A criminal information's allegations must be proven in order to obtain a conviction, and it is not sufficient that the evidence show a violation of the statute specified in the information if the actual violation is different from the one alleged. Thus, when in an information, one count requires proof of identical allegations (facts and elements) as another count, it would violate a defendant's double jeopardy protection if he were convicted of both and then punished for both. The proper remedy, however, is not to dismiss before trial some counts based on what might happen because the government will not be denied the right to charge the separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. But if, after trial, the court finds the defendant guilty of both counts, a conviction will be entered only on one of those two counts. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 530-31 (Chk. 2009).

When, in the information and supporting affidavit or in the material before the court during the pretrial motion hearing, no notice was given the defendants of any act or conduct by either of them that was alleged to constitute aiding and abetting, the aiding and abetting counts against them will be dismissed. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 532 (Chk. 2009).

When notice was given a defendant, and even relied upon by him in his motion, of his alleged conduct to aid and abet, the prosecution will be given time to either amend the information to include that conduct or to dismiss the aiding and abetting counts against him. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 532 (Chk. 2009).

A motion to dismiss conspiracy counts will be denied when the affidavit stated the essential facts constituting the charges and was based on the first-hand knowledge of the affiant who was the investigating officer; when the information clearly stated the nature of the acts charged; and when, although the affidavit referred to witness statements that were suppressed, the affidavit also contained a considerable amount of other evidence, including the substance of the affiant's interviews with eye-witnesses, which supported probable cause. Such hearsay statements, if reliable, may support a finding of probable cause for instituting a prosecution. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

An allegation that the defendants "did unlawfully conspire" to do some act is an allegation that there was an agreement since the word "conspire" means to join in secret agreement to do an unlawful or wrongful act or to use such means to accomplish a lawful end. By alleging that the defendants "conspired to" do something, the information alleges that the defendants joined in an agreement. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

An information will not be thrown out because of minor, technical objections which do not prejudice the accused. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 77 (Chk. 2010).

When the defendant asserts that the investigating officer's affidavit was deficient because it is inconsistent with the date specified in the police report but this argument was not raised in the defendant's pre-trial motions as a challenge to the sufficiency of the affidavit of probable cause and therefore to the extent the defendant contends there was a defect in the information, that objection was waived. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A defendant's contention that as a result of the police report containing an inconsistent date of the offense, he was misled as to when the alleged offense took place, borders on the spurious because the information is the charging document that informs the defendant of the charge he is called upon to defend against and a police report that was not mentioned in the affidavit of probable cause and which no one sought to admit into evidence has no bearing on whether the defendant was sufficiently informed of the allegations. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

If before trial a defendant asserts that an affidavit was deficient because the affiant did not indicate the sources of his investigation, and that there was no probable cause to support the allegations regarding the dates of the offense, the court could then have addressed the asserted deficiencies, but when he did not, issues regarding deficiencies in the information were waived. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A mere inconsistency between the allegations contained in the information and a document that the defendant did not seek to admit into evidence does not provide the court with a substantial question of law or fact. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

In a criminal contempt proceeding, an order to show cause (the notice) why someone should not be held in contempt must describe the contempt charged as criminal contempt as required by Criminal Procedure Rule 42(b), which requires that the notice shall state the essential facts constituting the criminal contempt charged, describing it as such. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

When the affidavit in support of the information is simply too vague, it does not contain any evidence or factual information that might lead a cautious person to believe it likely that defendant committed a crime prior to being arrested and searched. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

An affidavit's failure to establish probable cause does not affect the information's charging or notice-providing component. An information's fundamental purpose is to inform the defendant of the charges so that he may prepare his defense, and to advise the court of the facts alleged so that the court may determine whether those facts, if proven, may support a conviction. An information deficient in these respects may be dismissed without prejudice. The test for a particular information's sufficiency is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge as stated therein. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When a factually-sufficient information is unsupported by an affidavit showing probable cause but at the motion hearing the State, although neither was the affiant, elicited testimony from an officer involved in the actual arrest and another involved in defendant's search and booking and the arresting officer provided sufficient detail to remedy the affidavit's defects; when the accused was given the opportunity, and in fact did, cross-examine both witnesses; when the court finds their testimony credible and is satisfied that ample probable cause existed for accused's arrest; and when there is nothing before the court to indicate that the accused would in any way be prejudiced if the sworn testimony elicited at the hearing were admitted for the purposes of demonstrating that law enforcement had probable cause to arrest and subsequently search the accused incident to his arrest, at the time he was arrested, the information's charging portion remains unaffected and the accused's motion to suppress will be denied. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

An information is sufficient if it is a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged and if it sufficiently apprises the defendant of the charges against which he must be prepared to defend and is sufficiently detailed to enable him to plead this case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same offense. Each count in an information should stand on its own although facts alleged therein may be incorporated by reference, and this is true for each defendant. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 393 (Chk. 2011).

An information must state for each count the citation of the statute, rule, regulation or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged to have violated. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 393 (Chk. 2011).

The mere conclusion that the defendant violated the statute does not supply the necessary factful allegations to charge an offense. The general rule is that an information is insufficient if it states conclusions rather than the facts upon which the conclusions are based. However, such facts need not be stated in detail. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 393-94 (Chk. 2011).

Although to establish legal requirements in criminal cases, the court must first consult FSM sources of law rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, the court may consult U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting an FSM criminal procedure rule when it has not previously construed the rule and the rule is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, such as when court has not previously considered some aspects of an information's sufficiency under Criminal Rule 7(c). FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 394 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

An information must charge all the essential elements of the offense, and, although liberality is the guide in testing an information's sufficiency, this applies to matters of form and not of substance. The omission of an essential element from the pleading cannot be cured by citing the statute. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 394 (Chk. 2011).

If a statute makes it an offense to do a certain act "contrary to law," it is not enough simply to cite the statute and to allege that the act was done contrary to law. The pleading must show what other law was violated, either by a citation or by a sufficient statement of facts. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 394 (Chk. 2011).

An information that charges that a defendant's shotgun possession is "unlawful" omits the essential element of a factual allegation that makes that possession unlawful when it cites a statute that provides that "[n]o person shall manufacture, purchase, sell, possess or carry any firearm, dangerous device, or ammunition other than as hereinafter provided" and several different following provisions create different ways a shotgun's possession could be unlawful and carry varying penalties. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 394 (Chk. 2011).

In assessing the factual specificity of a charging instrument, courts start from the assumption that the defendant is innocent and consequently has no knowledge of the facts charged against him. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 395 (Chk. 2011).

When a count, even reading it together with the facts incorporated by reference and the supporting affidavit, does not include all the essential elements constituting the offense that the prosecution has charged, it must be dismissed. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 395 (Chk. 2011).

Usually when a defendant challenges whether the supporting affidavit shows probable cause for a charged offense, the prosecution will call witnesses and possibly introduce exhibits in order to firmly establish probable cause for the offense charged since the prosecution has the burden to establish probable cause. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 395 (Chk. 2011).

When there is just barely enough evidence and information in the supporting affidavit sufficiently persuasive to warrant the court to believe it is more likely than not that the violation of the law occurred as charged and that the accused committed that violation, the motion to dismiss the challenged count will be denied. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 395-96 (Chk. 2011).

A challenge to a count that is merely a semantical word game must be rejected. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 397 (Chk. 2011).

FSM Criminal Rule 12(a) abolishes motions to quash an information. However, since under FSM law any relief possible under the common law motions and pleas abolished by Rule 12(a) may be sought by pretrial motion under FSM Criminal Rule 12(b), the court will consider a defendant's motion to quash the information as a Rule 12(b) motion to dismiss the information. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 425 (Pon. 2011).

A criminal information's primary purpose is to inform the defendant of the charges against him so that he may prepare his defense, and to advise the court of the facts alleged so that the court may determine whether those facts, if proven, may support a conviction. An information deficient in these respects may be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 426 (Pon. 2011).

The test for whether a particular information is sufficient is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge(s) as stated therein. To determine whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit(s) must be read together. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 426 (Pon. 2011).

When the three officers' affidavits are sufficient to establish facts which, if proven, may support the defendant's conviction on the charges brought; when the connection between a customs officer and an informant, to the extent that it exists, is not necessary to show probable cause to arrest the defendant; and when the affidavits support the discovery of significant quantities of a leafy substance resembling marijuana in the defendant's backpack, as well as further tests of that substance which revealed that it was marijuana, these affidavits provide probable cause to believe that a crime was committed, and the defendant's motion to dismiss the information will be denied. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 426 (Pon. 2011).

When the affidavit identifies its author as a Chuuk State Public Safety Department police detective and indicates that the detective was assigned to investigate the offenses alleged in the information; when the affidavit does not identify informants but describes facts uncovered during the course of the investigation; and when the defendant admits that the affiant formed his conclusions based upon the alleged victim's representations, the affiant's failure to name sources of information does not render the affidavit defective, in part because the defendant admits that the affiant gathered information directly from the victim. The affidavit does not suffer from multiple layers of hearsay because the affiant identifies himself and attests to personally investigating the criminal violations alleged. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 513 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

An information is sufficient if: 1) it is a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged; 2) it sufficiently apprises the defendant of the charges against which he must be prepared to defend; and 3) it is sufficiently detailed to enable him to plead the case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same offense. An information must also charge all the essential elements of the offense, and, although liberality is the guide in testing an information's sufficiency, this applies to matters of form and not of substance. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 519 (Chk. 2011).

Since the Criminal Procedure Rules are designed to avoid technicalities and gamesmanship in criminal pleading and are to be construed to secure simplicity in procedure, an information will not be thrown out because of minor, technical objections which do not prejudice the accused. The Rules do not countenance the practice of fine combing or nit picking a criminal information for verbal and technical omissions; substantial compliance is sufficient. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 519-20 (Chk. 2011).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' cases, when the court has not previously considered certain aspects of a criminal information's sufficiency under Criminal Rule 7, an FSM criminal procedure rule that is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 520 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

Each count in an information should stand on its own although the facts alleged therein may be incorporated by reference, and this is true for each defendant. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 520 (Chk. 2011).

To determine a criminal information's sufficiency, the information and its supporting affidavit(s) must be read together. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 520 (Chk. 2011).

When the information and supporting affidavits allege that the accused cashed various national government checks that were made payable to fictitious people and that he and his codefendant shared the money thus obtained, those allegations are sufficient to put the accused on notice that the national government claims a legal, equitable, or possessory interest in the funds that the checks were used to obtain and the allegation that the codefendants made checks out to fictitious persons using legitimate travel authorization numbers for other persons and then cashed those checks, dividing the proceeds among themselves, is sufficient to put the accused on notice that the prosecution alleges that the checks were not authorized. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 520 (Chk. 2011).

When the information charges that the accused "invited reliance on these false checks by asking the same be cashed, effectively requesting the financial system and the FSM National Government to accept these false checks as true," and when this charge tracks the statutory language in subdivision 524(1)(c), wherein criminal liability is imposed when a person "invites reliance on any writing which he or she knows to be . . . lacking in authenticity," the accused should not be prejudiced merely because the information cited section 524 instead of subdivision 524(1)(c). FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 521 (Chk. 2011).

When construing the meaning of an information, the description of the alleged conduct is far more critical than the information's prefatory language or its citation of a particular provision of a statute. It is the statement of facts in the pleading, rather than the statutory citation, that is controlling, and if an information properly charges an offense under the laws it is sufficient even though the government attorney may have supposed that the offenses charged were covered by a different statute. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 521 (Chk. 2011).

When the accused is fully informed of the charge against him and the information contains every element of the charge, the accused will have no basis for relief even if the information cites to the wrong subsection, or if it cites to a section and the specific subsection is omitted. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 521 (Chk. 2011).

Although an information must state for each count the citation of the statute, rule, regulation or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged to have violated, an error in the citation or description or its omission will not be ground for the information's dismissal if the error or omission did not mislead the defendant to the defendant's prejudice. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 521 (Chk. 2011).

An information should be drawn with greater care. The prosecution should in all cases specify the particular provision or subsection on which the charge is based. By doing so it will ensure that the defendant receives fair warning of the charge against which he or she must defend and will at the same time avoid unnecessary risks to itself on appeal. But when an information falls short of this desired standard, it is still sufficient if it fairly informs the accused of the charge against him. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 521 (Chk. 2011).

When the information alleges that the accused presented checks to merchants knowing that those checks were false documents, those factual allegations, supported by affidavit, establish probable cause that the accused violated 11 F.S.M.C. 529(1)(b). FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 522 (Chk. 2011).

A conspiracy count is sufficient if it alleges an agreement, and identifies the object towards which the agreement is directed and an overt act. But it is not necessary that the information state the object of the agreement with the detail required of an information charging the substantive offense, and it is not necessary in a conspiracy charge to allege with precision all the elements essential to the offense which is the object of a conspiracy; allegations clearly identifying the offense the defendants conspired to commit are sufficient. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 523 (Chk. 2011).

When, although the information could have been drawn with greater care, the accused is not misled to his prejudice because the prosecution failed to cite the statute(s) that the codefendants allegedly conspired to violate, the conspiracy count will not be dismissed. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 523 (Chk. 2011).

An accused is not misled about the underlying crime that he is charged with conspiring to commit when, between the conspiracy count, the facts incorporated therein by reference, and the supporting affidavits, it should be clear that he is charged with conspiring to take, through the use of national government checks with fictitious payees, money from the FSM national government to which neither he nor his codefendant had any rightful claim and when the conspiracy count, the facts incorporated therein by reference, and the supporting affidavits describe the substantive underlying offense with enough specificity to sufficiently apprise the accused of the charges against which he must be prepared to defend and it is sufficiently detailed to enable him to plead the case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same crime. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 523 (Chk. 2011).

When, although the affiant does not identify sources of information in his affidavit, the court finds that the description he includes regarding the results of his investigation are enough to enable a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the laws charged in the information occurred; when if the affiant obtained information from the statements of any witnesses, as hearsay it is permissible in making the probable cause determination; when it appears from the affidavit that the officer was able to observe damage to a vehicle that the defendant caused, the court will find that probable cause existed to support the information's charges and that defendant's motion to dismiss the information is without merit and will be denied. Chuuk v. Mitipok, 17 FSM R. 552, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Since an information's fundamental purpose is to inform the accused of the charges so that he may prepare his defense, the test for sufficiency is whether it is fair to the accused to require him to defend on the basis of the charges as stated in the information. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 127 (Chk. 2011).

Generally, an information is sufficient if it adequately apprises the accused of the charges against which the accused must be prepared to defend and if it is detailed enough to enable the accused to plead the case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same offenses. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 127 (Chk. 2011).

Since the possession of any handgun is banned, an information charging the illegal possession of a handgun is not deficient when the information does not allege the handgun's exact barrel length, color, caliber, or whether the handgun was a pistol or a revolver. The allegation that an accused possessed a handgun is an allegation that the firearm had a barrel length under twenty-six inches because that is the statutory definition of a handgun. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 127 (Chk. 2011).

Three of the four 11 F.S.M.C. 1003 statutory exemptions for firearms possession are defenses within 11 F.S.M.C. 107 for which the accused has the burden of going forward with sufficient evidence to raise these exemptions as issues although the ultimate burden of persuasion still remains with the government. The prosecution does not have to make the initial showing but ultimately bears the burden of disproving the applicability of the exception when it is properly presented. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 128 (Chk. 2011).

A information is not insufficient because it fails to plead that the handgun the accused allegedly possessed was currently operable. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 128 (Chk. 2011).

The inapplicability of the 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2) exemption is an essential element of the government's case in a prosecution for unlawful possession of a firearm, and since it is an essential element 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2)'s inapplicability must be pled. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 128-29 (Chk. 2011).

An information must charge all the essential elements of the offense, when it does not include all the essential elements constituting the offense that the prosecution has charged, it must be dismissed. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

An information charging firearms possession is sufficient if it or the supporting affidavit contains an allegation that negates any one of the three 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2) requirements and the prosecution's proof at trial is sufficient if it negates beyond a reasonable doubt any one of the three requirements. FSM v.

Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

Liberality is the guide in testing an information's sufficiency in charging all the essential elements of the offense, although this applies to matters of form and not of substance. To determine whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit must be read together. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

If an information charging handgun possession or its supporting affidavit contains allegations from which it may be inferred that the 1003(2) exemption is inapplicable, it is sufficient. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

A supporting affidavit's averment that the accused had been drinking and was openly displaying the handgun at the public market is viewed as just barely enough to give the accused notice of the essential element of the charges against him that the 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2) exemption does not apply because in the appellate court's view, an intoxicated defendant displaying a firearm in public is inconsistent with the 1003(2) exemption because it is inconsistent with a claim that the accused was keeping the handgun as a curio, ornament, or a piece with historical value. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

The test for a particular information's sufficiency is whether it is fair to defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge stated therein. Chuuk v. Akapito, 19 FSM R. 13, 14 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

To determine whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit must be read together, and allegations against the defendant in one count may be incorporated by reference in another count. Chuuk v. Akapito, 19 FSM R. 13, 14 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

If, when reading the information and supporting affidavit together, it is apparent that there are sufficient facts to give notice to the defendant that he is being charged with allegedly running over a certain victim, such notice is enough to allow him to prepare his defense. Chuuk v. Akapito, 19 FSM R. 13, 14-15 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Probable cause is present when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. A court must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. Chuuk v. Akapito, 19 FSM R. 13, 15 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Probable cause existed when the affidavit of probable cause includes such facts that the court can find that the detective had sufficient information to believe that it was more likely than not a violation of the law had occurred involving the defendant. Chuuk v. Akapito, 19 FSM R. 13, 15 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A criminal defendant is not in danger of being subjected to multiple punishments in the same prosecution until the defendant has been found guilty. A pretrial motion raising a double jeopardy claim of multiple punishments is premature because the defendant may be acquitted on one or all of the charges. Thus, multiple charges in an information is not a defect in the information and is not a claim that is required to be made before trial or it will be deemed waived. A defendant's multiple punishment double jeopardy claim is a claim that cannot be raised before trial but may be raised after guilty findings for more than one offense. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 208 (App. 2013).

Under FSM Criminal Rule 7(d), the court has the authority to strike a surplusage from the information. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 619 (Pon. 2014).

A criminal information's primary purpose is to inform the defendant of the charges against him so that he may prepare his defense, and to advise the court of the facts alleged so that the court may determine whether those facts, if proven, may support a conviction. An information deficient in these respects may be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 108 (Pon. 2015).

The test for a particular information's sufficiency is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge as stated therein. Liberality is the guide in testing an information's sufficiency in charging all the essential elements of the offense, although this applies to matters of form and not of substance. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 108-09 (Pon. 2015).

An information will not be thrown out because of minor, technical objections which do not prejudice the accused because the Criminal Procedure Rules do not countenance the practice of fine combing or nit picking a criminal information for verbal and technical omissions. Substantial compliance is sufficient. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 109 (Pon. 2015).

To determine whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit must be read together. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 109 (Pon. 2015).

When the supporting affidavit refers to "Governor Ehsa"; when paragraph 1 of the information states that "the defendant, John Ehsa," is an FSM citizen and a Pohnpei resident; when paragraph 4 refers to the "defendant, the Governor of the State of Pohnpei" and paragraph 5 quotes the court order, whose alleged violation gave rise to this criminal case, as enjoining, among others, "John Ehsa, in his capacity as Governor," that leaves no doubt that the defendant named as John Ehsa in paragraph 1 of the Information is the John Ehsa who is the Governor of Pohnpei. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 109 (Pon. 2015).

A criminal case is not a civil action where a person might appear in his official capacity, or his individual capacity, or both. In a criminal case, a person can only be prosecuted as an individual regardless of what capacity he was acting under while committing the acts that gave rise to the prosecution. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 109 (Pon. 2015).

When the charges are pled in the disjunctive – or – so that the prosecution only has to prove one of several methods of committing the crimes charged; when the counts are very clear about the defendant's conduct for which the prosecution seeks to hold him criminally liable; and when the counts clearly state the act(s) that the defendant is accused of committing that allegedly give rise to criminal liability, the information is sufficient to permit the defendant to prepare his defense and it is fair to require him to defend on the basis of the charges as pled. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 110 (Pon. 2015).

When an information's language is more specific than the language of the statute under which the offense is charged, the prosecution must establish those specific facts in addition to a violation of the statute. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165-66 (App. 2015).

The test for a particular information's sufficiency is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge as stated therein. Liberality is the guide in testing an information's sufficiency in charging all of the offense's essential elements, although this applies to matters of form and not of substance. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 234 (Pon. 2015).

The court will take an information's factual allegations as true for jurisdictional purposes and determine whether those factual allegations do allege a crime over which the court can exercise jurisdiction. The government's allegations remain to be proven at trial. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 234 (Pon. 2015).

When an information charges, in different counts, contamination of both the FSM territorial waters and its Exclusive Economic Zone, the FSM must prove not only that the contamination occurred but also where it occurred since it is unlikely that the contamination took place when the vessel was at a location where trash thrown overboard could contaminate both the territorial sea and the EEZ. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R.

If a statute makes it an offense to do a certain act "contrary to law," it is not enough simply to cite the statute and to allege that the act was done contrary to law. The pleading must show what other law was violated, either by a citation or by a sufficient statement of facts. This is because an information must be sufficiently certain and unambiguous so as to permit the defendant to prepare its defense, and to inform the court of which of this particular defendant's alleged acts or omissions result in criminal liability. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 303 (Pon. 2016).

An information is sufficient if it contains a plain, definite, and concise statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged so that the defendant can prepare his defense and so that the defendant can avail himself of his conviction or acquittal as a bar to subsequent prosecutions. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 303 (Pon. 2016).

A count will not be dismissed if it contains a sufficient statement of the facts that allegedly give rise to criminal liability so as to inform the defendants so that they can prepare their defense and so that they can avail themselves of a conviction or acquittal as a bar to subsequent prosecutions. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 303 (Pon. 2016).

When the FSM's failure to incorporate the fisheries management agreement provisions by reference in statute, or regulation, or in permits and access agreements leaves the law so vague and ill-defined that what are the acts prohibited cannot be understood by people of ordinary intelligence, and so it cannot serve as a basis for criminal prosecution, the court must grant the defendants' motion to dismiss those counts for the Information's failure to charge an offense. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 305 (Pon. 2016).

Any defendant in a criminal case has the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation against him. This constitutional protection is implemented through Criminal Rule 7(c)(1), which requires that the information be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2017).

An information is required to: 1) contain a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential elements of the offense charged; 2) fairly inform the defendant of the charge against which he must defend; and 3) enable the defendant to plead an acquittal or conviction in bar of future prosecutions of the same offense. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2017).

The information's fundamental purpose is to inform the defendant of the charge so that he may prepare his defense, and the test for sufficiency is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge as stated in the particular information. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2017).

An information should be sufficiently definite, certain, and unambiguous as to permit the accused to prepare his defense. Common sense will be a better guide than arbitrary and artificial rules, and the sufficiency of the information will be determined on the basis of practical, rather than technical, considerations. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2017).

An information is sufficient if it contains a plain, definite, and concise statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged so that the defendant can prepare his defense and so that the defendant can avail himself of his conviction or acquittal as a bar to subsequent prosecutions. The true test of an information's sufficiency is not whether it could have been made more definite and certain, but whether it contains the elements of the offenses intended to be charged. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2017).

At common law, an allegation of the date of the crime was required, and a good pleading will still state that the crime was committed on a particular day, month, and year. However, the modern view is that a defect in the allegation of the date is a defect in form only. Indeed, great generality in the date allegation is acceptable. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 201 (Chk. 2017).

When time is not an essential element in trafficking in children cases; when the pertinent statute does not require proof of an exact date; and when each count of the information alleges the offenses occurred in the latter months of 2015, including September and October, the criminal information alleges with sufficient specificity the time period the offenses were allegedly committed so as to satisfy the defendants' right to due process. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 202 (Chk. 2017).

Although it is desirable for the information to allege the place where the alleged crime was committed, it is sufficient to state that the crime took place within the court's jurisdiction. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 202 (Chk. 2017).

Since location is not an essential element in trafficking in children cases and since the pertinent statute does not require proof of an exact location, when each count alleges the general areas on Patta Island of Chuuk where the offenses were allegedly committed, the criminal information alleges with sufficient specificity the locations that the offenses were allegedly committed so as to satisfy the defendants' right to due process. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 202 (Chk. 2017).

Since the human trafficking statute does not define recruiting, transporting, harboring, transferring, or receiving, these words' plain meaning will be used to determine whether the actions alleged in each count of the criminal information are included within the statute. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 203 (Chk. 2017).

When, without getting into a lesson in semantics, the statutory words' plain meanings lead to the conclusion that the human trafficking statute intended to include the actions allegedly taken by the defendants to secure access to the minor victim because the various methods by which they gained access to her were a form of recruitment and in each allegation the minor was received by the respective defendant. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 203 (Chk. 2017).

There are two essential elements a criminal information charging conspiracy must contain to satisfy due process standards – 1) an agreement with one or more persons that they, or one or more of them, will commit a crime and 2) an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy by a party to the conspiracy. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

A conspiracy count is sufficient if it alleges an agreement, identifies the object towards which the agreement is directed, and an overt act. It is not necessary that the information state the object of the agreement with the detail required of an information charging the substantive offense or that it allege with precision all the elements essential to the offense which is the conspiracy's object; allegations clearly identifying the offense the defendants conspired to commit are sufficient. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

For conspiracy, the agreement does not have to be explicit. A mere tacit understanding will suffice, and there need not be any written statement or even a speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

Merely because each defendant acted individually after the implicit agreement does not mean a conspiracy was not committed because any party to the conspiracy who then commits an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy satisfies the statute's second essential element. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 205 (Chk. 2017).

Although the criminal information could have been drafted with greater care, the defendants are not misled to their prejudice based on the information's language charging them with conspiracy to commit trafficking in children when, from Counts I through VIII and the supporting affidavit, it should be clear that they are charged with conspiring to commit the offense of trafficking in children and when the conspiracy count (IX) describes the substantive underlying offense with enough specificity to sufficiently apprise the defendants of the charges which they must be prepared to defend and when it is detailed enough so that they may plead this case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same crime alleged. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 205 (Chk. 2017).

An information's fundamental purpose is to inform the defendant of the charges so that the defendant may prepare a defense, and to advise the court of the facts alleged so that the court may determine whether those facts, if proven, may support a conviction. An information deficient in these respects may be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 397 (Kos. 2017).

An information is sufficient if it is a plain, concise, and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged, and if it sufficiently apprises the defendant of the charges against which the defendant must be prepared to defend and is sufficiently detailed to enable the defendant to plead the case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same offense. It is generally sufficient that an information set forth the offense in the words of the statute itself when those two basic requirements are met. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 397-98 (Kos. 2017).

Each count in an information should stand on its own although facts alleged therein may be incorporated by reference, and, the information must state for each count the citation of the statute, rule, regulation, or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged to have violated. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398 (Kos. 2017).

The information must charge all the essential elements of the offense, but such facts need not be stated in detail. To determine whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit must be read together. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398 (Kos. 2017).

Pleading whether the firearms in question were .22 caliber handguns or .22 caliber rifles is essential because importing the former is banned by the statute, while importing the latter is not. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398 (Kos. 2017).

Rule 7(a) requires a criminal information to be a plain, concise, and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the crime charged. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 504 (Pon. 2018).

To determine whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit(s) must be read together. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 504 (Pon. 2018).

A motion for a bill of particulars will be denied when the facts as alleged in four different, detailed affidavits include dates, locations, and amounts of money exchanged, and in addition to the charges as set forth in the information, give the defendant sufficient knowledge of the charges against him so that there will be no prejudicial surprise to him. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 504 (Pon. 2018).

Under both the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions, an accused has the right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation. This right has been incorporated into the Chuuk Rules of Criminal Procedure and requires that a criminal information be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged, and state, for each count, the citation of the statute, rule, regulation, or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged to have violated. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 653 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The standard for statutes to comply with a defendant's "right to be informed" is that a criminal statute must be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that persons of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. The constitutional clauses speak of rights to be informed of the nature of the charges and to receive due process. This is not language calculated to require absolute precision or even the best possible statement of the charge or violation. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 653 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Rule 7 requires that the information consist of a plain, concise, and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged, and it must cite for each count the statute, rule, regulation, or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged to have violated. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The State may only prosecute offenses by information, and, by implication, it may not prosecute an offense outside the information. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

If the information does not sufficiently inform the accused of the charges against him, he may file for a bill of particulars, although a bill of particulars in not necessarily a "right," and it is preconditioned on the State having listed actionable charges within the information against the accused. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Common sense dictates that a charge for "liability for the crimes of another" must state which "crimes of the other" the State intends to charge the defendant with. Stated differently, "liability for the crimes of another" is a charge that is always dependent on an independent charge towards another person – it thus may not stand as an independent charge without reference to another's criminal misconduct, coupled with the law allegedly violated. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Rule 7 prohibits the State from prosecuting someone for offense not listed in the information. As a dependent charge, "liability for the crimes of another" cannot be prosecuted alone unless an independent charge against another is explicitly referenced in the information. "Liability for the crimes of another" is thus not an actionable charge all by itself. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 414 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

As a matter of law, the State may not prosecute a defendant for charges not included in the information. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 414 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Since Chuuk State Law No. 6-66 provides liability for the crime of another if the defendant intentionally aids, abets, advises, solicits, counsels, or conspires to commit an offense, or fails to follow a legal duty to prevent the offense's commission, or causes an innocent to engage in criminal conduct, when the affidavit of probable cause provides no facts to show that the accused did any of these things and, instead, it states that another's assault with a dangerous weapon crime occurred well before March 19, 2019, the accused's turning a boat around on March 19, 2019 could never qualify as aiding or abetting an act of alleged criminal activity completed well before that date and therefore fails to meet the standard of probable cause that a crime had been committed. Since the Chuuk Constitution requires a showing of probable cause for the State to file a case, and where there is none, the Chuuk Constitution requires the court to dismiss the case. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 414 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The terms "criminal complaint" and "criminal information" are not interchangeable. "Criminal complaint" refers to a written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged that was made upon oath before a judicial officer or a clerk of court. A complaint's principal function is as a basis for an application for an arrest warrant, but no complaint is needed, if a more formal determination of probable cause is made first because if an information has been filed before the arrest, a warrant may be issued on this ground alone. A "criminal information" is a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged, that must be signed by the government's attorney. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 441 n.1 (Yap 2020).

The information is the charging document, and it need not be limited to the terms of the complaint. Thus, a criminal complaint could be signed by the arresting officer, with the accused later prosecuted by an information signed by a government attorney. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 441 n.1 (Yap 2020).

The court has consistently held that when determining whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit(s) must be read together. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 442

The test for a particular information's sufficiency is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge as stated therein. Liberality is the guide in testing an information's sufficiency in charging all of the crime's essential elements, although this applies to matters of form and not of substance. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 442 (Yap 2020).

An accused's contention that the information is defective because various factual allegations are missing in the information itself is a matter of form, not substance when the information's supporting affidavit includes sufficient factual allegations to fairly inform the accused of the essential elements of the charges against him so that he may fashion a defense and to also inform the court of the facts alleged so that it can determine whether those facts, if proven, would support a conviction. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 442 (Yap 2020).

Since the court's rules require only that the information be signed by the attorney for the government, when the signer is unquestionably an attorney, is unquestionably employed by the government, and is acting on the government's behalf, he has apparent authority to sign a criminal information. If the signer's actions exceed what he was contracted to do or what any written or oral amendment to that contract authorized him to do, that is a matter for the contracting parties to resolve between themselves. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 444 (Yap 2020).

– Information – Amendment

At the trial judge's discretion, the information may be amended to conform to the evidence if it appears fair to do so. Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 494 (App. 1984).

The government will be permitted to file an amended information to dismiss those counts for which the statute of limitations has expired. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 545 (Pon. 1998).

A motion to dismiss an information because the named defendant is not a formally constituted entity is moot when the government's motion to amend the information to change the defendant's name to its proper name is granted. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 142 (Pon. 1999).

The court may permit an information to be amended at any time before making its finding of guilty or not guilty if no additional or different offense is charged and if the defendant's substantial rights are not prejudiced. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. 2006).

If the government adds a completely new or different offense of which the defendant had no notice, Rule 7(e) would be violated. But since the original information contained the factual elements necessary to charge the defendants as aiding or abetting another, the defendants had notice of the offense and their substantial rights are not prejudiced. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. 2006).

Amending an information to include a crime that is not a lesser included offense of the original charge does not necessarily violate Rule 7(e). FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. 2006).

The court may permit an information to be amended as any time before finding if no additional or different offense is charged and if substantial rights of the defendant are not prejudiced. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 610 (Pon. 2007).

If the government were to file an amended criminal information which contained the signature of the Secretary of the Department of Transportation, Communication and Infrastructure, i.e., signed by that official, and if the inclusion of this signature reflected the only difference between such an information and the previously-filed amended criminal information, then there would be no additional or different offense that is being charged, nor would any substantial rights of the defendant be prejudiced. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 610-11 (Pon. 2007).

The court may permit an information to be amended at any time before finding if no additional or different offense is charged and if substantial rights of the defendant are not prejudiced. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 460 (Chk. 2007).

The filing of an amended information does not require a second affidavit if the affidavit filed with the original information established probable cause as to the amended charge. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 460-61 (Chk. 2007).

No additional or different offense was charged in an amended information and the defendants' substantial rights were not prejudiced when the defendants had, by reading the original information and the affidavit together, notice from the start of the factual allegations in the case. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 461 (Chk. 2007).

To the extent that a count is amended to charge aiding and abetting the use of a firearm to commit assault and homicide may subject the defendants, if convicted, to heavier sentences, such an amendment is not barred because no additional or different offense has been charged and the defendants have been on notice from the start (because of the affidavit accompanying the original complaint) that the prosecution alleged that they were criminally liable for another's use of a firearm to commit assault and homicide. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 461 (Chk. 2007).

Since the court may permit an information to be amended at any time before finding if no additional or different offense is charged and if the defendant's substantial rights are not prejudiced, when, before the trial court's finding, the information was amended to add violation of section 548 of the 1980 criminal code to violation of section 529 of the 2001 criminal code; when the two sections are identical in all but in two inconsequential ways (in 2001 violation of the statute is changed from being an "offense" to being a "crime" and the feminine pronoun "she" is added to indicate that a man or woman can violate the statute); and when the elements of violating the two statutes and their respective penalty provisions are identical, no additional or different offense was charged by adding Section 548 to the information. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 555 (App. 2008).

When, because the two statutes are substantively identical, the appellants were not prejudiced in any way; when the appellants conceded there was nothing different that they would have done to prepare a defense for Section 548 as opposed to Section 529 and when the trial court explicitly gave the opportunity for the appellants to counter any perceived prejudice, amendment of the information to include both sections was proper. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 555 (App. 2008).

Since the court may permit an information to be amended at any time before finding if no additional or different offense is charged and if the defendant's substantial rights are not prejudiced, the court will permit amendments that only clarify the application of the relevant statutes and that make no further factual allegations and do not charge any different or additional offense. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

While Rule 7(e) bars amending an information to charge an additional offense, the prosecution may file a superseding information with additional charges. The Rule 7(e) bar does not apply to a superseding information. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

Amendments to the information are permitted when the original Information contained the factual elements necessary to charge the defendant thereby providing notice to the defendant of the offense and his substantial rights are not prejudiced by this amendment, but not if the government adds a completely new or different offense of which the defendant had no notice. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 59 (Kos. 2018).

An amendment to the information is permitted when it seeks only to clarify the application of relevant statutes, and no further factual allegations and no different or additional charges are made against the accused. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 59 (Kos. 2018).

An amendment to the information will be allowed, and the defendant's substantial rights are not prejudiced, when no new, additional, or different offense is charged since the amendment seeks only to change the date from "May of 2014" to "Sometime between May of 2014 and July of 2014," and since the crime's essential elements were provided in the information and that remains unchanged. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 59-60 (Kos. 2018).

Rule 7(e) does not affect a superseding information. While Rule 7(e) bars amending an information to charge an additional offense, the prosecution may file a superseding information with additional charges. An information is considered superseding when the subsequent information charges a different offense or alleges facts different from the original charges. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 444 (Yap 2020).

– Information – Superseding

The pretrial dismissal of an information, or of counts in an information, does not, if the facts permit, bar the prosecution from filing a superseding information if the accused has not yet been put in jeopardy. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 n.6 (Chk. 2011).

While Rule 7(e) bars amending an information to charge an additional offense, the prosecution may file a superseding information with additional charges. The Rule 7(e) bar does not apply to a superseding information. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

An information is considered superseding when the subsequent information charges a different offense or alleges facts different from the original charges. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

Generally, the prosecution will file a superseding information when new facts or evidence have come to light and it seeks to prosecute new or additional charges stemming from the same course of conduct or when the prosecution seeks to correct defects in the charges already filed. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

It is proper to file a superseding information in response to a defense motion to dismiss the original instrument for insufficiency. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 n.2 (Chk. 2011).

A superseding information may not be filed once jeopardy has attached or once the defendant has pled guilty, but if neither of these events has occurred, the government may, if the circumstances warrant, file a superseding information. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

A superseding information is proper unless it and the dismissal of the original information were done for the purpose of harassment. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

The dismissal of a prosecution without prejudice is proper when the information has been superseded since it is in the public interest that the prosecution accurately charges the offenses that may have been committed. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126-27 (Chk. 2011).

If, when a superseding information has been filed, more time to prepare a defense is needed, the proper remedy to cure that prejudice would be a continuance, not a dismissal. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 127 (Chk. 2011).

When a superseding information was filed along with the motion to dismiss, and the superseding information bears the current case's docket number and is not accompanied by its own affidavit(s) of probable cause, the court, based on these circumstances, must consider it to be a proposed superseding information. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 443 n.3 (Yap 2020).

Rule 7(e) does not affect a superseding information. While Rule 7(e) bars amending an information to charge an additional offense, the prosecution may file a superseding information with additional charges. An information is considered superseding when the subsequent information charges a different offense or alleges facts different from the original charges. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 444 (Yap 2020).

Generally, the prosecution will file a superseding information when new facts or evidence have come to light and it seeks to prosecute new or additional charges stemming from the same course of conduct or when the prosecution seeks to correct defects in the charges already filed. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 444 (Yap 2020).

The reasons for which a court may, under Rule 48(a), exercise its discretion and grant the government leave to dismiss an information are: 1] a plea agreement; 2] the defendant's death; 3] the defendant's incompetency to stand trial; 4] when the government's security interests might be placed at risk by disclosures at trial; 5] when a defendant has cooperated with a prosecutorial investigation; and 6] when the information has been superseded. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 444 (Yap 2020).

A dismissal properly taken under Rule 48(a) is without prejudice, and within the period of statute of limitations, a second information may be brought on the same charge. The result will be otherwise, and the dismissal will be with prejudice, if the government sought dismissal for an improper purpose, such as harassment of the defendant. Besides harassment, the court may also deny a motion to dismiss without prejudice if the motion is clearly contrary to manifest public interest. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 (Yap 2020).

Prosecutorial harassment can occur when the prosecutor charges, dismisses, and recharges a defendant and moves to dismiss an information over the defendant's objection. But a request for a dismissal of the original information without prejudice once a superseding information has been filed is usually not in bad faith because it is in the public interest that the prosecution accurately charges the offenses that may have been committed. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 (Yap 2020).

There are serious doubts that a defendant's not guilty plea would, by itself, ever be an adequate ground to deny a dismissal without prejudice after a superseding information has been filed. But a guilty plea would be a good reason because a guilty plea's waiver of trial means that jeopardy has attached. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 n.5 (Yap 2020).

– Interrogation and Confession

Courts may look to the Journals of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention for assistance in determining the meaning of constitutional language that does not provide an unmistakable answer. The Journals provide no conclusion as to whether promises of leniency by the police should be regarded as having compelled a defendant to give statements and other evidence but shows that the article IV, section 7 protection against self-incrimination was based upon the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution. Therefore courts within the Federated States of Micronesia may look to United States decisions to assist in determining the meaning of article IV, section 7. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 193-94 (Kos. 1986).

A confession which is the product of an essentially free and unconstrained choice by its maker may be used as evidence to establish the guilt of the defendant in court. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. 1986).

Although questioning of witnesses and suspects is a necessary tool for the effective enforcement of criminal law, courts have recognized that there is an unbroken line from physical brutality to more subtle police use of deception, intimidation and manipulation, and that vigilance is required. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. 1986).

In the area of police questioning and confessions, the protection against self-incrimination is the principal protection, designed to restrict or prevent use of devices to subvert the will of an accused. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. 1986).

Overall circumstances and not merely the existence or nonexistence of a promise determines whether a confession will be accepted as voluntary or rendered inadmissible as involuntary. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. 1986).

Voluntariness of a confession may not be resolved by reference to any single infallible touchstone, such as whether a promise was made, but instead must be determined by reference to the totality of surrounding circumstances. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 197 (Kos. 1986).

Where a police officer promised to reduce charges if the defendant cooperated but there was no other showing of police intimidation or manipulation and the defendant had recognized that his guilt was apparent, the confession was not induced by the promises but instead was a voluntary response to the futility of carrying the deceit further. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 198 (Kos. 1986).

Police may question persons who, while they are in police custody, fall under suspicion for another crime, without regard to the fact that other persons in a similar category would be released without questioning. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 199 (Kos. 1986).

Protection offered by the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia against compulsory self-incrimination is traceable to the fifth amendment of the United States Constitution. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 230 (Pon. 1987).

Voluntary admissions prompted by the accumulation of evidence against the defendant are a legitimate goal of police investigation. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 232 (Pon. 1987).

Where admissions have been obtained in the course of questioning conducted in violation of 12 F.S.M.C. 218, statutory policy calls for a presumption that subsequent admissions were obtained as a result of the violation. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 233 (Pon. 1987).

When a defendant has expressed a wish to meet with counsel before further questioning, questioning must cease at once. Any attempt by police officers to ignore or override the defendant's wish, or to dissuade him from exercising his right, violates 12 F.S.M.C. 218. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 237 (Pon. 1987).

A statement of a defendant may be used as evidence against him only if the statement was made voluntarily. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 238 (Pon. 1987).

In determining whether a defendant's statement to police is "voluntary," consistent with the due process requirements of the Constitution, courts should consider the totality of the surrounding circumstances. Courts review the actual circumstances surrounding confession and attempt to assess the psychological impact on the accused of those circumstances. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 238 (Pon. 1987).

The court will not issue a writ of certiorari to review the trial court's suppression of defendant's confession in a case in which no assignments of error are furnished to the court, although such decision effectively terminates the case because the government cannot continue its prosecution without the confession, and although no appeal is available to the government. In re Edward, 3 FSM R. 285, 286-87 (App. 1987).

Where no motion to suppress a confession has been made before trial and no cause has been offered as to the failure to raise the objection, the trial court was justified in finding that the defendant had waived any objection to the admission of the confession. In re Juvenile, 4 FSM R. 161, 163 (App. 1989).

Where the trial record shows no waiver of a minor's rights against self-incrimination, where a remarkable discrepancy exists between police procedure for taking a statement and the written evidence offered at trial, where the only evidence supporting the conviction other than the confession is an accomplice's testimony, where the minor is 16 years of age and had been on detention some 2 weeks prior to his confession, and where the parents of the minor were absent at the time the confession was made, the trial court erred in admitting the defendant's confession. In re Juvenile, 4 FSM R. 161, 164 (App. 1989).

A defendant's statement will be suppressed when the defendant has not been advised of all the rights set forth in 12 F.S.M.C. 218 (1)-(5), even though he was advised of the right to remain silent and the right to counsel and he waived those rights. FSM v. Sangechik, 4 FSM R. 210, 211-12 (Chk. 1990).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. There exists a presumption against such waivers. Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 159 (App. 1991).

Although implied waivers of a defendant's rights might be valid there is a presumption against a finding of a waiver of rights. Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 159-60 (App. 1991).

A form which advises a suspect of his right to lawyer, and of his right to remain silent but only asks if the suspect wants a lawyer now, is confusing and lacks a specific waiver as to the right to remain silent. Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 161 (App. 1991).

Although there is a danger of prejudice in cases where a co-defendant's inculpatory statement is admitted into evidence, because the court is hesitant to limit the broad discretion afforded the trial judge by Criminal Rule 14, and because many problems can be eliminated by redaction of the statement, the court will not adopt a per se rule of severance at this time. Hartman v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 224, 230 (App. 1991).

For a confession of a defendant to be admissible as evidence the defendant must not merely waive his right to counsel but must also specifically waive the independent right to remain silent. Hartman v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 224, 234-35 (App. 1991).

By responding voluntarily to questions asked without coercion, after he has been advised of his rights, a defendant waives his right to remain silent. FSM v. Hartman (I), 5 FSM R. 350, 352 (Pon. 1992).

If severance is denied, the defendants' out of court statements ought to be redacted to eliminate in each references to other codefendants. Failure to do so may result in reversal of convictions in the interests of justice. After redaction, no prejudice will occur if the statements then give no reference to any codefendant. Redaction can normally be accomplished by the parties. Thus the court will not view the statement until after redaction. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 301-02 & n.12 (App. 1993).

By statute, statements taken as a result of a violation of the defendant's statutory right to be brought before a judicial officer without unnecessary delay are inadmissible, even if voluntary. Chuuk v. Arnish, 6 FSM R. 611, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

Even if the police advise a person of all his rights in strict compliance with the statute, the issue remains whether the incriminating statement was voluntarily made. Voluntariness of a statement made while in custody is determined not by consideration of a single fact alone but instead by reference to the totality of surrounding circumstances. One of the standards to be applied in assessing a claim of involuntariness is the length of detention of the arrested person. FSM v. George, 6 FSM R. 626, 629 (Kos. 1994).

Statements made by a person being questioned by police without being advised of all his rights violates 12 F.S.M.C. 218. A statement so obtained is rendered inadmissible by 12 F.S.M.C. 220. FSM v. George, 6 FSM R. 626, 629 (Kos. 1994).

When a person's ability to think or reason has been diminished due to lack of rest by being held in custody for over 12 hours, his submission to questioning is not an act of voluntariness or consent even though he was advised of some of his rights just before questioning. Any statements made then were the products of physical exhaustion and a sense of oppression, and as a result of violation of the accused's rights under 12 F.S.M.C. 218. Under 12 F.S.M.C. 220, the statement, or evidence derived therefrom, is thus inadmissible against the accused. FSM v. George, 6 FSM R. 626, 629 (Kos. 1994).

When a defendant who testified in a civil contempt proceeding was not in custody, the civil contempt proceedings were not conducted to gather evidence for use in a subsequent criminal action and because a court is not required to warn a defendant of his right to counsel before giving testimony in a civil contempt proceeding, the defendant's testimony and voluntarily submitted pleadings in a civil contempt proceeding are admissible in a later criminal contempt proceeding. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 640 & n.2 (Chk. 1996).

A defendant's constitutional right against self-incrimination is an important right, and, although an implied waiver of the right might be valid, there is a presumption against such waivers. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

No FSM case determines that a corporation is a person for purposes of the privilege against self-incrimination found in article IV, section 7 of the FSM Constitution. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Fishery Co., 9 FSM R. 351, 352 (Kos. 2000).

Should the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination attach, it would be for the defendants to assert, not the FSM. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Fishery Co., 9 FSM R. 351, 353 (Kos. 2000).

Where a person's freedom was substantially restricted by a police officer when he was placed into a police car and where that person was under the police officer's suspicion that he was involved in the crimes committed earlier that evening, he was considered arrested for the purpose of the right to be advised of his constitutional rights to remain silent and to have legal counsel. And when the police officers failed to advise him of his constitutional rights at the time he was placed in the police car and considered arrested, all his statements made to the police after his arrest and placement into the police car and before he was advised of his constitutional rights, are inadmissible against him. Kosrae v. Erwin, 11 FSM R. 192, 193-94 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Statements made by an arrested person being questioned by police without having been advised of his constitutional rights violates the law and the Kosrae Constitution, and any such statement made by that person is inadmissible against him. Kosrae v. Erwin, 11 FSM R. 192, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A defendant's statement may be used as evidence against him only if the statement was made voluntarily. In deciding whether a statement was made voluntarily, the court will consider the totality of the circumstances. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The protection against self-incrimination requires the giving of the so-called "Miranda" warnings to the accused, prior to questioning of the accused. The "Miranda" warnings include statements made by the police officers to an accused regarding the accused's right to remain silent and right to legal counsel, free of charge. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Routine questioning by government agents as part of procedure does not require Miranda warnings. The purpose of this type of procedural questioning is not to compel the person being questioned to incriminate himself. The government agents cannot be held to foresee that criminal liability of the subject might be exposed during the questioning. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Routine traffic stops which occur on the open road in view of passersby, and which do not result in custodial interrogation, do not require Miranda warnings. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The requirements that a person's driver's license be in the immediate possession of the operator, and that the operator display his license to a police officer upon demand do not violate the Kosrae Constitution. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 257 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Any statements or confessions made after arrest but before accused was provided his rights is subject to suppression of the statements or confession, but when there was no statement and no confession made by the defendant between the time of arrest and the time of his booking a short time later, there are no statements or confessions to suppress. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 121 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the evidence was uncontroverted that the defendant signed a Chuukese language advice of rights form showing that he had been informed of each of his rights under 12 F.S.M.C. 218, that he understood those rights, and that he waived his rights to silence, to have an attorney or someone else present on his behalf, and to have someone called for him, the statement he gave at the time the advice of rights and waiver form was executed was knowingly and intelligently and therefore voluntarily given within 24 hours of his arrest. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. There exists a presumption against such waivers. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

For a defendant to voluntarily waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. There exists a presumption against such waivers. The government has overcome that presumption when it has produced signed advice of rights forms showing waivers and the defendants do not controvert that evidence. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 335 (Chk. 2006).

Our constitution provides a criminal defendant with the right to be confronted by his accusers, which means that a defendant may cross-examine the witness against him. Consequently, the court is forbidden to consider as evidence against a defendant any part of a non-testifying codefendant's statement which inculpates another defendant since a statement cannot be cross-examined. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 335 (Chk. 2006).

A "weapons lineup" conducted without any advice of rights or waiver beforehand, will be suppressed to the extent that the "weapons lineup" constituted statements by the defendants. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 335 (Chk. 2006).

If codefendants are tried together, a defendant's out-of-court statement ought to be redacted to eliminate references to other codefendants. Failure to do so may result in reversal of convictions in the interests of justice. After redaction, no prejudice will occur if the statements then give no reference to any codefendant. Redaction can normally be accomplished by the parties. Thus the court will not view the statement until after redaction. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 335 (Chk. 2006).

Evidence obtained as a result of the defendant being detained for more than 24 hours without being charged or released or obtained when the defendant was not properly informed of his rights must be excluded. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 210 (Pon. 2007).

When none of the evidence the defendant seeks to suppress was obtained as a result of his being detained for more than 24 hours without being charged or released since his interview by a state police officer took place approximately 7 hours after he was arrested and therefore before the expiration of the 24 hour period and since his interview with a national police officer took place two days after he was charged in the Pohnpei Supreme Court and while he was in state police custody pursuant to a Pohnpei Supreme Court order, the motion to suppress those statements will be denied. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 210 (Pon. 2007).

A defendant's contention that the state and national police failed to properly inform him of his rights is without merit where he was properly informed in Pohnpeian of his rights, including the right to remain silent and the right to counsel, three times when a state officer read him his rights in Pohnpeian as the officer arrested him in the morning, when the state officer read him his rights in Pohnpeian before his interview that afternoon, and when a national officer read him his rights in English and explained each right in Pohnpeian before his later interview, and thus his motion to suppress will be denied. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 210 (Pon. 2007).

When a defendant fails to address the particular circumstances of his warrantless arrest or the bearing on the probable cause showing, if any, of the witness testimony contained in the police report referred to in the affidavit supporting the criminal information, the court can discern no legal basis for dismissing the case and even assuming the defendant's arrest was illegal, he is not entitled to dismissal of the information. The remedy for an illegal arrest is suppression of any statements made by the defendant. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 265 & n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When a defendant did not make any statements to the police, there are no statements to suppress. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Failure to inform an accused of his rights does not in and of itself entitle an accused to an acquittal, but no evidence obtained as a result of such violation shall be admissible against the accused. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 352 (Pon. 2007).

When the police officers only viewed the accused as a potential witness in the matter of another person, not as a suspect; when the officers dropped him back off at the funeral where they originally met him instead of taking him to the police station and the officers never substantially restricted or controlled the accused's freedom of movement; when the accused agreed to take the officers to fetch the handgun at Palikir, and willingly went with them in the vehicle; and when there is simply no evidence that the officers threatened, demanded, or compelled the accused in any manner, the accused was not under arrest during the car ride to and from Palikir. Accordingly, the officers were not required to inform the accused of his rights under 12 F.S.M.C. 218. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2007).

When the court, based upon the witnesses' testimony, including their respective demeanor in the courtroom during the hearing, concludes that the accused was properly advised of his rights, including the right to remain silent, before he purportedly confessed to possessing a firearm and ammunition, the motion to suppress his confession will be denied. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2008).

The government has the burden of proving that an accused's statement is voluntary and thus admissible. Thus, although it was the defendant's motion to suppress, the government, because it has the burden, presented its side first at the suppression hearing. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 492-93 (Chk. 2008).

Where the court finds that an accused's statement was voluntarily made after he had been informed of, and understood his rights, and chose to waive those rights, that will not end the analysis if the accused has established a relationship between unlawful police activity and the evidence sought to be suppressed, because the burden is on the prosecution to show that the evidence is still admissible. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

It is unlawful for the government to fail either to release or charge an arrested person with a criminal offense within a reasonable time, which must under no circumstances exceed 24 hours. Thus, evidence, such as an accused's statement, obtained as a result of the defendant being detained for more than 24 hours without being charged or released must be excluded. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

When the defendant's advice of rights form waiving his rights was dated the day after his arrest and when the government presented no evidence as to the time of day on that the defendant made his statement on the day following his arrest or as to whether the statement was made within 24 hours of his arrest, the statement will be suppressed because once the defendant has established the government's unlawful act, it is the government's burden to show that the challenged evidence was not the result of that unlawful act. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

A defendant's suppressed statement may not be used against him at trial unless he chooses to testify on his own behalf, in which case, the statement may be used to impeach his credibility. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

Evidence and statements lawfully obtained from a defendant before he had been illegally detained over 24 hours will be admissible, but the defendant is entitled to the suppression of any evidence or statements obtained from him after his first 24 hours of detention. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

The remedy for a defendant's unlawful detention over 24 hours is not the dismissal of the information against him or the suppression of all evidence and statements obtained from him. His only remedy in a criminal prosecution (as opposed to a civil suit) is suppression of any evidence obtained as a result of the illegal detention. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

By statute, 12 F.S.M.C. 218, statements taken (even if made voluntarily) and evidence obtained as a result of a violation of the defendant's statutory right to be brought before a judicial officer without unnecessary delay are inadmissible, but when none of the evidence the defendant seeks to suppress was obtained as a result of his being detained for more than 24 hours, the motion to suppress will be denied. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

The government has the burden of proving that an accused's statement is voluntary and thus admissible. Thus, although it may be the defendant's motion to suppress, the government, because it has the burden, presents its side first at a suppression hearing. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

When the government did not present any evidence that the accused's statement(s) were voluntary, but instead, averred that it did not take any statement from him, if there were any statements by the accused in the prosecution's possession, they could be suppressed. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

A motion to suppress an accused's statement made while in police custody will be granted when the accused was unlawfully detained since he was held over 24 hours without being charged or brought before a judge and when the prosecution failed to prove that the custodial statement was given within 24 hours of his arrest. FSM v. Sippa, 16 FSM R. 247, 249 (Chk. 2009).

Although routine questioning by government agents does not require a rights warning to be given beforehand since the purpose of this type of procedural questioning is not to compel the person being questioned to incriminate himself, but when the questioning was not routine since the state police officer, who questioned the accused for 30 minutes outside of where he lived, did so because a complainant had named the accused as the person who had earlier possessed and discharged a firearm in her presence and when the accused was thus already a suspect and the officer's questioning was designed to elicit incriminating statements and to produce incriminating evidence while the accused's freedom of movement was substantially restricted or controlled by the officer exercising official authority, the officer should have informed the accused of his rights before the questioning went very far. FSM v. Sippa, 16 FSM R. 247, 249 (Chk. 2009).

When, after the accused had been questioned for some time without being informed of his rights, the accused went into his residence, retrieved a handgun and five shells, and came out and turned the gun and ammunition over to the officer, the firearm was not seized as the result of an illegal search because the police officer did not conduct a search of the residence or even enter it, but since the accused's surrender of the handgun and ammunition was the result of the officer's questioning and the incriminating statements made when the accused was interrogated without having been informed of his rights, the handgun and ammunition are thus inadmissible as they are the fruit of the poisonous tree. FSM v. Sippa, 16 FSM R. 247, 249 (Chk. 2009).

The government has the burden of proving that an accused's statement is voluntary and thus admissible. Thus, although it was the defendant's motion to suppress, the government, because it has the burden, usually presents its side first at a suppression hearing. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2009).

When an accused's statement is voluntarily made after he has been informed of, and understood his rights, and chosen to waive those rights, his statement is admissible unless the accused has established a relationship between unlawful police activity and the statement sought to be suppressed. The burden then remains on the prosecution to show that the evidence is still admissible. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2009).

The remedy for a defendant's unlawful detention over 24 hours is not the suppression of evidence lawfully obtained before the 24 hours passed. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2009).

Without any other evidence, a signed advice of rights and waiver with the same date and time as the accused's signed statement cannot meet the prosecution's burden to show the advice of rights was given, and a waiver received, before the accused began to answer questions or make a statement. The statement will therefore be suppressed. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 529 (Chk. 2009).

A motion to suppress an accused's statement will be granted when the government failed to meet its burden to show that the accused was advised of his rights, that he understood those rights, and that he waived them before he voluntarily made his statement. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 529 (Chk. 2009).

Even if voluntarily given, a statement that is dated the day after the accused's arrest, but with no time given, is insufficient to show that the statement was not the product of the government's unlawful act of holding the defendant longer than 24 hours after his arrest. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 529 (Chk. 2009).

While the better practice is to finish all the paperwork concerning the advice of rights and waiver before beginning questioning, it is not a requirement in order for an accused to have made a valid waiver of his rights. The greater certainty engendered by completing the advice of rights and waiver paperwork first does, however, make things easier on counsel and the courts. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 529 (Chk. 2009).

If codefendants are tried together, a defendant's admissible out-of-court statement ought to be redacted to eliminate references to other codefendants. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2009).

When an accused's statement has been suppressed, it may not be used against him at trial unless he chooses to testify on his own behalf, in which case, the statement may be used to impeach his credibility. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2009).

Since the government has the burden of proof to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants' statements were admissible; it presented its side first on the issue. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

For the defendants' statements to be admissible, the government is required to prove three things: 1) that the defendants, once they were placed under arrest and before they made their statements, knowingly and intelligently waived their constitutional rights against self-incrimination, including their rights to counsel and to remain silent; 2) that the statements were voluntarily made by the defendants; and 3) that the confessions were made within 24 hours of the defendants' arrests. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The government has overcome the presumption against waiver when it has produced signed advice of rights forms showing timely waivers and the defendants do not controvert that evidence. Witness testimony is also admissible on the issue of whether a waiver was knowingly and voluntarily given. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the court, based upon the witnesses' testimony, including their respective demeanor in the courtroom during the hearing, concludes that the accused was properly advised of his rights, including the right to remain silent, before he confessed, the court will deny a motion to suppress a confession that is based on the ground that a waiver was not knowingly and intelligently given. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the advice of rights form was written in English and contained accurate descriptions of each of the defendant's rights; when officers testified that the rights were explained in English and Chuukese; and when, although to avoid any confusion on the issue the form itself should be written in English and Chuukese, the defendants knew English, there is no issue with the defendants' understanding of the contents of the advice of rights form. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629-30 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When an accused asked for counsel before he gave his statement, the government failed to overcome the presumption against the accused's waiver of his right to counsel and to remain silent. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Even if a defendant has been advised of and waived his rights, a subsequent statement may be used as evidence against him only if the statement was made voluntarily. To make the determination about whether a statement was voluntary, the court must examine the totality of the circumstances surrounding the confession and assess the psychological impact on the defendants of those circumstances. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When a defendant has expressed a wish to meet with counsel before further questioning, questioning must cease at once. Any attempt by police officers to ignore or override the defendant's wish, or to dissuade him from exercising his constitutional rights, is grounds for suppression of his subsequent statement. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The only circumstance in which the government may use a defendant's suppressed statement is if the defendant chooses to testify on his own behalf; in which case, the statement can be used to impeach his credibility. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

An officer's hitting an arrestee during interrogation or during his detention immediately before interrogation is compelling evidence that any subsequent statement was not voluntary, but was the result of intimidation and coercion. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

In the absence of clear, unbroken testimony regarding the period when the statements were prepared and signed by the defendants, the court is unable to determine if their statements were voluntarily made, or whether they may have been coerced during the time periods not covered by the testimony. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

By statute, statements taken as a result of a violation of the defendant's statutory right to be brought before a judicial officer without unnecessary delay, that is, twenty-four hours from arrest, are inadmissible, even if voluntary and the defendant has waived his rights against self-incrimination. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Evidence and statements lawfully obtained from a defendant before he had been illegally detained over 24 hours will be admissible, but the defendant is entitled to the suppression of any evidence or statements obtained from him after his first 24 hours of detention. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the court has determined that a defendant's statement was taken after his invocation of his right to counsel and that neither his nor another's statements were voluntarily given, the timeliness of their statements does not save them from suppression. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The court is forbidden to consider as evidence against a defendant any part of a non-testifying codefendant's statement which inculpates another defendant since a statement cannot be cross-examined. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

If the government seeks to admit a defendant's out-of-court statement, it ought to be redacted to eliminate references to his co-defendants. Failure to do so may result in reversal of convictions in the interests of justice. The parties should make all attempts to stipulate to redacted statements without the court's assistance. The court, especially when taking into account its fact-finding function, need not and should not view the statements until after the redactions have been made. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Once an accused has established a relationship between unlawful police activity and the evidence sought to be suppressed, the burden is on the prosecution to show that the evidence is still admissible. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74 (Chk. 2010).

When an accused's advice of rights form was signed at 10:03 a.m., on the day after his arrest at about 10:00 a.m., the prosecution has failed to prove that the accused's statement was given within 24 hours of his arrest even though there was some testimony that the accused signed the form not only after he was informed of his rights but also after he subsequently gave a statement since this is neither the usual nor the better method of conducting a police interrogation. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74 (Chk. 2010).

Statements and evidence obtained from an accused during the first 24 hours after his arrest are not inadmissible merely because the accused ended up being detained for over 24 hours. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74 (Chk. 2010).

When the only evidence and testimony properly before the court and from which the court may draw inferences and find facts supports the conclusion that an accused's statement was voluntarily made not long after his arrest and well within the 24-hour timeframe, the preponderance of the evidence thus weighs in the prosecution's favor and the accused's motion to suppress his statement will be denied. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74-75 (Chk. 2010).

The use of a non-testifying defendant's statement as evidence against a codefendant would violate the codefendant's constitutional "right of confrontation" since the declarant would not be a trial witness subject to the codefendant's cross-examination. This difficulty can be eliminated if the parties redact any codefendant statements before trial. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 75 & n.1 (Chk. 2010).

Arrestees are not prejudiced if they are notified of the offense(s) with which they are to be charged soon after they are taken into custody and before giving a statement. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 118 (Chk. 2010).

When it is determined that the searches were conducted with the defendant's voluntary consent, the defendant's claims of a violation of his right not to incriminate himself pursuant to FSM Const. art. IV, § 7 also fail because a confession's voluntariness is determined by reference to the totality of surrounding circumstances. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 425 (Pon. 2011).

When, after arriving at the police station, a person was advised of his constitutional rights in a "Your Rights in the Constitution" form that he signed; when the officer went over his rights one by one; when the officer specifically asked the person whether he needed a lawyer at that time and he said no; when, by signing the form, he acknowledged that he had been advised of his rights and understood them; when, following his signing of the advice of rights form, the police officers began their interrogation; and when there was no use of threats by the police officers and he was not under duress at the time, the evidence shows that his statements were made knowingly and voluntarily and that his statements were not extracted through any form of compulsion. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 449-50 (Pon. 2012).

When the government had not complied with 12 F.S.M.C. 218 by releasing or charging the defendant within 24 hours of his arrest, the statements made and evidence retrieved thereafter until he was released will be suppressed because evidence obtained as a result of a violation of 12 F.S.M.C. 218 is not admissible against an accused. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2012).

Although evidence and statements lawfully obtained from an accused before he has been detained over 24 hours will be admissible, the accused is entitled to the suppression of any evidence of statements obtained from him after the first 24 hours of his detention. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2012).

A defendant must be advised of a full "panoply" of due process rights in addition to the right to remain silent and the right to counsel. These may be summarized as the right not to be denied access to counsel, family members, or other interested persons; the right to send a message, or other communications; the right to stop all questioning until such persons are present; the right to remain silent; and the right to be brought before a judge or released within a reasonable time. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 & n.4 (Pon. 2014).

The statutory protections are reviewed under a two-part analysis: first, under a statutory review of whether the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his rights before giving a statement to the police. Second, they are reviewed under a constitutional backdrop of whether the defendant voluntarily waived those rights. This second look is often cursory, or entirely unnecessary, in the ordinary case where no investigatory irregularities are implicated. This two-part analysis is ultimately the inquiry into whether a defendant, knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his or her rights. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 (Pon. 2014).

A motion to suppress an accused's statement will be granted when the government has failed to meet its burden to show that the accused was advised of his rights, that he understood those rights, and that he waived them before he voluntarily made his statement. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 (Pon. 2014).

The government has the burden of proving that an accused's statement is voluntary and thus admissible and must show this by a preponderance of the evidence. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 510 (Pon. 2014).

Waiver of a fundamental right may not be presumed in ambiguous circumstances. Thus, a signed advice of rights form without any other evidence cannot meet the prosecution's burden to show the advice of rights was given and a waiver received. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 510 (Pon. 2014).

While the better practice is to finish all the paperwork concerning the advice of rights and waiver before beginning questioning, it is not a requirement in order for an accused to have made a valid waiver of his rights. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 510 (Pon. 2014).

An accused's waiver may be inferred by his responding voluntarily to questions asked of him without coercion after he has been advised of his rights. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 510 (Pon. 2014).

Voluntariness of a confession may not be resolved by reference to any single infallible touchstone, but instead must be determined by reference to the totality of the surrounding circumstances. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 511 (Pon. 2014).

There are two sets of factors to consider in determining whether a suspect's will was overborne. The first set of factors are the particular vulnerabilities and characteristics of the defendant himself, such as the accused's age, education, intelligence and general sophistication. The second set of factors focuses on the coercive conduct and the manner of the interrogation such as the length, detention facility, presence of weapons, number of interrogators, access to food and water, threats, deception, promises, and the denial of access to family friends or attorneys as well failure to inform suspect of rights. Of course, the actual use of physical force clearly violates the voluntariness standard. Ultimately, this is an ad hoc test and no one aspect is determinative. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 511-12 (Pon. 2014).

The determination of whether there has been an intelligent waiver of right to counsel must depend, in each case, upon the particular facts and circumstances surrounding that case, including the accused's background, experience, and conduct. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 511 n.7 (Pon. 2014).

When the entire interview was conducted in Pohnpeian; when the enumerated form shows that the defendant and his guardian were advised of his rights and that at the end of each statement he was asked whether he understood the right, and that after each statement he indicated, in writing, "yes" in each blank provided; when at the conclusion of the reading of the advice of rights the officer asked the defendant if he understood his rights and he responded that he did; when the officer asked the guardian if she understood, and she nodded her head; when the defendant answered "no" to "Do you want to meet your attorney now?"; when the defendant and the guardian both then signed the form; and when the officer subsequently took the defendant's statement as recorded in the record of interview which both the defendant and his guardian also signed, it was sufficiently reliable evidence to indicate that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his rights. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 512-13 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendant voluntarily went to the police station for questioning and when the officer's explanation adequately informed the defendant as to the reason for the questioning, and the requirement under 12 F.S.M.C. 214 was met, at that time, regardless of whether or not an arrest was subsequently effected in a custodial environment. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 517 (Pon. 2014).

Even though there was no probable cause to charge a defendant with theft prior to his own incriminating statements, when the police had probable cause to suspect him of trespass based on the video surveillance and interviews of the other co-defendants, that alone was sufficient to ask him to come in for questioning or to arrest him without further questioning since it is not uncommon for an ongoing investigation to result in the emergence of additional crimes, or the reduction of crimes, as new facts and evidence come into light, including statements taken from the defendants themselves. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 517 (Pon. 2014).

Although there is a potential danger of prejudice in cases where a co-defendant's inculpatory statement is admitted into evidence, many problems can be eliminated by a redaction. Thus, the court has not adopted a per se rule of severance. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 518 (Pon. 2014).

The use of a defendant's inculpatory statements in evidence against a co-defendant, would violate the right of confrontation since the declarant is not a witness at the trial subject to cross examination. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 518 (Pon. 2014).

The question "Do you know why we are here?" did not constitute an interrogation of the suspect's involvement in the crime, but was rather an inquiry directed towards him about whether he knew why the police were at his residence (which is the question's literal and plain meaning) since he was not confined or arrested when asked the question and since the question could have solicited various responses, including a "No" or a silent reply. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 375 (Pon. 2017).

That an investigation has focused on a suspect does not trigger the need for warnings in a non-custodial setting, and that situation is not comparable to that of a suspect who is physically restrained and painfully aware that he literally cannot escape a persistent custodial interrogator. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 376 (Pon. 2017).

The questioning of witnesses and suspects is a necessary tool for the effective enforcement of criminal laws. Without such investigation, those who were innocent might be falsely accused, those who were guilty might wholly escape prosecution, and many crimes would go unsolved. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 402 (Kos. 2017).

That an investigation has focused on a suspect does not trigger the need for warnings in a non-custodial setting, and that situation is not comparable to that of a suspect who is physically restrained and painfully aware that he literally cannot escape a persistent custodial interrogator. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 402 (Kos. 2017).

The statutory and constitutional rights to be advised of one's rights are owing to "one arrested," and to "any person arrested," and "arrest" is the placing any person under any form of detention by legal authority. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 402 (Kos. 2017).

Government agents' routine questioning does not require a rights warning to be given beforehand since the purpose of this type of procedural questioning is not to compel the person being questioned to incriminate himself. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 403 (Kos. 2017).

When the defendant signed a form that, before the signature and date lines, stated in bold: "that the information provided in this statement is true and correct, and that this Statement is freely given and not made under threat, duress, or intimidation"; and when the defendant's freedom of movement was not substantially controlled by the officers exercising official authority when they questioned him; and when he was free to leave after the questioning and did leave, the defendant's statements to the police will not be suppressed. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 403 (Kos. 2017).

The court has consistently rejected the redaction-is-premature argument, and has repeatedly required the redaction before trial of any co-defendant's statement that the prosecution intends to use at trial. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 83 (Chk. 2018).

Redaction is not required for a co-defendant's statement when it is used to help establish probable cause since hearsay may be used to establish probable cause. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 83 n.1 (Chk. 2018).

If the defendants are tried together, a defendant's out-of-court statement ought to be redacted to eliminate references to other co-defendants. Failure to do so may result in reversal of convictions in the interests of justice. After redaction, no prejudice will occur if the statements then give no reference to any co-defendant. Redaction can normally be accomplished by the parties. Thus, the court will not view the statement until after redaction. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 84 (Chk. 2018).

When co-defendants are tried together, one defendant's admissible out-of-court statement must be redacted to eliminate references to any co-defendant. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 84 (Chk. 2018).

Since it will not be known until trial whether either co-defendant will testify, the prosecution should be prepared for the eventuality that neither will. The prosecution presents its case first. Whether any co-defendant will testify is rarely certain until the defense has called its last witness. It is therefore proper that the parties agree on the redaction before trial. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 84 (Chk. 2018).

If the prosecution is ready with a redacted version of any co-defendant statement that it intends to introduce as evidence at trial, the trial will not be delayed to wait for the redactions or by disputes over what should be redacted. The prosecution may then use redacted version in its case-in-chief, and if a co-defendant does later testify, the prosecution, may then use that co-defendant's unredacted statement in its cross-examination even if it has already introduced the redacted version. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 84 (Chk. 2018).

– Joinder and Severance

It is appropriate to proceed separately in cases involving multiple juvenile defendants. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 17 (Pon. 1981).

Although there is a danger of prejudice in cases where a co-defendant's inculpatory statement is admitted into evidence, because the court is hesitant to limit the broad discretion afforded the trial judge by Criminal Rule 14, and because many problems can be eliminated by redaction of the statement, the court will not adopt a per se rule of severance at this time. Hartman v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 224, 230 (App. 1991).

If severance is denied, the defendants' out of court statements ought to be redacted to eliminate in each references to other codefendants. Failure to do so may result in reversal of convictions in the interests of justice. After redaction, no prejudice will occur if the statements then give no reference to any codefendant. Redaction can normally be accomplished by the parties. Thus the court will not view the statement until after redaction. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 301-02 & n.12 (App. 1993).

Severance of joint criminal defendants is a matter of sound judicial discretion. A trial judge is afforded broad discretion under Rule 14 to grant relief from prejudicial joinder – to sever defendants or counts from trial. When co-defendants were prejudiced by their joinder in a case because an attorney disqualified from prosecuting them assisted in the trial preparation, the court will order the severance of the charges against them. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 176 (Chk. 2006).

Rule 14 comes into play only if the original joinder was proper. It then permits a severance—or an order to the government to elect—if this is needed to avoid prejudice. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 176 n.3 (Chk. 2006).

Two or more offenses may be charged in the same information in a separate count for each offense if the offenses charged are of the same or similar character or are based on the same act or transaction or on two or more acts or transactions connected together or constituting parts of a common scheme or plan. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 614 (Pon. 2007).

Two or more defendants may be charged in the information if they are alleged to have participated in the same act or transaction or in the same series of acts or transactions constituting an offense or offenses. Such defendants may be charged in one or more counts together or separately and all of the defendants need not be charged in each count. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 614 n.4 (Pon. 2007).

If it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or defendants in a single information, or by such joinder for trial together, the court may order an election or separate trials of counts, grant a severance of defendants or provide whatever relief justice requires. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 614 (Pon. 2007).

When there is only one defendant in the matter, the prejudice that could necessitate a severance of trial, does not exist. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

Absent a strong showing of prejudice, co-conspirators are customarily tried together. This is not only for reasons of judicial and prosecutorial economy and, in the FSM, public defender economy, but also to give the factfinder a fuller picture of the scheme, as well as to decrease the chance of inconsistent verdicts and allow witnesses to avoid the burden of having to testify at successive trials. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 186-87 (Chk. 2007).

Since, absent a strong showing of prejudice, co-conspirators are customarily tried together, when the movant has not made a strong showing and has not identified any defense he would raise but cannot because his case is joined with another, his motion to sever will be denied. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 (Chk. 2007).

There is no rule requiring severance whenever co-defendants have conflicting defenses. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 (Chk. 2007).

Properly-joined defendants should be severed under Criminal Rule 14 only if there is a serious risk that a joint trial would compromise a specific trial right of one of the defendants. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 (Chk. 2007).

All past delays attributable to any co-defendant are also attributable any other co-defendant. Severance would not change this. All delay attributable to one co-defendant because it was attributable to another co-defendant before severance would still be attributable to the first co-defendant. A severed co-defendant would have a separate speedy trial "clock" only for the time after severance was ordered. So when trial on the merits due in the foreseeable future, severance and the start of a separate speedy trial "clock" for one co-defendant would not help him preserve his speedy trial right or prevail on an unnecessary delay defense. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 (Chk. 2007).

If a co-defendant were prepared to go to trial soon while his co-defendant was not ready for trial in the foreseeable future, then severance could be appropriate to preserve his speedy trial right and avoid unnecessary delay, but when that is not the case, the movant has not shown a serious risk of, or articulated, any specific instances of prejudice, and his motion to sever will be denied. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 (Chk. 2007).

With a joint trial, while not immediately imminent, the next step in the case and expected in the foreseeable future, severance would only increase delay for the movant since both he and his co-defendant could not be tried simultaneously, and most likely his trial would not start until some time after his co-defendant's had finished. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 n.5 (Chk. 2007).

The trial court used a co-defendant's pre-trial, out-of-court affidavit only against the declarant since the judge's discourses with the prosecutor stated that it was only being offered or used against the declarant and the trial court's made specific findings with regard to the affidavit that only concerned the declarant co-defendant and since the court's special findings delineated other pieces of evidence, independent of that affidavit, that supported the other defendants' participation in the conspiracy. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 556-57 (App. 2008).

The best practice for a trial court finding itself in the situation where a non-testifying defendant's out-of-court statement will be introduced into evidence in a joint or multi-defendant trial, is to make an early, clear and uniform record identifying those defendants against whom the out-of-court statement will and will not be used. A trial court is not generally prohibited from admitting the statement. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 557 (App. 2008).

Pretrial rulings on the admissibility of evidence may have had an impact on the decision made by the FSM to later move for severance and the prejudice to the FSM by the joint trial of the two co-defendants are sufficient cause for the court to grant a relief from the Rule 12(f) waiver for failure to make the severance request earlier. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 547, 549 (Pon. 2013).

While the two defendants' joint trial would promote efficiency and might remove the possibility of inconsistent verdicts, the possible prejudice to the FSM is substantial and outweighs these factors. Severance of the defendants' trials will have the effect of setting back the trial dates, but the delay should not be lengthy and when the trials should not be longer than several days each and it is always possible that a plea would mean no trial at all, any delay or waiting by the objecting defendant is not anticipated to be unduly burdensome. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 547, 549-50 (Pon. 2013).

Severance of joint criminal defendants is a matter of sound judicial discretion. A trial judge is afforded broad discretion under FSM Criminal Rule 14 to grant relief from prejudicial joinder – to sever defendants from trial. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 547, 550 (Pon. 2013).

If it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or defendants in a single information, or by such joinder for trial together, the court may order an election or separate trials of counts, grant a severance of defendants or provide whatever relief justice requires. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 547, 550 (Pon. 2013).

Severance will be granted when the prejudice to the FSM by the joint trial of the two co-defendants is sufficient cause to grant a severance for the trials of the two defendants; when it outweighs the benefits of a single trial; and when no significant delay in the separate trials for both defendants is expected. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 547, 550 (Pon. 2013).

The court has the authority to order two or more informations to be tried together. However, if it appears that a defendant or the government is prejudiced by a joinder of offenses or of defendants in an information or by such joinder for trial together, the court may order an election or separate trials of counts, grant a severance of the defendants or provide whatever other relief justice requires. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 518 (Pon. 2014).

Although there is a potential danger of prejudice in cases where a co-defendant's inculpatory statement is admitted into evidence, many problems can be eliminated by a redaction. Thus, the court has not adopted a per se rule of severance. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 518 (Pon. 2014).

– Jurisdiction

The National Criminal Code places in the FSM Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction over allegations of violations of the Code. No exception to that jurisdiction is provided for juveniles, so charges of crimes leveled against juveniles are governed by the National Criminal Code. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 15 (Pon. 1981).

Since the national government does not have major crimes jurisdiction over Title 11 Trust Territory Code assaults calling for imprisonment of no more than six months, the repealer clause of the National Criminal Code would not appear to repeal those sections. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 30 (Pon. 1987).

The language employed by Congress in 11 F.S.M.C. 901 leaves no doubt that Congress was carefully limiting this provision for conduct of cases in the name of the national government to cases involving violation of laws enacted by the Congress and violations of statutes within the jurisdiction of the national government. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 32 (Pon. 1981).

When the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a violation of the National Criminal Code, it cannot then take jurisdiction over a non-major crime, which arose out of the same transaction and formed part of the same plan, under a theory of ancillary jurisdiction. FSM v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 43, 44-46 (Truk 1981).

The repealer clause of the National Criminal Code repealed those provisions of Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code above the monetary minimum of $1,000 set for major crimes. Where the value is below $1,000, section 2 does not apply because it is not within the national court jurisdiction. FSM v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 43, 46 (Truk 1981).

Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code, before the effective date of the National Criminal Code, is not a national law because its criminal jurisdiction was not expressly delegated to the national government, nor is the power it confers of indisputably national character; therefore, it is not within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 127, 130 (Truk 1982).

The delegation of judicial functions to the Federated States of Micronesia, pursuant to Secretarial Order 3039, section 2 does not by itself give the FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction over Title 11 Trust Territory Code crimes occurring before the National Criminal Code's effective date. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 127, 131 (Truk 1982).

Offenses before the National Criminal Code's effective date are outside the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 133, 134 (Truk 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction to try Title 11 Trust Territory Code cases if they arise under a national law. Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code is not a national law. It was not adopted by Congress as a national law and it did not become a national law by virtue of the transition article. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 178 (Truk 1982).

Exclusive national government jurisdiction over major crimes is not mandated by the Constitution; such jurisdiction would be exclusive in any event only if criminal jurisdiction was a power of indisputably national character. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 181 (Truk 1982).

The National Government has exclusive jurisdiction over crimes arising under national law. 11 F.S.M.C. 901. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 181 (Truk 1982).

Sections of Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code covering matters within the jurisdiction of Congress owe their continuing vitality to section 102 of the National Criminal Code. Thus, the criminal prosecutions thereunder are a national matter and fall within the FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 102. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 185 (App. 1982).

Upon inception of constitutional self-government by the people of the Federated States of Micronesia, criminal law provisions in Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code became the law of governments within the Federated States of Micronesia by virtue of the Constitution's transition provisions. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1982).

The savings clause, 11 F.S.M.C. 102(2), unlike the other sections of the National Criminal Code, was intended to apply to offenses committed before the Code's effective date. It specifically authorizes prosecutions of Title 11 Trust Territory Code offenses occurring prior to the enactment of the National Criminal Code. Therefore, these prosecutions fall within the FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 189-90 (App. 1982).

Section 102(2), the savings clause of the National Criminal Code, authorizes prosecutions of Title 11 Trust Territory Code offenses occurring prior to the enactment of the National Criminal Code. Therefore, these prosecutions fall within the FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 102(2). In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1982).

Presumably, Congress inserted no specific jurisdictional provision in section 102 of the National Criminal Code because Congress recognized that the FSM Supreme Court would have jurisdiction over all cases arising under national law by virtue of article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. 11 F.S.M.C. 102. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 193 (App. 1982).

Article IV, section 6 of the FSM Constitution, as implemented by Rule 7(c) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure, requires that the government's reliance upon aggregation to bring an alleged crime within the jurisdictional boundaries of the court be plainly disclosed to the defendant in the information. Fred v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 141, 144 (App. 1987).

State courts are not prohibited by article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution from hearing and determining cases where the defendants are from FSM states other than the prosecuting state. Jurisdiction over criminal matters between the national and state governments is determined by the severity of the crime; not diversity of citizenship. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 543, 554 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1988).

The general rule of criminal procedure is that jurisdiction over a particular crime places in the trial division the necessary authority to find a defendant guilty of any offense necessarily included in the offense charged. Kosrae v. Tosie, 4 FSM R. 61, 63 (Kos. 1989).

In the course of the formation of the FSM, the allocation of responsibilities between states and nation was such that the impact of the national courts in criminal matters was to be in the area of major crimes and as the ultimate arbiter of human rights issues. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 93 (App. 1989).

The diversity jurisdiction provisions of article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution do not apply to criminal proceedings. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 94 (App. 1989).

Where the crimes charged are no longer those expressly delegated to Congress to define, or are not indisputedly of a national character the FSM Supreme Court has no subject matter jurisdiction. FSM v. Jano, 6 FSM R. 9, 11 (Pon. 1993).

Where a court has dismissed a criminal case for lack of jurisdiction over the crimes for which the defendant was charged, the dismissal does not act as a discharge so as to preclude extradition on the charge. "Discharge" requires both personal and subject matter jurisdiction. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 107-08 (App. 1993).

A national crime is one that is committed in some place where the national government has jurisdiction, or that involves an instrumentality of the national government, or involves an activity that the national government has the power to regulate. This power to define national crimes was inherent in the national government and existed before the 1991 constitutional amendment made the power express. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

A first and fundamental principle of criminal jurisprudence is that in order for a state to impose criminal penalties on an individual, it must be shown that he or she committed some unlawful act or engaged in some prohibited course of conduct, together with a wrongful intent or mens rea. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 405 (App. 1998).

When an appeal has been filed in the case, the trial court, in the absence of any authority indicating otherwise, no longer retains jurisdiction over the matter. Chuuk v. William, 17 FSM R. 495, 496 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction to convict and sentence a person who commits, or attempts to commit a crime, in whole or in part within the Federated States of Micronesia. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 444-45 (Chk. 2014).

Even though the crimes being aided and abetted took place on Guam, the FSM Supreme Court, under 11 F.S.M.C. 103(2)(a), has jurisdiction to convict and punish a defendant on the aiding and abetting charges when the aiding and abetting took place in Chuuk. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 445 (Chk. 2014).

– Juvenile

The National Criminal Code places in the FSM Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction over allegations of violations of the Code. No exception to that jurisdiction is provided for juveniles, so charges of crimes leveled against juveniles are governed by the National Criminal Code. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 15 (Pon. 1981).

To dismiss litigation against juvenile defendants for lack of jurisdiction would be contrary to the National Criminal Code despite the fact that Code makes no reference to charges against juveniles or to the Juvenile Code. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 15 (Pon. 1981).

The Juvenile Code section mandating that courts adopt flexible procedures in juvenile cases remains in effect; neither the National Criminal Code nor any other provision of law enacted by the Congress is at odds with it. 12 F.S.M.C. 1101. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 17 (Pon. 1981).

It is appropriate to proceed separately in cases involving multiple juvenile defendants. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 17 (Pon. 1981).

In the absence of any explanation in the legislative history or from the government to justify a different interpretation, the only apparent reason for the deletion of the words "alleged to be found delinquent" from the Model Penal Code definition of official detention is that Congress wished to exclude detained juveniles from the national prohibitions against escape. 11 F.S.M.C. 505(1). In re Cantero, 3 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 1988).

Juveniles alleged or found to be delinquent children are not under "official detention" within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 505(1). In re Cantero, 3 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 1988).

The Kosrae Pre-Trial Diversion Program is available only to first time juvenile offenders charged with certain non-violent crimes. When one of the charges against the subject juvenile, assault and battery, is a violent crime as it involved physical force and injury to the victim, the program is not applicable. Kosrae v. Ned, 13 FSM R. 351, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A Kosrae Pre-Trial Diversion Agreement must contain payment of restitution and/or performance of community service, and in a case where restitution is not warranted, the component of community service must be included. Kosrae v. Ned, 13 FSM R. 351, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The imposition of community service on a juvenile offender would not violate the provisions or spirit of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child since community service, could be considered as guidance, supervision, counseling, education and vocational training, which are all preferred alternatives to institutional care (detention), which is also explicitly permitted under the Convention. Kosrae v. Ned, 13 FSM R. 351, 354 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The waiver of a pre-trial diversion agreement's limited applicability, is permitted, despite that one offense charged is a violent offense, assault and battery, when the benefits to the juvenile to be gained through her participation in the Pre-Trial Diversion Program, and dismissal of the petition upon its completion, merits the pre-trial diversion agreement's application. Kosrae v. Ned, 13 FSM R. 351, 354-55 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Kosrae State Code, Section 6.4802 permits an offender over the age of sixteen to be treated as an adult, in all respects, if the court determines that his physical and mental maturity justify it. In the proceedings to determine whether an offender should be treated as an adult, the court may order the juvenile to be examined by a physician or a psychologist, to aid the court in determining the propriety of treating the juvenile as an adult accused. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 88 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Kosrae Rules of Evidence apply to civil, criminal and contempt proceedings, but are not applicable to miscellaneous proceedings, such as preliminary examinations for criminal cases and bail proceedings. The rules do not reference their applicability or inapplicability to juvenile proceedings or to preliminary proceedings to determine whether to treat a minor defendant as an adult. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 89 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Neither state law nor the Kosrae Juvenile Rules require a witness to be qualified as an expert witness under the Evidence Rules in order to accept her testimony and report in a preliminary proceeding to determine whether to treat the defendant as an adult. The court may accept the witness's qualifications based upon her training as a physician and her position as Clinical Director of the FSM National Health Substance Abuse and Mental Health Program. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 90 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Kosrae Penal Code, Section 13.104(4)(a) excludes certain minors from criminal liability, but it also does not prohibit criminal proceedings against minors. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 90 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Criminal proceedings against minors must be brought under Chapter 48, unless the minor is 16 or 17 and the court determines that his mental and physical maturity justify treating the minor as an adult. A minor who is 16 or 17 may be held responsible for his criminal conduct either as a juvenile under Title 6, Chapter 48 or an adult under Title 13. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 90 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Although the initial filing of the case as a criminal matter, and not as a juvenile proceeding, was in error, when as soon as the court was informed that the defendant was minor, the Juvenile Rules were immediately applied to the proceedings and all proceedings were then closed to the public, and the court ensured that a parent of the defendant was present at all proceedings, there was no prejudice to the defendant and the defendant's motion to dismiss on that ground will be denied. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 90 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a normal sixteen-year old young man's physical and mental maturity warrant treating him as an adult in a criminal proceeding, the state's motion to treat juvenile accused as an adult will be granted. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 91 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

– Kidnapping

The victims were confined in a "place of isolation" within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 921(1), defining the offense of kidnapping, where they were moved from place to place but all locations were in the same vicinity, their captors were in complete control, and they could expect no assistance from anybody. Teruo v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 167, 170-71 (App. 1986).

Confinement for four to six hours is a "substantial period" of confinement within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 921(1), defining the offense of kidnapping, particularly where the victims were subjected to indignities and brutalities amounting to torture during that time. Teruo v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 167, 171 (App. 1986).

The criminal charge of kidnapping is defined as forcibly or fraudulently and deceitfully, and without authority, imprisoning, seizing, detaining, or inveigling away any person (other than his minor child), with intent to cause the person to be secreted against his will, or sent out of the State against his will, or sold or held as a slave or for ransom. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of kidnapping requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of forcibly or fraudulently and deceitfully, and without authority, imprisoning, seizing, detaining, or inveigling away any person (other than his minor child), with intent to cause the person to be secreted against his will, or sent out of the state against his will, or sold or held as a slave or for ransom. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 595 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there was undisputed evidence that the defendant had grabbed and held on to a six year old girl's arm and then forced her to walk across the street with him into the wooded area where he intended to secrete her against her will and the defendant is not the victim's parent, the state did prove beyond a reasonable doubt all elements of the offense of kidnapping. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 595 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

– Major Crimes

A simple assault, one without a weapon or the intent to inflict serious bodily injury, is punishable only by six months' imprisonment. It is neither a major crime under the National Criminal Code, because it does not call for three years' imprisonment, nor a felony. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 24 n.* (Pon. 1981).

Because Congress defined a major crime under the National Criminal Code as one calling for imprisonment of three years or more and because assaults under Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code are punishable by only six months' imprisonment, it is clear that the assault provisions of the Trust Territory Code are left intact. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 30 (Pon. 1981).

Exclusive national government jurisdiction over major crimes is not mandated by the Constitution; such jurisdiction would be exclusive in any event only if criminal jurisdiction was a power of indisputably national character. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 181 (Truk 1982).

The National Criminal Code is an exercise of Congress's power to define and provide penalties for major crimes. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1982).

The Weapons Control Act violations punishable by imprisonment of three or more years are national crimes. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 41 (App. 1985).

In light of the Constitution's Transition Clause, action by the FSM Congress is not necessary in order to establish that violations of the Weapons Control Act are prohibited within the Federated States of Micronesia. The only question is whether those are state or national law prohibitions or both. If the definition of major crimes in the National Criminal Code bears upon the Weapons Control Act at all, it is only for that purpose of allocating between state and national law. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 43 (App. 1985).

The Weapons Control Act seems well attuned to the recognition of shared national-state interest in maintaining an orderly society and the goal of cooperation in law enforcement as reflected in the Major Crimes Clause, article IX, section 2(p) of the Constitution as well as the Joint Law Enforcement Act, 12 F.S.M.C. 1201. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 44 (App. 1985).

The Major Crimes Clause, with its admonition to Congress to have due regard for local custom and tradition, unmistakably reflects awareness of the framers that Congress would be empowered under this clause to regulate crimes that would require consideration of local custom and tradition. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 57 (App. 1985).

Departure from the form of the United States Constitution reveals an intention by the framers of the FSM Constitution to depart from the substance as well, so far as major crimes are concerned. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 58 (App. 1985).

Major crimes obviously were not viewed by the framers as simply a local or state problem. The Major Crimes Clause undoubtedly reflects their judgment that the very integrity of this new nation could be threatened if major crimes could be committed with impunity in any part of the nation, with the national government forced helplessly to stand aside. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 58 (App. 1985).

The framers of the Constitution stipulated that the line for determining whether a crime is major be drawn on the basis of severity or gravity of the crime rather than by reference to principles of federalism developed under the Constitution of the United States. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 58 (App. 1985).

The scope of state police powers under the FSM Constitution must be determined by reference to the powers of the national government under the Major Crimes Clause. It follows that legitimate exercise of the national government power to define major crimes cannot be viewed as an unconstitutional encroachment upon the states' police powers. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 59 (App. 1985).

The members of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention obviously did not believe the Major Crimes Clause was improperly at odds with their general view that governmental power should be less centralized under the FSM Constitution than it had been in Trust Territory days. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 59 (App. 1985).

The precise line to be drawn in defining major crimes is to be determined by Congress. The policy determined in the Constitutional Convention was that the major-minor crimes distinction be based on the severity of the crime; and that local custom be taken into account. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 60 (App. 1985).

The general rule of criminal procedure is that jurisdiction over a particular crime places in the trial division the necessary authority to find a defendant guilty of any offense necessarily included in the offense charged. Kosrae v. Tosie, 4 FSM R. 61, 63 (Kos. 1989).

Under the constitutional and statutory framework of the Federated States of Micronesia, the FSM Supreme Court trial division, when exercising jurisdiction over cases reasonably initiated as major crimes charges, may also exercise jurisdiction over lesser included offenses prohibited by state law. Kosrae v. Tosie, 4 FSM R. 61, 65 (Kos. 1989).

Rather than rely heavily on United States precedent for guidance in establishing principles of federalism in matters of criminal regulation, the FSM Supreme Court is under an affirmative obligation to develop approaches suited to permit implementation of the national major crime responsibilities identified by Congress. Kosrae v. Tosie, 4 FSM R. 61, 65 (Kos. 1989).

In the course of the formation of the FSM, the allocation of responsibilities between states and nation was such that the impact of the national courts in criminal matters was to be in the area of major crimes and as the ultimate arbiter of human rights issues. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 93 (App. 1989).

The intent of the Constitutional Convention is that major crimes, as defined by Congress and committed prior to voter ratification, fall within the jurisdiction of the national government and may be prosecuted pursuant to the national law after the effective date of the amendment. In re Ress, 5 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 1992).

The national court should not abstain from deciding a criminal case where the crime took place before the effective date of the 1991 amendment removing federal jurisdiction over major crimes because of the firmly expressed intention by the Constitutional Convention delegates as to the manner of transition from national jurisdiction to state jurisdiction. In re Ress, 5 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 1992).

Where the crimes charged are no longer those expressly delegated to Congress to define, or are not indisputedly of a national character the FSM Supreme Court has no subject matter jurisdiction. FSM v. Jano, 6 FSM R. 9, 11 (Pon. 1993).

Ever since the ratification of the constitutional amendment removed from Congress the power to define "major crimes" and substituted for it the power to define "national crimes" the national government has had no general criminal jurisdiction. That jurisdiction now lies with the states. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 102 (App. 1993).

Congress has the express power to define national crimes, and until the Constitution was amended in 1991, Congress also had the express power to define major crimes. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 153 (Yap 1997).

Since the FSM Constitution was amended in 1991, the national courts no longer have jurisdiction over major crimes. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 73 (Pon. 2002).

When the constitutional amendment to article IX, § 2(p) was ratified, it eliminated Congress's power to define major crimes and repealed by implication Title 11's major crimes provisions. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

Major crimes jurisdiction was based upon defining a major crime by the severity of the penalty. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 573 (App. 2004).

The 1991 constitutional amendment that changed the word "major" to the word "national" narrowed Congress's power by allowing it to define national crimes instead of major crimes and prescribe penalties, having due regard for local custom and tradition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 573 (App. 2004).

– Malicious Mischief

An essential element of the crime of malicious mischief is that the property injured or destroyed be the property of another. A good faith belief that one owns the property injured or destroyed typically constitutes a defense to the crime. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 402, 407 (App. 1998).

As a matter of law, then, if one has a good faith belief that he or she owns the property subject to the crime, he or she cannot be guilty of trespass, malicious mischief or petty larceny. Whether a defendant has a good faith belief in ownership is ordinarily a determination for the trier of fact. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 402-03 (App. 1998).

The burden was on the government to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that defendants' interference with the crops at issue was unlawful; if there was any doubt about defendants' claim of right, defendants should have been acquitted on the malicious mischief charge. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 406-07 (App. 1998).

If defendants, in good faith, believe they can assert ownership rights over plantings made on their own land, they cannot be guilty of malicious mischief with respect to those plantings. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 407 (App. 1998).

The penalties applicable to criminal mischief pertain to deterring the commission of the crime not for the primary purpose of raising revenue as with the tax code which has comprehensive civil and criminal penalties designed specifically for that purpose. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 549 (Pon. 1998).

The criminal offense of malicious mischief requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of wilfully destroying, damaging or injuring property belonging to another. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When testimony regarding the prior, good, and undamaged condition of the window screen and door latch is undisputed and testimony regarding the torn and damaged condition of the window screen and door latch after finding the defendant in the home is also undisputed, that is circumstantial evidence of the defendant's actions to damage the window screen and door latch and the court may infer from the evidence regarding the condition of the window screen and door latch before and after the defendant's entry into the home, that the defendant committed the damage to the window screen and door latch. Accordingly, the state proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did wilfully damage or injure property belonging to another and is guilty of the offense of malicious mischief. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 610 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The offense of malicious mischief as willfully destroying, damaging, or injuring property belonging to another. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

– Misconduct in Office

In order to find an accused guilty of misconduct in public office, the court must find that the prosecution proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused 1) was a public official, and 2) he did an illegal act under the color of office, or he willingly neglected to perform the duties of his office as provided by law. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 76, 78-79 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A legislator who seeks to use representation fund monies for a medical referral, which is an impermissible purpose under the Representation Fund Act; who seeks to use Speaker and staff travel fund monies for a medical referral, which is neither permissible nor authorized; who altered the account and amount of his travel authorization request and submitted it for approval when it was not an authorized or permissible travel authorization; and who received the travel funds without the intention of using them for the approved travel, is guilty of misconduct in office. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 79-80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

– Misdemeanors

The government has no affirmative obligation to provide the defendant with information concerning misdemeanor offenses committed by its potential witnesses. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 641 (Chk. 1996).

The court may accept the statement of the charge or charges in a citation or a copy thereof in place of an information in any misdemeanor tried. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A felony is an offense punishable by more than one year in prison and a misdemeanor is an offense punishable by more than 30 days imprisonment and up to one year. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 109 n.2 (Chk. 2003).

Under previous law, a felony is an offense which may be punished by imprisonment for more than one year; a petty misdemeanor is an offense which may be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 days; and every other offense is a misdemeanor. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 501 (Pon. 2004).

When, for the offenses charged, a defendant convicted of the crime cannot be subjected to any imprisonment, the offenses are classified as petty misdemeanors. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 501 (Pon. 2004).

Misdemeanors are offenses punishable by imprisonment for more than 30 days up to one year. Felonies are offenses punishable by more than one year in prison. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 536 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

Kosrae State Code §13.106(2)(b) imposes a requirement that prosecutions for misdemeanors begin with one year of when the alleged crime was committed. This statute recognizes that a misdemeanor prosecution commenced after one year generally infringes on a defendant's right to a speedy trial. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The Kosrae State Court standard for measuring delay when filing an information and proceeding to trial is that the court presumes that there has been no unnecessary delay if the information is filed within six months of the alleged criminal act, but if the information is filed more than six months after the alleged act, then the prosecution must show that the delay in filing was reasonable or necessary. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Ten months' delay is in excess of what the Kosrae State Court would normally accept as reasonable or necessary for beginning the prosecution of misdemeanors allegedly committed in the presence of officers. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Under Pohnpei state law, a felony is defined as a crime or offense that may be punishable by imprisonment for a period of more than one year, and every other crime is a misdemeanor. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

Under Pohnpei state law, disorderly conduct is a misdemeanor since it carries a maximum of six months' imprisonment. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

11 F.S.M.C. 1007 is a misdemeanor because anyone convicted of it cannot be imprisoned for more than one year and because a felony is any crime which is punishable by imprisonment for more than one year. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 n.7 (Yap 2020).

A misdemeanor is any crime which is not a felony. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 n.7 (Yap 2020).

Often a misdemeanor will be a lesser included offense of a felony. But that is not the case when the greater offense can be committed without committing the misdemeanor. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

– Motions

A motion to reopen a hearing will be denied where the movant does not demonstrate that he has learned of or located any new information after the hearing was closed. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 94 (Pon. 1982).

A written motion and notice of the hearing thereof shall be served, with a memorandum of points and authorities, not later than 14 days before the time specified for the hearing unless a different period is fixed by order of the court, and the moving party's failure to file a memorandum of points and authorities shall be deemed a waiver by the moving party of the motion. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 143 (Pon. 1999).

Any defense, objection, or request which is capable of determination without the trial of the general issue may be made before trial by motion. Motions may be written or oral at the judge's discretion. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 143 (Pon. 1999).

Generally, a motion to disqualify a prosecutor must be made at the earliest possible time, and failure to do so may constitute a waiver of the objection. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 363 (Chk. 2004).

Motions raising defenses and objections based on defects in the information (other than it fails to state an offense or the court lacks jurisdiction) must be raised prior to trial. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 363 (Chk. 2004).

By rule, timely receipt by the court would be ten days from date of service of the papers being responded to, if served personally, and sixteen days if served by mail. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 408 (Chk. 2004).

A moving party's failure to file a memorandum of points and authorities in support of a motion is deemed the moving party's waiver of the motion. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 511 n.1 (Chk. 2004).

Movants cannot raise the claims of third parties; they may only raise their own claims. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 642 (Chk. 2004).

A written motion must be served with a memorandum of points and authorities. The moving party's failure to file the memorandum of points and authorities is deemed the moving party's waiver of the motion. When a party has waived his motion, there was no motion pending before the court. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 90 (Chk. 2004).

Service is incomplete when a defendant's response to a government motion is served only on the government and not on the other defendants because all filings are to be served on all other parties, including other co-defendants. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 167, 168 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

Failure to respond in writing to a written motion is deemed a consent to the granting of the motion, and oral argument will not be heard from that party. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 167, 169 n.2 (Chk. 2005).

A "brief" is in effect a motion when it asks the court for relief. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 394 (Chk. 2005).

A motion to disqualify the Attorney General's Office is a preliminary motion, which ought to be brought fairly early in the proceedings. Its filing should not wait until the deadline for filing all other pretrial motions. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 438 (Chk. 2005).

When the court has assumed, for the purpose of deciding the motion, that the defendant's allegations are true, the defendant's request for an evidentiary hearing to establish those allegations to support his motion will be denied. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 439 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

Considering that appointments of Acting Secretaries are a matter of public record and that defense counsel's office has two investigators and other staff on the Public Defenders' payroll on Pohnpei, the accuracy of the government's representation ought to be readily verifiable by the defense. To put the Public Defenders' Office to the expense of flying defense counsel to Chuuk from Yap and of flying witnesses from Pohnpei to Chuuk, to put the court to the expense of flying the judge to Chuuk from Yap, and to put the government to the expense of flying a prosecutor to Chuuk to hold an evidentiary hearing merely to establish when someone was Acting Secretary would be a waste of scarce resources and the defendant's request for an evidentiary hearing to establish those dates will therefore be denied. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 441 n.3 (Chk. 2005).

The FSM's motion in limine asking for an order barring all defendants from raising the certain defenses at trial will be granted when it was filed as a result of a defendant's response to its discovery request; when it was considered together with that defendant's motion asserting those same defenses; and when all defendants were served the motion but only one filed a response. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 131 (Chk. 2006).

On a motion to reconsider, the court will not consider the later affidavits of the three who were present at the hearing when they present no information located after the hearing was closed and there was no valid reason given why the government was unable to present the evidence at the hearing; but a fourth person's affidavit will be considered because he was unavailable before and during the hearing. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. 2006).

An accused must raise the selective-prosecution claim at the pretrial motion stage. Defects in the institution of a prosecution, which is what a selective (or vindictive) prosecution would be, must be raised by motion before trial. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendants' motions to dismiss based on selective or vindictive prosecution have been denied for failure to establish a prima facie case, the government's motion in limine that the defendants be precluded from introducing at trial any testimony on or evidence of, or asserting, the defense of selective or discriminatory prosecution and of vindictive prosecution must be granted. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

A party opposing a motion has ten days after service of the motion to file and serve responsive papers and six days are added to this period when service is done by mail. The court may at its discretion enlarge the time for filing for cause shown, if a request for an enlargement of time is made prior to the expiration of the time period in which the responsive pleading itself is to be filed and if a request for enlargement of time is made after the expiration of the original time period in which the responsive pleading is itself due, then the enlargement of time may only be granted upon a showing of excusable neglect. Where no reason is given for late filing and an enlargement of time is never sought, responsive papers may be stricken from the record as untimely. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 608-09, 612 (Pon. 2007).

The moving and non-moving parties must conform to the same standard with respect to the content of a memorandum of points and authorities and must set forth the law upon which the party relies and his theory as to the application of that law to the facts of the case. No bright-line test is appropriate for determining what is a sufficient memorandum of points and authorities and a court necessarily assesses a memorandum's sufficiency on the facts and law of a given motion. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 264 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The fugitive disentitlement doctrine is not limited only to appellate review of a criminal conviction or of a related civil forfeiture. It may also apply in trial court proceedings, such as pretrial motions made by fugitives in the trial courts. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 442 (Chk. 2007).

A fugitive, in bringing motions, is trying to obtain favorable rulings from the court without risking any burden that may flow from an adverse ruling. If the rulings are unfavorable to him, he will remain a fugitive. Then, if the government wishes to pursue prosecuting him, it must go to the effort and expense of extraditing him assuming he has not fled to a jurisdiction with which the FSM does not have an extradition agreement. That bestows a benefit on the fugitive and violates the principle of mutuality and reaching the merits of a fugitive's pretrial motions may encourage others in the same position to take flight from justice. Thus his motions will be denied without prejudice. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 443 (Chk. 2007).

A fugitive's pending motions will all be denied without prejudice. Once he has submitted to the court's jurisdiction by returning, he may reurge any motion not previously denied on the merits. The fugitive will be afforded due process and his right to a fair trial once he has returned. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 443 (Chk. 2007).

The government has the burden of proving that an accused's statement is voluntary and thus admissible. Thus, although it was the defendant's motion to suppress, the government, because it has the burden, presented its side first at the suppression hearing. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 492-93 (Chk. 2008).

Criminal Procedure Rule 12(a) abolished motions to quash an information, but any relief possible under the common law motions and pleas abolished by Rule 12(a) may be sought by motion under Criminal Rule 12(b). Thus, if a motion to quash information is filed, it will be considered a Rule 12(b) motion to dismiss the information. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 28 (Chk. 2008).

Written motions must be supported by a memorandum of points and authorities and the moving party's failure to file the memorandum of points and authorities is deemed a waiver by the moving party of the motion. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 181 (Chk. 2008).

The government has the burden of proving that an accused's statement is voluntary and thus admissible. Thus, although it may be the defendant's motion to suppress, the government, because it has the burden, presents its side first at a suppression hearing. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

A motion to suppress the evidence against an accused on the ground that the evidence was obtained as the result of "an arrest that was not in compliance with the law" is not sufficiently particular since it does not indicate the reason(s) why the accused asserts that the arrest was illegal. A suppression movant must articulate in his motion with sufficient particularity the specific reason on which he bases his claim that the seizure was illegal, and a written motion to suppress evidence must specify with particularity the grounds upon which the motion is based. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

The FSM rules have long required that written motions to suppress evidence be filed and decided before trial. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

A motion to suppress is, in effect, a pleading to the extent that it frames the issues to be determined in a pretrial hearing on the motion. The fundamental role of a pleading is to give an opposing party notice of the pleader's position concerning the facts and law so that the opposing party can begin to prepare his defense. A pleading thus both defines and limits the areas of consideration at a trial or other evidentiary hearing. Furthermore, the pleading assists the court in the conduct of the hearing. For example, by enabling the court to determine the relevance of the offered evidence. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

At least as much specificity should be required in a pretrial objection to the admissibility of evidence, i.e., a motion to suppress, as is required in an oral objection made during the course of a trial. In fact, even more specificity could reasonably be required because the pretrial objection can be researched and written under relatively calm circumstances, as distinguished from an extemporaneous objection made in the heat of trial. Broadly worded and vague objections are inappropriate in either context. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 185 (Chk. 2008).

Since a general objection such as "illegal arrest" or "illegal search" made before trial will ordinarily present no basis for reversing a trial court's ruling, a "shot-gun" motion that contains only conclusory language such as "illegal arrest" and that fails to specify with any particularity why his arrest was illegal could be denied without hearing on that ground alone. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 185 (Chk. 2008).

An oral motion to dismiss the case because the prosecution, by not putting on any witnesses or evidence, failed to establish a prima facie case against the accused at the hearing will be denied when the hearing was not a preliminary examination or an initial appearance, or some other proceeding at which the government is required to make a prima facie showing of the case against the defendant but was a pretrial hearing on the defendant's Rule 12(b)(2) and (3) motions – motions alleging defects in the information and to suppress evidence. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 185 (Chk. 2008).

Since, under Kosrae Criminal Rule 12, any defense, objection, or request which is capable of determination without the trial of the general issue may be raised before trial by motion, this rule encompasses a motion raising a statute of limitations defense. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228d (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A motion to suppress is both belated and premature when it is belated because it was filed after the deadline for filing pre-trial motions and when it is premature because there is no indication from the court record or from the motion that the government intends to produce at trial the evidence that the defendant seeks to suppress. Without any indication that the government intends to produce that evidence at trial, the court is unable to discern what, if any, evidence may be subject to suppression. Chuuk v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 250, 252 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The authority for filing a motion to suppress is provided for by Criminal Rule 12(b)(3), which requires that a motion to suppress must be raised prior to trial. Chuuk v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 250, 252 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When there is no indication that the government intends to produce at trial the evidence sought to be suppressed, and until the government specifies that it intends to produce that evidence at trial, a motion to suppress that evidence is premature. The procedures set forth in Rules 12 and 16 need, as appropriate, to be followed before the court can reasonably address such issues. Chuuk v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 250, 252 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A "shot-gun" motion that contains only conclusory language and that fails to specify the grounds with any particularity can be denied without hearing on that ground alone. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 526 (Chk. 2009).

Since the government has the burden of proof to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants' statements were admissible; it presented its side first on the issue. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A motion made before trial must be determined before trial unless the court, for good cause, orders that it be deferred for determination at the trial of the general issue or until after finding, but no such determination can be deferred if a party's right to appeal is adversely affected. When factual issues are involved in determining a motion, the court must state its essential findings on the record; otherwise, the court is required to exercise sound judicial discretion in considering a request for dismissal that requires that the court have factual information supporting the request. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

FSM Criminal Rule 12(a) abolishes motions to quash an information. However, since under FSM law any relief possible under the common law motions and pleas abolished by Rule 12(a) may be sought by pretrial motion under FSM Criminal Rule 12(b), the court will consider a defendant's motion to quash the information as a Rule 12(b) motion to dismiss the information. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 425 (Pon. 2011).

When the government has filed no response to a defendant's motion, it will not be permitted to present argument on the motion. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 425-26 (Pon. 2011).

A motion requesting a chamber conference is defective when it specifies neither a legal ground nor the relief or order sought, as required under Chuuk Criminal Rule 47. The court does not entertain motions for the purposes of "discussing concerns." Chuuk v. William, 17 FSM R. 495, 496 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The time to raise issues regarding probable cause is immediately after arrest, preferably at the initial appearance, arraignment, or, upon motion, at a probable cause hearing. It is not approximately one month before trial is scheduled to begin. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Pretrial motions are governed by Criminal Procedure Rule 12. Under that rule, any defense, objection, or request which is capable of determination without the trial of the general issue may be raised before trial by motion, and certain motions must be raised before trial or they are deemed waived. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

A pretrial motion is generally capable of determination before trial if it involves questions of law rather than fact. A defense is thus capable of determination if trial of the facts surrounding the commission of the alleged offense would be of no assistance in determining the validity of the defense. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

As a general matter, the question of whether or not a particular defense may be raised by means of a Rule 12(b) motion turns on whether or not that defense may be decided solely on issues of law. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

Under Rule 12(e), the court must decide a pretrial motion before trial unless the court, for good cause, orders that it be deferred for determination at the trial of the general issue. Good cause for deferral exists only if facts at trial will be relevant to the court's decision. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

The trial court must rule on any issue entirely segregable from the evidence to be presented at trial, but may in its discretion defer a ruling on any motion that requires trial of any nontrivial part of the general issue – that is, presentation of any significant quantity of evidence relevant to the question of guilt or innocence – on the ground that it requires trial of the general issue for purposes of Rule 12(b). FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

Most defenses, such as self-defense, insanity, and entrapment require factual determinations that make pretrial disposition inappropriate. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

A motion to dismiss is not the proper way to raise a factual defense because if the pretrial claim is substantially founded upon and intertwined with evidence concerning the alleged offense, the motion must be deferred because it falls within the province of the factfinder at trial. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

An accused's self-defense claim is a factual defense substantially founded upon and intertwined with evidence about the alleged offenses that requires trial of the general issue of the accused's guilt or innocence and that cannot be decided solely on issues of law. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 226 (Chk. 2012).

Even though it was filed eleven days after the motion it opposed, when an opposition was filed on the deadline that the court otherwise directed in its scheduling order, it was timely filed and it will not be stricken. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 (Chk. 2012).

A motion styled a motion in limine that requests the court's permission under Rule 15 to depose a witness outside of the jurisdiction is misnamed because a motion in limine is a pretrial request that certain inadmissible evidence not be referred to or offered at trial. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 35 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The Department of Justice's involvement in the government's relief efforts following Typhoon Maysak, which may have been the strongest typhoon to hit this area in the last 100 years, constitute excusable neglect for its delay in filing an opposition six days late. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 133 (Pon. 2015).

When the government has shown excusable neglect for its tardiness because its Department of Justice needed to assist in emergency relief in Typhoon Maysek's aftermath, the court will excuse the late filing of its response to the defendants' motion. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 300 n.1 (Pon. 2016).

The court treats a motion, that asks the court to allow the filing of and consideration of certain motions despite being filed well-outside the court-ordered deadline for the filing of pretrial motions, as a motion for an enlargement of time because a thing is what it is regardless of what someone chooses to label his filing. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 392 n.1 (Kos. 2017).

When the issues raised by the motion to dismiss may be considered by the court at any time during the pendency of the proceedings in the matter, the motion should be noticed and considered. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 393 (Kos. 2017).

A court can exclude evidence by granting a motion in limine. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 587, 588 n.1 (Pon. 2018).

A defendant's motion for special findings made after the court had already entered its general findings is untimely and will be denied. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 630 (Chk. 2018).

Under the court's inherent common law authority to administer the order of proof before it, the court may entertain a party's motion to reopen its case in the interest of justice, such as when the state had inadvertently forgotten to introduce a piece of evidence, the other party had notice through discovery that such evidence will be introduced, and the other party was not unduly prejudiced by the evidence's introduction. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130e (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The factors that are relevant for deciding whether to grant the state's motion to reopen its case in chief are: 1) the seriousness of the crime alleged; 2) whether motion to re-open case resulted from lack of preparation for trial; 3) timeliness of motion to reopen case in chief; 4) good cause; 5) whether motion to reopen case in chief resulted from a decision of the court after the case in chief, which was contrary to the state's understanding of the applicable law; 6) whether the other party would be unfairly prejudiced by reopening such case; and 7) whether re-opening the case will unduly delay the disposition of the case. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130d-0e (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A motion to reopen a case should be denied when unfair prejudice towards the defendant results, such as when the state wants to introduce a document or evidence not disclosed in discovery, of which defendant lacked any notice, and against which defendant could not adequately defend due to the lack of time to prepare a defense. But when the defendant had notice of the confession statement; and when a preliminary hearing determined that the confession statement was admissible at trial, and so that the defendant was put on notice that the confession would be introduced at trial, no unfair prejudice would result from allowing the state to introduce the defendant's confession statement upon re-opening its case. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130e-0f (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Motions – Unopposed

Failure by the non-moving party to respond to the motion constitutes a consent to the granting of the motion, but even if a motion is unopposed, a court still needs good grounds before the motion may be granted. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 203 (Chk. 2003).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion and a party who has failed to oppose will not be permitted to orally argue the motion. But even when there is no opposition, a court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 362 (Chk. 2004).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, but even when there is no opposition, a court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. But when the motion seeks the same relief, makes much the same arguments, and rests on much the same grounds as a motion that has been opposed, the court will consider the two motions together and the responsive filings as being applicable to both. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 379 (Chk. 2004).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, but even if there is no opposition, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Sipos, 12 FSM R. 385, 386 (Chk. 2004).

When no opposition has been filed, it is generally deemed a consent to the motion, but even without an opposition, a court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 408 (Chk. 2004).

Although failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to a motion, even if there is no opposition, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2004).

Although a motion to dismiss stands unopposed, and while failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 609, 613 (Pon. 2007).

Failure to timely oppose a motion is deemed a consent to that motion, but a court still needs proper grounds before it can grant an unopposed motion. Chuuk v. Inos, 15 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Failure to timely oppose a motion is deemed a consent to that motion, but a court still needs proper grounds before it can grant an unopposed motion. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 281 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the government has filed no response to a defendant's motions, it will not be permitted to present argument on the motions. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 378 (Chk. 2007).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion. But even if there is no opposition, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 378 (Chk. 2007).

Even though failure to timely oppose a motion is deemed consent to the motion, a court still needs good, proper grounds before it may grant the motion. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 390 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, but even when there is no opposition, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Marehalau, 16 FSM R. 505, 507 (Pon. 2009).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, but even if there is no opposition, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 115 (Chk. 2010).

No substantial issue of law or fact is raised when the defendant argues that the government failed to file a written response to his second motion to dismiss and therefore it should have been granted since the court has the discretion to allow argument without the filing of a brief and since the court will not grant an unopposed motion unless there are otherwise good grounds to grant it. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A moving party's failure to file the memorandum of points and authorities is deemed the moving party's waiver of the motion. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 317 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A non-moving party's failure to respond to a motion constitutes a consent to the granting of the motion. However, even if a motion is unopposed, the court still needs good grounds before the motion may be granted. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 426 (Pon. 2011).

A moving party's failure to file a memorandum of points and authorities will be deemed the moving party's waiver of the motion. Chuuk v. William, 17 FSM R. 495, 496 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, but even when there is no opposition, a court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 597 (Pon. 2011).

Regardless of whether a motion is unopposed and thus deemed consented to, the court must still evaluate the motion's merits and can only grant it if there are good grounds for it. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 224 (Chk. 2012).

Failure to timely oppose a motion, even a motion to enlarge time, is generally deemed a consent to the motion. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 133 (Pon. 2015).

Although the government did not file a response to the defendant's motion, it was allowed to orally respond to the motion during the hearing because the defendant did not oppose the government's participation. FSM v. Bisalen, 20 FSM R. 471, 472 (Pon. 2016).

While failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, even then the court still needs good grounds before it can grant an unopposed motion. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 598 (Chk. 2016).

When a party has failed to respond in writing to a written motion, oral argument will generally not be heard from that party, but the court may decide to permit a limited oral response on the assurance that the party's arguments would not stray outside the scope of the movant's arguments. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 598 (Chk. 2016).

When no response is filed to a motion, the non-response is deemed consent to the granting of the motion. A basis in law and fact must nevertheless exist to grant the motion. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 247, 249 (Pon. 2017).

Failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, but even when there is no opposition, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 272, 274 (Pon. 2017).

When no response is filed to a motion, the non-response is deemed consent to granting the motion, but a basis in law and fact must nevertheless exist to grant the motion. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

While failure to oppose a motion is, by rule, deemed a consent to the motion, even then the court still needs good grounds before it can grant an unopposed motion. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 52 (Chk. 2018).

Even when a motion is unopposed, the motion must still present good grounds in law and fact before the court can grant it. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 441 (Yap 2020).

– Motions for Acquittal

In stating that the prosecution's burden was to present a "prima facie" case, the trial court did not apply an incorrect standard in deciding an FSM Criminal Rule 29 motion for judgment of acquittal. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 437-38 (App. 1984).

An ordinary reading of FSM Criminal Rule 29 would require that the prosecution's case warrant a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, or else a motion for judgment of acquittal should be granted. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 441 (App. 1984).

In deciding a motion for a judgment of acquittal, the question is not whether the government has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt. The proper question is whether from the evidence presented, a reasonable fact finder could find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 441-42 (App. 1984).

In deciding a FSM Criminal Rule 29 motion for judgment of acquittal, it is not required that the evidence presented compel, but only that it be capable of persuading the trial fact finder to reach a verdict of guilt by the requisite standard. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 442 (App. 1984).

The offense of negligent driving requires proof of driving a vehicle in such a manner as to constitute a substantial deviation from the standard of care a reasonable person would exercise in the situation and when the state did not present any witnesses who saw the defendant driving his vehicle and there was no evidence presented to show the manner in which defendant was driving his vehicle and whether it was a substantial deviation from the appropriate standard of care and an officer testified that the defendant reported that he had a problem with his vehicle, it is reasonable to infer that this problem may caused the vehicle to leave the road and come to rest in the culvert. The state thus failed to present a prima facie case and the defendant's motion for acquittal on that count was granted and that count dismissed. Kosrae

v. Alokoa, 13 FSM R. 82, 83 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The offense of unauthorized operation of a motor vehicle requires proof of operating a motor vehicle on a road without possessing a valid license or learner's permit and when the state did not present any witnesses who saw the defendant operating his vehicle and did not present any evidence that the defendant did not possess a driver's license or learner's permit, there was no evidence presented to prove that the defendant operated his vehicle without a valid license or permit in his possession. The state thus failed to present a prima facie case and the defendant's motion for acquittal on that count was granted and that count dismissed. Kosrae v. Alokoa, 13 FSM R. 82, 83 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The standard of review that a court uses in considering a renewed motion for acquittal under Criminal Rule 29(c) is whether the evidence could "sustain" a conviction, i.e., such evidence that reasonable persons could find guilt beyond reasonable doubt. It is not a requirement that the evidence compel, but only that it is capable of or sufficient to persuade the factfinder to reach a verdict of guilt by the requisite standard. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 85, 86 (Chk. 2004).

As a matter of due process, to sustain a conviction, the government must prove each element of an offense charged beyond a reasonable doubt. To sustain a charge against a Rule 29 motion for acquittal, however, it is not a requirement that the evidence compel a guilty verdict "beyond a reasonable doubt," only that it is adequate and sufficient to support a "prima facie" case. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 487 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

In ruling on a Rule 29 motion, the proper inquiry is not whether the government has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt, but whether there has been evidence presented that could persuade a reasonable person, viewing the evidence and reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the prosecution, of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 487 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

For the purposes of motions for acquittal, the government has presented sufficient evidence of the requisite intent to satisfy that element of the murder charges when the defendants' use of dangerous weapons to repeatedly beat the victim alone creates a strong inference of the requisite intent and when there is evidence sufficient to support the specific intent requirement for murder based on the prolonged duration of the beating and other attendant circumstances arising after the victim's initial assault. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When an adjudication on the merits has not yet occurred and the case is still in the pretrial stage, a defendant's motion for acquittal on insanity grounds is premature and will be denied without prejudice since the FSM Code requires that, if a defendant is acquitted on the grounds of physical or mental disorder, the verdict and judgment must so state and since the court cannot issue a verdict and judgment until after a trial on the merits, during which the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt all elements including intent. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 216 (Pon. 2010).

The standard used in considering a Rule 29(a) motion for acquittal is not whether the evidence is insufficient for the court to find that each of the elements of the crimes the accused is charged with committing was proven beyond a reasonable doubt and the question is not whether the government has proved its case beyond a reasonable doubt. Instead, the proper question is whether the evidence could "sustain" a conviction, i.e., such evidence that reasonable persons could find guilt beyond reasonable doubt. It is not a requirement that the evidence compel, but only that it is capable of or sufficient to persuade the factfinder to reach a verdict of guilt by the requisite standard. FSM v. Sonis, 18 FSM R. 620, 621 (Chk. 2013).

When there is evidence that could sustain a conviction because there is evidence that reasonable persons could find guilt beyond reasonable doubt on each of the counts, a motion to acquit will be denied for each count. FSM v. Sonis, 18 FSM R. 620, 622 (Chk. 2013).

Although the failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to that motion, the court, even with no opposition, still needs good grounds before it can grant a motion for acquittal. FSM v. Benedicto, 21 FSM R. 377, 379 (Chk. 2017).

When a defendant rests without putting on a defense, the sole basis for moving for acquittal, or raising the point on appeal, is that the government has failed to establish a prima facie case. In this context, the "prima facie" is used to denote evidence which, if believed, would be sufficient to establish a defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. FSM v. Benedicto, 21 FSM R. 377, 379 (Chk. 2017).

The court's standard of review in considering a renewed motion for acquittal under Criminal Rule 29(c) is whether the evidence could "sustain" a conviction, i.e., such evidence that reasonable persons could find guilt beyond reasonable doubt. It is not a requirement that the evidence compel, but only that it is capable of or sufficient to persuade the factfinder to reach a verdict of guilt by the requisite standard. FSM v. Benedicto, 21 FSM R. 377, 379 (Chk. 2017).

The court will deny a renewed motion for acquittal when, not only are most of the witness-victim's testimonial inconsistencies minor, they are immaterial, and when the prosecution established a prima facie case because there was sufficient evidence that reasonable persons could find the defendant guilty beyond reasonable doubt – there was sufficient evidence to persuade a factfinder to reach a guilty verdict. FSM v. Benedicto, 21 FSM R. 377, 380 (Chk. 2017).

The court's standard of review when considering a renewed motion for judgment of acquittal under Rule 29(c) is whether the evidence is such that reasonable persons could find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. It is not a requirement that the evidence compel, but only that it is capable of or sufficient to persuade the fact finder to reach a verdict of guilt by the requisite standard. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 631 (Chk. 2018).

The requisite standard for evaluating a Rule 29(c) motion is the same as the due process standard used in evaluating whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict: whether viewing all the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, any rational fact finder could find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 631 (Chk. 2018).

Essentially, a Rule 29 motion for judgment of acquittal is a challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 631 (Chk. 2018).

A Rule 29 motion is an important safeguard for the defendant. It tests the sufficiency of the evidence against the defendant, and avoids the risk that the trier of fact may capriciously find the defendant guilty even though there is no legally sufficient evidence of guilt. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 631 (Chk. 2018).

The relevant question in assessing a Rule 29(c) motion is whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the government, any rational trier of fact could have found the crime's essential elements beyond a reasonable doubt. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 631 (Chk. 2018).

When the court finds that there is such evidence that reasonable persons could find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, the court will deny the defendants' motion for judgment of acquittal after finding of guilt. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 633 (Chk. 2018).

– National Crimes

The prosecution of criminals is not a power having an indisputably national character. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 178 (Truk 1982).

Congress did not exceed its constitutional authority when it defined a national crime as one committed "against a national public servant in the course of, in connection with, or as a result of that person's employment or service;" nor was this definition so vague that it does not give reasonable notice of what conduct is prohibited, or encourages arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 73 (Pon. 2002).

The Constitution, as amended, expressly delegates to Congress the power to define national crimes and prescribe penalties. Congress enacted the Revised Criminal Code Act, as amended, pursuant to this constitutional power. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

Congress defined crimes against persons as inherently national when they are committed against national public servants, if the crime is sufficiently connected with national public servants' performance of their duties. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

An assault against a national public servant at the national government capitol complex in Palikir, in the middle of a workday, in the National Public Auditor's Office demonstrates precisely the national government's interests that Congress sought to protect by defining a crime against a national public servant in the course of the public servant's employment as a national crime. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

Congress acted constitutionally and within its power to define national crimes when it defined a crime against a national public servant in the course of employment as a national crime. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

When a very strong nexus exists in this case between the defendant's alleged criminal conduct and the victim's employment as a national public servant because it was a crime of violence perpetrated on government property, against a government employee who was conducting official government business, it should be the national government that determines the penalty for that conduct and punishes that conduct. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 76 (Pon. 2002).

The 1991 constitutional amendment that changed the word "major" to the word "national" narrowed Congress's power by allowing it to define national crimes instead of major crimes and prescribe penalties, having due regard for local custom and tradition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 573 (App. 2004).

The 1991 constitutional amendment that removed national government jurisdiction over major crimes did not remove national government jurisdiction over firearms and ammunition possession under the Weapons Control Act since there was an independent jurisdictional basis for it under the Constitution's foreign and interstate commerce and national defense clauses and Congress has always had the power to define national crimes. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 574 (App. 2004).

In an examination to determine whether it is a national crime, the focus is: Does the regulation of the possession of firearms and ammunition involve a national activity or function, or is it one of an indisputably national character? Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 575 (App. 2004).

Congress's power to define national crimes is generally restricted to three areas: 1) actions occurring in places where the national government has jurisdiction; 2) actions involving an instrumentality of the national government; and 3) actions involving an activity or function that the national government has the power to regulate. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 575 (App. 2004).

The national government can regulate firearms and ammunition possession since there is an international commerce aspect to the regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition that is related to its manufacture outside of the FSM and to its movement through the nation's customs and immigration borders and on the additional jurisdictional basis rooted in the national defense clause. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

There is a national government interest in regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition in order to provide for the national security, which furthers the nation's interest in its defense, and this, in combination with the international commerce aspects, provides a jurisdictional basis for the national government's regulation of the possession of firearms and ammunition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

The regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition involves a national activity or function because of the international commerce aspects of its manufacture and movement, together with the national government interest in protecting the national security under the national defense clause. In combination, these provide the national government with a jurisdictional basis to regulate the possession of firearms and ammunition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

Even if Congress took no position on its jurisdiction based on Article IX, Section 2(a), the court is well within its power to determine jurisdiction based on this constitutional provision when it is not a situation where the action of the government is being challenged for attempting to implement a non-self-executing provision of the Constitution, but is one where the court determined what authority Congress had to enact statutes regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition. In doing so, the court did not usurp the powers of Congress. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 633, 635 (App. 2004).

That the evidence presented in a prosecution for interfering in a national election, might also have sustained a state court conviction on state law charges (if one had been brought) arising from the simultaneous state election, is irrelevant and thus not a substantial or close question. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 164, 169 (Chk. 2006).

In an examination to determine whether it is a national crime, the focus is: Does the regulation involve a national activity or function, or is it one of an indisputably national character? FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

Congress has always had the power to define national crimes. The power to define national crimes is inherent in the national government and existed before the 1991 amendment made the power express. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

A contention that the FSM Supreme Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over a case's firearms charges because there was no nexus between those charges and the national government's powers to regulate interstate and foreign commerce and to provide for the national defense or because national defense and foreign or interstate commerce was not involved or not implicated in the case is without merit. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 459-60 (Chk. 2007).

When a "national offense" is defined as including any offense "which is otherwise an offense against the Federated States of Micronesia" and the underlying offenses involve improper obligation and expenditure of FSM funds and tampering with FSM official documents and information, it is difficult to see how these offenses could not be considered offenses against the FSM and an argument that they are not will be rejected. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 558 (App. 2008).

11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), which prohibits firearms use in connection with or in aid of the commission of "any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," does not restrict liability for firearms use to only those crimes defined in the FSM Code because the term "any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," when read in context must refer to any or all criminal laws in the Federated States of Micronesia, national, state, or local, since, if it were otherwise, it would not be possible for the statute to have its obviously intended purpose and effect – to discourage the use of, and to punish the use of, firearms during the commission of other crimes. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

The use of a firearm to commit a Chuuk state law crime, such as robbery, is a national offense even though the robbery itself is not a national offense. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

Exclusive national jurisdiction over a trespass and theft at the Chinese Embassy is proper under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(ii) as an otherwise undefined national crime, but jurisdiction is not proper under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(i) where an exclusive list of national crimes is defined. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 494 (Pon. 2014).

Jurisdiction under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(i) cannot be supported for the misdemeanor crime of trespass or theft at the Chinese Embassy because the trespass and theft were not committed in the FSM's exclusive economic zone, or its the airspace, or oceans; because it was not a retaliation, or breach of fiduciary responsibility by a public servant; or because it was not against property belonging to the FSM national government, or against people participating in an election. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 495 (Pon. 2014).

Exclusive jurisdiction for undefined national crimes can be found under in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(ii) which states that national jurisdiction is proper for any crime that is "otherwise a crime against the Federated States of Micronesia." FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 495 (Pon. 2014).

The test for what constitutes a crime under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(ii) is: Does the regulation involve a national activity or function, or is it one of an indisputably national character? Alternatively stated, a national crime is one that is committed in some place where the national government has jurisdiction, or that involves a national government instrumentality, or involves an activity that the national government has the power to regulate. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 495 (Pon. 2014).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(ii), the FSM Supreme Court's trial division has exclusive jurisdiction over a trespass and theft at the Chinese Embassy because the power to create, enforce, and interpret treaties is exclusively an activity or function that the national government has power to regulate; because a power expressly delegated to the national government, or a power of such an indisputably national character as to be beyond the power of a state to control, is a national power; because the President has the duty to enforce and conduct foreign affairs under national law; because Congress has the duty to ratify treaties; because the national Supreme Court the duty to interpret and adjudicate international treaties; because the nature of the expressly delegated powers in the Constitution's article IX, § 2, calls for a uniform nationally coordinated approach; and because if a power is of an indisputable national character such that it is beyond state's power to control, that power is to be considered a national power. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 495-96 (Pon. 2014).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(ii), the FSM Supreme Court's trial division has exclusive jurisdiction over a trespass and theft at the Chinese Embassy because ambassadors, and all foreign officials, are explicitly intended to be protected by the national government and breaching of an embassy's sanctity affects the personal residence of the ambassador, and directly affects the ambassador's staff, many of whom are legally protected foreign officials; because, although the embassy's physical premises are not explicitly listed in the Constitution as protected property they are necessarily, and implicitly, included within relationship with the ambassador and other foreign diplomats; because the duty of protecting the physical diplomatic mission is an express requirement of the agreement between the FSM and China and the Vienna Convention, statutorily incorporated by reference, requires the protection of the embassy itself; and because this is of an indisputably international character, a fortiori of a national character, and therefore beyond the reach of the state power to control. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 496 (Pon. 2014).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(b)(i), the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over any crime committed in the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 633 (Pon. 2015).

The FSM Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction over the prosecution of national crimes. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 134 (Pon. 2015).

A national crime is statutorily defined as any crime which is inherently national in character and defined anywhere in Title 11, or otherwise a crime against the FSM. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 134 (Pon. 2015).

A crime is "inherently national in character" when the crime is committed by a national public official or public servant while that person is engaged in his or her official duties or in violation of a fiduciary duty or when the crime involves property belonging to the national government. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 134 (Pon. 2015).

When all of the acts and omissions a defendant is accused of committing, he did as a national government official or public servant while he was engaged in his official duty; when those acts may also be a violation of his fiduciary duty; and when national government property – $926 in Maritime Operations Revolving Fund money – was involved, the information alleges national crimes. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 134 (Pon. 2015).

Since the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over crimes committed by a national public official or public servant while that person is engaged in his or her official duties or in violation of a fiduciary duty, it will not dismiss a case where all of the acts and omissions the defendant is accused of committing, he did as a national government official or public servant while he was engaged in his official duty. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 235 (Pon. 2015).

A national crime is one that is committed in some place where the national government has jurisdiction, or that involves a national government instrumentality, or involves an activity that the national government has the power to regulate. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 331, 333 (Chk. 2017).

Under article IX, section 2(p) of the Constitution, the FSM national government has exclusive jurisdiction over all national crimes, as defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7), and the FSM Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction over allegations of violations of the National Criminal Code. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 465-66 (Pon. 2018).

A national crime is one which is 1) inherently national in character and defined anywhere in Title 11; or 2) otherwise a crime against the FSM. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 466 (Pon. 2018).

A crime is inherently national in character when it involves either real or personal property belonging to the national government. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 466 (Pon. 2018).

The FSM Supreme Court properly has jurisdiction over a crime committed in a building entirely leased (except for one office space retained by the landlord) by the FSM Department of Health and Social Affairs to provide necessary office space to the World Health Organization. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 466 (Pon. 2018).

Theft and unauthorized possession or removal of property from office space leased by the FSM national government and provided to, and occupied by, the World Health Organization is a national crime because it was committed in a place where the national government has jurisdiction, or that involves an instrumentality of the national government, or involves an activity that the national government has the power to regulate. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 467 (Pon. 2018).

– New Trial

On a defendant's motion, the court may grant a new trial to that defendant if required in the interests of justice. When the motion is not brought on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, the other grounds on which a motion for a new trial may be granted are if the court reaches the conclusion that the verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence and that a miscarriage of justice may have resulted, or for any error of sufficient magnitude to require reversal on appeal. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 85, 87 (Chk. 2004).

If a timely motion for a new trial on any ground other than newly discovered evidence has been made, an appeal from a judgment of conviction may be taken within 10 days after the entry of an order denying the motion. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 85, 87-88 (Chk. 2004).

When the prosecution has volunteered to provide prior witness statements before trial, a mistrial will be declared if the prosecution's failure to provide the Chuukese language witness statements before trial prejudiced the defendant. The failure to produce prior witness statements is analyzed under a strict harmless error standard. Since courts cannot speculate whether the statement of the witness could have been utilized effectively at trial, the harmless error doctrine must be strictly applied in these cases. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

The proper standard in negligent nondisclosure cases should call for a new trial whenever the nondisclosed evidence might reasonably have affected the factfinder's judgment on some material point, without necessarily requiring a supplementary finding that it would also have changed its verdict. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

The purpose of production of witness statements is to give defendants impeachment materials at a time when they can effectively use them. When the prosecution has failed to timely provide the statements, that objective can be fulfilled by the grant of a mistrial because when the denial of an opportunity to impeach a prosecution witness's highly damaging testimony is caused by the breach of the prosecutor's duty to produce the witness's prior statement, a new trial is necessitated. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

A defendant whose trial ended in a mistrial is entitled to a new trial, but not a new judge. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 251 (App. 2015).

– Obstructing Justice

The offense of obstructing justice requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of resisting or interfering with a police officer in the lawful pursuit of his duties. The intent of the statute is that the police should be able to perform their official duties, including the arrest of an accused, without any obstacles, obstructions or hindrances placed in their way. Arresting a person is within scope of employment and within the lawful pursuit of a police officer's duties. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 528 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The term "interfere" means to check or hamper the action of the officer, or to do something which hinders or prevents or tends to prevent the performance of his legal duty. Defendants' actions in contacting, holding and pulling up a person while an officer was attempting to arrest him, did hamper or hinder the officer in the performance of his legal duty. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 529 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The offense of obstructing justice does not require force. However, the use of force, as distinguished from the use of words, is obviously sufficient. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 529 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Mere threats are not sufficient to constitute obstruction of justice. However, threats, accompanied by a show of force, are sufficient to constitute the offense. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 529 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Arguments with or criticism of a police officer, without any other action, is generally not sufficient to constitute the offense. For example, demanding that the officers properly identify themselves and show an arrest warrant, is not adequate for the offense of obstructing justice. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 529 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under common law, a person may resist a lawful arrest if the arresting officer uses unreasonable force. After careful consideration of public policy and the constitutional protection of individual rights, including protection against arrests involving excessive force, the Kosrae State Court recognizes and accepts the application of the defense. A police officer has a right to use force reasonably necessary to effectuate an arrest. The reasonableness of a police officer's conduct while making an arrest must be assessed on the basis of information that the police officer had when he acted. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When an arrestee was intoxicated and the arresting officer restrained and held the arrestee with a technique that he had been trained in to subdue intoxicated persons; when he did not use any weapons to subdue the arrestee; when the arrestee was not injured and did not receive any medical treatment for any injuries received; when the arrestee was not in danger of death or great bodily harm from the action in restraining him, the officer's conduct in making the arrest was reasonable based upon the information available to him when he acted and therefore he used the reasonable force necessary in trying to subdue, hold, and arrest the arrestee. Therefore the defendants' defense of resisting the arrest of another where the arresting officer uses unreasonable force, must fail. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Pohnpei law, every person who unlawfully resists or interferes with any law enforcement officer in the lawful pursuit of his duties, or who unlawfully tampers with witnesses or attempts to prevent their attendance at trials, is guilty of obstructing justice. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

Since the police may arrest without a warrant persons who are in the process of committing an offense in their presence, when the trial court found as fact that a person had, in the presence of the police, been argumentative; had prevented them from gaining access to her husband, who they had reasonable suspicion to stop and to whom they wanted to talk about a car abandonment; and that when a sergeant arrested her it was for obstructing justice and for pushing him in the chest and when these facts remain the facts on appeal, the facts, viewed from the law enforcement officers' vantage point, would constitute probable cause for an arrest on an obstructing justice charge. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 371 (App. 2011).

A person is guilty of obstructing administration of law and other government functions when the government has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant willfully interfered with, delayed, and obstructed certain public officials in the discharge or attempted discharge of their duties to process and prepare FSM passports by not providing the information necessary to gain access to the machine readable passport system after he left his government employment, thereby interfering with, and delaying or obstructing the processing and production of FSM passports. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 315, 317 (Pon. 2017).

– Pardon

The English version of the Pohnpei Constitution gives the Governor the power to commute a sentence and to grant a pardon (though the Pohnpeian version restricts that power to felony cases); and both versions are silent on the power to grant parole. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 17, 23 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

In one line of cases, the United States Supreme Court held that the presidential power to pardon includes the power to commute a sentence even if not specifically provided for by statute, as long as the conditions do not offend the Constitution; in another line of case, however, the court holds that Congress may vest the power to commute by statute. This latter line, requiring legislative enactment, should be adopted by the Pohnpei state court system. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 17, 24 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

The only power given to the executive to modify a sentence is the power to grant pardons and reprieves. FSM v. Finey, 3 FSM R. 82, 84 (Truk 1986).

While a person's assertion that, given his rehabilitation over time, and his good work in the community and on behalf of his municipality in the years since his conviction, it is a "manifest injustice" that his felony conviction prohibits him from serving in Congress, may be grounds for a pardon, it is not a valid ground for setting aside a conviction and permitting withdrawal of a guilty plea under Rule 32(d). Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A Presidential pardon restores a person's basic civil rights. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 295 (Pon. 2016).

The court lacks the authority to order expungement of the record of a valid and unchallenged conviction even though the defendant has been pardoned since a pardon does not create the factual fiction that the crime was never committed. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 296 (Pon. 2016).

A Presidential pardon restores a convicted felon's basic civil rights. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

The court does not have the constitutional power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress because the Constitution reserves that power to Congress, and the court cannot exercise a power that only Congress has. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

The Constitution permits Congress, and only Congress, to change, by statute, the constitutional provision disqualifying a person convicted of a felony from membership in Congress, and Congress so far has not seen fit to alter this qualification. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

Congress itself always has the final say over the election and qualification of its members, and, unless Congress acts to change the qualifications, a person convicted of a felony and later pardoned is still ineligible for Congress membership. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600-01 (Chk. 2016).

If a Presidential pardon automatically entitled the pardoned person to an expungement of his criminal record, then the executive branch would have the power to interfere with the record-keeping of another co-equal branch of government (the judicial branch) while also preventing still another co-equal branch of government (Congress) from access to the judicial branch's records that would assist it in its constitutional duty to be the sole judge of the qualification of its members. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 601 (Chk. 2016).

– Parole

The National Criminal Code preserves the President's parole powers for offenses committed before the Code's effective date; the repeal of parole powers applies only to offenses committed thereafter. Tosie v. Tosie, 1 FSM R. 149, 151, 158 (Kos. 1982).

The English version of the Pohnpei Constitution gives the Governor the power to commute a sentence and to grant a pardon (though the Pohnpeian version restricts that power to felony cases); and both versions are silent on the power to grant parole. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 17, 23 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

The parole statute, 11 F.S.M.C. 1401, does not mandate, but merely authorizes, review of sentences for the purpose of determining parole eligibility. Yalmad v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 32, 33 (App. 1991).

When considering parole a justice shall request and consider the views of the prosecution, the prisoner and his counsel, the victim or head of the victim's family, and, when requested by the prosecution of the prisoner, such community leaders as clergy and municipal and village leaders when determining a prisoner's eligibility for parole. The justice shall also base his determination upon the prisoner's behavior in prison and any factors indicative of the prisoner's chance for successful adaptation to community life after release. Yalmad v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 32, 33-34 (App. 1991).

An appeal from the decision of the trial judge may be only on the grounds of abuse of discretion resulting from the justice exceeding constraints imposed by the parole statute, 11 F.S.M.C. 1401. Yalmad v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 32, 34 (App. 1991).

Sentencing is to be individualized, and the overall objective must be to make the sentence fit the offender as well as the offense. The sentencing court's focus must be the defendant, the defendant's background and potential, and the nature of the offense. The term of imprisonment fixed in the sentence must be the time which the sentencing judge believes the convicted person justly should be required to serve. There is no justification for the sentence to include an additional factor in recognition of the possibility of parole. Kimoul v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 53, 60-61 (App. 1991).

If a motion were considered to be a parole application based on the defendant having served ⅓ of his sentence then it would have to be denied, with leave to renew within 30 days, for failure to follow the proper procedures and supply the proper information. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 194, 196 (Chk. 2002).

The Kosrae Parole Board must consider any written statements and recommendations of the presiding justice. If one is not in the file, the Board, upon receipt of a parole petition, will serve a written notice on the presiding justice, who may, in his sole discretion, submit or decline to submit a written statement or recommendation. If no written statement and/or recommendation is received by the Parole Board from the presiding justice within the specified 10 day period, the Parole Board shall so state in its submission to the Governor. Phillip v. Kosrae State Parole Bd., 11 FSM R. 331, 332-33 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Kosrae Parole Board will not consider any verbal statements made by the presiding justice. Phillip v. Kosrae State Parole Bd., 11 FSM R. 331, 333 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the parole statute requires the court to request and consider the views of the prosecution, the prisoner and his counsel, the victim or head of the victim's family, and, when requested by the prosecution or the prisoner, such community leaders as clergy and municipal and village leaders, the court must request that the prosecution express its views. FSM v. Engichy, 14 FSM R. 573, 574 (Chk. 2007).

The parole statute requires that the justice reviewing a parole application "base his or her determination upon the prisoner's behavior in prison and any factors indicative of the prisoner's chances for a successful adaptation to community life after release." The statute (and the parole review procedural rule that implements it) limits the reviewing justice to considering just those, and no other, factors. FSM v. Engichy, 14 FSM R. 573, 574 (Chk. 2007).

Since the parole statute requires that the court request and consider the views of the prosecution, the prisoner and his counsel, the victim or head of the victim's family, and, when requested by the prosecution or the prisoner, such community leaders as clergy and municipal and village leaders, when the prisoner's request expresses the prisoner's views and the views of some community leaders and the Chuuk Chief of Correction the court will ask that the prosecution and the Chuuk Director of Public Safety express their views on the prisoner's parole request. FSM v. Aki, 15 FSM R. 282, 283 (Chk. 2007).

The statute requires that the justice reviewing a parole application base his or her determination upon the prisoner's behavior in prison and any factors indicative of the prisoner's chances for a successful adaptation to community life after release. The statute (and the parole review procedural rule that implements it), limits the reviewing justice to considering just those two, and no other, factors. FSM v. Aki, 15 FSM R. 282, 284 (Chk. 2007).

That while the prisoner was on pretrial release in another criminal case, he committed the offense for which he is now serving a jail sentence from which he seeks parole, is not relevant to the prisoner's parole application since it occurred before he was convicted and sentenced to prison. FSM v. Aki, 15 FSM R. 282, 284 (Chk. 2007).

A prisoner's violation of his work release conditions must be considered to be "behavior in prison" within the meaning of the parole statute because it occurred while he was serving his jail sentence, and, since it occurred while the prisoner was on work release, it also has some bearing on whether he can successfully adapt to community life after release. It therefore must have some effect on the court's decision on the prisoner's parole application. FSM v. Aki, 15 FSM R. 282, 284 (Chk. 2007).

If the court denies a prisoner's parole request, the prisoner cannot apply for parole again until one year has passed after the entry of the denial order. FSM v. Aki, 15 FSM R. 282, 284 (Chk. 2007).

Instead of denying a parole request, the court may grant it and delay its effective date. FSM v. Aki, 15 FSM R. 282, 284 (Chk. 2007).

The Parole Rules require the applicant to file an original and three copies and also require the parole application to be accompanied by proof of service on not only the prosecutor or prosecuting authority, but also on the person or persons in charge of any facility where the prisoner has been incarcerated for 30 days or more during the sentence he is requesting to be reviewed, the victim of the crime or at least one member of the victim's immediate family if the victim is deceased, and the prisoner's village or municipal leaders. When a parole request does not comply with these requirements, the court may deny the request for failure to comply with the parole request procedure and may, at its discretion, notify the prisoner of the inadequacies and grant him one or more 30-day extensions within which to file a renewed request that properly complies with the parole rules. FSM v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 22, 23 (Chk. 2008).

The parole rules bar repetitive requests. A prisoner whose request for parole has been denied (either before or after review) is not permitted to file another request until one year after the entry of the order denying the request for review or denying modification of sentence following review. FSM v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 22, 23-24 (Chk. 2008).

Congress has granted the court the power to suspend jail sentences, to suspend the imposition of a sentence, and to parole prisoners after they have served part of their sentence, but it has not given the court the power to expunge convictions. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 45 (Chk. 2008).

When the statute requires that a defendant convicted of murder be sentenced to a minimum of term of not less than 40 year(s), and eligible for parole after 20, the term imprisonment, as used within the statute, means a punishment of not less than 40 years in prison. Otherwise, the term parole is left meaningless, since it can only refer to release from prison, as opposed to house arrest, or the lifting of a suspended sentence. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Parole is the conditional release of prisoners before they complete their sentence. Paroled prisoners are supervised by a parole officer. If paroled prisoners violate their release conditions, they may be returned to prison. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The commonly understood meaning of parole is the conditional release from prison. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Pleas

A duty imposed on the trial court by Rule 11(e)(5) of the FSM Rules of Criminal Procedure to protect the defendant by assuring that there is a factual basis for the plea, may be breached only if the trial court should "enter a judgment" without finding a factual basis. In re Main, 4 FSM R. 255, 259 (App. 1990).

Default judgments are unknown in criminal law. Guilty pleas by a defendant require compliance with formalities designed to insure that the accused receives due process. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 474 n.3 (App. 1996).

A criminal defendant, having pled not guilty at arraignment, is not required to abandon that plea upon conviction. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 9 (App. 1997).

A Rule 32(d) motion can be granted if the defendant failed to understand the direct consequences of his plea with regard to sentencing, but failure to comprehend the collateral consequences of a plea is not grounds for the granting of a Rule 32(d) motion. The fact that the defendant, upon pleading guilty to a felony, would be precluded from becoming a candidate for public office is a collateral consequence of the plea. Felons lose privileges available to those who do not commit crimes. Loss of these privileges of good citizenship is simply not grounds for vacating a conviction. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 307 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The term "nolo contendere" is a Latin phrase meaning "I will not contest it." It is a plea which has a similar legal effect as pleading guilty. The plea of nolo contendere has been described as a confession, implied confession, admission of guilt of all facts pleaded, conviction, and a guilty plea. A plea of nolo contendere is considered the functional and substantive equivalent of a guilty plea. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 123 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The principal difference between a plea of guilty and a plea of nolo contendere is that the plea of nolo contendere may not be used against the defendant in a civil action based upon the same acts. A plea of nolo contendere admits for the purpose of the criminal case all the elements of the offense charged against the defendant, and gives the court complete power to sentence the defendant for that offense. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 123 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A plea of "nolo contendere" literally means "I do not contest it." Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 128 (App. 2007).

A bargained-for dismissal as part of a plea agreement is not tantamount to an acquittal and the dismissal of charges pursuant to a plea agreement is clearly not a finding of the same order as an acquittal and should not have the same implications. Therefore, an accused's bargained-for dismissal of an illegal possession of ammunition charge against him does not warrant the dismissal of the aiding and abetting illegal possession of ammunition charges against other defendants. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 462 (Chk. 2007).

In order to convict defendants of the aiding and abetting illegal possession of ammunition, the prosecution must first prove that another illegally possessed ammunition. But the dismissal of the illegal possession of ammunition charge against that other as the result of his bargained-for plea agreement in the other's case does not preclude the prosecution from proving, in this case, that the other illegally possessed ammunition, and then proving that the defendants aided and abetted him. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 462 (Chk. 2007).

Rule 11 does not apply to hearings on the revocation of probation or supervised release. Rule 11 on its face applies only to the procedures a court must follow before accepting a plea of guilty or nolo contendere. The rule is addressed to the taking of a plea, not the imposition of sentence or the revocation of probation. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 7-8 (Chk. 2008).

When Rule 11 applies, the failure to comply with the Rule 11 procedures would entitle the defendant to have his plea set aside and to have another hearing at which he may plead anew. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 8 n.2 (Chk. 2008).

A guilty plea is itself a conviction, ending the controversy, but admissions of probation violations [unlike guilty pleas] do not end the controversy. The judge must still decide the more difficult issue whether the violations warrant revocation of probation. Thus, admissions of probation violations, unlike guilty pleas, do not automatically trigger sentencing. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

Unlike in a criminal prosecution where it is constitutionally required, in a probation revocation the government does not have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the probation terms have been violated. The court may revoke probation if it is reasonably satisfied that the probation terms were violated. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

The constitutional protection not to be twice placed in jeopardy does not apply to a revocation hearing because revocation and a criminal prosecution can both be based on the same transaction without implicating double jeopardy concerns. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

Since probation revocation is not a stage in a criminal prosecution, the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination is limited to where his answers might incriminate him in a future criminal proceeding. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

A court is not required by the rules or by due process to warn a defendant that he would not be able to withdraw his admissions if the court did not follow the parties' recommendation about the length of probation to be revoked. Nor is a court required to allow him to withdraw his admission when the length of the probation revocation is not to his liking and a formal waiver of the defendant's rights or a Rule 11 style colloquy is also not required. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

The revocation or modification of probation is not governed by Rule 11, but by Criminal Procedure Rule 32.1, which provides for a preliminary hearing and a final revocation hearing. A preliminary hearing is only held whenever a probationer is held in custody on the ground that the person has violated a condition of probation or supervised release. When the probationer is not in custody, the hearing is a final revocation hearing. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

Unless waived by the person whose probation the government seeks to revoke, that person must be given 1) written notice of the alleged probation violation; 2) disclosure of the evidence supporting the charge; 3) an opportunity to appear and to present evidence; 4) the opportunity to question adverse witnesses; and 5) notice of the right to be represented by counsel. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 10 (Chk. 2008).

A guilty plea is as an admission of all the elements of a formal criminal charge. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 459 (Chk. 2014).

A guilty plea constitutes an admission to all of the facts averred in the information. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 459 (Chk. 2014).

A plea of no contest or nolo contendere, a plea in which an accused does not expressly admit guilt but consents to be punished as if guilty, is insufficient to satisfy the actually litigated requirement and thus cannot be used to apply collateral estoppel or issue preclusion in a later civil proceeding. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 459 n.3 (Chk. 2014).

Although a guilty plea eliminates the need for a contested trial, the FSM Supreme Court cannot enter a judgment of conviction on the plea unless it determines that a factual basis exists for it. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 459 (Chk. 2014).

While the rules do permit the court to take an accused's plea during the accused's initial appearance, it is not this court's usual practice to do so. The one time that the FSM Supreme Court might be persuaded to take a plea during the accused's initial appearance, would be when the accused, while represented by counsel, has already negotiated a plea bargain with the prosecution and the parties are ready to proceed with the Rule 11 plea colloquy. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 446 & n.7 (Yap 2020).

The court will generally not take the accused's plea until after all pretrial motions have been decided, and the accused and the prosecution have been forewarned that if a not guilty plea is entered at the accused's scheduled plea hearing, then trial will start immediately thereafter, so both sides should be prepared for that eventuality. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 446 (Yap 2020).

– Pleas – Plea Agreement

The trial judge did not actively participate in plea negotiations when he did nothing other than judicially review and comment upon a proposed plea agreement prepared solely by counsel and parties and then voluntarily submitted by counsel to the court. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 478-79 (Kos. 1984).

A trial judge cannot be said to have negotiated with the parties concerning a proposed plea when he did not in any way suggest that the defendant plead guilty, made no efforts to encourage either party to enter into a plea agreement or to pursue further negotiations, offered no promise to accept any agreement ultimately arrived at, nor was present at any plea agreement negotiations. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 479 (Kos. 1984).

The plea bargaining process contemplates that plea agreements will be submitted to the trial judge for acceptance or rejection. When counsel place documents before a court either voluntarily or as part of standard court procedures under circumstances where the court is normally expected to comment judicially on the documents, the court's response may not customarily be used as a basis for judicial disqualification. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 480-81 (Kos. 1984).

Submission of a proposed plea agreement to the court is intended to elicit from the court some indication of an acceptable sanction, assuming that the defendant will admit guilt. The court's statement as to an acceptable penalty does not denote its belief of defendant's guilt. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 482 (Kos. 1984).

The existence of plea negotiations says little to the court about defendant's actual guilt. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 483 (Kos. 1984).

A defendant's violation of his plea agreement after the agreement was filed with, and accepted by, the court, but before sentencing by the court, may serve as the basis for court punishment of the defendant. Based upon that violation, the court may accept the defendant's plea of guilty to the crime, although the plea agreement provides for the court to defer acceptance of the plea. FSM v. Dores, 1 FSM R. 580, 584 (Pon. 1984).

FSM Criminal Rule 11(e)(1)(C) calls for implementation of a plea agreement's terms by the court if the court accepts the agreement. When the court accepts, the defendant, the prosecution and the court are all bound to carry out the terms of the plea agreement. The defendant is entitled to the benefit of the bargain reflected in the plea agreement and the government is likewise entitled to enforce the defendant's promises. FSM v. Dores, 1 FSM R. 580, 587 (Pon. 1984).

Considerations of fairness and mutuality, as well as sound policy, require that a defendant who enters into a plea agreement be subject to punishment when he violates the terms of his agreement. FSM v. Dores, 1 FSM R. 580, 588 (Pon. 1984).

There are sound reasons why prosecutors should retain discretion over whether to submit a plea agreement to a court based upon information obtained by the prosecution subsequent to execution of a written plea agreement but before presentation of that agreement to the court. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 91 (Pon. 1987).

A plea agreement calling for dismissal or reduction of charges pending in criminal litigation is contingent upon court approval. Until such approval, neither party is bound by the agreement and neither party can enforce it against the other. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 92 (Pon. 1987).

A plea agreement is not fixed until the court has acted upon it in all particulars and has fixed all conditions and explained them to the defendant. Dores v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 155, 158 (App. 1987).

A judge's involvement in plea discussions in violation of Rule 11(e)(1) is plain error. One of the principles behind the rigid enforcement of Rule 11(e)(1), is to protect the integrity of the judicial process so that the judge's impartiality and objectivity shall not be open to any questions or suspicions when it becomes his duty to impose sentence. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 387 (App. 2006).

The government attorney and the defendant's attorney may engage in discussions with a view toward reaching a plea agreement. The court shall not participate in any such discussions. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 387 (App. 2006).

A conference, which counsel sought and at which they discussed their impasse in plea negotiations and presented the case and their positions to the trial judge is an improper and inappropriate procedure. Counsel should not ask the court to give any opinion on a possible plea agreement until a final agreement is properly presented to the court in its entirety. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 387-88 & n.9 (App. 2006).

A judge's indication of sentence necessarily constitutes participation in such [plea agreement] discussions. Rule 11(e)(1)'s command with regard to plea negotiations is simple and admits of no exceptions: the court shall not participate in any such discussions. Rule 11(e)(1) is an absolute prohibition on all forms of judicial participation in or interference with the plea negotiation process. The court's role is to evaluate a plea agreement once it has been reached by the parties and discussed in open court. Prior to that time, a court should not offer comments touching upon proposed or possible plea agreements. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 388 (App. 2006).

Rule 11 means what it says: the court shall not participate in any plea negotiations. Rule 11(e)(1) is a bright-line rule prohibiting all forms of judicial participation before the parties have reached a plea agreement and disclosed the agreement in open court. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 388 (App. 2006).

The primary reason for Rule 11 is that a judge's participation in plea negotiation is inherently coercive. Rule 11 is designed to totally eliminate judicial pressure from the plea bargaining process. Judicial participation in plea negotiation discussions also threatens the trial judge's impartiality. Rule 11(e)(1)'s bar of judicial participation in the plea discussions also serves to preserve the judge's impartiality after the negotiations are completed. This is because judicial participation in a plea discussion makes it difficult for a judge to later objectively assess the voluntariness of the plea; risks the loss (if the plea negotiations fail) of the judge's impartiality during trial; and diminishes the judge's objectivity in post-trial matters such as sentencing and motions for acquittal. Rule 11(e)(1) also protects the integrity of the judicial process – so that the judge's impartiality and objectivity shall not be open to any questions or suspicions when it becomes his duty to impose sentence. The judge's role must be that of a neutral arbiter of the criminal prosecution: his involvement in the adversary process of plea negotiation is beyond and detracts from that judicial duty. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 388 (App. 2006).

A defendant who has pled guilty after the judge has participated in plea discussions should be allowed to replead, without having to show actual prejudice has resulted from the participation. Regardless of whether he has shown actual prejudice, a defendant who has pleaded guilty after the judge has participated in plea discussions is entitled to replead. Judicial participation in plea discussions is not harmless error. This is because the court cannot measure the harm to the defendant because it cannot know what agreement, if any would have been reached absent judicial participation. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 388-89 (App. 2006).

When a case is remanded to permit the defendant to replead because the trial judge had participated in plea discussion in violation of Rule 11(e)(1), the case will be reassigned to another judge as a prophylactic measure. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 389 (App. 2006).

A bargained-for dismissal as part of a plea agreement is not tantamount to an acquittal and the dismissal of charges pursuant to a plea agreement is clearly not a finding of the same order as an acquittal and should not have the same implications. Therefore, an accused's bargained-for dismissal of an illegal possession of ammunition charge against him does not warrant the dismissal of the aiding and abetting illegal possession of ammunition charges against other defendants. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 462

In order to convict defendants of the aiding and abetting illegal possession of ammunition, the prosecution must first prove that another illegally possessed ammunition. But the dismissal of the illegal possession of ammunition charge against that other as the result of his bargained-for plea agreement in the other's case does not preclude the prosecution from proving, in this case, that the other illegally possessed ammunition, and then proving that the defendants aided and abetted him. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 462 (Chk. 2007).

The court is not bound by the terms of a plea agreement, and, at the plea hearing, it must inform the defendant of the charges, his rights, and the maximum possible sentence, and it must ask if the guilty plea had been entered into without coercion, threats of force or other promises. FSM v. Bui Van Cua, 20 FSM R. 588, 590 (Pon. 2016).

Under Rule 11(e), when a plea agreement contains sentencing recommendations, the court may impose a different sentence than that proposed by the government and the parties. FSM v. Bui Van Cua, 20 FSM R. 588, 590 (Pon. 2016).

The first step in determining whether a plea agreement has been breached and whether a remedy is proper is to determine if promises were made and, if so, what they were. While the government must be held to the promises it made, it will not be bound to those it did not make. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2019).

The FSM promised that it would support the defendant's expungement petition if the FSM determined that all the sentencing conditions have been satisfied, and it kept that promise when, having determined that the defendant had satisfied the plea agreement's conditions, the FSM not only did not oppose the defendant's expungement petition, but it also affirmatively stated that it supported the petition. The FSM did not breach the plea agreement, and it also did not violate its plea agreement promise when it truthfully responded to the court's request for briefing about the current state of FSM law on expungement. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2019).

The court may reject a plea agreement due to the failure to establish the factual basis for the counts to which the defendant is pleading guilty. FSM v. Pelep, 22 FSM R. 400, 403 (Pon. 2019).

– Pleas – Withdrawal

The defendant may withdraw from a plea agreement at any time prior to the court's action on every element on the agreement. Dores v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 155, 158 (App. 1987).

Ordinarily Rule 32(d) only permits a motion to withdraw a guilty plea prior to imposition of sentence. When the defendant has been sentenced and served his sentence fully, a motion under this rule should under most circumstances be denied. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

After sentencing, the court, in its discretion, may set aside a judgment of conviction and thereafter permit a defendant to withdraw his guilty plea only upon a showing manifest injustice. The burden of proof of establishing "manifest injustice" sufficient to warrant setting aside a conviction lies with the defendant. In order to sustain his burden, the defendant must show that the conviction was obtained through fraud, imposition upon him, or misapprehension of his legal rights, and/or that he is not guilty of the crimes as charged. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

While a person's assertion that, given his rehabilitation over time, and his good work in the community and on behalf of his municipality in the years since his conviction, it is a "manifest injustice" that his felony conviction prohibits him from serving in Congress, may be grounds for a pardon, it is not a valid ground for setting aside a conviction and permitting withdrawal of a guilty plea under Rule 32(d). Trust Territory v.

Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Grounds for setting aside a conviction and permitting withdrawal of a guilty plea under Rule 32(d) include, inter alia, the trial court's failure to comply with Rule 11; the trial court's failure to adduce a factual basis for the plea; and lack of assistance of counsel coupled with a failure to understand the direct consequences of a guilty plea as regards the sentence to be imposed. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 306-07 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A motion to withdraw a guilty or nolo contendere plea may be made only before sentence is imposed or imposition of sentence is suspended; but to correct manifest injustice the court after sentence may set aside the judgment of conviction and permit the defendant to withdraw his plea. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 234 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Rule 32(d) establishes a two step process for the setting aside of the judgment after sentence and withdrawal of the defendant's plea. First, the court must find manifest injustice in the defendant's plea of guilty. Second, if the court finds manifest injustice, it may, in its discretion, set aside the judgment of conviction and permit the defendant to withdraw his plea. The burden of establishing "manifest injustice" sufficient to warrant setting aside a conviction lies with the defendant. In order to sustain his burden, the defendant must show that his conviction was obtained through fraud, imposition upon him, misunderstanding of his legal rights, and/or that the defendant is not guilty of the crimes as charged. Grounds granting a motion brought pursuant to Rule 32(d) include lack of assistance of counsel, coupled with a failure to understand the direct consequences of a guilty plea with regard to the sentence to be imposed. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 234 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

For a defendant's former counsel to testify regarding communications made during the course of the case at hearing on a motion to withdraw the defendant's plea, the defendant must be advised that if counsel is permitted to testify, the attorney-client privilege must be waived. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the defendant voluntarily terminated the Public Defender Office's services and chose to retain private counsel; when counsel talked to his potential client and reviewed the file before accepting the representation; when counsel met with the defendant on more than five occasions and on each occasion, in accordance with his established legal practice, advised the defendant that he can change counsel at any time, if he so desired; when counsel interviewed the defendant on the charges brought against him and each of the facts alleged in the Information and the defendant admitted that each of the charges and facts were true and that each of the sexual assault acts occurred as alleged; when counsel considered the possibility of double jeopardy with respect to the sexual assault charges, but concluded that the defendant's protection against double jeopardy had not been violated and that it was therefore not a defense; when, based upon this evaluation and analysis, and upon the defendant's admissions, counsel participated in settlement negotiations with the state and exchanged several plea offers before the final plea agreement was reached; when counsel presented and explained the proposed plea agreement to the defendant; when the defendant testified that he was not forced to sign the plea agreement and that he met with counsel, who explained the terms of the plea agreement to him, including the pleas of guilty and the recommended sentencing; and when this plea agreement was signed and accepted by the court in lieu of going to trial only after the court had explained it in the defendant's native language and was assured that the defendant understood the plea agreement and the direct consequences of his guilty pleas, the defendant was aware of the charges, his pleas of guilty to specific counts, dismissal of specific counts and the length of the recommended sentencing and therefore cannot show that his conviction was obtained through imposition upon him or that he misunderstood his legal rights or the direct consequences of his guilty pleas with regard to the sentence to be imposed for each count. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 236-37 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The Public Defender, based upon the information he had received during his prior representation of the defendant in the matter, should have refused to sign the plea agreement, indicating his approval if he believed that the agreement violated the defendant's constitutional protection against double jeopardy. It is disingenuous for defendant to now argue that private counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to raise the defense of double jeopardy, when defendant's former counsel, also a public defender, agreed to and signed the plea agreement in the matter. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Kosrae Criminal Procedure Rule 32(d) provides that a motion to withdraw a plea of guilty or nolo contendere may be made only before sentence is imposed or imposition of sentence is suspended; but to correct manifest injustice the court after sentence may set aside the judgment of conviction and permit the defendant to withdraw his plea. The burden of establishing manifest injustice lies with the defendant. To meet this burden, the defendant must show that his conviction was obtained through fraud, imposition upon him, or misapprehension of his legal rights, and/or that he is not guilty of the crimes charged. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 381 (App. 2006).

Ineffective assistance of counsel during plea negotiations may invalidate a guilty plea if counsel's deficient performance undermined the voluntary and intelligent nature of the defendant's decision to plead guilty. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 (App. 2006).

To meet the second prong of the ineffective assistance of counsel analysis in the context of plea negotiations, an appellant must demonstrate a reasonable probability that, but for attorney error, he would have proceeded to trial. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 (App. 2006).

– Preliminary Hearing

The statute providing for preliminary hearings for criminal defendants, by its terms, does not apply to a defendant who was never arrested and who appeared before the court competent to try him. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 622 (Chk. 2002).

Because a prosecutor's assessment of probable cause is not sufficient alone to justify restraint of liberty pending trial, a preliminary hearing would be required if the defendant were to be detained pending trial or if significant restraints were to be placed on his liberty. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 622 (Chk. 2002).

The government is required to make a probable cause showing at a hearing before pretrial restraints on the defendant's liberty can be granted. This is because a fair and reliable determination of probable cause is a condition for any significant pretrial restraint of liberty, and this determination must be made by a judicial officer either before or promptly after arrest. Affidavits can be used, if properly introduced, as evidence at that hearing to make the probable cause showing. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 622 (Chk. 2002).

Because a probable cause determination is not a constitutional prerequisite to the charging decision, it is constitutionally required only for those suspects who suffer restraints on liberty other than the condition that they appear for trial. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 622 (Chk. 2002).

A preliminary hearing for the government to make a probable cause showing or for the defendant to challenge probable cause is not required either by the statute or by the Constitution when the defendant has not been arrested and has had no restraints placed on his liberty other than the condition that he appear for trial. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 622-23 (Chk. 2002).

A preliminary hearing is not a defendant's discovery tool. The preliminary hearing's purpose is to establish probable cause for detaining or requiring bail for an accused, not to create a discovery opportunity for the defendant (although some discovery may usually be a by-product of the hearing). The Criminal Procedure Rules provide other discovery methods for a defendant's use. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 623 (Chk. 2002).

A preliminary hearing is not a mini-trial. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 623 (Chk. 2002).

When the government filed an information with an accompanying affidavit, and the court, having concluded that probable cause existed that certain crimes occurred and that the accused committed those crimes, authorized the issuance of a summons commanding the accused to appear before the court for his initial appearance, the accused is not entitled to a preliminary examination. Because a prosecutor's assessment of probable cause is not sufficient alone to cause a restraint of liberty pending trial, a preliminary hearing is required if an accused is to be detained pending trial or if significant restraints are to be placed on his liberty, and, by its terms, the statute providing for preliminary hearings for criminal defendants does not apply to a defendant who was summoned to appear before the court competent to try him. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 463, 465 (Chk. 2008).

Usually when a defendant challenges whether the supporting affidavit shows probable cause for a charged offense, the prosecution will call witnesses and possibly introduce exhibits in order to firmly establish probable cause for the offense charged since the prosecution has the burden to establish probable cause. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 395 (Chk. 2011).

In situations where an arrest is not made pursuant to an arrest warrant, the arrested individual is nonetheless entitled to a judicial determination as to whether there is probable cause to detain the accused and normally the accused has the right to a probable cause hearing within twenty four hours or be released without condition. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 620 n.4 (Pon. 2014).

The right to a prompt probable cause hearing is constitutional requirement for any significant pretrial restraint of liberty but is only necessary if detention, bail, or condition for release is placed on the defendant. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 620 n.5 (Pon. 2014).

– Prisons and Prisoners

Actions of a police officer in stripping a prisoner to punish and humiliate him, then beating him and damaging his pickup truck, constituted violation of the prisoner's constitutional rights to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and his due process rights. Tolenoa v. Alokoa, 2 FSM R. 247, 250 (Kos. 1986).

Except in grave emergencies, the Director of Public Safety or any other executive branch official responsible for the administration of the jail has no inherent or implied power to exercise his own discretion, or to carry out instructions from other nonjudicial officials, in determining whether to release from jail persons ordered to be confined there. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 79-80 (App. 1989).

There is necessarily some limited power for a jailer to release prisoners in the case of a grave emergency to protect lives or property, but the emergency power is narrow, to be exercised only when there is no opportunity to contact the proper authorities. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 81 (App. 1989).

Although the internal management of a jail or prison is, subject to compliance with constitutional requirements, a function of the executive branch, the legislature controls the overall sentencing scheme through statute. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 82 (App. 1989).

In the absence of legislative action saying otherwise, it is the sentencing order, not the jailer or any member of the executive branch, which determines whether the prisoner is to be confined, and for how long. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 82 (App. 1989).

A national senator has no power to release national prisoners confined for violation of laws enacted by the national Congress. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 83 (App. 1989).

The Joint Law Enforcement Agreement between the State of Truk and the national government in no way affects the ability of a national court to require a jailer who has accepted custody of a prisoner to act in conformity with the sentencing order governing the confinement of the prisoner. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 84 (App. 1989).

The serious illness of a prisoner's child does not constitute an emergency necessitating the defendant's release from prison, where the child will receive the treatment she requires whether the prisoner is released or not. FSM v. Engichy, 4 FSM R. 177, 180 (Truk 1989).

Constitutional provisions applicable to a prisoner may vary depending on his status. A pre-trial detainee has a stronger right to liberty, which right is protected by the Due Process Clause, FSM Const. art. IV, § 3. A convicted prisoner's claims upon liberty have been diminished through due process so that person must rely primarily on article IV, section 8 which protects him from cruel and unusual punishment. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 190 (Pon. 1991).

In a case where a convicted prisoner, who is also a pre-trial detainee, asserts civil rights claims arising out of ill-treatment after arrest, denial of access to family is a due process claim, and physical abuse involves due process as well as cruel and unusual punishment claims. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 190 (Pon. 1991).

Deliberate indifference to an inmate's medical needs can amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 199-200 (Pon. 1991).

Where a prisoner is physically abused by an official with final policy-making authority, these acts are governmental and a statement of state policy concerning the prisoner. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 207 (Pon. 1991).

Refusing to permit the public defender or the prisoner's mother to see him are violations of civil rights guaranteed under 12 F.S.M.C. 218(1) and (2) and constitute official actions for which a state must be held responsible under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 207 (Pon. 1991).

Confining a prisoner in dangerously unsanitary conditions, which represent a broader government-wide policy of deliberate indifference to the dignity and well-being of prisoners, is a failure to provide civilized treatment or punishment, in violation of prisoners' protection against cruel and unusual punishment, and renders the state liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 208 (Pon. 1991).

The national government is liable for violations of 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2) when it has abdicated its responsibility toward national prisoners. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 210-11 (Pon. 1991).

A prisoner's rights to procedural due process have been violated when he received neither notice of the charges against him nor an opportunity to respond to those charges before or during confinement. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 212 (Pon. 1991).

A prisoner, incarcerated as the result of his conviction for a national crime, is in the national government's custody although incarcerated in a state jail. The state is merely acting as the national government's agent in keeping the prisoner in custody. Primo v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 412 (App. 2000).

When it appears that the Chief of Police has attended to a prisoner's medical needs with respect to food preparation and the medical recommendation for low salt and low fat foods, there has been no refusal by the state to provide to the prisoner's medical needs. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk Attorney General must make a bi-weekly report to the Chuuk State Supreme Court listing each defendant and witness who has been held in custody pending information, arraignment or trial for a period in excess of ten days. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The right to marry is a fundamental constitutional right. Prisoners retain that right, but the right is subject to substantial restrictions as a result of imprisonment. Prisons may regulate the time and place of the wedding ceremony. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A prisoner's rights to privacy and association, particularly intimate association, are necessarily impacted and limited during the period of imprisonment. Persons convicted of crimes and serving a sentence of imprisonment necessarily have their rights of privacy and intimate association lost or restricted as a consequence of their imprisonment. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A prisoner's right to marry has not been violated when the wedding ceremony will take place at the Kosrae state jail because the prison has authority to regulate a prisoner's wedding ceremony, including the regulation of the ceremony's time and place. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A prisoner's rights to privacy and association, including intimate association, do not include the right to be married at his family home. The prisoner's right to privacy and association are necessarily limited during his period of imprisonment. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Since a prisoner's rights to marry, privacy and association are not violated by the jailer's restriction of the location of prisoner's wedding ceremony to the Kosrae state jail, there is no unlawful restraint of the prisoner's liberty, and thus, a petition for the writ of habeas corpus to be married at home will be denied. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Considering the state's geographic and social configuration, the customary importance of marriages in the state and its effects upon the family and community relationships in Kosrae, the customary location of wedding ceremonies in Kosrae and the absence of any held at the state jail, a request for a prisoner to be married outside of the jail may be granted, in part, upon fulfillment of conditions. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Confining a person in dangerously unsanitary conditions, which represents a broader government-wide policy of deliberate indifference to the person's dignity and well-being, is a failure to provide civilized treatment, in violation of detainees' due process protections, and renders the state liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Walter v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 336, 340 (Chk. 2006).

The state has a duty to protect the persons it has confined from themselves and each other and violating a person's civil right to be free from excessive force while detained in a jail, is a violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). The state can violate that duty by failing to intervene and stop the prisoners' attacks on the arrestees. Walter v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 336, 340 (Chk. 2006).

When the decedent's civil right to be free from excessive force while a prisoner in Weno municipal jail was violated, this violation and the defendants' failure to monitor the plaintiff prisoner was the proximate cause of his wrongful death. The defendants' failure to monitor may also show a deliberate indifference to the prisoner's medical needs, which is also a violation of the FSM Civil Rights statute. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 352 (Chk. 2006).

A prisoner has a civil right to be free of excessive force while in custody. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 352 (Chk. 2006).

The municipality, chief, and jailer owed a prisoner a duty of care, had a duty to regularly observe his condition, breached that duty by failing to provide the required checks on his condition. These defendants are therefore liable under for the prisoner's death by neglect. The municipality, through its subsequent conduct, effectively ratified its agents' conduct. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

The Joint Law Enforcement Agreement provides that the state is responsible for the incarceration of prisoners convicted or charged with a national crime. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 663 (Chk. 2009).

National prisoners held in Chuuk jail will not be released outright from the state jail or ordered moved to some other facility that holds national prisoners when the FSM-Chuuk joint law enforcement agreement remains in effect. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 663 (Chk. 2009).

To the extent that the prisoners are asserting that Chuuk has a right to be paid money by the national government because of their incarceration in Chuuk state jail, the prisoners are asserting, not their own rights, but the State of Chuuk's rights, which they cannot do because they lack standing to raise a non-party's rights. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 664 (Chk. 2009).

When a prisoner was kept incarcerated in state jail after he has finished his maximum jail sentence and when state officials, after the matter was brought to their attention, showed deliberate indifference to his continued incarceration, the prisoner was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the FSM Constitution. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 465-66 (Chk. 2014).

A prisoner's unlawful 161-day detention after the end of his sentence meant that he was deprived of his constitutional right not to be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

Generally, the alleged mistreatment of pre-trial arrestees is subject to a due process analysis while that of convicted prisoners is analyzed under the cruel and unusual punishment standard. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

A convicted prisoner whose sentence had already ended but who was still kept imprisoned for 161 more days can assert a procedural due process claim – he was denied his liberty without due process when, without a hearing or an opportunity to be heard, his prison term was effectively extended and his release date bypassed. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

The FSM civil rights statute, 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), creates a private cause of action for damages against any person, including a state government, who deprives another of his civil rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution. Chuuk therefore liable to a prisoner for depriving him of his civil right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and to due process of law when it kept him in jail for 161 days after his sentence ended. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

When there was an initial lawful arrest followed by lawful confinement in the Chuuk state jail pursuant to Chuuk State Supreme Court orders, but once the prisoner's release date passed his lawful detention became unlawful detention without an arrest and it thus became false imprisonment without a false arrest. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2014).

Although there is a lack of a female holding cell in the Chuuk jail and no separate female showering and restroom facilities, a female prisoner is not subjected to a cruel and unusual punishment by virtue of her incarceration at the Chuuk jail with shared use of restroom facilities with male inmates – when she has a female police officer guarding her, her own separate sleeping quarters, and uses the shower at a different time from the male inmate population. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Process

The right to a speedy public and impartial trial attaches either when an information or complaint has been filed with the court and service of that information or complaint has been effected upon the one named as the accused; or when an accused has been arrested by means of an arrest warrant or other process issued by a judicial officer. "Other process" includes summons, writ, warrant, mandate or other process issuing from or by the authority of the court to have the defendant named therein appear before it at the appointed time. It does not refer to a warrantless arrest. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 451-53 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

A bench warrant is a process issued by the court itself, or from the bench, for the attachment or arrest of a person. One accused of crime, not in custody or under bail, may be brought before the court, after information filed, by means of a bench warrant or a capias, for his arrest; and the state has the right to have as many capias issued as are necessary to accomplish its duty to try one accused. Chuuk v. Defang, 9 FSM R. 43, 44 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A witness is unavailable if he is absent from the hearing and the proponent of his statement has been unable to procure his attendance by process or other reasonable means. A foreign resident's attendance at trial cannot be secured by process since the FSM Supreme Court's subpoena power does not extend into other countries. Merely being resident in a foreign country does not necessarily mean the witness is unavailable, but when the travel expenses are burdensome or when the witness unwilling to return for trial testimony, a possibility that may be more likely when he is an adverse, or even hostile, witness, a foreign resident may be considered unavailable and a deposition warranted. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 305-06 (Chk. 2005).

The filing of an information or complaint is one point in time where the statute stops, or tolls, the limitations period from running. The other event that may commence a prosecution and thus toll the statute of limitations is when an arrest warrant, summons or other process is issued, provided that reasonable attempts are made at service. The limitations period is also tolled during any time when the accused is continuously absent from the complaining jurisdiction or has no reasonably determinable place of abode or work within the jurisdiction. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 533 (Chk. 2008).

A bench warrant is a process issued by the court itself, or from the bench, for the attachment or arrest of a person such as a non-appearing defendant. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 n.3 (Pon. 2012).

A witness is unavailable if he is absent from the hearing and the proponent of his statement has been unable to procure his attendance by process or other reasonable means. A foreign resident's attendance at trial cannot be secured by process since the FSM Supreme Court's subpoena power does not extend into other countries. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A prosecution for a misdemeanor must be commenced within two years after it is committed. A prosecution is commenced either when an information or complaint is filed or when an arrest warrant, summons or other process is issued, provided that reasonable attempts are made at service. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

The right to a speedy trial does not attach until the information, or other process is issued. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

"Process" is a summons or writ issued in order to bring a defendant into court. "Service" usually refers to the formal delivery of some other legal notice, such as a pleading or a motion or other documents. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 233 n.1 (Pon. 2015).

In a criminal case, "process" is the arrest warrant or the penal summons that issues to compel a person to answer for a crime. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 233 n.1 (Pon. 2015).

In a criminal case, "process" is the arrest warrant or penal summons that issues to compel a person to answer for a crime. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. 2017).

Physical presence in the country usually supplies the only necessary prerequisite for personal jurisdiction in a national criminal prosecution. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. 2017).

When criminal defendants do not claim that they were not served process or that the process was not properly served on them or that they are not, or were not, physically present in the FSM, the court has personal jurisdiction over them. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. 2017).

– Prosecutors

A prosecutor's decision whether to prosecute must be overruled only in the most extraordinary circumstances, e.g., vindictiveness, impermissible discrimination, or an attempt to prevent the exercise of constitutional rights. Nix v. Ehmes, 1 FSM R. 114, 125-26 (Pon. 1982).

A prosecutor has wide discretion in determining whether to prosecute. Nix v. Ehmes, 1 FSM R. 114, 126 (Pon. 1982).

The decision to initiate, continue, or terminate a particular criminal prosecution is, with limited exceptions, within the prosecutor's discretion. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 140 (Pon. 1982).

The prosecutor does not have authority to dismiss an existing prosecution on the basis of customary law, but the court does have power to respond to a prosecutorial suggestion for dismissal because of customary considerations. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 141 (Pon. 1982).

The high public office of state prosecutor may be the most powerful office in our system of justice. The prosecutor invokes and implements the sovereign powers of the state in the justice system and is given a wide degree of discretion in so doing. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 13 (Pon. 1985).

Some government workers have been held partially or completely immune from tort liability on grounds that they are public officers. This immunity, intended to serve the purpose of encouraging fearless and independent public service, has been bestowed upon prosecutors as well as other public officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 16 (Pon. 1985).

There are sound reasons why prosecutors should retain discretion over whether to submit a plea agreement to a court based upon information obtained by the prosecution subsequent to execution of a written plea agreement but before presentation of that agreement to the court. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 91 (Pon. 1987).

Although the prosecution has broad discretion in determining whether to initiate litigation, once that litigation is initiated in the FSM Supreme Court, the court also has responsibility for assuring that actions thereafter taken are in the public interest. Thus, criminal litigation can be dismissed only by obtaining leave of court. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 91 (Pon. 1987).

Prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their actions which are connected to their role in judicial proceedings, which include participation in hearings related to obtaining search warrants. Prosecutors do not, however, enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their role as an administrative or investigative officers, which includes participation in and giving advice regarding the execution of a search warrant. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 396 (Pon. 1992).

Prosecutors are absolutely immune from prosecution for their actions which are connected to their role in judicial proceedings, but do not enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their role as an administrative or investigative officer. Therefore prosecutors are absolutely immune for involvement in judicial proceedings to obtain a search warrant, but not for participation in and giving police advice regarding the execution of a search warrant. Liwi v. Finn, 5 FSM R. 398, 401 (Pon. 1992).

Prosecuting attorneys have wide discretion in determining whether to prosecute, and a prosecutor's decision whether to prosecute must be overruled only in the most extraordinary circumstances, such as vindictiveness, impermissible discrimination, or an attempt to prevent the exercise of constitutional rights. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8 (Chk. 2002).

Absent evidence to the contrary, a decision to prosecute a particular person is presumed to be motivated solely by proper considerations. In order to dispel the presumption that a prosecutor has not violated equal protection, a criminal defendant must present clear evidence to the contrary. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8 (Chk. 2002).

To overcome the presumption that a decision to prosecute a particular person is motivated solely by proper considerations, a criminal defendant has a heavy burden to establish prima facie the elements of an impermissible selective prosecution so as to shift the burden to the government to demonstrate that the prosecution was not premised on an invidious objective. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8 (Chk. 2002).

Under the Model Rules of Professional Conduct, which regulates conduct of legal counsel admitted to practice law in the State of Kosrae, Rule 1.7 prohibits a counsel from representing a client if representation of that client may be materially limited by the counsel's responsibilities to a third person or the counsel's own interests. A counsel may not represent the state in prosecuting a criminal action, if the counsel's prosecution will be materially limited by his personal relationship to the defendant. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A prosecutor's duty is to zealously and diligently prosecute criminal charges which are supported by probable cause, in the public interest, and, in his position as a public servant, to serve the public interest, consistent with the Model Rules of Professional Conduct. If the prosecutor cannot fulfill his prosecutorial duties in a particular case due to a conflict, including a personal relationship to the defendant, then the prosecutor is obligated to withdraw from the case. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Office of the Attorney General should complete appropriate assignment of criminal matters to avoid conflicts of interest. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A criminal case will not be dismissed if the whole FSM Department of Justice must be disqualified from prosecuting since a special prosecutor can be appointed. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2003).

The question of disqualification of counsel, including prosecutors, is largely within the trial court's discretion. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2003).

A prosecutor must communicate to his witnesses so that they appear at hearings when they are needed even if they are attorneys in the same office. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2003).

Statements to the press generally will not disqualify a prosecutor, especially since there is no jury pool to taint through pretrial publicity as there are no jury trials in the FSM. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2003).

Failure to return a .22 rifle to a criminal defendant does not show bias when the defendant's release conditions do not allow him to possess firearms, since if the government had returned the rifle to him, he would have been put in the position of violating his own bail bond release. That is not a position the government should be permitted to put any defendant into. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2003).

Prosecutors' seeking a change of venue do not necessarily indicate bias so that they could continue to prosecute when the case is ready for immediate trial and, under the then alleged prevailing conditions, any FSM prosecutor might have felt unsafe unless venue were changed. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2003).

Having sought the same release conditions for a defendant in two separate prosecutions does not constitute a hopeless intertwining of the two cases. Release conditions in two otherwise unrelated cases are easily separable. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 178 & n.3 (Chk. 2003).

A government lawyer, like any lawyer, cannot represent a client if the representation of that client may be materially limited by the lawyer's own interests. The lawyer's own interests may include emotional interests. An emotional interest, in order to be disqualifying, must create a bias or hostility in the government lawyer sufficiently strong to interfere seriously with the lawyer's exercise of public responsibility. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 178 (Chk. 2003).

A government lawyer's public responsibility involves the exercise of discretion. A prosecutor may be disqualified when the prosecutor suffers from a conflict of interest which might prejudice him against the accused and thereby affect, or appear to affect, his ability to impartially perform the discretionary function of his office. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 178 (Chk. 2003).

Prosecutors' discretion is limited. They can neither withdraw from representing the plaintiff government, nor dismiss the case, without first seeking and obtaining leave of court. They can, of course, seek such leave. Their other remaining discretion lies in a possible plea bargain should the defendant seek one and in their sentencing recommendation should he be convicted. They also retain discretion in choice of trial tactics to employ. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 178 (Chk. 2003).

The court declines to establish a bright line rule that any prosecutor who has some involvement with another case involving the defendant must always be disqualified. To conclude that prosecutors who are allegedly later victims of offenses committed by someone they are prosecuting must always be disqualified from continuing to prosecute would set an unhealthy precedent. It would provide an unwanted incentive for a criminal defendant who sought to disqualify a certain prosecutor to obtain his disqualification through extralegal means. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 178-79 (Chk. 2003).

When prosecutors have a special emotional stake or interest in a case, their disqualification from any future involvement with the prosecution is warranted. The current prosecutor will therefore make certain that there is no contact with the former prosecutors about the case and that they have no access to the case file. The current prosecutor may be ordered to file and serve a notice detailing all steps taken to implement this precaution. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 179 (Chk. 2003).

A prosecutor that has no interest in the case's outcome other than that justice be done has the exact interest that an impartial prosecutor must have because government's interest in a criminal case is not that it should win the case, but that justice be done. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 180 (Chk. 2003).

Because the court is required to make decisions consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration and because the FSM is a large country in terms of geographical distances, but has a small land base, a small population, and limited resources with a small government legal office and few other lawyers available, the court thus should not order the government to go outside its Department of Justice for a prosecutor unless it is absolutely necessary. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 180 (Chk. 2003).

There is no basis to disqualify the current prosecutor and the entire FSM Department of Justice when no member of the department is either an alleged victim or a witness in the case; when the current prosecutor was not a member of the department when the events occurred that ultimately lead to the disqualification of the other assistant attorneys general; when neither of the disqualified attorneys have any supervisory power over the current prosecutor and he is not subordinate to them; and when, if he has not already done so, he can and will be ordered to have no contact with them concerning the case and to keep all case files segregated from all other department files so that no other department employee can obtain access to them. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 180 (Chk. 2003).

It is the prosecutor's discretion to initiate, continue, or terminate a particular criminal prosecution. However, once prosecution has been initiated, the court also has responsibility to assure that all actions taken thereafter are in the public interest. Public interest requires the court to examine the grounds for a dismissal request. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Generally, a motion to disqualify a prosecutor must be made at the earliest possible time, and failure to do so may constitute a waiver of the objection. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 363 (Chk. 2004).

A government lawyer, like any other lawyer, cannot represent the government if the representation of that client may be materially limited by the lawyer's own interests. A lawyer's own interests may include emotional interests. An emotional interest, in order to be disqualifying, must create a bias or hostility in the government lawyer sufficiently strong to interfere seriously with the lawyer's exercise of public responsibility. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 363 (Chk. 2004).

Since a government lawyer's public responsibility involves the exercise of discretion, a prosecutor may be disqualified when the prosecutor suffers from a conflict of interest which might prejudice him against the accused and thereby affect, or appear to affect, his ability to impartially perform the discretionary function of his office. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 363 (Chk. 2004).

Since a prosecutor has wide discretion in deciding whether to initiate a particular criminal prosecution, a prosecutor's emotional interest sufficiently strong to impair the impartial exercise of this discretion will disqualify the prosecutor from any participation in the matter, including filing the information. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 364 (Chk. 2004).

When prosecutors filed a case just two months after the frightening events allegedly caused by the defendant, and when it seems reasonable for them to have had emotional interests that would disqualify them from impartially exercising their discretion whether to prosecute the same defendant in any new cases, their failure to disqualify themselves raises an appearance of impropriety. Accordingly, a motion to disqualify those prosecutors will be granted. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 364 (Chk. 2004).

When there is no way to determine if prosecutors who were not disqualified would have exercised their discretion to file these charges, the information must be dismissed to allow that to happen. This is because no matter how firmly and conscientiously a prosecutor may steel himself against the intrusion of a competing and disqualifying interest, he never can be certain that he has succeeded in isolating himself from the inroads on his subconscious. The defendant does not have to show actual prejudice, because on the basis of public policy, it will be presumed to exist as a matter of law. The purpose of this is to avoid the appearance of impropriety. This is designed not only to prevent the dishonest practitioner from improper conduct but also to preclude the honest practitioner from being put in a position where he will be forced to choose between conflicting duties. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 364 (Chk. 2004).

Since a lawyer's conflicts are usually imputed to all in the lawyer's office or firm, one member's disqualification generally requires the entire firm's disqualification, but unlike private law firms, the disqualification of all government attorneys in an office is not required when one is disqualified. This different treatment for private and government law offices is considered to stem, in part, from government agency attorneys not being bound by a common profit motive as are lawyers in private practice, and in part because a prosecutor's duty is to seek justice, not merely to convict. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 380 & n.2 (Chk. 2004).

The general rule is that the recusal or disqualification of an assistant attorney general does not require the recusal of the attorney general or his other assistants. Individual rather than vicarious disqualification is the general rule but individual disqualification must be complete and any participation or anything less than complete abstention by a disqualified member of a prosecutor's office in a supervisory capacity would warrant disqualification of the entire office. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 381 (Chk. 2004).

As a general rule, an entire office of prosecutors will not be disqualified when one member is disqualified unless that one member has supervisory or administrative control over all the others. This general principle has been followed even when the entire prosecutor's office might be said to be a victim of the defendants' crimes. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 382 (Chk. 2004).

In light of the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia, FSM Const. art. XI, § 11, and the principle that a prosecutor's disqualification is largely within the court's discretion, the better course is to follow the general principle and disqualify only those in the office over whom the disqualified attorneys had, or have, supervisory authority, not the entire office. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 383 (Chk. 2004).

Police are considered part of the prosecution. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 n.2 (Chk. 2005).

When the prosecutor's filing of a contempt charge against only the defense counsel followed precipitously on the heels of the defense counsel's clients' non-filing of a required report; when the non-complying clients were not charged with contempt; when the prosecutor sought an enlargement of time to respond to already filed motions, for which the rules required a response within ten days, in order to prepare and file a criminal contempt charge although there was no need to prepare the charge in such an immediate fashion since contempt has a three-month statute of limitations; when it would have been salutary for the prosecutor to have taken some time for calm refection and consideration and some research before deciding whether to exercise prosecutor's discretion to file contempt charges and against whom; when the haste with which the contempt charge was brought against defense counsel does not show the impartial exercise of a prosecutor's discretion of whether to initiate a prosecution, that is required of the prosecutor's office; when, once the prosecutor became aware of the need to prove defense counsel's bad faith, he did not move to amend the contempt charge to allege bad faith but months later moved to dismiss the information against defense counsel on other grounds, the court thus concludes that the contempt prosecution was not brought in good faith although the court does not conclude that the contempt prosecution was initiated to intentionally interfere with the defendants' chosen counsel, but rather that it appeared that it may have had that effect. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 349-50 (Chk. 2005).

A prosecutor is held to a higher standard than defense counsel. A prosecutor is much more constrained as an advocate and has the responsibility of a minister of justice and not simply that of an advocate. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 349-50 (Chk. 2005).

A prosecutor must have no interest in the case's outcome other than that justice be done because the government's interest in a criminal case is not that it should win the case, but that justice be done. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 350 (Chk. 2005).

When the prosecution of defense counsel for contempt was not in good faith and had the effect of appearing unfair and interfering with the defendants' choice of counsel and when that prosecution was not demonstrated to be harmless, the prosecutor will be disqualified from prosecuting those defendants. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 350 (Chk. 2005).

The record is wholly inadequate to disqualify the entire FSM Department of Justice or any other member of that department when the record shows that one prosecutor must be disqualified from prosecuting some of the defendants. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 350 (Chk. 2005).

Neither the prosecutor's search of another private law office on Pohnpei nor defense counsel's possible fee-forfeiture warrant the prosecutor's disqualification. Nor does defense counsel's civil suit against the prosecutor have any bearing on whether the prosecutor should be disqualified. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 350 (Chk. 2005).

Under FSM caselaw, prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their actions which are connected to their role in judicial proceedings, including participation in hearings related to obtaining search warrants. Prosecutors do not, however, enjoy absolute immunity for their role as administrative or investigative officers. Prosecutors are absolutely immune for involvement in judicial proceedings to obtain a search warrant, but not for participation in and giving police advice regarding the execution of a search warrant. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

A request for, appearance at, and the presentation of evidence related to obtaining a search warrant is considered part of a prosecutor's judicial function, for which the prosecutor enjoys absolute immunity. This is true even though no criminal information has been filed yet since search warrants are usually, but not always, sought before criminal charges are filed. The defendants therefore enjoy absolute immunity for all alleged wrongful acts related to obtaining search warrants or other pretrial orders of a similar nature. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 367 (Pon. 2005).

A prosecutor's actions in seeking (and obtaining) release conditions during an initial appearance in a criminal case, was a judicial function for which prosecutors enjoy absolute prosecutorial immunity. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 367 (Pon. 2005).

A motion to disqualify the Attorney General's Office is a preliminary motion, which ought to be brought fairly early in the proceedings. Its filing should not wait until the deadline for filing all other pretrial motions. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 438 (Chk. 2005).

The question of disqualification of counsel, including prosecutors, is largely within the trial court's discretion. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 440 (Chk. 2005).

The court is required to make decisions consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration. While the FSM is a country of large geographical distances, it has a small land base, a small population, and limited resources. Likewise, it has a small government legal office and few other lawyers available. The court, consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration, thus should not order the government to go outside its Department of Justice for a prosecutor unless it is absolutely necessary. The disqualification of all lawyers in a government office when one of them is disqualified is a question within the trial court's discretion. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 440 (Chk. 2005).

The court will not establish a principle that the Department of Justice cannot prosecute a defendant accused of committing an offense against Department of Justice personnel. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 440 (Chk. 2005).

Individual rather than vicarious disqualification is the general rule but individual disqualification must be complete and any participation or anything less than complete abstention by a disqualified member of a prosecutor's office in a supervisory capacity would warrant the entire office's disqualification. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 442 (Chk. 2005).

The entire FSM Department of Justice will not be disqualified (and by implication the information dismissed) because one of its members will be a witness in the case. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 443 (Chk. 2005).

A lawyer may act as advocate in a trial in which another lawyer in the lawyer's firm is likely to be called as a witness unless precluded from doing so by FSM MRPC Rule 1.7 or Rule 1.9. Rules 1.7 and 1.9 deal with conflicts of interest. That members of the prosecutor's office are witnesses does not disqualify the entire office. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 443 (Chk. 2005).

Although a lawyer's conflicts are usually imputed to all in the lawyer's office or firm so that one member's disqualification requires the entire firm's disqualification, the disqualification of all government attorneys in an office, unlike private law firms, is not required when one is disqualified. This different treatment for private and government law offices stems, in part, from government attorneys not being bound by a common profit motive as are lawyers in private practice, and in part because a prosecutor's duty is to seek justice, not merely to convict. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 443 & n.6 (Chk. 2005).

The mere presence of prosecutors during a search is not per se improper. A prosecutor may assist in a search to provide legal advice. The reason a prosecutor might not want to participate in investigative matters such as executing a search warrant is that prosecutors only enjoy a limited immunity from civil liability when participating in investigative acts, unlike the absolute immunity from civil liability that prosecutors enjoy for their actions connected with their role in judicial proceedings. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 57 (Chk. 2006).

When the FSM Secretary of Justice approached a defendant to discuss, and did discuss, a possible plea agreement without the presence or prior consent of his attorney, but the incident was short and ended with the defendant saying he wanted to discuss it with his lawyer and when no prejudice was alleged or shown, the Secretary of Justice's actions did not form any part of the basis of the FSM Department of Justice's disqualification and the three defendants' severance, but the court had no choice but to refer the matter to the disciplinary process. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 174 (Chk. 2006).

The court cannot give any credence to a contention that a prosecutor's complete disqualification was not required because of the ground for the disqualification. A disqualification is a disqualification. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 174 (Chk. 2006).

A prosecutor is held to a higher standard than defense counsel. A prosecutor has the responsibility of a minister of justice and not simply that of an advocate. A prosecutor must have no interest in the case's outcome other than that justice be done since the government's interest in a criminal case is not that it should win the case, but that justice be done. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 174-75 (Chk. 2006).

The general rule is that the recusal or disqualification of an assistant attorney general does not require the recusal of the attorney general or his other assistants. Individual rather than vicarious disqualification is the general rule for prosecutors but individual disqualification must be complete. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 175 (Chk. 2006).

The result of a prosecutor's disqualification from prosecuting three co-defendants is that the government had a choice – it could either move to sever those three defendants and assign a different assistant attorney general to prosecute them and insulate the disqualified prosecutor from that prosecution, or it could have assigned a different assistant attorney general to prosecute all of the co-defendants. A detailed screening order is inappropriate when the government, at least theoretically, had a choice to make – a new prosecutor for the case, or seek severance into two cases. This is a choice that, at least initially, the prosecution, not the court, must make. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 175 (Chk. 2006).

Although the court was reluctant to disqualify the FSM Department of Justice from prosecuting three co-defendants and ordering their severance from the trial scheduled to start the same day, when no lesser sanction presented itself and the defendant has met his burden and established that a disqualified (former) prosecutor has assisted the current prosecutors in preparing the case against him and the government did not establish, or try to establish, that the disqualified former prosecutor was effectively screened from the prosecutors in the case, the entire FSM Department of Justice is therefore disqualified. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 176 (Chk. 2006).

Prosecutors, because of their conduct, can be disqualified when it is in the public's interest that the judicial process should both appear fair and be fair in fact. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. 2006).

In helping locate and discuss relevant evidence in the discovery, a former prosecutor was a part of the prosecution team in the same way that the police are considered part of the prosecution team. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. 2006).

Once an assistant attorney general has been disqualified, that attorney's disqualification must be complete and any participation or anything less than complete abstention by a disqualified member of a prosecutor's office in a supervisory capacity would warrant disqualification of the entire office. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. 2006).

The court must make its decisions consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration. While the FSM is a nation of large geographical distances, it has a small land base, a small population, and limited resources. It also has a small government legal office and few other lawyers available. The court, consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration, thus should not order the government to go outside its Department of Justice for a prosecutor unless it is absolutely necessary. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. 2006).

To insure that the judicial process both appears fair and is fair in fact, the court, aware of the hardship and insurmountable difficulties that the continued disqualification of the entire FSM Department of Justice may cause and also aware that the judicial process's fairness may be impugned by the appearance that a former disqualified prosecutor may have had some involvement in the government's preparation of its case against those defendants he was barred from prosecuting, will order that the entire FSM Department of Justice remain disqualified from prosecuting those defendants except for any FSM Department of Justice attorneys hired after the date of the former prosecutor's last involvement. The new assistant attorney(s) general assigned to prosecute the case shall not have discussed the case's merits with the previous prosecutors and shall not consult any of the previous prosecutors in preparing their prosecution. These new prosecutors shall be screened from all previous prosecutors in the case. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 278-79 (Chk. 2006).

A prosecutor has wide discretion in determining who and whether to prosecute, and a prosecutor's decision whether to prosecute must be overruled only in the most extraordinary circumstances, e.g., vindictiveness, impermissible discrimination, or an attempt to prevent the exercise of constitutional rights. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

When a former prosecutor was not disqualified from prosecuting the movant, any communication between the former prosecutor, who for the purpose of the motion must be considered as a part of the prosecution team since he was acting as a consultant attorney, and the Department of Justice concerning the movant cannot be per se misconduct. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 376-77 (Chk. 2007).

A former prosecutor who is helping locate and discuss relevant evidence in the discovery, is considered a part of the prosecution team. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 377 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

Disqualification for an emotional interest because it causes a conflicting interference with the lawyer's exercise of public responsibility is limited to prosecutors since prosecutors are held to a higher standard. Marsolo v. Esa, 17 FSM R. 480, 484 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

Prosecutors are constitutionally required to provide criminal defendants with any and all exculpatory evidence they have regardless of whether the defendant has made a discovery request. This is a continuing obligation which does not cease at any deadline. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 293-94 (Chk. 2012).

A prosecutor has an ethical obligation to make timely disclosure to the defense of all evidence or information known to the prosecutor that tends to negate the guilt of the accused or mitigates the offense, and, in connection with sentencing, disclose to the defense and to the tribunal all unprivileged mitigating information known to the prosecutor, except when the prosecutor is relieved of this responsibility by a protective order of the tribunal. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 (Chk. 2012).

Regardless of whether an accused has requested discovery, a prosecutor must disclose to the defense evidence that is favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory or because it is impeaching. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 (Chk. 2012).

Police are considered part of the prosecution team so that any evidence or information in the hands of the police is considered evidence or information in the prosecution's hands. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2012).

A prosecutor is held to a higher standard than defense counsel. A prosecutor has the responsibility of a minister of justice and not simply that of an advocate. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 101 (App. 2018).

One prosecutorial duty is the constitutional obligation to provide criminal defendants with any and all exculpatory evidence they have regardless of whether the defendant has made a discovery request, and this is a continuing obligation that does not end at any deadline. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 101 (App. 2018).

Regardless of whether an accused has requested discovery, a prosecutor must disclose to the defense evidence that is favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory, or because it is impeaching. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 101 (App. 2018).

A prosecutor is obligated to make timely disclosure to the defense of all evidence or information known to the prosecutor that tends to negate the guilt of the accused or mitigates the offense, and, in connection with sentencing, disclose to the defense and to the tribunal all unprivileged mitigating information known to the prosecutor, except when the prosecutor is relieved of this responsibility by a protective order of the tribunal. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 101 (App. 2018).

The prosecutor's obligation to produce exculpatory or impeaching evidence involves three types of situations. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

A prosecutor has an obligation to produce exculpatory or impeaching evidence when the undisclosed evidence demonstrates that the prosecution's case includes perjured testimony and that the prosecution knew, or should have known, of the perjury. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

Since the knowing use of perjured testimony is fundamentally unfair, such a conviction must be set aside if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the fact-finder's judgment. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

The prosecution, as an entity, has a constitutional obligation not to deceive the fact-finder or to allow the fact-finder to be deceived by the prosecution's witnesses; thus, the prosecution cannot let false testimony by any of its witnesses stand uncorrected. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

When there was a pretrial request for specific evidence, if the subject matter of such a request is material, or indeed if a substantial basis for claiming materiality exists, it is reasonable for the prosecution to respond either by furnishing the information or by submitting the problem to the trial judge. When the prosecutor receives a specific and relevant request, the failure to make any response is seldom, if ever, excusable. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

When there was a pretrial request for specific evidence or when there was no defense request at all or there was merely a generalized request for exculpatory material, the constitutional obligation is not measured by the prosecutor's moral culpability or willfulness. If evidence highly probative of innocence is in the prosecutor's file, the prosecutor is presumed to recognize its significance even if the prosecutor has actually overlooked it. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

If the evidence sought actually has no probative significance at all, no purpose would be served by requiring a new trial simply because an inept prosecutor incorrectly believed the prosecution was suppressing a fact that would be vital to the defense. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102-103 (App. 2018).

If the prosecution's suppression of evidence results in constitutional error, it is because of the evidence's character, not the prosecutor's. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 103 (App. 2018).

A defendant may request that the prosecution produce for his inspection, and any needed copying, a document material to the preparation of his case. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 104 (App. 2018).

If the prosecution should find that it has exculpatory evidence, it must provide it, even though the defendant has already been convicted, because there is no deadline for the production of exculpatory evidence and the duty applies irrespective of the prosecution's prior good faith or bad faith. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 104 (App. 2018).

Since the court's rules require only that the information be signed by the attorney for the government, when the signer is unquestionably an attorney, is unquestionably employed by the government, and is acting on the government's behalf, he has apparent authority to sign a criminal information. If the signer's actions exceed what he was contracted to do or what any written or oral amendment to that contract authorized him to do, that is a matter for the contracting parties to resolve between themselves. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 444 (Yap 2020).

– Public Trial

The FSM constitutional right that the defendant in a criminal case has a right to a speedy public trial is traceable to the U.S. Bill of Rights. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 410 (Chk. 2004).

A sentence is imposed when it is pronounced in open court. This is a constitutional as well as procedural requirement. The rules require the defendant's presence at sentencing. This is also required by the FSM constitutional provision, requiring a public trial and giving a defendant the right to confront witness against him. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 91 n.1 (Chk. 2004).

The FSM Constitution guarantees every criminal defendant the right to a public trial, as does the Kosrae Constitution. A criminal defendant's right to be present at trial extends to all stages of trial, including the return of the finding or verdict, even in a bench trial. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 78 (App. 2006).

The defendant shall be present at every stage of the trial including the finding of the court, and the judge's finding must be returned in open court. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 78 (App. 2006).

Under the constitutional guarantee of a public trial, an accused and the public both have a constitutional right that the court's finding be announced publicly in open court with the accused present. This is true whether the finding is guilty or not guilty. Violation of this constitutional protection is not subject to a harmless error analysis and the defendant need not show any prejudice. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 78 (App. 2006).

The announcement of the decision to convict or acquit is neither of little significance nor trivial; it is the focal point of the entire trial. To exclude the public, the defendant, the prosecution, and defense counsel from such a proceeding–indeed not to have a proceeding at all–affects the integrity and legitimacy of the entire judicial process. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 78 (App. 2006).

The remedy for the constitutional violation of not pronouncing a defendant guilty or acquitted in open court is not a new trial on the merits – instead the finding (and conviction) is vacated and the case is returned to the trial court for it to make a public pronouncement of its decision. Since a pronouncement in open court is constitutionally required, no other remedy is adequate. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 78 (App. 2006).

The trial court must, in all criminal trials, orally pronounce in open court its finding of guilty or not guilty on each count tried. The trial court may issue written findings at the conclusion of the oral proceeding in open court if it so chooses or if a party has requested special findings and they are lengthy. Nena v.

Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 79 (App. 2006).

The FSM and Kosrae Constitutions guarantee every criminal defendant the right to a public trial. A criminal defendant's right to be present at trial extends to all stages of trial, including the return of the finding or verdict of guilty or not guilty. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 232 (App. 2006).

Violation of the constitutional public trial right is not subject to a harmless error analysis and the defendant need not show any prejudice. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 232 (App. 2006).

When, after the trial court had taken the case under advisement, it made its finding of guilt in writing and the written finding was then served on counsel and there was never an oral in-court pronouncement of guilt beforehand, and when, following the sentencing hearing, there was no public imposition of sentence in open court, only a later written sentencing order served on counsel, an appellate court must vacate the finding because it was improperly entered since there was no public finding of guilt. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 232 (App. 2006).

Even if the finding of guilt had been made in open court with the defendant present, the case would still have to be remanded to the trial court when there was no public imposition of sentence with the defendant present. When a sentence is imposed, the defendant's presence is required because the defendant must be present at every stage of the trial including the finding of the court and at the imposition of sentence. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 232 (App. 2006).

The defendant's right (found in Rule 43) to be present at the imposition of sentence is constitutionally based on the confrontation and due process clauses. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 & n.3 (App. 2006).

Although Kosrae Criminal Rule 43(b) permits a criminal defendant, once trial has started with the defendant present, to voluntarily absent himself or herself from the trial or from the oral pronouncement of findings, it does not permit a criminal defendant to be absent from the court's imposition of sentence or to waive his or her right to be present at the imposition of sentence. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 (App. 2006).

A reason illustrating the importance of the public imposition of sentence is that the written sentence must conform to the one delivered orally. If it does not, the oral sentence, not the written sentence, controls. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 (App. 2006).

The sentence orally pronounced from the bench is the sentence, because the only sentence that is legally cognizable is the actual oral pronouncement in the defendant's presence. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 234 (App. 2006).

The general public also has a right and interest in a public sentencing that enables the public to learn the sentence and court's reasons for it. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 234 (App. 2006).

Criminal Procedure Rules 43(b) only applies when a criminal defendant has appeared for trial and trial has started and then the defendant voluntarily absents himself or herself although the defendant has been informed of the obligation to remain during trial. In such cases, the defendant is considered to have waived the right to be present and the trial may progress to a conclusion in his or her absence. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 442 (Chk. 2007).

Rule 43(c)(3) provides that defendant is not required to be present at a conference or argument upon a question of law. But an evidentiary hearing is one that involves more than just a question of law. It involves findings of fact. An evidentiary hearing is thus one where the defendant must appear in court. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 442 (Chk. 2007).

A criminal contempt conviction would have to be vacated when neither the trial court's contempt finding nor its sentencing were done in open court because a criminal defendant's constitutional right to a public trial requires that the finding of guilt or innocence be made in open court and that, if there is a guilty finding, then the sentence must also be imposed in open court. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

Since the criminal contempt statute provides that no punishment of a fine of more than $100 or imprisonment can be imposed unless the accused is given a right to notice of the charges, to a speedy public trial, to confront the witnesses against him, to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and to have the assistance of counsel, this statute was violated when a $200 fine was imposed without a public trial and the party having the opportunity to be represented by a public defender. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

Although it might be advisable for the trial court to conduct a hearing on motions to stay and for in forma pauperis status, especially if the motions look like they may be denied, it is not part of the constitutional public trial right. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 156 (App. 2015).

A prosecution request that the courtroom be closed and that the public be excluded during the child-victim's testimony and that a screen be placed in the courtroom so that when she testifies, she is shielded from the defendants' gaze, implicates two important constitutional rights – the defendant's right to confront any witnesses against the defendant and the public trial right. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 52 (Chk. 2018).

When the prosecution has made an adequate showing of necessity, the governmental interest in protecting child witnesses from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of a special procedure that permits a child witness in such cases to testify at trial against a defendant in the absence of face-to-face confrontation with the defendant. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 (Chk. 2018).

The public trial guarantee is a constitutional right that both the accused and the general public have. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

Violation of the constitutional public trial right is not subject to a harmless error analysis and the defendant need not show any prejudice in order to have his conviction or sentencing or other proceeding vacated. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

Closure of a criminal trial may be constitutional under limited circumstances. The public trial interest will be balanced against other interests that might justify closing the trial or part of the trial, but in striking a fair balance, the trial judge's discretion is strictly limited. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

The trial judge's best course of action is to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issue of closure whenever it arises, although in some circumstances, the judge will be able to take judicial notice of the essential facts. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

The party seeking to close a criminal proceeding 1) must advance an overriding interest that is likely to be prejudiced, 2) the closure must be no broader than necessary to protect that interest, 3) the trial court must consider reasonable alternatives to closing the proceeding, and 4) it must make findings adequate to support the closure. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

Closure orders are to be no broader than necessary to protect the countervailing interest advanced. That is because it is incumbent upon trial judges to consider reasonable alternatives before closing the courtroom during trial testimony. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

Implicit in the command that a courtroom closure must be no broader than necessary is the requirement to consider measures less broad than complete closure. The court must consider alternatives to a complete closure of the courtroom even if no party suggests any, since courtrooms are presumed to be open and trials are presumed to be public and less drastic alternatives than courtroom closure must be considered even though those alternatives may be cumbersome. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

Although a trial for the sexual assault of a minor involves the government's compelling interest in the minor victim's welfare, it does not follow from this that the court may automatically close trials to the public whenever a minor victim testifies in any sexual assault trial. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

A trial court can determine on a case-by-case basis whether closure is necessary to protect a minor victim's welfare. Among the factors to be weighed are the minor victim's age, psychological maturity and understanding, the nature of the crime, the desires of the victim, and the interests of parents and relatives. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

Case-by-case attention is required when the issue is determining whether there is a legitimate need to encroach upon the defendant's right to a public trial. Limited exclusion of spectators is also permissible when there is a demonstrated need to protect a witness from threatened harassment or physical harm. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54-55 (Chk. 2018).

Since the best course of action is for the trial judge to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issue of closure whenever it arises, the court cannot grant a trial closure when one has not yet been held, and judicial notice does not seem possible. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 55 (Chk. 2018).

– Right to Compel Witnesses

Upon a satisfactory showing that the defendant is financially unable to pay the fees of the witness and that the witness's presence is necessary to an adequate defense, the government will bear the costs of insuring that the witness is present at trial. Specifically, this includes travel costs. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 511, 512 (Pon. 2003).

In a criminal case, a witness's fees and costs need not be tendered at the time of service of the subpoena, a useful precautionary measure. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 511, 513 (Pon. 2003).

If a criminal defendant elects to proceed under FSM Criminal Rule 17(b), he should then ascertain from the FSM what that manner of payment is, and how that procedure will work in the event that he is found unable to pay the costs attendant upon securing the presence of his witnesses at trial. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 511, 513 (Pon. 2003).

The defendant in a criminal case has a right to compel attendance of witnesses on his behalf, and defendants can exercise this right through the use of subpoenas, which the clerk of the court will issue under the FSM Supreme Court's seal and which will command each person to whom it is directed to attend and give testimony at the time and place specified therein, and the subpoena may also command the person to whom it is directed to produce the books, papers, documents, or other objects designated. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 103 (App. 2018).

A primary limitation on a subpoena asking a witness to produce something is that it must be for "evidence," that is, information that will be admissible at trial. Such a subpoena may be challenged when the circumstances indicate that the defense's use is directed at a purpose other than a "good faith" effort to obtain evidence, but where the subpoena seeks a specific document that clearly is relevant, courts invariably conclude that the subpoena is proper. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 103 (App. 2018).

The court clerk is even authorized to issue a subpoena, signed and with the seal of the FSM Supreme Court, but otherwise in blank to a party requesting it, who shall fill in the blanks before it is served, so that once the defendant learned the identity of the person(s) with the evidence he sought, he could fill in a blank subpoena and have it served. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 104 (App. 2018).

A defendant may, at any time during the course of the proceedings, bring to the trial court's attention that he believes that the prosecution had not complied with his discovery request and seek appropriate relief, which could be a court order to permit the discovery, or inspection of the documents, or the grant of a continuance, or such other order as the court deems just under the circumstances. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 104 (App. 2018).

– Right to Confront Witnesses

A codefendant's inculpatory statement which has been admitted into evidence may not be used against any defendant other than the declarant without violating the right of confrontation guarantee of the FSM Constitution. Hartman v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 224, 229 (App. 1991).

Use of a defendant's out of court statement as evidence against a codefendant would violate the codefendant's "right of confrontation" since the declarant is not a witness at the trial subject to cross examination. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 301 (App. 1993).

Criminal conviction of a defendant who has failed to appear for trial violates the accused's constitutional right to confront witnesses against him, and other rights, such as due process and effective assistance of counsel, may also be implicated. But a defendant who appears at the beginning of trial and voluntarily absents himself before the trial's end waives any further right to be present. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 477 & n.7 (App. 1996).

An accused's right to confront the witnesses against him provides him with two types of protection: the right physically to face those who testify against him, and the right to conduct cross-examination. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

Because the FSM Declaration of Rights was modeled after the U.S. Bill of Rights, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting similar Declaration of Rights provisions, such as the right to confrontation. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 n.1 (Chk. 2002).

The right to confrontation is basically a trial right. It includes both the opportunity to cross-examine and the occasion for the factfinder to weigh the demeanor of the witness, and it applies when the ability to confront witnesses is most important–when the trier-of-fact determines the ultimate issue of fact. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

The right to confrontation does not apply before a criminal defendant is accused, and it is doubtful that the right applies even at a pretrial hearing. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

The use of affidavits to support the filing of a criminal information does not violate a criminal defendant's right to confrontation. The defendant will have the opportunity to confront the affiants if they are called as witnesses at trial by either the government or the defendant. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

An accused has a constitutional right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. Both the Constitution and the criminal rules contemplate trial by live testimony, not by deposition. This is in part because of the desirability of having the factfinder observe the witnesses' demeanor. Exceptional circumstances are thus required for depositions in criminal cases. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304 (Chk. 2005).

Our constitution provides a criminal defendant with the right to be confronted by his accusers, which means that a defendant may cross-examine the witness against him. Consequently, the court is forbidden to consider as evidence against a defendant any part of a non-testifying codefendant's statement which inculpates another defendant since a statement cannot be cross-examined. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 335 (Chk. 2006).

If codefendants are tried together, a defendant's out-of-court statement ought to be redacted to eliminate references to other codefendants. Failure to do so may result in reversal of convictions in the interests of justice. After redaction, no prejudice will occur if the statements then give no reference to any codefendant. Redaction can normally be accomplished by the parties. Thus the court will not view the statement until after redaction. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 400 (Chk. 2006).

An accused's right to confront the witnesses against him provides him with two types of protection: the right physically to face those who testify against him, and the right to conduct cross-examination. The right to confrontation is basically a trial right. It includes both the opportunity to cross-examine and the occasion for the factfinder to weigh the witness's demeanor. It applies when the ability to confront witnesses is most important – when the trier-of-fact determines the ultimate issue of fact. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 401 (Chk. 2006).

The court is forbidden to consider as evidence against a defendant any part of a non-testifying codefendant's statement which inculpates another defendant since a statement cannot be cross-examined. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Since the accused has a constitutional right to confront and cross examine his accusers at trial, if the complainant has been untruthful or misleading, it remains to be ferreted out through the adversarial process. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When codefendants are tried together, one defendant's admissible out-of-court statement ought to be redacted to eliminate references to the codefendant. This is because the use of a defendant's statement as evidence against a codefendant would violate the codefendant's right to be confronted with the witnesses against him if the declarant is not a witness at the trial subject to cross examination. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 524 (Chk. 2011).

Redaction is not required for a defendant's statement when it is used to help establish probable cause since hearsay may be used to establish probable cause. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 524 n.2 (Chk. 2011).

Although it may not be known whether a codefendant will testify at trial, the prosecution ought to be prepared in advance for the eventuality that she will not and be ready with a redacted version of any statement by her that it intends to introduce as evidence at trial. If she does testify, the prosecution may then introduce the unredacted statement even if it has already introduced a redacted version. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 525 (Chk. 2011).

A statement by a party's co-conspirator made during the course and in furtherance of a conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 525 n.3 (Chk. 2011).

As a general principle, an accused in a criminal trial must be able to confront the witnesses against him, but the court will not issue a blanket ruling with unknown effects about statements that the prosecution may or may not seek to introduce at trial. The accused may raise his objections to any statement once it is known that the prosecution intends to introduce it. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 525 (Chk. 2011).

Because the FSM Declaration of Rights was modeled after the U.S. Bill of Rights, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting similar Declaration of Rights provisions, such as the right to confrontation, found in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights at Article IV, section 6, and in the U.S. Constitution in its Sixth Amendment. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 449 (Chk. 2014).

The prosecution may use Rule 15 to depose its witnesses because the FSM's Confrontation Clause does not always require a physical confrontation before the fact-finder, but the justification for using a deposition at a criminal trial as evidence against a defendant is much stronger if defendant has been present or if he or she has waived the right to be present. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 449 (Chk. 2014).

The FSM's confrontation clause does not always require a physical confrontation before the fact-finder. For example, there are certain well-established exceptions to the rule barring hearsay that, because of their indicia of reliability or trustworthiness, allow the introduction of evidence from witnesses a defendant will be unable to confront. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 449 (Chk. 2014).

When the government conducts a Rule 15 deposition in a foreign land with a view toward introducing it at trial, the Confrontation Clause requires, at a minimum, that the government undertake diligent efforts to secure the defendant's presence. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

A defendant's failure, absent good cause shown, to appear at the deposition of a government witness after notice and the government's tender of expenses constitutes a waiver of that right and of any objection to the taking and use of the deposition based upon that right. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

The scope and manner of examination and cross-examination during the Rule 15 depositions is the same as would be allowed in the trial itself. This includes the prosecution making available to the defendant or his counsel for examination and use during the deposition any statement of the witness being deposed which is in the government's possession and to which the defendant would be entitled at the trial. The deposition procedure will also include frequent pauses in the testimony so as to allow for translation for the defendant's benefit. The prosecution will be responsible for engaging and compensating a court-approved translator so that the defendant can follow the testimony and confer with his defense counsel. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

The use of a defendant's inculpatory statements in evidence against a co-defendant, would violate the right of confrontation since the declarant is not a witness at the trial subject to cross examination. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 518 (Pon. 2014).

An accused's right to confront the witnesses against him provides him with two types of protection: the right physically to face those who testify against him, and the right to conduct cross-examination. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 518 (Pon. 2014).

The FSM Rules of Criminal Procedure are silent about the admissibility of Skype testimony at trial and Congress has not legislated on this issue. Therefore it is left to the court's sound discretion to determine whether to allow Skype testimony at trial as FSM Criminal Rule 26 does not act to preclude the admissibility of Skype testimony because testimony offered via Skype would be taken orally in open court as the Rule requires. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 45 & n.1 (Pon. 2015).

Since live televised testimony is certainly not the equivalent of in-person testimony, the decision to excuse a witness's presence in the courtroom should be weighed carefully. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 45-46 (Pon. 2015).

Allowing testimony over Skype in exceptional circumstances is essential to vindicate the policy expressed in FSM Criminal Rule 2, which requires that the Rules be construed to provide "fairness in administration and the elimination of unjustifiable expense and delay" in criminal proceedings. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 46 (Pon. 2015).

When, in light of the witness's refusal to travel to the FSM, the court is faced with three flawed options: 1) The witness's testimony could be excluded entirely; 2) trial could be continued to allow the parties to travel to the United States to depose the witness; and 3) the witness could testify over Skype, the court may exercise its discretion to allow the witness to testify over Skype when his testimony is necessary to further the important public policy in favor of justly resolving criminal cases. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 46 (Pon. 2015).

The confrontation clause requires the defendant to cross examine the adverse witness face-to-face, thereby permitting the finder of fact to evaluate the witness' credibility. However, the right to confrontation is not an absolute right. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 46 (Pon. 2015).

The FSM Declaration of Rights was modeled after the U.S. Bill of Rights, and so the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting similar Declaration of Rights provisions, such as the right to confrontation, found in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights in Article IV, section 6, and in the U.S. Constitution in its Sixth Amendment. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 46 n.3 (Pon. 2015).

Testimony may be admissible so long as it contains the essential indicia of reliability, including 1) the giving of testimony under oath; 2) the opportunity for cross examination; 3) the ability of the fact-finder to observe demeanor evidence; and 4) the reduced risk that a witness will wrongfully implicate an innocent defendant when testifying in his presence. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 46 (Pon. 2015).

Confrontation rights may be satisfied absent a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial only when there is an individualized determination that denial of physical face-to-face confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy, and only when the testimony's reliability is otherwise assured. Since the reliability of Skype testimony is safeguarded by the traditional indicia of reliability, the deciding question is whether, under the circumstances of this case, allowing a witness to testify via Skype is necessary to further an important public policy. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 47 (Pon. 2015).

In all cases that allowed televised testimony it was not practicable for a material witness to appear at trial so as to facilitate physical face-to-face confrontation. Similar circumstances are extant when a material witness for the government is unable to secure permission from his employer to travel to the FSM and the court is powerless to compel his presence via a subpoena. In such circumstances, and where the reliability off testimony is otherwise ensured, allowing a witness to testify via Skype does not violate the defendant's right under the FSM Constitution to confront witnesses against him. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 47-48 (Pon. 2015).

A two-way video platform, such as Skype, preserves the face-to-face confrontation that is at the center of the right to confrontation, and thus, a more profitable comparison can be made to the Rule 15 deposition, which may be employed whenever due to the exceptional circumstances of the case it is in the interest of justice that the testimony of a prospective witness of a party be taken and preserved for use at trial." FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 48 (Pon. 2015).

Since the FSM Constitution requires that court decisions be consistent with the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia; since the geographical configuration of Micronesia is such that its population is scattered amongst numerous islands, and transportation between the distant islands of the FSM can be expensive, time consuming and unreliable, and since travel to and from the United States can be especially expensive and time consuming due to the vast distances involved and one commercial airline carrier's monopoly over transportation in the FSM, the FSM's unique geographical configuration generates a public policy impetus in favor of remote testimony by Skype that is lacking in the United States. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 48-49 (Pon. 2015).

A prosecution request that the courtroom be closed and that the public be excluded during the child-victim's testimony and that a screen be placed in the courtroom so that when she testifies, she is shielded from the defendants' gaze, implicates two important constitutional rights – the defendant's right to confront any witnesses against the defendant and the public trial right. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 52 (Chk. 2018).

The accused's rights that are protected by the confrontation clause are the right to cross-examine witnesses, the right to exclude out-of-court statements, and the right to face-to-face confrontation, including a right to meet face to face all those who appear and give evidence at trial. Meeting face to face is required because it is always more difficult to tell a lie about a person to his face than behind his back, even though there are times it may unfortunately upset the truthful victim-witness. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 (Chk. 2018).

The confrontation clause requires that the defendant cross-examine an adverse witness face-to-face, thereby permitting the finder of fact to evaluate the witness' credibility, but the right to confrontation is not an absolute right. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 (Chk. 2018).

Since the right to meet face-to-face all those who appear and give evidence at trial is not absolute, an actual face-to-face encounter at trial is not constitutionally required in every instance. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 (Chk. 2018).

The government's interest in the physical and psychological well-being of child abuse victims may be sufficiently important to outweigh, at least in some cases, a defendant's right to face his or her accusers in court. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 (Chk. 2018).

When the prosecution has made an adequate showing of necessity, the governmental interest in protecting child witnesses from the trauma of testifying in a child abuse case is sufficiently important to justify the use of a special procedure that permits a child witness in such cases to testify at trial against a defendant in the absence of face-to-face confrontation with the defendant. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 (Chk. 2018).

Confrontation rights may be satisfied absent a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial only when there is an individualized determination that the denial of a physical face-to-face confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy, and only when the testimony's reliability is otherwise assured. The requisite finding of necessity must be a case-specific one where the trial court hears evidence and determines the necessity of the special procedure to protect the chid's welfare. When no such determination of necessity has been made since no evidentiary hearing on the subject has been held, the court cannot grant the relief sought. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 (Chk. 2018).

Article II of the Kosrae Constitution provides for the constitutional rights of the people of Kosrae and also guarantees the right to be confronted by accusers. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

In all Kosrae State Court criminal trials, the testimony of witnesses must be taken orally in open court, unless otherwise provided by an Act of the Kosrae State Legislature or by a Kosrae State Court rule. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The criminal procedure rules are silent about whether video testimony is admissible in a criminal trial, and there is no legislation on this. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Rule 26 does not seem to preclude the admissibility of video testimony because remote video testimony will be taken orally in open court as required by the rules. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Whether remote video testimony is admissible in a criminal trial is left to the court's sound discretion since Rule 26 does not seem to preclude the admissibility of video testimony because the remote video testimony will be taken orally in open court as required by the rules. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Live video testimony is not the equivalent of in-person testimony, and the decision to excuse a witness's presence in the courtroom should be weighed carefully. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Although remote testimony via video chat is not equivalent to in-person testimony, when the testimonies of the alleged victims seem to be crucial to the determination of the issues, the court will exercise its discretion to ensure a fair and just criminal trial by allowing the alleged victims to testify via video chat at trial. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75-76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The confrontation clause requires the defendant to cross examine the adverse witness face-to-face, thereby permitting the finder of fact to evaluate the witness's credibility, but this is not an absolute right. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Confrontation rights may, in limited circumstances, be satisfied without a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial when the reliability of the testimony is otherwise assured and when there is an individualized determination that the denial of a face-to-face confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Testimony may be admissible so long as it contains the essential indicia of reliability, including 1) the giving of testimony under oath; 2) the opportunity for cross examination; 3) the ability of the fact-finder to observe demeanor evidence; and 4) the reduced risk that a witness will wrongfully implicate an innocent defendant when testifying in his presence. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When the traditional indicia of reliability safeguards remote video testimony, a court must decide whether, under the case's circumstances, allowing witnesses to testify via video chat is necessary to further an important public policy. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A defendant's constitutional right to confront his accuser is not absolute. It can be met even without a face-to-face confrontation when it is necessary to further an important public policy and it is assured that the testimony is reliable. Thus, when the alleged victims testify by appearing visibly on a screen to the court and to the defendant and her counsel, these witnesses will, through video chat, deliver their testimonies orally, under oath, and in open court where the defendant will have an opportunity to cross-examine them and the court will be able to observe their demeanor. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Considering our people's migration realities, there are important public policies to uphold as the FSM's and Kosrae's geographical configuration make the ability to use video conferencing an advantage for the process by significantly reducing costs for plane tickets to and from Kosrae, by helping to reduce delay, and by allowing testimony of witnesses who otherwise would not be able to appear at all. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The use of a non-testifying defendant's statement as evidence against a co-defendant violates the co-defendant's right to be confronted with the witnesses against him since the declarant is not a trial witness subject to the co-defendant's cross-examination. This difficulty can be eliminated if the parties redact any co-defendant statements before trial. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 83 (Chk. 2018).

– Right to Counsel

The Constitution secures to the criminal defendant, as a minimum, the right to receive reasonable notice of the charges against the defendant, the right to examine any witnesses against the defendant, and the right to offer testimony and be represented by counsel. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 225, 260 (Pon. 1983).

Where the defendants had been advised of their right to counsel but there was no indication that they desired or requested counsel, there is no basis for finding that their right to counsel had been violated.

FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 199 (Kos. 1986).

When a defendant has expressed a wish to meet with counsel before further questioning, questioning must cease at once. Any attempt by police officers to ignore or override the defendant's wish, or to dissuade him from exercising his right, violates 12 F.S.M.C. 218. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 237 (Pon. 1987).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. There exists a presumption against such waivers. Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 159 (App. 1991).

Although implied waivers of a defendant's rights might be valid there is a presumption against a finding of a waiver of rights. Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 159-60 (App. 1991).

A court cannot allow defense counsel to withdraw so that the defendant can seek new counsel to resume trial when the trial is well into the defendant's case-in-chief and when that new counsel was not present during trial and has not heard either the prosecution's witnesses' testimony or that of the defense witnesses who have already testified. FSM v. Jano, 9 FSM R. 470a, 470b (Pon. 2000).

Defense counsel cannot, in the middle of a criminal trial, precipitously accept other employment, without making the acceptance of employment conditional, commit himself to begin work "immediately," and then move for withdrawal because defense counsel is under an ethical obligation to continue as counsel until the criminal trial ends, even if that means postponement of his departure for new employment. FSM v. Jano, 9 FSM R. 470a, 470b (Pon. 2000).

When ordered to by a tribunal, defense counsel is ethically obligated to continue the representation even if good cause to withdraw is present. Should the criminal trial end in a conviction, new counsel may be obtained for sentencing. FSM v. Jano, 9 FSM R. 470a, 470b (Pon. 2000).

Denying withdrawal of counsel in the middle of a criminal trial is within the court's discretion, and as long as counsel is providing effective assistance, a criminal defendant has the choice of either continuing with that counsel or representing himself pro se. FSM v. Jano, 9 FSM R. 470a, 470b (Pon. 2000).

A defendant in a criminal case has a right to have counsel for his defense. This constitutional right to counsel affords a criminal defendant the right to choose his own counsel, provided that the choice of counsel does not interfere with just resolution of the case. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 26, 29 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When no authority has been given for the court to appoint private counsel already retained by a defendant or to require that the Public Defenders' Office compensate that private counsel at his prevailing hourly rate and when appointed counsel usually serve pro bono, the request will be denied. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 641 (Chk. 2004).

When the movants have not been convicted of any charges, no assets have been ordered forfeited, no payments to movant's counsel have been identified as coming from forfeitable assets, and the government has not committed itself to seeking disgorgement of counsel's fees, and the record shows that the movants have sources of income and assets that the government has not alleged are forfeitable and from which attorney's fees might be paid, it is too speculative for the court to consider whether the possible forfeiture of attorney's fees will affect an accused's right to retain counsel of his choice and to effective assistance of that counsel. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 641 (Chk. 2004).

Concerns about the affect of possible forfeiture of defense counsel's attorney's fees do not apply to a defendant who is represented by a salaried employee of the Public Defenders' Office and who is only charged with one offense and forfeiture of assets is not a penalty that the court can impose for the conviction of that offense. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 641-42 (Chk. 2004).

The court is obligated to set pretrial release conditions for defendants when they make their initial appearance. At an initial appearance, the court is required to, among other things, inform a defendant of his rights, including his right to retain counsel, or to request the assignment of counsel if the defendant is unable to obtain counsel, and will, if requested, direct the appointment of counsel. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 642 (Chk. 2004).

The Office of the Public Defender was created by 2 F.S.M.C. 204(5). For at least the criminal side of the docket, this represents Congress's affirmative implementation of the Constitution's Professional Services Clause. The primary, perhaps even the sole, responsibility, for the Professional Services Clause's affirmative implementation lies with Congress. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 394 & n.1 (Chk. 2005).

The framers' intent in including the Professional Services Clause was to establish a national policy of providing the services when requested by individual citizens unable to provide for themselves, although these services would not necessarily be free. Thus the framers intended that these professional services were to be provided only to natural persons, not to artificial persons. Therefore neither the Office of the Public Defender's refusal to represent business entity defendants nor Public Defender Directive No. 19 barring such representation is unconstitutional. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 395 (Chk. 2005).

For appointment of counsel under Rule 44(a), the rule requires that a defendant be unable to obtain counsel. Before the court can make a determination that a business entity defendant is unable to obtain counsel, the court would need detailed evidence concerning each entity defendant's financial situation, its ability to pay counsel, whether it has sought to obtain counsel, which counsel it had tried to retain, and what was the result of each of those attempts. Without that information, the court has no ground on which to conclude that the entity defendants, or any one of them, are unable to obtain counsel, or that they have even tried to. When none of that information is before the court, the court, without deciding whether Rule 44(a) applies to defendants who are not natural persons, will decline to appoint counsel for the entity defendants under Rule 44(a). FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 395 (Chk. 2005).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. There exists a presumption against such waivers. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 151 (Chk. 2006).

The burden of proof is on the prosecution to show that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel. The standard of proof the prosecution must meet is the preponderance of the evidence. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 151-52 (Chk. 2006).

The government has met the standard of proof and proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant has waived his rights knowingly and intelligently when the defendant's signed waiver showed that he was informed of his right to silence and his right to counsel and waived those rights and when, considering that signed waiver and the testimony presented, the court has considered the defendant's evidence and argument and cannot find that the manner in which the statement was elicited coerced the defendant into making it. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 152 (Chk. 2006).

The government's drafting of the defendant's affidavit, which the defendant signed and had notarized at the FSM Supreme Court, Palikir, Pohnpei, while not in the presence of any prosecution team member, does not make that affidavit the product of an unknowing or involuntary waiver of the defendant's rights. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 152 (Chk. 2006).

A defendant's right to counsel extends through any appeal of the trial court decision. It is counsel's responsibility, in consultation with his client, to determine where his obligations and duties lie and to determine whether an appeal is a desirable course of action, and proceed accordingly. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If counsel seeks to terminate representation after trial but before the appeal, steps must be taken to ensure the client's rights are protected to the extent reasonably practicable and, even then, notwithstanding good cause for withdrawal, the court may order counsel to continue representation. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Counsel may not simply refuse to pursue an appeal, without taking any further action to protect the client's rights. If counsel concludes that an appeal would not be meritorious, but the client still wishes to pursue the appeal, any withdrawal is conditioned upon the court's approval. Such approval may be conditioned on counsel's filing of an "Anders brief" referring to anything in the record that may arguably support appeal, whereupon the court should only grant withdrawal if it finds the appeal to be frivolous. Counsel may withdraw without the court's permission only if counsel was appointed solely to act as trial counsel. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the public defender is the attorney of record in this case, unless and until the court recognizes his withdrawal, neither counsel nor his office is relieved of the duty of ensuring adequate representation for the client's appeal. The trial court may leave to the appellate court any ruling on whether the Public Defender's office may withdraw its representation of an appellant and what additional steps, if any, may be required before such withdrawal is approved. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although an arrestee, who was not informed of her rights to access to counsel when she was handcuffed, was told her full rights at the police station, this does not excuse the police's failure to advise her of rights regarding to access to counsel on the scene when she was first placed in handcuffs. Since the arrestee was not harmed by the failure to advise her, when she was first placed in handcuffs, of rights regarding to access to counsel, the state is liable to her for nominal damages in the amount of one dollar. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 576 (Pon. 2009).

Upon request, the police must allow the arrested person to call an attorney. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 576 (Pon. 2009).

An arrestee was not denied access to legal counsel when she was allowed several attempts to call an attorney, but the attorneys that she attempted to contact via telephone were not available at that time. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 576 (Pon. 2009).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel, he must do so knowingly and intelligently. The burden is on the government to show not only that the waiver was knowingly and intelligently given, but that it was given before any statement was made. There exists a presumption against such waivers. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When an accused asked for counsel before he gave his statement, the government failed to overcome the presumption against the accused's waiver of his right to counsel and to remain silent. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When a defendant has expressed a wish to meet with counsel before further questioning, questioning must cease at once. Any attempt by police officers to ignore or override the defendant's wish, or to dissuade him from exercising his constitutional rights, is grounds for suppression of his subsequent statement. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 630 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Since the criminal contempt statute provides that no punishment of a fine of more than $100 or imprisonment can be imposed unless the accused is given a right to notice of the charges, to a speedy public trial, to confront the witnesses against him, to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and to have the assistance of counsel, this statute was violated when a $200 fine was imposed without a public trial and the party having the opportunity to be represented by a public defender. Berman v. Pohnpei

An arrestee's right to be informed of her right to counsel when arrested is a due process right. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 371 (App. 2011).

The usual remedy for the denial of the right to counsel is to vacate the conviction and remand for a new trial. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 n.2 (Pon. 2012).

Since, in a criminal case, a court is not constitutionally required to allow defense counsel to withdraw or to be replaced at a strategic moment in the proceedings, the right to counsel of an official who wanted to switch trial counsel before the end of his impeachment trial has not been violated even if that official had a constitutional right to counsel during his impeachment trial. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 (Pon. 2012).

The FSM Constitution protects the due process rights of all people accused of a crime. These rights include the right to be informed, the right against self-incrimination, and the right to have an attorney present at the time of questioning. These rights, along with others, were codified under 12 F.S.M.C. 214 and 218. The remedy for unlawful violations of these due process rights shall not in and of itself entitle an accused to an acquittal, but no evidence obtained as a result of such violation shall be admissible against the accused. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 508 (Pon. 2014).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendants have been advised of their right to counsel but there was no indication that they desired or requested counsel, there is no basis for finding that their right to counsel has been violated. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 (Pon. 2014).

– Right to Counsel – Ineffective Assistance

Where defendant's counsel had five days to prepare for the defense of the accused, and was granted a two day continuance, in the absence of any showing in the record or representation by counsel of resulting prejudice or ineffectiveness of counsel, the trial court's refusal to grant a longer continuance was not an abuse of discretion and did not violate article IV, section 6 of the FSM Constitution. Hartman v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 224, 233-34 (App. 1991).

The right of effective assistance of counsel applies equally to retained as well as appointed counsel. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 478 (App. 1996).

Criminal defendants charged with a serious crime have a constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel even if the defendant is a corporation with retained counsel. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 478 (App. 1996).

Defense counsel's performance must be both deficient and prejudicial to the defendant to be ineffective assistance. Under the first prong of the test, the proper standard for attorney performance is that of reasonably effective assistance, and under the second prong, an error by counsel, even if professionally unreasonable, does not warrant setting aside the judgment of a criminal proceeding if the error had no effect on the judgment, but in certain contexts prejudice is presumed. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 478 (App. 1996).

Because prejudice is presumed when counsel is burdened by an actual conflict of interest an attorney representing criminal codefendants with conflicting interests denies a defendant his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479 (App. 1996).

In order to prevail on an ineffective assistance of counsel claim in cases of joint representation, a criminal defendant who raised no objection at trial to the joint representation must demonstrate that an actual conflict of interest adversely affected his lawyer's performance. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479 (App. 1996).

A criminal defendant who cannot show joint representation of conflicting interests can still prevail on an ineffective assistance claim if he can show deficient attorney performance resulting in actual prejudice. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479 (App. 1996).

To resolve an ineffective assistance of counsel claim a court must consider the entire record. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479 (App. 1996).

While an evidentiary hearing on remand may be necessary in many, or even most, ineffective assistance of counsel cases, it may not be needed when counsel's performance was deficient, and an actual conflict of interest existed which adversely affected that performance. In some such cases the conviction may be reversed, and the government may proceed with a new trial. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 481, 484 (App. 1996).

The right to counsel means competent counsel, but a trial counselor is not, merely because he is a trial counselor and not a lawyer, incompetent counsel. Representation by a trial counselor is not per se ineffective assistance of counsel failing to meet the constitutional requirement. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 400 (App. 1998).

Trial counselors and attorneys are expected to handle different types of cases, both civil and criminal. A counsel need not necessarily have special training or prior experience to handle legal problems of a type with which the counsel is unfamiliar. Consequently, even if a trial counselor did not have prior experience with the specific types of offenses charged against the defendant, that lack of experience does not automatically result in lack of competency. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The Public Defender, based upon the information he had received during his prior representation of the defendant in the matter, should have refused to sign the plea agreement, indicating his approval if he believed that the agreement violated the defendant's constitutional protection against double jeopardy. It is disingenuous for defendant to now argue that private counsel provided ineffective assistance of counsel for failing to raise the defense of double jeopardy, when defendant's former counsel, also a public defender, agreed to and signed the plea agreement in the matter. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

All criminal defendants, including corporations, have the right to effective assistance of counsel. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 394 (Chk. 2005).

Ineffective assistance of counsel during plea negotiations may invalidate a guilty plea if counsel's deficient performance undermined the voluntary and intelligent nature of the defendant's decision to plead guilty. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 (App. 2006).

To prevail on an ineffective assistance of counsel claim, an appellant must show that 1) counsel's performance was so deficient that it fell below an objective standard of reasonableness, and 2) the deficient performance prejudiced the defense. Under the first prong of the analysis, courts must indulge in a strong presumption of attorney competence. The second prong of the analysis requires an appellant to demonstrate a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's deficient performance, the result of the proceedings would have been different (i.e., better). If the appellant cannot satisfy the first prong of this test, the court's inquiry will proceed no further. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 (App. 2006).

To meet the second prong of the ineffective assistance of counsel analysis in the context of plea negotiations, an appellant must demonstrate a reasonable probability that, but for attorney error, he would have proceeded to trial. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 (App. 2006).

To resolve an argument that the defendant's counsel was constitutionally ineffective for failing to raise a double jeopardy defense before the defendant entered his guilty pleas, the court must necessarily consider the merits of the defendant's double jeopardy claim, since counsel may not be declared constitutionally ineffective for failing to raise a defense that would not have benefited the client. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 (App. 2006).

It is axiomatic that the failure to raise nonmeritorious issues does not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. A position that as long as a defendant has a defense that has historically been recognized as meritorious, he automatically prevails on his ineffectiveness claim without having to prove that the defense would have been meritorious in his case is clearly flawed reasoning. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 & n.2 (App. 2006).

Having concluded that counsel was not constitutionally ineffective for failing to raise the defense of double jeopardy, the court must conclude that it is irrelevant whether counsel would have raised the defense if he had pondered the case longer. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 386 (App. 2006).

– Right to Counsel – Joint Representation

Because prejudice is presumed when counsel is burdened by an actual conflict of interest an attorney representing criminal codefendants with conflicting interests denies a defendant his constitutional right to effective assistance of counsel. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479 (App. 1996).

In order to prevail on an ineffective assistance of counsel claim in cases of joint representation, a criminal defendant who raised no objection at trial to the joint representation must demonstrate that an actual conflict of interest adversely affected his lawyer's performance. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479 (App. 1996).

A criminal defendant who cannot show joint representation of conflicting interests can still prevail on an ineffective assistance claim if he can show deficient attorney performance resulting in actual prejudice. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479 (App. 1996).

It is an uncommon case where joint representation of criminal defendants is proper because the potential for conflict of interest in representing multiple defendants is so grave that ordinarily a lawyer should decline to represent more than one codefendant. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 479-80 (App. 1996).

Conflicting interests in the joint representation of criminal defendants might be discovered and avoided if an early hearing is conducted pursuant to FSM Criminal Rule 44(c). Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 480 n.9 (App. 1996).

In a case of actual conflict between jointly represented criminal codefendants a presumption of prejudice exists so that actual prejudice does not have to be shown and so that a harmless error inquiry is inappropriate. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 480 (App. 1996).

There must first be a finding of a valid waiver to any conflict of interest from the jointly represented codefendants before the question of whether counsel's trial tactics were reasoned becomes proper. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 481, 483 (App. 1996).

A court must indulge in every reasonable presumption against the waiver of the conflict of an attorney jointly representing codefendants. Such a waiver is not to be lightly inferred–it must be shown to have been knowingly, voluntarily and intelligently made. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 481, 483 (App. 1996).

Reversal of a conviction is warranted where there has been no inquiry into waiver of any conflict of counsel jointly representing codefendants, no hint of a waiver appears on the record, and an actual conflict existed. A new trial is then proper. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 481, 483 (App. 1996).

The right to waive an attorney's conflict of interest is not absolute. There are times when a court should not allow an otherwise valid waiver by a jointly represented codefendant. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 481, 484 (App. 1996).

In criminal cases the potential for conflict of interest in representing multiple defendants in a criminal case is so grave that ordinarily a lawyer should decline to represent more than one codefendant. On the other hand, common representation of persons having similar interests is proper if the risk of adverse effect is minimal and FSM MRPC R. 1.6(b)'s requirements are met. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 79 (App. 2006).

It is an uncommon case where joint representation of criminal defendants is proper since the potential for conflict of interest in representing multiple criminal defendants is so grave that ordinarily a lawyer should decline to represent more than one codefendant. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 79 (App. 2006).

Rule 44 requires that the trial court inquire into possible conflicts when criminal defendants are charged or tried together and are represented by the same counsel or firm, and unless it appears that there is good cause to believe no conflict of interest is likely to arise, the court must take such measures as may be appropriate to protect each defendant's right to counsel. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 79-80 (App. 2006).

A danger of representing criminal codefendants is that in any case with codefendants, one (or more) codefendant may insist upon his right to testify even if counsel advises against it since a criminal accused has a right to the assistance of an advocate, a right to testify and a right of confidential communication with counsel. When one codefendant testifies and another codefendant is represented by the same counsel, the other codefendant is deprived of effective assistance of counsel because he is unable to cross-examine the testifying defendant. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 80 (App. 2006).

Even if codefendants' testimony would be entirely consistent, defendants jointly tried may present a conflict because of the advantages and disadvantages of taking the stand may vary substantially as between them. A decision to have them testify or not testify might work to the disadvantage of one or the other, while a decision to have only one testify will undoubtedly highlight the lack of testimony from the other. Although these tensions between the codefendants' interests may be lessened somewhat by separate trials, multiple representation may present various conflicts even in that setting. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 80 (App. 2006).

When a conflict between two codefendants may not have been obvious initially, but once one of the defendants testified, it was apparent and it turned out to be prejudicial, although it was entirely likely that if the defendants had been tried separately or if neither defendant had testified there would have been no conflict, the remedy for a defendant who had ineffective assistance of counsel is to reverse the conviction and remand for a new trial. Reversal of a conviction is warranted when there has been no inquiry into waiver of any conflict of counsel jointly representing codefendants, no hint of a waiver appears on the record, and an actual conflict existed. A new trial is then proper. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 81 & n.4 (App. 2006).

When the court raised the issue of a potential conflict of interest in having one attorney representing both defendants. After a brief discussion, the defendants expressly waived the right to separate counsel in court. The court agrees that at this time that no conflict of interest is apparent, however, recognizes that a Rule 44 hearing might be necessary at a later date. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 619 (Pon. 2014).

Although joint representation of a defendant in a criminal case is possible, the risk of error is so grave that ordinarily a lawyer should decline to represent more than one codefendant. On the other hand, common representation of persons having similar interests is proper if the risk of adverse effect is minimal and the requirements are met. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 619 n.2 (Pon. 2014).

– Right to Silence

The issue of the court's jurisdiction to try a case is a preliminary matter that the accused, by testifying upon, does not subject himself to cross-examination as to other issues in the case. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

When a motorist, detained at routine traffic stop for a temporary and brief period, was not arrested and was not in custody at the time he was questioned regarding his driver's license, the police questioning at the roadblock was routine questioning, conducted by government agents as part of their roadblock procedure and did not require Miranda warnings. Therefore, based upon the totality of the circumstances, that motorist was not compelled into giving incriminating evidence against himself, his right against self-incrimination was not violated by the roadblock, and the evidence thus obtained will not be suppressed. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The privilege against self-incrimination is designed to prevent the use of devices to subvert the will of an accused. This protection has its roots in the United States Constitution's fifth amendment. Historically, the linchpin of this principle has been to prohibit the compelling of evidence of a testimonial or communicative nature. The protection does not extend to non-testimonial evidence such as fingerprints, handwriting exemplars, voice exemplars, or blood samples for purposes of determining a person's blood alcohol level, or the admission into evidence of a person's refusal to take a blood alcohol test. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 331 (App. 2004).

The larger question is not whether a statute technically requires an act versus a statement, but whether the driver's failure to produce his license was compelled by the state in violation of the right against self-incrimination. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 332 (App. 2004).

While a statute may be said to "compel" compliance with its requirement that a driver display his driver's license upon request by a police officer, it is manifestly the case that in such a sense every law specifying a positive duty and a penalty for failure to comply with that duty may be said to "compel" the required conduct. But this generalized characteristic of all effectively enforceable laws is a different question from whether the state coerced the driver's failure to display his license when the police officer requested him to do so. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 332 (App. 2004).

A driver may not lay his own conduct in failing to have his license in his possession and failing to produce it upon an officer's request, at the statute's feet by claiming that it requires him to incriminate himself. The police officer who requested the driver to produce his license cannot be said to have prevented him from displaying his license, or to have engaged in any other type of coercive conduct. The short of it is that the state did not compel the driver's failure to produce his driver's license. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 332 (App. 2004).

The constitutional privilege against self-incrimination is not meant to be a refuge for those who, by their own conduct and without any coercive action on the part of the state, fail to comply with the reasonable requirements of a valid statute. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 332-33 (App. 2004).

Failure to produce a driver's license upon a police officer's request in contravention of a statute does not constitute compelled evidence within the meaning of either Article II, § 1(f) of the Kosrae Constitution, or Article IV, § 7 of the FSM Constitution, so as to render the statute unconstitutional under either of those constitutional provisions. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 333 (App. 2004).

The protection offered by the FSM Constitution against compulsory self-incrimination is traceable to the U.S. Constitution's fifth amendment, and when a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 643 (Chk. 2004).

The central standard for application of the privilege against self-incrimination has been whether the claimant is confronted by substantial and real, and not merely trifling or imaginary, hazards of incrimination. Prospective acts will ordinarily involve only speculative and insubstantial risks of incrimination. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 643 (Chk. 2004).

When a pretrial release order's reporting requirement is prospective only and the movants are not required to report any past transactions, but only ones that had not yet taken place, the reports cannot incriminate any defendant for any of the offenses charged in the pending criminal information. When sending money abroad is not a criminal or regulatory offense, merely reporting it cannot, by itself, incriminate anyone. When the condition to report money sent abroad is prospective only and a defendant may arrange his, her, or its affairs so that there is nothing to report that would be evidence of some act for which criminal charges might be brought, it presents the ordinary case for prospective acts – the movants are not confronted by any substantial and real hazard of self-incrimination and therefore may not rely on the right against self-incrimination for relief from a pretrial release order to report money sent abroad. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 643 (Chk. 2004).

Under the right against self-incrimination, neither a partnership nor the individual partners are shielded from compelled production of partnership records on self-incrimination grounds. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 643 (Chk. 2004).

A release condition that the defendants report money sent abroad is not contrary to the purpose of pretrial release conditions to ensure the defendant's appearance at trial and assure the community's safety when among the possible penalties, if convicted of the offenses charged, is the forfeiture of certain assets allegedly wrongfully acquired; when the provisions help assure that the res that might be subject to forfeiture is not transferred from its current owners or does not depart the jurisdiction – it helps assure the presence of the res; and when it is a less drastic measure than that sought by the government, which was to freeze the movants' assets and not permit any remittances abroad without prior court approval. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 643 (Chk. 2004).

An attorney is not liable for criminal contempt for advising his client in good faith to assert his or her privilege against self-incrimination. For an attorney in the Federated States of Micronesia to be liable for criminal contempt for advising a client to assert his or her right to self-incrimination, the attorney must have given that advice in bad faith. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 349 (Chk. 2005).

A person is "in custody" when a person's freedom is substantially restricted by a police officer. For example, where a person's freedom is substantially restricted by a police officer by being placed into a police car, based upon a police officer's suspicion that the person was involved in the crimes committed earlier that evening, that person is considered arrested for the purpose of the right to be advised of his constitutional rights to remain silent and to have legal counsel. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A person who is stopped for a routine traffic offense is not in custody, for the purpose of requiring Miranda warnings, and persons who are stopped at a roadblock, where a person's freedom of movement is not substantially restricted or controlled, are not considered to be in custody and not considered to be arrested. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a defendant was followed by the Kosrae State Police, stopped at a traffic stop, questioned briefly and asked to perform field sobriety tests; when the traffic stop was conducted on a public road, where passersby could witness the interaction of the police officers and the defendant and was conducted by only two police officers, which created a non-threatening situation; when the officers did not tell the defendant that he would be going to jail; and when there was no needless delay in the administration of the field sobriety tests, the defendant, when he was asked to perform the field sobriety tests, was not considered arrested and was not in custody for the purposes of Miranda rights, and the state was not required to provide the defendant his Miranda rights prior to administration of the tests. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 453 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. There exists a presumption against such waivers. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 151 (Chk. 2006).

The burden of proof is on the prosecution to show that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and his right to retained or appointed counsel. The standard of proof the prosecution must meet is the preponderance of the evidence. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 151-52 (Chk. 2006).

The government has met the standard of proof and proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant has waived his rights knowingly and intelligently when the defendant's signed waiver showed that he was informed of his right to silence and his right to counsel and waived those rights and when, considering that signed waiver and the testimony presented, the court has considered the defendant's evidence and argument and cannot find that the manner in which the statement was elicited coerced the defendant into making it. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 152 (Chk. 2006).

The government's drafting of the defendant's affidavit, which the defendant signed and had notarized at the FSM Supreme Court, Palikir, Pohnpei, while not in the presence of any prosecution team member, does not make that affidavit the product of an unknowing or involuntary waiver of the defendant's rights. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 152 (Chk. 2006).

Since probation revocation is not a stage in a criminal prosecution, the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination is limited to where his answers might incriminate him in a future criminal proceeding. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

A person may refuse to testify against himself in two situations. First, a person may invoke the privilege in a criminal trial in which that person is a defendant. Second, a person may invoke the privilege in any other proceeding, civil, criminal, formal or informal, where the answers might incriminate him in future criminal proceedings. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 n.4 (Chk. 2008).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel, he must do so knowingly and intelligently. The burden is on the government to show not only that the waiver was knowingly and intelligently given, but that it was given before any statement was made. There exists a presumption against such waivers. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the court, based upon the witnesses' testimony, including their respective demeanor in the courtroom during the hearing, concludes that the accused was properly advised of his rights, including the right to remain silent, before he confessed, the court will deny a motion to suppress a confession that is based on the ground that a waiver was not knowingly and intelligently given. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 629 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the officers' investigatory stop of the defendant and their questioning him about suspicious circumstances did not constitute an arrest, the officers were not required to advise the defendant of his right to remain silent when they first approached him on the dock. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 420 (Pon. 2011).

When the officers had reasonable suspicion, based on specific and articulable facts, to perform an investigatory stop of the defendant after he disembarked from the Voyager on December 27, 2009, and when the defendant was not compelled to make an explicit or implicit disclosure of incriminating testimonial information since he volunteered to help the officers locate his backpack, he was not at that time, entitled to a privilege against self-incrimination under FSM Const. art. IV, § 7. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 599 (Pon. 2011).

The FSM Constitution protects the due process rights of all people accused of a crime. These rights include the right to be informed, the right against self-incrimination, and the right to have an attorney present at the time of questioning. These rights, along with others, were codified under 12 F.S.M.C. 214 and 218. The remedy for unlawful violations of these due process rights shall not in and of itself entitle an accused to an acquittal, but no evidence obtained as a result of such violation shall be admissible against the accused. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 508 (Pon. 2014).

The statutory protections are reviewed under a two-part analysis: first, under a statutory review of whether the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his rights before giving a statement to the police. Second, they are reviewed under a constitutional backdrop of whether the defendant voluntarily waived those rights. This second look is often cursory, or entirely unnecessary, in the ordinary case where no investigatory irregularities are implicated. This two-part analysis is ultimately the inquiry into whether a defendant, knowingly, intelligently, and voluntarily waived his or her rights. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 (Pon. 2014).

For a defendant to waive his right to silence or to counsel he must do so knowingly and intelligently. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 (Pon. 2014).

A defendant's constitutional right against self-incrimination is an important right and, although an implied waiver of the right might be valid, there is a presumption against such waivers. For waiver to be effective, there must be a clear and unmistakable warning of the rights being waived. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 (Pon. 2014).

The right against self-incrimination is a privilege that may be waived by defendants and is a purely personal privilege that may not be claimed by a corporation that is named as a defendant in a criminal case. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 626 & n.9 (Pon. 2014).

– Robbery

When one person, encouraged by the defendant to commit an assault, carries out the assault and then proceeds to commit robbery by the taking of turtle meat from the possession of the assaulted person, the defendant is not guilt of robbery where: 1) he did not suggest taking of the turtle meat or anything of value; 2) there is no showing that the could have foreseen the assault would be followed by the taking of something of value; and 3) the defendant left the premises before the turtle meat was taken. FSM v. Carl, 1 FSM R. 1, 2 (Pon. 1981).

Robbery requires a linkage between the threat or use of violence and the taking of something of value. FSM v. Carl, 1 FSM R. 1, 2 (Pon. 1981).

In robbery, as defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 920, the element of use or threatened use of immediate force or violence must be shown to have preceded or been concomitant or contemporaneous with the taking. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 446-47 (App. 1984).

A conviction for robbery is a finding which can only be reversed if the court's finding is clearly erroneous. Loney v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 151, 155 (App. 1987).

One who suggests to his drinking companions that they obtain additional liquor by taking a bottle from construction laborers in the area, and who then leads his companions in an effort to attack one of the workers, solicits more possibilities than just the taking of a bottle, and is guilty of aiding and abetting the robbery of a watch and money from another construction worker carried out by his companions while the original instigator is still pursuing the first laborer. FSM v. Hadley, 3 FSM R. 281, 284 (Pon. 1987).

It is reasonably foreseeable that a robbery of watch and money from a Korean construction worker may be a probable consequence of a common plan to take a bottle from "some Koreans," and the person who suggests the plan and initiates efforts to attack one of the construction workers may be held guilty of aiding and abetting the robbery of watch and money carried out by his companions against another Korean worker, immediately after the defendant initiated the first attack. FSM v. Hadley, 3 FSM R. 281, 284 (Pon. 1987).

Custom is more properly considered during sentencing than at other stages of a criminal prosecution. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 147-48 (Pon. 1982).

A criminal sentence may be affirmed on appeal when a review of the record reveals that the sentence is appropriate. Malakai v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 338, 338 (App. 1983).

The government's failure to prove the assertion in its information that a dangerous weapon was used to cause the victim to submit to the sexual assault need not result in dismissal of the case. It merely prevents an application of greater punishment available under 11 F.S.M.C. 914(3)(b). Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 493-94 (App. 1984).

The statutory construction rule of lenity reflects the reluctance of courts to increase or multiply punishments absent a clear and definite legislative direction. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 528 (App. 1984).

When two statutory provisions aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and upholding citizen and public interests of the same nature would apply to a solitary illegal act, which caused only one injury, the statutes will be construed not to authorize cumulative convictions in absence of a clear indication of legislative intent. However, the government is not denied the right to charge separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 529 (App. 1984).

The only power given to the executive to modify a sentence is the power to grant pardons and reprieves. FSM v. Finey, 3 FSM R. 82, 84 (Truk 1986).

No authority exists for the court to grant home visits. FSM v. Finey, 3 FSM R. 82, 84 (Truk 1986).

The doctrine of separation of powers does not prevent courts from modifying sentences even though the effect of modification may be the same as commuting the sentence. Kosrae v. Mongkeya, 3 FSM R. 262, 263-64 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Commutation powers affect the enforcement of the judgment whereas the modification powers affect the judgment itself. Kosrae v. Mongkeya, 3 FSM R. 262, 265 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The Kosrae Constitution did not intend for the executive's power to commute a sentence to prevent the Kosrae State Court from modifying its own sentencing orders or to prevent the appellate division of the Federated States of Micronesia from reviewing a sentencing order of the state court. Kosrae v. Mongkeya, 3 FSM R. 262, 266 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Although the internal management of a jail or prison is, subject to compliance with constitutional requirements, a function of the executive branch, the legislature controls the overall sentencing scheme through statute. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 82 (App. 1989).

In the absence of legislative action saying otherwise, it is the sentencing order, not the jailer or any member of the executive branch, which determines whether the prisoner is to be confined, and for how long. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 82 (App. 1989).

A national senator has no power to release national prisoners confined for violation of laws enacted by the national Congress. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 83 (App. 1989).

The Joint Law Enforcement Agreement between the State of Truk and the national government in no way affects the ability of a national court to require a jailer who has accepted custody of a prisoner to act in conformity with the sentencing order governing the confinement of the prisoner. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 84 (App. 1989).

Both cumulative and concurrent sentencing are logically not mentioned in 11 F.S.M.C. 1002, because they are not alternatives to the punishments specified by the separate criminal statutes, but rather the standards from which the "authorized sentences" of 11 F.S.M.C. 1002 deviate. Plais v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 153, 155 (App. 1989).

The authority to impose consecutive punishments for different crimes can be understood to be within the powers which the legislature has implicitly granted to the court in its overall scheme of criminal law; since each crime in the criminal code carries with it a separate and distinct punishment, it is logical to infer that when a person commits multiple crimes arising from more than one act, Congress intended that person to be punished separately for each offense. Plais v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 153, 155 (App. 1989).

If a defendant himself is incapable of paying restitution and he has made a request for assistance to his family, the family's bad faith in not paying cannot be imputed to the defendant and result in increased imprisonment. Gilmete v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 165, 166 (App. 1989).

The sentencing judge has authority to make a broad inquiry into the background of a defendant; specifically, the court may consider even cases in which the defendant was accused but not convicted. Kallop v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 170, 177 (App. 1989).

A sentencing judge may properly consider factors which would show trafficking of a controlled substance in a previous case, even though in the earlier case the defendant had pled guilty to possession and the trafficking charge had been dismissed. Kallop v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 170, 177 (App. 1989).

In the absence of authority derived from the Constitution, statutes or court rules, judges of the FSM Supreme Court are bound by their own sentencing orders arrived at through the normal exercise of criminal jurisdiction. FSM v. Likitimus, 4 FSM R. 180, 181 (Pon. 1990).

The trial division of the FSM Supreme Court has no power to amend its sentences at will. FSM v. Likitimus, 4 FSM R. 180, 181 (Pon. 1990).

The National Criminal Code does not contemplate routine application of the maximum or any other specific punishment but instead requires individualized sentencing, that is, court consideration of a broad range of alternatives, with the court's focus at all times on the defendant, the defendant's background and potential, and the nature of the offense, with the "overall objective" of the exercise of discretion being to "make the punishment fit the offender as well as the offense." Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 272-73 (App. 1990).

In reviewing a sentencing decision of a trial court, an appellate court should follow the standards generally applied in criminal appeals, upholding findings of fact supported by credible evidence but overruling those legal rulings with which the appellate court disagrees. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 274 (App. 1990).

When, before sentencing, a beating has been administered to a defendant by family and friends of the victim to punish the defendant for the crime for which he is to be sentenced, the sentencing court's refusal to consider the beatings is an inappropriate attempt to achieve a larger social purpose and an unacceptable diversion of the sentencing process when the refusal is not motivated by defendant's guilt or status but instead is an attempt to influence the future conduct of people who were not before the court and who had not committed crimes similar to those committed by defendants. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 276-77 (App. 1990).

Sentencing courts are not free to bar from consideration beatings that were grounded upon, or were products of custom and tradition when considering sentencing, and failure to consider the customary implications of those beatings violates not only the implicit statutory requirement of individualized sentencing, but also mandate of 11 F.S.M.C. 1003, enacted pursuant to article V, section 2 of the Constitution, as well as the judicial guidance clause. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 278 (App. 1990).

When a trial court is asked to give special mitigative effect to customary punishment during its sentencing proceedings, the court must first consider whether these customary activities have become so imbued with official state action so that the actions of the assailants are seen as actions of the state itself; if so the punishments must be tested by the same standards that would be applied if state officials carried out these punishments directly. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 283 (App. 1990).

The judicial guidance clause prohibits a sentencing court from giving special effect to customary beatings administered to the defendant, unless the court finds that such recognition would be consistent with the protections guaranteed to individuals by the Declaration of Rights. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 284 (App. 1990).

Sentencing is to be individualized, and the overall objective must be to make the sentence fit the offender as well as the offense. The sentencing court's focus must be the defendant, the defendant's background and potential, and the nature of the offense. The term of imprisonment fixed in the sentence must be the time which the sentencing judge believes the convicted person justly should be required to serve. There is no justification for the sentence to include an additional factor in recognition of the possibility of parole. Kimoul v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 53, 60-61 (App. 1991).

Because the defendants were convicted of the crime of aggravated sexual assault, which by nature is a violent crime, especially in this case where it was random, if released there is a likelihood they would pose a danger to others in the community. But because the defendants have committed one wrongdoing in the three years since their conviction other factors are needed to require denial of stay of sentence. FSM v. Hartman (II), 5 FSM R. 368, 369-70 (Pon. 1992).

Where defendants have willfully violated the court's previous order to remain confined to the Municipality of U, thus indicating a risk of flight, and where there is no substantial question of law or fact, defendants' motion for a stay of sentence pending appeal will not be granted. FSM v. Hartman (II), 5 FSM R. 368, 370-71 (Pon. 1992).

In considering the mitigation in sentencing to be given without regard to custom because of the beatings received by the defendants, the severity of the beating is the primary consideration. FSM v. Tammed, 5 FSM R. 426, 428 (Yap 1990).

The court cannot give further mitigative effect in sentencing to reflect the customary nature of the beatings if the court cannot find from the evidence presented that the beatings were customary. FSM v. Tammed, 5 FSM R. 426, 429 (Yap 1990).

The purpose of a sentencing hearing is to determine an appropriate sentence for criminal violations of which a defendant has already been convicted, not to reopen already decided issues of liability. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 219 (Pon. 1995).

Congress, by prescribing a mandatory minimum penalty, has determined that the penalty is proportionate to the nature of the crimes involved. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 219 (Pon. 1995).

Where a statute imposes a mandatory minimum fine and does not permit probation, a court cannot impose probation without violating the statute. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 219-20 (Pon. 1995).

Mitigating evidence cannot be used to depart below the mandatory minimum penalty required by the statute. A court may only consider that evidence in deciding whether the minimum sentence should be enhanced. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 220 (Pon. 1995).

A single, consolidated sentence for multiple offenses is proper, and when some convictions are vacated on appeal the consolidated sentence will be affirmed if it neither exceeds the maximum sentence of all the remaining convictions combined nor exceeds the maximum possible sentence for the most serious conviction remaining. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 103 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

Although a single, consolidated sentence for multiple offenses is proper, the better practice is for the trial court to impose sentence on each count individually, and to indicate on the record whether the sentences are to run concurrently or consecutively. A sentence which tracks the individual counts in this manner facilitates appellate review, and obviates the need for the appellate court to review the propriety of the entire sentence in the event any count underlying a general sentence is vacated. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 103 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

Where there is a plain legislative intent to impose separate punishments a court may reject a proposal that the sentences for those counts run concurrently. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 181 (Pon. 1997).

In fashioning an appropriate sentence for fishing violations, a court considers the nature, circumstances, extent, and gravity of the prohibited acts committed, the defendant's degree of culpability and history of prior offenses, whether other civil penalties or criminal fines have already been imposed for the specific conduct before the court, and such other matters as justice might require, keeping in mind the statutory purpose behind the provisions violated. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 181-82 (Pon. 1997).

When a person convicted of a crime appeals only his jail sentence and seeks a stay of that sentence pending appeal, the trial court will grant a stay only if it is reasonably assured that the appellant will not flee or pose a danger to any other person or to the community, and that the appeal is not for purpose of delay, and raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in a sentence that does not include a term of imprisonment. The burden of establishing these criteria rests with the defendant. FSM v. Nimwes, 8 FSM R. 299, 300 (Chk. 1998).

The request of a defendant, who is appealing only his jail sentence, for a stay pending appeal will be denied because his allegation that his four-month jail sentence for misappropriating to his own use $17,125 of government money is cruel and unusual punishment and an abuse of the judge's discretion when he has diabetes does not raise a substantial question likely to result in a sentence without a jail term and raises the inference that the appeal was brought for the purpose of delay. FSM v. Nimwes, 8 FSM R. 299, 300 (Chk. 1998).

If, for the same act, both a lesser included and a greater offense are proven, the court should then enter a conviction on only the greater offense. A defendant cannot be sentenced on both the higher and the lesser included offense arising out of the same criminal transaction. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 516 (App. 1998).

A sentence of imprisonment will be stayed if an appeal is taken to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division and the defendant is released pending disposition of appeal if application for release is made in the first instance in the court appealed from. Iwenong v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 550, 551-52 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

Sentencing is to be individualized, and the overall objective is to make the punishment fit the offender as well as the offense. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1999).

The sentencing court's focus at all times must be on the defendant, the defendant's background and potential, and the nature of the offense. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1999).

If the trial court based the sentence upon the defendant's background and potential, and the nature of the offense, such individualized sentencing decision would be entitled to the deference accorded to findings of fact. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1999).

The original sentence is to be one which the sentencing court has considered carefully and has concluded fits the offender as well as the offense. Any change in that sentence will not be lightly won. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1999).

As a criminal contempt remedy is designed for individual deterrence, to punish for intentional disobedience of the court's orders, a defendant's status as a first time offender is not a mitigating factor in his sentencing. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 188 (App. 1999).

When an appellant has failed to provide a transcript of the relevant evidence and failed to identify the portions of the record that support his argument, he has failed to demonstrate that the trial court has erred as a matter of law in imposing sentence, and the presumption is that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the trial court's judgment. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 189 (App. 1999).

A trial judge may impose a sentence less than the maximum permitted by law. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 189-90 (App. 1999).

A sentence is individualized when the maximum is not imposed, the defendant's work schedule is taken into account, and an incentive is provided for compliance with other court orders. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1999).

Imposing a fine is inadequate when the money diverted to the court would otherwise be used to repay the victim. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1999).

A jail sentence with work release enables a defendant to continue his employment, meet his financial obligations to his family and fulfill a trial court judgment to repay the victims. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1999).

Among the criteria the defendant must show to be released pending appeal when the appeal is only of his sentence of imprisonment is that the appeal is not for the purpose of delay and that it raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in a sentence that does not include a term of imprisonment. FSM v. Akapito, 10 FSM R. 255, 256 (Chk. 2001).

A defendant appealing his sentence has utterly failed to meet the criteria for release pending appeal when neither his moving papers nor argument raised a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in a sentence not including a term of imprisonment. FSM v. Akapito, 10 FSM R. 255, 256 (Chk. 2001).

That the defendant would then be free, in mind and body, to assist his counsel in the preparation of his appeal is not a substantial question of law or fact justifying release pending an appeal. FSM v. Akapito, 10 FSM R. 255, 257 (Chk. 2001).

When an appeal of a criminal sentence does not raise any substantial question likely to obtain the result the appellant seeks, the court may draw the inference that it was brought for the purpose of delay. FSM v. Akapito, 10 FSM R. 255, 257 (Chk. 2001).

By statute, the Chuuk State Supreme Court, at any time before imposition of sentence, may suspend imposition of sentence on conditions, and if the conditions are fully satisfied, it must vacate the conviction, but this statute is only applicable before the imposition of sentence and not in a case where the sentence was not only imposed, but was fully served. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 307 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Reconciliation is not a basis for dismissal of a criminal information. The law of our nation in this regard is clear. Custom, including customary apology and reconciliation, is to be considered during the sentencing of a criminal prosecution. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Appellate Rule 9(c) sets the criteria for release pending appeal in a criminal case, and the burden of establishing the requisite criteria rests with the defendant. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2004).

To grant a release pending appeal, the court first must conclude that one or more release conditions will reasonably assure that the appellant will not flee or pose a danger to another person or the community, and then the movant must establish that the appeal is not for purpose of delay and that it raises a substantial question of law or fact likely to result in either 1) a reversal; 2) an order for a new trial; 3) a sentence that does not include a term of imprisonment; or 4) a reduced sentence to a term of imprisonment less than the total of the time already served. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2004).

The release of a prisoner is not automatic once a notice of appeal and a motion for release have been filed. The prisoner must establish the requisite criteria exist under Appellate Rule 9(c). FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2004).

When a criminal defendant wants to be released pending appeal but his appeal does not raise any substantial question likely to obtain the result sought by the appeal, the court may draw the inference that the appeal was brought for the purpose of delay. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2004).

A stay of sentence pending appeal is not automatic upon the filing of a notice of appeal and a motion to stay, but rests on the court's discretion. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2004).

The court may, in its discretion, stay pending appeal upon such terms as the court deems proper, an order for restitution, but the court may require the defendant pending appeal to deposit the whole or any part of the fine, restitution or costs in the registry of the trial court, or to give bond for the payment thereof, or to submit to an examination of assets, and it may make any appropriate order to restrain the defendant from dissipating his assets. The court may invite the movant and the government to submit their views on the advisability, if restitution is stayed, of an order that while the appeal is pending the restitution be paid into the court's registry to remain there in an interest-bearing account until the appeal is decided. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 512 (Chk. 2004).

Generally, a criminal sentence starts when it is pronounced from the bench unless the sentence contains a provision that the sentence starts at some later time. A jail sentence starts to run the date the defendant is received at the jail or other place of detention. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 90-91 (Chk. 2004).

A sentence is imposed when it is pronounced in open court. This is a constitutional as well as procedural requirement. The rules require the defendant's presence at sentencing. This is also required by the FSM constitutional provision, requiring a public trial and giving a defendant the right to confront witness against him. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 91 n.1 (Chk. 2004).

A written sentence must conform to the one delivered orally. If it does not, the oral sentence controls. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 91 n.1 (Chk. 2004).

Work release is a grant of leniency and privilege granted to an imprisoned defendant at the court's discretion. It is not an entitlement to a defendant. The court will not grant work release when, based upon the papers filed, arguments of counsel, the record, and in the interests of justice, the court concludes that modification of the defendant's sentence to allow work release is not warranted and the interests of justice will be best served by completion of the individualized sentence imposed upon him, including his imprisonment in jail without work release for his entire sentence, as specified in the sentencing order. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 190, 192 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Custom, including customary apology and reconciliation, is to be considered during the sentencing of a criminal prosecution, but when there was no customary reconciliation reached among the defendant and the victims, there is no consideration of this factor for sentencing. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 368, 369 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When there was no evidence submitted to support defendant's contention that he, as an adult male in the family, is authorized under custom to commit an assault and battery upon two selected females in his family in order to stop an argument among three females in his family; when there was no evidence submitted to support defendant's argument that his actions were appropriate and taken in accordance with custom; and when although the defendant's sister initiated the argument with victims, the defendant committed the assaults and batteries upon the non-aggressors in the argument only further inciting the argument and raising tensions among the family instead of encouraging resolution of the argument and initiating reconciliation and peace, the defendant's argument that his actions were taken properly in accordance with custom, based upon his traditional authority as an adult male in the family must therefore be rejected in consideration of sentencing. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 368, 369 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

In Kosrae, in imposing a sentence, state law specifically permits the court to consider a convicted person's criminal record by hearing evidence of the convicted's good or bad character, including a criminal record. A criminal record includes the record or file of the criminal proceedings against an accused, and necessarily includes documentation of disposition of the case, including conviction and sentencing based upon a plea of guilty or nolo contendere, judgment of acquittal, or dismissal. Consequently, a plea of nolo contendere in a prior case and the judgment and sentencing, may be heard and considered in sentencing a defendant. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 124 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A defendant's criminal record is considered evidence of the defendant's character and is therefore admissible in a sentencing hearing. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 124 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A court may consider all criminal matters in which the defendant was accused, even if not convicted. A sentencing judge's authority is to make broad inquiry into the defendant's background. Specifically the court may consider even cases of which the defendant was accused but not convicted. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 124 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

If a defendant is well enough to attend the sentencing hearing at the courthouse, the defendant must appear at the courthouse, but if he is not well enough to attend the sentencing hearing at the courthouse, then the sentencing hearing will be held at the hospital in a conference room or other suitable location at which the sentencing hearing can be conducted. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 126 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the justice sentencing the defendant has resigned from the court and it is the justice's final day of service as a justice, a motion for recusal from sentencing on that ground is meritless. It is within the judge's authority and is his duty to conduct the sentencing hearing especially since the sentencing hearing was delayed at the defendant's request to address the issue of admission of defendant's prior criminal record. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 126 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

That the judge has other criminal cases pending which he has not completed, and has granted continuances in other cases are meritless grounds to recuse the judge from sentencing the defendant on his final day as a judge when those matters are unrelated to this case and trial had been completed and the only action left is the imposition of sentence. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 126-27 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A defendant's potential health problems and needs are not relevant to a motion for stay of execution of sentence. They are appropriately raised in a Rule 35(b) motion for reduction of sentence. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 164, 168 (Chk. 2006).

Even if the finding of guilt had been made in open court with the defendant present, the case would still have to be remanded to the trial court when there was no public imposition of sentence with the defendant present. When a sentence is imposed, the defendant's presence is required because the defendant must be present at every stage of the trial including the finding of the court and at the imposition of sentence. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 232 (App. 2006).

The defendant's right (found in Rule 43) to be present at the imposition of sentence is constitutionally based on the confrontation and due process clauses. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 & n.3 (App. 2006).

When sentencing a criminal defendant, the sentencing court must eyeball the defendant at the instant it exercises its most important judicial responsibility. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 (App. 2006).

Although Kosrae Criminal Rule 43(b) permits a criminal defendant, once trial has started with the defendant present, to voluntarily absent himself or herself from the trial or from the oral pronouncement of findings, it does not permit a criminal defendant to be absent from the court's imposition of sentence or to waive his or her right to be present at the imposition of sentence. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 (App. 2006).

A reason illustrating the importance of the public imposition of sentence is that the written sentence must conform to the one delivered orally. If it does not, the oral sentence, not the written sentence, controls. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 (App. 2006).

The sentence orally pronounced from the bench is the sentence, because the only sentence that is legally cognizable is the actual oral pronouncement in the defendant's presence. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 234 (App. 2006).

The general public also has a right and interest in a public sentencing that enables the public to learn the sentence and court's reasons for it. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 234 (App. 2006).

There can be no cumulative punishment for a single offense absent clear legislative intent. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 383 (App. 2006).

A harsh sentence does not constitute manifest injustice, particularly when the sentence conforms to statutory guidelines. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 386 n.8 (App. 2006).

That the charge on which the defendant was convicted is a serious one which involved dishonesty by persons holding high-ranking positions in government and that the public should be conveyed that message are factors to be taken into account when sentence is imposed. FSM v. Engichy, 14 FSM R. 573, 574 (Chk. 2007).

The maximum sentence for violating 11 F.S.M.C. 701 was raised in the 2001 criminal code from three years to ten years. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 46 n.2 (App. 2007).

The trial court's imposition of a one year sentence of imprisonment for a violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701 was not an abuse of discretion when there is nothing in the record which suggests that the sentence was anything but reasonable in light of the evidence presented to the court at the time of sentencing, and when, at the time of the defendant's conduct giving rise to his conviction, a violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701 could result in a period of incarceration of up to 3 years. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 49 (App. 2007).

The trial court did not abuse its discretion when its consideration of the pre-sentence report's inclusion of information concerning another criminal matter against the defendant obviously had no negative effect on the sentence imposed, nor did the trial court's consideration of it prior to the imposition of the defendant's sentence reveal an abuse of discretion by the trial court. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 49 (App. 2007).

At the time of sentencing, a trial court is entitled to consider a defendant's prior conviction, and the plea upon which it was based, even when the prior conviction was based upon a nolo contendere plea because it is not only the plea that is considered, but the conviction based upon the plea as well. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 128 (App. 2007).

An original sentence is to be one which the sentencing court has considered carefully and has concluded fits the offender as well as the offense. The sentencing should be individualized, and the overall objective is to make the punishment fit the offender as well as the offense. The sentencing court's focus at all times must be on the defendant, the defendant's background and potential, and the nature of the offense. Chuuk v. Inos, 15 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A sentence of six years incarceration is not unduly severe on a manslaughter conviction. It may even be considered lenient. Chuuk v. Inos, 15 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Congress has granted the court the power to suspend jail sentences, to suspend the imposition of a sentence, and to parole prisoners after they have served part of their sentence, but it has not given the court the power to expunge convictions. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 45 (Chk. 2008).

Notice that the convicted person has a right to appeal must be given orally when a criminal contempt sentence is imposed. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

A guilty finding is not a "judgment of conviction" because in order to be a judgment of conviction, the "judgment of conviction" must set forth the plea, the findings, and the adjudication and sentence. Since a "judgment of conviction" must contain the sentence, it can only be entered after the sentence is pronounced. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 204-05 n.1 (App. 2013).

A criminal sentence may be affirmed when a review of the record reveals that the sentence is appropriate, and, if the trial court based the sentence upon the defendant's background and potential, and the nature of the offense, such an individualized sentencing decision would be entitled to the deference accorded to findings of fact. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 205 (App. 2013).

The standard of review of a trial court's decision to impose consecutive sentences is de novo review when the issues raised are the questions of law – whether an offense is a lesser included offense of another offense; whether a sentence violates the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions' protections against double jeopardy; and whether the rule of lenity should apply in construing a statute. Otherwise, the review of a judge's decision to impose concurrent or consecutive sentences is generally limited to review for abuse of discretion. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 205 (App. 2013).

While a trial judge's failure to inform a criminal defendant of his right to appeal may be harmless error when the defendant has in fact timely appealed, the trial judge's failure at a sentencing hearing to address a criminal defendant personally and ask him if wishes to make a statement in the defendant's own behalf and to present any information in mitigation of punishment is not harmless error. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 206 (App. 2013).

A criminal defendant's right at a sentencing hearing to be personally addressed by the judge and to then make an unsworn statement on his own behalf in an effort to lessen the impending sentence is called the right of allocution. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 206 (App. 2013).

The appellate court may notice plain error when the error affects a criminal defendant's substantial rights, such as his right of allocution. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 206-07 & n.2 (App. 2013).

A trial judge's failure to personally address a criminal defendant and offer him an opportunity to allocute is not harmless error and the criminal defendant does not waive that right by failing to object to his lack of opportunity at the sentencing hearing. The right of allocution is a fundamental or substantial right. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 207 (App. 2013).

The trial judge, as noted in Kosrae Criminal Procedure Rule 32(a)(1), has the burden to personally address a criminal defendant at the sentencing hearing and to offer him the right to allocute and make an unsworn statement to the court. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 207 (App. 2013).

The law is clear that a defendant must be present in person at the time sentence is originally imposed and that he must be afforded the right of allocution. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 207 (App. 2013).

When a criminal defendant was not afforded the right of allocution, his sentences will be vacated and the matter remanded for a new sentencing hearing. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 207 (App. 2013).

Considering the seriousness of the sexual abuse charge, it is advisable that a presentence investigation and report be done as required by Kosrae Criminal Procedure Rule 32(c). Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 207 (App. 2013).

There is no authority that a crime is no longer a crime and the case must be dismissed once the accused has repaid all of the alleged financial losses, but, if the accused were found guilty, the repayment would likely have some effect on the degree of punishment. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 135 (Pon. 2015).

Since the attempt to commit sexual assault merged into the completed sexual assault; since assault is a lesser included offense of assault and battery; and since assault and battery and disturbing the peace are both lesser included offenses of sexual assault, the convictions for all these lesser offenses must be vacated, and since the maximum sentence for sexual assault as a category two felony is five years, the accused's seven-year sentence, and therefore his convictions, for all offenses must be vacated and the case remanded for re-sentencing on, and thus for a conviction to be entered for, only the greater offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 155 (App. 2015).

A trial judge is required to publicly read out his sentence in open court, and if the trial judge fails to do so, he abuses his discretion because this is part of the constitutional right to a public trial. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 155 (App. 2015).

Courts differ on whether a consolidated sentence is proper. Some courts hold them improper, and even where they are proper, courts take two approaches. Some courts hold that a single sentence may be imposed for all offenses so long as it does not exceed the aggregate of sentences that might have been separately imposed on all the counts consecutively while other courts hold that a consolidated or general sentence, that is, one that does not specify the punishment imposed under separate counts of the information, will not be upheld if it exceeds the maximum term of punishment permissible under any single count. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 155 (App. 2015).

A seven-year sentence is improper and must be vacated when it exceeds the maximum sentence for the one conviction that the appellate court has affirmed. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 155 (App. 2015).

The better practice is for the trial court to impose sentence on each count individually and to indicate on the record whether the sentences are to run concurrently or consecutively. Such a sentence facilitates appellate review, and obviates the need for the appellate court to review the entire sentence's propriety in the event any count underlying a general sentence is vacated. Thus, if any part of a conviction is reversed on appeal, the sentence imposed under the valid count would not have to be disturbed. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 155 (App. 2015).

The use of consolidated sentences should be avoided. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 157 (App. 2015).

Although a consolidated sentence may be proper, it is inadvisable. The better practice is for the trial court to impose sentence on each count individually, indicating whether the sentences are to run concurrently or consecutively because such a sentence facilitates appellate review and obviates the need for a remand for re-sentencing. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 168 (App. 2015).

The Compact of Free Association has a provision by which sentences imposed by FSM courts on U.S. citizens may be served in U.S. penal institutions, but if they go through the diplomatic channels and comply with transfer procedures and eligibility, but the Compact does not have a section that deals with an FSM citizen under a sentence rendered by a FSM court who seeks to serve the remaining term of his sentence in a U.S. jurisdiction. FSM v. Bisalen, 20 FSM R. 471, 473 (Pon. 2016).

Under Rule 11(e), when a plea agreement contains sentencing recommendations, the court may impose a different sentence than that proposed by the government and the parties. FSM v. Bui Van Cua, 20 FSM R. 588, 590 (Pon. 2016).

A criminal defendant will be given credit for such time as he has been in the government's custody. FSM v. Bui Van Cua, 20 FSM R. 588, 591 (Pon. 2016).

A court's jurisdiction ends once the defendant has satisfied the sentence that had been imposed. Chuuk v. Rimuo, 21 FSM R. 19, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

A defendant is subject to possible imprisonment for not more than five years for the defendant's tampering with public records conviction when the court finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant's purpose was to defraud or injure the government in its processing and production of FSM passports and to injure those FSM citizens who applied for and needed to obtain passports at the time the machine readable passport system was inoperable. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 315, 317 (Pon. 2017).

Chuuk State Law No. 13-16-12 amended the sentencing provisions for some of the most violent felonies listed within Chuuk State Law No. 6-66 in order to help courts impose stiffer sentences on the convicted violators so as to help deter future criminal tendencies and involvement. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 569 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The commonly understood meaning of the term "imprisonment," and its definition in both legal and regular dictionaries, is confining someone in prison or jail, and these definitions consistently allude to detention or captivity within a structure, as opposed to "suspended sentences," but the scope of imprisonment possibly includes house arrest, since it is a type of lawful restraint upon movement. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 569 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Chuuk courts have consistently relied on the discretionary authority vested upon them under Section 1110, to suspend the execution of sentences that the court imposed. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 570 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A Chuuk court may direct that the execution of the whole or any part of a sentence of imprisonment it imposes be suspended on such terms as to good behavior and on such conditions as the court may think proper. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 570 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When the statute never defines imprisonment, the plain meaning of the term governs, which could leave the possibility of defining imprisonment to include house arrest, but the statute's context narrows the definition of imprisonment to refer only to confinement in jail. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 570 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When the statute requires that a defendant convicted of murder be sentenced to a minimum of term of not less than 40 year(s), and eligible for parole after 20, the term imprisonment, as used within the statute, means a punishment of not less than 40 years in prison. Otherwise, the term parole is left meaningless, since it can only refer to release from prison, as opposed to house arrest, or the lifting of a suspended sentence. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When a statute states that "a person convicted under this Section shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years," has consistently been interpreted to refer to the imposition of sentences, leaving the court the opportunity to suspend the execution of its imposed jail terms for sexual abuse, but when the punishment provision was amended to "not less than five years" instead of "not more than five years" imprisonment and the punishment section's wording otherwise remains the same, therefore, although imprisonment means jail term, the mandated punishment refers to the imposition of such jail term as opposed to its execution. Therefore, courts may still suspend such sentences. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When the amended statute added some additional subsections requiring that the defendant serve a minimum five-year sentence, the "shall serve" within this provision refers to the execution of a sentence. But when the notable term missing within the paragraph is "jail" sentence, the court must impose a five-year imprisonment term, which it may then suspend in whole or in part, although the defendant is required to serve a five-year sentence. Since the provision lacks the term "jail" before "sentence," it only requires the court to impose at least a five-year jail sentence – which the court may then suspend by virtue of its discretionary power. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571-72 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Only those sections that contain a provision which mandates that defendant shall serve a mandatory x year jail sentence supersede § 1110 and thereby actually remove the court's equitable power to suspend such jail sentence. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The Chuuk Legislature's finding of an apparent increase in the commission of violent crimes in the State and the need to promote public peace and safety caused the Legislature to find it necessary to increase certain minimum sentences to help the court impose stiffer sentences on the convicted violators in certain violent felony criminal cases to help deter future criminal tendencies and involvement. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 654 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The "definite, unambiguous, and certain" analysis is usually applied to statutory language which prohibits conduct as opposed to sentencing language. Courts are more deferential as to determining what constitutes a definite statement when sentencing guidelines are concerned. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 654-55 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The court is subject to certain limits in sentencing when the state law sets a precise minimum of no less than five years imprisonment while the maximum sentence, as set by the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions, is life in prison because the Constitutions ban capital punishment. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM

R. 649, 655 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A statute that sets only a minimum sentence does not allow the court unbridled discretion to implement cruel and unusual punishments because the court is constrained by the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions; because the court has a traditional role of adjudication based on equity that involves the considering mitigating and aggravating factors before imposing sentence; and because all statutes are presumptively constitutional. Thus, this statute is not so unconstitutionally vague or ambiguous as to violate a defendant's due process rights to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 655-56 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Chuuk courts are restricted in hearing only "live" cases, meaning the case must be one appropriate for judicial determination. A matter is appropriate for judicial determination when there is a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. Thus, when a defendant has not yet stood trial and thus may not be convicted, the question of whether a potential sentence constitutes a cruel and unusual punishment is merely hypothetical and academic and not yet appropriate for judicial determination. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 656 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When determining a statute's vagueness or ambiguity, the court must look to a statute that prescribes an offense that either forbids or requires the doing of an act. Thus, a sentencing requirement that states, "imprisonment for not less than five years, or a fine of not less than $5,000.00, or both" is not subject to a due process analysis for violating the defendant's right to know the nature and cause of the accusation against him because the statute's sentencing provision is not the part of the statute that forbids or requires the doing of an act. In order to attack a statute's vagueness, the court is restricted to looking at the statute that prescribes an offense or that forbids or requires the doing of an act. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 656 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

There is no requirement that a statutory sentencing provision's language contain absolute precision or perfection. Informing a defendant that the sentence constitutes a minimum of five years imprisonment is sufficient notice because the sentencing statute provides a clear and explicit notice of a monetary and sentencing minimum for the defendant and leaves the court the equitable power to set a cap upon the sentencing as justice demands and as restricted by the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions. Thus, the statute provides notice to the defendant that he may be sentenced to between five years and life. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 657 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Although a statute gives the court the authority to suspend the execution and imposition of a sentence respectively, the court's power to suspend a sentence is not absolute when a mandatory jail term is required. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Criminal statutes, that contain a provision which mandates that the defendant must serve a mandatory x year jail sentence, supersede the court's equitable power to suspend the mandatory jail sentence and its power to suspend the imposition of sentence. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When the statute requires that the court impose a sentence of three years of imprisonment and that the defendant must serve a minimum of 3 years in jail, the statute controls, and the court cannot suspend the imposition or execution of the first three years of the jail sentence for a sexual assault conviction or to reduce the sentence to house arrest or to permit unsupervised release between 8 a.m. – 5 p.m. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Although the statute gives the court the authority to suspend the execution and imposition of a sentence respectively, the court's power to suspend a sentence is not absolute when a mandatory jail term is required. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Criminal statutes that contain a provision which mandates that the defendant must serve a mandatory x year jail sentence supersede the court's equitable power to suspend the mandatory jail sentence and its power to suspend the imposition of sentence. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Sentence – Probation

While the court is interested in the rehabilitation of a defendant, its greater interest is in protecting society at large from illegal conduct. When a court releases a convicted person on probation, it does so at its own discretion. Probation is a leniency granted by the court. It is not a right and revocation of probation should not be thought of as additional punishment. FSM v. Phillip, 5 FSM R. 298, 301-02 (Kos. 1992).

Probation is inappropriate sentence when the defendant has departed from the FSM, not permitting the FSM to monitor or control its future behavior, and where the seriousness of its violations warranted a more serious sanction. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 181 (Pon. 1997).

The Kosrae State Court may modify an order of probation during the term of probation when the court finds a termination of probation serves the ends of justice and the best interests of the public and the defendant. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

An order placing a defendant on probation may be stayed if an appeal is taken. If not stayed, the court shall specify when the term of probation will commence. If the order is stayed, the court must fix the terms of the stay. FSM v. Moses, 12 FSM R. 509, 512 (Chk. 2004).

In most instances in which a court orders probation, a defendant is placed on probation without any intervening imprisonment or delay. A court often orders "delayed probation," but this is when the probationary period is to start after the defendant has completed a sentence of imprisonment for some other crime. However, these statements in regard to Criminal Rule 32 do not apply when the sentence is probation and an appeal is sought. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 91 (Chk. 2004).

Under Rule 38(a)(4), when a sentence is probation and an appeal is taken, an automatic stay pending appeal remains in effect until a starting date is set for probation to begin. If a motion to stay is filed, the court would not set a starting date until the defendant's motion for a stay was either granted (in which case the terms of that stay order would take effect) or denied (in which case a starting date would be set for probation to begin). Conceivably, the court could set a starting date that came before the court was able to rule on the motion to stay. In such a circumstance, the probation would start and then a stay would be either granted or denied. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 91-92 (Chk. 2004).

A sentence of probation is automatically stayed upon appeal until a starting date for probation is explicitly set by the court. As a general rule, the court must explicitly state when the probation period starts and, until it does, a sentence of probation will not start. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 92 (Chk. 2004).

Once a probationary period has elapsed the defendant has automatically satisfied the sentence imposed. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 338 (Pon. 2016).

Since probation law is intended in part to rehabilitate the offender without imprisonment, it contemplates that during the probation period he will be within the jurisdiction of the court that retains control over him and will be available to probation officers for the performance of their duties. FSM v. Bisalen, 20 FSM R. 471, 474 (Pon. 2016).

There is no authority to allow an FSM defendant with a remaining term on his probation to relocate to a foreign jurisdiction when that defendant has not produced any evidence that any steps have been taken in notifying or seeking permission from a court within that foreign jurisdiction for the purposes of monitoring his whereabouts and to oversee his compliance with his terms of release. The burden will is on the defendant to furnish proof of a court there that is willing to oversee the remaining term of his probation. FSM v. Bisalen, 20 FSM R. 471, 474 (Pon. 2016).

– Sentence – Probation – Revocation

Courts have uniformly held that sound policy requires that they be able to revoke probation for a defendant's offense committed before the sentence commences. FSM v. Dores, 1 FSM R. 580, 586 (Pon. 1984).

Revocation of probation of an alcohol dependent person because he consumed alcohol or because of alcohol related offenses for which he was convicted does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Constitution. FSM v. Phillip, 5 FSM R. 298, 300 (Kos. 1992).

Even if the defendant had been arrested merely for drinking alcohol the court would be compelled to return him to prison because the no-drinking condition had been imposed before the court became aware of the defendant's alcohol dependent condition and because compliance with that condition is fundamental to a proper probation. FSM v. Phillip, 5 FSM R. 298, 300-01 (Kos. 1992).

While the court is interested in the rehabilitation of a defendant, its greater interest is in protecting society at large from illegal conduct. When a court releases a convicted person on probation, it does so at its own discretion. Probation is a leniency granted by the court. It is not a right and revocation of probation should not be thought of as additional punishment. FSM v. Phillip, 5 FSM R. 298, 301-02 (Kos. 1992).

The issue of whether a defendant actually broke the law or that his arrest was unconstitutional is beyond the scope of a probation revocation hearing. The issues of whether a conviction is valid and constitutional should be taken to the appropriate court of appeals. FSM v. Phillip, 5 FSM R. 298, 302 (Kos. 1992).

A parole revocation hearing is significantly different than a trial. Although a court may not act capriciously in revoking probation, there is no need to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the terms of the probation have been violated. A court may revoke probation if it is reasonably satisfied that the terms of the probation were violated. FSM v. Phillip, 5 FSM R. 298, 302-03 (Kos. 1992).

The court cannot revoke a sentence of probation for acts that took place before the sentence started. Probation cannot be revoked upon the basis of a probation violation occurring before defendant was placed on probation. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 92 (Chk. 2004).

Kosrae statute provides that upon revocation of probation the court may impose a sentence which it may have initially imposed if the court had not suspended imposition of sentence. Kosrae v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 187, 189 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the defendant was sentenced to five years imprisonment, suspended with conditions of probation, and payment of a fine; when during the sentencing hearing, there was extensive discussion regarding payment of the fine by local produce instead of cash, to accommodate the defendant's difficulty in paying cash; when the defendant was verbally informed at the sentencing hearing that his violation of the probation conditions may result in revocation of probation and remand to jail for the remainder of his term of imprisonment and the sentencing order also clearly gave notice of remand to jail in case of violation of probation conditions; when the defendant agreed verbally and by signature to the plea agreement's recommended sentence of five years term; when the defendant presented no grounds in support of his request to modify the sentencing order; and when the court finds by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant violated his probation by committing assault and battery and did not pay the fine imposed, the defendant's suspended sentence is revoked and he is remanded to jail to serve his remaining term. Kosrae v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 187, 189-90 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A motion to revoke a suspended sentence must be filed by the State, as it is the prosecuting entity. A motion to revoke a suspended sentence may be filed with or without an affidavit from the Court Marshal. The State Attorney General's Office may be informed of a probationer's alleged violation of probation conditions through several avenues: direct complaint, witness, police report, Court Marshal's affidavit etc. Kosrae is authorized by state law and court rules to file the motion to revoke suspended sentence based upon information provided to them. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 31 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Probation and revocation of probation proceedings are governed by Kosrae State Code, Section 6.4909. Neither this statutory provision nor Criminal Rule 32.1 require the court marshal, probation officer or any other specific person to institute a revocation proceeding. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 31 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Kosrae GCO 1998-03 establishes the probation officer's power to confine people for violations of suspended sentences, pre-trial and post-conviction release orders; it provides for the confinement and hearing procedure in cases where the person has been taken into custody by the probation officer, or where an arrest warrant has been executed by the Kosrae State Police; and it establishes the hearing procedure to ensure that a hearing on a revocation petition for a person held in custody is held as soon as possible. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 31 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When, based upon clear and convincing evidence of the defendant's assault and battery, the court finds that the defendant has violated his probation condition of "no violation of any national, state or municipal laws or ordinances," the defendant's probation will be revoked. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 32 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a July 7, 2006 report of the defendant's non-compliance with his probation release conditions sought to revoke the defendant's probation, the defendant has not shown that a September 28, 2006 hearing date was not a hearing set within a reasonable time since he was without counsel and new, off-island counsel had to be assigned and since he had been released and was not being held pending his revocation hearing. And when any further delay after September 28, 2006, is attributable to the defendant and his requests for continuances, the ground that the defendant's hearing was not held within a reasonable time will be rejected as a ground to deny the motion to revoke his probation. FSM v. Kintin, 15 FSM R. 83, 85 (Chk. 2007).

Since the defendant had already started serving his sentence which included probation and weekends in jail when the alleged incident occurred, since the defendant violated his terms of probation while serving his weekend jail sentence, and since the defendant's term of probation had thus started before his violation, it would be unreasonable to hold that the court had no power to revoke the defendant's probation for an incident (if proven), which, if it had occurred two days earlier or one day later, the court clearly would have had the power to revoke probation. FSM v. Kintin, 15 FSM R. 83, 86 (Chk. 2007).

Although a court may not act capriciously in revoking probation, the government does not have to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the probation terms have been violated. A court may revoke probation if it is reasonably satisfied that the terms of the probation were violated. FSM v. Kintin, 15 FSM R. 83, 86 (Chk. 2007).

Rule 11 does not apply to hearings on the revocation of probation or supervised release. Rule 11 on its face applies only to the procedures a court must follow before accepting a plea of guilty or nolo contendere. The rule is addressed to the taking of a plea, not the imposition of sentence or the revocation of probation. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 7-8 (Chk. 2008).

A probation revocation is not a stage of a criminal prosecution, but does result in the loss of liberty. Accordingly a probationer is entitled to a preliminary and a final revocation hearing. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 8 (Chk. 2008).

The due process concerns in a Rule 11 plea hearing do not apply with equal force to the context of a revocation of probation or supervised release. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 8 (Chk. 2008).

Constitutionally and procedurally, the revocation of probation, of supervised release, and of parole are treated alike. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 8 n.3 (Chk. 2008).

At a revocation hearing, not only is a Rule 11 voluntariness colloquy not required before a court may accept a defendant's admission of supervised release violations, but such a formal colloquy would be ill suited to the context of supervised release proceedings. In contrast to the adversarial setting that characterizes the offering of a guilty plea, a revocation of supervised release proceeding features the involvement of a parole officer, who is responsible for representing the defendant's best interests to the greatest extent possible consistent with the community's welfare. To superimpose formalistic procedures such as a Rule 11 colloquy onto this context, however much it may be sound practice for judges to elicit some indication of voluntariness for the record, is neither required by due process nor necessarily conducive to a more effective accomplishment of the goals of probation. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 8 (Chk. 2008).

Admissions to probation violations are not made in the course of a criminal trial and do not give rise to a different statutory offense or to an increase in punishment on the underlying conviction. Thus, by not contesting the revocation motion and having his probation revoked, a defendant would not be punished for any new crime, nor would his punishment be increased, he would only be punished for the crimes he had already pled guilty and he would be serving the sentence he received for those crimes. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 8-9 (Chk. 2008).

A probation revocation hearing is not analogous to a criminal trial or prosecution and the admission of a probation violation is not the functional equivalent of a guilty plea. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

The rights which a probationer enjoys during a revocation proceeding are simply not co-extensive with those enjoyed by a defendant during a prosecution for a substantive offense. For revocation hearings there is no constitutional (or statutory) requirement of a voluntariness colloquy similar to that required under Rule 11 and a defendant in a probation revocation hearing who admits to probation violations does not have to be informed of the maximum possible sentence because he was already informed of that when he pled guilty to the original offense or before he was sentenced. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

A guilty plea is itself a conviction, ending the controversy, but admissions of probation violations [unlike guilty pleas] do not end the controversy. The judge must still decide the more difficult issue whether the violations warrant revocation of probation. Thus, admissions of probation violations, unlike guilty pleas, do not automatically trigger sentencing. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

Unlike in a criminal prosecution where it is constitutionally required, in a probation revocation the government does not have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the probation terms have been violated. The court may revoke probation if it is reasonably satisfied that the probation terms were violated. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

The constitutional protection not to be twice placed in jeopardy does not apply to a revocation hearing because revocation and a criminal prosecution can both be based on the same transaction without implicating double jeopardy concerns. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

Since probation revocation is not a stage in a criminal prosecution, the defendant's privilege against self-incrimination is limited to where his answers might incriminate him in a future criminal proceeding. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

When the most likely reason for the arrest and later court appearance of a prisoner on work release was not to charge him with a new crime but to revoke or modify his work release conditions, the rule concerning revocation of probation, rather than the statute concerning charging a crime, is the applicable law. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2013).

When Chuuk seeks to revoke a prisoner's work release for violating a release condition, the revocation hearing, unless waived by the probationer, must be held within a reasonable time, and whenever a probationer is held in custody on the ground that he has violated a condition of his probation, he must be afforded a prompt hearing before a judicial officer to determine whether there is probable cause to hold the probationer for a revocation hearing. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2013).

Since a convicted inmate is a probationer only when he is on work release and is otherwise properly in custody, the court must conclude that a preliminary probable cause hearing within 48 hours of the inmate's arrest for violating work release conditions would be prompt within the meaning of Chuuk Criminal Rule 32.1 and that a revocation hearing within 48 hours of the arrest for violation of probation would be within a reasonable time. Chuuk therefore cannot be held civilly liable for the arrestee detention from September 8, 2010 to September 10, 2010, of a prisoner arrested for a work release violation. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2013).

Since Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 32.1 provides that the person whose release Chuuk is trying to revoke be given written notice of the alleged probation violation and informed of the evidence against him and given an opportunity to appear and to present evidence and to question adverse witnesses and be represented by counsel, when, other than counsel at the hearing, the plaintiff was not given any of these Rule 32.1 procedural rights his remedy for that failure would be a denial of Chuuk's attempt to revoke his work release. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 199-200 (Chk. 2013).

Once a prisoner arrested for a work release violation has been detained in the arrestee holding area past 72 hours without being charged with work release violations under Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 32.1, his continued detention there becomes unlawful. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 200 (Chk. 2013).

Extended jurisdiction over a defendant is proper if the revocation process has been set in motion during the probationary period. Courts have uniformly held that jurisdiction continues after the probation term so long as formal revocation proceedings were commenced within the probation term. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 338 (Pon. 2016).

Jurisdiction over a defendant can be extended for a violation committed during the probationary period, but only through the issuance of a summons, arrest warrant, or comparable court order notifying defendant of the allegations or issued before the expiration of the probationary term. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 339 (Pon. 2016).

Due process requires that the sentencing court, not the probationary officer, ultimately determine whether revocation proceedings will be initiated. The sentencing court may initiate such proceedings sua sponte based on information acquired from any source, including the probation officer who is primarily responsible for acquiring and presenting such information to the sentencing court. Since Criminal Rule 32.1 does not specify who may file a report of violation, any person may supply the court with that evidence. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 339 (Pon. 2016).

Due process requires that for a warrant to issue, the report must demonstrate "probable cause" and this determination must be made by a judicial officer before jurisdiction is extended. Thus, the sentencing court takes primary responsibility for initiating probation revocation proceedings. To delegate that authority would be tantamount to abdicating the judiciary's sentencing responsibility to the executive. Ultimately, the court retains the discretion to reject or accept the probation officer's recommendations. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 339 (Pon. 2016).

A petition for revocation, an affidavit of violation, or a notice of non-compliance, however styled, is merely a report or a motion, but does not by itself initiate revocation proceedings. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 339 (Pon. 2016).

Only the court can initiate revocation proceedings and its usual practice is to issue an order notifying the defendant of the allegations and setting a hearing. This action may be made by issuing an arrest warrant, a summons, an order, or even a margin order, but in any case the procedure requires a judicial determination of probable cause to be made before the revocation proceedings are initiated. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 339 (Pon. 2016).

If the court had formally initiated the revocation procedure before the expiration of the probationary term, jurisdiction would have been extended over the defendant and a revocation hearing held, but since the court did not do so before the defendant's probation ended on March 31, 2015, the court's jurisdiction over the defendant ended then. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 339 (Pon. 2016).

Regardless of the lesser standards that apply in revocation proceedings, due process is required. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 340 (Pon. 2016).

A defendant is entitled to a judicial determination of probable cause and to notice of those proceedings before the court can hold a delayed revocation hearing. This rule is jurisdictional. Ordinarily, when the warrant, summons, or order is executed, filed, and served, the defendant is provided with notice of this process, and the affidavit of violation is attached or adequately summarized therein, thereby fulfilling FSM Criminal Rule 32.1's procedural requirements. The court must set this process in motion before the probationary sentence's expiration. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 340 (Pon. 2016).

Once a probationary period has elapsed, the defendant has automatically satisfied the sentence imposed, but extended jurisdiction over a defendant is proper if the revocation process has been set in motion during the probationary period. FSM v. Akapito, 20 FSM R. 579, 581 (Chk. 2016).

Jurisdiction over a probationer can be extended for a violation committed during the probationary period only through the issuance of a summons, arrest warrant, or comparable court order notifying defendant of the allegations or issued before the probationary term's expiration. FSM v. Akapito, 20 FSM R. 579, 581 (Chk. 2016).

The court may revoke probation if it is reasonably satisfied that the probation terms were violated. FSM v. Akapito, 20 FSM R. 579, 581 (Chk. 2016).

If the court determines that one or more probation violations occurred but that revocation is not necessary, it will sometimes be appropriate for the court to increase the conditions under which the defendant is allowed to remain on probation. Among the possibilities is extension of the probation period, which is constitutionally permissible. FSM v. Akapito, 20 FSM R. 579, 581 (Chk. 2016).

Depending on how the analysis is approached, a defendant's probation was either extended seven years or his probation was revoked and then, rather than return him to jail, his probation was reinstated for seven years. Either way, the result is that the defendant will have another seven years within which to finish paying his restitution. FSM v. Akapito, 20 FSM R. 579, 581-82 (Chk. 2016).

A court's jurisdiction over probationary matters lasts only as long as the probationary term. Chuuk v. Rimuo, 21 FSM R. 19, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

When no action has been taken against a defendant during the term of probation, no action can be initiated after the probationary period's expiration. The "triggering event" that would properly initiate proceedings and grant a court jurisdiction after the probationary period's conclusion is generally considered to be more formal revocation proceedings such as issuing, before the probation's expiration, a summons or an arrest warrant alleging a probation violation. Chuuk v. Rimuo, 21 FSM R. 19, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

When the defendant violated probation by not reporting to his probation officer for the last four months of his probation and by not paying the court-ordered $70 restitution to the victim, but the probation officer did not inform the Attorney General's Office of the probation violations until after the defendant's probationary term had already expired, and when the defendant was not summoned, which was the proper triggering procedure to grant this court jurisdiction, until over eleven months later, such delay in initiating the proper triggering event results in the court losing jurisdiction over the matter. It therefore cannot grant a revocation motion. Chuuk v. Rimuo, 21 FSM R. 19, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

Due to the state's lack of timeliness to issue a warrant or summons during the probationary term, this court lacks jurisdiction over a probation revocation matter. Chuuk v. Rimuo, 21 FSM R. 19, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

– Sentence – Reduction of Sentence

Rule 35 of the Pohnpei Supreme Court Rules of Criminal Procedure is void because the statutes and Constitution of Pohnpei do not give the power to reduce sentences to the courts. Rather, the statutes and Constitution of Pohnpei explicitly reserve that power for the executive branch, in the person of the Governor. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 17, 24 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

There is no provision in the National Criminal Code of the Federated States of Micronesia permitting the court to modify a sentence after judgment. The rules only permit the court to reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence has been imposed. FSM v. Finey, 3 FSM R. 82, 84 (Truk 1986).

Even when mitigative effect cannot be given due to the beatings suffered by the defendants the court may consider a reduction of sentence pursuant to FSM Crim. R. 35. FSM v. Tammed, 5 FSM R. 426, 430 (Yap 1990).

In a criminal case, the appellate court may commute, reduce, or suspend the execution of sentence, but when the appellate court has held that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in considering and imposing its sentence on the defendant for the offense committed, it will find no way to commute, reduce, or suspend the sentence. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1999).

FSM Criminal Rule 35 permits the sentencing judge to reduce a sentence within 120 days after sentence is imposed. FSM v. Faen, 9 FSM R. 416, 417 (Yap 2000).

Although the court may reduce a sentence simply because it has changed its mind, it usually will not do so where nothing is shown to justify a reduced sentence that was not already considered by the court when the initial sentence was fixed. FSM v. Faen, 9 FSM R. 416, 417 (Yap 2000).

Occasions will arise when a conscientious judge, after reflection or upon receipt of new probation reports or other information, will feel that he has been too harsh or has failed to give weight to mitigating factors which properly should have been taken into account. FSM v. Faen, 9 FSM R. 416, 417 (Yap 2000).

While it is a sobering fact that any incarceration will interrupt family life, that fact alone, however, does not constitute a basis upon which to reduce defendant's sentence when the court was aware of the defendant's family situation at the time of sentencing, and the motion for reconsideration presents nothing that could not have been presented then. FSM v. Faen, 9 FSM R. 416, 417 (Yap 2000).

The court may reduce a sentence from one of incarceration to one of probation within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, or within 120 days after the court's receipt of a mandate issued upon affirmance of the judgment or dismissal of the appeal, or after entry of any order or judgment denying review of, or having the effect of upholding, a judgment of conviction. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 194, 195 (Chk. 2002).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction to hear a Rule 35 motion for reduction of sentence after a convicted criminal defendant has dismissed his own appeal. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 194, 196 (Chk. 2002).

When the relevant portion of FSM Criminal Procedure Rule 35(b) is identical to the United States Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 35(b) that was in effect until November 1, 1987, and is derived from that source, the standard applied by U.S. federal courts exercising their discretion in Rule 35(b) requests is thus persuasive. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 298, 300 (Chk. 2002).

A reduction of sentence may be granted if the court decides that the sentence unduly severe. The court may reduce the sentence simply because it has changed its mind, but usually will not do so where nothing is shown to justify a reduced sentence that was not already considered by the court when the original sentence was fixed. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 298, 300 (Chk. 2002).

A court may reconsider a sentence in light of further information presented to it in the interim between the imposition of sentence and the motion to reduce the sentence. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 298, 300 (Chk. 2002).

On an application for reduction of sentence, the applicant's commendable prison deportment is only some evidence on the issue to be resolved, neither to be disregarded nor overestimated. Also, hardship on the applicant's family may justify a sentence reduction. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 298, 300 (Chk. 2002).

A motion for reduction of sentence will be denied when the original sentence was not unduly severe, when no reason appeared for the court to change its mind, and when nothing is presented now that was not already considered at the time the sentence was imposed. FSM v. Akapito, 11 FSM R. 298, 300 (Chk. 2002).

Criminal Rule 35(b) provides for judicial discretion to reduce a sentence upon a timely motion. However, any change in the original sentence will not be lightly won by a convicted party because a court should not change a sentence when nothing is shown to justify a reduced sentence that was not already considered by the court when the original sentence was fixed. Chuuk v. Inos, 15 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A motion for reduction of sentence will be denied when the original sentence was not unduly severe, when no reason appeared for the court to change its mind, and when nothing is presented that was not already considered at the time the sentence was imposed. Chuuk v. Inos, 15 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A motion to reduce a sentence will be denied when the defendant was sentenced to incarceration for six years, four years less than the maximum sentence, and was, on its face, not unduly severe for the crime of manslaughter and when the mitigating factors were all considered in his original sentence. Chuuk v. Inos, 15 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A motion for reduction of sentence will be denied for lack of jurisdiction when a notice of appeal has been filed and the motion was not timely filed within 120 days of the entry of conviction. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Since a properly filed notice of appeal transfers jurisdiction from the trial court to the appellate court, the trial court is then divested of jurisdiction, except to take action in aid of the appeal, until the case is remanded to it. Thus, the trial court has no jurisdiction to rule on a motion for reduction of sentence after an appeal has been filed. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The standard applied by U.S. federal courts exercising their discretion in Rule 35(b) requests is persuasive. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 152 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Since the rules permit the court to reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence has been imposed, the court is without jurisdiction to rule on a motion to reduce sentence when it is filed more than 120 days from the date that the orders of conviction were entered. Chuuk v. William, 16 FSM R. 149, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The court may, within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, reduce a sentence if it has changed its mind on the terms of the sentence, but this is rarely done in the absence of justification for reducing the sentence that was not already considered by the court during the initial sentencing. FSM v. Marehalau, 16 FSM R. 505, 507 (Pon. 2009).

A motion for reduction of sentence is essentially a plea for leniency, and is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. FSM v. Marehalau, 16 FSM R. 505, 507 (Pon. 2009).

In the absence of FSM precedent, the FSM Supreme Court may consider the reasoning from the courts of other common law jurisdictions. FSM v. Marehalau, 16 FSM R. 505, 507 (Pon. 2009).

A sentence will not be reduced from imprisonment in jail to house arrest when the prisoner's doctor does not specifically assert that house arrest is necessary to alleviate any of the prisoner's medical problems and when the common jail conditions of heat in his prison cell, unhealthy food, and noise along with his state of health do not justify modifying the sentence because no showing was made that accommodation for these concerns is unavailable to him and because the court expects that the jail will make reasonable efforts to follow recommendations from the prisoner and/or his treating physician(s) regarding measures that may be taken at the jail to accommodate and alleviate the prisoner's medical conditions while he serves his sentence of imprisonment. FSM v. Marehalau, 16 FSM R. 505, 507-08 (Pon. 2009).

Chuuk Criminal Rule 35(b) provides for judicial discretion to reduce a sentence upon a timely motion, but any change in the original sentence will not be lightly won, and a motion for reduction of sentence will be denied when the original sentence was not unduly severe, when no reason appeared for the court to change its mind, and when nothing is presented now that was not already considered at the time the sentence was imposed. The burden rests on the moving party. Chuuk v. Ramey, 22 FSM R. 130f, 130h (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The court may reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, or within 120 days after receipt by the court of a mandate issued upon affirmance of the judgment or dismissal of the appeal, or within 120 days after entry of any order or judgment of the State Court appellate division denying review of, or having the effect of upholding, a judgment of conviction. Changing a sentence from one of incarceration to a grant of probation constitutes a permissible reduction of sentence under Rule 35(b). Chuuk v. Ramey, 22 FSM R. 130f, 130h (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Since the rules permit the court to reduce a sentence within 120 days after the imposition of sentence, the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction to rule on a motion to reduce a sentence when it is filed 123 days from the date that the orders of conviction were entered, and Criminal Procedure Rule 57 cannot serve as the basis for considering a motion for reduction of sentence filed after the 120-day deadline set in Rule 35(b). Chuuk v. Ramey, 22 FSM R. 130f, 130h-0i (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A motion for reduction of sentence will be denied when, even if the defendant had filed his motion within 120 days, the evidence presented still did not meet his burden to show that modification of his sentence is warranted because he did not prove that he suffers from a medical hardship which cannot be accommodated by the department of public safety and he did not prove that modifying his sentence to house arrest would not further victimize his victim's family. Chuuk v. Ramey, 22 FSM R. 130f, 130i-0j (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Under Rule 35(b), the court may reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, and changing a sentence from a sentence of incarceration to a grant of probation constitutes a permissible reduction of sentence, but any Rule 35 change in the original sentence will not be lightly won. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 427 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The court cannot reduce a sentence where nothing is shown that was not already considered by the court when the original sentence was fixed, and the court must deny a motion for modification where the original sentence was not unduly severe, no reason appeared for the court to change its mind, and nothing was presented which was not already considered when the sentence was imposed. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 427 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When the statute requires that the court impose a sentence of three years of imprisonment and that the defendant must serve a minimum of 3 years in jail, the statute controls, and the court cannot suspend the imposition or execution of the first three years of the jail sentence for a sexual assault conviction or to reduce the sentence to house arrest or to permit unsupervised release between 8 a.m. – 5 p.m. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

A reduction of sentence will be denied when the court carefully reviewed the defendant's aggravating and mitigating factors at the time of sentencing and sentenced him to the mandatory minimum, which cannot not be deemed as unduly severe for a serious felony offense; when the defendant did not present any additional factors besides those the court had already considered; and when the motion also lacked any reason to change the court's mind. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428-29 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Under Rule 35(b), the court may reduce a sentence within 120 days after the sentence is imposed, and changing a sentence from one of incarceration to a grant of probation constitutes a permissible reduction of sentence, but any Rule 35 change in the original sentence will not be lightly won. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When nothing is shown to justify a reduced sentence that the court had not already considered when it fixed the original sentence, the court cannot change the sentence and it must deny a motion for modification where the original sentence was not unduly severe, no reason appeared for the court to change its mind, and nothing was presented within the motion which was not already considered when the sentence was imposed. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When the statute requires the court to impose a sentence of three years of imprisonment and that the defendant must serve a minimum of 3 years in jail, the statute controls, and the court cannot suspend the imposition or execution of the first three years of the jail sentence for the sexual assault conviction or reduce the sentence to house arrest. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

A reduction of sentence will be denied when the court carefully reviewed the defendant's aggravating and mitigating factors at the time of sentencing and sentenced her to the mandatory minimum, which cannot not be deemed as unduly severe for a serious felony offense; when the defendant did not present any additional factors besides those the court had already considered; and when the motion also lacked any reason to change the court's mind. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 433-34 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Service

It is not unreasonable and oppressive to serve witness subpoenas one week before trial. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 585 (Chk. 2000).

A subpoena duces tecum is not unreasonable and oppressive when it requires documents that were earlier produced in response to discovery and materials and documents not discoverable under Criminal Rule 16 because it is not a valid objection that documents required by the subpoenas are not discoverable under Rule 16, but any materials already furnished in discovery need not be produced pursuant to the subpoenas. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 585 (Chk. 2000).

A subpoena will not be quashed for failure to tender a witness's travel costs "allowed by law" when the subpoena was served because, in the absence of a statute or rule setting a figure for the "fee for one day's attendance and the mileage allowed by law," the law does not allow an amount. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. 2000).

– Sexual Offenses

The constitutional requirement that proof of guilt be established beyond a reasonable doubt provides protection to persons accused of sexual offenses as well as those accused of other crimes. Complaints by women of sexual assault in Micronesia require no more corroboration than those of other witnesses in other serious cases. Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 492 (App. 1984).

When there is sufficient evidence of other force in the record to support a conviction for forced sexual penetration, there is no inconsistency in finding the use of force even without ruling that a knife compelled the victim to submit. Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 494 (App. 1984).

Forcing the victim into the nahs, holding and disrobing her, and subjecting her to sexual penetration against her will in the presence of others constituted a single contemporaneous series of events, all of which were intended to be, and were, mutually supporting the general plan to subject the victim to group rape. FSM v. Hartman (I), 5 FSM R. 350, 352 (Pon. 1992).

When the state has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the sexual penetration was made against the complainant's will, the state has not carried its burden of proof and the sexual assault charge must be dismissed. Kosrae v. Jonah, 10 FSM R. 270, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Sexual assault is intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration, or forcing another person to make a sexual penetration on himself or another or on an animal, against the other person's will, or under conditions in which the offender knows or should know that the other person is mentally or physically incapable of resisting or understanding the nature of his conduct. Sexual penetration is sexual intercourse, cunnilingus, fellatio, anal or oral intercourse, or the causing of penetration of the genital, anal, or oral opening of another to any extent and with any object whether or not there is an emission. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 99 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the state did prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did commit a sexual assault by intentionally subjecting the victim to sexual penetration, by oral intercourse, under conditions in which the defendant knew or should have known that she was mentally or physically incapable of resisting or understanding the nature of his conduct, the defendant is guilty of the offense of sexual assault. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 100 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of sexual assault requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration, against the other person's will. Sexual penetration includes the causing of penetration of the genital, anal, or oral opening of another to any extent and with any object whether or not there is an emission. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 566 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the evidence is undisputed that the defendant used his fingers to penetrate the victim's vagina, he did cause the penetration of the victim's genital opening with an object: his fingers, and the state has proven beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements of the criminal offense of sexual assault. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 566 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Kosrae statute, sexual assault is intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration, or forcing another person to make a sexual penetration on himself or another or on an animal, against the other person's will, or under conditions in which the offender knows or should know that the other person is mentally or physically incapable of resisting or understanding the nature of his conduct. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 594, 595-96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Kosrae statute, sexual penetration is sexual intercourse, cunnilingus, fellatio, anal or oral intercourse, or the causing of the penetration of the genital, anal, or oral opening of another to any extent and with any object whether or not there is an emission. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 594, 596 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Kosrae statute, sexual abuse is intentionally having sexual contact with another person who is less than thirteen years old or causing the person to have sexual contact with the offender. Sexual contact means any touching of the sexual or other intimate parts of another done with the intent of gratifying the sexual desire of either party. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 594, 596 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the sexual abuse and sexual assault statutes each require proof of a fact which the other offense does not – the offense of sexual assault requires proof of the fact of intercourse, penetration, cunnilingus or fellatio; the offense of sexual abuse requires proof of the victim's age, but does not require proof of the fact of intercourse or penetration since sexual contact through touching is adequate – the court may enter findings and a decision on both offenses without violating double jeopardy protections. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 594 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the evidence is undisputed that the defendant used his mouth and tongue to fondle and lick the six year old victim's vagina and vaginal area (actions defined as cunnilingus); when it is undisputed that she tried to resist the defendant's actions but he was too strong for her and that she was mentally and physically incapable of resisting or understanding the nature of the defendant's conduct; and when the 44 year old male defendant knew or should have known that she was mentally or physically incapable of resisting or understanding the nature of his conduct, the defendant committed cunnilingus thereby subjecting the victim to sexual penetration, and accordingly, the state proved beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements of the offense of sexual assault. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 596 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the evidence is undisputed that the defendant used his mouth and tongue to fondle and lick the victim's vagina and vaginal area, that the victim was a six year old child at the time, and that the defendant did masturbate during the time he was touching the victim, the defendant intentionally had sexual contact with a victim less than thirteen years old and he touched the victim's intimate parts with the intent of gratifying his own sexual desire. The state thus proved beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements of the offense of sexual abuse. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 596 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Sexual assault is intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration, or forcing another person to make a sexual penetration on himself or another or on an animal, against that person's will, or under conditions in which the offender knows or should know that the other person is mentally or physically incapable of resisting or understanding the nature of his conduct. Sexual penetration is sexual intercourse, cunnilingus, fellatio, anal or oral intercourse, or the causing of penetration of the genital, anal, or oral opening of another to any extent and with any object whether or not there is an emission. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 240 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Each instance of sexual penetration may be charged and prosecuted as a separate violation of Kosrae State Code, Section 13.311. Each factually distinguishable act of sexual penetration is subject to prosecution as a separate count, conviction and sentencing when the defendant committed three factually distinguishable acts of sexual penetration upon the same victim and the record reflects that each of the three acts that the defendant's conduct was separate in time and showed the defendant's new intent in his course of conduct. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 240 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

An argument that multiple acts of sexual penetration committed during a single continuous criminal episode can be subject only to conviction and sentencing on a single count is not supported by public policy. No principle exempts an accused from prosecution for all the offenses that were committed, just because the accused has the opportunity and willingness to multiply those offenses. Such a principle would encourage the more vicious and repeated criminal acts. The State Legislature could not have intended to grant immunity to a criminal who committed one sexual assault upon a minor victim, from prosecution and punishment for further criminal acts committed during the same encounter. When the defendant's conviction and sentencing upon three counts of sexual assault upon the same victim during the same criminal episode were based upon factually distinct acts and offenses, they are not multiple punishments for the same offense. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 241-42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

In Kosrae law, sexual assault is intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration, or forcing another person to make a sexual penetration on himself or another or on an animal, against the other person's will, or under conditions in which the offender knows or should know that the other person is mentally or physically incapable of resisting or understanding the nature of his conduct. Sexual penetration is sexual intercourse, cunnilingus, fellatio, anal or oral intercourse, or the causing of penetration of the genital, anal, or oral opening of another to any extent and with any object whether or not there is an emission. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 383 n.4 (App. 2006).

When the defendant committed three distinct acts upon the victim and the act of fellatio occurred at a different time and in a different location than did the acts of anal intercourse and the two acts of anal intercourse were separated by an act of battery (a bite) the defendant penetrated the victim's body at least three times and he thus, did not receive multiple punishments for a single offense. On the contrary, he received multiple punishments for multiple offenses. The State was not required to prove that a significant amount of time elapsed between the three acts of penetration. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 384 (App. 2006).

Although physical evidence or the lack thereof may be compelling in some cases, it is not a requirement of proof when the victim herself testified credibly to the alleged act and when her testimony was neither impeached nor rebutted. The lack of physical evidence may even be expected in a case charging sexual abuse because, unlike sexual assault, proof of sexual abuse does not require proof of sexual penetration, but only of sexual contact. Sexual contact is defined as any touching of the sexual or other intimate parts of a person not married to the defendant, done with the intent of gratifying the sexual desire of either party. It would be highly unlikely for a doctor examining a person days after her genitalia or intimate parts had been touched to be able to determine whether she had in fact been touched. Thus, the lack of physical evidence in a sexual abuse case is rather to be anticipated, and does not provide the defendant with a defense. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Under the pleading theory, disturbing the peace is not a lesser included offense of sexual abuse when, as pled, to prove sexual abuse, Kosrae had to prove the genital licking and the fingering and that the victim was under 13 and to prove disturbing the peace, Kosrae had to prove the genital licking and that the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed. Thus, the victim's age and the fingering were facts that Kosrae had to prove to obtain a sexual abuse conviction that it did not have to prove to obtain the disturbing the peace conviction. That the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed was a fact that Kosrae had to prove to obtain the disturbing the peace conviction that it did not have to prove for the sexual abuse conviction. Kosrae did not have to prove that the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed to prove sexual abuse. Thus, the greater offense of sexual abuse could have been committed without committing the lesser offense of disturbing the peace. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 209-10 (App. 2013).

"Sexual penetration" is a statutory element of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 152 (App. 2015).

To prove sexual assault, the victim's lack of consent is necessarily pled and proven, which would necessarily also require pleading and proving something that would constitute annoyance and disturbance to the victim. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Since sexual assault requires intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration against the other person's will and assault and battery requires striking, beating, wounding, or otherwise doing bodily harm to another, and since subjecting another person to sexual penetration against the other person's will is one of a number of ways to otherwise do bodily harm to another, assault and battery is a lesser included offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Since disturbing the peace is willfully committing any act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that she is deprived of peace and quiet, or which provokes a breach of the peace, and since every sexual assault – every intentional subjecting a person to sexual penetration against that person's will – is also the willful commission of an act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that she is deprived of peace and quiet, disturbing the peace is a lesser included offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154-55 (App. 2015).

Since the attempt to commit sexual assault merged into the completed sexual assault; since assault is a lesser included offense of assault and battery; and since assault and battery and disturbing the peace are both lesser included offenses of sexual assault, the convictions for all these lesser offenses must be vacated, and since the maximum sentence for sexual assault as a category two felony is five years, the accused's seven-year sentence, and therefore his convictions, for all offenses must be vacated and the case remanded for re-sentencing on, and thus for a conviction to be entered for, only the greater offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 155 (App. 2015).

When a statute states that "a person convicted under this Section shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than five years," has consistently been interpreted to refer to the imposition of sentences, leaving the court the opportunity to suspend the execution of its imposed jail terms for sexual abuse, but when the punishment provision was amended to "not less than five years" instead of "not more than five years" imprisonment and the punishment section's wording otherwise remains the same, therefore, although imprisonment means jail term, the mandated punishment refers to the imposition of such jail term as opposed to its execution. Therefore, courts may still suspend such sentences. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Although a trial for the sexual assault of a minor involves the government's compelling interest in the minor victim's welfare, it does not follow from this that the court may automatically close trials to the public whenever a minor victim testifies in any sexual assault trial. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 54 (Chk. 2018).

– Solicitation

One who suggests to his drinking companions that they obtain additional liquor by taking a bottle from construction laborers in the area, and who then leads his companions in an effort to attack one of the workers, solicits more possibilities than just the taking of a bottle, and is guilty of aiding and abetting the robbery of a watch and money from another construction worker carried out by his companions while the original instigator is still pursuing the first laborer. FSM v. Hadley, 3 FSM R. 281, 284 (Pon. 1987).

A solicitation charge will merge into a conspiracy charge when the person solicited agrees to the solicitation by acting on the request. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 n.5 (Chk. 2011).

Like aiding and abetting, soliciting and conspiring are all bases for criminal liability for the acts of another found in 11 F.S.M.C. 301(1)(d). FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 n.5 (Chk. 2011).

– Speedy Trial

The Pohnpeian customary practice of quickly resolving conflict resulting from the commission of an act is closely related to, if not the counterpart of the Western concept of a speedy trial. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 450 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

The statute of limitations begins to run from the commission of an offense, or when the crime is complete. Once prosecution has been commenced the statute of limitations period is no longer available to the prosecution who must then face the task of bringing the defendants to a prompt trial. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 454-55 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

The Pohnpeian concept of justice and Pohnpei Criminal Rule 48 both allow the court to dismiss a criminal case for delay even when the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial has not been violated. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 456 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

When a defendant has already agreed to a trial date that meets the constitutional requirement for a speedy trial, and no reason is offered why that date is no longer constitutionally sound, a later motion for a speedy trial may be denied. FSM v. Wu Ya Si, 6 FSM R. 573, 574 (Pon. 1994).

The time that elapses between the alleged offenses and the filing of charges is not to be considered when determining whether a defendant has been denied a speedy trial. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 191 (Chk. 2002).

Rule 48(b) is the mechanism by which a defendant may assert his constitutional right to a speedy trial, although it also embraces the court's inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution. The court's power to dismiss under Rule 48(b) is not limited to those situations in which the defendant's constitutional speedy trial right has been violated. The Rule is a restatement of the court's inherent power to dismiss a case for want of prosecution. It imposes a stricter standard of tolerable delay than does the Constitution. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 409 (Chk. 2004).

It is appropriate to look to U.S. constitutional law and its courts' interpretations, especially those interpretations existing at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention, as a guide to the intended meaning and scope of the FSM Constitution's words (such as the speedy trial right) since the provisions in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights are traceable to the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 409 (Chk. 2004).

The FSM constitutional right that the defendant in a criminal case has a right to a speedy public trial is traceable to the U.S. Bill of Rights. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 410 (Chk. 2004).

A four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations: – length of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his right, and prejudice to the defendant – is an appropriate tool to analyze the meaning of the FSM Constitution's speedy trial right. It is also an appropriate tool to use in analyzing a Rule 48(b) dismissal. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 410 (Chk. 2004).

In determining whether to exercise its discretionary power to dismiss under Rule 48(b), the court may consider the same factors relevant to a constitutional decision regarding denial of a speedy trial. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 410 (Chk. 2004).

A lengthy delay is a triggering mechanism to determine if further analysis is required to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 410 (Chk. 2004).

A four-factor balancing test – 1) length of delay, 2) the reason for the delay, 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant – is used to analyze the meaning of the FSM Constitution's speedy trial right and to determine speedy trial violations; and it is also an appropriate tool to analyze whether a Rule 48(b) dismissal for unnecessary delay in prosecution is warranted. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 499 (Chk. 2006).

To determine whether to exercise its discretionary power to dismiss under Rule 48(b), a court may consider the same factors relevant to a constitutional decision regarding denial of a speedy trial. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 499 (Chk. 2006).

A lengthy delay is a triggering mechanism to determine if further analysis is required to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 499 (Chk. 2006).

Four factors – 1) length of delay, 2) the reason for the delay, 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant – are balanced when analyzing the FSM Constitution's speedy trial right and to determine speedy trial violations; and they are also used to analyze whether a Rule 48(b) dismissal for unnecessary delay in prosecution is warranted. The court will also use the same four-factor balancing test to determine whether dismissal is appropriate under 12 F.S.M.C. 802 since that statutory right is embodied in Rule 48(b). FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 183 (Chk. 2007).

A lengthy delay is a triggering mechanism to determine if further analysis is required to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. If the delay has not been so lengthy as to be presumptively prejudicial, no further analysis is needed. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 183 (Chk. 2007).

The provisions in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights are traceable to the United States Constitution's Bill of Rights, and when a FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. The FSM speedy trial right is patterned after the United States Constitution. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 185 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

A defendant may waive his right to a speedy trial. He effects a waiver, in respect of a particular delay, when he requests it, consents to it, enters a plea of guilty, makes certain dilatory pleas or motions, or when the delay is otherwise attributable to the defendant. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 185 (Chk. 2007).

A defendant remains free to move for a severance at any time during which his speedy trial clock has not begun to run because a codefendant has not been apprehended. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 188 (Chk. 2007).

The four-factor balancing test applicable for cases implicating a defendant's right to a speedy trial or a Chuuk Criminal Rule 48(b) dismissal for unnecessary delay in prosecution is: 1) length of delay, 2) the reason for the delay, 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant. The first factor, whether there has been a lengthy delay, is a triggering mechanism for further analysis to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. A delay of one year is presumptively prejudicial and triggers application of the three remaining factors. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 386 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The provisions in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights are traceable to the United States Constitution's Bill of Rights, and when a FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. The FSM speedy trial right is patterned after the United States Constitution. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 387 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Under Kosrae Criminal Procedure Rule 48(b), the Kosrae State Court may dismiss a case if there is unnecessary delay in filing an information or if there is unnecessary delay in going to trial. Under this rule, either delay may violate a defendant's right to a speedy trial and to due process. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 603 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The factors for determining speedy trial violations are: length of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his right, and prejudice to the defendant. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 603 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The right to a speedy trial primarily protects a criminal defendant from hardship due to restraints of liberty before trial. There may also be some anxiety and the recognized risk that the memories of witnesses and the defendant will suffer. The prosecution and public are harmed by delays, too. Witnesses' loss of memory makes them vulnerable on cross-examination. And, imposing criminal sanctions in a prompt, clear manner is more likely to deter future criminal conduct. These factors are important to the fair and prompt administration of justice in all circumstances, even when the prosecution and defense agree to a continuance. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

An accused has the constitutional right to a speedy trial. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2012).

Rule 48(b) embraces the court's inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution. It is not limited to those situations in which the defendant's constitutional speedy trial right has been violated because it imposes a stricter standard of tolerable delay than does the Constitution. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2012).

The four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations is: 1) length of delay; 2) the reason for the delay; 3) the defendant's assertion of his right; and 4) prejudice to the defendant, and it is also an appropriate tool to use in analyzing a Rule 48(b) dismissal. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has the authority to dismiss a case sua sponte. This is a necessary corollary of the judge's authority to process criminal cases. Cases that have remained dormant due to inaction and that meet the standard for dismissal, may be dismissed. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Dismissal without prejudice is a relatively lenient penalty for the state's utter failure to prosecute an action, for a dismissal without prejudice does not, in theory, irrevocably deprive the state of its day in court. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the four speedy trial factors, on balance, show that the defendant has suffered a violation of his right to a speedy trial because the record does not support any legitimate reasons for the delay, because an excessive length of time that has passed coupled with the absolute lack of diligence on the prosecution's part are sufficient to assume prejudice; when the delays were a direct result of the state failing to diligently prosecute the case, the case will be dismissed. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations: 1) length of delay; 2) the reason for the delay; 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant, is also an appropriate tool to use in analyzing a Rule 48(b) dismissal. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations: 1) length of delay; 2) the reason for the delay; 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant, is also an appropriate tool to use in analyzing a Rule 48(b) dismissal. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 46 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has the authority to dismiss a case sua sponte. This is a necessary corollary of the judge's authority to process criminal cases. Cases that have remained dormant due to inaction and that meet the standard for dismissal, may be dismissed. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the record demonstrates that neither the court nor the defendant were the cause for the delay, the state's premise that the case has been waiting scheduling is flawed. If the court were to adopt such an approach, as long as the court schedules trials and other hearings, the state or the court would be free to subsequently delay a trial as long as it wished for any reason, but common sense dictates that the reason or reasons for all trial delays must have the requisite good cause existing for the delay in ultimately bringing a defendant to trial. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The case will be dismissed without prejudice for lack of prosecution when, taking a look at the state's processing of the case before the dismissal, the four speedy trial factors, on balance, show that the defendant suffered a violation of his right to a speedy trial because the record does not support any legitimate reasons for the delay, because the record does show that the delays were a direct result of the state failing to diligently prosecute the case, and because the excessive length of time that has passed coupled with the absolute lack of diligence on the state's part are sufficient to assume prejudice. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

An appropriate tool to analyze the meaning of the FSM Constitution's speedy trial right is a four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations: length of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his right, and prejudice to the defendant. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 505-06 (Pon. 2014).

Rule 48(b) is the mechanism by which a defendant may assert his constitutional right to a speedy trial, although it also embraces the court's inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution. The court's power to dismiss under Rule 48(b) is not limited to those situations in which the defendant's constitutional speedy trial right has been violated since the Rule is a restatement of the court's inherent power to dismiss a case for want of prosecution and it imposes a stricter standard of tolerable delay than does the Constitution. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

The court will use the same four-factor balancing test to determine whether dismissal is appropriate under 12 F.S.M.C. 802 since that statutory right is embodied in Rule 48(b). Accordingly, a case may be dismissed by the court if there is unnecessary delay in bringing the accused to trial. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

The four-factor balancing test applicable for cases implicating a defendant's right to a speedy trial or a Chuuk Criminal Rule 48(b) dismissal for unnecessary delay in prosecution include: 1) length of delay, 2) the reason for the delay, 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant. The first factor, whether there has been a lengthy delay, is a triggering mechanism for further analysis to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. Chuuk v. Kapwich, 19 FSM R. 548, 550 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

If there is unnecessary delay in filing an information against a defendant who has been held to answer, or if there is unnecessary delay in bringing a defendant to trial, the court may dismiss the information or complaint. Rule 48(b) is the mechanism by which a defendant may assert his constitutional right to a speedy trial, although it also embraces the court's inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 60 (Kos. 2018).

The court's power to dismiss under Rule 48(b) is not limited to those situations in which the defendant's constitutional speedy trial right has been violated. The Rule is a restatement of the court's inherent power to dismiss a case for want of prosecution and imposes a stricter standard of tolerable delay than does the Constitution. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 60 (Kos. 2018).

The four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations – 1) length of delay; 2) reason for the delay; 3) defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant – is used to analyze the Constitution's right to speedy trial and to determine speedy trial violations under a Rule 48(b) dismissal for unnecessary delay. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 60-61 (Kos. 2018).

The four-factor balancing test is used to determine whether a court may exercise its discretionary power to dismiss under Rule 48(b) and whether a dismissal is appropriate under 12 F.S.M.C. 802 since that statutory right is embodied in Rule 48(b). FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 61 (Kos. 2018).

A defendant may waive his right to a speedy trial. He effects a waiver when he requests it, consents to it, enters a plea of guilty, or when the delay is otherwise attributable to him. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 61 (Kos. 2018).

As a general rule, the state is expected to produce all evidence available to it at the time of trial. This rule exists for the purposes of judicial economy, an efficient disposition of cases, and to not delay the defendant's rights to a speedy trial. Some instances merit exception to this general rule. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130d (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Speedy Trial – Assertion of Right

Although non-assertion of the right does not constitute waiver of the speedy trial right, a court can consider whether the right was asserted, and how vigorously, in determining the reasonableness of any delay. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 185 (Chk. 2007).

For speedy trial or unnecessary delay purposes, a defendant's demand for a prompt trial will always weigh heavily in his favor, while a failure to assert the right will make it difficult for him to prove that he was denied it. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 388-89 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

For speedy trial or unnecessary delay purposes, the defendant's demand for a prompt trial will always weigh heavily in his favor, while a failure to assert the right will make it difficult for him to prove that he was denied it. But since non-assertion of the right does not constitute waiver of the speedy trial right, a court can consider whether the right was asserted, and how vigorously, in determining the reasonableness of any delay. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A defendant's failure to demand a speedy trial will weigh in favor of the prosecution. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

For speedy trial or unnecessary delay purposes, the defendant's demand for a prompt trial will always weigh heavily in his favor while a failure to assert the right will make it difficult for him to prove that he was denied it, but non-assertion of the right does not constitute waiver of the speedy trial right. A court can consider whether the right was asserted, and how vigorously, in determining the reasonableness of any delay. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When a defendant failed to object to any delay either on the basis that it was unnecessary or that it violated the defendant's right to a speedy trial, this factor will weigh in the prosecution's favor. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

For speedy trial or unnecessary delay purposes, the defendant's demand for a prompt trial will always weigh heavily in his favor, and a failure to assert the right will make it difficult for him to prove that he was denied it, and while non-assertion of the right does not constitute waiver of the speedy trial right, a court can consider whether the right was asserted, and how vigorously, in determining the reasonableness of any delay. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A defendant's failure to object to any delay either on the basis that it was unnecessary or that it violated the defendant's right to a speedy trial, will weigh in the prosecution's favor. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47-48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A defendant may waive his right to a speedy trial. He effects a waiver when he requests it, consents to it, enters a plea of guilty or when the delay is otherwise attributable to the defendant. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

Although non-assertion of the right does not constitute waiver of the speedy trial right, a court can consider whether the right was asserted, and how vigorously, in determining the reasonableness of any delay. When the defendants have raised the right and cannot be considered to be sleeping on the right, but some delay is being caused collectively by the defendants' pretrial actions, and motions, this delay is an implicit acquiescence and necessary part of any criminal action. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

Although non-assertion of the speedy trial right does not constitute waiver of the right, a court can consider whether the right was asserted, and how vigorously, in determining the reasonableness of any delay. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 61-62 (Kos. 2018).

A defendant may waive his right to a speedy trial when he requests a continuance; when he does not oppose the government's request for continuance; when he makes certain representations that result in continuance of trial; and when he files pre-trial motions beyond the set deadline. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 62 (Kos. 2018).

– Speedy Trial – Length of Delay

When only ten months have passed since the defendant was charged with twelve counts and about 8½ months since his initial appearance – not enough time has elapsed for speedy trial concerns to be implicated in a complex case, especially when trial seems imminent. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 191 (Chk. 2002).

A longer delay is tolerable for a complex conspiracy, than for an ordinary crime. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 184 (Chk. 2007).

Ten months' delay is in excess of what the Kosrae State Court would normally accept as reasonable or necessary for beginning the prosecution of misdemeanors allegedly committed in the presence of officers. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The less than four months between the information's filing and the accused's motion to dismiss is simply insufficient to trigger any presumption of a violation of the accused's speedy trial right. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2012).

Whether there has been a lengthy delay, is a triggering mechanism for further analysis to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. Since a delay of one year is presumptively prejudicial and triggers application of the three remaining factors, those factors will be considered when the case has been pending since November 2007. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When fifty-five months elapsed between the filing of the action and the order for dismissal and in that time, the prosecution failed to file anything to move the case forward and when the case languished in the courts for several years with the inactivity prompting the court to place it on the dismissal list, the appearance docket reveals scant effort to prosecute the case. The primary responsibility for prosecuting a case lies with the plaintiff. When a case has not been prosecuted in a diligent manner, prejudice is generally presumed because a case left to languish in the system, with little to no activity, will eventually erode the defendant's ability to prepare a defense. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 32-33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Brief periods of inactivity in an otherwise active prosecution are acceptable. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Brief periods of inactivity in an otherwise active prosecution are acceptable. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Only rarely would the prosecution's failure to file anything for several years be appropriate. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Whether there has been a lengthy delay, is a triggering mechanism for further analysis to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. Since a delay of one year is presumptively prejudicial and triggers application of the three remaining factors when the case has been pending since September 2, 2003, the remaining factors are triggered. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Whether there has been a lengthy delay is a triggering mechanism for further analysis to determine if a defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. Since a delay of one year is presumptively prejudicial and triggers application of the three remaining factors when the case has been pending since May 19, 2008, the remaining factors are triggered. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 46 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When it can reasonably be inferred from the lack of activity on the record that the state had been deliberately proceeding in dilatory fashion, a dismissal is more than a mere attempt to enforce a scheduling order or to "clean up the docket." Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The time that elapses between the alleged offenses and the filing of charges is not to be considered when determining whether a defendant has been denied a speedy trial. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

The statute of limitations is not the same as the right to a speedy trial, but it is a referent as to whether the case should be dismissed under the more exacting standard of unnecessary delay found in 12 F.S.M.C. 802. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

A single speedy trial "clock" governs in cases with multiple defendants. The "clock" starts to run with the most recently added defendant and any delay attributable to any one defendant is charged against the single clock, thus making the delay applicable to all defendants. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

When the criminal information was re-filed against the defendant a little over six months after the alleged incident and when the defendant has been charged with felonious crimes, not misdemeanors, it cannot be viewed as a lengthy delay that would trigger further analysis and consideration of the remaining three speedy trial factors. Chuuk v. Kapwich, 19 FSM R. 548, 550 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

A lengthy delay (the first factor) is a triggering mechanism to determine if further analysis is required. A two-year delay is presumptively prejudicial, therefore triggering the three remaining balancing factors. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 61 (Kos. 2018).

– Speedy Trial – Prejudice to Accused

Prejudice to an accused from delay may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense. Of these, the most serious is the last because the possibility an accused's inability to adequately prepare his defense skews the fairness of the entire system. Pretrial anxiety is the least significant factor and, because a certain amount of pretrial anxiety naturally exists, the accused must demonstrate that he suffered extraordinary or unusual pretrial anxiety. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 188 (Chk. 2007).

A defendant's general statement that witnesses' memories may be impaired from the delay, does not show prejudice. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 188 (Chk. 2007).

When delay is justified by a legitimate reason, such as complexity, a speedy trial claim will fail absent a demonstration of actual prejudice. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 188 (Chk. 2007).

Prejudice is not shown when the defendant does not state that his, or any particular one of his, witnesses now has an impaired memory or is no longer available, or what that witness would testify to if his or her memory were not impaired. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 188 (Chk. 2007).

The failure of a prosecution witness's memory does not support a speedy trial violation claim. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 188-89 (Chk. 2007).

When it was less than three years after the accused was charged that he was arrested in the U.S. on an FSM extradition warrant and during that whole time he was residing, working, and paying taxes in the United States or its territory and he neither resided nor worked in the accusing jurisdiction (the FSM) and had no reasonably determinable place of abode or work within the jurisdiction of the FSM after 1999 at anytime after he was charged in November, 2003 and when the claimed prejudice resulting from his alleged 1999 involvement in the charged conspiracy and his 2006 arrest was the deaths of two mayors of municipalities in Faichuk, who are alleged to be possible witnesses, but how they would have assisted the accused's defense, who was responsible only for the Northern Namoneas, is left unsaid, his motion to dismiss for unnecessary delay based on the FSM's alleged negligence in arresting him will be denied. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 378-79 (Chk. 2007).

Prejudice to an accused may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense. Of these, the most serious is the last because the possibility that an accused may not be able to adequately prepare his defense skews the fairness of the entire system. Pretrial anxiety is the least significant factor, and, because a certain amount of pretrial anxiety naturally exists, the accused must demonstrate that he suffered extraordinary or unusual pretrial anxiety. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 389 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Since the mere erosion of memory through the passage of time is not sufficient for a showing of prejudice, any claim of failing memory must be supported by a specific showing of which memories were affected and how any memory problem affects the defense. When the only witness a defendant addresses in his motion is himself and, assuming he testifies at his trial, he has not asserted that his memory is impaired other than by the passage of time, or what he would be able to testify if his memory were not impaired, his vague assertions of memory impairment alone do not constitute a showing of prejudice from the delay and this factor, therefore, favors the government. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 389 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When, although the delay of over three years was presumptively prejudicial, such presumptive prejudice alone is not determinative of the speedy trial analysis, but must be considered in the context of the other factors and when delay is justified by legitimate reasons, a speedy trial claim will fail absent a demonstration of actual prejudice. Thus, when the delays were not the result of any deliberate or negligent act of the government since it was due to necessary changes in counsel and judges, defendants' pre-trial motions, scheduling difficulties, and other reasons unrelated to the diligence of the government's prosecution, and since the accused only now raises his right to a speedy trial, and he has not shown any prejudice from the delay, he did not suffer a constitutional speedy trial violation. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 390 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When it was the prosecution's witnesses who were either unavailable or whose memory failed, the defendants were not prejudiced and may even have benefitted from the delay. When the defendants do not state that any particular defense witness now had an impaired memory or was no longer available, or what that witness would have testified to if his or her memory were not impaired, this does not show prejudice. The failure of a prosecution witness's memory does not support a dismissal for unnecessary delay claim. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 481, 482 (Chk. 2008).

Prejudice to an accused may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense. Of these, the most serious is the last because the possibility that an accused may not be able to adequately prepare his defense skews the fairness of the entire system. Pretrial anxiety is the least significant factor, and, because a certain amount of pretrial anxiety naturally exists, the accused must demonstrate that he suffered extraordinary or unusual pretrial anxiety. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the pre-trial release conditions imposed on the defendant restrict his ability to travel outside of the State of Chuuk and when this restriction of movement will be analogous to an incarceration within the state since FSM citizens are afforded a constitutional right to travel, it will weigh in favor of the pretrial incarceration, though much less than actual oppressive incarceration. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Prejudice to an accused may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense. Of these, the most serious is the last because the possibility that an accused may not be able to adequately prepare his defense skews the fairness of the entire system, and pretrial anxiety is the least significant factor, and, because a certain amount of pretrial anxiety naturally exists, the accused must demonstrate that he suffered extraordinary or unusual pretrial anxiety. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the pre-trial release conditions imposed on the defendant restrict his ability to travel outside of Chuuk and when this restriction of movement will be analogous to an incarceration within the State since FSM citizens are afforded a constitutional right to travel, it will weigh in favor of a pretrial incarceration, though much less than actual oppressive incarceration. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The court is not merely interested in "cleaning house" and dismissal is appropriate when the defendant would suffer a demonstrable prejudice or threat of prejudice from the excessive delay in the prosecution's bringing this case to trial because the case has been pending for over nine years and contains a stipulated dismissal from 2003, signed by both parties, which demonstrates the prosecution's desire to abandon the case rather than continue to prosecute, and because the prosecution has taken no action in the case since the stipulated motion's filing. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 42-43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Prejudice to an accused may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense. Of these, the most serious is the last because the possibility that an accused may not be able to adequately prepare his defense skews the fairness of the entire system, and pretrial anxiety is the least significant factor, and, because a certain amount of pretrial anxiety naturally exists, the accused must demonstrate that he suffered extraordinary or unusual pretrial anxiety. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the pre-trial release conditions imposed on the defendant restrict his ability to travel outside of Chuuk and when the defendant was also required to submit his passport, this restriction of the defendant's ability to freely move will count as an incarceration of sorts and will weigh in favor of the pretrial incarceration, though much less than actual oppressive incarceration. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When pretrial anxiety of insurmountable or extraordinary measures has not been demonstrated, it will weigh in the prosecution's favor. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Prejudice to an accused may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense. Of these, the most serious is the last because the possibility an accused's inability to adequately prepare his defense skews the fairness of the entire system. Pretrial anxiety is the least significant factor and because a certain amount of pretrial anxiety naturally exists, the accused must demonstrate that he suffered extraordinary or unusual pretrial anxiety as a result of the delay. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

When the pretrial release restrictions placed on the defendants are not onerous and do not rise to the level of oppressive and when the anxiety caused by delay in confronting trespass charges is not extraordinary, the prejudice as a result of the delay is minimal and will not impact the fairness of the trial procedure, the quality of the evidence, or jeopardize any other due processes right of the defendants. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 508 (Pon. 2014).

Prejudice to an accused may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense. Of these, the most serious is the last because the possibility that an accused may not be able to adequately prepare his defense skews the fairness of the system, and the least significant is "pretrial anxiety" because it is natural for an accused to experience some anxiety. Therefore, the defendant must demonstrate "extraordinary or unusual" pretrial anxiety. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 62 (Kos. 2018).

A defendant is not prejudiced by the delay when, although his pre-trial conditions restricted travel outside of the FSM, there was no oppressive pre-trial incarceration; when he was recently permitted to travel to Japan for official business purposes; when, although some pretrial anxiety is natural or even expected, he did not establish extraordinary or unusual pretrial anxiety; and when there is no impairment to his defense since he is fully aware of the charges against him and there is no new, different, or additional charge against him. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 62 (Kos. 2018).

– Speedy Trial – Reason for Delay

Under the Pohnpei Constitution an accused's right to a speedy trial is not violated if the delay was necessary to afford the accused the opportunity (if he chooses to exercise the customary practice) of pacifying hostilities arising from the criminal conduct between the defendant and his victims; or if the delay was necessary for the prosecutor to prepare for trial, given the complexity and other circumstances of the case; or if the delay was the result of certain excusable neglect by any agency involved in the criminal process. It is a violation of an accused's right to a speedy trial if the delay was employed by the prosecution to subject the accused to undue oppression. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 450-51 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

A delay in bringing to trial caused by a "subsisting agreement" between the government and the Public Defender's Office that was not clear as to how service of the criminal process was to be effected on defendants was excusable neglect and thus not a violation of the right to a speedy trial. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 455 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

No trial can be held while an appellate division-ordered stay is in effect, nor until after a defendant's motions to disqualify the prosecutors and to dismiss the case are decided. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 411 (Chk. 2004).

Delay caused or requested by a defendant suspends his speedy trial right, or is considered his waiver of that right, until that delay is over, even when that delay is justified. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 411 (Chk. 2004).

An accused is not denied a speedy trial when the delay is clearly attributable to the accused himself or to his counsel. Such delay includes the defendant's excused absences and the time to rule on his pretrial motions. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 411-12 (Chk. 2004).

For speedy trial or unnecessary delay purposes, a defendant cannot take advantage of delays caused by his own conduct whether or not those delays were justified. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 412 (Chk. 2004).

Since no trial can be held until after a defendant's motions to disqualify the prosecutors or to dismiss the case are decided, such motions are delays caused or requested by a defendant. Delay caused or requested by a defendant suspends his speedy trial right, or is considered his waiver of that right until that delay is over, even when that delay is justified. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 500 (Chk. 2006).

An accused is not denied a speedy trial when the delay is clearly attributable to the accused himself or to his counsel. Such delay includes the time to rule on a defendant's pretrial motions. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 500 (Chk. 2006).

A defendant's consent to a trial date that may be, or is, beyond the time when a trial would have to be held under the defendant's speedy trial right, constitutes the defendant's waiver of his right to a speedy trial. An express waiver of an accused's speedy trial right is not required if defense counsel agrees to a trial date beyond the speedy trial limit. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 500 (Chk. 2006).

For speedy trial or unnecessary delay purposes, a defendant cannot take advantage of delays caused by his own conduct or consent, whether or not those delays were justified. The delay caused by a defendant's requests, although justified since the court granted relief based on his motions, thus cannot be used by the defendant to seek a dismissal on the ground that his speedy trial right was violated or that there has been unnecessary delay in bringing him to trial. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 500 (Chk. 2006).

The court can disregard the delay during the 2005 discovery when the defendant's first assertion of his speedy trial right was not until he filed a motion to dismiss on that ground on November 6, 2006, since he had already waived any claim based on that right by consenting to the March 13, 2006 trial date. A defendant's consent to a trial date that may, or is, beyond the time when a trial would have to be held under the defendant's speedy trial right, constitutes the defendant's waiver of his right to a speedy trial. Since an express waiver of an accused's speedy trial right is not required if defense counsel agrees to a trial date beyond the speedy trial limit, the defendant thus waived any speedy trial claim for the delay before the March 13, 2006 trial date when his attorney consented to that trial date. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 185-86 (Chk. 2007).

Delay caused or requested by a defendant suspends his speedy trial right, or is considered his waiver of that right, until that delay is over, even when that delay is justified. The movant's speedy trial right was thus suspended or waived by his successful (and justified) motion to disqualify the FSM Department of Justice. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 186 (Chk. 2007).

When a defendant raises an issue before trial which makes the original trial date impractical, the reasonable period of delay caused thereby is attributable to the defendant. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 186 (Chk. 2007).

A defendant is free to take whatever actions he feels are necessary to protect his rights prior to trial. He may not, however, use the delaying consequences of those actions as a basis for claiming that his trial was improperly delayed. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 186 (Chk. 2007).

Delay caused by a defendant's successful motion to disqualify the FSM Department of Justice is attributable to him, if not wholly, at least in large part, and delay caused by his successful motion to disqualify the judge is also attributable to him. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 186 (Chk. 2007).

Although judicial economy considerations cannot be elevated to where they impair a defendant's constitutional rights, they are relevant. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 187 n.3 (Chk. 2007).

When co-defendants are charged together and will be tried together, any delay attributed to one co-defendant is attributed to all of them. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 187 (Chk. 2007).

Delay due to a co-defendant's unavailability is not attributed to the government, and this includes the time a co-defendant was a fugitive. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 187 (Chk. 2007).

A single speedy trial "clock" governs in cases with multiple defendants. The "clock" starts to run with the most recently added defendant and any delay attributable to any one defendant is charged against the single clock, thus making the delay applicable to all defendants. No other rule is practical. If every co-defendant had a different "clock," the advantages of a joint trial would be destroyed and multiple trials, with all their disadvantages, would have to be held in sequence. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 187-88 & n.5 (Chk. 2007).

When the movant's case has never been severed from his co-defendant's and the movant never sought a severance, the speedy trial "clock" therefore did not start to run until December 11, 2006, when the co-defendant made his initial appearance. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 188 (Chk. 2007).

Co-defendants share the same speedy trial "clock" and any delay attributable to one joined co-defendant is attributable to all joined co-defendants. Thus the delay that the court has already attributed to the other joined co-defendants, is also attributed to a co-defendant. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 379 (Chk. 2007).

It is the prosecution's burden to take the necessary steps to bring a criminal matter to trial, but, a defendant cannot take advantage of delays caused by his own conduct or consent, whether or not those delays were justified. Any delay resulting from a defendant's difficulty in obtaining counsel and adequately preparing a defense should not be attributed to the prosecution, and a defendant may waive his right to a speedy trial. He effects a waiver, in respect of a particular delay, when he requests it, consents to it, enters a plea of guilty, makes certain dilatory pleas or motions, or when the delay is otherwise attributable to the defendant. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Delay caused by pre-trial motions, including a successful motion to disqualify a judge or government prosecutor, is attributable to the defense and is a waiver of the speedy trial right until that delay is over even if the delay is justified. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Delays on one defendant's part are not attributable to the government and the government is not required to request severance when one defendant causes delay in the prosecution of a co-defendant. Rather, a single speedy trial "clock" governs in cases with multiple defendants. The "clock" starts to run with the most recently added defendant and any delay attributable to any one defendant is charged against the single clock, thus making the delay applicable to all defendants. No other rule is practical. If every co-defendant had a different "clock," the advantages of a joint trial would be destroyed and multiple trials, with all their disadvantages, would have to be held in sequence. A defendant is free to seek severance himself when a co-defendant causes delay in the ticking of the speedy trial "clock." Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 387 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Assuming the government is to blame for the delay, the weight to be given to the government's reason for delay depends upon what that reason is. If delay is due to a government effort to impede the defense, then, of course it will weigh heavily against the government. If the reason is neutral, such as crowded courts, it will still go against the government, but less heavily. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A valid reason justifies appropriate delay. If the court should find that the prosecution was conducted with such disregard of the appellant's interests that it can be said that the delay resulted from the prosecutor's deliberate, or at least negligent, actions and the prosecutor fails to show that the accused suffered no serious prejudice beyond that which ensued from the ordinary and inevitable delay, then the accused's speedy trial rights have been denied and the convictions must be vacated and the indictments dismissed, but if the court finds that all the delay attributable to the prosecutor was necessary for fair and just prosecution of the charge, then the conviction will stand. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When much of the delay, such as that resulting from the defendants' difficulties in obtaining and retaining counsel, timely appearing for scheduled court dates, and their pre-trial motions, is attributable to the defendants and any objection to the delay was waived; when other delays attributable to the death of the presiding judge, judge recusal for conflict of interest, and judge reassignment do not weigh heavily against the government as the delays were due either to neutral factors or the court's extraordinary circumstances (although these "neutral" delays are attributable to the government); but when none of the delay was the result of the government's deliberate or negligent action and the government was prepared to present its case in October of 2004 before defense counsel's departure for medical treatment lead to a continuance, the third factor favors a finding that there was no constitutional speedy trial violation. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A valid reason should serve to justify appropriate delay. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the prosecution states that the court is to blame for the delay and that the case has been waiting scheduling and when, assuming that this assertion is correct and that the sole reason for the delay was a result of the crowded courts, such will still go against the government, but less heavily. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the record demonstrates that neither the court nor the defendant were the cause for the delay and when the prosecution has provided no supporting evidence for the proposition that the court was to blame for the delay, the prosection simply failed to move the case forward. This is not a demonstration of good cause as required. Otherwise, as long as the court schedules trials and other hearings, the prosecution and/or the court would be free to subsequently delay a trial as long as they wished for any reason. Common sense dictates that the reason or reasons for all trial delays must have the requisite good cause existing for the delay in ultimately bringing a defendant to trial. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The dismissal of a 2007 case is more than a mere attempt to enforce a scheduling order or to "clean up the docket" when it can reasonably be inferred from the lack of activity on the record that the prosecution had been deliberately proceeding in dilatory fashion. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31-32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The better procedure is for the prosecution to insist on its need to have its day in court by filing a motion for reassignment, requesting a status conference, or scheduling of the case before a dismissal. Something more than nothing would be a necessary action to avoid dismissal. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A valid reason should serve to justify appropriate delay. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Assuming that the sole reason for the delay was a result of the crowded courts, such will still go against the government, but less heavily. But when the record demonstrates that the prosecution requested a dismissal, the premise of the prosecution's argument–that the case has been waiting scheduling–is flawed. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Common sense dictates that the reason or reasons for all trial delays must have the requisite good cause existing for the delay in ultimately bringing a defendant to trial. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the prosecution simply failed to move the case forward, a dismissal is more than a mere attempt to enforce a scheduling order or to "clean up the docket" when it can reasonably be inferred from the lack of activity on the record that the prosecution had been deliberately proceeding in dilatory fashion. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A valid reason should serve to justify appropriate delay. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The state's response is void of any demonstration of good cause as to why it has failed to prosecute the case when, rather than demonstrating a valid reason, it asks the court for permission to set trial; when the state does state that the court is to blame for the delay and that the case has been waiting scheduling and that due to the severity of the crime, it should not be dismissed; and when, assuming that the sole reason for the forty-nine month delay was a result of the crowded courts, such will still go against the government, but less heavily. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the state offers no reason for its failure to comply with the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial; when it was only after the court issued a notice that the state requested leave to begin trial; when the state's failure to make the request on its own, further demonstrates a lack of diligence in prosecuting this case; and when, on three separate occasions, the prosecutor neglected to attend the trials, dismissal without prejudice is a relatively lenient penalty for the state's utter failure to prosecute the case since a dismissal without prejudice does not, in theory, irrevocably deprive the state of its day in court. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the defendant requested discovery on June 23, 2008, and the request was never answered and when forty-nine months elapsed between the filing of the action and the order for dismissal, the case languished in the courts for several years with the inactivity prompting the court to place it on the dismissal list because the appearance docket revealed scant effort by the state's counsel to prosecute this case. Since the primary responsibility for prosecuting a case lies with the state, when a case has not been prosecuted in a diligent manner, prejudice is generally presumed because a case left to languish in the system, with little to no activity will eventually erode the defendant's ability to prepare a defense, particularly if the defendant's request for discovery, which does not require any action by the court, is never answered. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

An accused is not denied a speedy trial when the delay is clearly attributable to the accused himself or to his counsel. Such delay includes the defendant's excused absences and the time to rule on his pretrial motions. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

Delay caused or requested by the defendant suspends his right to a speedy trial, or is considered his waiver of that right, until after that delay is over, even if the delay is justified. Such delay includes the time to rule on a defendant's pretrial motions. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

When delay is justified by a legitimate reason, such as complexity, a speedy trial claim will fail absent a demonstration of actual prejudice. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

When a defendant's attorney had to file multiple enlargements due to the fact that he could not contact his client, this delay is attributable to the defendant's own actions and is applicable to all co-defendants in a joint trial. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

When the delay is reasonably attributed to the complexity and unusual character of a case of first impression, to the appointment of counsel, to the defendants' own actions, and to a non-intentional change in the lead investigator, no unnecessary delay has shown on the prosecution's part, nor any intent to prejudice the defendants thereby. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 507 (Pon. 2014).

When, due to the complexity of jurisdictional questions of first impression, combined with coordinating the activity of all four defendants, and to the lead investigator's death, no intentional delay can be attributed to the prosecution, the defendants' right to a speedy trial has not been violated under the Constitution, nor has it been violated under the more exacting standard of "unnecessary delay" under 12 F.S.M.C. 802. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 508 (Pon. 2014).

An accused is not denied a speedy trial when the delay is clearly attributable to the accused himself or his counsel. Such delay includes the defendant's excused absences and the time to rule on his pretrial motions. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 61 (Kos. 2018).

Delay caused or requested by a defendant suspends his speedy trial right, or is considered his waiver of that right, until that delay is over. A defendant cannot, for the purposes of speedy trial or unnecessary delay, take advantage of delays that he has caused, even if those delays were justified. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 61 (Kos. 2018).

When most of the delay is attributable to the defendant's motions that were filed beyond the set deadline for pre-trial motions and when certain actions by the defendant throughout the case's procedural course also resulted in continuance of trial, the defendant, even if those delays were justified, cannot take advantage of the delay that stemmed from his own actions for the purposes of a speedy trial or unnecessary delay objection. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 61 (Kos. 2018).

– Speedy Trial – When Right Attaches

The right to a speedy public and impartial trial attaches either when an information or complaint has been filed with the court and service of that information or complaint has been effected upon the one named as the accused; or when an accused has been arrested by means of an arrest warrant or other process issued by a judicial officer. "Other process" includes summons, writ, warrant, mandate or other process issuing from or by the authority of the court to have the defendant named therein appear before it at the appointed time. It does not refer to a warrantless arrest. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 451-53 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

An accused's speedy trial right attaches once he or she is accused – that is, when the criminal information charging the accused with a crime has been filed. The time that elapses between the alleged crimes and the filing of charges is not to be considered when determining whether a defendant has been denied a speedy trial. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2012).

The right to a speedy trial does not attach until the information, or other process is issued. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

– Standard of Proof

All elements of a crime need not themselves be criminal in order for the combination of those elements to be criminal. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 33 (Pon. 1981).

The Constitution's Due Process Clause requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt as a condition for criminal conviction in the Federated States of Micronesia. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 217-23 (App. 1982).

As a matter of constitutional due process, a trial court presented with an alibi defense should consider evidence concerning the alibi along with all other evidence and shall not find the defendant guilty if after considering all of that evidence, the judge feels there is a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 223-25 (App. 1982).

Unsubstantiated speculations raised after trial are not sufficient to raise reasonable doubt as to a person's guilt in the light of eyewitness testimony. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 225-27 (App. 1982).

The government's burden in criminal prosecutions is to show guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 441 (App. 1984).

The constitutional requirement that proof of guilt be established beyond a reasonable doubt provides protection to persons accused of sexual offenses as well as those accused of other crimes. Complaints by women of sexual assault in Micronesia require no more corroboration than those of other witnesses in other serious cases. Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 492 (App. 1984).

A gun with a defective trigger is a firearm under 11 F.S.M.C. 1204(4). The statute's purpose may not be evaded by such simple expedients as dismantling the weapon, maintaining weapons and ammunition in separate places, removing one easily replaceable part, or other similar ploys. Under the statute, current operability is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a firearm. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R.

27, 34 (App. 1985).

The government in any criminal case is required, as a matter of due process, to prove all elements of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 35 (App. 1985).

Statutes which provide a defense in the form of exceptions to a general proscription do not reduce or remove the government's traditional burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt every fact necessary to constitute the offense. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 35 (App. 1985).

The government ultimately bears the burden of disproving the applicability of a statutory exception when it is properly presented as a defense. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 35 (App. 1985).

Each item of evidence is merely a building block. The standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt is not applied to any specific item of evidence to determine admissibility but to all of the evidence collectively to determine whether all elements of the crime have been established beyond a reasonable doubt. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 47 (App. 1985).

Mental condition defense established by 11 F.S.M.C. 302(1), and other affirmative defenses, do not lift from government the burden of establishing all essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 312 (App. 1988).

In order for trier of fact to be free to choose between the lesser offense, manslaughter, or a greater degree of homicide, there must be a factual element, the resolution of which will determine whether the greater or lesser offense is applicable. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 318 (App. 1988).

The burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt is on the government as to all essential elements of a crime charged. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 479 (Pon. 1988).

Where two government witnesses testified that they knew the defendant and the witnesses were policemen who participated in the search of the defendant's property in the defendant's presence, the trial court was justified in reaching the finding, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was the one who committed the crime even though there was no in-court identification or description of the defendant. Kallop v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 170, 176 (App. 1989).

In a murder case, the defendant's voluntary admissions, including an express statement to his mother that he had committed the crime and asking others if the victim had been killed at a time before the body had been found, corroborated by finding the body slain in a manner consistent with the defendant's statement, constitute evidence sufficient to permit a reasonable trier of fact to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant in fact killed the victim. Kimoul v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 53, 58 (App. 1991).

Failure to raise objections which must be made prior to trial constitutes a waiver of objections, FSM Crim. R. 12(f). Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 159 (App. 1991).

A variance – a discrepancy or disagreement between allegations of the charging instrument and the proof adduced at trial – will be tolerated as long as it is not material to the basic elements of the crime charged. Otto v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 218, 221-22 (App. 1991).

Variance between charge of striking police car windshield with fists and evidence adduced at trial of damaging headlights with a beer can is not so misleading and prejudicial that defendant was denied a fair trial or suffered from a lack of notice as to the evidence to be offered at trial on a charge of damaging the property of another. Otto v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 218, 222 (App. 1991).

Where evidence offered at trial showed the defendant was hitting vehicle and that there was damage to vehicle and that defendant was at and participated in illegal roadblock the trial court, acting reasonably, could be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt. Otto v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 218, 223 (App. 1991).

Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is not established in a case in which only one witness testifies as to the presence of an element of the crime (live birth) and he expresses assumptions and has difficulty in being exact or sure, and states that the infant was either born alive or its heart was beating. Welson v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 281, 285-87 (App. 1992).

In a case in which the existence of an element of the crime (live birth) was not established because of the uncertainty of the evidence on this point, and in which a review of all the evidence yields the possibility that the infant was dead at the time the defendant disposed of the body, a reasonable doubt would exist in the mind of the trier of fact as to the element of live birth. Welson v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 281, 287 (App. 1992).

The Chapman rule, which holds that a constitutional error can be found harmless only when it is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, is suitable for the FSM. Jonah v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 308, 314 (App. 1992).

When there are verdicts that are inconsistent to such an extent that an essential element cannot be proven beyond a reasonable doubt a resulting conviction is reversible error. Thus when someone is convicted of a charge for which an essential element is being aided and abetted by another and that other is acquitted of being an aider and abettor the conviction is reversible error for failure of proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the essential element of being aided and abetted. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 300-01 (App. 1993).

The government has the burden of proof in criminal cases, and must prove each element of the crimes charged beyond a reasonable doubt. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 171 (Pon. 1997).

Proof of guilt may be by either direct evidence, circumstantial evidence or both. Direct evidence is evidence, which if believed, proves the existence of facts in issue without inference or presumption. Circumstantial evidence is evidence of facts and circumstances from which the existence or nonexistence of facts in issue may be inferred. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 171 (Pon. 1997).

The burden was on the government to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that defendants' interference with the crops at issue was unlawful; if there was any doubt about defendants' claim of right, defendants should have been acquitted on the malicious mischief charge. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 406-07 (App. 1998).

Where a person claims to have acted in the lawful exercise of his rights, the burden is on the government to show that his interference with the property was unlawful; if the evidence leaves any room for reasonable doubt as to the accused's claim of right, the accused should be acquitted. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 407 (App. 1998).

Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is the constitutionally-mandated standard to sustain a criminal defendant's conviction. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

In order for a warrant or a criminal summons to issue, the affidavits, or affidavits and exhibits, attached to a criminal information should make a prima facie showing of probable cause, not proof beyond a reasonable doubt. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

A defendant's intention must be inferred from what he says and what he does. An inference is not permitted if it cannot reasonably be drawn from the facts in evidence. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Eyewitness testimony is not necessary to prove each fact or element of a criminal offense. Facts may be shown by circumstantial evidence. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Proof of guilt may be by either direct evidence, circumstantial evidence or both. Direct evidence is evidence, which if believed, proves the existence of facts in issue without inference or presumption. Circumstantial evidence is evidence of facts and circumstances from which the existence or nonexistence of facts in issue may be inferred. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609-10 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When considering whether an allegation of variance warrants relief, the court must examine whether the variance was material or prejudicial, that is, whether it affected the substantial rights of the accused. Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded. The issue is whether the accused is given sufficient notice of the charges against him so as to be able to present his defense and not be taken by surprise by the evidence offered at the trial and also to be protected against another prosecution for the same offense. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 85, 87 (Chk. 2004).

When the plain meaning of the defendant's letters clearly refers to both the state and national candidates in the March 2, 1999 election, that is sufficient evidence that there was a national election on March 2, 1999. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 48-49 (App. 2007).

There was clearly sufficient evidence to support the trial court's findings that the defendant sent his February 19 and 27, 1999 letters in his capacity as a public officer, specifically as the mayor of Udot Municipality, when the letters were signed: "T.C. Wainit, Mayor, Udot Fonuweisom." Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 49 (App. 2007).

When there is nothing present in the defendant's letters to suggest that either letter was sent by accident, by an unauthorized person, or was in any way unintentional on the defendant's part, the trial court was correct in its finding that the defendant acted willfully. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 49 (App. 2007).

There was sufficient evidence apart from the field sobriety tests to sustain the conviction for driving under the influence because there were testimonies that the defendant appeared drunk and had the smell of alcohol on him, together with the fact that the defendant exhibited these characteristics when he emerged from his vehicle carrying an open can of Budweiser after going through a stop sign and colliding with another vehicle. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 127 (App. 2007).

A trier of fact is entitled to rely on properly admitted evidence and reasonable inferences drawn from that evidence. A reasonable inference is that the accused, who smelled of alcohol and had appeared to be intoxicated, would not have emerged from a vehicle immediately after an accident carrying an empty Budweiser can with him when he had this can in hand when he was on the road, which is a public place. Thus there was sufficient evidence to convict the defendant for possessing an open can of alcohol in a public place. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 127 (App. 2007).

When a reasonable fact finder could find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants employed unreasonable force against the victim when he was no longer a threat to them, evidenced by their use of dangerous weapons against the victim when he no longer had a machete and their simultaneous beating of him when he was no longer offering resistance, the government has presented sufficient evidence that the victim's killing was unlawful. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If a reasonable fact finder could find beyond a reasonable doubt that during the extended period between the victim's initial assault and the defendants' finally relenting from their beating of him, during which the defendants had ample time to observe that the victim was suppliant, injured and helpless, then either the defendants had, in fact, regained their senses or reasonable persons in the defendants' situation would have cooled off and regained their senses. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Conflicting testimony may be admitted, and it is the responsibility of the finder of fact to weigh all the answers and resolve the conflict, and it is well established that the weighing of contradictory evidence is strictly within the trial court's discretion. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 559 (App. 2008).

To sustain a conviction, each element of a charge must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 78 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A variance is a discrepancy or disagreement between the allegations of the charging instrument and the proof adduced at trial. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 245 (App. 2009).

When considering whether a variance warrants relief, the court must examine whether the variance was material or prejudicial, that is, whether it affected the substantial rights of the accused. Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights is disregarded. The issue is whether the accused is given sufficient notice of the charges against him so as to be able to present his defense and not be taken by surprise by the evidence offered at the trial and also to be protected against another prosecution for the same offense. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 245 (App. 2009).

When the prosecution failed to incorporate the accused's alleged possession of a rifle into its prosecution even after witness testimony, choosing instead to remain within the parameters of its original allegations all the way through closing argument, namely that the accused's presence in the boat alone supported conviction, it is reasonable to conclude that the accused was never given proper notice of his alleged conduct, and, even if the accused was given notice of the conduct underlying the violation after the witness testimony, such notice coming midway through the FSM's case-in-chief is not sufficient notice for the accused to prepare his defense against the factual allegations ultimately used to convict him. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 246 (App. 2009).

Allegations in the information alleging a criminal violation must be proven in order to obtain a conviction. It is not sufficient that the evidence show a violation of the statute specified in the information if the actual violation is different from the one alleged. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 247 (App. 2009).

Under the permissive inference type of criminal statutory presumptions, the prosecution is not relieved of the burden of persuasion since the presumption is effective only so long as there is no substantial evidence contradicting the conclusion flowing from the presumption, and the factfinder is left free to accept or reject the inference. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2009).

A presumption in a criminal statute creates a permissive inference. Because this permissive presumption leaves the trier of fact free to credit or reject the inference and does not shift the burden of proof, it affects the application of the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard only if, under the facts of the case, there is no rational way the trier could make the connection permitted by the inference. This is the manner in which the FSM Supreme Court should and will handle a criminal presumption that is "prima facie evidence." FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533-34 (Chk. 2009).

A motion for a pretrial acquittal on conspiracy counts based on the government's failure to prove an agreement will be denied as premature because the existence of such an agreement is subject to proof at trial. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The government has the burden of proving that an accused's statement is voluntary and thus admissible and must show this by a preponderance of the evidence. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 510 (Pon. 2014).

There is a substantial difference between the quantum of proof necessary to constitute sufficient evidence to establish probable cause and that necessary to support a conviction. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 636, 638 (Pon. 2015).

When an information's language is more specific than the language of the statute under which the offense is charged, the prosecution must establish those specific facts in addition to a violation of the statute. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165-66 (App. 2015).

The report of a trained and experienced fisheries observer on the scene and his later deposition testimony is more than sufficient to show probable cause – that it was more likely than not that a violation occurred – when, although the observer never actually saw a crew member throw the trash overboard, the court can infer from the circumstantial evidence that it is more likely than not that that is what occurred. Whether the government will be able to prove that beyond a reasonable doubt, a higher standard, is a matter left for trial. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

The element that escalates contempt to criminal status is the level of willfulness associated with the conduct. Criminal intent is a specific intent to consciously disregard an order of the court. Criminal intent is defined by 11 F.S.M.C. 104(4) as acting with the conscious purpose to engage in the conduct specified. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

Civil intent can be demonstrated by general intent, or by knowledge defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(5) as being aware of the nature of the conduct or omission which brings the conduct or omission within the provision of the code. This standard is expressly distinguished from mere negligence, a negligent act is one born of inattention or carelessness – the opposite of an intended act. An act, not willfully intending the result, creating a substantial risk of the unlawful result, is not an act done purposefully or intentionally. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM and Chuuk Constitutions both provide criminal defendants the protections of due process, which require the state to prove their case beyond a reasonable doubt. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

The government bears the burden to prove each element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt, and in proving guilt, the government may use either direct evidence, circumstantial evidence, or both. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When the doctrine of transferred intent applies, the burden of proof still remains on the government, but the state need not prove the defendant intended to harm the actual victim, but merely the intended victim. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

The state needs only to prove intent as to one of the intended victims and does not have to prove intent specifically directed at each of the actual victims. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Before a defendant can be convicted, it must first be shown that he had the intention to cause great bodily harm to someone. Merely because he shot the wrong person makes his crime no less heinous. It is only necessary that the state of mind exist, not that it be directed at a particular person. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Evidence that the defendant suffered from a physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect is admissible whenever it is relevant to prove that the defendant did or did not have a state of mind which is an element of the crime. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 337 n.2 (Chk. 2019).

"Clear and convincing evidence" is the standard of proof required to prove the existence of a defendant's physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338 n.5 (Chk. 2019).

When the court has found that clear and convincing evidence proved the existence of the accused's mental disease, disorder, or defect when he committed the crime, the court is required by statute to enter a judgment of acquittal due to mental disease, disorder, or defect. But the court's responsibility does not end there. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338-39 (Chk. 2019).

– Statutes of Limitation

The statute of limitations begins to run from the commission of an offense, or when the crime is complete. Once prosecution has been commenced the statute of limitations period is no longer available to the prosecution who must then face the task of bringing the defendants to a prompt trial. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 454-55 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

The day upon which a crime is committed is to be excluded in the computation of the statute of limitations. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 106 (App. 1993).

Where the prosecution of an underlying offense is not time-barred, prosecution of conspiracy to commit that offense is not time-barred even if part of the conspiracy extends back in time to a point that would be time-barred. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 107 (App. 1993).

A prosecution for criminal contempt will not be dismissed on statute of limitations grounds when the information is based in part on acts within the three month statute of limitations for contempt. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 638 (Chk. 1996).

The government will be permitted to file an amended information to dismiss those counts for which the statute of limitations has expired. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 545 (Pon. 1998).

The statute of limitations is no part of any definition of probable cause. Probable cause is present when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. That the violation of law occurred within the statute of limitations is not an element that must be shown for probable cause to exist. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 108 (Chk. 2003).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which the defendant must raise either by motion under Criminal Procedure Rule 12(b) or later at trial by a plea of not guilty. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 108 (Chk. 2003).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 105(3)(b) even if the three-year time limitation to prosecute a felony or the two-year time limit to prosecute a misdemeanor has expired, a prosecution may nevertheless be commenced for any offense based on misconduct in office by a public officer or employee at any time when the defendant is in public office or employment or within two years thereafter, but in no case will this provision extend the period of limitations otherwise applicable by more than three years. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 109 (Chk. 2003).

Although statutes of limitation on criminal prosecutions must be accorded a rational meaning in harmony with the obvious intent and purpose of the law, such statutes must be liberally construed in favor of the accused, and exceptions from the benefits of such statutes must be construed narrowly or strictly against the government. The rule of strict construction will not justify an unreasonable interpretation – one contrary to the law's intent. The rule of strict construction simply means that ordinary words are to be given their ordinary meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 109-10 (Chk. 2003).

The right not to be put into jeopardy once when barred by the statute of limitations is not a constitutional right, but rather one created by statute. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2003).

Prosecution for a petty misdemeanor must be commenced within six months after it is committed. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 501 (Pon. 2004).

Dismissal of a case is warranted when the statute of limitation applicable to both of the counts in the criminal information had elapsed before the case was filed. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 504-05 (Pon. 2004).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which an accused must raise either by motion under Criminal Procedure Rule 12(b) or later at trial by a plea of not guilty. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 536 (Chk. 2005).

Under the earlier criminal code, prosecutions for felonies punishable by ten years or less in jail had to start within three years after the offense was committed, and misdemeanor prosecutions within two years after the offense was committed, except as otherwise provided in 11 F.S.M.C. 105. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 537 (Chk. 2005).

Under the earlier criminal code, even if the time limitation to prosecute had expired, a prosecution may nevertheless be commenced for any offense based on misconduct in office by a public officer or employee at any time when the accused was in public office or employment or within two years thereafter, but in no case can the period of limitations otherwise applicable be extended by more than three years. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 537 (Chk. 2005).

Although statutes of limitation on criminal prosecutions must be accorded a rational meaning in harmony with the law's obvious intent and purpose, such statutes must be liberally construed in favor of the accused, and exceptions from the benefits of such statutes must be construed narrowly or strictly against the government. The rule of strict construction will not justify an unreasonable interpretation – one contrary to the law's intent. The rule of strict construction simply means that ordinary words are to be given their ordinary meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 537 (Chk. 2005).

By deliberately using a different term, "public officer," in 11 F.S.M.C. 105(3)(b) from the ones defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(11) and in 11 F.S.M.C. 1301(2), the drafters can only have intended that the meaning be different, and, by not defining it, that the term's meaning should be its common, ordinary English language meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 538 (Chk. 2005).

A statute's policy is to be found in the legislative intent. And it is the cardinal rule in the construction of statutes that such intent is, itself, to be found solely in the statute's words, if they are free from ambiguity and express a sensible meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 539 (Chk. 2005).

Section 105(3)(b)'s object was to apply the statute of limitations exception to all public officers, not just to those defined as "public servants" in section 104(11) or as "public officials" in section 1301(2). This was 11 F.S.M.C. 105(3)(b)'s plain and unambiguous meaning. If the drafters had intended to restrict the section 105(3)(b) exception to just those persons that had been defined as "public servants," or as "public officials" they could easily have inserted either term into section 105(3)(b) as they so easily inserted "public servants" in so many other criminal code sections or as they so easily used "public officials" in chapter 13. Instead, the drafters deliberately chose the term "public officer" for section 105(3)(b). FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 539 (Chk. 2005).

Section 105(3)(b) "public officer" exception to the statute of limitations applied to persons based upon their status as public officers – persons holding posts and exercising governmental functions. It did not matter whether that status was defined and bestowed upon a person by the national government or by another level of government. It only mattered that the person held that status. That the term "public officer" cannot possibly refer to state and municipal public officials since the national government lacks the constitutional power to define those offices and to determine or install those officials is a frivolous and misplaced contention because national laws are often applied to persons based on their status, even when that status is defined solely by another government. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 539 (Chk. 2005).

When the public officer tolling exception was part of a provision of general application to the whole criminal code, not to just one portion and the information alleges that the accused used his office to commit the charged offenses, that section did not require that the accused additionally actually use the office to conceal the wrongful act(s), the statute's application was triggered by the accused's alleged use of his office to commit allegedly national offenses. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 541 (Chk. 2005).

The section 105(3)(b) exception to the criminal statute of limitations applied to any public officer in any level of government in the FSM who, based on the public officer's misconduct in office, was charged with the commission of a national criminal offense. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 541 (Chk. 2005).

The time limitation does not run during any time when a prosecution against the accused for the same conduct is pending in the jurisdiction. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 541 (Chk. 2005).

As a general principle, the subsection 105(4)(b) tolling the statute of limitations while a prosecution is pending operated independently of the public officer tolling exception in subsection 105(3) because it was applicable to all limitations on criminal prosecutions. Thus, the time tolled by the operation of subsection (4)(b) cannot be included in the subsection (3)(b) three-year limit to the public officer extension of the statute of limitations. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 541-42 (Chk. 2005).

FSM law provides that a prosecution commences when an information is filed, and the filing of an information is sufficient for statute of limitations purposes. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 131 (Chk. 2006).

Conspiracy is regarded as a continuing offense, hence, the statutory period of limitation therefor begins to run from the time of the last provable overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 134 (Chk. 2006).

Conspiracy is punishable by imprisonment for not more than one-half the maximum sentence which is provided for the most serious offense which was the object of the conspiracy if the maximum is less than life imprisonment. When the most serious offense charged as an object of the conspiracy carries a maximum of twenty years' imprisonment, the conspiracy charge thus has a maximum sentence of ten years and therefore a limitations period of three years. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 134-35 (Chk. 2006).

For any offense based on misconduct in office by a public officer or employee at any time when the defendant is in public office or employment or within two years thereafter, the period of limitation otherwise applicable can be extended by up to three years. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 135 (Chk. 2006).

Since the maximum penalty for bribery is five years' imprisonment, the general limitation period for bribery is thus three years. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 135 (Chk. 2006).

When the statute of limitations is three years for a felony charge and two years for a misdemeanor charge and under the law applicable for offenses in 1999, the statute of limitations was extended, even if the time limitation to prosecute had expired, for any offense based on misconduct in office by a public officer or employee at any time when the defendant is in public office or employment or within two years thereafter, but in no case will this provision extend the limitations period otherwise applicable by more than three years. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 164, 170 (Chk. 2006).

When, under the 1982 national criminal code, the statute of limitations for an offense which is punishable by imprisonment for more than ten years was six years after it is committed and for any other felony was three years, and when the penalty for a person convicted under section 601, if the value of the property or service was $5,000 or more, was s "imprisonment for not more than ten years," the applicable limitations period was three years except as otherwise provided in Title 11, section 105. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 312 (Chk. 2006).

The limitations period for any offense based on misconduct in office by a public officer or employee at any time when the defendant is in public office or employment or within two years thereafter can be extended by no more than three years. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 312 (Chk. 2006).

Although statutes of limitation on criminal prosecutions must be accorded a rational meaning in harmony with the obvious intent and purpose of the law, such statutes must be liberally construed in favor of the accused, and exceptions from the benefits of such statutes must be construed narrowly or strictly against the government. But the rule of strict construction does not justify an unreasonable interpretation – one contrary to the law's intent. The strict construction rule simply means that ordinary words are to be given their ordinary meaning. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 313 (Chk. 2006).

The common and approved English language usage of the term "public officer" is a person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. Strictly construing the term "public officer" by using only its plain, ordinary, and unambiguous meaning (or in the code's terms "its common and approved usage"), a mayor falls within the public officer tolling provision to the criminal statute of limitations, since the plain, unambiguous, and ordinary meaning of "public officer" (an ordinary term for which no construction is required) is that the term includes any person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 313 (Chk. 2006).

Under the 2001 criminal code, the applicable limitations periods for murder or treason is any time; for a crime which is punishable by imprisonment for ten years or more is six years or within two years after it is discovered or with reasonable diligence could have been discovered, whichever is longer; and for any other felony is three years or within one year after it is discovered or with reasonable diligence could have been discovered, whichever is longer. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 314 (Chk. 2006).

When the maximum possible penalty for an alleged offense is ten years and the limitations period for offenses "punishable by imprisonment for ten years or more" is six years, the applicable limitations period is six years. The phrase, "ten years or more" does not mean that the maximum possible sentence must be more than ten years. The disjunctive "or" clearly means that, for subsection 105(2) to apply, a maximum possible sentence of only ten years is enough. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 314 (Chk. 2006).

Any request in 2005 for an order to show cause why a defendant should not be held in criminal contempt for failure to appear at the start of the February 5, 2001 trial as required by the witness subpoena served on him, comes much too late since anyone charged with criminal contempt must be charged within three months of the contempt. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 355, 361 (Pon. 2006).

Nothing in Title 11 suggests that the Congress intended the tolling provision set forth at Section 105(3) to apply only to "public officers" acting at the national level. Indeed, when the context of the sections of the statutes relating to crimes against "public servants" and offenses committed by "public officials," clearly shows a congressional intent to limit those sections to federal officers and employees, the trial court correctly rejected efforts to limit the tolling provision for offenses committed by public officers at the national level, as Congress clearly has the power to define crimes and criminals in all states, including the states' political subdivisions. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 48 (App. 2007).

There is no authority to limit the power of Congress to define those persons affected by application of a statute of limitation, including any applicable tolling provisions. The Constitution vests in Congress the plenary power to enact laws of general application throughout the entire nation. The statute of limitations, including tolling provision for public officers, is one such law. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 48 (App. 2007).

The FSM tolling statute for criminal prosecutions does not require that the accused be fleeing justice. It only requires that the accused either be continuously absent from the jurisdiction or that has no reasonably determinable place of abode or work within the jurisdiction. Maintaining a home in Chuuk for his family there, but residing and working abroad and having no reasonably determinable place of abode or work within the FSM, cannot remove the accused from the operation of the statute. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 379 & n.4 (Chk. 2007).

Prosecution for felonies other than murder, treason, or those punishable by imprisonment for ten years or more, must be commenced within three years after it is committed, or within one year after it is discovered or with reasonable diligence could have been discovered, whichever is longer. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 532 (Chk. 2008).

When the maximum possible penalty for an alleged offense is ten years and the limitations period for offenses "punishable by imprisonment for ten years or more" is six years, the applicable limitations period is six years because the phrase, "ten years or more" does not mean that the maximum possible sentence must be more than ten years since the disjunctive "or" clearly means that, for subsection 105(2) to apply, a maximum possible sentence of only ten years is enough. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 533 (Chk. 2008).

The time periods running from "discovery" of the offense and the date the offense was committed are subject to the qualifier, "whichever is longer." The court will not read into the statute a qualifier of "whichever is shorter" because this would be directly contrary to the statute's plain meaning. The longer of the two possible calculations of the statutory limitations period applies. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 533 (Chk. 2008).

A prosecution has been properly "commenced" when the information was filed within the applicable time period. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 533 (Chk. 2008).

The filing of an information or complaint is one point in time where the statute stops, or tolls, the limitations period from running. The other event that may commence a prosecution and thus toll the statute of limitations is when an arrest warrant, summons or other process is issued, provided that reasonable attempts are made at service. The limitations period is also tolled during any time when the accused is continuously absent from the complaining jurisdiction or has no reasonably determinable place of abode or work within the jurisdiction. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 533 (Chk. 2008).

When two independent actions were both overt acts committed by a member, or members, of the conspiracy within the three years preceding the information's filing, the government filed its information within the applicable statute of limitations. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 554 (App. 2008).

Kosrae State Code §13.106(2)(b) imposes a requirement that prosecutions for misdemeanors begin with one year of when the alleged crime was committed. This statute recognizes that a misdemeanor prosecution commenced after one year generally infringes on a defendant's right to a speedy trial. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When a prosecution was commenced within the time limits set by Kosrae State Code §13.106(2)(b), there is no statutorily-required dismissal. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Since, under Kosrae Criminal Rule 12, any defense, objection, or request which is capable of determination without the trial of the general issue may be raised before trial by motion, this rule encompasses a motion raising a statute of limitations defense. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228d (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which the defendant must raise either by motion under Criminal Procedure Rule 12(b) or later at trial by a plea of not guilty. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228d (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The statute of limitations begins to run from the commission of an offense, or when the offense is complete. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A prosecution is commenced when an information is filed in court. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The dismissal of a case is warranted when the statute of limitations applicable to the count in the criminal information elapses before the case is filed. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Under the Kosrae State Code, a prosecution for a felony must be commenced within three years after the alleged crime was committed but an extension of the statute of limitations is allowed when an element of the offense is fraud. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the defendant was charged with two counts of forgery, both containing the element of fraud, the statute of limitations is, since fraud is an element of the crime, extended to allow prosecution to commence the action within one year of the discovery of the offense by the aggrieved party, but not in any case is the period of limitation otherwise applicable extended by more than three years. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although when an element of the crime is fraud, the statute of limitations allows a prosecution to commence within one year of an aggrieved party's discovery of an offense, the limitation period cannot be extended by more than an additional three years. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the statute of limitations to both counts in a criminal information had elapsed before the case was filed, the dismissal of the case is warranted. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The underlying reason for having a statute of limitations, which is a statutory time beyond which the action may not be brought, is that the enactment of such laws concerns the belief that there is a point beyond which a prospective defendant should no longer need to worry about the possible commencement in the future of an action against him or her and that the law disfavors stale evidence. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228f (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although statutes of limitation on criminal prosecutions must be accorded a rational meaning in harmony with the obvious intent and purpose of the law, such statutes must be liberally construed in favor of the accused, and exceptions from the benefits of such statutes must be construed narrowly or strictly against the government. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228f (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A prosecution for a misdemeanor must be commenced within two years after it is committed. A prosecution is commenced either when an information or complaint is filed or when an arrest warrant, summons or other process is issued, provided that reasonable attempts are made at service. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

The statute of limitations is not the same as the right to a speedy trial, but it is a referent as to whether the case should be dismissed under the more exacting standard of unnecessary delay found in 12 F.S.M.C. 802. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

Generally, the filing of an information within the statute of limitations time frame weighs in favor of non-dismissal, unless evidence of bad faith reasons for the delay are shown. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

When the prosecution of an underlying offense is not time-barred, prosecution of conspiracy to commit that offense is not time-barred even if part of the conspiracy extends back in time to a point that would be time-barred. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 395, 397 (Kos. 2017).

The statute of limitations runs from the time the offense is committed until the prosecution is commenced, unless some intervening act occurs to interrupt it, and it is considered as being an act of grace, or as the sovereign's surrender of its right to prosecute. It creates a bar to prosecution and is not merely a statute of repose as in civil cases. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 395 (Kos. 2017).

The statute of limitations begins to run from the time of the commission of an offense, or when the crime is complete, not from the date the crime is discovered. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 395 (Kos. 2017).

Although statutes of limitation on criminal prosecutions must be accorded a rational meaning in harmony with the law's obvious intent and purpose, such statutes must be liberally construed in favor of the accused, and exceptions from the benefits of such statutes must be narrowly or strictly construed. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 396 (Kos. 2017).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which the defendant must raise either by motion under Criminal Procedure Rule 12(b) or later at trial by a plea of not guilty. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 396 (Kos. 2017).

When a violation of the charged Weapons Control Act provisions hold a sentence of up to ten years, the six-year statute of limitations applies. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 396 (Kos. 2017).

– Strict Liability Crime

The absence of an intent element in 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) (which prohibits any person from boarding or attempting to board a commercial airliner while carrying a firearm either on his person or in his luggage) evinces a legislative intent to dispense with the mens rea element and make the proscribed conduct a strict liability crime. The court can properly infer from Congress's silence in subsection (6) and lack of silence in subsections (1) and (2) that Congress intended that subsection (6) constitute a strict liability offense, whereas subsections (1) and (2) do not. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2000).

Although 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) does not dispense with the mental element that the defendant must know or be aware that he had the shotgun in his possession, the statute does dispense with the specific intent to board the aircraft knowing that it was illegal to do so with a shotgun. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2000).

A heavy maximum penalty of a $2000 fine and five years imprisonment is not dispositive in determining whether a crime is a strict liability offense. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2000).

Because violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) is not a case of an attempt to commit a crime but a case where "attempt to board" is an element of the offense, 11 F.S.M.C. 201 (the attempt statute) does not apply to the crime of attempting to board a commercial aircraft with a firearm. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2000).

Because conduct alone without regard to the doer's intent is often sufficient to convict someone of a crime, because there is wide latitude to declare an offense and to exclude elements of knowledge and diligence from its definition, and because the defendant knew, by his own admission, that he was not permitted to take a weapon on board the plane, the strict criminal liability imposed by 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) for boarding or attempting to board a commercial aircraft while carrying a firearm or dangerous device does not violate due process. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 449-50 (App. 2000).

The absence of an intent element – either the defendant has a valid sea cucumber permit or he does not – creates a strict liability or liability without fault offense. The defendant's intent is irrelevant. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 166 (App. 2015).

There is no such thing as liability without fault conspiracy. In order to be guilty of conspiring to commit an underlying strict liability offense, the defendant must have the specific intent to violate the underlying law. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167 (App. 2015).

The only elements needed for a successful 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) prosecution is that the firearm is something other than a .22 rile or a .410 shotgun and the defendant knows that he possesses a firearm. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 335 n.1 (Chk. 2019).

Unlawful firearms possession is almost a strict liability crime – the defendant need only know that he possesses a firearm, and in the case of prosecutions under 11 F.S.M.C. 1005, and that he does not possess a firearms identification card. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338 (Chk. 2019).

– Tampering with Public Records

When a "national offense" is defined as including any offense "which is otherwise an offense against the Federated States of Micronesia" and the underlying offenses involve improper obligation and expenditure of FSM funds and tampering with FSM official documents and information, it is difficult to see how these offenses could not be considered offenses against the FSM and an argument that they are not will be rejected. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 558 (App. 2008).

A person is guilty of tampering with public records or information in violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 529(1) when the government has proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did make, present, or use a record, document, or thing knowing it to be false, and with the purpose that it be taken as a genuine part of information or records, including the information necessary to access the machine readable passport system that allows for the processing and issuance of FSM passports. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 315, 317 (Pon. 2017).

A defendant is subject to possible imprisonment for not more than five years for the defendant's tampering with public records conviction when the court finds beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant's purpose was to defraud or injure the government in its processing and production of FSM passports and to injure those FSM citizens who applied for and needed to obtain passports at the time the machine readable passport system was inoperable. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 315, 317 (Pon. 2017).

– Theft

When existing facts having a material bearing upon the desirability of a proposed investment are intentionally misrepresented, the investor has been defrauded, even if the person who has induced the investors by false statements fervently hopes that related promises of future actions, developments or profitability will be fulfilled. Wolfe v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 115, 120 (App. 1985).

Where an obvious and unreasonable risk of loss was forced on investors, without their knowledge or consent, by defendant's intentional misstatement of facts, and the defendant thereby obtained money of the investors knowing that he was exposing the investors to risk beyond their knowledge, this is theft in violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 934. Wolfe v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 115, 120 (App. 1985).

When a person makes statements calculated to create a false impression as to value in order to induce those who heard him to give him their money, and the statements did have that result, the person has purposely obtained property through deception within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 932(6). Wolfe v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 115, 121 (App. 1985).

When the government fails to notify defendant of its intention to rely upon 11 F.S.M.C. 931(3), allowing aggregation of amounts involved in the thefts, as its source of jurisdiction, such aggregation will not be allowed. Fred v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 141, 144 (App. 1987).

The crime of grand larceny requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the stealing, taking or carrying away of the personal property of another, in the value of $50 or more, without the owner's knowledge or consent, and with the intent to convert it to one's own use. Kosrae v. Tolenoa, 4 FSM R. 201, 202 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

To prove larceny, the prosecution generally need not prove that the victim had an unassailable right to possession in the items stolen, only that the defendant had no greater right to possession of the stolen items. Kosrae v. Tolenoa, 4 FSM R. 201, 203 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

As with trespass and malicious mischief, a necessary element of the offense of petty larceny is that the subject personalty be "property of another." Thus a good faith belief in a right to the property negates an element of the offense of petty larceny as well. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 402 (App. 1998).

Where one, in good faith, takes the property of another and converts it to his own use, believing it to be legally his own, or that he has a legal right to its possession, he is not guilty of larceny, although his claim is based on a misconception of the law or of his right under it, for although ignorance of law and honest intentions cannot shield a man from civil liability for a trespass committed by him, they do protect him from criminal liability by divesting the act of the felonious intent without which it cannot be a crime. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 402 (App. 1998).

As a matter of law, then, if one has a good faith belief that he or she owns the property subject to the crime, he or she cannot be guilty of trespass, malicious mischief or petty larceny. Whether a defendant has a good faith belief in ownership is ordinarily a determination for the trier of fact. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 402-03 (App. 1998).

The doctrine of separation of powers is not violated every time a person, who happens to be a senator, allegedly misuses property that is traceable to an appropriation made under national law. If a senator takes a car, boat, desk, computer, or pen that rightfully is in the possession of another person or entity, he should bear the same responsibility and consequences as any other person: he could be charged criminally, or sued in a civil action by the rightful owner for conversion of that property. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 632 (Pon. 2002).

In order to find an accused guilty of grand larceny, the court must find that the accused 1) stole, took and carried away the personal property of another; 2) valued at more than $200 but less than $5,000; 3) without the owner's knowledge or consent: and 4) with the intent to permanently convert it to his own use. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 76, 80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the accused sought and obtained a check in the amount of $3,100 from the Speaker's and staff travel fund for a medical referral when he was neither authorized nor legally entitled to use the funds, the funds, without authorization for a permissible purpose, remained the property of the state. When the owner of the funds, the allottee Speaker, did not have knowledge or consent to the taking and his authorization and approval was required in order for the accused to legally obtain funds from that account; when the accused intended to permanently convert the funds and never demonstrated his entitlement to using the $3,100; when the accused did not use the funds for an approved, allotted purpose or return them so that they could be used for an allotted purpose, the allottee of the funds was permanently deprived of their use; and when the accused intended to permanently convert the funds because he sought reimbursement to use the funds for a medical referral, which was not a lawful purpose, the accused is guilty of grand larceny. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 80-81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A voucher submitted for a travel authorization in October 2007 could not have been authorized in the spring of 2006 without obligating funds in advance of their appropriation in violation of the Financial Management Act. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 81 n.8 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Even though the state was able to recover of some of the funds that were not returned and not used for permissible, authorized travel, such recovery did not excuse their taking since the funds were public monies held in the General Fund to be used only for their designated statutory purposes according to the requirements and procedures provided for by law. A travel authorization cannot lawfully be used as a means for a government employee to obtain an interest free personal loan, or for any other purpose not prescribed by statute in accordance with the Chuuk Constitution article VIII, § 2. The state's ability to recover any or all travel funds advanced to a particular traveler has little to no bearing on whether the traveler unlawfully obtained the funds or used them for an unlawful purpose. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the information and supporting affidavits allege that the accused cashed various national government checks that were made payable to fictitious people and that he and his codefendant shared the money thus obtained, those allegations are sufficient to put the accused on notice that the national government claims a legal, equitable, or possessory interest in the funds that the checks were used to obtain and the allegation that the codefendants made checks out to fictitious persons using legitimate travel authorization numbers for other persons and then cashed those checks, dividing the proceeds among themselves, is sufficient to put the accused on notice that the prosecution alleges that the checks were not authorized. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 520 (Chk. 2011).

Although conversion has sometimes been called the civil equivalent of theft that is not an accurate description. It is not the same as theft. The crime of theft requires the intent to permanently deprive another of the property. Conversion only requires the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property be inconsistent with the owner's right. It does not require the intent to permanently deprive the owner of its property. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 602 (App. 2014).

– Traffic Offenses

When neither the Legislature nor the court has provided any rules of procedure for traffic cases, the proper rules to follow are the court's rules of criminal procedure. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Relevant provisions of Title 12 of the Trust Territory Code regarding traffic citations' definition and procedure continue in effect as Chuuk state law on criminal procedure, as long as these provisions have not been amended or repealed and are consistent with the Chuuk Constitution. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A person who is stopped for a routine traffic offense is not in custody for purposes of Miranda warnings. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The offense of negligent driving requires proof of driving a vehicle in such a manner as to constitute a substantial deviation from the standard of care a reasonable person would exercise in the situation and when the state did not present any witnesses who saw the defendant driving his vehicle and there was no evidence presented to show the manner in which defendant was driving his vehicle and whether it was a substantial deviation from the appropriate standard of care and an officer testified that the defendant reported that he had a problem with his vehicle, it is reasonable to infer that this problem may caused the vehicle to leave the road and come to rest in the culvert. The state thus failed to present a prima facie case and the defendant's motion for acquittal on that count was granted and that count dismissed. Kosrae v. Alokoa, 13 FSM R. 82, 83 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The offense of unauthorized operation of a motor vehicle requires proof of operating a motor vehicle on a road without possessing a valid license or learner's permit and when the state did not present any witnesses who saw the defendant operating his vehicle and did not present any evidence that the defendant did not possess a driver's license or learner's permit, there was no evidence presented to prove that the defendant operated his vehicle without a valid license or permit in his possession. The state thus failed to present a prima facie case and the defendant's motion for acquittal on that count was granted and that

Driving under the influence is driving a vehicle while under the influence of alcoholic drink or a controlled substance or any other intoxicating substance. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 288 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The term "under the influence" as establishing a standard of conduct subject to criminal liability, has existed and has been enforced since at least 1970, first as a Trust Territory statute, and then later as a Kosrae state statute. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 288 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the language of the statute being challenged has been consistently enforced by the prior Trust Territory government and by the Kosrae state government for a cumulative period of at least thirty-five years without challenge and field sobriety tests have also been the predominant, if not sole, standard by which the Kosrae State Police determine whether a person was "under the influence" of alcoholic drink, the court must accord great weight to the constitutionality of Kosrae State Code, Section 13.710 and the use of field sobriety tests. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 288 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The criminal offense of driving under the influence, as defined in Kosrae State Code, Section 13.710, is not unconstitutionally vague. The term "under the influence" does give people of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know and understand what conduct is prohibited and how to avoid violation. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 291 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Field sobriety tests are not subjective and arbitrary although all testing, even the chemical testing of breath, blood or urine that the defendant strongly advocates, is subject to human error. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 292 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The offense of driving under the influence requires proof of two elements: driving a vehicle, and being under the influence of alcoholic drink, controlled substance or other intoxicating substance. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 46 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The United States National Highway Traffic Safety Administration findings, reports, standards, methods and statements do not constitute the law of the FSM or Kosrae, and are not binding upon the Kosrae State Court. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 46, 47 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When evidence was presented regarding the field sobriety tests administered to the defendant, coupled with the evidence regarding the smell of alcohol upon defendant's breath, defendant's red eyes, the presence of open and closed beer cans in the passenger compartment of defendant's vehicle, defendant's actions in driving the vehicle at a high speed more than twice the statutory speed limit, defendant's vehicle weaving in the road and crossing the center line, and defendant's refusal to stop the vehicle after being signaled by the police officer, the state has presented evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was impaired and driving under the influence of alcoholic drinks even without consideration of the evidence of the defendant's performance of the one-legged stand field sobriety test. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 47 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The offense of driving under the influence requires driving under the influence of an alcoholic drink, controlled substance or any other intoxicating substance: it does not require the presence of any specific blood alcohol percentage. A specific blood alcohol percentage is not an element of the offense of driving under the influence. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 47 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing or giving of alcoholic drink is not inclusive of, or a lesser included offense of driving under the influence because the two offenses are committed with completely different actions and do not share even one common element. The offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing or giving of alcoholic drink does not require any involvement of a vehicle, whereas the offense of driving under the influence does not require possession of a alcoholic drink or non-possession of a valid drinking permit. Also, both offenses are classified as category one misdemeanors: neither offense is a classified as lesser than the other. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 48 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The offense of driving under the influence requires proof of two elements: driving a vehicle, and being under the influence of alcoholic drink, controlled substance, or other intoxicating substance. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 120 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the defendant failed two of the three field sobriety tests administered to him, coupled with the evidence regarding the smell of alcoholic drinks upon his breath, his intoxicated appearance, his intoxicated conduct, his failure to stop at a stop sign, his carrying of a beer can to another car after the accident, the state has presented evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was impaired and driving under the influence of alcoholic drinks. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 121 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When there was undisputed evidence presented of the defendant's performance of other physical activity, the court can infer that the defendant's ailments did permit the defendant to complete a variety of activities requiring movement of his arms, legs and body, and did not affect his performance of the field sobriety tests. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 122 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Cases upholding the constitutionality of statutes criminalizing driving "under the influence" reflect the fact that alcohol, its consumption, and effects have long been a part of human experience. DUI statutes enacted with the arrival of the motor vehicle take that experience into account. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 120 (App. 2007).

The Kosrae DUI statute does not violate the vagueness doctrine because it employs the phrase "under the influence." It provides both law enforcement officers and judges with the necessary enforcement standards. "Driving under the influence" is commonly understood to mean driving in a state of intoxication that lessens a person's normal ability for clarity and control. A police officer will know that he may take enforcement action where he observes an individual exhibiting this commonly understood behavior. That a police officer must exercise his judgment in evaluating this behavior does not render the statute vague. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 120 (App. 2007).

"Driving under the influence" provides a judge with a sufficient enforcement standard. Based upon the evidence that a judge hears and is entitled to consider, he may determine whether a defendant was "under the influence" such that he was driving in a state of intoxication that lessened his normal ability for clarity and control. The statute thus passes constitutional muster. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 120-21 (App. 2007).

In Micronesia, our communities are small, roadways are limited, and on occasion may be in less than optimal condition. Active village life takes place near those roadways. In this setting, drunken driving can have consequences for people in addition to those who may at any given moment be traveling on, or be in the vicinity of, the roads. A DUI statute that prohibits "driving under the influence" is a useful and reasonably effective means of helping to insure the safety of those who travel on, are present near, or live near public roadways in our island communities. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 121 (App. 2007).

When the accused either was or was not driving "under the influence," and it was the arresting officer's job to exercise his judgment to determine whether there was probable cause to believe the accused's ability for clarity and control had been lessened by his consumption of alcohol, or in other words, whether the accused was driving "under the influence," and when Kosrae's statute did not require the accused to offer an explanation for his conduct and any such exculpatory explanation would have been immaterial to his objective state of sobriety or lack thereof, the Kosrae DUI statute is not void for vagueness and does not violate the Due Process Clause of either the Kosrae Constitution or the FSM Constitution. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 121 (App. 2007).

Even assuming that the photos not admitted would have shown that the defendant was not at fault in the accident, that would have had no bearing on his state of intoxication because even if the other driver were 100% at fault, there is no question that the defendant was driving a vehicle, and he would still have been subject to conviction under the driving under the influence. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 127 (App. 2007).

– Trespass

Where there is consent to enter another's property for certain purposes, but a person enters the property with the intent to commit an assault therein a conviction for trespass can be maintained because no consent can be implied to enter for an unlawful purpose. Lawful entry followed by a later unlawful act, however, is not trespass. Alik v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 469, 472 (App. 1994).

Since under Yap statutory law trespass is a lesser included offense of burglary, a trespass conviction will be vacated when there is a burglary conviction for the same act. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 101-02 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

A necessary element of the crime of trespass is that the property trespassed upon be property of another. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 401-02 (App. 1998).

The real property on which a defendant is alleged to have trespassed must be the property of another. A good faith claim of right to the property provides a complete defense to the crime of trespass because it negates the criminal intent necessary for conviction. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 402 (App. 1998).

As a matter of law, then, if one has a good faith belief that he or she owns the property subject to the crime, he or she cannot be guilty of trespass, malicious mischief or petty larceny. Whether a defendant has a good faith belief in ownership is ordinarily a determination for the trier of fact. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 402-03 (App. 1998).

The court's role in a civil trespass case is to determine which party has the greater possessory right to disputed property. In a criminal trespass case, in contrast, the court must determine whether the prosecution has established each element of the crime of trespass beyond a reasonable doubt. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 403 (App. 1998).

Criminal trespass is defined as entering, or causing an object to enter, the dwelling place, premises, or property of another without his express or implied consent, or entering with his consent and, following withdrawal of the consent, refusing to leave the dwelling place, premises, or property. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 98-99 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the householders did not give the defendant permission to enter their home, and when, even assuming that the defendant did have some implied consent to enter the home due to being a family friend, that implied consent did not extend to the time and purpose under consideration – to enter the home between the hours of midnight and 4 am, for the purpose of waking up, and assaulting the handicapped daughter. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 99 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of trespass requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of entering the dwelling place, premises, or property of another without her express or implied consent. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the evidence is undisputed that the defendant did not have consent to enter the victim's cookhouse at 2 a.m., (although there appeared to be implied consent for neighbors to cross the victim's property around her house and cookhouse, this consent does not extend to the cookhouse's interior), and that the defendant entered the victim's dwelling place and property without her express or implied consent, the state proved beyond a reasonable doubt all the elements of the criminal offense of trespass. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The criminal offense of trespass requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of entering the dwelling place or property of another without consent and when it is undisputed that the defendant entered another's dwelling place without consent at approximately 5:50 a.m., the state has proven beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements of the criminal offense of trespass. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 610 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

– Venue

All trials of criminal offenses should be held in the state in which the offense was committed. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 474 n.2 (App. 1996).

The venue provision in a criminal case in the FSM is not a constitutional right but rather is provided for under statute and under court rule, which provide for the trial of offenses in the state where committed. The provisions thus do not apply to occurrences not within any state in the FSM, such as in the EEZ. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 578, 580 (Pon. 1996).

The primary purpose of the criminal venue requirement is to prevent government oppression of a defendant by requiring him to defend against a criminal prosecution in a place far from his home, counsel and any witnesses or evidence which may be of help to him in his defense. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 578, 580 (Pon. 1996).

Trial of a corporation for a crime committed in the FSM EEZ is appropriate on Pohnpei when the corporation's FSM offices are on Pohnpei and most of its witnesses and its counsel are available on Pohnpei. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 578, 580-81 (Pon. 1996).

An order granting or refusing a transfer of venue is not a final judgment and is not appealable. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 411, 412 (Pon. 2003).

Since an order granting a change of venue is not appealable, no stay is warranted while the defendant seeks its review in the appellate division. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 411, 412 (Pon. 2003).

By statute, either a defendant or the government may petition the court for a change of venue for good cause. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 2003).

Apart from the rights conferred by 11 F.S.M.C. 106, there is no constitutional or statutory right to trial in the same state as the offense. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 2003).

A criminal defendant may raise the issue of venue on any appeal from a final judgment should he be convicted. If he is acquitted, then he has suffered no prejudice. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 2003).

A defendant's contention that he will suffer irreparable injury if he is forced to defend his case in a different venue is not persuasive. Any individual who employs private counsel to defend himself in a criminal case will incur the costs of defense, even if he is ultimately acquitted. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 2003).

Prosecutors' seeking a change of venue do not necessarily indicate bias so that they could continue to prosecute when the case is ready for immediate trial and, under the then alleged prevailing conditions, any FSM prosecutor might have felt unsafe unless venue were changed. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2003).

CUSTOM AND TRADITION

A customary privilege to enter one's cousin's house cannot be exercised by pounding on the walls of the house at two a.m. until a hole for entry is created and shouting threats at the occupants. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 26 (Pon. 1981).

The fact that one may have a general customary privilege to enter property does not necessarily mean that the privilege may be exercised at all times and in every conceivable manner. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 39 (Truk 1981).

Familial relationships are at the core of Micronesian society and are the source of numerous rights and obligations which influence practically every aspect of the lives of individual Micronesians. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 40 (Truk 1981).

Familial relationships are an important segment, perhaps the most important component, of the custom and tradition referred to generally in the Constitution, FSM Const. art. V, art. XI, § 11, and more specifically in the National Criminal Code, 11 F.S.M.C. 108, 1003. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 40 (Truk 1981).

While the court may find that a criminal defendant's conduct did not violate the criminal law and the defendant owes no debt to society in general, this does not suggest that the defendant has necessarily fulfilled all customary obligations he may owe to a relative who was the victim of his actions. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 41 (Truk 1981).

The court is willing to assume that the homeowner whose wife's brother is seeking to enter the house by force late at night in a threatening manner should as a matter of customary law go lightly and use less force than he might to expel some other intruder. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 41 (Truk 1981).

State officials generally should have greater knowledge of use, local custom and expectations concerning land and personal property. They should be better equipped than the national government to control and regulate these matter. The Constitution's framers specifically considered this issue and felt that powers of this sort should be state powers. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107, 109 (Pon. 1982).

Under appropriate circumstances, customary law may assume importance equal to or greater than particular written provisions in the National Criminal Code. 11 F.S.M.C. 108. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 139-40 (Pon. 1982).

Customary law is placed in neither an overriding nor inferior position by the FSM Constitution and statutes. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 139 (Pon. 1982).

Customary settlements do not require court dismissal of court proceedings if no exceptional circumstances are shown. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 140 (Pon. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court is required by the National Criminal Code to recognize generally accepted customs and to determine the applicability and effect of customary law in a criminal case; it is not authorized to develop new customary law. 11 F.S.M.C. 108. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 140, 146-47 (Pon. 1982).

The prosecutor does not have authority to dismiss an existing prosecution on the basis of customary law, but the court does have power to respond to a prosecutorial suggestion for dismissal because of customary considerations. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 141 (Pon. 1982).

The burden of proof is on a defendant to establish effect of customary law; the effect of customary apology ceremony on court proceedings is not self-evident. 11 F.S.M.C. 108(3). FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 141-43.

Customary law and the constitutional legal system perform different roles; they may mutually support each other. Neither system controls the other. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 145 (Kos. 1982).

Custom is more properly considered during sentencing than at other stages of a criminal prosecution. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 147-48 (Pon. 1982).

The constitutional government seeks not to override custom but to work in cooperation with the traditional system in an atmosphere of mutual respect. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 271 (Pon. 1982).

When no custom is established by a preponderance of the evidence that the vile phrases used are sufficient provocation for a serious attack on the speaker, that alleged custom will not be considered in determining the criminal culpability of the person who attacks the one who has used vile phrases. FSM v. Raitoun, 1 FSM R. 589, 591-92 (Truk 1984).

The Major Crimes Clause, with its admonition to Congress to have due regard for local custom and tradition, unmistakably reflects awareness of the framers that Congress would be empowered under this clause to regulate crimes that would require consideration of local custom and tradition. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 57 (App. 1985).

Even where the parties have not asserted that any principle of custom or tradition applies, the court has an obligation of its own to consider custom and tradition. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 140 (Pon. 1985).

Where the business activities which gave rise to the lawsuit are not of a local or traditional nature, and the work setting and the work itself are of a markedly non-local, international character, the court need not conduct an intense search for applicable customary laws and traditional rules when none have been brought to its attention by the parties. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 140 (Pon. 1985).

Customary and traditional practices within a state should be considered in determining whether the people of that state would expect their state government to be immune from court action. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 159 (Pon. 1986).

Defendants are not within the coverage of FSM Constitution article V, section 1, preserving "the role or function of a traditional leader as recognized by custom and tradition," simply by virtue of their status as municipal police officers. Teruo v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 167, 172 (App. 1986).

Whether interference with the efforts of a non-FSM citizen engaged in business within the Federated States of Micronesia is an abuse of process is not an issue which may be resolved by reference to traditional or customary principles. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 2 FSM R. 265, 268 (Pon. 1986).

An agreement between the FSM National Government and operators of a United States fishing vessel in an attempt to terminate court proceedings, is not the kind of matter that historically came within principles of custom and tradition. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 91 (Pon. 1987).

In a case of first impression concerning national employment contracts, when no party points to applicable customary principles of law or traditional values, the FSM Supreme Court looks to the common law in other jurisdictions to assist in developing legal principles suitable for Micronesia. Falcam v. FSM Postal Serv., 3 FSM R. 112, 120 (Pon. 1987).

In a case in which the defendant proposes a standard of requiring clear and convincing evidence in civil conspiracy cases rather than a preponderance based upon conditions, customs and traditions in Micronesia, it is incumbent upon him to establish such conditions by evidence, because the court will not take judicial notice of such conditions, customs or traditions. Opet v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 3 FSM R. 159, 164 (App. 1987).

Sentencing courts are not free to bar from consideration beatings that were grounded upon, or were products of custom and tradition when considering sentencing, and failure to consider the customary implications of those beatings violates not only the implicit statutory requirement of individualized sentencing, but also mandate of 11 F.S.M.C. 1003, enacted pursuant to article V, section 2 of the Constitution, as well as the judicial guidance clause. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 278 (App. 1990).

The duty of a national court justice to give full and careful consideration to a request to consider a particular customary practice or value in arriving at a decision requires careful investigation of the nature and customary effect of the specific practice at issue, a serious effort to reconcile the custom and tradition with other constitutional requirements, and an individualized decision as to whether the specific custom or tradition should be given effect in the particular contexts of the case before the court. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 279 (App. 1990).

When a trial court is asked to give special mitigative effect to customary punishment during its sentencing proceedings, the court must first consider whether these customary activities have become so imbued with official state action so that the actions of the assailants are seen as actions of the state itself; if so the punishments must be tested by the same standards that would be applied if state officials carried out these punishments directly. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 283 (App. 1990).

The judicial guidance clause prohibits a sentencing court from giving special effect to customary beatings administered to the defendant, unless the court finds that such recognition would be consistent with the protections guaranteed to individuals by the Declaration of Rights. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 284 (App. 1990).

Congress has no power to specify voting requirements for the Constitutional Convention and therefore any attempt to exercise this power so as to uphold tradition is also outside the powers of Congress under article V, section 2 of the Constitution, which is not an independent source of congressional power but which merely confirms the power of Congress, in exercising national legislative powers, to make special provisions for Micronesian tradition. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 328 (App. 1990).

6 F.S.M.C. 1614 exempts adoptions effected in accordance with local custom from the domestic relations law of the Federated States of Micronesia. Customary adoptions are an alternative to court-ordered adoptions which are established by the Code. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 383 (Pon. 1992).

Parties who wish to adopt a child have a choice of method of adoption. They may adopt according to local custom, or they may adopt according to the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia. What a petitioner may not do is seek the court's involvement in a customary adoption. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 383 (Pon. 1992).

Determining the relevancy of custom in carrying out the mandate of article XI, section 11 of the FSM Constitution must proceed on a case-by-case basis. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 132 (App. 1993).

Where entitlement to customary relief has been proven and the means to execute such a remedy are within the trial court's authority and discretion, the trial court should as a matter of equity and constitutional duty grant the relief. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1993).

FSM courts must consider customary law where relevant to a decision, but it is not error for a court to consider custom and find that it is not relevant to its decision because a Certificate of Title had been issued for the land. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 50 (App. 1995).

Issues related to the EEZ cannot be determined by relying on custom and tradition, as the commercial value of the EEZ to the Federated States of Micronesia was first realized when the nation acceded to the Law of the Sea Convention. While the rights of individual Micronesians, families and clans to living marine resources under particular circumstances might be amenable to determination by custom and tradition, the states' legal entitlement to share in fishing fees derived from commercial fishing ventures, extending to 200 miles from island baselines, is not. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 378 (Pon. 1998).

Any claim to resources in the EEZ based upon custom and tradition must rest with clans, families and individuals rather than with the states. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 379 (Pon. 1998).

The constitutional government works not to override custom, but works in cooperation with the traditional system in an atmosphere of mutual respect. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 497 (Pon. 1998).

In a civil case where defendants seeks to advance Pohnpeian customary practice as a defense to a claim of equitable contribution, the burden is on the defendants to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the relevant custom and tradition. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 497 (Pon. 1998).

Micronesian custom, and the constitutional legal system established by the people of the FSM, flow from differing (not necessarily inconsistent) premises and purposes. These two systems, then, can be seen as supplementary and complementary, not contradictory. Each has a valuable role to perform, independent of the other. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

One of our courts' express functions is to apply and interpret the duly enacted and promulgated laws and regulations which lie at the heart of a dispute. Our court system exists to speak to the very issues to which Pohnpeian custom and tradition are silent. In this way, the two systems complement each other. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

Allowing a contribution claim between parties who are relatives, and who are equally liable under a duly promulgated regulation for a corporation's debts, is consistent with the customary principle that relatives should assist one another. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

A contention that custom and tradition as a procedural device may prevent an equitable claim for contribution based on violation of a regulation governing the formation of corporations is an insufficient defense as a matter of law. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

In a civil case when a defendant seeks to advance Pohnpeian customary practice as a defense, the burden is on the defendant to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the relevant custom and tradition. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc. v. Mauricio, 9 FSM R. 155, 158-59 (App. 1999).

The FSM Constitution requires court decisions be consistent with Micronesian customs and traditions, and provides that the FSM Congress may enact statutes to protect the traditions of the people of the FSM. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

The filing of the appeal over land was not a breach of the defendant's condition and was not a breach of a customary settlement when the appeal was filed before the customary settlement and condition were made; and when the appeal was not decided in the defendant's favor, the defendant's condition regarding his promised grant of a portion of land was satisfied and the customary settlement and the defendant's promise were therefore enforceable. Robert v. Semuda, 11 FSM R. 165, 168 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Customary and traditional use rights to an island are a form of property right. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Since the FSM people's traditions may be protected by statute and if challenged as violative of the fundamental rights in Article IV, protection of Micronesian tradition shall be considered a compelling social purpose warranting such governmental action, Kosrae may pass a law which protects the Kosraean people's traditions. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 390 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Reconciliation is not a basis for dismissal of a criminal information. The law of our nation in this regard is clear. Custom, including customary apology and reconciliation, is to be considered during the sentencing of a criminal prosecution. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

While the doctrine of unjust enrichment has not been explicitly discussed or adopted, Pohnpei state law and Micronesian custom and tradition dictate that a party who has benefitted unjustly from another should, under certain circumstances, be made to repay that benefit. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 346 (Pon. 2004).

Custom, including customary apology and reconciliation, is to be considered during the sentencing of a criminal prosecution, but when there was no customary reconciliation reached among the defendant and the victims, there is no consideration of this factor for sentencing. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 368, 369 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

An obligation to give aid to someone in need does not mean that it may be done in an illegal manner. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 22 & n.7 (App. 2006).

When the defendant argued that the court should recognize custom regarding the relationship between him and the victim, but did not present any evidence of the relationship between victim and him, and did not present any evidence of custom, specifically evidence that due to the relationship between victim and the defendant, it would be customary for the defendant to show up drunk at a relative's home and commit a battery upon the relative, the court may not utilize tradition in reaching a decision because it has not received satisfactory evidence of the tradition. When a defendant has not provided any evidence of custom or tradition, it cannot be considered. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 30-31 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Customary business practice is distinguished from customary law, that is, from the "custom and tradition" enshrined in the Constitution. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 487, 489 (Pon. 2006).

Parties who proffer custom as a basis for a claim must prove the relevant custom by a preponderance of the evidence. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 240 (App. 2009).

There is a general deference to local officials' knowledge of local customs. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2009).

While the ultimate burden of persuasion remains with the government, a defendant, asserting an affirmative defense, has some burden of proof or of going forward with sufficient evidence to raise the defense as an issue at trial. When custom is raised, it is usually more properly considered during sentencing than at other stages of a criminal prosecution. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 534 (Chk. 2009).

A defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground of custom will be denied, but he will be free to present evidence at trial concerning his defense(s), if applicable. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 534 (Chk. 2009).

Custom does not divest Congress of its power to regulate shipping and commerce or render the limitation of liability statute, 19 F.S.M.C. 1101-1108, unconstitutional. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 532, 538 (Yap 2013).

Before the establishment of the FSM constitutional government, customary law was inferior in legal status to written law promulgated by the administering authority, or any official or legislative body, which often disregarded, or considered void, any custom or customary law in conflict with written law, but under FSM law, customary law is not placed in an exalted or overriding posture under the FSM Constitution and statues, but neither is it relegated to its previous inferior status. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 641 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court is indisputably charged with the duty of considering customary law when relevant to a decision since the constitutional government works not to override custom, but to work in cooperation with the traditional system in an atmosphere of mutual respect. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

While Trust Territory High Court opinions are not binding precedent on the FSM Supreme Court, they serve as useful advisory precedent, especially considering they contain important information regarding the customs and traditions of the people of Micronesia. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 n.2 (Pon. 2016).

Custom is a law established by long usage and is by common consent and uniform practice so that it becomes the law of the place, or of the subject matter, to which it relates. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

It is only when a local custom is firmly established and generally known and been peacefully and fairly uniformly acquiesced in by those whose rights would naturally be affected that it will be judicially noticed by the court. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

When there is a dispute about the existence or effect of a local custom, and the court is not satisfied about either its existence or its applicability, such custom becomes a mixed question of law and fact, and the party relying upon it must prove it to the court's satisfaction. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642-43 (Pon. 2016).

Rare is the case where the court benefits from clear, uncontradicted evidence of custom on point in a given matter presented by knowledgeable authorities. The great difficulty in applying custom is that unlike other sources of law, it is uncodified. Custom is revealed through human practice and oral description, and owing to the diversity of cultures and languages in the FSM, the court must rely almost entirely on witness testimony to elucidate particular customs and traditions. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

Under the FSM Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause, the FSM Supreme Court's decisions must be consistent with, inter alia, Micronesian customs and traditions. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

– Chuuk

In Trukese society, the husband, as the head of the household, is responsible for taking care of the family legal matters such as signing of documents, and overseeing all family financial matters. O'Sonis v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 516, 518 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Either the husband or the wife may prosecute or defend a civil action in which one or both are parties, provided that he or she has informed his or her spouse of the representation. O'Sonis v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 516, 518 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Even when the parties have not raised an issue of custom or tradition, the court has an obligation of its own to consider custom and tradition. O'Sonis v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 516, 518 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Since the judicial system and customary settlement in Truk are fundamentally different and serve different goals, the primary concern of customary settlement being community harmony rather than compensation for loss, the use of one should not prevent the use of the other. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 128 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Offers or acceptances of customary settlement should neither be used in court to prove liability on the part of the wrongdoer, nor be deemed the same as a legal release on the part of the plaintiff. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 129 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

To the extent that customary settlements are given any binding effect at all, they should be only binding as to those persons that are part of custom; state agencies and non-Trukese persons are not part of that system. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 129 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

The absolute defenses of Assumption of the Risk and Contributory Negligence are contrary to the traditional Chuukese concepts of responsibility and shall not be available in Chuuk State. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 167 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The traditional remedy for the original landowners in an "ammot" transaction when the grantee no longer used the land for the purpose for which it was given was repossession of the land and nothing more. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 134 (App. 1993).

Patrilineal descendants – or afokur – have no rights to lineage land in Chuuk. They only enjoy permissive rights of usage from the members of the lineage. Mere usage of lineage land by afokur does not constitute title of any sort even if the usage lasts a lifetime. Transfer of lineage land to any descendants of male members requires the clear agreement of the Clan. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 196 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

It is an established principle of Chuukese land tenure, that lineage land is owned by the matrilineal descendants and not by the patrilineal descendants or "afokur." Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The people of Chuuk have always considered themselves to have rights and ownership of the tidelands, and thereby hold the property rights in them, throughout all of the several foreign administrations. These traditional and customary claims came down from time immemorial. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 208 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The sanction imposed on one who controls and manages the land of a group who does not fairly and according to custom concern himself with the rights of the other members or another member of the group is the censure of the community. In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 328 (Chk. 1994).

When the children of a landowner with full title to land inherit the land they form a land-owning group ("corporation"). The senior male, the mwäänii chi, is required to manage the property in the interest of the "corporation." The corporation owns the land even if one part or another is allotted to a member for his use. In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 329 (Chk. 1994).

Individuals have full title to the improvements (as distinguished from the soil) made upon land owned by a land-owning group or "corporation." In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 330 (Chk. 1994).

The property owned in full title by one who dies is inherited by the children of the deceased. Personal property suited for use by women is inherited by daughters and sisters. In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 330 (Chk. 1994).

A court should not order a traditional apology, compensation, and settlement when none has been offered voluntarily because traditional settlements are customarily non-adversarial and arrived at without outside coercion and court decisions must be consistent with custom. Alafonso v. Sarep, 7 FSM R. 288, 290-91 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that existing Chuukese custom and tradition shall be respected. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 578 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A court's finding of guilt and sentencing would not render illegal, or prevent, customary forgiveness of the defendant by the victim's family or clan. Whatever the court does, customary settlement may remain desirable to resolve lingering hostility and disputes between the families. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 579 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A customary forgiveness ceremony resolving disputes among families or clans may not prevent the court system from determining the individual guilt of the defendant and considering whether societal notions of justice and the need to uphold law and order require fining, imprisonment or other restriction of the defendant's freedom. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 579 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Because the trend of the application of customary settlements in the criminal justice system, is its use as excuse, justification or mitigation during the imposition of sentence after conviction for a crime and not as an element of guilt or the dismissal of an information and complaint charging a criminal offense, a motion for dismissal of a major criminal charge on the grounds that a customary settlement has been reached will be denied. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 579-80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Because the Chuuk Constitution requires the courts to make decisions consistent with Chuukese customs and traditions, Chuukese custom and tradition may prevail over the provisions of a holographic will in deciding who may enter upon land for the purpose of making reasonable use thereof. In re Ori, 8 FSM R. 593, 595 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

When tidelands were never properly divided during the father's lifetime, the logical conclusion is that those tidelands remain lineage or family property according to Chuukese tradition and custom and cannot be transferred without the consent of all male adults of the lineage, subject only to the traditional rights of afokur as consented to. Lukas v. Stanley, 10 FSM R. 365, 366 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Under Chuukese custom and tradition the oldest sister may have the authority in family and lineage matters to sign for younger family members, but the youngest sister does not have the authority, under custom and tradition, to sign for the older ones. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 44 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An afokur's rights to lineage land are permissive use rights only. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2002).

The consent of all adult members of the lineage is needed to sell lineage land. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2002).

It would seem that for a long-term land lease (especially one that could last two or three or more generations) the level of lineage members' consent needed should be equivalent to that needed for a sale. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2002).

An entity, such as a corporation, which must act through agents or representatives, can, by its conduct, ratify an unauthorized agreement. A lineage or a clan is a similar entity in that it is recognized by courts in Chuuk as a personable entity – a entity capable of suing and being sued and of entering into contracts. This parallels and recognizes the clan's or lineage's position under custom and tradition in which the clan or lineage is an entity capable of owning, acquiring, and alienating land. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2002).

A clan or lineage in some respects functions as a corporation – it is, or can be, composed of many members, but is considered a single legal entity, capable of owning land, suing and being sued, and performing other acts, and which must necessarily act through its representatives. In this respect a corporation and a clan or lineage are analogous. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

Generally, any ratification of an unauthorized agreement must be in its entirety because an entity cannot accept the benefits of an unauthorized act, but reject its burdens. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

When a lineage as a whole has accepted all of the benefits of a lease – all of the payments that the lessee was required to make – up to the present and even beyond, it cannot now reject the burden of the lessee exercising its options to renew. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

Distribution of benefits within a lineage is an internal lineage matter. Courts generally will not involve themselves in a lineage's internal affairs. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

Community censure is the sanction imposed on one who controls and manages the land of a group who does not fairly and according to custom concern himself with the rights of other members or another member of the group. That is not a sanction that a court can order or relief that a court could grant. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

The court is unaware of any tradition or custom within Chuukese society for a child, or even an adult, to carry the last name of his or her step-father or step-mother, and finds and concludes that no such tradition or custom exists. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Acheche is traditionally a gift of land at the time of the birth of the first son so there could not have been any acheche of the land later because the transfer would have had to have taken place when the son was born. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 593 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the project control document did not say otherwise, the community halls contemplated by the Uman Social Project project control document are the customary and traditional community hall (an wuut or uut) found in Uman (and throughout the Southern Namoneas and Chuuk Lagoon) because this is the meaning of the term community hall (wuut or uut) as understood by the defendants, who are all from the Southern Namoneas and because is this is not only the only logical conclusion to draw under the circumstances, this result is mandated by the Judicial Guidance Clause, which requires all judicial decisions to be consistent with custom and tradition. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 481 (Chk. 2004).

It is generally recognized that in order to sell lineage land in Chuuk, lineage heads need the lineage members' consent. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 218 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A lineage is an entity similar to a corporation in that it is recognized by courts in Chuuk as a personable entity – a entity capable of suing and being sued and of entering into contracts. This parallels the lineage's position under Chuukese custom and tradition in which a lineage is an entity capable of owning, acquiring, and alienating land. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

It is possible for an agreement not authorized by all lineage members to be ratified by the later conduct of those who did not authorize it. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Lineage members' consent or acquiesce to the sale of lineage land can be shown by affirmative assent, or an acquiescence, or by ratification of the act. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Under Mortlockese custom, a person would be considered related to his relative's stepson, but the added generation that results from his relative being another's step-grandmother – as opposed to his step-mother – cuts off the relationship under Mortlockese custom so that in actual fact a person is not considered related to the other. In such circumstances, a judge would not need to disqualify himself since he lacks a relationship to the other. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 339 n.1 (Pon. 2007).

A traditional gift of nechop is a Chuukese custom through which someone gives property to another in gratitude for care giving. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 240 (App. 2009).

When the testimony on nechop is sufficient to establish that it existed as a custom and that, when employed, it operated to disrupt the status quo of matrilineal descent, the trial court did not ignore the established custom of Chuukese matrilineal descent in accepting that a nechop took place since it was proven by a preponderance of the evidence that the nechop took place. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2009).

Proof of the existence of a custom is a factual issue. The burden is therefore on the proponents to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that achemwir is a custom practiced in Chuuk, and they have the further burden of proving that the requirements of the custom were met. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

To prove an achemwir adoption, the consent of the adoptive lineage's members must be proven. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Consent of lineage members, if not given contemporaneously, may, at least in some contexts, be shown by evidence of ratification through the lineage members' later conduct. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When Epen Inong brought Yosko Epen to live among members of his lineage, but his lineage members did not treat her as a lineage member since she did not participate in lineage member meetings and decision-making and since she was referred to as Epen Inong's daughter and not as a "sister" as would be proper if she had been a lineage member through an achemwir adoption, there is no admitted evidence showing that the lineage members, by their subsequent conduct, consented to or ratified an achemwir adoption of Yosko Epen. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171-72 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the proponents did not present any evidence or argument to support their contention that achemwir doesn't require lineage member consent or to otherwise impeach the testimony of their own expert to that effect and when they had ample opportunity, at the trial level, to raise any issues regarding achemwir's requirements and their own expert witness presented evidence that the trial court found credible, and which clearly articulated its requirements including the lineage member consent requirement, they failed to meet their burden of proof to show otherwise at trial. The appellate court will not, therefore, entertain a new theory regarding achemwir's requirements. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Lineage rights descend through the female lineage members and that patrilineal descendants, as afokur, have only permissive use rights in lineage land. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Once all the lineage members died, the intervener, as an afokur to the lineage ceased having even permissive rights to lineage lands because once the lineage was extinct, all lineage rights ceased. The lands were then validly acquired by another person and her descendants, not as lineage members, but as heirs. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175-76 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Under Chuukese custom, children are expected to and do in fact contribute to support of their parents. If they are not married and are employed they give larger amounts than when they have a family of their own, but the support in some amount will continue, in a normal relationship, as long as the parents live. Whether there is an obligation under the custom to support parents or other members of the family, largely depending on their need, does not affect the next of kin's entitlement to damages for pecuniary loss. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

If a decedent had been married, this would not eliminate parental support under custom, nor would it relieve the wrongdoer under the wrongful death statute. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

Since there is no indication that parental support has ceased to be the custom in Chuuk and since parents are undoubtedly "other next of kin" under the Chuuk wrongful death statute, parents of adult children, consistent with custom, are included within the single class of persons entitled to recover in a wrongful death action even when there are other members (surviving spouse and children) of the class present. But even when a plaintiff is within the class of persons who may benefit from a wrongful death action, that plaintiff still must prove pecuniary damages in order for a money judgment to be awarded, and, of course, the plaintiff must also prove the other elements of a wrongful death cause of action. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

Traditionally, when someone no longer had the right to reside on another's land, he would be allowed to dismantle the house he had built and take the materials to rebuild somewhere else because he owned the building materials. This is usually not feasible with modern houses. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Chuukese custom generally follows the rule that a person who makes improvements on property has full title to these improvements even though he does not hold title to the property on which they are made. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 n.4 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

– Kosrae

When the land commission concludes that a traditional gift of land, a "kewosr," has been made, but is unable to determine who made the gift, and when, and does not explain any details about the customary gift sufficient to explain how it has determined that a kewosr was made, the opinion does not reflect proper resolution of the legal issues or reasonable assessment of the evidence and therefore must be set aside. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 395, 402 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Pursuant to the Kosrae State Code, the court cannot consider tradition unless satisfactory evidence of it is introduced. Kosrae Code 6.303. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 537, 540 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Because farming of short term crops, such as sugar cane, on someone else's land is not uncommon in Kosrae, the fruits of such farming are considered the personal property of the person planting them. Kosrae v. Tolenoa, 4 FSM R. 201, 204 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

A statutory cap on the amount and scope of recovery in a wrongful death action, lawfully enacted by the Kosrae legislature, does not interfere with traditional Kosraean or Micronesian compensation of a victim's family by the tortfeasor. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 361 (Kos. 1992).

Until proven contrary to Kosraean custom the Kosrae State Court will entertain actions for negligence as tort liability for negligence is consistent with Micronesian culture. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

On Kosrae, usru is a gift of land by a parent to one's children, and kewosr is an outright gift of land from a man to a favored lover. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

Under Kosraen custom one does not openly declare that a kewosr has taken place, but simply acts, with a witness present, in a certain fashion. A kewosr is a secret way of giving land that only the man and woman involved know about. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

Although transfer of land by kewosr fell out of favor after the arrival of Christianity on Kosrae, kewosr did continue afterward. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 37 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

Under the Kosrae Code, a court cannot consider tradition unless satisfactory evidence of tradition is introduced. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 406 (App. 1998).

The Kosrae Constitution provides that the state government protect the state's traditions as the public interest may require. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 165 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The court is required to receive satisfactory evidence that custom or tradition applies to a case, before utilizing it. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 26, 30 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Kosrae customary practice is to hold wedding ceremonies at a church or at the home of the bride or groom. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The burden of proving custom and tradition relies on the party asserting its effect. When both parties were specifically given the opportunity to offer such evidence, but neither party took that opportunity, the court correctly concluded that no Kosraean customary transfer or acquisition of land could be considered because no party offered evidence. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 298-99 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Kosrae State Code § 6.303 prohibits the trial court's application of custom and tradition unless there is satisfactory evidence of the tradition or custom. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 398 (App. 2007).

When the appellees' general right to enter the land to tend to existing burial sites is established by the undisputed facts but the same cannot be said of the ten-foot buffer zone that was ordered to be maintained around the exiting burial sites since the trial court did not elaborate as to the exact operation of this "perimeter"; when the undisputed facts which establish the right of way do not support such a precisely defined area being designated; when the case relied upon by the trial court is factually distinguishable and does not alone justify the trial court's mandate of such a large buffer zone; and when the invocation of custom remains as the only basis for the trial court's order but the trial court was not provided supporting evidence of a custom or tradition involving such a specifically demarcated perimeter around burial sites, this single issue will be remanded to the trial court with instructions to strike the portion of its order that provides a 10-foot perimeter around the existing burial sites. The trial court may then receive supporting evidence of custom or tradition about the size of perimeters around graves and thereafter may enter an amended order based upon its findings. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 399 (App. 2007).

In resolving a land claim, it is irrelevant whether kewosr is a legally-recognized tradition with the force of law today when the kewosr land transfer at issue occurred about 1912. The relevant question would thus be whether kewosr was a tradition when the kewosr occurred. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 375 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Since the Land Court's jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title to land and any interests therein, that would necessarily include whether kewosr was a tradition affecting land tenure when the alleged transfer took place and whether a kewosr did in fact occur. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 375 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

– Pohnpei

The court must try to apply the Court Rules of Civil Procedure in a way that is consistent with local customary practice. Hadley v. Board of Trustees, 3 FSM R. 14, 16 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Judicial decisions, including interpretations of rules of civil procedure, should be consistent with the Constitution and with the Pohnpeian concept of justice. Hadley v. Board of Trustees, 3 FSM R. 14, 16

(Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

The Pohnpeian custom of "Ke pwurohng omw mwur," according to which one reaps the fruit of one's misdeed, requires the lessor to bear the consequences of his failure to repossess the rented vehicle from the lessee. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 38 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Customary law takes precedence over the common law, according to Pon. Const. art. 5, § 1; 1 TTC 103; 1 F.S.M.C. 203. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 38 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court may look to Pohnpeian customs and concepts of justice when there are no statutes governing the subject matter, but it may also draw from common law concepts when they are appropriate. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 64 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

The common Pohnpeian custom of assisting a person in need should not be dispensed with in order to allow the defense of contributory negligence or assumption of risk to be raised. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 67 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

According to the Pohnpeian view of civil wrongs, if one damages another's property, he must repair or replace it; if one injures another person, he must apologize and provide assistance to the injured person and his family; if one kills another person, he must provide the assistance that the victim would have provided and may have to offer another person to take the place of victim in his family. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 70-71 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court declines to adopt the "collateral source" rule, according to which alternative sources of income available to a victim are not allowed to be deducted from the amount the negligent party owes, because it does not want to discourage customary forms of family restitution. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 74 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

Under Pohnpeian state law after confirmation of a customary separation or divorce under 39 TTC 5, the court may order custody and child support under 39 TTC 103. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 225 (Pon. 1990).

Although under historical Pohnpeian customary law only the husband had rights over the children of the marriage, now both parents have rights and responsibilities in connection with a marriage and the court should take this into consideration in determining child custody rights and support payment obligations in cases of customary divorce. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 225 (Pon. 1990).

The doctrine of comparative negligence is more consistent with life in Pohnpei in that the doctrine recognizes that injuries and damages are often caused through a combination of errors and misjudgments by more than one person. Nothing in Pohnpei custom absolves a party who caused injury to another from the customary obligations of apology and reconciliation because the injured party's negligence contributed to the injury. Alfons v. Edwin, 5 FSM R. 238, 242 (Pon. 1991).

The Pohnpei court system has to be extra cautious applying the foreignly developed concepts of criminal justice into its own, so that in adopting or applying such concepts it does so without doing injustice to Pohnpeian culture and traditional values. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 449 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

The Pohnpeian customary practice of quickly resolving conflict resulting from the commission of an act is closely related to, if not the counterpart of the Western concept of a speedy trial. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 450 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

Should Pohnpeian custom and tradition not be determinative, the FSM Supreme Court will look to its earlier holding and decisions of United States courts for guidance as to relevant common law tort principles, and will evaluate the persuasiveness of the reasoning in these decisions against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture in Pohnpei. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 253 (Pon. 1998).

Although under Pohnpeian custom it is inappropriate for a parent, or an individual who stands in the place of a parent, to see his daughter come home late at night with a boyfriend, it is not a corollary that that person is justified under custom in inflicting a battery on the boyfriend, or damaging car he is driving. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2000).

When there was no evidence to suggest that a parent's customary privilege to discipline ran beyond the daughter to encompass her boyfriend as well, when there was no evidence to suggest that when the boyfriend dropped the daughter off he was threatening or in any other way posing a danger of physical harm to her such that the parent was entitled to inflict a battery upon the boyfriend in order to defend the daughter as he may have been obligated to do under custom, and when there was no evidence that under custom a parent could attack the car driven by the daughter's boyfriend with the baseball bat as a way of demonstrating his displeasure with the boyfriend for his role in keeping her out late, and in dropping her off under circumstances where he would see them together, Pohnpeian custom does not constitute a defense to either the battery or property damage claims. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2000).

The people of Pohnpei's traditional and customary rights to freely navigate the reef, engage in subsistence fishing in that area, and control the use of and materials in that marine environment is recognized in 67 TTC 2(1)(e), in the FSM Constitution, and the Pohnpei Constitution. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

The construction of a multistory building using imported technology is not imbued with Pohnpeian custom and tradition so as to lend itself to an analysis in those terms. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 384 (Pon. 2001).

Customary law takes precedence over the common law. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 272 n.3 (Pon. 2015).

Customary marriage is based on a flexible standard and is not established by a single test or a defined set of parameters because the solemnization of a customary marriage can take many forms. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 273 (Pon. 2015).

In a civil case, the party advancing Pohnpeian customary practice or law must establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, the relevant custom and tradition. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 640 (Pon. 2016).

The court recognizes the customary and traditional rights of municipalities, clans, families, and individuals to control the use of, or material in, marine areas below the ordinary high watermark and otherwise engage in the harvesting of fish and other marine resources from reef areas, but any traditional and customary right to control the use of, or material in, marine areas below the ordinary high watermark is subject to, and limited by, the inherent rights of the Pohnpei Public Lands Trust as the owner of such marine areas. Accordingly, the Mwoalen Wahu does not have standing on the basis that there exists a customary law that gives the traditional leaders the right to control the use of marine areas in their respective municipalities. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 641-42 & n.1 (Pon. 2016).

The Pohnpei Constitution provides protection for custom and tradition, and mandates that the Pohnpei government shall respect and protect the customs and traditions of Pohnpei. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

To the extent a claimed customary right is still in effect, the Mwoalen Wahu members have a legal right under the Pohnpei Constitution to institute legal proceedings in order to protect their constitutionally protected interests. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

In order to be protected by the Pohnpei Constitution, the customary law must still exist. Custom is a practice that by its common adoption and long, unvarying habit has come to have the force of law. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

The traditional and customary right of the Nahnmwarki of each established municipality of Pohnpei to receive offerings from their respective subjects is firmly established in history and still widely known and peacefully accepted by the citizens of Pohnpei, thereby making it a judicially noticeable fact. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

Even assuming arguendo that wide recognition and practice of the custom has disappeared so as to preclude judicial notice of its existence, testimony given by the Iso Nahnken of Nett provides a sufficient basis to conclude that the custom is still practiced today when he testified that the custom is still practiced and the defendants failed to sufficiently rebut that testimony and a conclusory argument to the contrary was not evidence. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

The custom that Mwoalen Wahu members receive from their constituents various marine life that inhabit Pohnpei waters, allegedly threatened by the proposed harvesting scheme, remains an active customary law. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

The custom that Mwoalen Wahu members receive from their constituents various marine life that inhabit Pohnpei waters, allegedly threatened by the proposed harvesting scheme, remains an active customary law. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

– Yap

Since under Yapese custom a daughter in her adult years may be expected to provide certain services for her mother, the loss of such customary services should be considered in calculating the mother's pecuniary injury resulting from her daughter's death. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 365 (Yap 1990).

Given that a 19-year old daughter is considered a child under Yapese custom, that the decedent was a 19-year old daughter who up to the time of her death continued to live with her parents in Yap and to perform those household chores expected under custom of young female persons within families in Yap, and that the parents were accompanying their daughter en route to obtain medical services when she died, the daughter was a child within the meaning of 6 F.S.M.C. 503. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 366 (Yap 1990).

Under Yap traditional rights and ownership of natural resources and marine areas inside the Yap fringing reef – the rights to use and exploit, to the exclusion of all others, the marine resources of particular areas of the submerged lands inside the fringing reef around Yap – stem from a concept called a tabinaw. A tabinaw entails rights, duties and obligations for its members, and includes families and households. But a tabinaw is more than a concept. A tabinaw includes an estate in identifiable land and specific areas within the Yap fringing reef within which a tabinaw member can exploit the marine resources. A tabinaw member can only exploit marine resources in the marine area that appertains to his tabinaw. Each village includes a number of tabinaw. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 415 (Yap 2006).

The court can take judicial notice that the social configuration of the outer islands in the State of Yap differs significantly from the Yap main island (even the vernacular language is significantly different) since it is a fact not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction and since the court's decisions are required to be consistent with the social and geographic configuration of Micronesia. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 262, 267 (Yap 2012).

Tabinaw are a salient social feature of the main island of Yap, but may not be in Yap's outer islands or on Eauripik. Thus, the failure to mention tabinaw membership in the plaintiffs' proposed class definition may not make the class designation indefinite. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 262, 267 (Yap 2012).

CUSTOMS

All aircraft entering FSM ports of entry are subject to immigration inspection, customs inspections, agricultural inspections and quarantines, and other administrative inspections authorized by law. In Chuuk, the Chuuk International Airport is the only port of entry for aircraft. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 (Chk. 1999).

Customs officers have the right to examine all goods subject to customs control, and it is unlawful to import into the FSM any goods whose use, possession or import is prohibited or contrary to restrictions imposed by the FSM or the state into which the goods are imported. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 (Chk. 1999).

The Customs Act of 1996 gives the FSM the authority to investigate and perform post-audits of declared CIF values after the release of the goods. Ruben v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 508, 514 (Pon. 2008).

An importer has the responsibility of fully and accurately declaring the value of all dutiable goods. The amount of penalties for understating the value of the imported goods depends on who discovers the understatement and the timing of the discovery in relation to the release of the goods. If the FSM discovers the understatement before the release of the goods, a 100% penalty applies. A 100% penalty also applies if the importer or owner discovers and reports the understatement within 10 days of the release of the goods. A 200% penalty applies in all other cases of understatement. Ruben v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 508, 514 (Pon. 2008).

While the statute is not explicit, instances where a 200% penalty will apply include when the importer or owner discovers and reports the understatement more than 10 days after the release of the goods and when the FSM discovers the understatement anytime after the release of the goods. Ruben v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 508, 514 (Pon. 2008).

The FSM is within its statutory authority to conduct a post-audit investigation after the goods have been released. Ruben v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 508, 514 (Pon. 2008).

Appraisement is just one of the valuation methods set forth in Section 223; there are several other preferred methods for arriving at an equivalent CIF price when the CIF price cannot be reasonably determined. For instance, an equivalent CIF price can be established through the value of identical goods at the CIF location. Only when all other preferable methods fail to render an equivalent CIF price does the statute permit the use of appraisement to arrive at the CIF price. Ruben v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 508, 516 (Pon. 2008).

Civil penalties and interest for understating the amount of duty due on imported goods cannot be avoided through lack of knowledge, however innocent the importer's lack of knowledge may be. Laxmi Enterprises v. FSM Dep't of Fin. & Admin., 21 FSM R. 601, 603 (Chk. 2018).

Unlike most goods, the customs duty for cigarettes is based on the number of cigarettes imported, not on the imported cigarettes' monetary value. Laxmi Enterprises v. FSM Dep't of Fin. & Admin., 21 FSM R. 601, 603 n.1 (Chk. 2018).

If an importer, correctly reporting the types, quantities, and values of the dutiable goods, were to prove that it was affirmatively misled by customs officials to understate the amount of duty due, it may have an equitable estoppel claim against the government. Laxmi Enterprises v. FSM Dep't of Fin. & Admin., 21 FSM R. 601, 603 (Chk. 2018).

A Customs officer has the right to examine all goods subject to Customs control, and among the goods subject to Customs control are all goods for export, from the time such goods are brought to any port, airport, or other place for export until their exportation to any country outside of the FSM. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

A facility that is not itself a port or airport, but is in close proximity to both the port and airport, can be considered an "other place for export" to the extent that it is a container yard – it stores packed containers ready for shipment abroad. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

A CY-CY container is a container in which all goods packed in it are for the one consignee and the container is consigned from one container yard to another container yard and will not normally be unpacked at the wharf. CY-CY containers are typically subjected to customs inspection, not on the wharf, but at a container yard. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

That an examination was not done by a customs officer, but by the national police, a different FSM law enforcement agency, but one that is tasked with the general enforcement of all FSM national law, instead of the narrow specialized area that customs officers are restricted to, should not invalidate the examination when it was one that was permissible for Customs officers to do. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

Ports, airports, and other places for export such as a container yard are functional equivalents of a border. Border searches and searches at the functional equivalent of a border are an exception to the warrant requirement of section 5 of the FSM Declaration of Rights. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

The border search exception to the constitutional search warrant requirement applies equally to persons and goods leaving the country as it does to persons and goods entering the country. A border search, or a search at the functional equivalent of a border, of outgoing passengers or goods requires neither a warrant nor probable cause. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

DEBTORS' AND CREDITORS' RIGHTS

With respect to liens, first in time is not always first in right. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 1987).

A prior statutory lien will not necessarily be given priority over all liens which arise subsequently. Rather, the effect to be given to a statutory lien must be determined through interpretation of the statute which provides for the lien. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 1987).

In an insolvency proceeding, a broad range of issues must be decided for which there is little or no guidance by way of statute or precedent, and the court is acting as an equitable court and must apply equitable principles to the circumstances of each case to reach a fair result. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 296 (Pon. 1988).

In absence of statute pertaining to rights of employees of insolvent companies to receive preference against other creditors of employer, an appropriate source of guidance is the common law as it existed in absence of statute. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 300 (Pon. 1988).

Claims for wages asserted by low level employees and laborers are entitled to preference over all other claims, except wage and salary tax lien rights of the national government, which are given priority over all other claims and liens by 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2). In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 301 (Pon. 1988).

Attachment and seizure create statutory and possessory lien rights which will be unaffected by subsequent writs of execution, but will be subject to national government's wage and salary tax lien claims under 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2), to wage claims of low level employees and laborers, and to pre-existing national government lien rights under 54 F.S.M.C. 153. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 303 (Pon. 1988).

Without more, continuing guaranties given to a creditor do not establish any lien rights for the creditor against property of the debtor whose obligations are covered by the guaranty. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 304 (Pon. 1988).

An execution creditor holds a more powerful position than a mere judgment creditor. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 306 (Pon. 1988).

Where it becomes apparent that claims of creditors will outstrip the value of debtor's assets, the approach is to give all creditors an opportunity to submit claims, and distribute any available proceeds on an equitable basis. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 306 (Pon. 1988).

An employee's preference for wage claims is determined by reference to the equities among the parties rather than exclusively by specific dates upon which particular liens were established. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 341 (Pon. 1988).

Unless a statute or common law principle expressly says otherwise, disclosure is a prerequisite for making a lien effective against other creditors. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 342 (Pon. 1988).

Where purchasers at a judicial sale are not served by summons and complaint pursuant to FSM Civil Rule 3 but receive notice of a motion seeking confirmation of the sale and made by a creditor of the party whose property was sold, and where the purchasers do not object to the motion, confirmation of the sale is effective and binding on the purchasers and is not violative of their rights of due process. Sets v. Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 365, 368 (Pon. 1988).

The fact that stock issued by a corporation and formerly owned by a judgment debtor has been sold to a third party at a judicial sale of the debtor's assets does not make the corporation a party to the litigation concerning distribution of the assets of the insolvent debtor for purposes of determining whether the shares were validly issued and outstanding shares of the corporation. Sets v. Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 365, 368 (Pon. 1988).

A lawsuit to enforce a mortgage is an attempt to enforce a type of lien against a delinquent debtor. Such a case bears a relationship to the power to regulate "bankruptcy and insolvency," which the Constitution, in article IX, section 2(g), places in the national Congress. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 381 (Pon. 1988).

Under circumstances where there is no bankruptcy legislation or comprehensive system for establishing and recognizing liens in the FSM, the court acts essentially as a court of equity when deciding insolvency cases. In re Pacific Islands Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 581 (Pon. 1988).

Creditors with judgments more than 10 days old are entitled to writs of execution upon request. In re Pacific Islands Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 582 (Pon. 1988).

In an insolvency proceeding, holders of writs of execution should be paid on the basis of a first-in-time, first-in-right rule according to the dates of the individual parties' writs, subject to the rights of the creditors entitled to superior treatment by virtue of statutory lien priority or extraordinary equitable relief. In re Pacific Islands Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 582 (Pon. 1988).

In an insolvency proceeding, claimants without liens and not entitled to special equitable treatment, who comply with a court order or with the instructions of a court appointed receiver, trustee or other custodian to substantiate their claims against the debtor's estate after the proceedings have been consolidated, shall receive payment on a pro rata basis with other creditors in the same class. In re Pacific Islands Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 583 (Pon. 1988).

In an insolvency proceeding, judgment creditors with judgments issued on or before the consolidation of the case but without writs of execution as of that time are prioritized on a pro rata basis, after satisfaction of claims of lienholders, those with special equitable claims and holders of writs of execution. In re Pacific Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 583 (Pon. 1988).

The final class of creditors entitled to distribution in an insolvency proceeding shall consist of all the debtor's remaining creditors who either reduced their claims to judgment after the consolidation date or who substantiate their claims according to the receiver's instructions. In re Pacific Islands Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 585 (Pon. 1988).

Where the rights of a corporation have been assigned to its creditors in previous litigation, the creditors' rights as against the shareholders or subscribers of stock in the corporation are derived from the rights of the corporation itself, and the creditors will be able to enforce the shareholders' liability only to the extent that the corporation could have enforced it before the assignment. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 159 (Pon. 1989).

In an action to enforce an unpaid stock subscription, the statute of limitations begins to run against the creditors when it runs against the corporation. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 159 (Pon. 1989).

Stock subscriptions which are silent as to the date and terms of payment do not become due until a call has been issued by the corporation or, if the corporation becomes insolvent without ever issuing such a call, then the cause of action to collect unpaid subscriptions accrues when the creditors, by authority of the court, first demand payment. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 161 (Pon. 1989).

It is necessary for each creditor to establish that attorney's fees to be charged to a debtor pursuant to an agreement in a promissory note are reasonable in relation to the amount of the debt as well as to the services rendered. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 220 (Pon. 1990).

The statutory right of a judgment creditor to obtain immediate issuance of a writ of execution implies as well a legislative intent that holders of writs be paid on the basis of a first-in-right rule according to the dates of the individual parties' writs. In re Island Hardware, Inc., 5 FSM R. 170, 173 (App. 1991).

The trial court did not abuse its discretion when it ruled that judgment creditor who had accepted assignment of debtor's accounts receivable should not otherwise participate in distribution of assets of insolvent debtor. In re Island Hardware, Inc., 5 FSM R. 170, 174 (App. 1991).

Where a debtor/account receivable to an insolvent corporation is liable to the corporation's creditors the debtor has no standing to vindicate the rights of any of the creditors against other creditors. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 6 FSM R. 140, 142 (Pon. 1993).

Where a debtor/account receivable to an insolvent corporation is liable to the corporation's creditors the debtor cannot challenge the arrangement for attorney's fees made between the creditors, counsel, and the court for collection of the insolvent corporation's accounts receivable. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 6 FSM R. 140, 142 (Pon. 1993).

In collection cases creditors must establish that the attorney's fees to be charged are reasonable in relation to the amount of the debt as well as to the services rendered. Generally, plaintiff's attorney's fees in a debt collection case, barring bad faith on the defendant's part, will be limited to a reasonable amount not to exceed fifteen percent of the outstanding principal and interest. J.C. Tenorio Enterprises, Inc. v. Sado, 6 FSM R. 430, 432 (Pon. 1994).

Among execution creditors the claims of those whose writs are dated earliest have priority to an insolvent's assets over those whose writs are dated later. Individual writ-holders are to be paid on the basis of first-in-time, first-in-right rule according to the dates of their writs. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Ponape Federation of Coop. Ass'ns, 6 FSM R. 592, 593 (Pon. 1994).

An intervenor must make a three part showing to qualify for intervention as a matter of right: an interest, impairment of that interest, and inadequacy of representation by existing parties. A tax lien holder and a judgment creditor with an unsatisfied writ of execution may intervene as a matter of right where an assignee is compromising a debtor's accounts receivable. California Pac. Assocs. v. Alexander, 7 FSM R. 198, 200 (Pon. 1995).

Where a creditor accepts a premium payment for insurance that he has agreed to procure, where he makes a diligent effort to fulfill his agreement to do so, promptly notifies the debtor of his inability to procure insurance, he would not be held liable to the debtor, as he would have fulfilled his contract to attempt to procure insurance which is not a contract of insurance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 250 (Chk. 1995).

Both contract and tort theories can be pursued by a debtor who alleges that a creditor has failed to procure credit insurance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

A creditor who undertakes to secure credit insurance for a debtor is liable to the debtor for negligent performance of that duty or of duty to notify debtor if insurance not obtained. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

Failure of a creditor to notify the debtor of its failure to obtain insurance is negligence. As a consequence the creditor is liable to the debtor for the entire amount of the debtors' loss, otherwise the debtor is only entitled to return of full amount of insurance premiums paid. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

Judgment creditors will be paid in their priority order except for those who release their claims in writing. Payment of a released judgment may be returned to the judgment debtor. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 371, 373-75 (Pon. 1996).

Appointment of a receiver is not appropriate when what little evidence that has been presented on the financial strength of the defendant company is long out of date, there is no reliable measure of the value of defendant's current assets and liabilities, no finding of insolvency, and plaintiffs have not demonstrated that the available legal remedy – the reduction of their claims to judgment, followed by a demand for payment, will be insufficient to provide the relief to which they may later prove themselves entitled. Lavides v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 400, 402-03 (Pon. 1996).

Generally, a person who seeks to satisfy the court that his failure to obey an order or decree was due entirely to his inability to render obedience, without fault on his part, must prove such inability. The FSM Supreme Court places the burden on the movant to show that the debtor has the ability to comply. Once this burden has been met and the debtor has been held in contempt, it is then the debtor's burden to show that he no longer has the ability to comply through no fault of his own despite his exercise of due diligence. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 452-53 (App. 1996).

A cooperative may be dissolved administratively by the FSM Registrar of Corporations and trustees appointed to wind up the cooperative's affairs. In re Kolonia Consumers Coop. Ass'n, 9 FSM R. 297, 300 (Pon. 2000).

All violations of the FSM Regulations under which the FSM Registrar of Corporations may appoint trustees in dissolution for winding up an association's affairs are enjoinable. In re Kolonia Consumers Coop. Ass'n, 9 FSM R. 297, 300 (Pon. 2000).

When a judgment-debtor has unilaterally increased his indebtedness to non-judgment creditors while not increasing his payments to his judgment-creditor, it is the judgment-debtor who should bear the burden of this improvidence, and not the judgment-creditor. The court will therefore order the allotment amounts for the new voluntary debts to be allotted to the judgment-creditor's debt instead. Bank of Guam v. Tuuth, 9 FSM R. 467, 469-70 (Yap 2000).

As between a judgment creditor and a creditor who has not instituted legal action, the judgment creditor should enjoy a priority. Bank of Guam v. Tuuth, 9 FSM R. 467, 470 (Yap 2000).

The national government is not subject to writ of garnishment or other judicial process to apply funds or other assets it owes to a state to satisfy the state's obligation to a third person. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 479 (App. 2000).

The only purpose of statutes authorizing orders in aid of judgment is to force the payment of a judgment and to provide means to collect a money judgment, which is the same as proceedings for attachment, garnishment or execution. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Historically, orders in aid of judgment and orders in aid of execution serve the same purpose and the terms are used interchangeably. Their purpose is to provide a means of discovery to inquire into the assets and ability of a judgment debtor to pay a judgment. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When Chuuk has ultimate access to money on a monthly basis that greatly exceeds the amount of the civil rights judgment, Chuuk must pay the judgment. Davis v. Kutta, 9 FSM R. 565, 568 (Chk. 2000).

A court shall determine the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment. Davis v. Kutta, 9 FSM R. 565, 568 (Chk. 2000).

When a judgment was entered over four years ago, and the bulk of it remains outstanding and the debtor has the means to pay, the judgment should be paid forthwith. Davis v. Kutta, 9 FSM R. 565, 568 (Chk. 2000).

When loan collateral is in the lender's possession and the borrower has made a reasonable request that the lender liquidate the collateral to preserve its value, the lender should do so; but there is no duty in law requiring the lender to take possession of the collateral and foreclose on property at the borrowers' request when that property is not in the lender's possession, unless there is a provision in the mortgage requiring it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 605, 607 (Chk. 2000).

A debtor who knew of an order, since he stipulated to it, and who had some ability to pay, as evidenced by the payments that he did make, cannot be found in contempt for failing to meet the payments under the stipulated order when there was insufficient evidence presented to establish any income sufficient to confer on the debtor the ability to pay under the order because having some ability to pay is different from having the ability to make the payments specified in the order. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 102 (Kos. 2001).

An attorney's fee must be reasonable, and the court must make such a finding. Except in unusual circumstances, an attorney's fee in debt collection cases will be limited to a reasonable amount not to exceed 15% of the amount due on the loan at the time of default. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

The rationale for limiting attorney's fees in collection cases, whether the attorney's fees result from a loan agreement or a stipulated judgment, to a reasonable percentage of the amount collected is so that a debtor is not ultimately faced with an obligation far in excess of that originally anticipated, and to provide certainty to debtors and creditors alike. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

Payments totaling the principal amount of a judgment have been paid do not fully satisfy the judgment when the judgment expressly provides for 9% interest and for attorney's fees incurred in enforcing the judgment. Even if it did not so state, the judgment creditor would be entitled to statutory interest of 9% under 6 F.S.M.C. 1401. Until such time as all interest and a reasonable attorney's fee is paid, the judgment remains unsatisfied. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

While the fact that as part of an assignment another agreed to assume all of a debtor's liabilities under a stipulated judgment may provide the debtor with recourse against the other, it does not affect the debtor's obligation to the creditor under the judgment and payment order. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

When a debtor has engaged in the unreasonable conduct that he has no further liability on the judgment, it is equitable to award an attorney's fee of 30% of the remaining amount due on the loan for work done to collect on the judgment, rather than the 15% allowed in Bank of Hawaii v. Jack. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

When a debtor's unreasonable conduct occurred in opposing the collection of the remainder of a judgment after the bulk of it had been paid and the creditor is entitled to reasonable attorney's fees, it is equitable to award the creditor reasonable attorney's fees not to exceed 15% for work done in collecting the bulk of the judgment, and reasonable attorney's fees not to exceed 30% of the judgment's remainder, rather than attorney's fees not exceeding 15% of the total judgment. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103-04 (Kos. 2001).

Criminal contempt is not a specified remedy in 6 F.S.M.C. 1412, but is an available remedy under the general FSM contempt statute, 4 F.S.M.C. 119, under which the court may punish any intentional disobedience to a lawful court order. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

Generally, pre-judgment interest is only included as an element of damages as a matter of right when a debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it. This occurs when a party has been deprived of funds to which he was entitled by virtue of the contract, and the defaulting party knew the exact amount and terms of the debt. In those types of cases, the goal of compensation requires that the complaining party be compensated for the loss of use of those funds. This compensation is made in the form of interest. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Payments should be applied first to interest, then principal. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 224, 226 (Chk. 2001).

An agreement between two defendants who are jointly liable on the note, whereby one of them would assume full responsibility on the note (and thereby "releasing" the other from responsibility on the note), is not binding on the plaintiff, especially when the note's language clearly states that in the case of joint obligors, one of the obligors can only be released from liability via a signed writing, signed by an official of the plaintiff bank. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 285 (Pon. 2001).

An agreement between two defendants, jointly responsible on a loan, as to who will be responsible to pay back the loan is not binding on the creditor unless the creditor clearly assents to the agreement. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 285 (Pon. 2001).

When the parties' written agreement requires that a writing signed by a bank officer would be necessary to release one of the obligors from responsibility on the note, the presence of a bank employee at the defendants' divorce proceeding (regardless of whether that employee were an officer or agent), and his failure to object to the defendants' settlement agreement, without more, would not release one of the defendants from liability to the bank on the note. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 285 (Pon. 2001).

When a divorced couple is jointly responsible on a promissory note, no agreement they could make between them could possibly prevent the creditor from pursuing its claims against either or both of them, and since the issue of whether one of the defendants could have relieved himself or herself from responsibility to the creditor could not have been litigated in the divorce proceeding, the creditor cannot be precluded from litigating that issue. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 286 (Pon. 2001).

A divorcing couple is free to enter into whatever agreement they choose as to who between the two of them will be responsible to repay a bank loan. However, such an agreement can have no effect on bank's right to seek repayment of the loan from either or both of them. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 286 (Pon. 2001).

A promissory note is a term of art. There is a division of authority as to whether a document containing no express promise to pay constitutes a promissory note, but a writing that does not include such promise-to-pay language, but which is signed by the party to be charged is enforceable on its face as an acknowledgment of a debt. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 475, 477 (Pon. 2001).

The general rule is that payments are applied to interest first, and then to principal. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 475, 477 (Pon. 2001).

Unpaid interest and principal, consolidated into a new principal sum for purposes of a new loan is not a violation of a statute that prohibits interest compounding, since interest compounding results where interest is automatically compounded, and not where interest has become due, has not been paid, and becomes the subject of a new loan agreement. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 475, 478 (Pon. 2001).

Even assuming that the seller historically did not charge interest on its account with the buyer, nothing precludes the parties to a commercial transaction from coming to a new agreement regarding installment payments on the outstanding indebtedness that also included an interest component calculated over the prior 26 months period, so long as the interest rate charged did not contravene FSM public policy as set out in 34 F.S.M.C. 204. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 502, 504 (Pon. 2002).

When an agreement provides for 18% interest per annum on the principal remaining after the debtor's last payment, no usury issue arises, and when the interest charged cannot be said to be arbitrary and capricious on any other basis, the interest portion of the agreement is binding. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 502, 504 (Pon. 2002).

Previous insolvency cases involved juridical persons, either corporations or cooperatives, which after they were declared insolvent and the creditors paid to the extent they could be, were dissolved. Once a corporation's or a cooperative's assets are all paid out and the corporation or cooperative is dissolved, unpaid creditors are generally without further recourse to collect any unpaid sums. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 525 (Chk. 2003).

While the court may determine (and has in the absence of statute) the priority of its judgments as to a debtor, the court is reluctant to assume that it may order the discharge of a judgment against a debtor when, by statute, the judgment is to remain valid and enforceable for twenty years. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 525 (Chk. 2003).

The Constitution assigns Congress the authority to enact bankruptcy laws and thus to determine when a judgment against an insolvent person should be discharged without either full payment or the parties' agreement. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 525-26 (Chk. 2003).

Even if the court can declare natural persons insolvent in the manner it can and has declared corporations and cooperatives insolvent, the court does not have the authority to "discharge" a natural person judgment-debtor's debts short of full satisfaction of the judgment. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 526 (Chk. 2003).

There is no impediment to appointing a receiver in the absence of an insolvency declaration, especially when it is the judgment-debtors who ask that one be appointed. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 526 (Chk. 2003).

In order to purge any possible contempt buy the judgment-debtors, the court may order the receiver to pay out of funds on deposit with the court the arrearages accrued on orders in aid of judgment before the judgments were consolidated. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 526 (Chk. 2003).

Among judgment creditors, those with a writ of execution have priority over those who do not. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2003).

One reason writ-holders are granted a higher priority is that the judgment creditor who has taken the effort and exhibited the diligence to move to the status of execution creditor deserves to be treated differently on that basis. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2003).

A judgment-creditor who has obtained an order in aid of judgment should be accorded the same status as a judgment creditor who has obtained a writ of execution because both methods of enforcing a money judgment are provided for by statute and both methods show that the judgment creditor has taken the effort and exhibited diligence greater than that of a mere judgment-creditor. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2003).

A judgment-creditor's statutory right to obtain immediate issuance of a writ of execution implies as well a legislative intent that holders of writs be paid on the basis of a first-in-time, first-in-right rule according to the dates of each party's writ. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2003).

Judgment-creditors with execution creditor status are to be paid on the basis of a first-in-time, first-in-right rule according to the dates of the individual parties' writs. The pro rata payment basis is the rule for unsecured judgment-creditors who do not hold execution creditor status or a statutory lien priority. Because holders of orders in aid of judgment are accorded the status of execution creditors, those judgment-creditors will be paid in order according to the date of either their first writ of execution or their first order in aid of judgment. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 528-29 (Chk. 2003).

If a creditor's judgment is secured by a mortgage, it would have priority over the other unsecured judgment-creditors for the proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged property. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

Assuming that the transfer of title to property by the judgment-debtors to a judgment-creditor was not a sham transaction with the judgment-debtors retaining ownership of it and the judgment-creditor merely selling it for them, but was a bona fide transfer of title, it was within the judgment-creditor's rights to take property instead of cash as payment on its judgment. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2003).

When a judgment-creditor decides to take title to property as full payment for the outstanding judgment in lieu of a cash payment for the remainder of the judgment, the judgment is satisfied at that point, not at some later time when the judgment-creditor has managed to sell the property for cash. A judgment-creditor accepting title to property in lieu of cash as full satisfaction of its judgment takes the risk that its later sale of the property could amount to less (or the chance it could be more) than amount due on the judgment or that the sale might fall through. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2003).

In the usual case, the payment of a money judgment against the state must abide a legislative appropriation. "The usual case" means the ordinary civil case for money damages. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 3, 9 (Chk. 2003).

The court will not determine the state to be insolvent and appoint a receiver to manage its debts to insure the payment of its judgments because it is a much more drastic approach than garnishment and it is also a course upon which the court will not embark without the benefit of a substantially fuller record than that now before it. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 3, 11 (Chk. 2003).

That a promissory note's co-signer did not receive the loan proceeds, but the other signers did and they spent it, is not a defense to an action on the note or a ground for dismissal of the case against the co-signer. LPP Mortgage Ltd. v. Maras, 12 FSM R. 27, 28 (Chk. 2003).

Except for unusual circumstances, 15% is the upward limit for an attorney's fee to be deemed reasonable when it is awarded pursuant to a stipulation for the payment of attorney's fees in a debt collection case. LPP Mortgage Ltd. v. Maras, 12 FSM R. 112, 113 (Chk. 2003).

That a corporation is insolvent does not mean that it lacks the capacity to sue or be sued. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 147 (Pon. 2003).

Even though the FSM does not have a bankruptcy code, the FSM Supreme Court has previously recognized the appointment of receivers or special masters to engage in collection efforts on behalf of insolvent corporate entities. A trustee's purpose in a bankruptcy proceeding is similar to the appointment of a receiver or collection agent to act on behalf of an insolvent corporation, and the fact of a corporation's insolvency does not affect the ability of a trustee, receiver, or collection agent to proceed on a corporation's behalf to recover assets in the corporation's name, and for the benefit of the corporation's creditors or shareholders. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 147 (Pon. 2003).

When the plaintiff had a legal right to initiate a lawsuit against a corporate defendant for its unpaid debts at the time that the promissory note was executed in 1994, but instead of initiating a lawsuit, it agreed to certain terms of payment, and required individuals to personally guarantee that payment would be made, each of the parties gained something in the execution of the promissory note and security agreement. There was thus consideration exchanged by the parties when they entered into these agreements. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 149 (Pon. 2003).

In a broad sense a guarantor or surety is one who promises to answer for the debt or default of another. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2004).

When the defendants contend that they cannot be liable on the guaranty because the guaranty secures the promissory note on which they are named as the promisors, but can only prevail on this argument if they are the primary obligors on the loan, but they are not, and never were even though certain writings failed to properly reflect that, and when those writings have been reformed, this contention is without merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2004).

Like other contracts, contracts of guaranty must be supported by consideration, and a guaranty will not be enforced unless the promise is supported by consideration. However, if the promise of the guarantor is shown to have been given as part of a transaction or arrangement which created the guaranteed debt or obligation, the promise is supported by the same consideration which supports the principal transaction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

When a guaranty was given as a part of the same transaction by which the debt to the bank was created, no independent consideration was necessary. The guaranty was supported by the same consideration that supported the transaction between the debtor and the bank. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

A debtor is not an indispensable party under Rule 19 in an action to enforce a guaranty of payment. A lender holding a guaranty of payment can sue a guarantor directly, without naming the borrower. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

When, under the terms of a guaranty, the guarantors waived any right to require the bank to proceed against the borrower, to proceed against or exhaust any security held from the borrower, or to pursue any other remedy in its power whatsoever, the guarantors' contention that the bank could not proceed against them without also proceeding against the borrower is without merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

Guaranties and suretyships bear many similarities. A guaranty creates a secondary obligation under which the guarantor promises to be responsible for the debt of another. The guarantor is only secondarily liable, and then only on proof of the default by the principal debtor. A suretyship differs from a guarantee in that a surety's obligation to the creditor is primary and unconditional whereas a guarantor's obligation is secondary and conditioned on the principal's default. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

The main distinction between a contract of surety and one of guaranty has been expressed by stating that a surety is primarily and jointly liable with the principal debtor, while a guarantor's liability is collateral and secondary and is fixed only by the inability of the principal debtor to discharge the primary obligation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

A court does not need to determine whether an instrument is a guaranty or a surety when the result would be the same. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 12 (Pon. 2004).

Failure to sue the borrower as well as, or instead of, the guarantors cannot be considered a "mistake" subject to relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(1) because, as a general legal principle, a lender holding a guaranty of payment can sue a guarantor directly, without naming the borrower and because the terms of the guaranty, under which the guarantors were found liable, permitted the bank, in the case of a loan default, to sue the guarantors without suing the borrower. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 632 (Pon. 2008).

As a general rule, in the absence of an agreement or stipulation to the contrary, a debt is payable at the place where the creditor resides, or at his place of business, if he has one, or wherever else he may be found; and ordinarily it is the duty of the debtor to seek the creditor for the purpose of making payment, provided the creditor is within the state of his residence when the payment is due. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 145 (App. 2013).

Where the obligor on a promissory note is to make his payments does not relate to a matter of vital importance or go to the contract's essence since the note provides a number of options for place of payment, and since the obligor was not deprived of the benefits he expected to receive under the contract – his use of the bank's money (the loan) for a specified period of time. He knew he had an obligation to pay the bank and he knew (or should have known) where to pay and if he did not know it was his duty to find out where. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 145 (App. 2013).

Since a partial payment constitutes an acknowledgment of the debt, it is implicitly treated as a new promise to pay, and a new promise to pay has the effect of starting any limitations period all over again. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

While a stipulated judgment does represent a private agreement and not a judicial determination, it is a judicial act, binding on the parties. Thus, contract defenses are not available to a judgment debtor in a proceeding to enforce a money judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 73 (Pon. 2015).

Under Rule 69, post-judgment discovery is available only to judgment creditors. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 73 (Pon. 2015).

The right to post-judgment discovery is limited to judgment creditors, who are usually, but not always, plaintiffs who succeeded in obtaining a money judgment. Rule 69 is meant to benefit a judgment creditor, not a judgment debtor. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 73-74 (Pon. 2015).

Rule 69 applies only to money judgments. Thus, it is generally not applicable to judgments that direct specific acts, which are covered by Rule 70. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 74 n.2 (Pon. 2015).

A judgment debtor has no discovery rights under Rule 69, which makes sense because once a money judgment has been rendered, the only relevant factual inquiry is the debtor's ability to pay the judgment and the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 74 (Pon. 2015).

The execution statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 1407, requires issuance of a writ of execution upon request, subject to the Rule 62(a) limitation that no execution shall issue upon a judgment until the expiration of 10 days after the entry of that judgment. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 276, 277 (Pon. 2015).

When the issuance of a writ of execution was not only based on statutory law, but the court had also afforded the judgment debtor and her counsel ample time to confer and respond to the motion for a writ of execution, the issuance of the writ was appropriate. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 276, 278 (Pon. 2015).

When the primary performer, the borrower, stopped making loan repayments to the bank and defaulted, the guarantors were then bound to perform on the loan repayments once the borrower had ceased to. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 289 (Pon. 2016).

A creditor who undertakes to secure credit insurance for a debtor is liable to the debtor for negligent performance of that duty or of duty to notify debtor if insurance not obtained. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 592, 593 (Pon. 2016).

When the debtor has not produced evidence to show that credit insurance was obtained when the loan was entered into, the court will not rule that the debt has been discharged although, if credit insurance had been obtained, the debtor would have had a valid claim of discharge of the debt. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 592, 594 (Pon. 2016).

If a loan is in default and the promissory note contains an acceleration clause, the lender may choose to accelerate payment of the entire amount due and payable under the note. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 172 (Pon. 2017).

A bank seeking attorney's fees as part of its loan collection lawsuit is not engaging in the unauthorized practice of law because the bank is not practicing law – its duly admitted attorney is, and there is no fee-splitting involved as an attorney fee award is solely the property of the client, not the attorney. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 173 (Pon. 2017).

When a promissory note contains a clause under which the bank, in the event of a default, is entitled to reasonable attorney's fees, expenses and costs of collection, the borrowers thus agreed to the imposition of reasonable attorney's fees and costs of collection if they defaulted on their payment obligation to the bank. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 173 (Pon. 2017).

In general, in debt collection cases, reasonable attorney's fees are limited to not more than 15% of the principal amount due. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 174 (Pon. 2017).

A borrower cannot make a bank liable for payment for further construction work (in effect, requiring the bank to make a further loan to the borrower) without the bank's consent. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 181 (Pon. 2017).

When a borrower's credit life insurance policy was for a four-year term and expired about eighteen years before the borrower's death, the claim for insurance coverage to cover the borrower's debt is invalid. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 642-43 (Pon. 2018).

FSM Development Bank loans that are determined to be no longer collectable are subject to write-off, but when the mortgaged parcel securing the loan is still generating income, in the form of monthly rent, the loan is still deemed to be capable of being paid off. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 643-44 (Pon. 2018).

A borrower's death does not automatically make an FSM Development Bank loan subject to a write-off. Rather, the death is only one criteria to be considered. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 644 (Pon. 2018).

An administrator of a decedent's estate is liable to manage the estate, including the decedent's debts and liabilities – financial or pecuniary obligations. A decedent's debt passes down to her estate's administrator to manage and settle. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 644 & n.9 (Pon. 2018).

– Orders in Aid of Judgment

FSM law allows imprisonment of a debtor for "not more than six months" if he is "adjudged in contempt as a civil matter" for failure "without good cause to comply with any order in aid of judgment." 6 F.S.M.C. 1412. The inability of a judgment debtor to comply with an order in aid of judgment without fault on his part after his exercise of due diligence constitutes "good cause" within the meaning of the statute. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 452 (App. 1996).

In order to hold a debtor in contempt for failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment it is not enough that the debtor's noncompliance was found to be willful. There must also be a recital, or a finding somewhere in the record, that the debtor was able to comply. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 453 (App. 1996).

A non-party is deprived of due process of law when a case is started against it without notice or it having been made a party, when an order in aid of judgment has been issued against the non-party without a judgment and a hearing held following notice, and when a writ of execution has been issued against a non-party and without notice or hearing to determine the amount to be executed upon. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 8 FSM R. 301, 304 (Chk. 1998).

The statute authorizing issuance of an order in aid of judgment, 6 F.S.M.C. 1409, presents two issues: the debtor's ability to pay, and the most expeditious way that payment can be accomplished. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 312, 316 (Chk. 1998).

A court has an interest in insuring that its orders are heeded, and this interest exists apart from any interest the parties may have in the litigation. A court may take whatever reasonable steps are appropriate to insure compliance with its orders. It need not rely on the parties themselves to prescribe the way in which its orders will be carried out, or its judgments executed. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 312, 318 (Chk. 1998).

By statute, a court has wide latitude in crafting an order in aid of judgment and may even modify the order on its own motion. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 312, 319 (Chk. 1998).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 701, a private cause of action is provided to any person whose constitutional rights are violated. In order for the remedy provided by 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) to be effective, it must be enforceable. Where the defendant in a civil rights action is a state, this means that the remedy should not be dependent upon subsequent state legislative action, such as appropriation of funds, which would thwart the Congressional mandate that 11 F.S.M.C. 701 is meant to implement. Accordingly, the FSM Supreme Court is not precluded from issuing an order in aid of judgment against a state in the absence of a state legislative appropriation. Davis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 338, 341 (Chk. 1998).

Under 6 F.S.M.C. 1409, an individual judgment debtor is allowed to "retain such property and such portion of his income as may be necessary to provide the reasonable living requirements of the debtor and his dependents," but if the debtor has some limited ability to pay, the court can order some payment. Davis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 338, 342 (Chk. 1998).

Under 6 F.S.M.C. 1410(2), an order in aid of judgment may provide for the sale of particular assets, such as unencumbered property that is not necessary for the debtor to meet his family and customary obligations, and payment of the net proceeds to the creditor. Davis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 338, 343 (Chk. 1998).

Under 6 F.S.M.C. 1409, the court makes two inquiries: the judgment debtor's ability to pay, and the fastest manner to accomplish payment. Davis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 338, 343 (Chk. 1998).

Because the court must consider the debtor's ability to pay, an order which takes this factor properly into consideration will not result, in and of itself, in the financial undoing of a debtor. Davis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 338, 344 (Chk. 1998).

A motion for an order in aid of judgment against the State of Chuuk to assign sufficient assets to pay a money judgment will be denied because the state may make payments subject only to legislative appropriation. Judah v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 41, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The only purpose of statutes authorizing orders in aid of judgment is to force the payment of a judgment and to provide means to collect a money judgment, which is the same as proceedings for attachment, garnishment or execution. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Trust Territory Code provisions for orders in aid of judgment are not available as against Chuuk because, when it barred the courts' power of attachment, execution and garnishment of public property, the clear legislative intent was to supersede or repeal all provisions of the Trust Territory Code, Title 8 insofar as they allowed seizure of Chuuk state property. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Historically, orders in aid of judgment and orders in aid of execution serve the same purpose and the terms are used interchangeably. Their purpose is to provide a means of discovery to inquire into the assets and ability of a judgment debtor to pay a judgment. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Proceedings in aid of a judgment are supplementary proceedings to enforce a judgment, the same as attachment, execution and garnishment, and as against Chuuk State public property, are prohibited by § 4 of the Chuuk Judiciary Act. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The court may modify any order in aid of judgment as justice may require, at any time, upon the application of either party and notice to the other, or on the court's own motion. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 224, 225 (Chk. 2001).

A court may grant a debtor's motion to modify an order in aid of judgment when the debtor's proposed commitment to pay is reasonable. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 224, 225 (Chk. 2001).

A judgment debtor's request to the court for a hearing, pursuant to 6 F.S.M.C. 1409 to determine its ability to pay the debt and the fastest means to pay and satisfy the judgment constitutes a motion for an order in aid of judgment. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 316 (Chk. 2001).

Either party may apply for an order in aid of judgment. Once it has, the court must, after notice to the opposite party, hold a hearing on the question of the debtor's ability to pay and determine the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment based on the finding. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 316-17 (Chk. 2001).

Although under FSM law once an application for an order in aid of judgment has been filed no writ of execution may issue except under an order in aid of judgment or by special order of the court, it is uncertain what effect, if any, this (or the Chuuk state law prohibiting attachment, execution, or garnishment of Chuuk public property) would have on courts in jurisdictions outside the Federated States of Micronesia. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 317 (Chk. 2001).

The procedure for a judgment creditor to obtain an order in aid of judgment and the authority for a court to issue one is contained in section 55 of Title 8 of the Trust Territory Code, which, under the Chuuk Constitution's Transition Clause, is still applicable law in Chuuk. Section 55, by its terms, does not bar its application to a government judgment debtor. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 600 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Section 4 of the Chuuk Judiciary Act of 1990 denies courts the power of attachment, execution and garnishment of public property. Thus, a court may issue an order in aid of judgment addressed to the state, but is barred from issuing any order in aid of judgment that acts as an attachment, execution and garnishment of public property. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 600 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Any order in aid of judgment may, be modified by the trial court at any time upon application of either party and notice to the other, or on the court's own motion. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 600 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

It is generally within the Chuuk State Supreme Court's power to issue an order in aid of judgment. This power derives from the court's power to issue all writs for equitable and legal relief. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 53 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In deciding whether to issue an order in aid of judgment, the court is presented with two issues: 1) the debtor's ability to pay, and 2) the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay the judgment based upon the finding of ability to pay. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 53 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

As a matter of law, the court cannot issue an order directing the state to pay money absent an appropriation therefor. The inquiry, then, is how, when funds are available to pay judgments, the court can assist a judgment creditor in getting his judgment paid in the fastest manner. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 53 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In addressing the question of how best to assure payment of a judgment in "the fastest manner," the court is mindful of the fact that it has wide latitude in crafting an order in aid of judgment. While the court cannot direct the Legislature to appropriate money to pay a judgment, it does have the authority to compel the Director of Treasury, and the Governor, through mandamus, to meet their non-discretionary duty to pay judgments in a fair and non-discriminatory manner. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A judgment creditor needing continuing medical care resulting from a state employee's negligent or wilful conduct, may apply to the court for specific relief, and assuming funds have been appropriated for payment of the state's judgment debts which remain undisbursed and available, any such judgment creditor shall receive payment on his or her judgment regardless of the judgment's date of entry. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The statutory remedy for violations of an order in aid of judgment is that if any debtor fails without good cause to comply with any order in aid of judgment, he may be adjudged in contempt as a civil matter. The inability of a judgment debtor to comply with an order in aid of judgment without fault on his part after his exercise of due diligence constitutes "good cause." Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 374 (App. 2003).

When the judgment-debtor's Social Security retirement benefits are received by him and have not been subjected to any sort of direct levy, allotment or garnishment or any execution, attachment, or assignment of these benefits and when these benefits may be commingled with any other income the debtor may have available to him, and from these funds he meets his living expenses and his other obligations, the trial court's order in aid of judgment does not require that the payment come from any particular source of income. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 379 (App. 2003).

There is no violation of the 53 F.S.M.C. 604 susceptibility of benefits rule, when there has been no execution, attachment, garnishment, or assignment of the judgment-debtor's Social Security retirement benefits and when the trial court's order in aid of judgment specifically found that the judgment-debtor would have sufficient funds for his and his dependents' basic support. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 380 (App. 2003).

While the trial court does not violate the Constitution's involuntary servitude provision when it orders a judgment-debtor to seek immediate employment, when the judgment-debtor has presented evidence that he is unable to work, the trial court must make specific findings with regard to his fitness for work before it orders him to seek immediate employment. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 386 (App. 2003).

A major purpose for granting consolidation of judgments is to establish the payment priority for the consolidated judgments and to implement an orderly payment plan involving one, instead of multiple, orders in aid of judgments. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2003).

A judgment-creditor's right to the issuance of a writ of execution is provided for by statute, as is the right to obtain an order in aid of judgment. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2003).

An FSM judgment-debtor can, if he so chooses, prevent the issuance of a writ of execution because any party, either the judgment-creditor or the judgment-debtor may apply for an order in aid of judgment and once a party has applied for an order in aid of judgment, the judgment-creditor is statutorily barred from obtaining a writ of execution except as part of an order in aid of judgment or by special order of the court for cause shown. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2003).

A judgment-creditor who has obtained an order in aid of judgment should be accorded the same status as a judgment creditor who has obtained a writ of execution because both methods of enforcing a money judgment are provided for by statute and both methods show that the judgment creditor has taken the effort and exhibited diligence greater than that of a mere judgment-creditor. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2003).

Judgment-creditors with execution creditor status are to be paid on the basis of a first-in-time, first-in-right rule according to the dates of the individual parties' writs. The pro rata payment basis is the rule for unsecured judgment-creditors who do not hold execution creditor status or a statutory lien priority. Because holders of orders in aid of judgment are accorded the status of execution creditors, those judgment-creditors will be paid in order according to the date of either their first writ of execution or their first order in aid of judgment. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 528-29 (Chk. 2003).

While the Chuuk Financial Control Commission is precluded from paying any court ordered judgments unless specifically appropriated by law, it must, in a timely manner, develop in consultation with the Governor and Attorney General subsequent legislation for appropriation or other purposes for consideration by the Chuuk Legislature to address court judgments. That the Commission has disclaimed this responsibility imparted is in material part a basis for the court's ruling that ordering Chuuk to pay the judgment through taking the first step in that direction by proposing a payment plan is not a workable means of obtaining a satisfaction of the judgment, and the parlous state of Chuuk's finances is more reason, not less, why it should have been forthcoming with a plan for payment. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 540 (Chk. 2003).

On motion for an order in aid of judgment, the court must determine both the question of the judgment debtor's ability to pay and the fastest manner in which payment can reasonably be made. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 542 (Chk. 2003).

Courts have the power to issue all writs for equitable and legal relief, except the power of attachment, execution and garnishment of public property. This statutory prohibition has been held to prohibit the issuance of an order in aid of judgment against Chuuk. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 651 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A stipulated judgment, even after court approval, cannot confer jurisdiction on a court to issue an order in aid of judgment against Chuuk in direct contravention of a statute. Regardless of the stipulated judgment's language, the court simply cannot violate the statute and issue an order in aid of judgment against Chuuk. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 651 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When no appropriation has been made, general or otherwise, for the payment of judgments, even if the court were to issue an order in aid of judgment, and even if the state government were to identify funds from some other source for payment of the judgment, the Chuuk Financial Control Commission would be precluded from approving the payment pursuant to the order in aid of judgment since it is precluded from paying any court ordered judgements unless specifically appropriated by law. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Under a Chuuk State Supreme Court decision, if money was appropriated to pay court judgments, the oldest judgment must be paid in full before any payment could be made on the next oldest judgment. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

An order in aid of judgment only requires future payment according to its terms, which invariably will not be immediate payment in full, and which may later be modified. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 66 (Chk. 2003).

An order in aid of judgment, unlike a writ of execution, may only be obtained after application and notice to the other party and a hearing instead of the prompt issuance possible for a writ of execution. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 66 (Chk. 2003).

A judgment-creditor (or its attorney) must evaluate which method (writ of execution or order in aid of judgment) is most likely to best satisfy its judgment unless the judgment-debtor has already foreclosed that choice by applying for an order in aid of judgment. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 66-67 (Chk. 2003).

An order in aid of judgment generally deals not only with funds and assets currently in a judgment-debtor's possession but also with funds that are expected to come into the judgment-debtor's possession in the future. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 72 (Chk. 2003).

When the court has found the defendants in civil contempt, it may order them imprisoned until such time as they comply with the orders issued to date and/or pay an amount necessary to compensate the court and plaintiff for the wasted time and expense involved in having held and set over pretrial conferences that the defendants never timely rescheduled nor attended; but if, in the court's opinion, imprisonment is a less suitable punishment than a ruling that by its nature will move this litigation to its conclusion, and when the defendant's only asserted defense to having defaulted on the underlying promissory note was his unemployment and inability to pay and he is now employed, the court may order the defendants to settle the case and file a stipulated judgment or the court will strike defendants' answer and enter a default judgment against the defendants, grant a motion for order in aid of judgment, the plaintiff files one, hold a hearing thereon, make findings as to the defendants' ability to pay, and if warranted, order the defendants' wages garnished for such amount as the court deems appropriate in light of those findings. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ladore, 12 FSM R. 169, 171-72 (Pon. 2003).

When a person has entered the plaintiff's parcel on at least two occasions and harvested crops in violation of the court's decision that the plaintiff is the fee simple owner of the parcel, an injunction will issue against that person and the defendants which prohibits further trespass and taking of crops from the parcel, and the defendants will be given a reasonable time to remove a local hut that they have constructed on parcel. Edwin v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 12 FSM R. 220, 222 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment and an injunction can be grounds for a contempt proceeding. Edwin v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 12 FSM R. 220, 222 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The trial court will not extend the right to a writ of garnishment against the state beyond that affirmed by the appellate division in Chuuk v. Davis and will therefore deny a judgment-creditor's request to seize local revenues by the only means logical, a writ of garnishment directed to the FSM national government, when his damages are strictly economic in nature. The suggested alternative, a more drastic step of an order seizing and auctioning the state legislative officers' new vehicles will also be denied. Barrett v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2006).

The trial court can issue an order in aid of judgment requiring the state executive branch to submit, within thirty days of entry of this order, an appropriation request to the Legislature for funds to satisfy the judgment. Barrett v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 509, 511 (Chk. 2006).

Civil Rule 6(d) provides that all motions shall contain certification by the movant that a reasonable effort has been made to obtain the opposing party's agreement or acquiescence and that no such agreement has been forthcoming, but a motion for an order in aid of judgment, which is what the court must consider a motion for a writ of garnishment to be, is governed by statute, and that statute does not require that a movant first seek the opposing party's agreement or acquiescence before moving for an order in aid of judgment. The procedural rules are not meant to alter that statutory scheme. Tipingeni v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 539, 542 (Chk. 2007).

A judgment-creditor's motion that asks for a court order to assist it in obtaining, or to facilitate, the payment of a money judgment, is a motion for an order in aid of judgment regardless of what the movant has called it because a thing is what it is regardless of what someone chooses to call it. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 42 & n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The procedure for a judgment creditor to obtain an order in aid of judgment and the authority for a court to issue one, is contained in section 55 of Title 8 of the Trust Territory Code, which requires the court, after notice to the opposite party, to hold a hearing on the question of the debtor's ability to pay and to determine the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment based on the finding. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When no hearing was held before the court issued its December 14, 2001 order in aid of judgment and no finding was made on the debtor's ability to pay in December 2001, the December 14, 2001 order was issued in violation of the State's right to due process and the order constitutes an abuse of the trial court's discretion. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the State has not made the appropriation act a part of the record, the appellate court is unable to determine whether the $20,000 ordered payment to a judgment-creditor violated the terms of that statute or whether it was only contrary to the Executive branch's hoped-for distribution of the appropriated funds. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 42-43 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The trial court must not issue any orders in aid of judgment against the State without affording the State notice and an opportunity to be heard and a finding that the State has the physical and legal ability to pay. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Section 4 of the Chuuk Judiciary Act of 1990 denies courts the power of attachment, execution and garnishment of public property. Thus, a court may issue an order in aid of judgment addressed to a governmental body, but is barred from issuing any order in aid of judgment that acts as an attachment, execution and garnishment of public property. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 232 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The procedure for a judgment creditor to obtain an order in aid of judgment and the authority for a court to issue one is contained in section 55 of Title 8 of the Trust Territory Code, which is still applicable law in Chuuk. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 233 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The statute requires that an order in aid of judgment hearing can only be held after an application for an order in aid of judgment and notice of that application has been given to the opposing party. Since an application for an order in aid of judgment must be made an adequate time for notice before the motion hearing, it must be made in writing. The Civil Rules provide that adequate time for service of the notice is not later than 5 days before the time specified for the hearing. Therefore, in order to obtain an order in aid of judgment, a party must serve a written motion on the opposing party at least five days before the specified hearing date. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 233 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The trial court cannot issue an order in aid of judgment without first making a finding about the debtor's ability to pay. In the case of a governmental debtor, this finding must include the debtor's legal ability to pay (e.g., whether money has been appropriated that can legally be applied to that debt). Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 233 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Any order in aid of judgment may be modified by the court as justice may require, at any time, upon application of either party and notice to the other, or on the court's own motion. But a court cannot decide its own motion without first giving either party notice or an opportunity to be heard because that would violate a litigant's due process rights guaranteed by both the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions since notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 234 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A trial judge's calculated and repeated disregard of governing rules of orders in aid of judgment would also support the issuance of a writ of prohibition that the trial judge issue no further orders in aid of judgment without complying with the statute and without first ruling on the pending motion to stay. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 234 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

After obtaining a judgment, the judgment holder is entitled by statute to seek an order in aid of judgment to force payment and determine the best means to effectuate such payment. The purpose of an order in aid of judgment is to provide a means of discovery to inquire into the assets and ability of a judgment debtor to pay a judgment. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp. v. Billimon, 15 FSM R. 290, 293 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Once a party has applied for an order in aid of judgment, the court must, after notice to the opposite party, hold a hearing on the question of the debtor's ability to pay and determine the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment based on the finding. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp. v. Billimon, 15 FSM R. 290, 293 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A plaintiff's motion for a temporary restraining order filed after judgment had already been entered against the defendant and after the plaintiff had already requested an order in aid of judgment will be denied since the plaintiff has an available remedy in its motion for an order in aid of judgment and since it seeks to restrain funds in the hands of a third party without a specific determination as to the defendant's right to any part of those funds. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp. v. Billimon, 15 FSM R. 290, 293 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An order in aid of judgment is not appropriate when the prevailing party seeks an order evicting an alleged successor-in-interest and non-party because an order in aid of judgment is only appropriate when seeking satisfaction of a money judgment and the matter does not involve a money judgment. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 537 (Pon. 2008).

The process to enforce a judgment for the payment of money may be a writ of execution or an order in aid of judgment. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 537 (Pon. 2008).

Once either party has moved for an order in aid of judgment, the court, after notice to the opposite party, must hold a hearing on the question of the debtor's ability to pay and determine the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment based on its finding. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 637 (Pon. 2008).

Payment by cash on hand is always the fastest way in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment. The next fastest way to pay is through the sale of highly liquid assets that can readily be reduced to cash. Unlike stock in closely-held corporations for which there is no readily identifiable market for their shares or easily ascertained value, stock, which is traded daily on major stock exchanges and the prices reported, is almost as liquid as cash. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 638-39 (Pon. 2008).

The court can, as an act of grace to prevent undue hardship, permit withholding from payment to the judgment-creditor any sums that might be due in taxes because of the order in aid of judgment since the court may make provision for tax payments to non-parties in its court judgments when a judgment causes a party to incur tax liability. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 137-38 (Pon. 2008).

The presence of the debtors' property in a Guam brokerage account does not affect the validity of an order in aid of judgment. While generally a court does not have jurisdiction over property in another jurisdiction because it cannot enforce its orders there, the court does have jurisdiction over the judgment-debtor's person. Thus, if the court were to order a debtor to sell property in another country and to pay or deposit the proceeds with some person or the court, and, if the judgment-debtor did not obey that order, the court could then impose sanctions on the debtor, such as, civil contempt of court to coerce the judgment-debtor's compliance or criminal contempt of court to punish the judgment-debtor's disobedience. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 138 (Pon. 2008).

Process to enforce a judgment for the payment of money may be a writ of execution or an order in aid of judgment. Barrett v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 229, 234 (App. 2009).

By statute, contempt proceedings to enforce judgments and orders in aid of judgment are meant to be civil matters. Further, by statute, orders in aid of judgment require hearings in which the court determines the judgment debtor's ability to pay. Since a judgment debtor is present at such hearings, no order in aid of judgment can logically issue without the court's determination of the debtor's ability to pay and the debtor's knowledge of the order in aid. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 226 (Kos. 2010).

In the context of failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment, there are four points in time when there may be a question of ability to pay: 1) when the order in aid was issued; 2) when the debtor misses a payment; 3) when the motion is submitted; and 4) when the hearing is held. Because the court assesses ability to pay when the order in aid is issued, the first point is irrelevant and because civil contempt is not used to punish past misconduct, ability to pay at the second point is similarly irrelevant, unless the moving party wishes to request criminal contempt proceedings, in which case the court may refer the matter to the appropriate government prosecutor. The remaining times are when the motion is submitted, and when the hearing is held. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 226 (Kos. 2010).

Traditionally, the movant has the burden to show that the debtor has the ability to comply with the court order; once this burden has been met, it is then the debtor's burden to show that he no longer has the ability to comply through no fault of his own despite due diligence. Thus, it is the moving party's burden not only to submit a proper motion for a show cause hearing, but also, at the hearing, to prove by a preponderance that the judgment debtor has the ability to pay. If the movant cannot provide evidentiary support, or certify his information and belief that such support is likely after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery, the court must deny the motion, but if the court does set a hearing and order parties to appear, and if at the hearing the moving party presents such evidence, only then will the burden shift to the debtor to show that he does not in fact have the ability to pay. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 226-27 (Kos. 2010).

If a debtor cannot overcome the moving party's evidence that the debtor in fact had the ability to pay when the motion was submitted, the court will find him in contempt only if he still has the same ability to pay at the time of the hearing; and in either case the moving party may request a separate adjudication as to criminal contempt. If the debtor did not have the ability to pay when the motion was submitted, the court will not entertain any request for a separate adjudication as to criminal contempt and will find him in contempt only if he has regained the same ability to pay at the time of the hearing. If the debtor's ability to pay at the time of the hearing is diminished, the court will not find him in contempt, but may issue a modified order in aid. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 227 (Kos. 2010).

Under the FSM national law regarding enforcement of judgments, the exemption for necessities for trade or occupation is defined as tools, implements, utensils, two work animals, and equipment necessary to enable the person to carry on his usual occupation. By a plain reading of the statute's language, a rental house, and by extension, the land on which it stands, is not such a necessity. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 323 (Kos. 2011).

Under FSM law, land or an interest in land owned solely by a judgment debtor in his own right may be ordered sold or transferred under an order in aid of judgment, provided the court deems that justice so requires and finds that the debtor will have sufficient land remaining after the sale to support himself and his dependents. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 323-24 (Kos. 2011).

When the judgment-creditor, by its offer to subdivide a parcel so as to ensure that the debtor's daughter and son-in-law can continue to live in the house on the parcel's back portion, has gone out of its way to accommodate not only the letter but the spirit of the law, the court concludes that a fee simple interest in land may be attached and executed under national law and that the creditor's proposal would leave the debtor with sufficient land to support her and her dependents. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 324 (Kos. 2011).

When a creditor is seeking a judicial power of sale that would subdivide a parcel, Kos. S.C. § 11.404(1)'s subdivision language is inapplicable because it applies to private powers of sale. FSM Dev. Ban k v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 324 (Kos. 2011).

When seeking to enforce a judgment against the State of Chuuk, the full set of factors a trial court should consider are: 1) the nature of the judgment, such as whether the judgment is in tort or contract, whether the judgment is full or partial, and whether or not the judgment includes a civil rights component; 2) whether or not the debtor has acted in good or bad faith in its attempts to satisfy the judgment; 3) the length of time the judgment has gone unsatisfied; 4) the ability of the debtor to pay; and 5) the balance of interests. Such factors are best weighed by the trial court. Stephen v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 453, 461 (App. 2011).

Statutorily, a motion for an order in aid of judgment requires a hearing at which the trial court assesses the debtor's ability to pay the judgment. Stephen v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 453, 461 n.4 (App. 2011).

When a trial court has the power to fashion an alternative remedy, but a party neither files a request for such alternative nor urges it at a hearing for the remedy the party actually requested and when the trial court has not foreclosed the possibility of the alternative remedy, the trial court has not abused its discretion by not fashioning its own relief. Stephen v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 453, 462 (App. 2011).

Upon remand, and as part of the factors for considering orders in aid of judgment, the trial court should spell out the nature of the judgment, so as to provide clarity and avoid obfuscation of issues. Stephen v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 453, 462 (App. 2011).

When Chuuk's deficiencies in addressing its judgment debt stem not so much from bad faith as it does from general fiscal ineptitude and from the lack of a sense of urgency or of a judgment's importance, the court will not doubt that Chuuk has made good faith efforts to address its debt problems and to reduce its overall debt. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25-26 (Chk. 2011).

The court will not make six and a half years after a civil rights judgment the magic date after which the judgment-holder can begin to seek the judgment's collection through extraordinary measures. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 26 (Chk. 2011).

When Chuuk has a limited ability to make some payment on the judgment but does not have the ability to pay the judgment in full at one time; when, if the court were to garnish the funds held in Chuuk's current account with the FSM for the full amount, it is unlikely that the garnished funds would satisfy the judgment but it is certain that such a garnishment would seriously hinder Chuuk's ability to function since the Chuuk Legislature, having estimated the amount that would be available from this source, has appropriated such sums for various vital uses, the court characterized the judgment's size as unwieldy as there is a strong public interest in Chuuk having sufficient fiscal resources to maintain a minimum level of basic and essential public services such that the public's health, safety, and welfare are not jeopardized and it would be an onerous burden on Chuuk's governmental operations to evict Chuuk from part of its warehouse. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 26 (Chk. 2011).

Since the trial court can, on application, endeavor to find a workable way in which to eventually pay the judgment as quickly as reasonably possible and issue writs for less than the full judgment amount, the court will issue a writ of garnishment for compensation for the taking of the plaintiff's retained property during two years, and if no further payments are made on the judgment within the next six months, the plaintiff may then apply for another writ of garnishment. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 26 (Chk. 2011).

The parties are free to stipulate how any payment on a judgment should be applied – what part of the judgment it should be applied to – but that in the absence of such an agreement, the court would usually presume any payment to be a general payment on the judgment as a whole. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 27 (Chk. 2011).

Funds received from U.S. military retirement and U.S. Social Security benefits are not the type of property that qualify as exemptions under 6 F.S.M.C. 1414 because the U.S. statutes have no force and effect outside of U.S. territory. Bank of Hawaii v. Dison, 18 FSM R. 161, 164 (Pon. 2012).

A writ of execution levied on an account in the Bank of Guam, Pohnpei branch, was directed toward funds held in a local bank, authorized to conduct banking transactions under FSM law, and did not assign, garnish, attach, execute, or levy on U.S. Social Security or military retirement benefits, but executed on funds on deposit in the FSM. Bank of Hawaii v. Dison, 18 FSM R. 161, 164 (Pon. 2012).

Since the statutory exemptions on judicial enforcement of judgments pertaining to U.S. Social Security and U.S. military retirement benefits are provided for by U.S. statutes and the judicial enforcement of FSM judgments is governed by FSM statutes, a judgment-debtor whose income is U.S. Social Security and U.S. military retirement benefits and who has the ability to pay will be ordered to make monthly payments toward the satisfaction of the judgment. Bank of Hawaii v. Dison, 18 FSM R. 161, 164 (Pon. 2012).

Interests in land are not subject to a writ of execution, but any interest in land owned solely by a judgment debtor, in his own right, may be ordered sold or transferred under an order in aid of judgment if the court making the order deems that justice so requires and finds as a fact that after the sale or transfer, the debtor will have sufficient land remaining to support himself and those persons directly dependent on him according to recognized local custom and FSM law. Saimon v. Wainit, 18 FSM R. 211, 214 (Chk. 2012).

Since homes and lands are not personal property, a writ of execution cannot be used to force their sale or rental to satisfy a judgment. A judgment-creditor must proceed through an order in aid of judgment to reach such assets. An evidentiary hearing under 6 F.S.M.C. 1410(1) is a necessary step of that process. Saimon v. Wainit, 18 FSM R. 211, 214 (Chk. 2012).

If a judgment creditor seeks to attach and sell any land personally owned by a judgment debtor in his own right, the judgment creditor must seek an order in aid of judgment and at the 6 F.S.M.C. 1410(1) order in aid of judgment hearing must produce sufficient evidence that the court can deem that justice so requires and can find as a fact that after the sale, the judgment debtor will have sufficient land remaining to support himself and any those persons directly dependent on him. Saimon v. Wainit, 18 FSM R. 211, 215 (Chk. 2012).

The trial court did not err in denying the defendants' motion to raise the minimum bid price when the motion was filed after the sale was held and the defendants were appealing the sale price but not the sale itself and the sale was conducted 56 days after the amended order in aid of judgment setting a minimum sale price was entered. Helgenberger v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 498, 500-01 (App. 2013).

Since the trial court retains jurisdiction to enforce a judgment even though it has been appealed, a judgment holder may, in the absence of a stay, seek to enforce its judgment, and a hearing to enforce or modify existing orders in aid of the existing judgment will proceed as scheduled because Congress has, by statute, has authorized judgment holders to use these methods to enforce valid money judgments. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 19 FSM R. 128, 130 (Pon. 2013).

The procedure for issuing an order in aid of judgment is governed by statute. The court, after notice to the opposite party, must hold a hearing on the question of the debtor's ability to pay and determine the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment based on the finding. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 133, 135 (Pon. 2013).

The trial court cannot issue an order in aid of judgment without first making a finding about the debtor's ability to pay, which, in the case of a governmental debtor, must include the debtor's legal ability to pay, that is, whether money has been appropriated that can legally be applied to that debt. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 133, 135 (Pon. 2013).

In the usual case, the payment of a money judgment against a state must abide a legislative appropriation since due respect must be given to the constitutional separation of powers. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 133, 135-36 (Pon. 2013).

The usual first step for an order in aid of judgment against a state when there are no appropriated funds available for that purpose is to order the state executive to submit an appropriation bill, and since legislative appropriation can be a time-consuming process, the state must be given a reasonable time and opportunity to complete the process and be given further opportunity to meet its obligation in some other manner before a plaintiff can resort to a writ of garnishment. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 133, 136 (Pon. 2013).

Since the payment of judgments is not a representation expense in the course of the Pohnpei Governor's official public relations, the court cannot issue an order in aid of judgment to use those funds to pay a judgment. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 133, 136 (Pon. 2013).

A request to order the Pohnpei Governor to reprogram funds or to use his representation funds to pay a judgment will be denied. The judgment holder must await the outcome of the legislative process. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 133, 136 (Pon. 2013).

The FSM social security non-assignment of benefits statute, 53 F.S.M.C. 604, does not bar legal process such as orders in aid of judgment from reaching FSM social security benefits. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161 (App. 2013).

Congress enacted an exemption statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 1415, and courts cannot broaden statutes beyond their original meaning. Nor do courts have the power to amend a statute. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161 (App. 2013).

There is no true conflict between the U.S. statues exempting U.S. military retirement benefits and U.S. social security benefits and the FSM exempt property statute because the U.S. statutes provide exemptions from judgments rendered and enforced in the U.S., and the FSM statute provides what property is exempt from judgments rendered and enforced in the FSM. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 162 (App. 2013).

A trial court did not abuse its discretion in applying only FSM, and not U.S., statutory law in determining whether property is exempt from legal process in the FSM. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 162 (App. 2013).

A $300 payment on a 1998 judgment could not have reduced the principal by $300, and considering the age of the judgment and how little has been paid, it likely did not reduce the principal at all. Therefore the part of the trial court order in aid of judgment reducing the judgment principal by $300 is reversed. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219-20 (App. 2013).

The purpose of an order-in-aid-of-judgment hearing is for the trial court to examine the question of the judgment debtor's ability to pay and determine the fastest way in which the judgment debtor can reasonably satisfy the judgment. A writ of execution (or garnishment or attachment) can issue as part of an order in aid of judgment. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 220 (App. 2013).

When the $50 monthly payments barely cover the monthly interest plus some of the accrued interest, if some of the rental payments to the judgment debtor can be garnished while complying with Kosrae Code § 6.2409(1) that allows debtors to retain property and income to provide reasonable living requirements, the trial court must do so unless there is an even faster way to satisfy the judgment. This is for the trial court to determine at a hearing where the parties present the necessary evidence for a determination. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 220 (App. 2013).

A judgment creditor has discovery tools available to him under Kosrae Civil Procedure Rule 69(a) under which a judgment creditor may obtain discovery from any person, including the judgment debtor. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 220 n.6 (App. 2013).

Often at an order-in-aid-of-judgment hearing, the judgment debtor, having been subpoenaed as a witness by the judgment creditor, will be called to testify, about his or her finances, assets, income, and ability to pay. Based on this evidence and other evidence the judgment creditor has introduced through other witness testimony or documentary exhibits, as well as any evidence similarly introduced by the judgment debtor, the trial judge makes his findings about the fastest way in which the judgment debtor can reasonably satisfy the judgment and fashions his order in aid of judgment accordingly. Argument of counsel is not evidence on which the court can base its factual findings. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 220-21 (App. 2013).

When the order-in-aid-of-judgment hearing is on the judgment creditor's motion, his counsel should have the opportunity to present his evidence and his witnesses first and the judgment debtor's counsel should present his side next with the judgment editor's counsel having any last words. Any future order-in-aid-of-judgment hearing should follow this procedure. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 221 (App. 2013).

When the previous sale of the RS Plaza Building still left a substantial outstanding balance, 6 F.S.M.C. 1409 allows for a successive request for an order in aid of judgment because the judgment has not been satisfied in full. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104 (Chk. 2015).

A writ of garnishment directing rent payments to the judgment creditor from the debtor corporation's commercial tenant, constitutes a proper exercise of the court's authority under the order-in-aid-judgment statute. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104 (Chk. 2015).

When a meritorious defense has not been portrayed, the defendants' requests to set aside or vacate the default judgment, order(s) in aid of judgment, and writ of garnishment will be denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104 (Chk. 2015).

A writ of ne exeat would require the defendant to surrender her passport and prevent her from leaving the FSM until she complies with all court orders and pays tax arrearages in full. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 128, 130 (Pon. 2015).

The writ ne exeat republica is an obscure writ that is ancient, and infrequently used, and is an extraordinary writ which should issue only in exceptional cases. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 128, 130 (Pon. 2015).

In the absence of a stay obtained in accordance with Rule 62(d), the pendency of an appeal does not prevent the judgment-creditor from acting to enforce the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 315, 318 (Pon. 2016).

Notwithstanding a notice of appeal's general effect, the trial court retains jurisdiction to determine matters collateral or incidental to the judgment and may act in aid of the appeal. Because the mere filing of a notice of appeal does not affect the judgment's validity, the trial court retains jurisdiction to enforce the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 315, 318 (Pon. 2016).

Post-judgment discovery from any person is expressly available. The judgment creditor or a successor in interest when that interest appears of record, may, in aid of the judgment or execution, obtain discovery from any person, including the judgment debtor. The judgment creditor is allowed discovery to find out about assets on which execution can issue or about assets that have been fraudulently transferred or are otherwise beyond the reach of execution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 329, 333 (Pon. 2016).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court cannot issue an order directing the payment of money by Chuuk State absent an appropriation therefor. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 530 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

If a judgment creditor wants Chuuk to furnish money to pay his judgment now, he must seek an appropriation from the Chuuk Legislature that includes it or that can be used to pay it. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 530-31 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Since the principle that funds appropriated for other purposes cannot be redirected to pay judgments is inherent in the separation-of-powers scheme in the Chuuk Constitution, the Chuuk State Supreme Court cannot levy any writs on Chuuk state funds because those writs would be levied on money that the Chuuk Legislature has already appropriated for another purpose. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Chuuk State Law No. 190-08, § 4 does not bar the issuance of an order in aid of judgment addressed to the state, but does bar the issuance of any order in aid of judgment that acts as an attachment, execution, or garnishment of public property. The general rule is that statutes (and case law) barring the issuance of such writs against public property are a constitutionally valid expression of the separation of powers doctrine recognizing the legislative branch's power to appropriate funds and the judicial branch's lack of power to appropriate funds. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

For a money judgment against the state to be paid there must be an appropriation by the Legislature and the courts have no power to compel an appropriation. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 532 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Under Rule 69, the judgment creditor, in aid of the judgment or execution, may obtain discovery from any person, including the judgment debtor. Rule 69 was intended to establish an effective and efficient means of securing the execution of judgments. As part of the process, it provides for securing information relating to the judgment-debtor's assets. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 592, 594-95 (Pon. 2016).

As required by 6 F.S.M.C. 1409, the court will schedule a hearing on the motions for an order to show cause for the failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment and for an order in aid of judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 592, 595 (Pon. 2016).

When the land whose title transfer is sought was owned only by one defendant, that defendant is the only defendant with standing to oppose the title transfer. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 608, 611 n.1 (Pon. 2016).

Since an order in aid of judgment may provide for the sale of the judgment debtor's particular assets and the payment of that sale's net proceeds to the judgment creditor, a judgment creditor does not have to first acquire title to a particular asset before it is sold for the creditor's benefit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 608, 612 (Pon. 2016).

Since a statute provides for the sale of a judgment debtor's particular non-exempt assets with the net proceeds to be paid to the judgment creditor and since such an order may be made only after a hearing on a motion for an order in aid of judgment, when such a hearing was held and the judgment debtor appeared at that hearing and agreed to the land's sale, the court may issue an order in aid of judgment that contained an order of sale for that parcel. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2016).

When no stay pending appeal had been granted, the trial court had the jurisdiction to not only deny the defendants' Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment, but it also had the jurisdiction to enforce the money judgment by mortgage foreclosure. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

The trial court's issuance of an order transferring title six days after the bank filed its motion and notice of payment was not reversible error when an earlier order in aid of judgment required that a court order transferring title to the parcel had to be issued no later than ten days after notice is given of delivery of a cashier's check in the full amount and when the appellants do not contend that there were any procedural defects in the sale on which they could base a challenge to its outcome. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 520 (App. 2018).

In hearings for an order in aid of judgment, the judgment debtor, having been subpoenaed as a witness by the judgment creditor, will testify about his or her finances, assets, income, and his ability to pay, and based on this evidence and other evidence the judgment creditor has introduced through other witness testimony or documentary exhibits, as well as any evidence similarly introduced by the judgment debtor, the trial judge will make findings about the fastest way in which the judgment debtor can reasonably satisfy the judgment and will fashion an order in aid of judgment accordingly. Bank of the FSM v. Ohwa Christian High Sch., 21 FSM R. 645, 648 (Pon. 2018).

When a plaintiff seeks an order in aid of judgment, the court must inquire into the defendant's ability to pay, and when the information the plaintiff seeks pertains to the defendant's income, finances, and could reasonably uncover assets not previously disclosed, the court will deny the defendant's motion to quash the plaintiff's subpoena and subpoena duces tecum. Bank of the FSM v. Ohwa Christian High Sch., 21 FSM R. 645, 648 (Pon. 2018).

When a subpoena duces tecum seeks documents that are reasonable and unoppressive and can address the defendant's ability to reasonably satisfy the judgment, the defendant has not provided good cause for the court to issue a protective order. Bank of the FSM v. Ohwa Christian High Sch., 21 FSM R. 645, 648 (Pon. 2018).

The court is reluctant to order the sale of land in a collection case until other methods of satisfying the money judgment have been tried and are unsuccessful because of the central importance of land in Micronesian culture, and this seems to be the general practice, even by creditors, although no law specifically mandates it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 (Pon. 2020).

The court is subject to the statutory command that the court, in aid of a money judgment, must determine the fastest manner in which the debtor can reasonably pay a judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 n.7 (Pon. 2020).

Since the court must make a reasonable effort to take every step reasonable and necessary to avoid unnecessarily reducing the availability of article XIII, section 1 health care services, the court will note that the FSM Development Bank is legally entitled to an order of sale for the mortgaged medical equipment and to an order enforcing the borrowers' assignments of income and exclusive possession of the medical clinic premises, but the court will not issue such orders contemporaneously with the judgment. The court will hesitate to issue such orders until all reasonable means of satisfying the judgment by other methods have been explored and exhausted, and will thus give special consideration to health care services and assure that their availability is not unreasonably or unnecessarily diminished by any action it takes. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481-82 (Pon. 2020).

The court is required by law to hold a hearing on an application for an order in aid of judgment if either party requests one. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 595 (Kos. 2020).

Collection proceedings against a judgment debtor will not be stayed because the debtor has filed a notice of appeal and has also filed an independent action for relief from the judgment. The usual method to stay the collection of a money judgment is for the defendant to give a supersedeas bond, and when the judgment debtor did not obtain, and did not offer to obtain, a supersedeas bond, and has not stated any basis upon which the court could exercise its discretion to stay the money judgment against him in absence of a bond, he is not entitled to a stay under FSM Civil Rule 62(d). FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 608, 610 (Kos. 2020).

In the absence of a stay, the court has the ability, and the inclination, to protect a judgment-debtor during an appeal by requiring that all sums the judgment-debtor is ordered to pay, be paid into the court's registry where the money would be held awaiting the outcome of the judgment debtor's appeal, with the money delivered to whichever party the appellate court deems proper. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 608, 610-11 (Kos. 2020).

A motion for an order in aid of judgment may be heard by video-conferencing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. 2020).

The statute authorizing issuance of an order in aid of judgment, 6 F.S.M.C. 1409, presents two issues: the debtor's ability to pay, and the most expeditious way that payment can be accomplished. Because the court must consider the debtor's ability to pay, an order which takes this factor properly into consideration will not result, in and of itself, in the debtor's financial undoing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 608, 612 (Kos. 2020).

The court is unable to determine a judgment debtor's ability to pay and the fastest way for the debtor to pay when, although the judgment creditor establishes that the debtor had substantial income, there is no evidence of the debtor's legitimate financial obligations, such as the amount needed to support dependents. The court cannot determine if that amount it should order the debtor to pay is greater than or less than the biweekly sum the creditor asked for. When the court cannot establish with any certainty an appropriate amount, the court has no choice but to deny the motion for an order in aid of judgment, without prejudice to any future order in aid of judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 608, 612 (Kos. 2020).

– Secured Transactions

Because courts generally were concerned that third parties, especially other potential creditors, might rely to their detriment on assets which are in the possession of the borrower but, unknown to the other parties, are subject to a secret lien, there exists in the law a strong general policy against non-possessory and secret liens. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc., 2 FSM R. 281, 279 (Pon. 1986).

The common law of the United States today concerning secured transactions is the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC), a comprehensive statute covering commercial transactions. Absence in the Federated States of Micronesia of any filing requirement to notify others of a security interest, and of a designated place for filing, which provisions are at the heart of the UCC statutory scheme, virtually precludes any judicial attempt to draw heavily on UCC principles in fashioning an approach to secured transactions. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc., 2 FSM R. 281, 287 (Pon. 1986).

In considering the law concerning secured transactions, the FSM Supreme Court must look for guidance of the pre-UCC common law and may only declare the existence of such security interests as have been found by other courts to exist in the absence of statutes. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc., 2 FSM R. 281, 288 (Pon. 1986).

When a party agrees to create a security interest to secure his debt but then refuses to do what is necessary to vest the other party with statutory or common law lien rights in the property, courts can find that the other party has an equitable lien in property even if statutory or common law lien requirements have not been made. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc., 2 FSM R. 281, 290 (Pon. 1986).

Non-possessory equitable liens will not be found to exist against another who had neither actual notice nor reason to know of the existence of the security claim. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc., 2 FSM R. 281, 290 (Pon. 1986).

In absence of an authorized statute, a claim of a chattel mortgage will not be upheld as an equitable lien against third parties who had neither actual notice nor reason to know of the existence of the security claim unless there has been some method of notice so that other interested persons could have a reasonable opportunity to become aware of the security interest. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 340 (Pon. 1988).

A "general security agreement," without more does not establish a lien under common law or pursuant to any statute in the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 342 (Pon. 1988).

Unless a statute or common law principle expressly says otherwise, disclosure is a prerequisite for making a lien effective against other creditors. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 342 (Pon. 1988).

Secured transactions within the Federated States of Micronesia remain subject to the policies applied elsewhere prior to the adoption of the Uniform Commercial Code. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 342 (Pon. 1988).

In the absence of a statute authorizing the recording of security interests, security agreements should be authenticated by a controller, accountant, bookkeeper, or other employee with firsthand, personal knowledge of the secured party's books and records. Bank of Hawaii v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n, 7 FSM R. 659, 663 (Pon. 1996).

A secured interest will not be given priority status when there is no recording statute, thus making it a secret lien, and where there is no transfer of dominion to the lender, and the lender appears to claim a floating interest. Bank of Hawaii v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n, 7 FSM R. 659, 664 (Pon. 1996).

It has long been recognized in the FSM, that secret liens are not enforceable against third parties. Banks in the past have attempted to assert a priority right for unpaid loan balances where the loan was used to purchase chattel property. The court has denied them and refused to uphold the asserted liens against third parties. This is controlling law in the FSM. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 365 (Chk. 2003).

If a judgment-creditor were to attempt to execute against a piece of land for which there was a certificate of title and that certificate showed an outstanding mortgage on the land, or if there was no certificate of title for the land but a mortgage had been duly and properly recorded at the Land Commission so that anyone searching the records there should necessarily find it, then that would be a security interest that was not a secret lien and therefore valid against third parties. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 365 (Chk. 2003).

Because there are no statutory schemes in the FSM to record liens and mortgages on chattel property and provide notice thereof because no Micronesian legislature has established any, except that for vessels, chattel mortgages are therefore secret liens which cannot be enforced against third parties who had neither notice nor reason to know of the security interest claim. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 365 (Chk. 2003).

When the FSM Supreme Court's concern in inquiring into a Guam bankruptcy case was not to determine whether the principles of comity should be applied, but rather whether any order the court might issue would subject a party to liability for contempt in the other court because the party was required by two courts to obey contradictory orders and when that concern has been assuaged, the court will take no position on whether, and under what circumstances, it might recognize U.S. bankruptcy law or proceedings and whether or when comity would apply in such a case. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 366 (Chk. 2003).

Generally, a secured interest will not be given priority status when there is no recording statute, thus making it a secret lien. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

A promissory note and a security agreement are enforceable contractual agreements between the parties. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

Whenever a bank lends money, it always assumes a risk that the borrower will not repay it. The bank tries to manage or lessen its risk by requiring certain information about the borrower and the money's intended use and by evaluating that information before any money is lent. Even if satisfied that the borrower is creditworthy, a bank may also lessen its risk by attaching certain conditions to the loan and by acquiring a security interest in the borrower's collateral. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 281, 286 (Chk. 2009).

If a security interest has been perfected under Title 33, chapter 10 of the FSM Code, the secured party will, by virtue of a judgment, be entitled to foreclose as a post-judgment remedy. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 281, 288 (Chk. 2009).

If a security interest has been perfected, the secured party will, by virtue of a judgment, be entitled to foreclose. This is a post-judgment remedy and the secured party may also have other post-judgment remedies available to it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Chuuk Fresh Tuna, Inc., 16 FSM R. 335, 339 (Chk. 2009).

A pre-judgment possession hearing should be an expedited proceeding because the statute provides that a secured party is entitled to an expedited hearing upon application for a pre-judgment order granting the secured party possession of the collateral. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 569, 571 (Kos. 2013).

A motion to dismiss that was a matter of first impression, had to be carefully considered and denied before the court could proceed with a pre-judgment possession hearing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 569, 571 (Kos. 2013).

The court will deny an attorney's motion to withdraw for financial reasons when substitute counsel certainly cannot be found in time for the pre-judgment possession hearing or the depositions and the pre-judgment possession cannot and will not be delayed because it is statutorily an expedited proceeding. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 569, 571-72 (Kos. 2013).

Since a secured party under a prior transaction may file a notice of the property interest created by the prior transaction within sixty days of the Secured Transactions Act's effective date in the same manner as provided for a notice of a security interest and since the Act became effective on October 2, 2006, a November 29, 2006 filing of a notice of security interest in a prior transaction created a perfected security interest. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 594-95 (Kos. 2013).

The Secured Transactions Act is an existing, applicable FSM statute that covers the pre-judgment seizure of property by a secured party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 595 (Kos. 2013).

When the secured party's application contains a statement under oath verifying the existence of the attached security agreement and identifies two events of the debtor's default; when it has perfected its security interest by properly filing it with the FSM Secured Transactions Filing Office; and when the debtor has defaulted on the loan payments, the secured party has, under 33 F.S.M.C. 1052, a right to take lawful possession of the collateral. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 596 (Kos. 2013).

A mortgagee under the provisions of a chattel mortgage covering all the personal property of the insolvent may, on default, be entitled to take possession of the property and sell it to satisfy his claim. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 596 (Kos. 2013).

When an FSM secured transactions statute mirrors and appears to have been drawn from a U.S. statute, U.S. caselaw construing the U.S. statute may be consulted for guidance in construing the FSM statute. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 596 & n.6 (Kos. 2013).

Since the Secured Transactions Act does not apply to the transfer of an interest in real property except as provided with respect to fixtures, crops, timber to be cut, or minerals to be extracted, a lender cannot have perfected a security interest in a factory building unless it had obtained a mortgage on the factory building (and presumably the land underneath it or an easement) and recorded that mortgage. The lender is therefore not entitled to pre-judgment possession of the factory building since it does not have a perfected security interest in it under the Act. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 597 (Kos. 2013).

Fixtures are goods that are fixed to real property, or are intended to become fixed to real property in a manner that causes a property right to arise in the goods under the prevailing law. Goods are all things that are movable when a security interest attaches and the term includes fixtures. Readily removable factory machines, office machines, and domestic appliances are not fixtures. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

When a security agreement covers fixtures, the secured party may, if it chooses, proceed under the Secured Transactions Act and obtain a 33 F.S.M.C. 1053(3) order for pre-judgment possession of the fixtures. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

A general description of the collateral is sufficient. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

When, except for the factory building, the vehicles, and the inventory, the rest of the listed items on the filing would fit the general description as water bottling machines and equipment needed to produce bottled water and thus be collateral subject to the bank's security interest even if the attachment to the agreement was an illegitimate expansion of the bank's security interests, the bank is therefore entitled, after the debtor has defaulted, to immediate possession of those chattels in which it has a perfected security interest. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

An assignment executed between a bank and a borrower that provides that, in the event of a default, the bank is the sole and exclusive party entitled to possession of the subject property/premises and to operate the subject business and to receive all income therefrom is a right to possession and operation that, although a security interest, is not a security interest that can be, or was, perfected under Title 33, chapter 10, because it involves real property – the factory building – and the incorporeal right to operate the business from that building. On its face, this is an executory contract for which there was an offer, acceptance, definite terms, and consideration. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

While 33 F.S.M.C. 1053 gives a secured party the right to pre-judgment possession of collateral – chattels – in which the secured party has perfected a security interest, it does not authorize the court to issue a pre-judgment order enforcing specific performance of a contract designed to give a lender further security in the event of a default or to issue an order granting the lender pre-judgment possession of property in which it does not have a perfected security interest and in which it could not perfect a security interest. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

The right to a debtor's income is an intangible property right in which a lender could have perfected a security interest. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 599 (Kos. 2013).

The Secured Transactions Act generally recognizes an obligor's liability for any deficiency. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 599 (Kos. 2013).

Besides pre-judgment possession of the collateral, under the Secured Transactions Act, the creditor also has the remedies of writ of attachment and release and modification and may seek a foreclosure action against a debtor's secured or unsecured property whether or not it has taken possession of the collateral. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 599 (Kos. 2013).

In order for a secured party's seizure of collateral to be a waiver of the secured party's right to a deficiency judgment, that waiver ordinarily would have to be expressly provided for in the mortgage documents or in a statute. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 599 (Kos. 2013).

A secured party's possession of the debtor's collateral will not constitute a waiver by the secured party of its right to proceed and obtain a judgment for any deficiency. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 599 (Kos. 2013).

When, although the factory building is real property to which the secured party does not have a right to pre-judgment possession, the secured party must be afforded access to the building so that it may take possession of the chattels to which it does have a right of pre-judgment possession. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 599 (Kos. 2013).

A claim by the Marshall Islands Social Security Administration against a debtor in the FSM is not a secured debt – a claim in which the creditor has a security interest in collateral. It is an unsecured claim. In re Mix, 18 FSM R. 600, 603 (Pon. 2013).

When the defaulting borrowers had executed a chattel mortgage to help secure a loan, and when the bank registered and thereby perfected its security interests in the chattels, the bank is entitled to a judgment on its claim to foreclose its chattel mortgage.

When the borrowers' assignment of income and of exclusive possession was used to secure their indebtedness to the bank and the assignments allowed the borrowers to retain their income and possession of the business premises so long as the loan it secured did not go into default, the bank is entitled to a judgment on its claim to enforce the assignments once the borrowers have defaulted. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2020).

When the borrowers' assignment of income and of exclusive possession was used to secure their indebtedness to the bank and the assignments allowed the borrowers to retain their income and possession of the business premises so long as the loan it secured did not go into default, the bank is entitled to a judgment on its claim to enforce the assignments once the borrowers have defaulted. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2020).

When the FSM Development Bank has a statutory right to reduce its claim to judgment and to foreclose its perfected security interest in the borrowers' medical equipment and also has the contractual right to do the same, the Constitution's Professional Services Clause does not make that contract illegal. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 (Pon. 2020).

Since the court must make a reasonable effort to take every step reasonable and necessary to avoid unnecessarily reducing the availability of article XIII, section 1 health care services, the court will note that the FSM Development Bank is legally entitled to an order of sale for the mortgaged medical equipment and to an order enforcing the borrowers' assignments of income and exclusive possession of the medical clinic premises, but the court will not issue such orders contemporaneously with the judgment. The court will hesitate to issue such orders until all reasonable means of satisfying the judgment by other methods have been explored and exhausted, and will thus give special consideration to health care services and assure that their availability is not unreasonably or unnecessarily diminished by any action it takes. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481-82 (Pon. 2020).

– Setoff

The general rule is that where a creditor has failed to both procure credit insurance paid for by the debtor and to notify the debtor of his failure to procure the insurance requested, prior to loss, the debtor may plead such failure as a defense or setoff. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 250 (Chk. 1995).

Equity does not dictate that a setoff for the amount of a defendant's stock subscription be allowed against a contribution claim when the person claiming the setoff received by far the greatest benefit from the failed corporation while it was operating. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 507 (Pon. 1998).

A statute that requires the creditor to give written notice to the debtor of the creditor's intention to foreclose prior to foreclosing on the property, is inapplicable to setoffs because foreclosures and setoffs are very different things. Bank of the FSM v. Asugar, 10 FSM R. 340, 342 (Chk. 2001).

A setoff is a debtor's right to reduce the amount of a debt by any sum the creditor owes the debtor, or the counterbalancing sum owed by the creditor. Bank of the FSM v. Asugar, 10 FSM R. 340, 342 (Chk. 2001).

Banks generally have a common law right to a setoff against depositors. Bank of the FSM v. Asugar, 10 FSM R. 340, 342 (Chk. 2001).

When a bank has a contractual right to setoff because the promissory note contains a provision granting the bank a right to setoff and in that provision, the borrowers authorize the bank's use of setoff, and the borrowers are on notice that if payments are not made that the bank may exercise a setoff against the borrower's bank deposits. And when the note provides that the bank may forgo or delay enforcing any of its rights or remedies without losing them, the bank was within its rights to setoff sums in the borrowers' bank accounts against the monthly payments as each became due and remained unpaid instead of declaring the loan in default and accelerating payment of the entire amount. Bank of the FSM v. Asugar, 10 FSM R. 340, 342 (Chk. 2001).

A setoff is a debtor's right to reduce the amount of a debt by any sum the creditor owes the debtor, or the counterbalancing sum owed by the creditor. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 469 (Pon. 2004).

A promissory note will not bear any interest past the date it is setoff against an opposing claim. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

Setoff implies that both the plaintiff and defendant have independent causes of action maintainable against the other, while mitigation (of damages) does not involve facts which constitute a cause of action in favor of the defendant, but facts that show that the plaintiff is not entitled to as large an amount as the plaintiff's showing would otherwise justify. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420 (Yap 2006).

The doctrine of set-off, as recognized in the FSM, applies between parties when the party being sued has no defense to an action but has a cause of action against the party suing him that arises out of the same right and the party being sued asks the court to determine the parties' mutual liability. Ruo Municipality v. Shigeto's Store, 17 FSM R. 195, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The setoff doctrine only applies when liabilities are mutual. Ruo Municipality v. Shigeto's Store, 17 FSM R. 195, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Since Ruo municipality and Piisemwar municipality are distinct parties, each responsible for its own obligations and liabilities, Ruo municipality is under no obligation to answer to Shigeto's Store's claim against Piisemwar municipality. Therefore, the respective liabilities of these parties cannot be set-off against each other. Ruo Municipality v. Shigeto's Store, 17 FSM R. 195, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Two municipalities cannot be jointly and severally liable for each others' debts because each municipality has a separate account in the State treasury, because each municipality is authorized to obligate funds from its municipal account, and because the municipality, not the state, obligates those funds and once the funds are obligated, the municipality, not the state, owes the obligation. Therefore, the amount Piisemwar municipality owes to Shigeto's cannot be set-off against the amount Shigeto's owes Ruo municipality. Ruo Municipality v. Shigeto's Store, 17 FSM R. 195, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When Shigeto's contracted with Piisemwar municipality for the purchase of motors and the state was not a party to that contract and when Shigeto's Store has not raised any other basis for liability other than set-off between the contracts it had with Ruo and Piisemwar municipalities, judgment will enter for Shigeto's Store and against only Piisemwar municipality. Ruo Municipality v. Shigeto's Store, 17 FSM R. 195, 197-98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When there was evidence of the terminated employee receiving approval of an advance leave request of 60 hours, but there was no evidence of how much of this advance leave was actually used, how much had already been paid back, and how much was still outstanding, the court will deny the government's request to offset the employee's pay to cover for the advance leave still owed since there is a lack of evidence on this matter. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 245 (Pon. 2012).

A setoff is a debtor's right to reduce the amount of a debt by any sum the creditor owes the debtor, or the counterbalancing sum owed by the creditor. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 181 n.12 (Pon. 2017).

Yap has specifically extended its sovereign immunity waiver to include set-offs. Pt. Alorinda Shipping v. Alorinda 251, 21 FSM R. 318, 325 n.6 (Yap 2017).

DOMESTIC RELATIONS

Where there is diversity of citizenship between the parties, litigation involving domestic relations issues, including custody and child support, falls within the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Mongkeya v. Brackett, 2 FSM R. 291, 292 (Kos. 1986).

All persons, whether male or female, residing in the state of Pohnpei, who have attained the age of 18 years are regarded as of legal age and their period of minority to have ceased. Welson v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 348, 351 n.1 (Pon. 2017).

When there is diversity of citizenship between the parties, litigation involving domestic relations issues, including custody and child support, falls within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction, even though state law will furnish the rules of decision. O'Sonis v. O'Sonis, 22 FSM R. 268, 269 (Chk. 2019).

The states generally have power over land law and other local issues including personal property law, inheritance law, and domestic law including marriage, divorce, and adoption. However, where the national government concurrently has the power to acquire title to land within the FSM under powers expressly delegated to it, and state law purports to restrict it, the state law must fail as applied to the national government. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 331-32 (Pon. 2019).

– Adoption

6 F.S.M.C. 1614 exempts adoptions effected in accordance with local custom from the domestic relations law of the FSM. Customary adoptions are an alternative to court-ordered adoptions which are established by the Code. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 383 (Pon. 1992).

Parties who wish to adopt a child have a choice of method of adoption. They may adopt according to local custom, or they may adopt according to the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia. What a petitioner may not do is seek the court's involvement in a customary adoption. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 383 (Pon. 1992).

6 F.S.M.C. 1615 grants the court jurisdiction to confirm customary adoptions. For the court to hear a petition to confirm a customary adoption there must first be a challenge to the validity of that adoption. Furthermore, the challenge must either cause "serious embarrassment" to one of the parties, or affect their property rights. Mere speculation or gossip will not suffice. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 383-84 (Pon. 1992).

Before the court may confirm a customary adoption, there must first have occurred a customary adoption. Thus, a threshold question is whether a customary adoption has taken place. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 384 (Pon. 1992).

Evidence that a customary adoption has taken place may be offered via affidavits from the natural parents of the child, consenting and attesting to the customary adoption. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 384 (Pon. 1992).

A petition to confirm a customary adoption which fails to indicate that the customary adoption has occurred is premature and unreviewable. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 385 (Pon. 1992).

The court has no statutory authority to enter a decree of adoption, pursuant to statute, for an adult. In re Jae Joong Hwang, 6 FSM R. 331, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

An adoption of an adult may qualify for recognition by the court if done under Chuukese custom. In re Jae Joong Hwang, 6 FSM R. 331, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

To prove an achemwir adoption, the consent of the adoptive lineage's members must be proven. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When Epen Inong brought Yosko Epen to live among members of his lineage, but his lineage members did not treat her as a lineage member since she did not participate in lineage member meetings and decision-making and since she was referred to as Epen Inong's daughter and not as a "sister" as would be proper if she had been a lineage member through an achemwir adoption, there is no admitted evidence showing that the lineage members, by their subsequent conduct, consented to or ratified an achemwir adoption of Yosko Epen. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171-72 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the proponents did not present any evidence or argument to support their contention that achemwir doesn't require lineage member consent or to otherwise impeach the testimony of their own expert to that effect and when they had ample opportunity, at the trial level, to raise any issues regarding achemwir's requirements and their own expert witness presented evidence that the trial court found credible, and which clearly articulated its requirements including the lineage member consent requirement, they failed to meet their burden of proof to show otherwise at trial. The appellate court will not, therefore, entertain a new theory regarding achemwir's requirements. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

A valid claim for Social Security benefits as an adopted child requires proof of adoption and of dependency of the adopted child on the wage earner. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 368 (Pon. 2016).

Changed circumstances may require the adopted child to move away and to no longer be dependent on the adopted parent. In these situations, the child no longer depends on the wage earner for support, and the child would fall outside of Social Security's statutory scheme. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 368 (Pon. 2016).

Social Security has the regulatory authority to request additional proof of dependency and the claimant is required to submit such proof. Actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for an adopted minor to receive surviving child Social Security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 370-71 (Pon. 2016).

A valid claim for adopted child benefits requires proof of adoption and of the adopted child's dependency on the wage earner. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 479 (Pon. 2016).

Social Security's statutory scheme is not unconstitutional, and the exercise of its investigatory functions, which would include the request for evidence of dependency in adoption matters, is lawful as long as it is authorized by law. Thus, Social Security regulations are not ultra vires. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 479 (Pon. 2016).

A child who is dependent upon a person entitled to old age benefits or who was dependent upon an individual who died fully insured or currently insured, is entitled, upon filing an application, to a child's insurance benefit, but actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for an adopted minor to receive surviving social security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 417 (App. 2018).

When an applicant was notified that evidence of dependency was lacking and did not apply to adduce additional evidence, the Board's findings as to the facts, if supported by competent, material and substantial evidence, are conclusive since there was no further evidence of dependency proffered. Thus, the trial court's grant of summary judgment in Social Security's favor was proper, since the applicant failed to adduce sufficient evidence of dependency, as required by statute. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 419 (App. 2018).

An adopted child applying for benefits under the FSM Social Security system must complete an application and show dependency on the insured. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 493 (Kos. 2018).

A valid claim for Social Security benefits as an adopted child requires proof of adoption and of the adopted child's dependency on the wage earner. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 493 (Kos. 2018).

Social Security has the regulatory authority to request additional proof of dependency and the claimant is required to submit such proof since actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for an adopted minor to receive surviving child Social Security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 493-94 (Kos. 2018).

When the immunization records that listed the children's natural mothers did not support the benefits claim because it did not show the children's dependency on the adoptive parents; when no additional evidence was submitted after the hearing for the court to consider; and when the census records show the adopted children in the same household as the wage-earner adoptive parent and his daughters, the natural mothers, the court will remand the matter to the Board to determine whether the children were dependent on the wage-earner's disability payments; whether the children's mothers were employed at the time; and whether dependency would be presumed if the child lived with the adoptive parents. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 494-95 (Kos. 2018).

– Child Support and Custody

Where there is diversity of citizenship between the parties, litigation involving domestic relations issues, including custody and child support, falls within the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Mongkeya v. Brackett, 2 FSM R. 291, 292 (Kos. 1986).

In litigation brought by a mother seeking child support payments from the father, the court will not grant the defendant-father's motion to change the venue to the FSM state in which he now resides from the FSM state in which: 1) the mother initiated the litigation; 2) the couple was married and resided together; 3) their children were born and have always lived; and 4) the mother still resides. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 224 (Pon. 1990).

Statutory provisions in the Trust Territory Code concerning domestic relations are part of state law because domestic relations fall within the powers of the states and not the national government. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 224 (Pon. 1990).

Since the determination of support payments payable by a divorced husband is a matter governed by state law, the FSM Supreme Court in addressing such an issue is obligated to attempt to apply the pertinent state statutes in the same fashion as would the highest state court in the pertinent jurisdiction. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 224 (Pon. 1990).

Under Pohnpeian state law after confirmation of a customary separation or divorce under 39 TTC 5, the court may order custody and child support under 39 TTC 103. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 225 (Pon. 1990).

Although under historical Pohnpeian customary law only the husband had rights over the children of the marriage, now both parents have rights and responsibilities in connection with a marriage and the court should take this into consideration in determining child custody rights and support payment obligations in cases of customary divorce. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 225 (Pon. 1990).

Under the law of Pohnpei a court may award child custody, and, if necessary order child support. The standard to be applied is the "best interests of the child." Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 335, 337 (Pon. 1992).

Under the law of Pohnpei support of the children is the responsibility of both parents. A court may order the parent without custody to make support payments. In granting or denying a divorce, the court may make such orders for custody of minor children, for their support as it deems justice and the best interests of all concerned may require. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 6 FSM R. 304, 306 (Pon. 1993).

If a court deems justice and the best interest of all concerned so require, it may award past child support. When considering child support, it is the best interests of the children with which a court is most concerned. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 6 FSM R. 304, 306 (Pon. 1993).

Factual determinations of a trial court, such as the appropriate size and period for an award of child support, will be overturned on appeal only if the findings of the trial court are clearly erroneous. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 7 FSM R. 34, 36 (App. 1995).

Citation to other cases is of limited assistance in framing an award for child support because a child support award is an inherently fact specific determination that must be made on a case by case basis. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 7 FSM R. 34, 37 (App. 1995).

The reciprocal child support enforcement provisions of chapter 17 of Title 6 of the FSM Code remain in effect as part of state law. Burke v. Torwal, 7 FSM R. 531, 534 (Pon. 1996).

A proceeding for enforcement in the FSM of a CNMI child support order is properly filed in state court by the state attorney general, not in national court by the FSM Attorney General. Burke v. Torwal, 7 FSM R. 531, 535-36 (Pon. 1996).

Although national law provides for the reciprocal enforcement of child support orders, case law supports the conclusion that FSM Supreme Court should abstain from exercising its jurisdiction at least until the state court has had the opportunity to rule on the issues. Villazon v. Mafnas, 11 FSM R. 309, 310 (Pon. 2003).

Based on the traditional state jurisdiction over matters of domestic relations and on the applicable statutory provisions' language and history, a proceeding for enforcement of a foreign support order is properly commenced in the state court in which the defendant resides, rather than in the FSM Supreme Court and for the same reasons, these cases are properly prosecuted by the Pohnpei Attorney General's office, rather than by the FSM Attorney General's office. Villazon v. Mafnas, 11 FSM R. 309, 310-11 (Pon. 2003).

Pohnpei state law anticipates the prosecution of child support enforcement actions in foreign jurisdictions, and provides plaintiffs with a procedure and remedy that is identical to that which they would enjoy under the national code. Villazon v. Mafnas, 11 FSM R. 309, 311 (Pon. 2003).

A biological father whose paternity has been established owes his natural child a duty of support. Tolenoa v. Timothy, 11 FSM R. 485, 487 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The interests of justice require an award of child support based upon the custom, tradition, prevailing economic status of Kosrae, the child's needs, the plaintiff's household status, and the defendant's earning capacity in Guam. Tolenoa v. Timothy, 11 FSM R. 485, 487 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

In domestic relations matters, the national court should abstain from exercising jurisdiction until the state court has had the opportunity to rule on the issues presented when it is a proceeding for enforcement of a foreign support order. These cases are properly commenced in the state court in which the defendant resides, rather than in the FSM Supreme Court and are properly prosecuted by a state attorney general, rather than by the FSM Attorney General. Anson v. Rutmag, 11 FSM R. 570, 571-72 (Pon. 2003).

Plaintiffs seeking to prosecute a foreign child support enforcement action must file their action in state court, where they will be provided with a procedure and remedy that is identical to that which they would enjoy under the national code. When such a case has been filed in the FSM Supreme Court, it will be ordered transferred to a state court with the proviso that if that court has not ruled on the issues presented within 45 days, the FSM Supreme Court may reinstitute active proceedings. The national court's role is to docket and transfer the case to a state court for determination of the paternity and child support issues. Anson v. Rutmag, 11 FSM R. 570, 572 (Pon. 2003).

When a state has not enacted laws in an area within its jurisdiction such as child support, national law is applicable to the state court proceeding, because the Trust Territory Code reciprocal support enforcement provisions, now codified at 6 F.S.M.C. 1711, are imputed to be state law under the FSM Constitution's Transition Clause. Under that clause, Trust Territory statutes that were applicable to the states became part of the states' laws regardless of whether they were published thereby. They stand as the laws of the states until amended, superseded or repealed. Anson v. Rutmag, 11 FSM R. 570, 572 (Pon. 2003).

Reciprocal support enforcement procedure requires that a state attorney general's office be diligent in its prosecution of it, and that, after a hearing, the state court will issue an order that decides the paternity question and determines the amount of child support and medical insurance coverage, if any, to which the petitioner is entitled. Anson v. Rutmag, 11 FSM R. 570, 572-73 (Pon. 2003).

Since any decree as to custody or support of the parties' minor children is subject to revision by the court at any time upon motion of either party, the court has on-going jurisdiction to reconsider the question of child support previously decided. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 639 (Pon. 2003).

In the context of a confirmation of a customary divorce, the court has awarded reimbursement for child support expenses where the father made no support payments, even when part of the reimbursement is sought for a period when no pendente lite order requiring support payments was in effect. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 641 (Pon. 2003).

When it is a court-ordered divorce decree's child support provisions, not a confirmation of a customary divorce, that a party seeks to modify, the court, bearing in mind the suitability to the FSM of any specific common law principle, may, in determining Pohnpei law, look to the Restatements (compilations of U.S. common law according to subject matter) and decisions from jurisdictions outside the FSM that also follow the common law tradition. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 641 (Pon. 2003).

Court-ordered child support payments may be modified at any time circumstances render such a change appropriate, but the modification operates prospectively only. Child support cannot be modified retroactively. This is consistent with the equitable principle, suitable for Micronesia or elsewhere, that one having a claim should pursue it when he or she first has notice of it. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 641 (Pon. 2003).

While a child support decree may be subject to revision by the court at any time, a party seeking modification of child support must show a substantial change in circumstances not anticipated by the original decree in order to justify the modification. For determination is the question of the children's needs, and not the standard of living desired by the custodial parent. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 641 (Pon. 2003).

While a divorced party's ability to help defray the alleged increased child support costs is certainly a valid consideration generally, it does not go to the question of the children's alleged changed circumstances (i.e., increased needs), which is the primary issue for determination in a support modification proceeding. When the custodial parent was aware in 1993 of these needs, her remedy was to move for modification under 6 F.S.M.C. 1622 at the time when she first had notice. It was not to wait nearly ten years until she had learned that his income had increased and her child support was about to terminate when during this period, he was making all of the court-ordered payments, a factor which the court may legitimately give some attention to in judging the equities as between the parties and their children's welfare. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 642 (Pon. 2003).

Under Pohnpei law, both the mother and the father are responsible for their children's support. The parties' obligation to support their children is in accordance with their respective abilities. It is sound public policy to require both parents to make some contribution toward the support of their children regardless of income disparity. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 642 (Pon. 2003).

Even if one divorced party's income is greater than the other's, that fact alone does not support a proposed modification to shift all of the pre-motion child-rearing costs retroactively to the higher-income party. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 642 (Pon. 2003).

The obligation to support the parties' children is, after all, one that the mother must share with the father, taking into account her ability to contribute. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 643 (Pon. 2003).

When under the separation agreement, the father is only obligated to support the parties' adult children while they are pursuing post secondary education and since a child has re-enrolled in college and the father has now resumed paying her expenses and another has left school, these two do not entitle the mother to any measure of relief. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 643 (Pon. 2003).

A requested child support order will be denied as redundant when it is already in the parties' court-approved separation agreement and past history shows that the father has complied with it. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 643-44 (Pon. 2003).

– Divorce

National courts can exercise jurisdiction over divorce cases where there is diversity of citizenship although domestic relations are primarily the subject of state law. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 335, 336 (Pon. 1992).

Since a divorce case involves the status or condition of a person and his relation to other persons the law to be applied is the law of the domicile. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 335, 337 (Pon. 1992).

When a divorced couple is jointly responsible on a promissory note, no agreement they could make between them could possibly prevent the creditor from pursuing its claims against either or both of them, and since the issue of whether one of the defendants could have relieved himself or herself from responsibility to the creditor could not have been litigated in the divorce proceeding, the creditor cannot be precluded from litigating that issue. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 286 (Pon. 2001).

A divorcing couple is free to enter into whatever agreement they choose as to who between the two of them will be responsible to repay a bank loan. However, such an agreement can have no effect on bank's right to seek repayment of the loan from either or both of them. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 286 (Pon. 2001).

Title 6, section 1622, FSM Code provides that any decree as to custody or support of the parties' minor children is subject to revision by the court at any time, but does not provide for continuing jurisdiction over property issues. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 633 n.1 (Pon. 2003).

Because a divorce case involves the parties' status or condition and their relationship to others, the law to be applied is that of the domicile. Thus in a divorce between a Pohnpeian, who now resides in Hawaii, and an American citizen who resides in Pohnpei and the parties lived in Pohnpei during their marriage, the court will apply Pohnpei substantive law. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 641 (Pon. 2003).

Spousal and child support and child visitation and custody rights are, under Chuuk State Supreme Court Civil Procedure Rule 13(a), compulsory counterclaims that must be pled in the earlier state court divorce action, if they have not been already pled there. O'Sonis v. O'Sonis, 22 FSM R. 268, 270 (Chk. 2019).

Any claim which is filed as an independent, separate action by one spouse during the pendency of a prior claim filed by the other spouse and which may be denominated a compulsory counterclaim under Rule 13(a), may not be independently prosecuted during the pendency of the prior action but must be dismissed with the leave to file it as a counterclaim in the prior action or stayed until final judgment has been entered in that action. O'Sonis v. O'Sonis, 22 FSM R. 268, 270 (Chk. 2019).

In a divorce action, even final support and custody and visitation orders might later be modified if materially changed circumstances warrant it. O'Sonis v. O'Sonis, 22 FSM R. 268, 270 (Chk. 2019).

– Marriage

A marriage procured and induced by fraud is void ab initio and the party whose consent was so procured is entitled to a judgment annulling the marriage. Burrow v. Burrow, 6 FSM R. 203, 204-05 (Pon. 1993).

The right to marry is a fundamental constitutional right. Prisoners retain that right, but the right is subject to substantial restrictions as a result of imprisonment. Prisons may regulate the time and place of the wedding ceremony. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A prisoner's right to marry has not been violated when the wedding ceremony will take place at the Kosrae state jail because the prison has authority to regulate a prisoner's wedding ceremony, including the regulation of the ceremony's time and place. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A prisoner's rights to privacy and association, including intimate association, do not include the right to be married at his family home. The prisoner's right to privacy and association are necessarily limited during his period of imprisonment. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Since a prisoner's rights to marry, privacy and association are not violated by the jailer's restriction of the location of prisoner's wedding ceremony to the Kosrae state jail, there is no unlawful restraint of the prisoner's liberty, and thus, a petition for the writ of habeas corpus to be married at home will be denied. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Kosrae State Court recognizes the universal importance of marriage in our societies; the social and geographical configuration of Kosrae; and the importance of family relationships in our communities and of the building of new family relationships through marriages. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Kosrae customary practice is to hold wedding ceremonies at a church or at the home of the bride or groom. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Considering the state's geographic and social configuration, the customary importance of marriages in the state and its effects upon the family and community relationships in Kosrae, the customary location of wedding ceremonies in Kosrae and the absence of any held at the state jail, a request for a prisoner to be married outside of the jail may be granted, in part, upon fulfillment of conditions. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a woman, living together with a man for three years, has a title that is taken from the man's Pohnpeian title and that is derived from being his wife, the Social Security Board's decision to cease spousal survival benefit payments to her because she has remarried will be upheld when the evidence submitted on record, taken in its entirety, is competent, material, and substantial and supports the Board's findings in denying benefits to her based on her remarriage. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 197, 200-01 (Pon. 2015).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court recognizes three types of marriages: 1) statutory civil marriage under 39 TTC 51; 2) statutory "religious marriage" commonly known in Pohnpei as "inou sarawi" meaning (a sacrosanct) and 3) statutory customary marriage known in Pohnpei as "pwopwoud en tiahk en sahpw." Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 271-72 (Pon. 2015).

Customary marriage is based on a flexible standard and is not established by a single test or a defined set of parameters because the solemnization of a customary marriage can take many forms. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 273 (Pon. 2015).

Under Pohnpei law, marriage contracts between parties, both of whom are FSM citizens, that are solemnized in accordance with recognized customs, are valid. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 427 (App. 2018).

To find that there was a Pohnpeian customary marriage, the court need not find that the coconut oil and head lei ritual was performed, only that there is substantial evidence in the record to make a finding that the families of both parties to the marriage contract consented to the marriage, expressly or impliedly.

When the applicant testified at the administrative level that the marriage was accepted by members of her community; that she and her partner had been living together for three years; that she has a sacred Pohnpeian title exclusively given to the wife of the second in chief, which is her partner's title; that her title is derived from being her partner's customary wife; and that she serves as her partner's wife at traditional feasts, Social Security's determination that she had remarried was valid since there was a reasonable basis, or substantial evidence, for its decision. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 427-28 (App. 2018).

It is generally recognized that interference with existing contractual relations applies to any type of contract, except a contract to marry – marriage contracts are specifically excluded from the tort of intentional interference with contract. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 505 (Pon. 2020).

A plaintiff cannot sue for tortious interference with a contract when that contract is a marriage contract. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 505, 511 (Pon. 2020).

– Probate

State court, rather than national courts, should normally resolve probate and inheritance issues especially where interests in land are at issue. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 97 (Pon. 1982).

Probate matters are statutory and involve proceedings in rem, that is, jurisdiction based on court control of specific property. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 103 (Pon. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court is empowered to exercise authority in probate matters where there is an independent basis for jurisdiction under the Constitution. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 104 (Pon. 1982).

The power to regulate probate of wills or inheritance of property is not "beyond the power of a state to control" within the meaning of article VIII, section 1 of the Constitution and is consequently a state power. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107 (Pon. 1982).

Nothing about the power to regulate probate of wills or inheritance of property suggests that these are beyond the power of a state to control. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107 (Pon. 1982).

The Ponape District Court, although not granted jurisdiction over land matters, may be given the opportunity to hear certified questions from the FSM Supreme Court on issues in a probate case involving land in order to further the intent of the framers that local decision-makers play a part in decisions of a local nature. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 110-12 (Pon. 1982).

When jurisdiction exists by virtue of diversity of the parties, the FSM Supreme Court may resolve the dispute despite the fact that matters squarely within the legislative power of states (e.g., probate, inheritance and land issues) may be involved. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 392-93 (Pon. 1984).

An assignor must be able to inherit the assigned expectancy from the source in order for his assignment of expectancy to be effective. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 382 (Pon. 1994).

Where a person is constitutionally prohibited from inheriting land that person's valid assignment of expectancy to a person who may acquire land will operate only to assign the non-land holdings in the expectancy. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 382-83 (Pon. 1994).

Where Trust Territory law in 1956 did not allow non-citizens to acquire land except as heirs or devisees a deed from a landowner to her non-citizen children is invalid because the grantor was still living, and therefore her children were neither heirs or devisees. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 385-86 (Pon. 1994).

Heirs are those persons who acquire ownership upon someone's death. Thus the later issuance of a Certificate of Title to "heirs" confirms their earlier ownership of the property. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 49 n.8 (App. 1995).

A probate appeal may be remanded when a number of essential issues and facts have yet to be established and the ends of justice require that additional matters must be considered, including whether the appellants are proper parties to the proceedings and who are the beneficiaries or the exact persons entitled to share in the assets of the estate and what the proposed division of the assets is. In re Malon, 8 FSM R. 591, 592 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The terms of the will and the clear intent of the testator control who shall be in actual physical control of the land for the purpose and its preservation and for the purpose of granting its reasonable use by those persons having a lawful right to the use of the land. In re Ori, 8 FSM R. 593, 594 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

Because the Chuuk Constitution requires the courts to make decisions consistent with Chuukese customs and traditions, Chuukese custom and tradition may prevail over the provisions of a holographic will in deciding who may enter upon land for the purpose of making reasonable use thereof. In re Ori, 8 FSM R. 593, 595 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

A will written out by request by someone else does not constitute a holographic will within the meaning of 13 TTC 6, or one in the handwriting of the testator, but one prepared by another at the testator's direction within the meaning of 13 TTC 5. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 181 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

There were no clearly ascertainable statutory requirements for the execution of a valid will in Kosrae in 1962. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 181-82 n.3 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A person may only transfer such title to land as that person lawfully possesses. So when someone did not own a parcel, he did not have the authority to transfer title and distribute it to his children through his will. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 165 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

It is in an estate's best interests that a trustee who resides in Kosrae be appointed to manage the lease of a land parcel located in Kosrae, so that negotiations, collection and distribution of the lease payments can easily take place in Kosrae, where most of the heirs live; and so that the trustee be able to quickly respond to any issues or problems which may arise during the lease, including seeking court assistance. In re Estate of Melander, 12 FSM R. 82, 83 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Even if a will is valid and judicially recognized as such, this does not automatically make every bequest in that will valid. For a bequest to be valid, the testator must, at the time of his death, actually own the property being bequeathed. A person can only transfer such title to land as he validly owns. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 287 (App. 2003).

When the Kosrae State Court did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the Land Commission's findings that the testator had not actually acquired ownership of the land were not clearly erroneous, any further consideration of the will was pointless once it has been determined that the testator did not own the land mentioned in the will. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 288 (App. 2003).

In general, a probate court is not a court of equity, but it is recognized that a probate court may apply principles of equity in determining issues brought before it. In re Estate of Setik, 12 FSM R. 423, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the court has determined the portion of a decedent's estate that one heir is to inherit, the court may permit all the heirs to agree to divide the estate to satisfy that heir's judgment. In re Estate of Setik, 12

FSM R. 423, 431 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The filing requirements in probate proceedings, specifically require that all heirs be listed in the verified petition. The term "heirs" include the decedent's surviving adopted children. In re Skilling, 12 FSM R. 447, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The omission of an adopted daughter's name from a verified probate petition, signed under oath by the petitioner, resulted in the failure to provide the adopted daughter her constitutional due process rights to be notified of the probate proceeding, have an opportunity to be heard and may have also affected her rights as an heir of the decedent. In re Skilling, 12 FSM R. 447, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Counsel is expected to know legal and procedural requirements for court filings and proceedings and is required to provide competent representation to a client, which includes the legal knowledge, skill, thoroughness and preparation reasonably necessary for the representation. It is counsel's duty to complete all preparation necessary to represent a petitioner in a probate proceeding, including investigating and obtaining all necessary facts to prepare the verified petition. In re Skilling, 12 FSM R. 447, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A person may only transfer such title to land as that person lawfully possesses. If the grantor had no authority to bequeath the property, plainly the devisees acquired no title to the property. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the plaintiffs' predecessor in interest no longer held title to the parcel in April 2002, when he wrote his will, he could not transfer any interest in the parcel, by will or otherwise, to the plaintiffs or to anyone else and therefore the plaintiffs do not have likelihood of success on the merits. This factor weighs strongly in the defendants' favor. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 72, 75-76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Pursuant to state law, when the Land Court found that Lonno was the "previous land owner" of the subject parcels and that Lonno died without leaving a will, all heirs of Lonno were therefore interested parties to the parcels. Heirs of Lonno v. Heirs of Lonno, 13 FSM R. 421, 423 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a person by virtue of a quitclaim deed that he executed and delivered, no longer owned a parcel on the date that he executed his will, he had no rights, interest or title to the parcel and could not bequeath the parcel in his will. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 549-50 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Upon the undisputed owner's death, title to land transfers pursuant to a valid will to the devisees specified in the will, or if there is no valid will, to the owner's heirs, according to intestate succession. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 106 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In Kosrae, an oral will is valid only if made by a person in imminent peril of death, whether from illness or otherwise, and if 1) the testator dies as a result of the peril and 2) the testator declares it to be his will before two disinterested witnesses and the court receives the will for probate within six months following the testator's death unless for good cause the court permits it to be submitted later. An oral will may dispose of personal property only and to an aggregate value not exceeding one thousand dollars. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 107-08 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In Kosrae, an oral will neither revokes nor changes an existing written will. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In Kosrae, real property, including land, may not be disposed of by oral will. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

All wills executed after the Kosrae State Code's October 1, 1985 effective date must comply with Title 16, Chapter 2. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Taulung, 14 FSM R. 287, 289 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Oral wills may only dispose of personal property only and must meet other requirements. Oral wills may not dispose of real property or land, and any oral will which disposes of land or interests in land is invalid to that land. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Taulung, 14 FSM R. 287, 289 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Only if a life insurance policy had no designated or named beneficiary, would the policy benefits be payable to his estate to be distributed through probate to his heirs or devisees. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

As the purpose of probate is not to determine issues of ownership, probate petitioners should resolve issues regarding land ownership, if any, before they proceed with probate. Otherwise, the probate proceeding may be subject to collateral attack from those who may claim an interest in the property and who were not given notice or made a party to this proceeding. In re Land Noota, Neppi, 15 FSM R. 518, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When it was established that a decedent's real property at issue was lineage land, it continues to be property of the lineage, and is not part of the decedent's estate. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Title to land is not generally subject to probate but transfers pursuant to a valid will to the devisees specified in the will, or if there is no valid will, to the owner's heirs according to intestate succession. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Social security benefits are not subject to probate, as the Social Security Board, not the court, has initial jurisdiction over applications for social security benefits, whether by a surviving spouse or surviving children. The procedure for such applications is set forth in the Social Security Act. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the sole owner of land dies his fee simple interest would be inherited by his multiple heirs who would hold that fee simple estate as a tenancy in common. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 372 n.1 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

One does not have heirs until one has passed away. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 324 n.2, 325 (Kos. 2011).

Under the Pohnpei Intestate Succession Act of 1977, ⅓ of an intestate decedent's estate is to be distributed to the surviving spouse and the rest (⅔) is to be divided equally among the decedent's children. Pohnpei probate courts will deviate from this statutorily-required division of an intestate decedent's assets only when a family agreement has been presented to and approved by the probate court. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 19 n.1 (Chk. 2013).

An improper sale by a fiduciary (estate administrator) that has already taken place can be vacated, but not if the buyer was a bona-fide purchaser because, when property of an estate has been transferred to a bona-fide purchaser for value, the latter is protected even if the fiduciary was acting improperly. The beneficiaries' remedy is not to void the transaction but to seek damages for the personal representative's breach of his fiduciary duty. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. 2013).

A bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, should be as protected buying shares from the distributee as he would have been buying them from the fiduciary administrator, especially when it was the same person. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 23 (Chk. 2013).

Someone who has wrongfully sold property to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice can be compelled to buy a replacement if this is reasonably possible. Sometimes damages are the only appropriate remedy. Either way, the rightful heir's remedy is against estate administrator. If it were any other way, then anyone who ever bought property after it had been inherited and distributed by a Pohnpei probate court final order could never be certain that his or her title would not be taken away by a future final probate court order that the distributee seller was not the proper distributee. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 23 (Chk. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court is empowered to exercise authority in probate matters when there is an independent basis for jurisdiction under the Constitution, and the court has found such an independent basis when there was a diversity of citizenship among the heirs. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 61 (Kos. 2013).

The Constitution does not mandates such a sweeping expansion of the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction over probate cases as would result if creditors were considered parties for jurisdictional purposes. The better view is that only the heirs, potential heirs, or devisees in a probate case be considered parties for jurisdictional purposes and that, in the usual case, the decedent's creditors would file their claims in a state court probate proceeding. This view comports with the proper respect due to the state courts as courts of general jurisdiction that should normally resolve probate and inheritance issues. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 62 (Kos. 2013).

For jurisdictional purposes, the parties in a probate case are those who have a claim that they are heirs. Creditors are not to be considered parties for jurisdictional purposes. This reasoning is suitable for the FSM. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 62 (Kos. 2013).

A creditor may open a probate case in state court without destroying the state court's jurisdiction because a creditor is not an heir. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 62 (Kos. 2013).

The probate exception reserves to state probate courts the probate or annulment of a will and the administration of a decedent's estate; it also precludes the national courts from disposing of property that is in a state probate court's custody. But it does not bar the national courts from adjudicating matters outside of those confines and otherwise within national court jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 430 (App. 2014).

Interference with the property of the estate, and the probate exception should be read narrowly so as not to bar national court jurisdiction over preliminary matters, or ancillary matters, such as in personam actions and equitable intervention for fraud, maladministration, or non-administration of the estate. In those matters, the national court may appoint an administrator or an administrator pendente lite on behalf of third party interests before, or while, the action is pending in state court. These actions are outside of the scope of the probate exception, but they should not be confused with direct challenges to the validity of the will itself, in interpreting the language of the will, or equitable charges of fraud, undue influence, or tortious interference with the testator's intent which are core matters within the probate exception. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 430 (App. 2014).

An open probate proceeding at the state level is not a bar to national court subject matter jurisdiction as long as the national court does not interfere with the estate's res. Under the longstanding "creditor exception," the national courts have subject matter jurisdiction to appoint an administrator or an administrator pendente lite and to initiate proceedings on behalf of interested third parties. This appointment has no impact on the res of the decedent's estate, does not interfere with administrative decisions regarding the decedent's estate, nor does it affect the distribution of those assets within the state's control. It is a preliminary matter outside of the scope of the probate exception. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 430-31 (App. 2014).

When jurisdiction exists by virtue of diversity of the parties, the FSM Supreme Court may resolve the dispute despite the fact that matters squarely within the legislative powers of states (e.g., probate, inheritance and land issues) may be involved. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 431 (App. 2014).

A long line of precedents supports diversity jurisdiction as a proper independent basis for national jurisdiction of probate matters. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 431 (App. 2014).

Since the FSM Supreme Court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction in cases in which the national government is a party except when an interest in land is at issue and since the Federated States of Micronesia Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government and part of the national government for the purposes of the Constitution's Article XI, § 6(a), the FSM Supreme Court's trial division therefore has original and exclusive jurisdiction in any case in which the bank is a party so long as no interest in land is at issue. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 432 (App. 2014).

Ultimately, the bulk of probate matters are to remain with the states, but an express constitutional exception is carved out when the national government is a party to the suit. Furthermore, the Constitution's framers created a constitutional limitation on the national government's jurisdiction under the land clause exception of article XI, § 6(a). FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 433 (App. 2014).

Preference toward state courts adjudicating the bulk of probate matters should be read narrowly, to permit creditors and other third parties to protect financial interests by initiating probate proceedings and resolving many auxiliary matters. The national courts are not barred from exercising subject matter jurisdiction over probate matters, and when an independent basis for jurisdiction is established, the national courts may proceed with the probate matter in its entirety. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

Another court's assumption of jurisdiction should be made with restraint, cognizant of the limitation that if a court has already assumed jurisdiction over the matter, a second court will not interfere and assume in rem jurisdiction over the same res. In those cases, abstention may be the appropriate course of action. A probate matter filed only in national court, however, causes no such conflict. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

Under Civil Rule 17's third party beneficiary clause, judgment creditors are real parties in interest when pursuing many preliminary and auxiliary matters relating to the probate of estates. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

The purpose of ancillary probate proceedings in places other than where the main probate case is, is to probate the decedent's properties in those locations. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 519 (App. 2018).

An ancillary probate proceeding for registered land (land with a certificate of title) on Pohnpei is through an heirship proceeding in the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 519 (App. 2018).

In rem jurisdiction includes registration of land titles, mortgages, and probate proceedings involving land. To exercise in rem jurisdiction, the property over which the court is to exercise jurisdiction must be physically present within the court's territorial jurisdiction and under its control. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

The only reason for ancillary probate proceedings in Pohnpei, Guam, and Hawaii would be to probate the decedent's properties in those places. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

The only place to "probate" registered land in Pohnpei would be through an heirship proceeding in the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

A decedent's estate ceased to own Pohnpei land once the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure ruled on the heirship petition for that land and the time to appeal that decision expired. Because the decedent's estate does not have, and, since Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure ruling, has not had, any interest in the property, it has no standing to seek the relief regarding that land. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

Land on Pohnpei cannot be tied up in a Chuuk probate proceeding. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

A Chuuk probate court cannot have jurisdiction over real property on Pohnpei even though the property's registered owner was a Chuukese decedent for whom probate cases were filed in a Chuuk state court. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

Even if there had not been an heirship proceeding for the Pohnpei property in the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure, the Chuuk State Supreme Court would still lack jurisdiction to probate the property since the land and real estate are outside of Chuuk. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

The Pohnpei State Mortgage Law provides that a deceased mortgagor's heirs and devisees take subject to a mortgage. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 643 (Pon. 2018).

An administrator is a person appointed by the court to manage the assets and liabilities of an intestate decedent. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 644 (Pon. 2018).

An estate of a deceased is the property that one leaves after death – a dead person's collective assets and liabilities. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 644 (Pon. 2018).

An administrator of a decedent's estate is liable to manage the estate, including the decedent's debts and liabilities – financial or pecuniary obligations. A decedent's debt passes down to her estate's administrator to manage and settle. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 644 & n.9 (Pon. 2018).

A temporary co-administrator's powers include only those powers specifically expressed in the order of appointment and as may be expressed in the appointing court's subsequent orders. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 9 (Pon. 2018).

When no particular powers were expressed in an administrator's temporary appointment, although he was expected to help resolve the "overlappings" between two estates, and when the subsequent order granted extensive powers to the co-administrators without making any distinction between the two full co-administrators and the temporary one, the court must, solely for the purpose of the pending motions, take as true the temporary administrator's assertion that he remains the estate's co-administrator and assume that since his administrator's powers were not otherwise limited, he has the power to sue on the estate's behalf to preserve the estate's assets. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 9 (Pon. 2018).

When the Pohnpei state probate case was the first filed lawsuit and that case can afford a complete resolution of the issues between the parties; when the later-filed FSM Supreme Court case could, at best, afford only a partial resolution and certainly lacks jurisdiction to enforce a state court interlocutory order; and when the Pohnpei Supreme Court is perfectly competent to enforce its own orders and judgments and to take any further needed steps in the probate case pending before it, it is appropriate that that forum resolve the issues. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 13 (Pon. 2018).

State courts should normally handle probate and inheritance matters. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 13 (Pon. 2018).

A joint tenancy gives each joint tenant the right of survivorship – to automatically become sole owner of the property on the other joint tenant's death. It differs from a tenancy in common because each joint tenant has a right of survivorship to the other's share. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.1 (Chk. 2019).

When the owner of registered land passes away, the Land Commission has the statutory duty to determine the devisee or devisees or heir or heirs and their interests or respective interests to which each is entitled. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.3 (Chk. 2019).

The general principle is that an administratrix stands in decedent's shoes and has no greater or other rights or powers than the decedent would have if living. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

If the decedent would, if living, have standing to bring the suit, then the administratrix of his estate would have standing to do so. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

Any action by or against the executor, administrator, or other representative of a deceased person for a cause of action in favor of, or against, the deceased shall be brought only within two years after the executor, administrator, or other representative is appointed or first takes possession of the assets of the deceased. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 (Pon. 2019).

An administratrix of a decedent's estate is the successor in interest to the decedent, and is his privy. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 359 (Pon. 2019).

DOMICILE AND RESIDENCE

Because a person may have more than one place of residence and a person's legal residence is his place of domicile or permanent abode, as distinguished from temporary residence, an FSM citizen temporarily working abroad is the legal resident of some state in the Federated States of Micronesia, and thus may be served process in any manner permitted by the FSM rules, such as by certified mail. Alik v. Moses, 8 FSM R. 148, 150 (Pon. 1997).

The Supreme Court may exercise personal jurisdiction in civil cases only over persons residing or found in the Federated States of Micronesia or who have been duly summoned and voluntarily appear, except as provided in the long arm statute. The terms "resides in," "is a resident of," and "residence is in" are roughly synonymous. Alik v. Moses, 8 FSM R. 148, 149-50 (Pon. 1997).

Ordinarily a person's usual place of abode is the place where the party is actually living, except for temporary absences, at the time service is made, but it is possible for a person to have two or more dwelling houses or usual places of abode for the purpose of Rule 4(d)(1) service. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 121 (Chk. 2002).

Because a divorce case involves the parties' status or condition and their relationship to others, the law to be applied is that of the domicile. Thus in a divorce between a Pohnpeian, who now resides in Hawaii, and an American citizen who resides in Pohnpei and the parties lived in Pohnpei during their marriage, the court will apply Pohnpei substantive law. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 641 (Pon. 2003).

When comparing the terms from different parts of the code, the court must presume that by using different terms, in this case "legal residents" and "residents," the drafters could have only intended that the meaning would also be different. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2011).

The word "resident" has many legal meanings that are largely determined by the statutory context in which it is used. The simplest definition of resident is a person who has residence in a location. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

Legal residence is defined as the place of domicile or permanent abode, as distinguished from temporary residence, it is the location defined by law as the residence of the person. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

The statute's plain meaning of term "legal residents of Pohnpei" is individuals who are domiciled in Pohnpei. This interpretation allows a Pohnpeian citizen living abroad, who maintained his or her domicile in Pohnpei, to receive the same hiring preference as a Pohnpeian citizen living in Pohnpei and it would give all FSM citizens and non-citizens who have moved to Pohnpei and made Pohnpei their domicile, equal opportunity for job selection and promotion. This interpretation is also internally consistent with the statute's other parts which give a second preference for employment to FSM citizens who are not legal residents of Pohnpei when applying for a position or promotion and who would receive a preference over non-citizens who are temporarily living in Pohnpei and over other non-residents. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

When, by its own terms, the 51 F.S.M.C. 112(7) definition of a "nonresident worker" applies only to FSM Code Title 51, chapter 1, and not even to the rest of the FSM Code, it certainly does not apply to the Chuuk Health Care Act, which contains its own definition for the term "resident." Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 619-20 (Chk. 2011).

Under the Chuuk Health Care Act, a "resident" is any Chuuk citizen for whom Chuuk is his principal residence, or any noncitizen who has established an ongoing physical presence in Chuuk and whose presence is sanctioned by law and is not merely transitory in nature. The non-citizen workers' ongoing physical presence in Chuuk is clearly sanctioned by law when the non-citizen employees apply annually for labor certification and for entry permits in order to maintain their employment in Chuuk. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 620 (Chk. 2011).

The law sometimes equates "legal residence" with domicil, while using "actual residence" to refer to one's present physical location. Even though the term "legal residence" is sometimes used as the equivalent of domicil, a person may have more than one legal residence. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 620 (Chk. 2011).

Even though a contractor's non-citizen employees cannot be domiciled in Chuuk, they might have a legal residence here, but, even if they are not considered to have a legal residence here, they do have an actual residence in Chuuk that is legally sanctioned, and they are thus, by statute, enrolled in and eligible for Chuuk Health Care Plan benefits and their employer is therefore liable, as a matter of law, to the Plan for the employees' and the employer's contributions of the health insurance premiums for its non-citizen as well as citizen employees on Chuuk. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 620 (Chk. 2011).

Since a suit against an official in his or her official capacity is a suit against that official's office and since a national government office with nationwide scope and authority must be "found" or be "present" in some form in each state in the nation regardless of whether it has an actual year-round physical presence there, for the purpose of the venue statute, none of the defendant national government officials "reside" on Pohnpei. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 66 (Chk. 2011).

Legal residence is usually defined as the place of domicile or permanent abode, and while the term "legal residence" is often the equivalent of domicile and "actual residence" is used to refer to one's current physical location, a person may have more than one legal residence, but a person can have only one domicile. In re Mix, 18 FSM R. 600, 602 n.1 (Pon. 2013).

ELECTIONS

After the executive branch has declared a candidate to have won an election, that winner has the right to hold office, subject only to the legislative branch's power to judge the qualifications of its members. Daniel v. Moses, 3 FSM R. 1, 4 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Where there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of the issue to a coordinate branch of government, such as Congress being the sole judge of the elections of its members, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 (App. 1993).

While the court has statutory authority to hear appeals regarding the conduct of elections, its power to grant relief is limited to ordering a recount or a revote. Only Congress can decide who is to be seated and once it has seated a member unconditionally the matter is nonjusticiable. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 & n.1 (App. 1993).

The framers did not intend that the constitutional provision barring persons convicted of a felony from serving in the legislature, even if pardoned, to have retroactive effect so as to bar a person who was both convicted and pardoned before the enactment of the Chuuk State Constitution from appearing on the official ballot for state legislator. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 178, 179-80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

While the Constitution makes ineligible for election to Congress persons convicted of felonies in FSM courts, the Constitution gives to Congress the power to modify that ineligibility by statute. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 398 (App. 1994).

Congress has the Constitutional power to prescribe, by statute, additional qualifications for eligibility for election to Congress beyond those found in the Constitution. Such additional qualifications must be consistent with the rest of the Constitution. Knowledge of English may not be a qualification. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 399 (App. 1994).

Congress, not the FSM Supreme Court, has the constitutional power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress. The court cannot exercise a power reserved to Congress. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

Where the election law provides for remedies that have not yet been used a candidate cannot show irreparable harm necessary for the issuance of a temporary restraining order. Wiliander v. Siales, 7 FSM R. 77, 80 (Chk. 1995).

While there may be cases in which the court would enter a matter before the election process has been completed the court will not do so where none of the acts complained of are contrary to law. Wiliander v. Siales, 7 FSM R. 77, 80 (Chk. 1995).

Voting is a privilege and not a right. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When it appears that there is no provision in the Chuuk Constitution or statutes which guarantees the right to or even permits voting by absentee ballot, the appellants have not shown a likelihood of success on appeal and their request for a stay of a trial court judgment not to deliver Losap municipal absentee ballots to voters outside of Chuuk will be denied. Chipen v. Election Comm'r of Losap, 9 FSM R. 80, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

There are rare occasions when an equitable remedy may be proper in an election case. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 137 (App. 1999).

The innocent voter who has done everything right should not lose the right to vote and be counted because the election officials have disregarded the mandates and directions of the election law. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 138 (App. 1999).

The secret ballot provision of Chuuk Constitution article XII, section 2 relates only to general elections and has no application to proceedings in the House of Representatives. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 507 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a congressional candidate seeks the issuance of a temporary restraining order prior to balloting he will be denied since he cannot show irreparable injury because the Election Code provides an aggrieved candidate with sufficient alternate and adequate remedies. When the election law provides for remedies that have not yet been used a candidate cannot show the irreparable harm necessary for the issuance of a temporary restraining order. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 209, 212 (Chk. 2005).

No temporary restraining order will issue ordering the National Election Director to accept the late filing of a candidate's nomination papers even though the candidate was misadvised as to the filing deadline. Doone v. National Election Comm'r, 14 FSM R. 489, 493 (Chk. 2006).

The court's only authority in election matters is to hear appeals from Chuuk State Election Commission decisions regarding the conduct of elections. Only a house of the Legislature can decide who is to be seated as a member. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The Tolensom Constitution does not grant the Tolensom Legislature the power to create a method to "appoint" persons to the offices of mayor and assistant mayor. Those offices can be filled in only one way – by vote of the Tolensom electorate, that is, by the people of Tolensom. The only exception to that is when the mayoral office becomes vacant with less than a year left in the mayor's term, the assistant mayor assumes the office for the rest of the term. It was the Tolensom Constitution's framers' clearly expressed will that the mayor and assistant mayor be elected by the voters and not appointed by someone else. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 204 (Chk. 2007).

When the Tolensom Legislature elected in 2004 would have been the sole judge of the election of its members elected in that year and that Legislature already judged the four-year members elected, the Legislature elected in 2006 cannot be the judge of the members elected in 2004. The Legislature elected in 2006 can only be the judge of the election of the members elected in 2006. It cannot be otherwise. A later legislature cannot re-examine a four-year member's election at its whim after the mid-term election because that would make a nullity and a mockery of the provision that four at-large seats would have four year terms, not two year terms. The framers' intent is obvious. They wanted the four year seat holders to be held over throughout the term of the Legislature elected at the mid-term election, to provide a certain continuity. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 204 (Chk. 2007).

There may be cases in which the court would enter an election matter before the election process has been completed. But when, assuming the plaintiff fails to get elected, any irregularities in the election results can be addressed by filing a complaint with the State Election Commission to seek a recount or to aside the election, the plaintiff has not demonstrated that he is in danger of immediate, irreparable harm. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 254 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The only explicit right to suffrage found in the FSM Constitution is the right to "vote in national elections." So an alleged denial of a right to suffrage in a Chuuk state election would be the denial of a right under the Chuuk Constitution's suffrage provisions, and not a denial of FSM constitutional right to suffrage. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

A claim of denial of the right to suffrage in a state election because no revote was ordered is not a claim arising under the national constitution or law. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

If a runoff election must be held, then it must be held and it is the State Election Commission's problem to come up with the necessary funds or to figure out how to conduct the election without funds. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The State Election Commission cannot refuse to hold an election because it has insufficient funds. If it refuses to hold an election on that ground, it is clear that, if sought, a writ of mandamus would issue to command that the election be announced and held. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

If the State Election Commission has a duty to announce and conduct a runoff election, that duty can only be ministerial and non-discretionary. The State Election Commission does not have the discretion to choose whether to conduct an election or not. Its duty to conduct elections is mandated by the Constitution. Thus, whether the petitioner is entitled to a writ commanding the respondent Election Commission to announce (and conduct) a runoff election to fill the Governor's office depends solely on the meaning of the relevant provisions of the Chuuk Constitution. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

It is a clear non-discretionary duty for the State Election Commission to conduct a runoff election if, during the general election, no ticket of candidates for Governor and Lieutenant Governor receives a majority of the votes cast. However, in a special gubernatorial election to fill a vacancy, the candidates do not run on tickets. They run alone for the office of governor. The Section 7 provision for runoff elections applies to tickets of candidates, not to single candidates. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 21-22 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The Section 11 constitutional provision for special elections does not mention runoff elections if there is no candidate with a majority. Nor does it state that the gubernatorial special election shall be conducted in the same manner as the gubernatorial election in Section 7, and it also does not state that it should be conducted in a manner to be prescribed by statute. If it did then, Section 142 of the Election Code, which provides that "[a]ll special elections shall be conducted in the same manner and form as a general election, except as otherwise provided in this Act," would carry great weight and might lead the court to conclude that there was a clear, non-discretionary duty to conduct a runoff. However, there are no such provisions. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the Constitution's framers did not include provisions for runoff elections after special elections, and even if that was through oversight, the court will not insert into the Constitution a runoff provision that is not there. Accordingly, the petition for a writ of mandamus directed to the State Election Commission commanding it to hold a runoff election will be denied. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division heartily approves of the method that if there were any discrepancies in tally totals at any of the twenty-five ballot checking points that the tabulating committee would recount the ballots they had counted since the last checking point and not count any further ballots until all tally counts agreed instead of using the methods that introduce a substantial chance of inaccurate results, and, although the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division does not require that all future elections use this tabulation method, this method will produce the most accurate result. Hallers v. Yer, 18 FSM R. 644, 648 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2013).

A motion to temporarily restrain an election will be denied as moot when that election was held as scheduled. Simina v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 19 FSM R. 572, 573 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

An appeal of an order denying a run-off election is moot when the real party in interest has taken the oath of office and has served the term as Governor until April 2013 since a run-off election following the August 24, 2011 special election is not now possible. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 20 FSM R. 36, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

The appellate court will not consider a municipal election ordinance's validity when that ordinance's two alleged defects may be remedied or addressed before the next municipal election. Selifis v. Robert, 22 FSM R. 569, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Conduct

The "two-of-three mechanism," in which three tabulators tally the votes for a particular candidate as they are read aloud, and either all three tabulators, or at least two of the three tabulators, must agree on the results for the results to be taken as correct, is not illegal, unreasonable, improper or prohibited. This mechanism will produce an accurate count for most ballot boxes. Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 135-37 (App. 1987).

For elections, the timing provisions of the National Election Code prevail over any conflicting timing set out in the APA. Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 129 (App. 1987).

Generally, the conduct of elections is left to the political branches of government, unless the court has powers specifically given to it by Congress contrary to that general rule. Kony v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 28, 29 (Chk. 1993).

By statute an aggrieved candidate in an election contest can only appeal to the FSM Supreme Court after his petition to the National Election Commissioner has been denied. Kony v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 28, 30 (Chk. 1993).

The National Election Commissioner has the power to establish voting precincts and designate polling places upon the recommendation of the members of the board of elections of the particular election district. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (II), 6 FSM R. 74, 76-77 (App. 1993).

When a state election is held on the same date as the national election and the closing time for the state poll is later than the 5:00 p.m. closing time for the national election, then the later state closing time prevails for the national election as well. The poll remains open to allow all who are waiting in line at closing time to vote. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (II), 6 FSM R. 74, 79 (App. 1993).

Courts of equity are without jurisdiction to enforce purely political rights. Matters concerning the conduct of elections are usually left to the political branches and the courts generally have no jurisdiction until after the elections are held. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Generally speaking, elections are conducted and carried out and administered by the executive and legislative branches. Courts do not have a primary position in that traditional scheme. The election law states the time at which the court has the right of entertaining an appeal from the final action of the National Election Director. Wiliander v. Siales, 7 FSM R. 77, 79 (Chk. 1995).

By statute, petitions to the National Election Director challenging the acceptablitiy of a vote or votes must be filed prior to certification of the results of the election or within one week of the election, whichever occurs first. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 156 (App. 1995).

By statute, absentee ballots are to be examined when received, on or before Election Day, to determine if the voter is qualified to vote absentee, and the ballot envelope deposited unopened in container, and publicly delivered to counting and tabulating committee on Election Day. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 156-57 (App. 1995).

Where, because election officials had not processed the absentee ballots until nine and ten days after the election thus making it impossible to file a petition concerning the acceptability of those ballots within the statutory time frame of prior to certification of the results of the election or within one week of the election, whichever occurs first, the petition will still be considered timely if it is filed before certification. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 157 (App. 1995).

A timely received absentee ballot may be rejected if the accompanying statement is insufficient, the signatures do not correspond, the procedure for marking and returning the absentee ballot has not been complied with, the voter is not a qualified elector, or the ballot envelope has been tampered with. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 156 n.6, 159 (App. 1995).

The formalities involved in the absentee election process are intended to safeguard the electoral process from voter fraud. Therefore a regulation rejecting absentee ballots if the signature on the request form is different from the signature on the statement accompanying an absentee ballot is a reasonable exercise of the National Election Director's power to implement rules and regulations for absentee ballots. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 160-61 (App. 1995).

Since the right to vote is personal – one person's vote cannot be cast by another – one person's request to vote absentee cannot be made by another. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 160 (App. 1995).

Congress intended that the National Election Code be applied uniformly throughout the nation. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 161 (App. 1995).

A radio announcement of the results of an Uman municipal election by the Uman Election Commissioner is not a ruling by the Chuuk Election Commission which would authorize an appeal to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300f (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that there shall be an independent Election Commission vested with powers, duties, and responsibilities, as prescribed by statute, for the administration of elections in the State of Chuuk. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300h (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The Chuuk Election Law of 1996 applies to all elections in Chuuk including municipal elections unless otherwise specifically provided. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300i (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

All the provisions of the Chuuk State Election Law of 1996 apply to all elections in the State of Chuuk, including municipal and national elections whenever applicable unless otherwise specifically provided. Chipen v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 8 FSM R. 300n, 300o (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

All ballots forwarded to absentee voters and not physically received by the Commission at its main office prior to the closing of the polls on election day shall be rejected. Chipen v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 8 FSM R. 300n, 300p (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that there shall be an independent election commission vested with powers, duties, and responsibilities, as prescribed by statute, for the administration of elections in Chuuk. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 564 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

No resident entitled to vote may be denied the privilege to vote or be interfered with in voting. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Absentee voting is a privilege granted electors, and not an absolute right. The purpose of statutes permitting absentee voting is to enable a qualified voter to vote at a general election in the precinct of his domicil when he is temporarily absent therefrom. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Unless voting is expressly allowed elsewhere, all ballots must be cast in the state of residence. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Voters' due process and equal protection rights are not violated by regulation or restriction of voting by absentee ballots. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A municipal ordinance restricting absentee voting in municipal elections to persons in the state of Chuuk is not unconstitutional. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The National Election Commissioner's failure to send out any absentee ballots until eleven days before the election instead of the at least 30 days prior to an election provided for by 9 F.S.M.C. 704(1) is not in substantial compliance with the procedures required by the statute and was a direct violation of a mandatory statute enacted by Congress. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 136 (App. 1999).

When requests for absentee ballots were received between January 30th and February 11th and no ballots were sent out until February 19th, those ballots were not sent out as soon as is practicable after the request was received as required by statute. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 136 (App. 1999).

Errors in not timely providing absentee ballots can be largely remedied by extending the time in which ballots from such voters can be counted as timely received. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 136 (App. 1999).

Absentee ballots must be sent out at least thirty days before the election to all duly qualified voters who have requested them by then. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 136, 137 (App. 1999).

No absentee ballots received after the established close of polling places on Election Day should be counted and tabulated. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 137 (App. 1999).

Separate mail or delivery by absentee voters is not required by the statute's language. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 138 (App. 1999).

Mere irregularities in a ballot's form will not invalidate an election if the voters' intent is obvious. Therefore ballots where the alignment of the candidate's name, picture, and box for an X vary slightly from the specimen ballot are not confusing and will not be invalidated. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 139 (App. 1999).

Candidates are to notify the national election commissioner twenty-four hours before their intended use of a government broadcast facility. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 144 (Pon. 1999).

When there is no statutory requirement that a candidate submit his taped speech before it is aired and when there is no mention of criminal liability on the of the government broadcast facility should it do so, there is no probable cause to believe a crime has been committed, and the information and criminal summons should be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

A court will not extrapolate a statute's allowable meaning to encompass submission of the taped speech directly to the radio station without first submitting it to the national election commissioner when the statute's only stated requirement is twenty-four hours' notice. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

A political candidate's freedom of expression is guaranteed, as it is to all citizens, under section 1 of the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

To conclude that 9 F.S.M.C. 107(1) criminalizes either a candidate's conduct in submitting his campaign tape directly to a broadcast facility without previously submitting it to the national election commissioner, or to conclude that the owner and operator of the radio station faces a criminal penalty because it aired the tape would be to attribute an uncertain meaning to the statute, which might well cause candidates to steer far wider of the unlawful zone than they otherwise would, or should, in the important work of presenting their views to a public which needs to exercise its franchise in an intelligent manner.

The court declines to credit such an uncertain meaning to the statute. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

The national election director and his deputies in the four states, the national election commissioners, may have a duty to take all reasonable steps to insure that candidates have equal access to government broadcast facilities. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

All provisions of the Chuuk Election Law of 1996 apply to all elections in the State of Chuuk, including municipal and national elections whenever applicable unless otherwise specifically provided. Phillip v. Phillip, 9 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

While conditions may be imposed on candidates, the candidate must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to satisfy the conditions, and the extraction of fees which are arbitrary, or have no relation to the expense of the election will be denied. Nameta v. Cheipot, 9 FSM R. 510, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The purpose of election filing fees is to defray the costs of the procedures leading to the election. There must be a reasonable relation to the amount of the fee and the costs incurred. Unreasonable fees not only deny the candidate his right to be a candidate, but also deny the right of every person to select him for office. When the fee requirements go beyond the bounds of reasonable regulation, it operates as a substantial impairment of the right of the electorate to freely choose the candidate of their choice. Nameta v. Cheipot, 9 FSM R. 510, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that no person, otherwise qualified to vote, may be denied the privilege to vote. The unreasonableness of candidate qualifying fees is an effective denial of the privilege to vote. Nameta v. Cheipot, 9 FSM R. 510, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When an ordinance has a savings clause and its provision for election filing fees is found unconstitutional, the filing fee provision of the previous ordinance it superseded will be reinstated. Nameta v. Cheipot, 9 FSM R. 510, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a constitution establishes specific eligibility requirements for a particular constitutional office, the legislature is without power to require different qualifications and when there is no direct authority in the constitution for the legislature to establish qualifications for office in excess of those imposed by the constitution, such extra qualifications are unconstitutional. Olap v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 531, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Chuuk Constitution does not, either expressly or by implication, give the Legislature any authority whatsoever, to add qualifications for persons seeking a legislative office beyond those in the Constitution. Olap v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 531, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

It is beyond the power of the Legislature to enact a law to prohibit government employees from becoming candidates for legislative service. Olap v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 531, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The issue of whether a person is entitled to have his name placed on the ballot is an election case, over which neither division of the Chuuk State Supreme Court has original jurisdiction, and which is placed solely in the hands of the Chuuk State Election Commission with the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division having jurisdiction only as provided in the Election Law of 1996. Hethon v. Os, 9 FSM R. 534, 535 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Even if the purported enactment of the education qualifications for mayor and assistant mayor were unquestionably enacted, the municipal council is without authority to add qualifications to those set out in the municipal constitution unless the constitution so authorizes the council. Chipen v. Election Comm'r of Losap, 10 FSM R. 15, 17-18 (Chk. 2001).

Unlawfully added education qualifications for mayor and assistant mayor improperly deprive candidates and those similarly situated of the equal protection of the law as guaranteed by the FSM Constitution. Chipen v. Election Comm'r of Losap, 10 FSM R. 15, 18 (Chk. 2001).

A municipality and its election commissioner will be restrained from enforcing added qualifications for municipal office when a short time remains to file as a candidate and the harm is irreparable to those potential candidates who are denied nominating petitions because they do not meet the unlawful added qualifications, when there is no harm to the municipality or the election commissioner if they are required to allow the candidacies, and when the public interest is served if eligible citizens are able to present themselves for election. Chipen v. Election Comm'r of Losap, 10 FSM R. 15, 18 (Chk. 2001).

While the Chuuk Constitution may not make voting abroad a constitutionally-protected right, it does not prohibit voting out-of-state. Such voting is a privilege that the Legislature may create and regulate by statute and it has done so. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The executive policy requiring resignation before running for a seat in the Chuuk Legislature adds a qualification prohibited by the Chuuk Constitution and is void, and therefore, the plaintiffs' forced resignation pursuant to the Governor's Executive Order or policy is unconstitutional and beyond his power. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A governor has only a delegated power and a limited sphere of action, and the Chuuk Constitution does not give the Governor the power to add qualifications, that a person must not be a state employee, to be a candidate for a seat in the Chuuk Legislature. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 307 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An FSM citizen, who is over 18 years of age, a resident of Chuuk, and not insane, confined to a mental institution or imprisoned, may vote at any Chuuk election provided he is registered to vote. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 465 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

Specific procedures and time frames govern voter registration. No one can be registered except by affidavit of registration made before the registration clerk in the municipality where such person resides at least 30 days prior to any election, when the registration rolls close for that election, and the Commission, accepts no further affidavits except for those who turn 18 years of age within the 30 day period. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 465 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The Chuuk State Election Commission has the statutory power to promulgate in writing the necessary rules and regulations including administrative procedures for elections. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 466 n.8 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

Any elector who has previously been registered but whose name does not appear on the master list of his or her election precinct may be re-registered provided, he or she signs an affidavit attesting to such previous registration and swears to before the Election Commission or a designated representative. A registered voter from the same precinct must witness the elector's sworn statement. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 466 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The Election Commission must prepare and compile a registration list of all voters for use in a general election, or any other election. The Election Commission's responsibility is to see that the general register lists accurately reflects the registered voters for the State of Chuuk. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 467 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When it was already too late for the 39 persons on the additional list to be registered if they had not previously registered, then their votes were illegal; and when the specific procedures for re-registration were not followed for any of the 39 persons on the additional list that were being re-registered, their votes were illegal. Therefore, the process used to add the 39 persons on the additional list to the general register list on election day so as to allow them to vote was an election irregularity; all 39 persons on the additional list should not have been allowed to vote; and their votes were illegal. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 467 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

Because the statutory provision prohibits making, using or furnishing copies of official ballots by any person, the Election Director should not have authorized the copying of additional ballots and copied ballots should not have been used in the election. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 467 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

Opening a ballot box on the day before the election is not in accordance with the election law. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 468 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When voters used a copied ballot but were not aware of it and did not intend to do so and when those voters were properly registered to vote, showed up at the polling place, and properly exercised their constitutional and statutory right to vote, any problem with the ballots that they used was not their fault, but the fault of election officials in carrying out the election. Thus their votes should not be voided. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 468-69 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

If true, even a failed attempt to intimidate voters, especially at a polling place, would subject that person to criminal liability. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 474 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The Election Director does not have the authority to open a ballot box and to change the certification on his own. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 475 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When the election law was not complied with in making a certification of votes, that certification is void. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 476-77 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

There will be an independent Election Commission, vested with powers, duties and responsibilities, as prescribed by statute, for the administration of elections in Chuuk. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk State Election Commission has the power to conduct all elections in the State of Chuuk, including national and municipal elections, if so provided by law or municipal constitutions. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 577 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Allegations of a total failure to provide an accounting of the number of ballots printed for the election; refusal to record or account for the total number of ballots cast in the election; failure to maintain an acknowledgment list to provide proof of which registered voters actually cast ballots; refusal by the Election Commissioner (the brother of an elected candidate) to permit opponents' representatives to accompany the Guam VAAPP ballot box to Fefan; the ballot box's seizure and opening while it was in his possession; evidence, including the fact that the key for the ballot box's lock did not fit the lock, raising an inference that the Election Commissioner had tampered with the ballot box while it was in his possession; deciding, a mere 10 days before the election, to do away with VAAPP sites in Hawaii and Pohnpei, thereby effectively depriving Fefan citizens residing in those places of their right to cast votes in the election; and the fact that the entire Fefan Election Commission had been hand selected by a candidate from his active supporters, thereby calling into question whether the Election Commission was truly independent, if proven to be true, are sufficient to call into question whether the election was in fact free and democratic, as required by the Chuuk Constitution. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 578 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Neither the Legislature, nor the Governor, may add qualifications for public office beyond those qualifications provided in the Chuuk Constitution. It matters not whether the employee in question is an "exempt" employee, or one covered by the Public Service Act. All government employees, with the express exception of the Governor's principal officers and advisors (who serve at the Governor's pleasure), are protected in their political activities from the Governor's interference with their employment. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 271 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When nothing in the record indicates under what tenure a person held the municipal election commissioner's office, the court cannot conclude as a matter of law that he held that position when he conducted an election on August 1, 2003 and that his purported removal from office was unlawful. Summary judgment that the August 1st election was valid will therefore denied. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 295 (Chk. 2004).

The election results certification, the signing of it, and notifying the public and the candidates should all be done at the same time, promptly on the same day. That an intervening day was celebrated as a holiday by many is no excuse. The date of certification is an important starting date in the election contest process. The statutory scheme contemplates that these steps are taken promptly. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203-04 (App. 2005).

The current election statute only gives the Chuuk State Election Commission the power to conduct municipal elections, if so provided by law or municipal constitutions and also requires that all election complaints be filed with the Chuuk Election Commissioner and that all appeals from the Election Commissioner's decision go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 265 & n.1 (Chk. 2006).

Election irregularities may include the polling place's location was not announced thirty days in advance, voting started without a candidate poll watcher's presence, and poll watchers, who, for some reason, were permitted to sit close to the poll workers in the voting area. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

It is a poll watcher's duty to know where the polling place is and to be present before it is scheduled to open. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Persons who are present at the polling place before closing (or in line at the door) and who are qualified to vote and have not been able to do so, must be given sufficient time to vote. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The current Chuuk election statute only gives the Chuuk State Election Commission the power to conduct municipal elections if so provided by law or municipal constitutions. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Elections, particularly, are in the hands of the political branches. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 254 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Elections belong to the political branch of the government. The court can exercise authority over election disputes only to the extent that there is a constitutional or statutory provision expressly or impliedly giving it that authority. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Under Chuuk election regulations, stopping the voting at a polling place is authorized if in a precinct board's best judgment an incident creates an imminently extreme and unpreventable danger to human beings, and the election commission's executive director confirms the closing. Aniol v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 387, 388-89 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The determination of whether a ballot can be counted or not is to be performed by examining the integrity of each individual ballot cast to determine if it is lost, destroyed, or defective, or whether it is capable of tabulation. Aniol v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 387, 389 (Chk. S. Ct. App.

When the court finds that although there was damage to the ballot box, there was no evidence that any of the individual ballots had been rendered unreliable or were otherwise incapable of tabulation, the court will order the ballot box to be delivered to the election commission for a tabulation of cast votes according to the applicable Election Code provisions and election regulations. Aniol v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 387, 389 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The Commissioners are tasked with a duty that includes the basic administrative planning of an election. Poor planning does not constitute an emergency, and the Commissioners must plan accordingly to ensure that they are carrying out their duties as assigned. To facilitate the process, state law provides that the Commissioners appoint people to conduct the election. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 584, 588 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the Commissioners' travel authorization was for travel originating in Chuuk on March 1, 2013, and therefore, any prior expenditure of funds, not directly attributable to the travel, cannot be then ascribed to a preliminary injunction's issuance; when the status quo for state government travel is to purchase full fare tickets which are therefore refundable with a minimal fee imposed and when hotel accommodations and car rentals are generally fully refundable given twenty-four hour notice and other costs associated with the election can generally be transferred to the parties that will travel in place of the Commissioners; when the Commissioners' impartiality is necessary to protect the elections' integrity while protecting the plaintiff candidates' and other individuals' fundamental rights; and when the Commissioners stated that they will attempt to be "honest" but that alone is insufficient because impartiality is required, the balance of the equities tips overwhelmingly in the plaintiffs' favor to enjoin the Commissioners' travel to supervise polling places. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 584, 588-89 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Allowing the Election Commissioners to travel to conduct the elections will not serve the public interest since the commissioners' need to be physically present at the polling sites to conduct the election is a mischaracterization of the law because subordinate officers and employees are designated duties for the efficient performance of functions and duties and because the law requires impartiality, whether explicitly or implicitly, and the Commissioners' physical presence at the polling sites defeats impartiality and clouds the Election Commission with the appearance of impropriety. Consequently, an injunction will serve the public interest in a manner, which preserves the integrity of elections by ensuring that the Election Commissioners remain impartial while being available for any necessary quorums and require adequate planning for the elections. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 584, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

State election commissioners are enjoined from traveling from Chuuk for the purposes of conducting the election at the voting sites and from appearing in person at the voting locations. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 584, 589-90 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

All ballots forwarded to absentee voters and not physically received by the Chuuk State Election Commission at its main office before the closing of the polls on election day must be rejected. Setile v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R.641, 643 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2013).

Since the FSM Post Office, Chuuk branch was not the Chuuk State Election Commission's main office on March 5, 2013 and the Chuuk State Election Law's language is mandatory and not discretionary and therefore must be strictly adhered to, counting the thirteen absentee mail-in ballots that were in the post office on March 5, 2013, but that were not physically received at the Chuuk State Election Commission main office until after the closing of the polling places was improper and must be deducted from the totals. Setile v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R.641, 643 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2013).

All Chuuk Election Commissioners must remain neutral to avoid any/all appearances of impropriety, and to be available for any quorum following an election. Additionally, all persons holding a position in the Chuuk State Election Commission must strictly adhere to the mandates of the election laws. Narruhn v.

Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

All Chuuk Election Commissioners are permanently enjoined from traveling from Chuuk for the purposes of conducting the election at the voting sites and from appearing in person at the voting locations for the purposes of conducting the election at the voting sites. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Whether an individual is entitled to be placed on the ballot is left solely in the hands of the Chuuk State Election Commission and is beyond the Chuuk State Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Simina v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 19 FSM R. 587, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

No law (including the Nema Constitution) prevents the Chuuk State Election Commission from determining whether an individual should be placed on the Nema Municipality General Election ballot. Simina v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 19 FSM R. 587, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

– Contests

An election must be completed and the results announced before the election can be contested. Daniel v. Moses, 3 FSM R. 1, 4 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

To interpret 9 F.S.M.C. 904, the FSM Supreme Court should apply a two-prong test. The first prong is whether there is a "substantial question or fraud or error" and the second prong is whether there is "substantial possibility that the outcome would be affected by a recount." Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 136-37 (App. 1987).

If the possibility of double voting is alleged the burden is on the appellant to show that it occurred. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (II), 6 FSM R. 74, 78 (App. 1993).

When the National Election Commissioner's decision concerning election irregularities is appealed to the FSM Supreme Court, the appellate division must decide whether the National Election Commissioner's decision is proper, and if not, whether the irregularities complained of could have resulted in the election of a candidate who would not have won had the irregularities not occurred. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (II), 6 FSM R. 74, 81 (App. 1993).

Where election irregularities cannot be corrected by a recount, the election, in whole or in part, can be set aside and done over only if it is more likely than not that the irregularities complained of could have, not necessarily would have, resulted in the election of a candidate who would not have won had the irregularities not occurred. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (II), 6 FSM R. 74, 82 (App. 1993).

While the court has statutory authority to hear appeals regarding the conduct of elections, its power to grant relief is limited to ordering a recount or a revote. Only Congress can decide who is to be seated and once it has seated a member unconditionally the matter is nonjusticiable. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 & n.1 (App. 1993).

The time frames established by statute for election petitions to the National Election Director are short. A candidate must be vigilant in asserting his rights to petition. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 157 (App. 1995).

Where no action, or words, or silence of the National Election Director prior to the appellant's initial petition misled the appellant into untimely filing his petition after certification it does not give rise to an estoppel. The Director's later failure to raise the issue of untimeliness until his denial of the petition was appealed to the Supreme Court does not give rise to an estoppel. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 157-58 (App. 1995).

Deadlines set by statute are generally jurisdictional. If the deadline has not been strictly complied with the adjudicator is without jurisdiction over the matter once the deadline has passed. This applies equally to the National Election Director as a member of an administrative agency (executive branch) hearing an appeal as it does to a court hearing an appeal from an administrative agency. Thus the Director cannot extend statutory time frames set by Congress. When the Director had not rendered his decision within the statutorily-prescribed time limit it must be considered a denial of the petition, and the petitioner could then have filed his appeal in the Supreme Court. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 158 (App. 1995).

Congress intended that the election appeal process be timely and expeditious. This is especially important in a year in which the newly elected Congress selects the President and Vice President of the nation from among its members. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 161 (App. 1995).

The Chuuk State Election Law, Chk. Pub. L. No. 3-95-26, §§ 126, 130, requires that all election complaints be filed with the Chuuk Election Commissioner and that all appeals from the Election Commissioner's decision go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the state election law requiring election appeals to go directly to the state court appellate division has a provision applying the law to municipal elections if the municipal constitution or law so provides and there is no such municipal provision, then jurisdiction over the election appeal does not lie in the state court appellate division in the first instance. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the state judiciary act gives the state court trial division authority to review all actions of an agency of the government, the trial division has jurisdiction over an appeal of the state election commissioner's denial of a petition to set aside a municipal election. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division had jurisdiction to hear an election appeal from an election conducted, pursuant to the governor's emergency declaration, under a state law providing for such jurisdiction. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 275, 280 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A decision of the Chuuk Election Commission may be appealed to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300f, 300h (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The right to contest an election is not a common law right. Elections belong to the political branch of the government, and are beyond the control of the judicial power. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300g (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests, unless it is so provided expressly or impliedly by the constitution or by statute. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300g (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

It is a general rule that courts of equity have no inherent power to try contested elections, notwithstanding fraud on the part of the election officers. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300g (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

Constitutions and statutes of most jurisdictions provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions. A strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300g (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

Election contests are purely statutory, and the courts have no inherent power to determine election contests, the determination of such contests being a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300h (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

If the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has original jurisdiction to decide an election contest, there must be a specific constitutional or statutory provision giving the appellate division that authority. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300h (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has no original jurisdiction to entertain an appeal directly from a municipal election commissioner. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300i (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

When a contestant offers no evidence of voting irregularities before a municipal election board and the Chuuk State Election Commission and the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division, the appellate division has no basis to disturb the findings of fact reached by the Election Commission. Findings of fact relative to the residence, age and location of electors will generally be left undisturbed. Chipen v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 8 FSM R. 300n, 300p (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The right to contest an election is not a common-law right. Elections belong to the political branch of the government, and are beyond the control of the judicial power. An election contest is purely a constitutional or statutory proceeding. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests, unless it is so provided expressly or impliedly by the constitution or by statute. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

It is a general rule that courts of equity have no inherent power to try contested elections, notwithstanding fraud on the part of the election officers. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The constitutions and statutes of most jurisdictions provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions. They are not actions at law or suits in equity, and were unknown to the common law. The proceedings are special and summary in their nature. A strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 563 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The determination of an election contest is a judicial function only so far as authorized by the statute. The court exercising the jurisdiction does not proceed according to the course of the common law, but must resort to the statute alone to ascertain its powers and mode of procedure. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 563 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division could have had jurisdiction over election commission appeals had the legislature seen fit to grant it such authority, but the Election Law of 1996, provides that Chuuk Election Commission decisions may be appealed to the appellate division. Therefore an election contest appeal in the trial division will be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 564 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

No stay in an election appeal will be granted when nothing in the record of the case indicates that appellant will suffer irreparable harm and, also, that he will likely prevail on the merits of the appeal and when granting a stay would have a substantial effect on the municipal employees and other public officials who have held office for almost a year and would not be in the public interest of having an efficient and effective municipal government. Pius v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 8 FSM R. 570, 571 (Chk. S. Ct.

An election contest is purely a constitutional or statutory proceeding. At common law there was no right to contest in a court any public election, the theory being that elections belong to the political branch of the government, beyond the control of judicial power. Phillip v. Phillip, 9 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When a voter contests any election he must file a written complaint with the Chuuk Election Commission. If the contestant is dissatisfied with the Commission's decision, appeal to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division can be had, and if the contestant is dissatisfied with the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division's decision, appeal to the FSM Supreme Court can be had. The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division is without jurisdiction to hear an election contest. Phillip v. Phillip, 9 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the statute requires that a statement of contest must be filed within five days "after declaration of the result of the election by the body canvassing the returns" and also provides that upon "tabulation of each of the precinct votes, the Commission shall tabulate or cause to be tabulated the cumulative results, including the total of election results for each nominee, and make these results known to the public," the declaration is when the results are made known to the public. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

An aggrieved candidate does not have to wait until the final certification of the results to file his complaint. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The Chuuk State Election Commission must meet within three days after certification to consider any complaints. A contestant is justified in considering the Commission's failure to meet within its deadline as a denial of his complaint, and is thus entitled to file a notice of appeal. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153-54 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

There is no provision in the election law allowing a voter to cast a ballot after the polling places have closed and everyone in line at the time has been allowed to vote. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 155 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When sufficient evidence was not produced to establish a prima facie case for the reliability of state ballots found misplaced in national election ballot boxes, and those ballots were not kept securely, the election contestant has failed to establish an attribute of reliability that might have lead the court to allow those ballots to have been counted. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 156 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When the faxed official result form from a polling place abroad is illegible and the results are later sent on an unofficial form, the proper relief for those results' unreliability is not their elimination, but that the ballot box be placed in the court clerk's custody, to be opened and the original official result form used in place of the faxed results to determine the proper result. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 156 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The election statute does not contain a deadline to file an election contest appeal from the Chuuk State Election Commission. The only deadlines in the statute that relate to the court are that the court must "meet within 7 days of its receipt of a complaint to determine the contested election," and that the court must "decide on the contested election prior to the date upon which the declared winning candidates are to take office." Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

An appellee's cross appeal in an election case will be dismissed when there was no evidence that he had ever raised the issue before either the tabulating committee or the Election Commission. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 158 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The absence of a filing deadline in the election statute means that there is no statutory jurisdictional time bar to an appeal, but that any election contest party who appeals within seven days of when the declared winning candidates are to take office runs the risk that the court will either not meet before its authority to decide the appeal expires or that court may be unable to conclude the proceedings and make its decision before its authority to decide the appeal expires. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 158 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

If, on appeal the Chuuk State Supreme Court confirms the election, judgment shall be rendered against the contestants, for costs, in favor of the defendant. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 222 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When, if an election contestant were declared a winning candidate, only one of two other candidates would no longer be a winning candidate, both may properly be considered defendants under the election statute when it is uncertain which of those two the contestant would have displaced if he had succeeded in being elected. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 222 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When a municipal election ordinance has no provision for contesting or challenging the election results after an election has been held, or for resolving election disputes and when the state election law applies to all elections in the state including municipal elections whenever applicable unless otherwise specifically provided, the state election law must apply to this phase of the election, and the proper forum to contest the municipal election is the Chuuk Election Commission. Alafanso v. Suda, 10 FSM R. 553, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the sole issue before the appellate court was whether the Director's rejection of an election petition as untimely was in compliance with the applicable statute and when the only relief the court could have granted would have been to vacate the Director's denial, remand the matter to the Director, and order the Director to consider the petition on the merits and when the Director himself has resolved this one issue in petitioner's favor and considered and ruled on the petition's merits, there is no further relief that the court could grant that the Director has not already granted. The appeal is moot. Fritz v. National Election Dir., 11 FSM R. 442, 444 (App. 2003).

A Chuuk Election Commission decision may be appealed to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division where a trial de novo may hear witness testimony and oral arguments from the parties. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 464 & n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When even if the number of illegal votes were all subtracted from the real party in interest's legal votes, the real party in interest still has more votes than his opponent, the court cannot set aside the election results because the election results would not change. In re Nomun Weito Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 461, 469-70 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When an election contestant has not proven that an unauthorized pollwatcher's actions made the situation at the Pohnpei VAAPP such that the results from that ballot box are so unreliable that they must be discarded, those results will stand. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 474 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

A letter to the Commission, that asks that the vote be changed from 154 to 164 is not in the form of a verified complaint as required by statute. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 475 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The unauthorized opening of a ballot box creates severe impediments to resolving an election contest in a manner reflecting the voters' intent. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 475 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

An aggrieved candidate has a due process right, created by statute, to be heard on his verified complaint's contentions. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 475 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

An aggrieved candidate should file a verified complaint, which should be heard and considered by the Election Commission before it alters or certifies the figures certified by the Overall Chairman and the Director. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When an election contest comes before the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division with the best evidence of the results, the ballots, irreversibly tainted and unusable, the court is forced to consider less authoritative evidence. Since the election law mandates that a trial be held for election contests appealed to the appellate division, this requires the court to make a de novo determination of the facts as well as stating its interpretation of the law. The court therefore hears witness testimony in addition to considering documentary evidence and legal argument. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The Chuuk election law requires a trial in the appellate division and not a normal appeal where generally only issues of law are decided and the facts as determined below are left undisturbed. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The Legislature has granted the appellate division "all powers necessary to make the determination" of the contested election. The Legislature's intent when it said "all powers" was that the court could consider all relevant and admissible evidence properly offered. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

In keeping with the Chuuk Constitution Judicial Guidance Clause's requirement that court decisions must be in conformity with "the social and geographical configuration of the State of Chuuk," parol evidence may be used to impeach a written election return that was based upon an oral communication by radio because Chuuk's geographical configuration is such that the transmission of election returns from the outer islands is oral (by radio). In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When the election commission never properly certified anyone as the winning candidate, an appellate trial's result cannot confirm a candidate's election, but rather determines which of two contestants should have been declared elected. Therefore no judgment for costs will be awarded in anyone's favor. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477-78 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

Even when the real parties in interest have already taken office, both the plaintiffs and the real parties in interest have a legally cognizable interest in the outcome, because if the election is declared unconstitutionally void, the plaintiffs may have another chance at victory and if the election is declared valid, then the real parties in interest may savor their victory and because it is not an abstract dispute, but a very real problem which threatens the very foundation of democracy, the right of the people to vote in free and fair and democratic elections. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 580 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since, if the court determines that the Chuuk State Election Commission is constitutionally required to conduct all elections in Chuuk, including all municipal elections, the Chuuk State Election Commission will be required to bear substantial additional burdens and obligations, the Chuuk State Election Commission is thus a necessary party to the litigation as provided in Chuuk Civil Rule 19(a). Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 581 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A new claim that constitutionally only the state election commission can conduct municipal elections in Chuuk will not be considered unless the municipal defendants are represented separately from the state when past practice in Chuuk has been that municipal officials have run municipal elections, when this new claim is only hypothetical as the state election commission, a non-party, has not asserted that it intends to and will conduct or that it has the sole authority to conduct municipal elections in the future, and when the defendant Governor and the municipal defendants are represented by the same counsel, a state employee, but may likely have differing views on the point. Even then, the court would desire a separate appearance by the state election commission before considering the issue. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 295 (Chk. 2004).

A prematurely filed election appeal must be dismissed. By statute, an aggrieved candidate in an election contest can appeal to the FSM Supreme Court only after the Election Director has denied his petition or after his petition has been effectively denied because the time has run out for the Director to issue a decision on the petition. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 202 (App. 2005).

The primary forum in which election contests must run their course is the election administrative machinery created by Congress. Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions. A strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203 (App. 2005).

An election contest appellant has not strictly observed the steps necessary to give the court jurisdiction when he has not filed his appeal within the time frame permitted by statute. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203 (App. 2005).

The election results certification, the signing of it, and notifying the public and the candidates should all be done at the same time, promptly on the same day. That an intervening day was celebrated as a holiday by many is no excuse. The date of certification is an important starting date in the election contest process. The statutory scheme contemplates that these steps are taken promptly. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203-04 (App. 2005).

When there are multiple dates upon which an election result was certified, the date of making the certification public and notifying the candidates would comport best with due process as the certification starting point for election contests. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

The court lacks jurisdiction to hear an election appeal filed too soon because the statute does not grant the court jurisdiction over election cases until the administrative steps and time frames in 9 F.S.M.C. 902 have been adhered to. Such an appeal is therefore dismissed as premature (unripe). Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

The five-day time limit to appeal an election to the FSM Supreme Court does not start when the Director certifies the election, but rather when the aggrieved candidate receives the Director's decision on the candidate's petition or until the time has run out for the Director to issue a decision on the candidate's petition. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

An election contest appellant's failure to specify which statutory standard of review he thinks applies to his appeal should not, by itself, be fatal to his appeal. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

The conduct of elections is generally left to the political branches of government – the legislative and the executive – and not to the judicial branch. The primary forum in which election contests must take place is the election administrative machinery Congress created by statute. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 209, 213 (Chk. 2005).

Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the election machinery, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by constitutional or statutory provisions. The necessary steps must be strictly observed to give the court jurisdiction, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are usually powerless to entertain such proceedings. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 209, 213 (Chk. 2005).

The election law states the time at which the court has the right to entertain an appeal is from the National Election Director's final action. No statutory or constitutional provision grants the court the power to interfere with the election machinery and issue injunctive relief at a point in the electoral process prior to the election officials' completion of their responsibilities. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 209, 213 (Chk. 2005).

The applicable time frame within which an election contest appeal can be made starts with a petition to the National Election Director filed within one week of certification of the results of the election. The winning candidate then has one week to respond to the petition. The Director then has ten days to decide whether to approve the petition. If the petition is denied, then the aggrieved candidate would have five days to appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. It is at that point that the court would have jurisdiction to consider this election contest. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

By statute, an aggrieved candidate in an election contest can appeal to the FSM Supreme Court only after the election agency has denied his petition. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

The primary forum in which election contests must take place is the election administrative machinery Congress created by statute. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the election machinery, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by constitutional or statutory provisions. The necessary steps must be strictly observed to give the court jurisdiction, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are usually powerless to entertain such proceedings. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

An election contest appeal must await the National Election Director's certification of the election results and the Director's denial of a timely post-certification petition by the candidate. If the Director's decision on the petition does not adequately address his concerns, only then would the aggrieved candidate have five days from the receipt of the Director's decision to appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division if the Director's decision on the petition does not adequately address his concerns. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

If the National Election Director does not issue his decision on a candidate's post-certification petition within the statutory time frame, the candidate may appeal without waiting further for the decision. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 n.3 (App. 2005).

Congress, when it drafted the election statute, limited the court's involvement in election contests to until after the issues were narrowed to the certified result and whether a candidate's petition contesting the certified result should have been granted by the Director and, if so, what relief was then appropriate. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 220 (App. 2005).

An election contest appeal must be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction when it is filed too soon, at a time before the election statute confers jurisdiction on the court. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 220 (App. 2005).

If an aggrieved candidate's appeal seeks a revote, he may, once the election is certified, petition the National Election Director for a revote, and if he feels that the Director's decision does not adequately address his concerns, then appeal that decision to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division within the statutory time limit. An earlier appeal is too soon. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 220 (App. 2005).

The court would be without jurisdiction to hear an election contest appeal on the acceptability of a vote or votes when the aggrieved candidate withdrew his only timely petition on the subject. Asugar v. Edward,

13 FSM R. 215, 220 (App. 2005).

If election contest issues come before the FSM Supreme Court appellate division by an appeal properly filed during the statutory time limit after the election contest machinery has run its course, the court will then consider at that time the merits of what is raised and before it. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 220 (App. 2005).

When the plaintiffs seek a declaration that they are the legal winners of an election but have not named as defendants the candidates that opposed them and that presumably question their right to office and since these other candidates are not only real parties in interest but also indispensable parties to such a declaration, the case may be dismissed for failure to join indispensable parties. Puchonong v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 67, 69 (Chk. 2006).

It is doubtful whether a court judgment in an election contest case can be collaterally attacked since election contests are purely statutory, and the courts have no inherent power to determine election contests. The determination of election contests is a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Thus, the jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests. An election contest must follow the path set out for it in the statute and no other. Puchonong v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 67, 69 (Chk. 2006).

Whether the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division lacked jurisdiction to consider the municipal election contest claims that the defendants brought there is irrelevant to a motion to dismiss a case in the FSM Supreme Court that relies on that state court decision because if that court lacked jurisdiction, it is now too late for the defendants to contest the municipal election in any other forum and the municipal election commission's decision will stand as a basis upon which the plaintiffs' complaint can state a claim for which relief may be granted and if that court had jurisdiction, then that court's final (and unappealed) judgment will stand as the basis on which the plaintiffs' complaint can state a claim for which relief can be granted. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 219 (Chk. 2006).

Assuming an allegation that the litigants were denied due process by the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division to be true, does not assist their argument because they had a clear avenue to appeal that judgment and did not. When no attempt was made to appeal a decision that the candidates considered in error and a violation of their due process rights, the defendants were not vigilant in asserting their rights in seeking appellate review. An aggrieved candidate must be vigilant in asserting his rights to contest an election result. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 219-20 (Chk. 2006).

The current election statute only gives the Chuuk State Election Commission the power to conduct municipal elections, if so provided by law or municipal constitutions and also requires that all election complaints be filed with the Chuuk Election Commissioner and that all appeals from the Election Commissioner's decision go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 265 & n.1 (Chk. 2006).

Generally speaking, elections are conducted, carried out, and administered by the executive and legislative branches. Courts do not have a primary position in that traditional scheme. The election law states the time at which the court has the right of entertaining an appeal from the National Election Director's final action, although there may be cases in which the court would enter a matter before the election process has been completed. Doone v. National Election Comm'r, 14 FSM R. 489, 493 (Chk. 2006).

Since the Civil Procedure Rules generally apply to civil proceedings in the trial division, not the appellate division, it is not necessary to serve a summons when an election contest is appealed to the appellate division and the respondent was properly served the notice of appeal. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 575, 577 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

An election contestant, when, if he obtained as relief the nullification of all the votes in a VAAPP box, his vote total would then be higher than another's with the result that he would be declared a winning candidate, has stated a claim for which the court can grant relief so his election appeal cannot be dismissed on that ground. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 575, 577 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The court's only authority in election matters is to hear appeals from Chuuk State Election Commission decisions regarding the conduct of elections. Only a house of the Legislature can decide who is to be seated as a member. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Chuuk Election Code, section 55 involves complaints in general by any citizen involving any misconduct and a candidate, when the candidate is contesting the election of another, is required, not to follow section 55, but to follow the administrative process specifically set forth in sections 123 through 130 for election contests. The completion of the administrative process outlined in section 55 is delegated to the Election Commission, not to the complainant since it is the Commission that makes the referrals to the other agencies, not the complainant. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Election Code, sections 126 and 127, involving what must be included in an election complaint and the requirement that it be verified, apply to complaints filed before the Election Commission, not to the papers required to be filed in the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division for it to obtain jurisdiction over the case. When the Election Commission did not render its decision rejecting Samuel's petition on the ground that his complaint was not properly verified or did not satisfy certain formalities. Any technical defects in the original complaint are not before the court. Furthermore, the proceedings are not to be dismissed by the Commission or any court for the want of form if the contest grounds are alleged with enough certainty as will advise the defendant of the particular ground or cause for which the election is contested. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When an election contestant's appeal to the court included what he called a Refutation of Decision of Election Commission in which he contends that the Commission's decision was contrary to law, the contestant has alleged abuse of discretion because one way in which an adjudicatory body may abuse its discretion is when its decision is based on an erroneous conclusion of law. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In an election contest trial in the appellate division, the respondent may, after presentation of the petitioner's case, move for dismissal on the ground that the petitioner has not carried his burden of proof for the relief sought. The court will consider the motion to be analogous to a Civil Procedure Rule 41(b) motion in the trial division and hear argument. Such a motion for dismissal may be made on the ground that upon the facts and the law the petitioner has shown no right to relief, and the appellate court, as the trier of facts, may then determine the facts and render judgment against the petitioner or may decline to render any judgment until the close of all the evidence. When the court renders judgment on the merits against the petitioner by granting a motion to dismiss after the close of the petitioner's case-in-chief, it must make findings of fact and conclusions of law in a manner analogous to Civil Procedure Rule 52(a). Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 594-95 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since, in an election contest appeal, the appellate division is statutorily required to conduct a trial instead of the usual appellate proceeding, the court will follow, where necessary, procedures analogous to those in the Civil Procedure Rules. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 594-95 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

For the twenty-plus voters who cast their votes after 5:00 p.m. to have affected the election's outcome, there would have to have been at least twenty-six voters (because the winning margin was twenty-six votes); they would have to have all been illegal votes; and all of them would have had to have voted for real party in interest and none for the petitioner, which since this is a multiple-member district, it was possible that one or more of these voters voted for both. This makes it unlikely that these twenty-plus voters (possibly not even totaling 26), even if they all cast illegal votes, affected the election's outcome. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

An election cannot be set aside on account of illegal votes, unless by deducting those illegal votes, the result is a tie or a different candidate would be declared the winner. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

An election contestant will prevail only when it is more likely than not that the irregularities complained of could have, not necessarily would have, resulted in a tie or the election of a candidate who would not have won had the irregularities not occurred. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When it was not more likely than not that the allegedly illegal votes cast after the Honolulu polling place had closed, if deducted, could have resulted in a tie or in the petitioner's election and when nothing before the court indicated that any of the other irregularities complained of had any affect on the election's outcome, the election contestant therefore failed to carry his burden of proof to show that upon the facts and the law he had a right to relief, and, on motion, the court may dismiss the case. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a candidate seeks as relief either that the results from certain ballot boxes be nullified, leaving him with a plurality thus making him the "winning candidate" or a revote, it is thus an election contest in which a candidate alleges that fraud or errors affected the election's outcome and challenges the certification of another as the "winning candidate." Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 2007).

The applicable time frame within which an election contest appeal can be made starts with a petition for a recount or a revote filed with the Election Director within one week of certification of the results of the election; the "winning candidate" is then given seven days to respond; and the Director then has fourteen days to decide whether to approve petition. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 2007).

A prematurely-filed election contest appeal must be dismissed because, by statute, an aggrieved candidate in an election contest can only appeal to the FSM Supreme Court after his petition has been denied. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 2007).

The primary forum in which election contests must run their course is the election administrative machinery created by Congress. Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions, and a strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. The statute conferring jurisdiction on the court does not allow appeals to the court until the proceedings before the Director (certification of election, candidate's petition, and Director's decision on the petition) have run their course. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 2007).

If a losing candidate wanted to appeal the National Election Director's April 3, 2007 decision rejecting his petition, he would have had to file a notice of appeal from that decision after it was issued on April 3, 2007. When he did not, and when if he had, then that appeal would have been docketed and filed separately as a different case, the court lacks jurisdiction to consider the appeal from the Director's alleged non-decision, filed before the Director's April 3, 2007 decision, and must dismiss the appeal. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 2007).

The only relief that the Election Code authorizes the FSM Supreme Court to grant is a recount or a revote. It does not authorize the court to restrain the Election Director from acts such as swearing in another candidate or to order a ballot box declared invalid (thus disenfranchising all of the many qualified voters who properly cast their ballots in that box) and thereby declaring another candidate the winner. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

The Election Code does not authorize ex parte court hearings. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

An election contestant cannot show irreparable harm, a necessary prerequisite to the issuance of a temporary restraining order and a major factor to be weighed before granting a preliminary injunction, when he has the election appeal process available to him within which he could properly seek redress, and although it is true that if Congress seats a candidate unconditionally the election contest becomes non-justiciable, not once has the court failed to decide an election contest appeal before the statutorily-mandated May 11 date for the newly-elected Congress to start. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

A candidate's supporters are not properly part of an election contest. Only the election contestant(s), the National Election Director, and the "winning candidate" are proper parties to an election contest appeal. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

Jurisdiction over election contests rests purely on statutory and constitutional provisions. Courts have no inherent power to determine election contests. The determination of such contests being a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since the jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests and since courts of equity are without jurisdiction to enforce purely political rights in election cases, a writ of prohibition is proper to prevent a trial court from exercising equity jurisdiction in an election case. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since relief from judgment, either in an independent action or under a Rule 60(b) motion seeks the exercise of a court's equitable powers, and since courts of equity have no jurisdiction in election contests, any trial division justices are without jurisdiction to hear a case seeking relief from judgment in an election contest case or to issue any substantive orders in that case other than to dismiss it for want of jurisdiction. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38-39 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The court will consider the constitutionality of a municipal ordinance when the one issue that has always been before the court from the case's inception was the right of those municipal officials elected to municipal offices (mayor, assistant mayor, and Tolensom legislators) in 2004 not to be deprived or divested of those offices until their terms are up; when the terms of the legislators elected for two years have already expired but the terms of the four at-large four-year legislators, the mayor, and the assistant mayor have not; and when the new municipal ordinance relates directly to this issue because it purports to create a Tolensom Special Election Tribunal Commission, which can appoint a mayor or assistant mayor when there is an "executive crisis" created because the offices have been "vacant" for more than six months because the right to those offices is disputed between the candidates who ran for those offices. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 203 (Chk. 2007).

In any action where a party seeks relief that would result in that party being declared the winner of an election rather than some other person, that other person is an indispensable party whose absence would make any judgment void and subject to collateral attack. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 224 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The Chuuk Election Law of 1996 applies to Murilo municipal elections. Sections 123-130 of that law provide for the means to contest an election in Chuuk, which is to be before, and decided by, the Chuuk Election Commission. And it is well settled that election contest appeals from the Chuuk Election Commission go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

From the Election Commission's denial in an election contest, the only proper avenue in which an aggrieved candidate can seek further review is by appeal to the appellate division. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Once an aggrieved candidate's request to the Chuuk Election Commission is denied, his only recourse is to appeal to the appellate division because the trial division lacks jurisdiction over the election contest. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

All the provisions of the Chuuk State Election Law of 1996 apply to all elections in the State of Chuuk, including municipal elections whenever applicable unless otherwise specifically provided. The Chuuk State Election Law requires that all election complaints be filed with the Chuuk Election Commissioner and that all appeals from the Election Commissioner's decision go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 254 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

In an election dispute, the person whose right to the office is contested is the real party in interest. When a plaintiff is contesting the right of a candidate to participate in an election but fails to name the candidate as a party in the complaint, the court will deny injunctive relief because the real parties in interest are not parties to the action, since without naming the candidates as parties to this action, and giving them the benefit of due process of law, the court is unwilling and unable to adjudicate their rights in the proceeding. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 255 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Chuuk courts do not have jurisdiction over disputes regarding an election until after the election and the matter has first been appealed from a decision of the Chuuk State Election Commission, and the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division does not have any jurisdiction over election disputes even after an appeal from the Chuuk State Election Commission. That the case involves a municipal election in a municipality without a provision for contesting or challenging an election does not change the analysis. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 256 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

In conducting a trial de novo in an election contest appeal, the court is not bound to show any deference to the findings of the Chuuk State Election Commission and will consider all admissible documentary and testimonial evidence in support of the petition. Miochy v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 15 FSM R. 369, 371 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a petitioner has presented sufficient evidence to support a prima facie case for relief, a respondent's motion for dismissal at the close of the petitioner's case-in-chief will be denied. Miochy v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 15 FSM R. 369, 372 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

After the parties rest, the court makes findings of fact based on the total record in the case. The petitioner (election contestant) has the burden of proof to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence. The petitioner satisfies his burden of proof if his evidence is more convincing to the court than that of the respondents. Therefore, the petitioner must establish facts in support of his claim by evidence at least sufficient to overbalance any weight of evidence produced by the other parties. Miochy v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 15 FSM R. 369, 372 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a motion to dismiss for lack of the court's subject matter jurisdiction is filed in lieu of an answer to an election contest complaint, the court is required to address the preliminary issues raised regarding the appellate division's subject matter jurisdiction before proceeding to the merits of the issue. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The determination of an election contest is a judicial function only so far as authorized by the statute. Even if the court is granted jurisdiction, it does not then proceed according to the course of the common law, but must rely solely on its statutorily granted authority to ascertain its powers and mode of procedure. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The Chuuk State Election Law of 1996, chapter 8 sets forth the procedures for contesting the results of an election. A "contestant" is someone contesting an election. A "defendant" in an election contest is one whose election or qualifications are contested. A contestant must verify a statement of contest and file it within five days after the declaration of the result of the election by the body canvassing the returns thereof, and the election commission must rule on the complaint within three days after the end of time for filing statements of contest. The Election Law imposes no deadline for appealing a ruling of the election commission to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 205-06 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Unless municipal law or constitution provides otherwise, all appeals from the Election Commissioner's decision on an election contest go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Although there may be no actual decision that was appealed from, an Election Commissioner's failure to act on an election contest constitutes an effective, appealable denial. In order to obtain appellate division jurisdiction over an election contest, however, the timing requirements for filing must be strictly complied with. The reason is that statutory deadlines are jurisdictional, and therefore, if a statutory deadline has not been strictly complied with, the adjudicator is without jurisdiction over the matter. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The election contest provisions do not allow for the filing of an election contest complaint before an election. Although a petitioner may file a petition after an election is declared but before it is certified, there is no authority for allowing an election contest to be filed outside the framework of section 127 of the Election Law, which specifically states that a contest must be filed within five days after the declaration of the election – the petition must be filed after declaration of the election, but no later than five days from the date of the declaration. The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has no jurisdiction when over an election contest when it was not filed with the Election Commission within the deadline imposed. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Although it may be preferable to have the issue of a candidate's qualification addressed before the election, there is nothing to prevent a petitioner from re-filing his qualification challenge after the declaration of the results, according to the provisions for an election contest. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Although there may be some cases where issues regarding the conduct of elections may be raised prior to an election, it seems axiomatic that an election contest only arises once the results of the election are known. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

By filing a complaint under section 55, any person may raise with the state election commission a controversy over a violation of any of the Election Law provisions. If a candidate is found guilty of violating any election law provision, the candidate may be disqualified from office and an Independent Prosecutor or Attorney General, or both, will take whatever necessary legal action to make the disqualification from office legally effective. While there are specific timing provisions that control the filing of an election contest, there is no provision that sets a deadline for filing section 55 controversies. A disqualification resulting from a successful section 55 action may, therefore, occur either before or after a candidate takes office. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 207 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

While the Election Law explicitly grants jurisdiction to the appellate court over appeals of election contests, it is silent on the question of appellate jurisdiction over appeals from decisions made under section 55 and no other provision in the Election Law, other than those granting jurisdiction over election contests in the appellate division, expressly provides for jurisdiction in the Supreme Court appellate division.

Although there is no specific reference to the jurisdiction of the trial division in the Election Law itself, it must be inferred that the trial division, and not the appellate division, has jurisdiction over criminal prosecutions sought pursuant to section 55 as well as the power to hear contempt proceedings that are certified from the Election Commission pursuant to section 8. Since the provisions in the Chuuk Constitution and Judiciary Act for trial court review over agency actions otherwise provide authority for the trial court's jurisdiction over appeals from an election commission, the appellate court does not have jurisdiction over an appeal from the Election Commission's denial of a petitioner's pre-election complaint regarding the qualifications of candidates for Polle municipal mayoral office. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 207 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The state appellate panel must decide on a contested election before the date upon which the declared winning candidates are to take office in the Senate or House of Representatives since the decision of the specific house concerned will prevail and is final. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 208 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Except for members-elect of the Senate or House of Representatives, the court is not prevented from ruling on cases involving elected officials even after they have taken office. A candidate will continue to have a legally cognizable interest in whether one or more candidates is disqualified because, if one or more candidates is disqualified, then one of the others may stand to be the winning candidate. If the candidates' qualifications are affirmed by the court, the ruling still serves a valuable function by settling a concrete dispute over the qualifications of an elected official. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 208 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The procedures for filing a challenge of a candidate's or elected official's qualifications may be presented at any time. A properly filed petition is not rendered moot by the results of an election or the swearing in of a mayoral candidate. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 208 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A case is an election contest when the relief sought may affect or change who the winning candidate is in an election district and the plaintiff-candidate is thus an election contestant. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 358 (Chk. 2009).

An election contestant cannot show irreparable harm, a necessary prerequisite to the issuance of a temporary restraining order and a major factor to be weighed before granting a preliminary injunction, when he has the election appeal process available to him through which he could properly seek redress. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 358 (Chk. 2009).

When the relief sought is obtainable from the National Election Director before certification since a recount or a revote is a remedy within the National Election Director's power to order during the election contest appeal process, the plaintiff cannot show irreparable harm and his motion for a temporary restraining order may be denied on that ground alone. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 358-59 (Chk. 2009).

An election contest appeal must await the National Election Director's certification of the election results and the Director's subsequent denial of the candidate's timely post-certification petition. If the Director's decision on an aggrieved candidate's petition does not adequately address the candidate's concerns, the aggrieved candidate would then have five days from the receipt of the Director's decision to appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 359 (Chk. 2009).

When Congress drafted the election statute, it limited court involvement in election contests until after the issues have been narrowed to the certified result and to whether the Director should have granted a candidate's petition contesting the certified result and, if so, what relief was then appropriate. The statute also designates the FSM Supreme Court appellate division as the forum for election contest appeals. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 359 (Chk. 2009).

Any candidate who would be adversely affected by the relief an aggrieved candidate seeks would be an indispensable party to the action and must be joined before a court could grant any relief or a dismissal will ensue. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 359 (Chk. 2009).

Election Code sections 131 and 132 specifically provide that the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division is to hold a trial de novo on an appeal from the election commission, which necessarily means that the appellate division will make its own determinations of fact. The court is therefore not limited to review of the election commission's findings for an abuse of discretion, but is authorized by law to make findings of fact. Aniol v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 387, 389 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When the election statute appears to contemplate that the election commission will be open for filing election complaints during the five days following the election results' certification regardless of whether one of those day falls on a weekend or holiday; when the election commission had no written policies or regulations or other notice issued to the public that would reasonably inform a complainant that the election commission would be open at reasonable, specified times for filing election contests each of the five days following the results' certification; when the election contestant was not reasonably informed that he could file his verified complaint on Saturday, March 14, rather than filing it on the following Monday, as he had done; when the contestant had sought to file his verified complaint on Saturday, but the election commission office was not open for filing; and when, even if there had been written policies or regulations or other reasonable public notice, the commission was not, in fact, open for filing when petitioner sought to file his complaint within the five-day deadline, the court will conclude that the verified election complaint's Monday filing was timely under the circumstances and remand the matter back to the election commission for an expedited ruling. Aten v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 390, 391-92 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A case is an election contest when the relief sought may affect, change, or prevent the change of who the winning candidates are. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 392, 394 (Chk. 2009).

An election contestant cannot show irreparable harm, a necessary prerequisite to the issuance of a temporary restraining order and a major factor to be weighed before granting a preliminary injunction, when he has the election appeal process available to him through which he could properly seek redress. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 392, 394 (Chk. 2009).

Jurisdiction over election contests rests purely on statutory and constitutional provisions, and courts have no inherent power to determine election contests. The determination of such contests are a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 392, 394 (Chk. 2009).

When a candidate seeks relief that would result either in him being confirmed the winning candidate or preventing another candidate from such a confirmation or relief could affect an election's outcome, it is an election contest. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division lacks jurisdiction over an election contest in a Chuuk state election since jurisdiction over election contests rests purely on statutory and constitutional provisions, and courts otherwise have no inherent power to determine election contests, and since the determination of such contests is a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

The court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over a case when, if applied, the general principle that courts should first consider any non-constitutional grounds that might resolve the issue because unnecessary constitutional adjudication ought to be avoided, would unmask the case as an election contest and the matter would accordingly be dismissed. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

An election contest is a proceeding to challenge the results of an election. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 410 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The pleading requirements for filing an election contest are liberal. An election contestant must file a verified, written complaint with the election commission setting forth the contestant's name and that he is a voter in the state, municipality or precinct where the contested election was held; the defendant's name; the office; and the particular grounds of contest, and the complaint must not be rejected, nor the proceeding dismissed by the commission or any court, for want of form, if the grounds of the contest are alleged with such certainty as will advise the defendant of the particular ground or cause for which the election is contested. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 410 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When the petitioners' complaint to the election commission shows numerous, specific allegations of misconduct resulting in election irregularities and when, based on these allegations, the petitioners challenge the election results and request relief that could change the election's outcome, the allegations are set forth with sufficient certainty to advise the defendants of the grounds for the contest, and since the petitioners' complaint challenges the election results with sufficient certainty, it should be treated as an election contest and not an action against the commissioners in their individual capacities. If there is a basis for criminal or civil liability against election commission officials in their individual capacities, the allegations may be pursued in a separate action within the discretion of the Attorney General or an independent prosecutor. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 410 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A complainant before the election commission may name as a defendant a person whose election or qualifications are contested or persons receiving an equal or larger number of votes, other than the contestant, and the election commission or an individual member may also be a defendant. If the election commission believes that the commission is an indispensable party to the action, it can easily order that it be named a party to the action. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 410-11 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The decision as to the court's jurisdiction over an action is one to be made by the court, and the election commission is not empowered to assume or confer whether a court has jurisdiction. The election commission is limited to determining its own jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 411 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

An election contestant must file a verified complaint with the election commission within five days after the declaration of the election result by the body canvassing the returns. The deadline for filing a complaint with the election commission is jurisdictional. If the complainant fails to meet the deadline, then the election commission has no jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 411 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A timely-filed election complaint confers jurisdiction in the election commission. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 411 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A court will refrain from addressing whether it has jurisdiction over an election contest when the matter is merely hypothetical and not a justiciable controversy, but if the issue comes properly before the court and if it appears that the court lacks jurisdiction over the complaint's subject matter, the court would dismiss the action. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 411 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

An appeal is an election contest when a candidate seeks relief that would result either in him being confirmed the "winning candidate" or preventing another candidate from such a confirmation or the relief could affect an election's outcome. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 419 (App. 2009).

Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the election machinery, the procedure by which election results may be contested, and such contests are regulated wholly by these constitutional or statutory provisions. A strict observance of the steps necessary to give us jurisdiction over an election contest is required, and if these steps are not followed, the court is powerless to entertain such proceedings. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 419 (App. 2009).

An aggrieved candidate may, within five days after receipt of the National Election Director's decision granting or denying a petition for a recount or a revote, appeal that decision to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. A post-certification petition, and a decision thereon, is a prerequisite to an appeal to the court. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 419 (App. 2009).

If the possibility of double voting is alleged, the burden is on the election appellant to show that it is likely to have occurred; he cannot rely solely on an assertion that double voting is possible. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 420 n.4 (App. 2009).

A petition presented to the National Election Director must contain a) a statement of the nature, location and extent of the election fraud or error that forms the basis of the petition; b) a statement of the form of relief the petitioner seeks; c) a list of election records and witnesses that will establish the existence of election error or fraud, specifying how each record or official listed is relevant to the petition's allegations; and d) affidavits, documents and any other evidence in support of the petition. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 420 (App. 2009).

When an election contestant's shifting allegations of irregularities (the allegations shifted from misreporting or tampering with the reported results to double-voting) and his later exhibits could have been an appropriate basis for a post-certification petition to the National Election Director, but instead of filing the required post-certification petition, the contestant filed a court appeal, the court cannot conduct a meaningful appellate review in such a manner and therefore cannot consider them because these issues and exhibits would, if allowed, come before the court without the benefit of the National Election Director's reasoned review and decision. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 420-21 (App. 2009).

If an election contestant's appeal is considered as only a claim challenging the acceptability of votes, the five-day time frame to appeal the National Election Commissioner's denial of that claim would start then even though a recount was pending because an FSM Supreme Court appellate division decision may have the effect of disallowing challenged votes but shall not halt or delay balloting or counting and tabulating. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 (App. 2009).

A candidate's only appeal from the certification of an election or the declaration of the winning candidate is to file a petition with the National Election Director within seven days of the certification, and, if the candidate is still aggrieved after the National Election Director's decision on the post-certification petition, then he or she may appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. The Election Code does not authorize an appeal of a certification of election directly to the FSM Supreme Court. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421-22 (App. 2009).

An election appeal filed too soon will be dismissed as premature (unripe) because the statute does not grant the court jurisdiction over election cases until the administrative steps and time frames have been adhered to. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 422 (App. 2009).

Although there are rare occasions when an equitable remedy may be proper in an election case, overlooking or extending a deadline to file an appeal is not one of them. Statutory deadlines to file appeals are jurisdictional, and if the deadline has not been strictly complied with the adjudicator is without jurisdiction over the matter once the deadline has passed. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 422 (App. 2009).

The timing provisions for the election commission to rule on an election contest provide that once the state election commission begins a special session, it has two days to reach a determination of the contest. The court reads the two-day deadline as directory, not mandatory. Because the deadline is directory, an election contest is not effectively denied if the election commission fails to reach a determination within two days, so long as the commission is taking reasonable steps to determine the contest as quickly as possible. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 459, 462 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A court cannot conclude that there was an effective denial of an election petition until there is a determination as to what, if any, substantive action to determine the contest was taken by the election commission. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 459, 463 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

If an election complaint was not timely filed with the election commission, then neither the election commission nor the court have jurisdiction over the election contest. Because statutory filing deadlines are generally mandatory, whether the complaint was timely filed is a jurisdictional question and therefore potentially dispositive of a contest. That determination is initially the election commission's to make, as it involves factual questions going to its own jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 459, 463 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Until the election commission determines the election contest, or there is otherwise an appeal from a final order or a determinate effective denial, administrative remedies have not been exhausted and such an election contest will, therefore, be remanded to the election commission for further proceedings. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 459, 463 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Since, in an election contest appeal, the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division is statutorily required to conduct a trial instead of the usual appellate proceeding and since the Election Law itself does not prescribe rules of procedure, the court has, when necessary, followed procedures analogous to those in the Civil Procedure Rules. Bisaram v. Oneisom Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 475, 477 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

In ruling on a motion to dismiss for failure to prosecute an election contest, the court also takes into consideration the vigilance required of an election contestant to prosecute his claim to a speedy resolution. Due to the time sensitivity of election contests, continuances should rarely if ever be granted since the public interest and the litigants' private rights demand that proceedings be resolved as soon as consistent with justice and orderly process. Bisaram v. Oneisom Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 475, 478 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The burden is on the election contestant to be vigilant and to prosecute his claim diligently to a speedy resolution. When a contestant has not done this; when the contestant's explanation for not complying with the court's order for a pre-trial record was not consistent with a good faith effort to prosecute his appeal; when the contestant otherwise took no action to expedite his appeal's resolution; and when an election contestant, without reasonable justification, failed to comply with a court order requiring a filing by a set deadline or his claim would be deemed abandoned; and when he has not taken steps to diligently pursue the speedy resolution of the election contest, the court is justified in concluding that the prosecution of the claim has been abandoned and will grant a motion to dismiss for failure to prosecute. Bisaram v. Oneisom Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 475, 478 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

An election contest petitioners' failure to name all real parties in interest in their pleadings can subject the court's rulings to being later challenged by the real parties in interest as a violation of their due process rights to defend their interest in the action. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 516 n.1, 517 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Absent a showing that the election commission had failed to take meaningful action on their complaint since the court's remand, the court could not take jurisdiction over the remanded election contest since, if the court had taken jurisdiction over the merits of the case before administrative remedies had been exhausted, it would have circumvented the power vested in the election commission to have primary jurisdiction over election contests and the court's rulings would have been subjected to appeal for lack of jurisdiction when administrative remedies had not yet been exhausted. Doone v. Chuuk State Election

Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 517 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Matters of statutory interpretation are issues of law that the court reviews de novo. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 518 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

In an election contest appeal in the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division, the court will hold a trial on an issue of fact. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 518 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

In an election contest trial in the appellate division, a respondent may, after presentation of the petitioner's case, move for dismissal on the ground that the petitioner has not carried his burden of proof for the relief sought. The court will consider this as a motion analogous to a Civil Procedure Rule 41(b) motion in the trial division. The motion may therefore be made on the ground that upon the facts and the law the petitioner has shown no right to relief, and the appellate court, as the trier of facts, may then make findings of fact and conclusions of law and render judgment against the petitioner. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 518 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Whether an election complaint is timely filed is a matter of great importance in election contests, as an untimely complaint will prevent an adjudicator from ruling on the contest for lack of jurisdiction since an adjudicator's jurisdiction over election contests is limited to the constitutional or statutory provision expressly or impliedly giving it that authority. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 518 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Under the Chuuk Election Law, initially, an election contestant must file a verified complaint with the election commission within five days after the declaration of the election result by the body canvassing the returns. This deadline for filing a complaint with the election commission is mandatory, and, if the complainant fails to strictly comply with the deadline for filing a verified complaint, the complaint will be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 518 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

An election contestant must file a verified complaint. An oral complaint does not satisfy the requirements of a verified complaint, which is a written complaint sworn to under oath. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The public announcement of the results, not the date of certification, is the date for determining an election contest filing deadline under the Chuuk Election Law. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

In an election contest, the court makes findings of fact based on the total record in the case. The petitioner has the burden of proof to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence. The petitioner satisfies his burden of proof if his evidence is more convincing to the court than that of the respondents. Thus, the petitioners must establish facts in support of their claim by evidence at least sufficient to overbalance any weight of evidence produced by the other parties. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When there was no evidence to contradict the election commission's finding of the dates that the election results were announced, the petitioners cannot prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the declaration of the election was after April 11, 2009, which, if it had been, would have made their petition timely and the panel would have remanded the contest to the election commission for a third time. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Neither the election commission nor the court can take jurisdiction over an election contest when it is not timely filed. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Before the appellate division proceeds to the merits of any action filed as an election contest, the court should determine if it has subject matter jurisdiction because the appellate division has jurisdiction over election contests only to the extent that a constitutional or statutory provision expressly or impliedly gives it that authority. Rayphand v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 540, 542 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The appellate court's authority to hear an election contest arises when there is an appeal from the election commission's ruling on a complaint filed pursuant to section 127, which requires a contestant to file a verified statement of contest with the election commission within five days after the declaration of the election result by the body canvassing the returns thereof. For the appellate division to take subject matter jurisdiction in an election contest, the appellants must have appealed from the election commission's ruling on a complaint that was filed within five days of the declaration of an election's results. But a complaint raising issues regarding an election, but before an election result has been declared, is not an election contest. Rather, jurisdiction over appeals of agency decisions, including those of the state election commission, is vested in trial division. Rayphand v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 540, 542 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Chuuk Election Code, section 138 clearly contemplates that the FSM Supreme Court appellate division may exercise jurisdiction over a Chuuk state election contest even after the candidates that have been declared the winners have been sworn in. Chuuk State Election Comm'n v. Chuuk State Supreme Court App. Div., 16 FSM R. 614, 615 (App. 2009).

A court cannot, for lack of jurisdiction, weigh the likelihood of plaintiff's success on the merits when, pursuant to state law, the merits of his appeal are not before the court because they were duly presented in their proper forum of the appellate division. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

In the case of a contested election of a member-elect of the Chuuk Senate or House of Representatives, the decision of the specific house concerned prevails. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 492, 494 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2011).

When, at the close of the petitioner's case-in-chief, the respondents move to dismiss the petitioner's case because he had not shown a right to relief, the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division will consider the motion to be analogous to a trial division Civil Procedure Rule 41(b) motion to dismiss although the civil procedure rules apply to the trial division and not the appellate division. Such a motion to dismiss may be made on the ground that on the facts and the law the petitioner has shown no right to relief, and the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division, as the trier of fact, may then determine the facts and render judgment against the petitioner or may decline to render any judgment until the close of all the evidence. Hallers v. Yer, 18 FSM R. 644, 647 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2013).

When determining whether a petitioner has shown a right to relief in an election contest appeal, the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division is not required to view the facts in the light most favorable to the petitioner but may draw permissible inferences, and if it determines that the petitioner has not made out a prima facie case, the real party in interest is entitled to have the case dismissed. Even if a petitioner makes out a prima facie case, the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division, as the trier of fact, may, in assessing the evidence on a Rule 41(b) or analogous motion, weigh the evidence, resolve any conflicts in it, and decide for itself where the preponderance of the evidence lies, and when weighing the evidence, the court may view the evidence with an unbiased eye without any attendant favorable inferences, and may sift and balance the evidence and give the evidence such weight as it deems fit, and when it renders judgment on the merits against the petitioner by granting a motion to dismiss after the close of the petitioner's case-in-chief, it must make findings of fact and conclusions of law in a manner analogous to Civil Procedure Rule 52(a). Hallers v. Yer, 18 FSM R. 644, 647 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2013).

When there was an eighty-five vote difference between the petitioner and the real party in interest; when, weighing the evidence with an unbiased eye, the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division determined that the petitioner did not show that the possible tabulation inaccuracies, even in the unlikely event that they were all in the real part in interest's favor, were enough that there was a substantial chance that the election's outcome was affected; and when, even if the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division were to view the facts in the light most favorable to the petitioner and gave the petitioner the benefit of all reasonable inferences, it still would not have been more likely than not that if a more accurate vote count were obtained through a recount the vote totals would have changed enough so that there was a substantial chance that the election's outcome would be affected; the petitioner failed to carry his burden of proof to show that upon the facts and the law he had a right to relief and the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division therefore may, on motion made after the presentation of the petitioner's case-in-chief, dismiss the case. Hallers v. Yer, 18 FSM R. 644, 648 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2013).

Without the Chuuk State Election Commission case record, including but not limited to the complaint and the Commission's decision, the court cannot determine whether certain requirements before retaining jurisdiction were met: 1) whether the Chuuk State Election Commission case was filed within the prescribed time and 2) whether the Chuuk State Election Commission case was filed as a verified complaint. Iron v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 20 FSM R. 39, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

Whether an election complaint is timely filed is a matter of great importance in election, as an untimely complaint will prevent an adjudicator from ruling on the contest for lack of jurisdiction. An adjudicator's jurisdiction over election contest is limited to the constitutional or statutory provision expressly or impliedly giving it that authority. A strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of a proceeding. Iron v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 20 FSM R. 39, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

When the appellant cannot verify to the court that the election contest requirements were met, the court lacks the jurisdiction. Iron v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 20 FSM R. 39, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

– Court Jurisdiction

A writ of prohibition is proper to prevent a trial court from exercising equity jurisdiction in an election case. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Courts of equity are without jurisdiction to enforce purely political rights. Matters concerning the conduct of elections are usually left to the political branches and the courts generally have no jurisdiction until after the elections are held. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Generally speaking, elections are conducted and carried out and administered by the executive and legislative branches. Courts do not have a primary position in that traditional scheme. The election law states the time at which the court has the right of entertaining an appeal from the final action of the National Election Director. Wiliander v. Siales, 7 FSM R. 77, 79 (Chk. 1995).

When the state election law requiring election appeals to go directly to the state court appellate division has a provision applying the law to municipal elections if the municipal constitution or law so provides and there is no such municipal provision, then jurisdiction over the election appeal does not lie in the state court appellate division in the first instance. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the state judiciary act gives the state court trial division authority to review all actions of an agency of the government, the trial division has jurisdiction over an appeal of the state election commissioner's denial of a petition to set aside a municipal election. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division had jurisdiction to hear an election appeal from an election conducted, pursuant to the governor's emergency declaration, under a state law providing for such jurisdiction. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 275, 280 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A decision of the Chuuk Election Commission may be appealed to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300f, 300h (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests, unless it is so provided expressly or impliedly by the constitution or by statute. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300g (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

It is a general rule that courts of equity have no inherent power to try contested elections, notwithstanding fraud on the part of the election officers. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300g (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

Constitutions and statutes of most jurisdictions provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions. A strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300g (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

Election contests are purely statutory, and the courts have no inherent power to determine election contests, the determination of such contests being a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300h (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

If the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has original jurisdiction to decide an election contest, there must be a specific constitutional or statutory provision giving the appellate division that authority. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300h (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has no original jurisdiction to entertain an appeal directly from a municipal election commissioner. David v. Uman Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 300d, 300i (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests, unless it is so provided expressly or impliedly by the constitution or by statute. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

It is a general rule that courts of equity have no inherent power to try contested elections, notwithstanding fraud on the part of the election officers. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The constitutions and statutes of most jurisdictions provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions. They are not actions at law or suits in equity, and were unknown to the common law. The proceedings are special and summary in their nature. A strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 563 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The determination of an election contest is a judicial function only so far as authorized by the statute. The court exercising the jurisdiction does not proceed according to the course of the common law, but must resort to the statute alone to ascertain its powers and mode of procedure. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 563 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division could have had jurisdiction over election commission appeals had the legislature seen fit to grant it such authority, but the Election Law of 1996, provides that Chuuk Election Commission decisions may be appealed to the appellate division. Therefore an election contest appeal in the trial division will be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Mathew v. Silander, 8 FSM R. 560, 564 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When a voter contests any election he must file a written complaint with the Chuuk Election Commission. If the contestant is dissatisfied with the Commission's decision, appeal to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division can be had, and if the contestant is dissatisfied with the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division's decision, appeal to the FSM Supreme Court can be had. The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division is without jurisdiction to hear an election contest. Phillip v. Phillip, 9 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The issue of whether a person is entitled to have his name placed on the ballot is an election case, over which neither division of the Chuuk State Supreme Court has original jurisdiction, and which is placed solely in the hands of the Chuuk State Election Commission with the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division having jurisdiction only as provided in the Election Law of 1996. Hethon v. Os, 9 FSM R. 534, 535 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Legislature has, under its power to prescribe by statute for the regulation of the certification of elections and under its power to provide by law for review of administrative agency decisions, the power to place the jurisdiction to review Election Commission decisions in the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division rather than in the trial division. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 155 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The primary forum in which election contests must run their course is the election administrative machinery created by Congress. Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions. A strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203 (App. 2005).

An election contest appellant has not strictly observed the steps necessary to give the court jurisdiction when he has not filed his appeal within the time frame permitted by statute. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203 (App. 2005).

The court lacks jurisdiction to hear an election appeal filed too soon because the statute does not grant the court jurisdiction over election cases until the administrative steps and time frames in 9 F.S.M.C. 902 have been adhered to. Such an appeal is therefore dismissed as premature (unripe). Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

The five-day time limit to appeal an election to the FSM Supreme Court does not start when the Director certifies the election, but rather when the aggrieved candidate receives the Director's decision on the candidate's petition or until the time has run out for the Director to issue a decision on the candidate's petition. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the election machinery, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by constitutional or statutory provisions. The necessary steps must be strictly observed to give the court jurisdiction, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are usually powerless to entertain such proceedings. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 209, 213 (Chk. 2005).

The election law states the time at which the court has the right to entertain an appeal is from the National Election Director's final action. No statutory or constitutional provision grants the court the power to interfere with the election machinery and issue injunctive relief at a point in the electoral process prior to the election officials' completion of their responsibilities. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 209, 213 (Chk. 2005).

The applicable time frame within which an election contest appeal can be made starts with a petition to the National Election Director filed within one week of certification of the results of the election. The winning candidate then has one week to respond to the petition. The Director then has ten days to decide whether to approve the petition. If the petition is denied, then the aggrieved candidate would have five days to appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. It is at that point that the court would have jurisdiction to consider this election contest. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

By statute, an aggrieved candidate in an election contest can appeal to the FSM Supreme Court only after the election agency has denied his petition. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the election machinery, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by constitutional or statutory provisions. The necessary steps must be strictly observed to give the court jurisdiction, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are usually powerless to entertain such proceedings. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

An election contest appeal must await the National Election Director's certification of the election results and the Director's denial of a timely post-certification petition by the candidate. If the Director's decision on the petition does not adequately address his concerns, only then would the aggrieved candidate have five days from the receipt of the Director's decision to appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division if the Director's decision on the petition does not adequately address his concerns. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 (App. 2005).

If the National Election Director does not issue his decision on a candidate's post-certification petition within the statutory time frame, the candidate may appeal without waiting further for the decision. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 219 n.3 (App. 2005).

Congress, when it drafted the election statute, limited the court's involvement in election contests to until after the issues were narrowed to the certified result and whether a candidate's petition contesting the certified result should have been granted by the Director and, if so, what relief was then appropriate. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 220 (App. 2005).

An election contest appeal must be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction when it is filed too soon, at a time before the election statute confers jurisdiction on the court. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 215, 220 (App. 2005).

It is doubtful whether a court judgment in an election contest case can be collaterally attacked since election contests are purely statutory, and the courts have no inherent power to determine election contests. The determination of election contests is a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Thus, the jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests. An election contest must follow the path set out for it in the statute and no other. Puchonong v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 67, 69 (Chk. 2006).

Whether the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division lacked jurisdiction to consider the municipal election contest claims that the defendants brought there is irrelevant to a motion to dismiss a case in the FSM Supreme Court that relies on that state court decision because if that court lacked jurisdiction, it is now too late for the defendants to contest the municipal election in any other forum and the municipal election commission's decision will stand as a basis upon which the plaintiffs' complaint can state a claim for which relief may be granted and if that court had jurisdiction, then that court's final (and unappealed) judgment will stand as the basis on which the plaintiffs' complaint can state a claim for which relief can be granted. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 219 (Chk. 2006).

The relevant Chuuk constitutional provisions do not bar the Legislature from providing by statute for an appeal directly from the Chuuk State Election Commission to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. The Constitution does provide for appeals from administrative agencies to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division, but the Constitution does not make the trial division's jurisdiction exclusive, and the trial division's jurisdiction is further qualified with the proviso "as may be provided by law." Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The Legislature, under its power to prescribe by statute for the regulation of the certification of elections and under its power to provide by law for review of administrative agency decisions, has the power to place the jurisdiction to review Election Commission decisions in the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division rather than in the trial division with an appeal to the appellate division and a further possible appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The court's only authority in election matters is to hear appeals from Chuuk State Election Commission decisions regarding the conduct of elections. Only a house of the Legislature can decide who is to be seated as a member. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In an election contest trial in the appellate division, the respondent may, after presentation of the petitioner's case, move for dismissal on the ground that the petitioner has not carried his burden of proof for the relief sought. The court will consider the motion to be analogous to a Civil Procedure Rule 41(b) motion in the trial division and hear argument. Such a motion for dismissal may be made on the ground that upon the facts and the law the petitioner has shown no right to relief, and the appellate court, as the trier of facts, may then determine the facts and render judgment against the petitioner or may decline to render any judgment until the close of all the evidence. When the court renders judgment on the merits against the petitioner by granting a motion to dismiss after the close of the petitioner's case-in-chief, it must make findings of fact and conclusions of law in a manner analogous to Civil Procedure Rule 52(a). Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 594-95 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since, in an election contest appeal, the appellate division is statutorily required to conduct a trial instead of the usual appellate proceeding, the court will follow, where necessary, procedures analogous to those in the Civil Procedure Rules. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 594-95 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A prematurely-filed election contest appeal must be dismissed because, by statute, an aggrieved candidate in an election contest can only appeal to the FSM Supreme Court after his petition has been denied. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 2007).

The primary forum in which election contests must run their course is the election administrative machinery created by Congress. Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the machinery of elections, a procedure by which election results may be contested. Such contests are regulated wholly by the constitutional or statutory provisions, and a strict observance to the steps necessary to give jurisdiction is required, and the jurisdictional facts must appear on the face of the proceedings. If these steps are not followed, courts are powerless to entertain such proceedings. The statute conferring jurisdiction on the court does not allow appeals to the court until the proceedings before the Director (certification of election, candidate's petition, and Director's decision on the petition) have run their course. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 2007).

If a losing candidate wanted to appeal the National Election Director's April 3, 2007 decision rejecting his petition, he would have had to file a notice of appeal from that decision after it was issued on April 3, 2007. When he did not, and when if he had, then that appeal would have been docketed and filed separately as a different case, the court lacks jurisdiction to consider the appeal from the Director's alleged non-decision, filed before the Director's April 3, 2007 decision, and must dismiss the appeal. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 2007).

The only relief that the Election Code authorizes the FSM Supreme Court to grant is a recount or a revote. It does not authorize the court to restrain the Election Director from acts such as swearing in another candidate or to order a ballot box declared invalid (thus disenfranchising all of the many qualified voters who properly cast their ballots in that box) and thereby declaring another candidate the winner. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

The Election Code does not authorize ex parte court hearings. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

An election contestant cannot show irreparable harm, a necessary prerequisite to the issuance of a temporary restraining order and a major factor to be weighed before granting a preliminary injunction, when he has the election appeal process available to him within which he could properly seek redress, and although it is true that if Congress seats a candidate unconditionally the election contest becomes non-justiciable, not once has the court failed to decide an election contest appeal before the statutorily-mandated May 11 date for the newly-elected Congress to start. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

A candidate's supporters are not properly part of an election contest. Only the election contestant(s), the National Election Director, and the "winning candidate" are proper parties to an election contest appeal. Sipenuk v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 15 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 2007).

Jurisdiction over election contests rests purely on statutory and constitutional provisions. Courts have no inherent power to determine election contests. The determination of such contests being a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since the jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests and since courts of equity are without jurisdiction to enforce purely political rights in election cases, a writ of prohibition is proper to prevent a trial court from exercising equity jurisdiction in an election case. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since relief from judgment, either in an independent action or under a Rule 60(b) motion seeks the exercise of a court's equitable powers, and since courts of equity have no jurisdiction in election contests, any trial division justices are without jurisdiction to hear a case seeking relief from judgment in an election contest case or to issue any substantive orders in that case other than to dismiss it for want of jurisdiction. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38-39 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

From the Election Commission's denial in an election contest, the only proper avenue in which an aggrieved candidate can seek further review is by appeal to the appellate division. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Once an aggrieved candidate's request to the Chuuk Election Commission is denied, his only recourse is to appeal to the appellate division because the trial division lacks jurisdiction over the election contest. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

All the provisions of the Chuuk State Election Law of 1996 apply to all elections in the State of Chuuk, including municipal elections whenever applicable unless otherwise specifically provided. The Chuuk State Election Law requires that all election complaints be filed with the Chuuk Election Commissioner and that all appeals from the Election Commissioner's decision go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 254 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Chuuk courts do not have jurisdiction over disputes regarding an election until after the election and the matter has first been appealed from a decision of the Chuuk State Election Commission, and the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division does not have any jurisdiction over election disputes even after an appeal from the Chuuk State Election Commission. That the case involves a municipal election in a municipality without a provision for contesting or challenging an election does not change the analysis. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 256 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

In conducting a trial de novo in an election contest appeal, the court is not bound to show any deference to the findings of the Chuuk State Election Commission and will consider all admissible documentary and testimonial evidence in support of the petition. Miochy v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 15 FSM R. 369, 371 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a motion to dismiss for lack of the court's subject matter jurisdiction is filed in lieu of an answer to an election contest complaint, the court is required to address the preliminary issues raised regarding the appellate division's subject matter jurisdiction before proceeding to the merits of the issue. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The determination of an election contest is a judicial function only so far as authorized by the statute. Even if the court is granted jurisdiction, it does not then proceed according to the course of the common law, but must rely solely on its statutorily granted authority to ascertain its powers and mode of procedure. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Unless municipal law or constitution provides otherwise, all appeals from the Election Commissioner's decision on an election contest go directly to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Although there may be no actual decision that was appealed from, an Election Commissioner's failure to act on an election contest constitutes an effective, appealable denial. In order to obtain appellate division jurisdiction over an election contest, however, the timing requirements for filing must be strictly complied with. The reason is that statutory deadlines are jurisdictional, and therefore, if a statutory deadline has not been strictly complied with, the adjudicator is without jurisdiction over the matter. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The election contest provisions do not allow for the filing of an election contest complaint before an election. Although a petitioner may file a petition after an election is declared but before it is certified, there is no authority for allowing an election contest to be filed outside the framework of section 127 of the Election Law, which specifically states that a contest must be filed within five days after the declaration of the election – the petition must be filed after declaration of the election, but no later than five days from the date of the declaration. The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has no jurisdiction when over an election contest when it was not filed with the Election Commission within the deadline imposed. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 206 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

While the Election Law explicitly grants jurisdiction to the appellate court over appeals of election contests, it is silent on the question of appellate jurisdiction over appeals from decisions made under section 55 and no other provision in the Election Law, other than those granting jurisdiction over election contests in the appellate division, expressly provides for jurisdiction in the Supreme Court appellate division. Although there is no specific reference to the jurisdiction of the trial division in the Election Law itself, it must be inferred that the trial division, and not the appellate division, has jurisdiction over criminal prosecutions sought pursuant to section 55 as well as the power to hear contempt proceedings that are certified from the Election Commission pursuant to section 8. Since the provisions in the Chuuk Constitution and Judiciary Act for trial court review over agency actions otherwise provide authority for the trial court's jurisdiction over appeals from an election commission, the appellate court does not have jurisdiction over an appeal from the Election Commission's denial of a petitioner's pre-election complaint regarding the qualifications of candidates for Polle municipal mayoral office. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 207 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

When the relief sought is obtainable from the National Election Director before certification since a recount or a revote is a remedy within the National Election Director's power to order during the election contest appeal process, the plaintiff cannot show irreparable harm and his motion for a temporary restraining order may be denied on that ground alone. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 358-59 (Chk. 2009).

If Congress seats a candidate unconditionally an election contest becomes a non-justiciable political question. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 359 (Chk. 2009).

Jurisdiction over election contests rests purely on statutory and constitutional provisions, and courts have no inherent power to determine election contests. The determination of such contests are a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 392, 394 (Chk. 2009).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division lacks jurisdiction over an election contest in a Chuuk state election since jurisdiction over election contests rests purely on statutory and constitutional provisions, and courts otherwise have no inherent power to determine election contests, and since the determination of such contests is a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

When the constitutional issues the plaintiffs raise are either a part of an election contest over which the court has no jurisdiction or are hypothetical, abstract, or academic, the court lacks jurisdiction over the case. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

The court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over a case when, if applied, the general principle that courts should first consider any non-constitutional grounds that might resolve the issue because unnecessary constitutional adjudication ought to be avoided, would unmask the case as an election contest and the matter would accordingly be dismissed. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

The decision as to the court's jurisdiction over an action is one to be made by the court, and the election commission is not empowered to assume or confer whether a court has jurisdiction. The election commission is limited to determining its own jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 411 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Constitutions and statutes provide, as a part of the election machinery, the procedure by which election results may be contested, and such contests are regulated wholly by these constitutional or statutory provisions. A strict observance of the steps necessary to give us jurisdiction over an election contest is required, and if these steps are not followed, the court is powerless to entertain such proceedings. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 419 (App. 2009).

An aggrieved candidate may, within five days after receipt of the National Election Director's decision granting or denying a petition for a recount or a revote, appeal that decision to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. A post-certification petition, and a decision thereon, is a prerequisite to an appeal to the court. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 419 (App. 2009).

An election appeal filed too soon will be dismissed as premature (unripe) because the statute does not grant the court jurisdiction over election cases until the administrative steps and time frames have been adhered to. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 422 (App. 2009).

Although there are rare occasions when an equitable remedy may be proper in an election case, overlooking or extending a deadline to file an appeal is not one of them. Statutory deadlines to file appeals are jurisdictional, and if the deadline has not been strictly complied with the adjudicator is without jurisdiction over the matter once the deadline has passed. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 422 (App. 2009).

The timing provisions for the election commission to rule on an election contest provide that once the state election commission begins a special session, it has two days to reach a determination of the contest. The court reads the two-day deadline as directory, not mandatory. Because the deadline is directory, an election contest is not effectively denied if the election commission fails to reach a determination within two days, so long as the commission is taking reasonable steps to determine the contest as quickly as possible. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 459, 462 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

If an election complaint was not timely filed with the election commission, then neither the election commission nor the court have jurisdiction over the election contest. Because statutory filing deadlines are generally mandatory, whether the complaint was timely filed is a jurisdictional question and therefore potentially dispositive of a contest. That determination is initially the election commission's to make, as it involves factual questions going to its own jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 459, 463 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Until the election commission determines the election contest, or there is otherwise an appeal from a final order or a determinate effective denial, administrative remedies have not been exhausted and such an election contest will, therefore, be remanded to the election commission for further proceedings. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 459, 463 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Under the Chuuk Election Law, initially, an election contestant must file a verified complaint with the election commission within five days after the declaration of the election result by the body canvassing the returns. This deadline for filing a complaint with the election commission is mandatory, and, if the complainant fails to strictly comply with the deadline for filing a verified complaint, the complaint will be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 518 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Neither the election commission nor the court can take jurisdiction over an election contest when it is not timely filed. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Before the appellate division proceeds to the merits of any action filed as an election contest, the court should determine if it has subject matter jurisdiction because the appellate division has jurisdiction over election contests only to the extent that a constitutional or statutory provision expressly or impliedly gives it that authority. Rayphand v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 540, 542 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The appellate court's authority to hear an election contest arises when there is an appeal from the election commission's ruling on a complaint filed pursuant to section 127, which requires a contestant to file a verified statement of contest with the election commission within five days after the declaration of the election result by the body canvassing the returns thereof. For the appellate division to take subject matter jurisdiction in an election contest, the appellants must have appealed from the election commission's ruling on a complaint that was filed within five days of the declaration of an election's results. But a complaint raising issues regarding an election, but before an election result has been declared, is not an election contest. Rather, jurisdiction over appeals of agency decisions, including those of the state election commission, is vested in trial division. Rayphand v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 540, 542 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When the appellants dispute the Election Commission's authority to nullify the results of a municipal mayoral election and reschedule the election, the appellants are not contesting the results of any election, especially since an appellant was the first election's declared winner; rather, the appellants dispute the state election commission's authority to nullify the first election's results and order a new election. Since the Election Law does not contemplate Appellate Division jurisdiction over disputes that arise outside the timeframe set by section 127 and since the appellants are not appealing from an election commission decision on an election complaint that was filed in compliance with section 127, the appellate court has no jurisdiction over the matter pursuant to sections 130 and 131 of the Election Law, which are the only provisions in the Election Law that provide for original jurisdiction over election matters in the appellate division. Rayphand v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 540, 542-43 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Chuuk Election Code, section 138 clearly contemplates that the FSM Supreme Court appellate division may exercise jurisdiction over a Chuuk state election contest even after the candidates that have been declared the winners have been sworn in. Chuuk State Election Comm'n v. Chuuk State Supreme Court App. Div., 16 FSM R. 614, 615 (App. 2009).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division does not have jurisdiction over a challenge to a municipal election commission's order for a revote because it is not an election contest since the appellant does not contest an election's result or a candidate's qualifications and since it is not an appeal from a municipal court decision or otherwise an appeal from a trial court decision. Siis Mun. Election Comm'n v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 146, 147 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the election law provides for remedies that have not yet been used, a candidate cannot show irreparable harm necessary for the issuance of a temporary restraining order. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Since section 131 of Chuuk State Law No. 3-95-26 provides for trials in the Chuuk State Supreme Court Appellate Division when review of Election Commission decisions regarding contested elections is sought and since the plaintiff has availed himself of that remedy, he cannot show irreparable harm. But a court must weigh three factors other than irreparable harm when considering injunctive relief – the relative harm to the plaintiff and to the defendant, the public interest, and the likelihood of success by the plaintiff in the underlying case – and when none of those factors weigh so strongly in the plaintiff's favor to overcome the lack of irreparable harm injunctive relief will not be granted. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A plaintiff's request that the court issue a declaratory judgment against defendant Election Commission stating that the scheduled revote election violates plaintiff's due process rights will be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction when that Election Commission decision is already being reviewed by the Appellate Division. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

It is the nature of the political process that elections typically yield a single winner and one or more losers. Absent a showing of foul play or procedural irregularity, a defeated election contestant has no claim before any court of law. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A court cannot, for lack of jurisdiction, weigh the likelihood of plaintiff's success on the merits when, pursuant to state law, the merits of his appeal are not before the court because they were duly presented in their proper forum of the appellate division. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Whether an individual is entitled to be placed on the ballot is left solely in the hands of the Chuuk State Election Commission and is beyond the Chuuk State Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Simina v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 19 FSM R. 587, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has jurisdiction of election matters as provided for in Sections 130 through 139, of the Election Law of 1996. Simina v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 19

FSM R. 587, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

When the appellant cannot verify to the court that the election contest requirements were met, the court lacks the jurisdiction. Iron v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 20 FSM R. 39, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

– Recount

A decision whether to grant or deny a recount is not an everyday decision, but a large question affecting the public interest profoundly and involving fundamental policy considerations. Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 133 (App. 1987).

To interpret 9 F.S.M.C. 904, the FSM Supreme Court should apply a two-prong test. The first prong is whether there is a "substantial question or fraud or error" and the second prong is whether there is "substantial possibility that the outcome would be affected by a recount." Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 136-37 (App. 1987).

The statutory scheme of the National Election Code strongly suggests that Congress intended the word "substantial" in 9 F.S.M.C. 904 to be applied liberally, so that in the event of doubt, a recount would be available. Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 138 (App. 1987).

The statutory scheme of the National Election Code reflects far greater concern that appropriate recounts be provided than that inappropriate recounts be prevented. If a recount is denied when it should have been granted, a grave risk is presented to constitutional government. Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 138-39 (App. 1987).

When an appellant seeks to have an election set aside and done over due to irregularities not correctable by a recount the appeal is timely filed if it is filed within one week of the certification of the results of the election. This is the same filing time frame as for a recount. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (I), 6 FSM R. 38, 39 (App. 1993).

While the court has statutory authority to hear appeals regarding the conduct of elections, its power to grant relief is limited to ordering a recount or a revote. Only Congress can decide who is to be seated and once it has seated a member unconditionally the matter is nonjusticiable. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 & n.1 (App. 1993).

The standard to determine whether a recount must be ordered is 1) whether a substantial question of fraud or error exists, and 2) whether there is a substantial possibility that the outcome of the election would be affected. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 136 (App. 1999).

A partial recount is a less drastic remedy than requiring part of the election to be done over. Braiel v. National Election Dir., 9 FSM R. 133, 137 (App. 1999).

Under Chuuk election law, once the votes are tabulated and certified, the Election Commission does not have the power to grant a recount request unless ordered to do so by "a court of competent jurisdiction." It can only deny a recount request and a contestant's only recourse then is an appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 154 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When the election statute provides that a recount is to be taken if a recount is necessary for the proper determination of the election contest, the proper standard to use to determine whether "a recount is necessary for the proper determination of the contest" is that a recount will be ordered when the contestant has shown that it is more likely than not that there were substantial irregularities that could have affected the election's outcome. It is the election contestant's burden to make this showing. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 156 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When one member of the tabulating committee, called the speaker, read out the votes on the ballot, another member verified what he read, and three other members recorded the votes on their tally sheets and stopped at various checking places to check their totals and when the methods used to resolve tally sheet discrepancies – if two tally sheets agreed and one did not, the result of the two that agreed was used; and if all three differed, the middle result was used – introduced a substantial chance of inaccurate results, these methods' inaccurate results could have affected the outcome because of the closeness of the official results (a one vote difference). Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 156-57 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The court heartily approved of a recount method designed to achieve an accurate result by which, if there were any discrepancies in tally totals at any of the checking points, the tabulating committee would instead recount the ballots they had counted since the last checking point and not count any further ballots until all tally counts agreed. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When the ballot box was obviously not in the condition it was when locked and it was not even in the condition that the Director asserted that it was in when he opened (and closed) it to retrieve the tally sheet, the possibility that the box could have been tampered with and that the ballots were not in their original condition was unmistakable. Since the court could have no confidence in the integrity of the ballots because they were so tainted that they were inadmissable as evidence of the votes cast, it would be pointless to order a recount. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

If the Director had not opened the ballot box on his own, but instead waited as required by statute, for a court order to recount, the ballots' integrity would, in all likelihood, be unquestioned and a recount could have been ordered which should have satisfied the parties and the public as to the true vote totals. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The court, in an election contest, would be extremely hesitant to grant the relief of nullification of all of the votes cast in a ballot box and a declaration that the election contestant was then the winner because that would disenfranchise the many qualified voters who properly cast their ballots in that ballot box in good faith. If there had been proven illegal votes in sufficient number that the ballot box result was cast in doubt, the court would have been inclined to consider ordering the election done over as a less drastic and more equitable and democratic remedy. The statute explicitly gives the court the power to order a recount during trial, but does not specifically grant the power to order a revote or to nullify a ballot box. The powers to effect remedies for irregularities that likely could have affected an election's outcome appear to be implied or inherent in the Election Commission's powers and thus in the court's powers in review of the Commission's election contest decisions. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596-97 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A recount will not be ordered when the statements of contest on file do not appear to make it necessary; when the petitioner, who had originally not made that request before the Election Commission, initially made such a request of the court prematurely, but later abandoned his request when the court specifically inquired if he was still seeking a recount; and when, even if the court could be assured of the security and chain of custody of the ballot box in question, it was not shown that it was likely a recount could alter the outcome. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 597 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

If an election contestant's appeal is considered as only a claim challenging the acceptability of votes, the five-day time frame to appeal the National Election Commissioner's denial of that claim would start then even though a recount was pending because an FSM Supreme Court appellate division decision may have the effect of disallowing challenged votes but shall not halt or delay balloting or counting and tabulating. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 (App. 2009).

A decision to provide a recount is not appealable. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 (App. 2009).

Provisions for challenging the acceptability of votes apply to individual or particular votes and not to an entire polling place. The only proper remedies when the reliability of an entire polling place result is in question, are either a recount or a revote, depending on the particular circumstances. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 (App. 2009).

The court will decline to order the exclusion of all votes at a polling place, thus disenfranchising many qualified and innocent voters and possibly altering the will of the electorate and the election results. Only a recount or a revote would be proper in such cases. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 (App. 2009).

When the only irregularity clearly alleged in an election petition was that the transmission of the results had been tampered with, a recount of the actual ballots, if the ballot boxes' security and integrity has been maintained and assured, is the logical remedy. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 n.5 (App. 2009).

When the tabulators, after twenty-five ballots had been tabulated, would compare their tabulations and if the tallies did not agree the tabulators would, if two tallies agreed, adopt the majority figure, and if all three were different, they would adopt the middle figure, these methods used to resolve discrepancies introduce a substantial chance of inaccurate results and these inaccurate results, depending on the closeness of the official outcome, could affect the outcome, which would entitle the petitioner to a recount. Hallers v. Yer, 18 FSM R. 644, 647-48 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2013).

– Revote

When an appellant seeks to have an election set aside and done over due to irregularities not correctable by a recount the appeal is timely filed if it is filed within one week of the certification of the results of the election. This is the same filing time frame as for a recount. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (I), 6 FSM R. 38, 39 (App. 1993).

That the results of the election would have been changed but for the alleged irregularities is not the correct formulation of the ground for a revote. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (II), 6 FSM R. 74, 79 (App. 1993).

Where election irregularities cannot be corrected by a recount, the election, in whole or in part, can be set aside and done over only if it is more likely than not that the irregularities complained of could have, not necessarily would have, resulted in the election of a candidate who would not have won had the irregularities not occurred. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (II), 6 FSM R. 74, 82 (App. 1993).

While the court has statutory authority to hear appeals regarding the conduct of elections, its power to grant relief is limited to ordering a recount or a revote. Only Congress can decide who is to be seated and once it has seated a member unconditionally the matter is nonjusticiable. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 & n.1 (App. 1993).

The proper standard for determining whether a revote should be ordered is whether the result could have been different had the irregularities not occurred. The plaintiffs' obligation is twofold, to establish that irregularities occurred and to show that the result could have been different had no irregularities occurred. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 275, 277-78 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

No revote can be ordered when there is no proof of the alleged election irregularities and thus no showing that the conduct of the election affected the result, and when the outcome is the result of the plaintiffs' refusal to participate in the election. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 275,

278-79 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The time frame for an aggrieved candidate to seek a revote is the same as that to seek a recount. It must be filed within one week of certification of the election results. The winning candidate has one week to respond to the petition. The National Election Director then has 10 days to decide whether to approve the petition. If he decides not to approve the petition, he must record the reasons for the decision. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203 (App. 2005).

When election irregularities cannot be corrected by recount, a candidate may petition for an election to be set aside and done over, either in a district as a whole or in the part where the irregularities took place. The procedures for the filing a revote petition, action thereon, and appeal of its denial are the same as those for a recount petition. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 203 n.3 (App. 2005).

Assuming that, as a result of the revote, that the candidate seeking to enjoin the revote is not declared the winning candidate (an assumption that the court cannot make), he still has all the avenues provided by the statutory provisions governing election contests, and once the administrative remedies before the National Election Director have run their course, a candidate still aggrieved may, at that time, seek relief from the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. Since this is an adequate alternative remedy, the candidate cannot show irreparable harm. Asugar v. Edward, 13 FSM R. 209, 212-13 (Chk. 2005).

The court, in an election contest, would be extremely hesitant to grant the relief of nullification of all of the votes cast in a ballot box and a declaration that the election contestant was then the winner because that would disenfranchise the many qualified voters who properly cast their ballots in that ballot box in good faith. If there had been proven illegal votes in sufficient number that the ballot box result was cast in doubt, the court would have been inclined to consider ordering the election done over as a less drastic and more equitable and democratic remedy. The statute explicitly gives the court the power to order a recount during trial, but does not specifically grant the power to order a revote or to nullify a ballot box. The powers to effect remedies for irregularities that likely could have affected an election's outcome appear to be implied or inherent in the Election Commission's powers and thus in the court's powers in review of the Commission's election contest decisions. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 591, 596-97 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Provisions for challenging the acceptability of votes apply to individual or particular votes and not to an entire polling place. The only proper remedies when the reliability of an entire polling place result is in question, are either a recount or a revote, depending on the particular circumstances. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 (App. 2009).

The court will decline to order the exclusion of all votes at a polling place, thus disenfranchising many qualified and innocent voters and possibly altering the will of the electorate and the election results. Only a recount or a revote would be proper in such cases. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 421 (App. 2009).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division does not have jurisdiction over a challenge to a municipal election commission's order for a revote because it is not an election contest since the appellant does not contest an election's result or a candidate's qualifications and since it is not an appeal from a municipal court decision or otherwise an appeal from a trial court decision. Siis Mun. Election Comm'n v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 146, 147 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the Election Commission has ordered a revote and that order has been appealed, the relative harm to each party, or even that either party faces an impending harm at all, is difficult to fathom. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A plaintiff's request that the court issue a declaratory judgment against defendant Election Commission stating that the scheduled revote election violates plaintiff's due process rights will be dismissed for lack of jurisdiction when that Election Commission decision is already being reviewed by the Appellate Division. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the trial court is without jurisdiction to either decide or second guess the reasoning underpinning future appellate division decisions and, whatever the results of the revote, neither party is likely to suffer a harm of such import that cannot potentially be redressed through the procedures set forth under our laws. The plaintiff does not stand to lose anything of a magnitude so great as to justify issuance of an order enjoining the election from taking place at all because if the defendant prevails in the appeal, there may be utility in the revote and if the plaintiff prevails in the appeal, the revote becomes a nullity. Under either scenario, the results of the revote may be administratively and, if necessary, judicially appealed. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When a plaintiff argues that the District No. 11 constituents should not incur the expenses of a revote where there is a likelihood that the appellate court will set aside the results, the public interest is best served if due process is allowed to run its course. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When, at least procedurally, the law governing appeals of administrative decisions on contested elections has been properly complied with, a plaintiff's petition requesting an injunction against the revote ordered by the Election Commission is wholly without merit and can only serve to frustrate the legal process underway in appellate division. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Under Chuuk State Law No. 3-95-26, no irregularity or improper conduct in the proceedings of any election board will void an election result, unless such irregularity or misconduct resulted in a defendant being declared either elected or tied for election, and an election will not be set aside on account of illegal votes unless it appears that such number of illegal votes has been given to the person whose right to the office is contested. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 492, 493-94 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2011).

Since, in order for the Chuuk State Election Commission to have properly declared a revote, in addition to determining that illegal votes were cast, it was required to determine that the illegal votes resulted in the winning candidate being declared elected, a call for a revote was in error when there is nothing to indicate the likelihood that the 18 illegally cast votes would have resulted in a different candidate being declared elected, or a tie, or would have rendered a different outcome in the district 11 poll results. Jackson v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 17 FSM R. 492, 494 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2011).

A "winning" candidate cannot show that a revote constitutes irreparable harm because, after the revote is held, that candidate may still be declared and certified as the winning candidate – the revote might not alter the ultimate outcome. In re Decision of Nat'l Election Dir., 22 FSM R. 221, 223 (App. 2019).

A revote is an authorized remedy for fraud or error that cannot be corrected by a recount, and a shortage of ballots at a polling place is, by its nature, an error that cannot be corrected by a recount. In re Decision of Nat'l Election Dir., 22 FSM R. 234, 236 (App. 2019).

A revote is the preferred remedy for an error that cannot be corrected by a recount since it does not disenfranchise the many qualified and innocent voters at the polling place(s) where the revote is held. In re Decision of Nat'l Election Dir., 22 FSM R. 234, 236 (App. 2019).

A party seeking a preliminary injunction must clearly show that an immediate and irreparable injury would otherwise occur and that there is no adequate alternative remedy. In re Decision of Nat'l Election Dir., 22 FSM R. 234, 236 (App. 2019).

EMPLOYER – EMPLOYEE

Where the employee seeking damages for injuries sustained while working does not, either in his complaint or elsewhere, point to any particular act or omission by the employer, who had been stripped of any supervision and control over the activities of the employee before the injury, that employer cannot be held responsible for any wrongful direction or lack of direction at the scene which might have led to the alleged injury. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 144 (Pon. 1985).

An employer who assigns employees to work under the supervision of another is not legally responsible to the assigned employees for injuries caused by failure of the other employer to provide labor-saving or safety equipment where the hazards known to the employer were equally obvious to the assigned employees. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 144 (Pon. 1985).

In absence of statute pertaining to rights of employees of insolvent companies to receive preference against other creditors of employer, an appropriate source of guidance is the common law as it existed in absence of statute. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 300 (Pon. 1988).

Claims for wages asserted by low level employees and laborers are entitled to preference over all other claims, except wage and salary tax lien rights of the national government, which are given priority over all other claims and liens by 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2). In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 301 (Pon. 1988).

An employee's preference for wage claims is determined by reference to the equities among the parties rather than exclusively by specific dates upon which particular liens were established. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 341 (Pon. 1988).

Where an employee is commanded to take an action which creates a known risk of injury, his obedience to the command will not bar subsequent recovery for injuries suffered, even where the risk of injury is apparent, but this will not excuse clearly reckless conduct by the employee where he had full knowledge of reasonable means to limit or prevent the injury. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 169 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

A plaintiff employee is not barred from recovery for his failure to exercise due care because defendant employer's conduct amounted to a reckless disregard for the safety of its employees. Alfons v. Edwin, 5 FSM R. 238, 241 (Pon. 1991).

Where prior course of dealing and surrounding circumstances make it apparent that the parties' intention was that pay for unused vacation time would be an implied term the former employee is entitled to the pay for unused vacation time minus the applicable taxes. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Wade, 5 FSM R. 354, 356 (Pon. 1992).

An employer owes a duty of care toward its employee to see that the employee is properly educated about the operation of clearly dangerous machinery. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 65 (Chk. 1997).

Where the employer is aware that unsafe procedures are being used and safe procedures are possible, but the employer does not demand them, the employer breaches its duty of care toward its employees. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 65 (Chk. 1997).

When a general manager's actions in hiring, supervising and paying the employees of a sawmill were within the scope of authority granted to him by the principals, the sawmill's joint owners, the principals are bound by their agent's actions in hiring or authorizing the hiring of a sawmill employee. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 52 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The determination of an employee-employer relationship for tort liability purposes will not be based upon an employer's decision on whether to report the persons as "employees" for the purposes of reporting Social Security contributions and FSM Income Tax deductions. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 52 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

For the purposes of determining the employee status of an individual person for FSM Social Security contributions or for the FSM Income Tax law, the statutes look to the usual common law rules applicable in determining the employer-employee relationship. An employer includes any association or group employing any person. Employment means any service by an employee for the employer employing him, irrespective of where such employment is performed. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 52 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Under common law generally, "employment" includes any service performed for remuneration under any oral agreement of hire. To "employ" is to make use of the services of another, and to "be employed" means to perform a function under orders to do so. An "employee" is normally defined as a person in the service of another, through an agreement, which may be express, implied or verbal, and which gives the employer the right to control and direct the person in the way the work is to be performed. An employee performs services for an employer and is paid by the employer for those services. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 52-53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

If a person performed services at the defendants' sawmill and was paid compensation for his services by the defendants through their sawmill operations manager, who gave employees directions for the performance of labor, he was the defendants' employee under the common law rules for determining the employer-employee relationship for individuals. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Under the common law, there are only two reasons for distinguishing between agents of a principal who are "servants" or "employees" of the principal and agents who are independent contractors. The most common is to determine the principal's possible liability for torts of the agent within the scope of employment. The second purpose is to determine the obligations, rights and immunities between the principal and the agent. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An employer owes a duty of care toward its employee to see that the employee is properly educated about the operation of clearly dangerous machinery. An employer who recognizes the potential danger of a work situation, but who fails to take steps to reduce the danger or warn his employees of the danger is negligent. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A general contractor in control of a structure or premises owes to the employees of any other contractor rightfully thereon a duty to exercise ordinary care to keep the structure or premises in a safe condition for their use. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

An employer has a duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care commensurate with the nature of the business to protect the employee from the hazards incident to it, and the employer is bound to exercise this degree of diligence in providing his employee with a safe working place. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

An owner/general contractor who actively supervises daily construction operations has a duty to keep the premises safe for all workers on the job and is ultimately liable for injuries occurring on the worksite when those injuries result from failure to perform that duty. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

When one company assigned its employee to work for another company, and the assigning company was effectively stripped of control over the way the work was done, and when the assigning company had no knowledge of facts unknown to the employee that would have affected the risk faced by him, and did nothing else to cause the employee's injury, there is no negligence liability on the part of the assigning company. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2001).

When an employee is directed or permitted by his employer to perform services for another employer he may become the employee of such other in performing the services and since the question of liability is always raised because of some specific act done, the important question is whether or not, as to the act in question the employee was acting in the business of and under the direction of one or the other employer. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2001).

A cause of action to collect salary or wages accrues when an employee has a right to collect the money allegedly owed to him. Thus the statute of limitations began to run from the time that each plaintiff's pay for any specific pay period was due. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 342 (Kos. 2003).

Even assuming that the Pohnpei Wage and Hour Law applies to a governmental organization employer and assuming that a claim under the statute was pled although the statute was not mentioned in the complaint, the claim is without merit when the court has determined that the positions of full-time and part-time teachers are different and the college may maintain different pay scales for them. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. 2007).

A full-time teacher's added duties, the need to forgo other employment, and the long-term commitment (three years as opposed to one semester) to teaching at the College, makes a full-time teaching position a substantially different job from a part-time teaching position. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 593 (App. 2008).

Regardless of the applicability of a U.S. case, the appeal of the denial of the plaintiff's equal pay claim turns on whether full-time teaching positions and part-time teaching positions are similar positions and on whether there is a rational relationship between a full-time teacher's pay and a part-time teacher's pay. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 593-94 (App. 2008).

When full-time teachers and part-time teachers are not similarly situated, a plaintiff does not have a factual basis for relief under the Pohnpei Wage and Hour Law when the claim is that she was paid less than male full-time teachers because she did not perform the same work as a full-time teacher. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 595 (App. 2008).

The College is an instrumentality of the national government in the same way that the FSM Development Bank is even though its employees are not considered government employees. The College was created by Congress and is subject to suit only in the manner provided for and to the extent that suits may be brought against the National Government. So, since the national government is not subject to suit under the Pohnpei Wage and Hour Law, neither is the College. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 596 (App. 2008).

An employee or agent is liable to a third person for injuries resulting from the breach of any duty which the employee or agent owes directly to such third person, and is not liable to a third person for injuries resulting from a breach of duty which the employee or agent owes only or solely to his employer. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438-39 (Pon. 2009).

An employment applicant was not discriminated against when the employer chose an applicant more qualified than she. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 497 (Pon. 2009).

Because it makes no sense to authorize an official to conduct hearings and investigations without also authorizing that official to do something with the information thus obtained, when the statute authorizes the Pohnpei Treasury Director to conduct hearings and investigations and, except for an appeal, makes the Director's decision final, it follows that the finality of the Director's decision applies to the entire administrative process before a judicial appeal. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 125, 130 (Pon. 2010).

Whereas the Pohnpei Division of Personnel, Labor and Manpower Development may issue orders and decisions, the Treasury Director has the final decision, and to give meaning to that finality, the Director's powers include issuing any orders necessary to arrive at and give effect to the decision. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 125, 130 (Pon. 2010).

While the Pohnpei PL&MD Division must establish procedures to ensure compliance with the Pohnpei Residents Employment Act of 1991 and the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder, the statute does not mention a "Chief of the Division," and where the Division of PL&MD is mentioned specifically, it is specifically envisioned that the Division must establish procedures to ensure compliance. By providing the Division with the responsibility for making the rules, the Act nevertheless does not empower only the Division to ensure compliance. Rather, it establishes that responsibility as part of the overall effort to ensure compliance and the statute vests the power of the final decision for effecting compliance with the Director, not the Division or its Chief. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 125, 130 (Pon. 2010).

Since the Pohnpei Residents Employment Act of 1991 does not solely empower the Division of PL&MD to hold hearings, and since it does vest the power of the final decision in the Director, it follows both that the hearing before the Director was legitimate pursuant to the Act, and that there was a legitimate hearing pursuant to the Act. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 125, 130 (Pon. 2010).

When the statute subjects the finality of the Director's decision to judicial appeal, and when it directs that judicial appeals of the Director's order or decision must be made to the Pohnpei Supreme Court trial division within 15 days of the date of the decision or order, the statute creates a statutory obligation to appeal a decision to Pohnpei Supreme Court, and, as the statutory law governing the administrative review of labor contracts disputes, it is a necessary part of the administrative process. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 125, 130-31 (Pon. 2010).

An employer has a duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care commensurate with the nature of the business to protect the employee from the hazards incident to it, and the employer is bound to exercise this degree of diligence in providing his employee with a safe working place. Duty of care is one of the four elements of a negligence cause of action. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 264, 265-66 (Chk. 2010).

When the employer instructed the employees to use safe procedures such as pulling rebars out (or inserting them) from the oceanside and not the roadside and when the employer provided its employees with a safe working place and did not knowingly permit unsafe procedures to be used, it did not breach its duty of care to its employees. Accordingly, since the plaintiff has failed to prove this essential element of a wrongful death claim, she cannot prevail. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 264, 266 (Chk. 2010).

The Constitution's investment in the national government of the power to regulate immigration, emigration, naturalization, and citizenship does not deprive the states of the ability to regulate employment within their own jurisdictions whenever such employment involves non-residents. To the degree that a state law regulating employment of non-resident workers does not directly conflict with national law, such state law is not preempted; and when there is possible conflict, the state law should be construed so as to avoid such conflict. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 333, 337-38 (Pon. 2011).

Pohnpei Code Title 19 and its definitions, apply only to private employers and their employees, not to Pohnpei public employees. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2011).

A subcontractor's status, when compared to that of an employee, is ordinarily that of an independent contractor. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 571 (Pon. 2011).

No national statute directly addresses overtime pay for private sector employment although 51 F.S.M.C. 139(2) does require an employer of a nonresident worker to present a copy of the worker's contract, which must contain certain information including a wage scale for regular and overtime work, before approval of the nonresident worker's entry to the FSM. Villarena v. Abello-Alfonso, 18 FSM R. 100, 102 & n.1 (Pon. 2011).

Wage and hour laws are a complex field in which there is substantial public concern. Villarena v. Abello-Alfonso, 18 FSM R. 100, 102 (Pon. 2011).

Private employment is governed by the principles of contract law. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 524 (Pon. 2013).

When, under the employment contract, compensation is to be figured on the "net total amount for the specific job" not on the net total amount for only a part of the contract job, the employee's commission compensation must be figured on a contract job by contract job basis, not on a task-by-task basis within the contract job. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 172 (App. 2013).

Since the College of Micronesia is an agency and instrumentality of the government, the Administrative Procedures Act should apply to all COM board decisions including employment disputes. Accordingly, a COM employee is required to bring his grievances to the agency tribunal, as the court of first instance under the primary jurisdiction doctrine, and complete the administrative procedures before the FSM Supreme Court will adjudicate the complaint. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 263 (Pon. 2015).

All College of Micronesia employment contract disputes are to be treated as a grievance, subject to the mandatory grievance procedure which has two components: the informal and the formal. The aggrieved employee must first pursue the grievance informally, and if the efforts to resolve the grievance through the informal procedure have failed, the aggrieved employee may proceed to the formal grievance procedure. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 264 (Pon. 2015).

The discretion an aggrieved College of Micronesia employee has when the grievance has not been resolved informally is the choice to further pursue the grievance through the formal procedure or to abandon the grievance altogether. It is not the discretion to either pursue the formal grievance procedure or to go directly to court. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 264 (Pon. 2015).

An aggrieved College of Micronesia employee's failure to appeal an adverse decision to the Board of Regents within the specified time limit, a required administrative step, is deemed as acceptance of the decision. Thus, when the aggrieved employee did not request an appeal before the Board, he failed to complete the administrative process, and thereby accepted the adverse committee decision. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 264 (Pon. 2015).

All College of Micronesia disputes must be brought before its administrative body, as a court of first instance, before it will be heard by this court, and, under the primary jurisdiction doctrine, the administrative processes created by that agency must ordinarily be completed before the court will entertain either a petition for review or an independent common law complaint. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 264-65 (Pon. 2015).

Private employment is governed by the principles of contract law. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 265 (Pon. 2015).

Pohnpei and the FSM have no workers' compensation law. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 406 (Pon. 2016).

The underlying purpose of Workers' Compensation Statutes is removal of the burden regarding work-place injury from an employee and instead, place it on the industry he served, irrespective of the cause for said injury. For employees within the statute's reach, Workers' Compensation is the exclusive remedy for accidental injuries sustained in the work place. While providing workers with benefits on a no-fault basis, the flip side of this arrangement is the provision for immunity from common law negligence suits for employers covered by the statute. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 407 (Pon. 2016).

The central tenet of Workers' Compensation is that of true no-fault insurance. In essence, employees were provided wage replacement and medical benefits resulting from industrial accidents for their respective injuries, in exchange for relinquishing the right to pursue a civil remedy. This exclusive remedy doctrine has been gradually eroded. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 407 (Pon. 2016).

When an insurance carrier's endorsement contained within an employer's policy limited the applicability of the CNMI Workers' Compensation Program to "the benefits provided under the Workers' Compensation Law of the CNMI," (which would entail that statute's "determination of pay," that statute's exclusive remedy provision setting forth tort immunity does not apply, and an employee would not be forestalled from also bringing a civil action sounding in negligence. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 409 (Pon. 2016).

Employment contracts generally do not make the employee's family members or dependants intended third-party beneficiaries. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 175 (Pon. 2017).

Even if public policy did not allow at-will employment in private industry as the default position, private parties could still contract for that provision. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 176 (Pon. 2017).

When, even though the employment contract was printed with a Pohnpei state government letterhead, the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau's actual function and operation shows that it is independent of the Pohnpei state government; when the PVB's funding is provided for under the Compact of Free Association, but is deposited with the Pohnpei Department of Treasury and Administration for custodial purposes and disbursement; and when the PVB's actual decision-making lies with its Board, the PVB is an entity that operates independent of the state government, and its Board is responsible for its General Manager's hiring, thus making the state's non-renewal of the plaintiff's contract unlawful. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

An employer has a duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care commensurate with the nature of the business to protect the employee from hazards incident to it. The employer is bound to exercise this degree of diligence in providing its employee with a safe working place. Duty of care is one of the four elements of a negligence cause of action. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

An employer has a duty to provide its employee with proper training, equipment, and a safe work environment. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

In a place like Pohnpei, where industrial and economic development continues to take shape and the people are not quite sophisticated about the uses or proper handling of certain machinery or equipment, a procurer, user, owner, or seller of equipment or machinery must take extra precautionary measures in educating the people about the proper handling, operation, or storage of any such machinery or equipment and also inform the people about the potential harm if such machinery or equipment is not properly handled, operated, or stored. Failure to observe such extra precautionary measures may render the equipment's procurer, user, owner, operator, or the seller liable for any injury that might result from such failure. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

Education or information about dangerous machinery or equipment can be made in writing, or by oral explanation, through demonstration, or uses of signs easily understood and noticeable. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

When an employer is aware that unsafe procedures are being used and safe procedures are possible but the employer does not demand them, the employer breaches its duty of care toward its employees. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

An employer breaches its duty of care when it fails to provide its employee with proper footwear appropriate for the hazardous work site despite being aware of the importance of proper footwear on the work site and despite it being company policy to require proper work equipment. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

When the employer provided the employee with a short safety briefing prior to his beginning work, but failed to provide him with the proper safety equipment necessary to safely perform his work duties, namely proper protective work shoes which are standard to the industry, it is clear that but for the employer's breach in not providing for or otherwise requiring the proper working boots before allowing him to begin work, he would not have been injured. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 29 (Pon. 2018).

When the employer paid the employee's salary during the time he was attempting to recover from his workplace injury, even after his discharge from the hospital, until the termination of his employment, and when the employer also paid his medical bills, damages for lost wages during that time and for his medical bills is inappropriate. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 30 n.1 (Pon. 2018).

Since Pohnpei is a mixed subsistence and cash economy, people rely on a person's employability to bring in the cash necessary to help support himself and his family in addition to the farm and fish products which he could produce through farming on his lands and fishing. Thus, a workplace injury, may greatly impair both the person's employability and his ability to provide from farming and fishing. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 30 (Pon. 2018).

When an employer is liable to an employee for a workplace injury permanently disabling the employee, the court must in all fairness determine a reasonable time frame to aid in calculating the amount of lost wages damages to award the plaintiff. Wages up to age sixty is a reasonable time frame. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 30 (Pon. 2018).

Generally, an employer is required to withhold the wages and salaries tax from its employees' pay, and the penalties and interest imposed for the failure to withhold the wages and salaries tax from an employee's pay are imposed upon the employer, not the taxpayer. Basu v. Amor, 22 FSM R. 557, 567 (Pon. 2020).

– Employee Handbook

Termination for just cause as described in a written employment contract precludes the former employee from seeking redress for the termination as the breach of an implied contract embodied in the personnel manual. Nakamura v. Bank of Guam (II), 6 FSM R. 345, 353 (App. 1994).

When failure to adopt a manual of administration was not a violation of statute because the statute does not set a time limit for the board to adopt one and when the employer is specifically exempted by statute from the Public Service System Act, summary judgment will be granted against a terminated employee on his claim that failure to adopt a manual made the employer liable for his termination. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 665 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Provisions in a personnel handbook may be enforceable as an employment contract if they meet the requirements for the formation of a unilateral contract. The offer must be definite in form and must be communicated to the offeree. Whether a proposal is meant to be an offer for a unilateral contract is determined by the outward manifestations of the parties, not by their subjective intentions. An employer's general statements of policy are no more than that and do not meet the contractual requirements for an offer. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 431 (Yap 2006).

It does not matter whether a personnel handbook was received at the time the employee was hired or at some later time because the distribution of the manual may act as an offer of a unilateral contract even if there was no unilateral contract offered at the time of hiring. This is because the consideration for the contract was supplied when the employee continued to work, after receipt of the manual, when he had no obligation to do so. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 431 n.2 (Yap 2006).

When a personnel policies manual is detailed and the court finds that it was intended to set the terms of employment; when a review of the employee handbook makes it clear that the employer intended its employees to be bound by the manual's terms and that it intended to bind itself to these terms, the personnel policies manual was meant to be an offer for a unilateral employment contract and an employee has accepted the offer through his continued employment. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 431-32 (Yap 2006).

A terminated employee's contract was not violated when he was not given a hearing before termination since the personnel manual did not require any hearing. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 435 (Yap 2006).

When an employee is presented with an employee handbook, instructed to read and understand it, told to sign-off on it, and when the employee does so, the employee handbook will constitute a unilateral contract between the parties. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 525 (Pon. 2013).

Personnel handbook provisions can be enforceable as an employment contract if they meet the requirements for the formation of a unilateral contract, which are: the offer must be definite in form and must be communicated to the offeree. An employer's general statements of policy are no more than that and do not meet the contractual requirements for an offer. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

When a personnel policies manual is detailed and the court finds that it was intended to set the terms of employment; when a review of the employee handbook makes it clear that the employer intended its employees to be bound by the manual's terms and that it intended to bind itself to these terms, the personnel policies manual was meant to be an offer for a unilateral employment contract and an employee has accepted the offer through his continued employment. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

When the Personnel Manual, read as a whole, authorizes the payment of the full amount (if it is 600 hours or less) of accrued annual leave to a former employee only when that employee has resigned with two weeks' written notice, the result must be that an employee's right to accrued annual leave pay is contingent upon certain events and if those events do not occur, the right never becomes a vested property interest. When it is undisputed that those events (written resignation with two weeks' notice) never occurred, the former employee, as a matter of law, did not have a vested property interest in his accrued annual leave. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 566 (Kos. 2014).

When an employee is presented with an employee handbook, instructed to read the handbook, told to sign off on the handbook, and when the employee does so, the employee handbook will constitute a unilateral contract between the parties. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 266 (Pon. 2015).

Since an employee handbook can provide contract terms between the employer and employee, when the employment contract explicitly states that the employee's position, construed employment, compensation, leaves of absences, additional employment, benefits, performance evaluations, and termination are governed by the employee manual and when that manual includes terminations provisions explicitly providing the employer with the right to initiate layoffs, the employer had the contractual right to lay off employees before the expiration of the contract term, although this right to lay off employees is limited to the procedures as set forth in the manual. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 266 (Pon. 2015).

– Wrongful Discharge

Where an employer terminates an employee without proper notice the termination will be given effect at the end of the proper notice period and the employee is entitled to any compensation he would have received during that period. Alik v. Kosrae Hotel Corp., 5 FSM R. 294, 296 (Kos. 1992).

Where there is sufficient evidence in the record for the trial judge to have found that an employee was terminated for the just cause of insubordination as permitted without notice in the parties' written employment contract, the trial court ruling that the plaintiff failed to prove he was terminated without just cause is sufficiently comprehensive and pertinent to the issue to form a basis for the decision. Nakamura v. Bank of Guam (II), 6 FSM R. 345, 352-53 (App. 1994).

Termination for just cause as described in a written employment contract precludes the former employee from seeking redress for the termination as the breach of an implied contract embodied in the personnel manual. Nakamura v. Bank of Guam (II), 6 FSM R. 345, 353 (App. 1994).

A plaintiff's firing by a private employer does not state a cause of action for unconstitutional deprivation of due process because no governmental entity or official is a defendant; the defendant is not alleged to be performing an essential governmental function; and a government action is not at issue. Semwen v. Seaward Holdings, Micronesia, 7 FSM R. 111, 113 (Chk. 1995).

An employee fired because he had filed suit against the defendant seeking compensation for injuries received while working on the job for the employer appears to state a cause of action in either tort or implied contract for wrongful discharge or termination. Semwen v. Seaward Holdings, Micronesia, 7 FSM R. 111, 114 (Chk. 1995).

When an employee has been laid off for the summer, it is not a termination for disciplinary reasons or a reduction-in-force. A layoff is a termination of employment at the will of the employer, which may be temporary or permanent. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Summary judgment will be granted against a terminated employee on his claim for breach of his verbal employment contract when he has failed to show that he had an assurance of continued employment through actions of a supervisor with authority to establish employment terms; when even assuming that former general manager did give the employee verbal assurances of continued employment, those verbal assurances ended with the general manager's termination; and when cause was not required for an employee's termination because the statute permitted employees to be terminated for other reasons, as the employer deemed appropriate. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 664 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When failure to adopt a manual of administration was not a violation of statute because the statute does not set a time limit for the board to adopt one and when the employer is specifically exempted by statute from the Public Service System Act, summary judgment will be granted against a terminated employee on his claim that failure to adopt a manual made the employer liable for his termination. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 665 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the employer is empowered to create bylaws in which the rights and obligations of employees with regard to termination might be spelled out, but none have been introduced into evidence in this case, only the terms of the contract itself may control the question of whether the plaintiff's termination was in material breach of his employment agreement. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 241 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An employee's diversion of funds can be construed to violate employment contract provision that bars unethical conduct, but when the contract provides the employer with the right to terminate the employee if he does not discharge his duties and responsibilities to his "employer's satisfaction," the employer could discharge the employee upon sixty days written notice if the employer was dissatisfied in any manner with his job performance, even without the apparent ethical lapse which occurred. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11

When a contract provision for written notice of termination was inserted in the contract to assure that the employee had actual notice of the adverse action and when there is no dispute that the employee received actual notice of his termination, the employer's failure to provide written notice is not actionable breach of contract. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When an employment contract has no provision for immediate termination under any circumstances, even where it is undisputed that the employer's property was misappropriated by an employee under contract, the court, construing the contract against the drafter, must conclude that the employer was required to provide the employee with sixty days written notice of his termination, which must run from the date of actual notice of impending termination. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An employer may fire an employee who was convicted of a violent felony while already employed when its personnel manual states it will refuse employment to such persons since an employer who fires an employee is refusing employment to the former employee. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 433 (Yap 2006).

When a personnel manual gives the director the responsibility of carrying out employee terminations, but another superior carried it out, this variation from the procedure is inconsequential because the requirement that the director perform the termination is a responsibility placed on the director rather than a procedural right vested in the employee. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 434 (Yap 2006).

When nothing in the personnel policies manual requires that an employee be given notice of his right to object to his termination and that this notice should have informed him of his right to write to the supervisor, director and the policy council, this notice was not required. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 434 (Yap 2006).

When the preamble to a personnel manual section states that the disciplinary actions are not mandatory, but the involuntary termination portion of that section is stated in mandatory terms, and when read together, the manual requires that the involuntary dismissal procedure be followed, and where the procedure is set out in such detail and phrased with mandatory language, the earlier general statement that disciplinary procedures are guidelines must give way. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 435 (Yap 2006).

When the personnel manual provides for an employee's involuntary dismissal two weeks after the director has recommended it, and when the employee was not afforded the two weeks of pay that he should have received had the procedure been followed, in this regard, the contract has been breached and the plaintiff is due his expectation damages under the contract, the amount he would have been paid for those two weeks. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 435 (Yap 2006).

A terminated employee's contract was not violated when he was not given a hearing before termination since the personnel manual did not require any hearing. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 435 (Yap 2006).

When a plaintiff is due what he should have been paid during the two-week notice period that was required by his contract, but was not paid, the court will award that as damages and the employee's share of taxes should be deducted from this amount and paid to the appropriate taxing agencies as required by law and the employer's share of applicable taxes should not be deducted from this amount, but should be paid to the appropriate taxing agencies as required by law. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 435 (Yap 2006).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination to the date he is reinstated are remedies are generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge. But the amount awarded in back pay should be reduced to the extent the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 436-37 (Yap 2006).

When a plaintiff suing for wrongful discharge has introduced no evidence of his efforts to mitigate his damages by attempting to secure a job during his periods of unemployment, the plaintiff is precluded from recovery of damages for these periods. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 437 (Yap 2006).

When an employer has unlawfully discharged an employee in violation of his civil rights and the former employee obtains alternative employment, in calculating damages, the income from the alternative employment will be deducted from the back pay owed to the employee, since otherwise the plaintiff could recover a windfall, which would violate the principles of compensatory damages. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination to the date he is reinstated are remedies generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge with the amount awarded in back pay reduced to the extent the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. But the court cannot reinstate a terminated employee in his former position when he is past the mandatory retirement age. It can only award him back pay for time before his retirement date, and any income through alternative employment that was received for employment after he would have had to retire from his Public Service System employment will not be used to reduce the back pay award. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 666 (Chk. 2008).

The applicable employment taxes should be deducted from a back pay award and paid to social security and the national government as required by law. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

When no evidence was introduced at trial of how much, if any, unused annual leave the plaintiff had accrued before he was wrongfully terminated, the court cannot make an award for unused accrued annual leave. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

In order to be eligible to be paid sick leave, an employee must be ill. The employee will not be paid sick leave when he was not sick. When a plaintiff was not sick when he was wrongfully terminated, he is not entitled to any sick leave. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

Redress for a wrongfully-terminated state employee would include reinstatement and back pay, except when the former employee could not be reinstated due the Public Service System Act's mandatory retirement policy. But the former employee could be awarded back pay if he had mitigated his damages. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 624 (App. 2009).

The remedies generally available to a state public service system employee who has shown that he was wrongfully discharged are reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 94 (Chk. 2010).

Back pay compensatory damages are the measure of compensatory damages for wrongful discharge. Compensation for an injury is not doubled just because the plaintiff has two different causes of action on which to base that recovery because only the injury itself is compensated. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 95-96 (Chk. 2010).

From awards of back pay damages the employer must deduct the applicable wage and salary taxes and social security taxes, which must then be remitted to the appropriate tax authorities. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 96 (Chk. 2010).

When an employee did not report to work for a total of twelve days before the termination action was taken, such action on the employee's part constituted voluntary job abandonment. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 480 (Pon. 2012).

When an employee had been requested to come into the work place to meet with management and did not and when the employee subsequently did not report to the work place for twelve days at which point she was administratively terminated, the existing evidence is sufficient for the employer to make out a prima facie case of entitlement for summary judgment. To survive summary judgment, the employee must establish that genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether she voluntarily abandoned her job and when she failed to offer any evidence setting forth specific facts to overcome the employer's voluntary job abandonment evidence, she has not shown that there exists any genuine issues of material fact for trial and the employer will be granted summary judgment that she abandoned her job. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 481 (Pon. 2012).

When a job applicant certified that she provided all the information requested in her employment history, and when the employer later discovered that one of the applicant's past employers was intentionally omitted, such omission constitutes a "material" omission to her work experience and would be sufficient grounds for termination. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 482 (Pon. 2012).

The employment-at-will doctrine avows that, when an employee does not have a written employment contract and the term of employment is of indefinite duration, the employer can terminate the employee for good cause, bad cause, or no cause at all. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 482 (Pon. 2012).

There is no inherent right to continued private sector employment. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 483 (Pon. 2012).

When the plaintiff was a new hire and had not completed her probationary period and when the employer included in its employee handbook a clear and unambiguous disclaimer that the handbook is not to be construed as a contract, the disclaimer is effective and the employee handbook does not create an implied employment contract and the plaintiff was an at-will employee who could have been terminated at any time within the introductory period with or without cause. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 483-84 (Pon. 2012).

"Just cause" or "good cause" for termination means a fair and honest cause or reason regulated by good faith on the employer's part. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 526 (Pon. 2013).

There are situations which would provide just cause for immediate termination even if not specifically set forth in an employment handbook. These situations could include severe or multiple instances of disobedience, insubordination, dishonesty, criminal conduct, theft, and actions detrimental to the business. All circumstances constituting just cause for immediate termination cannot be anticipated and listed in an employee handbook. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 526 (Pon. 2013).

Even when insubordination is not included in the employee handbook as a cause for termination, severe and/or multiple acts of insubordination can provide just cause for immediate termination. A private sector business cannot be required to retain an employee who acts in a way that actively harms the employer's business interest. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 526 (Pon. 2013).

The fact that an employment contract authorizes the employer to terminate it for certain specified causes does not ordinarily prevent the employer from discharging the employee for a legal cause not specified. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 527 (Pon. 2013).

It is implied in every employment contract that the employee will conduct himself with such decency and propriety as not to injure the employer in his business. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 527 (Pon. 2013).

The plaintiff's discharge was justified when her inappropriate behavior in not coming to work to book an airline ticket for a client seaman who had suffered a stroke was so prejudicial from a business standpoint and from a personal health and safety standpoint because of the urgent medical emergency situation and because the employer was directly involved in booking airline tickets for clients. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 527 (Pon. 2013).

As an exception to progressive discipline, an employee's immediate discharge was justified when she refused to come to work to issue airline ticket for client seaman, although she was aware that the client had suffered a stroke and needed to urgently depart Pohnpei to seek additional medical attention off-island since her conduct ran contrary to her employer's integrity, safety, and quality improvement objectives in providing needed, expected, and necessary services to its clients, especially when it involved a medical emergency. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 527 (Pon. 2013).

Three factors are used to determine whether immediate termination is justified even though the employer has a progressive discipline policy in its employee handbook: 1) culpability, 2) knowledge of expected conduct, and 3) control over the offending conduct. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 527 (Pon. 2013).

An employee's immediate termination was justified when not only did the employer have holiday pay but it also offered its employees overtime because of its need to work outside of normal hours; when the employee by refusing to come to work twice on March 21, 2008, engaged in conduct that was materially adverse to the employer's financial interest in not being able to promptly provide needed airline booking services and related assistance to its client who needed the flight arrangements to be made at the soonest possible time; when she was the only employee who could book airline tickets, and after being explained the situation's emergency nature and urgency, she must have known that by her not showing up to work as ordered, a serious interruption of the employer's operations would occur which would have possibly endangered the its client's health; when her absence placed unexpected pressure on other employees in what was already an emergency situation; and when she had control over her actions that day and her decision not to come into work was not abrupt and she had adequate time to consider the consequences of her actions. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 528-29 (Pon. 2013).

An employee's repeated acts of insubordination provide just cause for her immediate termination and do not require the progressive discipline in the employee's handbook and therefore the employer is not liable to her for any wrongful termination. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 529 (Pon. 2013).

An employee's immediate termination based on multiple acts of disobedience and insubordination was not a wrongful termination and was based on just cause and did not have to proceed through the employee handbook's progressive discipline. Having not prevailed on the wrongful termination claim, the plaintiff's other claims for pain and suffering, punitive damages, and attorneys' fees are also denied. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 531 (Pon. 2013).

Even when the plaintiffs failed to make reasonable efforts to secure alternative employment, the burden of proof falls on the former employer to show that the former employees could have found alternative employment in their chosen field. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 276 (Pon. 2014).

When the former employer has demonstrated that suitable alternative employment was available and that the former employees failed to make reasonable efforts to secure alternative employment, the court must conclude that plaintiffs could not recover for breach of contract due to their failure to mitigate damages. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 276 (Pon. 2014).

The failure to mitigate damages is an affirmative defense for which the defendant bears the burden of proof. The common law rule establishing failure to mitigate damages as an affirmative defense is sound because to hold otherwise would be to impose a burdensome requirement upon every plaintiff in a wrongful termination case and because a holding that failure to mitigate damages is an affirmative defense puts the burden of proof on defendants, who presumably would refrain from litigating this issue unless the question of failure to mitigate damages is actually in dispute. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 391 (Pon. 2014).

When the court has not held that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing could never be applied to an employment contract, the court, at the summary judgment stage of the proceeding, will not dismiss this cause of action as it might apply to the plaintiff's claim for wrongful termination in violation of his employment contract. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 568 (Kos. 2014).

The constitutional guarantee of due process only protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. Thus, a person's termination by a non-governmental employer does not state a cause of action for unconstitutional deprivation of due process because no governmental entity or official is a defendant; the defendant is not alleged to be performing an essential governmental function; and a government action is not at issue. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 569 (Kos. 2014).

An employer is not a governmental entity when it was not created by the FSM national government nor by any government established or recognized (national, state, or local) by the FSM Constitution; when it is merely funded, in part, by the FSM national and four state governments; when it is incorporated in the United States Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas and its parent corporation was created by the act of the United States Congress so that even if it were a governmental entity, it would be an entity of a government to which the FSM Constitution's due process clause does not apply. It will therefore be entitled to summary judgment on a former employee's wrongful termination in violation of constitutional due process cause of action. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 569 (Kos. 2014).

A former employee's allegation that his termination violated public policy under the FSM Constitution and the right to be free of religious discrimination does not state a cause of action. To the extent that any defendant could be held civilly liable for the violation of public policy, it would be under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), and the public policy as expressed in the civil rights statute. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 569 (Kos. 2014).

A former employee's allegation that his termination violated human rights policy under the FSM Constitution and his right to work and enjoy just and favorable working conditions under Article 23 of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights does not state a recognized cause of action. These claims are actionable under FSM domestic law. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 569-70 (Kos. 2014).

The three factors used to analyze whether there is just cause for immediate termination are: 1) culpability, 2) knowledge of expected conduct, and 3) control over the offending conduct. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 601 (App. 2014).

The proper emphasis under the culpability requirement for employee termination should not be upon the number of violations; rather, it should address the problem of whether the discharge was necessary to avoid actual or potential harm to the employer's rightful interest. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 601 (App. 2014).

The trial court's conclusion upholding an employee's termination is sound when the factual findings on which the conclusion is based are not clearly erroneous and the facts meet the three-factor test to permit immediate termination despite an employee handbook provision requiring progressive discipline. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 602 (App. 2014).

When an employee failed to discharge his duties in a prompt and efficient manner, and he was insubordinate; when the failure to discharge one's duties in a prompt and efficient manner constitutes just cause for termination from the employer; and when insubordination is also just cause, the employer did not materially breach the employee's employment contract (the employee manual) by terminating him since just cause for termination existed. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 116 (Kos. 2015).

When the plaintiff had the burden to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that his employer's termination of his employment was not for just cause and he failed to do so, he has not shown upon the facts and the law a right to relief and the defendants' motion to dismiss will therefore be granted. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 116 (Kos. 2015).

A plaintiff has not proven a material breach of his employment contract merely because he lost his job. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. 2015).

When the plaintiff produced no evidence from which the court could reasonably calculate a damages amount and when the plaintiff's termination was not a material breach of his employment contract, even if the plaintiff were permitted to proffer evidence now about the measure or the amount of his damages it would not help his case since he failed to prove a material breach and that failure is enough to bar any recovery. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177-78 (Kos. 2015).

The public policy reasons for requiring that a matter be first placed within the administrative body's competency include the uniformity and consistency in the regulation of business entrusted to a particular agency are secured and the judiciary's limited functions of review are more rationally exercised by preliminary resort for ascertaining and interpreting the circumstances underlying legal issues to agencies that are better equipped than courts by specialization, by insight gained through experience, and by more flexible procedure. Although wrongful termination claims rarely involve complex or technical issues that are outside of the court's competence, policy reasons also include avoiding conflict, indications of legislative intent, and other factors, and there are many policy reasons to abstain even when administrators lack identifiable expertise because the purpose is simply to promote the uniform application of the law and a proper relationship between the agencies and the judiciary. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 262-63 (Pon. 2015).

Since an employee handbook can provide contract terms between the employer and employee, when the employment contract explicitly states that the employee's position, construed employment, compensation, leaves of absences, additional employment, benefits, performance evaluations, and termination are governed by the employee manual and when that manual includes terminations provisions explicitly providing the employer with the right to initiate layoffs, the employer had the contractual right to lay off employees before the expiration of the contract term, although this right to lay off employees is limited to the procedures as set forth in the manual. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 266 (Pon. 2015).

A permanent employee is an employee who has successfully completed a probationary period. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 266 n.5 (Pon. 2015).

The employer is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law when, even viewing the uncontested facts in the light most favorable to the discharged employee, there are no genuine issues of material fact and the discharged employee cannot prevail on his breach of contract claim because he was properly laid off in accord with the contract terms incorporated from the personnel manual; because the employer had the right to layoff employees; because the employer created a specific layoff procedure in its personnel manual, and because the employee was laid off according to that procedure. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 267 (Pon. 2015).

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

Earthmoving regulations themselves represent a governmental determination as to the public interest, and the clear violation of such regulations may therefore be enjoined without a separate court assessment of the public interest and balancing of hardships between the parties. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 4 FSM R. 347, 349 (Pon. 1990).

Where the national government, in previous appearances and filings, stated that no valid earthmoving permit was in effect the burden is on the national government at a motion for summary judgment to establish that there was a valid delegation of permit granting authority by the national government to the state officials. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 1991).

Although neither the Environmental Protection Act nor the earthmoving regulations contain any absolute requirement that a public hearing be held before an earthmoving permit may be issued, the issuance by national government officials of a permit authorizing earthmoving by a state agency without holding a hearing and based simply upon the application filed by the state agency and the minutes prepared by the state officials, is arbitrary and capricious where the dredging activities have been long continued in the absence of a national earthmoving permit and where the parties directly affected by those activities have for several months been vigorously opposing continuation of the earthmoving activities at the dredging site. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 1, 8 (Pon. 1991).

Various environmental acts that do not provide for a private citizen's cause of action for monetary damages cannot be used to create a duty for the breach of which damages may be awarded. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 360-61 (Pon. 1994).

The FSM Environmental Protection Act does not provide for a citizen's claim for damages. Damarlane v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 119, 121 (Pon. 1997).

Claims for damages for violation of the FSM Environmental Protection Act and for damage based on an alleged property interest in the reef and lagoon adjoining plaintiffs' land will be dismissed for failure to state a claim for which relief may be granted. Damarlane v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 119, 121 (Pon. 1997).

A savings clause that merely states that private parties who could previously seek civil remedies for what are now violations of the Chuuk State Environmental Protection Act still retain that right even if the Chuuk Environmental Protection Agency decides to act, does not create any new rights for those persons. Nor does it entitle them to collect any of the penalties created which may be asserted only by the Chuuk Environmental Protection Agency and only to its credit. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 51 (Chk. 2001).

When Pohnpei's refusal to hold a trochus harvest allegedly stemmed from environmental concerns, but all of the reports addressing this issue recommended that a trochus harvest be held and the concern was not that there would be too little trochus, but that there would be too much, nothing stood in the way of reasonable limitations on the harvest that could have harmonized both Pohnpei's legitimate environmental concerns and the national law requirement that it not limit the production of any commodity. Failure to do so violated 32 F.S.M.C. 302(2). AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 552 (Pon. 2004).

A cause of action exists in admiralty and maritime law for recovery of damages for oil contamination of wildlife and other natural resources in the marine environment. The type of injury includes both physical loss or injury, such as due to the grounding on the reef, as well as loss of use, either because of a government ban or because there has been a diminution of the resources because of oil contamination. Maritime nations generally recognize that parties injured by an oil spill should recover their damages, as the polluter must pay. Such a cause of action is available under the general admiralty and maritime law of the Federated States of Micronesia. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 416 (Yap 2006).

Nuisance law is frequently used to address liability in environmental contamination cases. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 416 (Yap 2006).

No offset for sums spent on cleanup can be given since the defendants had a duty to mitigate their damages and a legal duty imposed by Yap law to respond to the oil spill and clean up as much as possible. The oil spill cleanup protected them from greater liability. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420 (Yap 2006).

When the issue of continued monitoring of the marine environment remains unresolved, the court may hold in abeyance its ruling with respect to the monitoring issue and will retain jurisdiction over this issue in the expectation that the parties (and the State) can resolve any differences themselves. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 422 (Yap 2006).

Title 1 of the Compact governs the relationship between and amongst the parties to the Compact and its environmental protection section does not create a private cause of action since it provides that actions brought pursuant to that section may be initiated only by the FSM government. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 18 FSM R. 177, 179 (Pon. 2012).

No private cause of action exists under the FSM Environmental Act – Section 704 by its own terms limits enforcement of the Act to the Board and Section 502 is aspirational. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 18 FSM R. 177, 179-80 (Pon. 2012).

When the plaintiffs have not stated a claim based on national law on which the FSM Supreme Court may grant relief and when all that remains is state law, including state environmental regulations, they have not persuaded the court to retain the case, and the court will therefore abstain. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 18 FSM R. 177, 181 (Pon. 2012).

Defendants may be liable for nuisance regardless of whether they violated any environmental regulations and regardless of and without reference to any environmental regulations or laws. Violation of any such regulations might be used as evidence that a nuisance exists. A plaintiffs' nuisance cause of action is not and cannot be based on statutes or regulations when the complaint would state a common law cause of action for nuisance even if there were no environmental laws. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

National or state environmental laws and regulations are relevant to a nuisance claim only to the extent that failure to comply with those laws and regulations that apply to the defendants, may be evidence that the defendants' conduct is unreasonable, negligent, or reckless. However, reference to those laws is not necessary for the plaintiffs to prevail on a nuisance cause of action. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

Nuisance law is frequently used to address liability in environmental contamination cases. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

The FSM Environmental Protection Act, 25 F.S.M.C. 501 et seq., and its enforcement provisions, 25 F.S.M.C. 703-707, do not, as a matter of law, provide for a private cause of action or a citizen's claim for money damages but may support a claim for injunctive relief. Berman v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 111, 116 (App. 2013).

When a regulation's plain language applies only to toilet facilities that might contaminate sources of water that could be used for drinking purposes – in other words, fresh water and when the term "body of water" might be construed as covering the lagoon but in light of the regulation's clear intent to preserve potable water sources, it must be read as a catchall phrase meant to cover any other potential potable water source, the regulation does not apply to a toilet on a berm in a salt-water lagoon. Berman v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 111, 116-17 (App. 2013).

When a regulation's purpose – the evil that the regulation is designed to prevent – is the contamination of drinking water, it would not apply to a case where it might be proven that the privy on the berm leaks pollutants into the lagoon as the lagoon is not a possible potable water source since it is salt water and that evil is not covered by the regulation. Berman v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 111, 117 (App. 2013).

Money damages are not available in a private environmental protection lawsuit even if injunctive relief is available. Berman v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 111, 117 (App. 2013).

The potential for a significant impact on the public interest exists when Pohnpei's entire population will be directly and adversely affected by an unsustainable sea cucumber harvest, potentially affecting Pohnpei's public health, welfare, and economy in a negative manner since allowing a potentially environmentally devastating sea cucumber harvest is certainly not in the public interest. There is strong public interest in protecting Pohnpei's precious environment and natural resources. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 546, 552 (Pon. 2016).

The plaintiffs' reasonable fears of environmental pollution is sufficient injury-in-fact to support standing. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 (Pon. 2016).

Under the Pohnpei Marine Sanctuary and Wildlife Refuge Act of 1999, any person may commence a civil suit on his own behalf to enjoin any person who is alleged to be in violation of § 5-107 of that Act, and "person" includes any individual, corporation, partnership, association or other entity, and any governmental entity including, but not limited to, the FSM or any of the FSM states or any political subdivision thereof, and any foreign government, subdivision of such government, or any entity thereof. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 647 (Pon. 2016).

Since, unlike 26 Pon. C. § 5-115 which expressly grants to the Attorney General the right to bring a suit to enjoin a person who is in "imminent violation," the citizen suit provision of 26 Pon. C. § 5-117 only allows a person to commence a civil suit to enjoin a person who is "alleged to be in violation" of § 5-107," the plain statutory language can only be read to allow the Attorney General the power to seek equitable relief for an imminent violation but not private persons who do not allege facts that are sufficient to grant traditional constitutional standing when it has not asserted injury to itself. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 647 (Pon. 2016).

That none of the edible species are included in the sea cucumber harvest's plan does not mean that the population of such species will not be negatively affected by a harvest which is more likely than not to have an impact on the ecosystem they inhabit. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 21 FSM R. 150, 158 (Pon. 2017).

EQUITY

Where it becomes apparent that claims of creditors will outstrip the value of debtor's assets, the approach is to give all creditors an opportunity to submit claims, and distribute any available proceeds on an equitable basis. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 306 (Pon. 1988).

Under circumstances where there is no bankruptcy legislation or comprehensive system for establishing and recognizing liens in the FSM, the court acts essentially as a court of equity when deciding insolvency cases. In re Pacific Islands Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 581 (Pon. 1988).

Decisions regarding res judicata and the transitional activities of the Trust Territory High Court typically should be made on the basis of larger policy considerations rather than the equities lying with or against a particular party. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 120 (App. 1989).

Where no contract existed for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Jim v. Alik, 4 FSM R. 198, 200 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Where attorney's fees claimed pursuant to a contractual provision are excessive or otherwise unreasonable, it is within the equitable and discretionary power of the court to reduce or even deny the award, despite the contractual provision. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 220 (Pon. 1990).

Encroachment of a road on adjacent parcels is a trespass when the state has not used the property without interruption for the statutory period, nor for a period of time that would make the assertion of plaintiff's rights unfair. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 156 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where entitlement to customary relief has been proven and the means to execute such a remedy are within the trial court's authority and discretion, the trial court should as a matter of equity and constitutional duty grant the relief. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1993).

Trial courts have jurisdiction to set aside judgments either by a Rule 60 relief from judgment motion or by an independent action in equity. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

There are five essential elements to an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment. They are 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. If any one of these elements is missing the court cannot take equitable jurisdiction of the case. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Where there are one or more legal remedies still available to a litigant the trial court has no jurisdiction to grant relief from a judgment through an independent action in equity. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Courts of equity are without jurisdiction to enforce purely political rights. Matters concerning the conduct of elections are usually left to the political branches and the courts generally have no jurisdiction until after the elections are held. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

A writ of prohibition is proper to prevent a trial court from exercising equity jurisdiction in an election case. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Courts may consult foreign sources about equitable principles when there is no applicable Micronesian authority on point. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 489 n.3 (App. 1996).

The clean hands doctrine has been expressed in the language that he who has done inequity shall not have equity. A maxim which is closely related to, and which has been described as a corollary of, the clean hands maxim is where the wrong of the one party equals that of the other, the defendant is in the stronger position. On the other hand, one whose wrong is less than that of the other may be granted relief in some circumstances. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 500 (Pon. 1998).

Equity does not dictate that a setoff for the amount of a defendant's stock subscription be allowed against a contribution claim when the person claiming the setoff received by far the greatest benefit from the failed corporation while it was operating. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 507 (Pon. 1998).

An award of attorney's fees, depending as it does upon a finding of reasonableness, is an exercise in equity. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

Rescission is equitable in nature, just as waiver is. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 510, 513 (Pon. 2002).

One who would seek the benefit of equitable relief must himself demonstrate that he has done equity, or that he has clean hands. Obversely stated, he who has done inequity shall not have equity. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 510, 513 (Pon. 2002).

When a defendant has unprofessionally refused to comply with the plaintiffs' discovery requests without any justification for doing so, in the limited context of discovery proceedings, its hands are unclean and it is in no position to make a case under rescission or other equitable principle. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 510, 513 (Pon. 2002).

Quantum meruit is an equitable doctrine, based on the concept that no one who benefits by the labor and materials of another should be unjustly enriched thereby; under those circumstances, the law implies a promise to pay a reasonable amount for the labor and materials furnished, even absent a specific contract therefor. The doctrine of unjust enrichment has been recognized in the FSM. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 232 (Pon. 2002).

A court exercising equity jurisdiction has plenary power to fashion an order in such a manner as to recognize and maintain the equities of the parties involved. The relief granted in equity is dictated by the equitable requirements of the situation at hand and must be adapted to the facts and circumstances of each particular case. More simply stated, the underlying concept is the prevention of injustice, when a legal remedy may not be available to a party because of a technicality. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 346 (Pon. 2004).

Reformation is an equitable doctrine that allows a court to conform a contract (even an insurance contract) to the true agreement between the parties rather than the agreement as written. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

The exercise of equity is justified for the court to order the return of a unique pocketknife to the plaintiff when that unique item is not available for purchase on Kosrae. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

If all the parties have unclean hands, the court may afford relief to the party who bears a lesser degree of fault. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 518 (App. 2005).

"Equity" describes a specific set of legal principles used in countries that follow English common law. At one point in history, courts of law and courts of equity (also called courts of chancery) were separate systems with jurisdiction over different types of cases, having different procedures and offering different remedies. Over time, particularly in the United States, courts merged into a unified jurisdiction where an action at law and a suit in equity became less distinct. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

An equitable remedy: 1) cannot take cognizance of any case wherein the common law can give complete remedy; 2) cannot interpose in any case against the legislature's express letter and intention since if the legislature means to enact an injustice, however palpable, the court of equity is not the body with whom a correcting power is lodged; and 3) shall not interpose in any case which does not come within a general description and admit of redress by a general and practicable rule. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

An equitable remedy does not apply unless: 1) there is no adequate remedy at law; 2) it does not conflict with any statute; and 3) it rests on existing legal obligations (it does not create a new obligation or duty where none existed before) and follows legal precedent. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Equitable relief is not generally necessary for a court to resolve disputes relating to title because establishment of title is available by law. This is true for the Kosrae Land Court. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Common law, or case law, and statutes provide the basis for Land Court orders, in other words, a complete and adequate remedy. The Legislature established the Land Court's authority to hear and decide title determinations. Statutes require that Land Court decisions not be contrary to law and must be based on substantial evidence. Case law guides the Land Court on what constitutes substantial evidence to support a decision; this is legal precedent. The Land Court must establish title based on substantial evidence by considering the testimony and record before it. There is no need to resort to equitable jurisdiction to make a title determination. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662-63 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A complex record that takes time to assess, is not normally grounds to rely on equity. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 663 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A court must make its findings and show it is relying on substantial evidence even if using equitable jurisdiction, because an order must be based on sufficient evidence. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 663 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although there are rare occasions when an equitable remedy may be proper in an election case, overlooking or extending a deadline to file an appeal is not one of them. Statutory deadlines to file appeals are jurisdictional, and if the deadline has not been strictly complied with the adjudicator is without jurisdiction over the matter once the deadline has passed. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 422 (App. 2009).

The equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment, a theory applicable to implied contracts, operates in the absence of an enforceable contract and this principle requires that the party receiving something of value either pay for it or return it, and is based on the notion that one party should not be allowed to enrich himself at another's expense. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 119 (App. 2011).

When the equities involved include that the plaintiff falsely informed Chuuk that the marine insurance policy was not in effect when, in fact, it was in effect because the net premium had been paid to the insurer, promissory estoppel may instead be a better measure of the damages than implied contract or unjust enrichment. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

Since the defenses of laches, estoppel, and waiver generally require certain factual determinations about a party's acts or omissions, when those facts have not been established, there is an insufficient factual basis on which to grant a movant summary judgment on these defenses. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 252, 255 (Chk. 2012).

When the defendant built family residences on part of the land and has occupied them at least since sometime in the early 1990s, requiring such longtime occupants to change residence and rebuild elsewhere and take compensation for the houses is burdensome. Equity would not favor giving the plaintiff the choice of paying the defendant for his houses instead of the defendant paying for the land. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Courts of equity are not bound to give any stereotyped form of relief. They readily and easily adapt themselves to the parties' situation and to the facts of the particular case, and may make such decrees as effectuate justice. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the parties had agreed to a land exchange and the defendant has built houses on the land he received but the plaintiff did not receive any land because the defendant did not have the land to exchange, instead of returning the land to the plaintiff and having the plaintiff pay the defendant the value of the houses the defendant built the most equitable remedy (and the easiest for the court to fashion) is monetary compensation to the plaintiff for the value of the land that he did not receive in an exchange agreement that provided that he was to receive in exchange land of an equal amount to the land transferred to the defendants. To effectuate justice, the defendants should pay the plaintiff the value of the land the defendants received. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A court may not grant a plaintiff's request for injunctive or other equitable relief when there has been no showing of irreparable harm or that there is no adequate remedy at law. Macayon v. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ., 19 FSM R. 644, 648 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

If both parties have unclean hands, the court may afford relief to the party who bears a lesser degree of fault. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

Unclean hands is an equitable defense that can be used against actions in equity, but not in actions at law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 477 (Pon. 2020).

– Estoppel

Under the doctrine of equitable estoppel, a person may sometimes be precluded by his act or conduct, or silence when he has a duty to speak, from asserting a right which he otherwise would have had. However, this equitable doctrine may apply only when justice demands intervention on behalf of a person misled by the conduct of the party estopped. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 417 (Pon. 1984).

The doctrine of equitable estoppel does not apply when a party claiming to have been misled was aware of the facts which he insists the other party should have told him or when the first party could reasonably have been expected to learn those facts. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 417 (Pon. 1984).

Laches and estoppel are equitable doctrines which may be invoked only by parties who themselves have acted properly concerning the subject matter of the litigation. Ponape Transfer & Storage v. Federated Shipping Co., 3 FSM R. 174, 178 (Pon. 1987).

The estoppel doctrine, which is applied when justice demands intervention on behalf of a person misled by the conduct of the person estopped, is not available as a defense to a board member of a corporation where the board member knowingly misled regulatory officials and creditors of the corporation. Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 376, 385 (Pon. 1990).

Equitable estoppel should be applied to governments in the Federated States of Micronesia where this is necessary to prevent manifest injustice and where the interests of the public will not be significantly prejudiced. KCCA v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 118, 120 (Pon. 1991).

A party may sometimes be precluded by his act or conduct from asserting a right which he otherwise would have had. When a party has failed to assert its rights over a long period of time, and another party has relied on this non-assertion, the first party may be estopped from asserting those rights now. NIH Corp. v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1992).

Where the government's prior audit methods had the effect of permitting gross revenue tax computation on the cash basis and where the government's attempts to advise businesses that they are required to use the accrual method have for many years been woefully inadequate, the government will be barred by equitable estoppel from assessing penalties and interest on any underpayment of taxes that was the result of being led to believe that the cash basis was an acceptable method of tax computation. NIH Corp. v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 411, 415 (Pon. 1992).

Where no action, or words, or silence of the National Election Director prior to the appellant's initial petition misled the appellant into untimely filing his petition after certification it does not give rise to an estoppel. The Director's later failure to raise the issue of untimeliness until his denial of the petition was appealed to the Supreme Court does not give rise to an estoppel. Wiliander v. Mallarme, 7 FSM R. 152, 157-58 (App. 1995).

The affirmative defense of estoppel requires a long non-assertion of one's rights by the plaintiff and the defendant's reliance on that non-assertion to its detriment. There can be no estoppel where there is no loss, injury, damage, detriment, or prejudice to the party claiming it. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 65-66 (Chk. 1997).

Defendants are not likely to prevail on counterclaims of promissory estoppel when it does not appear that they relied on the plaintiff's promise to their detriment. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Epina, 8 FSM R. 155, 163 (Pon. 1997).

Estoppel is an equitable doctrine which may be invoked only by parties who themselves have acted properly concerning the subject matter of the litigation. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Epina, 8 FSM R. 155, 163 (Pon. 1997).

One of the necessary elements of equitable estoppel is that the party to be estopped must have had knowledge, actual or constructive, of the real facts. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Epina, 8 FSM R. 155, 164 (Pon. 1997).

No estoppel can arise from an act or a representation if it was not intended to have the effect claimed and if, from its nature or from the time when, or the circumstances under which, it was done or made, it would be unreasonable to attribute such effect to it. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Epina, 8 FSM R. 155, 164 (Pon. 1997).

The defenses of estoppel, unclean hands and laches are all equitable defenses which do not apply in actions sounding in personal injury. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 193 (Pon. 1997).

When estoppel serves as the basis for a plaintiff to file a breach of contract claim and that contract claim has been time barred, the plaintiff's estoppel claim is also barred. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 559 (Pon. 2000).

Where no contract exists, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under equitable doctrines. The doctrine of promissory estoppel allows enforcement of promises that induce reliance. The doctrine of promissory estoppel, also referred to as detrimental reliance, is summarized as: A promise which the promisor should reasonably expect to induce action on the part of the promisee, and which does induce such action, is binding if justice requires enforcement of the promise. The remedy for breach may be limited as justice requires. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, a person's reliance upon a promise may create rights and duties. The finding of detrimental reliance does not depend upon finding any agreement or consideration. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the plaintiff relied upon the defendant's promise to let him use the land to build his house, and the defendant should have reasonably expected the plaintiff to take action on this promise, such as obtaining financing through a loan, leasing equipment, and purchasing materials and labor to build his house, and when the plaintiff did in fact rely upon the promise and took action to secure financing through a loan, the doctrine of promissory estoppel is applicable and the promise is enforceable. Justice requires the enforcement of the promise and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount expended in reliance of his promise, based upon the doctrine of promissory estoppel. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Evidence that, sometime before defendant's marriage, the plaintiff did have some limited intimate contact on one occasion with the woman who later became the defendant's wife, does not serve as a defense to the plaintiff's claim of unjust enrichment and to recover restitution for the defendant's stopping construction of the plaintiff's house. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in contract and quasi-contract cases involving equitable doctrines, such as promissory estoppel and restitution. The plaintiff may be compensated for the injuries by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the promise. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Pre-judgment interest is not appropriate and a claim for it will be denied when there was no agreement involving a promise to pay money, when the plaintiff was not deprived of funds that he was entitled to because there was no contract made between the parties to pay money, and when the plaintiff was awarded damages based upon the equitable doctrine of promissory estoppel for the plaintiff's expenditures made in reliance on a promise. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 197 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A defendant would be estopped from raising an illegality of contract as a defense to a negligence claim when as the other party to the allegedly illegal contract he had the benefit of it. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

Estoppel in pais is defined as the doctrine by which a person may be precluded by his act or conduct, or silence when it is his duty to speak. Enengeitaw Clan v. Shirai, 10 FSM R. 309, 311 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The doctrine of equitable estoppel operates to preclude a party from asserting a right he otherwise might have had, based upon his previous conduct. But a plaintiff is not equitably estopped from challenging the Office of Economic Affairs's authority to conduct a trochus harvest because any past acquiescence to the Office's authority does not alter the Office's powers and duties vested in it by Pohnpei state law when, as a matter of law, the Office's activities with regard to the trochus harvest were illegal. Nagata v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 265, 271 (Pon. 2002).

Estoppel is an equitable remedy that may be invoked only by parties who themselves have acted properly concerning the subject of the litigation. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 307 (Pon. 2004).

A plaintiff's effort to induce a driver to claim that he was not intoxicated at the time of the accident, makes it unlikely that the plaintiff will be successful in any attempt to rely upon equitable doctrines in the litigation, especially when it cannot be said that no genuine issue of material fact exists, and that on the basis of estoppel the plaintiff is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 307 (Pon. 2004).

Detrimental reliance is subsumed within estoppel. A party seeking to invoke the equitable estoppel doctrine must prove that 1) a defendant made representations or statements; 2) the plaintiff reasonably relied upon the representations; and 3) the plaintiff will be harmed if estoppel is not allowed. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

To claim promissory estoppel a party must prove that 1) a promise was made; 2) the promisor should reasonably have expected the promise to induce actions of a definite and substantial character; 3) the promise did in fact induce such action; and 4) the circumstances require the enforcement of the promise to avoid injustice. Elements 3 and 4 are sometimes referred to collectively as "detrimental reliance." Misrepresentation, too, contains the elements of reasonable reliance and damages. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191-92 (Pon. 2006).

Equitable estoppel is (and should be) applied to governments in the FSM when this is necessary to prevent manifest injustice and when the interests of the public will not be significantly prejudiced. But a party asserting equitable estoppel against the government must prove more than is required when it is asserted against a private entity. The government may not be estopped on the same terms as any other litigant. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

Another element must be established when a party asserts estoppel against the government – affirmative misconduct on the government's part. "Affirmative misconduct" has never been clearly defined by any court. This much, however, is clear. The misconduct complained of must be "affirmative," which indicates more than mere negligence is required. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

"Detrimental reliance" requires, at the very least, that a party has changed its position for the worse as a consequence of the government's purported misconduct. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

When the defendant affirmatively signed a Letter of Commitment that it would issue the plaintiff a permit to purchase the first 60 metric tons of shell from the Pohnpei reefs during each annual trochus harvest and made other promises or representations that there would be a trochus harvest and the plaintiff reasonably relied upon these representations that there would be a trochus harvest and, until it finally stopped business in 1998, kept employees on so that it would be ready to go back into the trochus button business, the defendant is liable. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

The doctrine of detrimental reliance is summarized as a promise which the promisor should reasonably expect to induce action or forbearance on the part of the promisee, and which does induce such action or forbearance is binding if justice requires enforcement of the promise. The remedy for breach may be limited as justice requires. In other words, when a person justifiably and reasonably relies on a promise, then the promise will be enforced if it is the only way to avoid injustice. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 195-96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the plaintiff performed his part of the agreement by providing goods and cash to the a defendant believing the boundary of his land would be extended and he timely filed a subdivision request with the Land Commission and completed building a house on the land, in expectation of receiving title; when the defendant accepted the goods and cash and another defendant received title to the land from that defendant and others, including the portion the plaintiff was to receive; and when the other defendant accepted title to both parcels, but knew that the plaintiff was entitled to a portion of the land and had requested the subdivision, applying the doctrine of unjust enrichment, the other defendant has been unjustly enriched at the plaintiff's expense. To end the other defendant's unjust enrichment, the remedy is to issue title to the plaintiff for the portion of the land he was to receive in 1987 and leave title to the remaining land with the other defendant. An application of the doctrine of detrimental reliance affords the same remedy. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Under the doctrine of equitable estoppel, or estoppel in pais, a person may sometimes be precluded by his act or conduct or silence when he has a duty to speak, from asserting a right which he otherwise would have had. However, this equitable doctrine applies only when justice demands intervention on behalf of a person misled by the conduct of the party estopped. The equitable estoppel doctrine should be applied to Federated States of Micronesia governments when this is necessary to prevent manifest injustice and when the interests of the public will not be significantly prejudiced. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 403-04 (Pon. 2007).

No estoppel can arise from an act or a representation if it was not intended to have the effect claimed and if, from its nature or from the time when, or the circumstances under which, it was done or made, it would be unreasonable to attribute such effect to it or when the party claiming to have been misled was aware of the facts which he now insists the other party should have told him, or could reasonably have been expected to learn the facts. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 404 (Pon. 2007).

Detrimental reliance is subsumed within estoppel. A party seeking to invoke the equitable estoppel doctrine must prove that 1) a defendant made representations or statements; 2) the plaintiff reasonably relied upon the representations; and 3) the plaintiff will be harmed if estoppel is not allowed. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. 2008).

To claim promissory estoppel a party must prove that 1) a promise was made; 2) the promisor should reasonably have expected the promise to induce actions of a definite and substantial character; 3) the promise did in fact induce such action; and 4) the circumstances require the enforcement of the promise to avoid injustice. Elements 3 and 4 are sometimes referred to collectively as "detrimental reliance." Detrimental reliance requires, at the very least, that a party has changed its position for the worse as a consequence of the defendant's purported misconduct. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. 2008).

When there is no evidence before the court that, if it were not for the employer's maintaining life insurance for the employees, the employee would have either quit his job and taken a job with a different employer that provided life insurance benefits or that he would have purchased his own life insurance policy from another source, the employee's widow cannot recover on a promissory estoppel or detrimental reliance theory since she cannot show that the employee relied on the employer's alleged promise to provide life insurance and her mere assertion, first made in her closing argument, that had they known they might have found another policy is insufficient to prove reliance. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. 2008).

Collateral estoppel prevents the land claimants from disputing, in this appeal, the existence of a kewosr transfer because collateral estoppel bars a party from relitigating an issue determined against that party in an earlier action, even if the second action differs significantly from the first one, and the court's 1997 decision between the same parties precludes the claimants from arguing that no kewosr transfer occurred or that the land could not have been transferred by kewosr. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 375 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in contract and quasi-contract cases involving equitable doctrines, such as promissory estoppel and restitution and the plaintiff may be compensated for the injuries by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the promise. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

A party seeking to invoke the equitable estoppel doctrine must prove that 1) a defendant made representations or statements; 2) the plaintiff reasonably relied upon the representations; and 3) the plaintiff will be harmed if estoppel is not allowed, and to claim promissory estoppel a party must prove that 1) a promise was made; 2) the promisor should reasonably have expected the promise to induce actions of a definite and substantial character; 3) the promise did in fact induce such action; and 4) the circumstances require the enforcement of the promise to avoid injustice. But a party asserting equitable estoppel against a government must prove more than is required when it is asserted against a private entity because the government may not be estopped on the same terms as any other litigant since another element must be established when a party asserts estoppel against the government – affirmative misconduct on the government's part. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

When Actouka relied on Chuuk's promises that the premium payments would be forthcoming and advanced the premium to keep the policy in force and it was reasonable for Actouka to rely on Chuuk's promise (especially in 1996) because Chuuk had always paid late in previous years (1988-95) and Chuuk should have expected that Actouka would keep the policy in force based on past performance and course of dealing; when enforcement of the promise would avoid the injustice that Actouka had to advance payment to keep the policy in force for the other governments operating FSM-owned ships and when Chuuk's affirmative misconduct was its misleading communications to Actouka that the premium money was available and that Actouka would be paid soon, equitable estoppel and detrimental reliance may apply. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

The running of a statute of limitations can be tolled – suspended – by certain events. A defendant's wrongful conduct can, as a form of estoppel, toll or suspend the running of a statute of limitations – for instance, a defendant would be estopped from raising a statute of limitations defense when, by his wrongful conduct, he induced the plaintiff not to sue until the statute of limitations had run out. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 252, 254 (Chk. 2012).

When it has not been shown, that the three-and-a-half-year time period, by itself, was an inexcusable delay and when it has not been shown, instead of merely speculating, that the delay has resulted in prejudice to the defendants, the defendants cannot be granted summary judgment on their laches defense and for the same reasons, they must also be denied summary judgment on their estoppel and waiver defense. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273 (Chk. 2012).

An estoppel and waiver affirmative defense requires a long non-assertion of one's rights by the plaintiff and the defendant's reliance on that non-assertion to its detriment, but there can be no estoppel when there is no prejudice to the party claiming it. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273-74 (Chk. 2012).

Under the doctrine of equitable estoppel, a person may sometimes be precluded by his act or conduct, or silence when he has a duty to speak, from asserting a right which he otherwise would have had, and this equitable doctrine will apply only when justice demands intervention on behalf of a person misled by the conduct of the party estopped. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

A party seeking to invoke the equitable estoppel doctrine must prove that 1) another party made representations or statements; 2) the party reasonably relied upon the representations; and 3) the party will be harmed if estoppel is not allowed. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

One essential element of equitable estoppel so far as the party to be estopped is concerned, is that he should have intended, or at least expected, that his conduct on which it is sought to predicate the estoppel should be acted upon by the other party or by other persons. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

The burden of proof is on the party alleging and relying on estoppel. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

Equitable estoppel is based on fraudulent conduct or fraudulent result. One must knowingly take a position with intention that it be acted upon, and reliance thereon by another to his prejudice. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

The application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel generally requires an express representation made by the party estopped and relied upon by another party who changes his position to his detriment. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

Estoppel is to be applied against wrongdoers, not the victim of a wrong. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

Since estoppel is an equitable remedy that may be invoked only by parties who themselves have acted properly concerning the subject of the litigation, a defendant cannot prevail on this defense when it behaved improperly by cashing checks made out to the plaintiff without the plaintiff's express authorization and when it did not reasonably rely on any statement by the plaintiff. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

Equitable estoppel has been defined simply as the familiar principle that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss, must sustain it. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

When the defendants must show detrimental reliance on the plaintiffs' waiver of exclusive possession of a town lot in order to establish the affirmative defense of equitable estoppel, the defendants' argument that burying a family member on the property in 2002 constituted detrimental reliance must fail because burying the family member on the property did not change the defendants' position to their detriment, and they fail to demonstrate that they buried him in reliance on the waiver from the plaintiffs. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 281 (Pon. 2014).

Injury, detriment, or prejudice to the party claiming the estoppel is one of the essential elements of an equitable estoppel. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 281 (Pon. 2014).

To claim promissory estoppel a party must prove that: 1) a promise was made; 2) the promisor should reasonably have expected the promise to induce actions of a definite and substantial character; 3) the promise did in fact induce such action; and 4) the circumstances require the enforcement of the promise to avoid injustice. Elements 3) and 4) are sometimes referred to collectively as "detrimental reliance." Misrepresentation, too, contains the elements of reasonable reliance and damages. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 358 (Pon. 2014).

The promises made by the insurer's agents bind the insurer and must be enforced in order to avoid manifest injustice because if the plaintiff had enrolled her daughter under a separate cancer policy, she would have been covered under her own policy, but instead, the agent's misrepresentation caused her to keep her daughter under her cancer policy, making the daughter ineligible at the time she was diagnosed with cancer because she did not qualify as a covered family member under that policy's provisions. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 359 (Pon. 2014).

A plaintiff's claim under a promissory estoppel and detrimental reliance cause of action is supported when the plaintiff has timely paid the insurance premiums since 1996; when her reasonable expectation was that she and her dependents would receive life and cancer insurance coverage; when she expected that, as an insured, that the insurer's agents would provide her with accurate and reliable information about the policies, which would include when a dependent is no longer covered and what steps to take when coverage has ceased; when the insurer did not fulfill these expectations, to the detriment of her and her dependents; and when, if the insurer had properly advised her, she would have had the opportunity to take out a separate cancer policy for her daughter and her daughter would have been eligible for cancer policy benefits once she was diagnosed with cancer in 2009. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 359-60 (Pon. 2014).

A claim that since the property is part of the late patriarch's estate and the state probate proceeding is still pending, the real property still belongs to this decedent, is belied by the fact that the decedent died on August 23, 1997, yet this did not prevent the defendants from pledging the property as collateral for a December 22, 1997 loan, or prevent, after the corporation's formation on October 20, 2004, the administratrix of this decedent's estate and the corporation's chairperson/president from notifying the bank on November 2, 2004, of the corporation's ownership of the subject real estate and businesses. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 103-04 (Chk. 2015).

A corporation, by having accepted the benefit of the contract, may be estopped to deny an officer's authority to act on its behalf. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104 (Chk. 2015).

To claim promissory estoppel a party must prove that 1) a promise was made; 2) the promisor should reasonably have expected the promise to induce actions of a definite and substantial character; 3) the promise did in fact induce such action; and 4) the circumstances require the enforcement of the promise to avoid injustice. Elements 3 and 4 are usually referred to collectively as "detrimental reliance," and detrimental reliance requires, at the very least, that a party has changed its position for the worse as a consequence of the defendant's purported misconduct. A finding of detrimental reliance does not depend upon finding any agreement or consideration. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 429 (App. 2016).

When the supposed "promise" might better be characterized as a careless misrepresentation, the plaintiff has failed to prove one of promissory estoppel's four elements. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 429 (App. 2016).

Estoppel is an equitable doctrine which may be invoked only by parties who themselves have acted properly concerning the subject matter of the litigation. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

Estoppel is to be applied against wrongdoers, not the victim of a wrong. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

Estoppel constitutes a doctrine which may be only be invoked by parties who themselves have acted properly concerning the subject matter of the litigation, and is a doctrine by which a person may be precluded by his act or conduct or silence, when it is his duty to speak. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 510 (App. 2016).

When, during a span of four plus years, the judgment debtors never even hinted that subject-matter jurisdiction was an unsettling issue and acquiesced to the trial court's rulings and implied a recognition of the judgment, the venerable legal concept of equitable estoppel applies since the judgment creditor relied on that conduct or more appropriately, lack thereof. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 511 (App. 2016).

Intentional misrepresentation, negligent misrepresentation, and promissory estoppel all contain elements of detrimental reliance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178 n.11 (Pon. 2017).

To claim promissory estoppel a party must prove that 1) a promise was made; 2) the promisor should reasonably have expected the promise to induce actions of a definite and substantial character; 3) the promise did in fact induce such action; and 4) the circumstances require the enforcement of the promise to avoid injustice. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 179 (Pon. 2017).

Since no estoppel can arise from an act or a representation if it was not intended to have the effect claimed and if, from its nature or from the time when, or the circumstances under which, it was done or made, it would be unreasonable to attribute such effect to it, and since the employee cannot show that his employer's alleged promise to him in 2008 was made with the intention that he take out a substantial home construction loan some three years later, (or some other action of a similar nature), his promissory estoppel claim must fail. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 179 (Pon. 2017).

If an importer, correctly reporting the types, quantities, and values of the dutiable goods, were to prove that it was affirmatively misled by customs officials to understate the amount of duty due, it may have an equitable estoppel claim against the government. Laxmi Enterprises v. FSM Dep't of Fin. & Admin., 21 FSM R. 601, 603 (Chk. 2018).

Appellate review of the equitable defenses of estoppel and waiver is similar to appellate review of a laches equitable defense since they are mixed questions of law and fact. An appellate court reviews an equitable estoppel defense for clear error for any factual findings and uses an abuse of discretion standard to review its application. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 616 (App. 2018).

The doctrines of laches and estoppel are closely allied. Laches is a form of equitable estoppel based on an unreasonable delay by a party in asserting a right. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

While laches focuses on the reasonableness of the plaintiff's delay in suit, equitable estoppel focuses on what the defendant reasonably has been led to believe from the plaintiff's conduct. While laches requires the passage of an unreasonable period of time in filing suit, estoppel does not. While estoppel requires reliance, laches generally does not. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

When there was no evidence, particularly undisputed evidence, that the plaintiffs' conduct led the defendants to reasonably believe or to rely on that conduct, summary judgment on an estoppel defense was inappropriate because a determination of estoppel generally involves questions of fact. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622-23 (App. 2018).

Generally, the equitable defense of laches is only available to a defendant when the plaintiff has sought some form of equitable relief and is not available as a defense against actions at law. Because an action on a judgment is an action at law, the equitable defense of laches is not available as a matter of law. The same is true for an estoppel defense. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

A helicopter owner will be estopped from asserting that the U.S. lacked jurisdiction or authority over the helicopter that it had registered with the U.S., and from asserting that it did not have to comply with the U.S.'s applicable regulations or U.S. aviation law. It should not now be able to assert that the U.S. has no jurisdiction over its helicopter when it registered that helicopter with the U.S. and maintained its U.S. registration thereafter and derived whatever benefits that the U.S. registration afforded. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 459 (Pon. 2020).

While it is true that parties cannot confer or divest a court of jurisdiction by stipulation or by assumption, a helicopter buyer who had to register that helicopter somewhere (some country) and chose to register it in the U.S., will be estopped from denying the U.S.'s regulatory authority over its helicopter. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 459 (Pon. 2020).

Equitable estoppel (and unclean hands) is based on the other party's alleged misrepresentation or misconduct, this ground for relief can only be sought through Rule 60(b)(3), and that rule, as noted above, has a one-year absolute time limit, and that time limit expired four and a half months before the defendant filed his motion. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 594-95 (Kos. 2020).

– Laches

Laches and estoppel are equitable doctrines which may be invoked only by parties who themselves have acted properly concerning the subject matter of the litigation. Ponape Transfer & Storage v. Federated Shipping Co., 3 FSM R. 174, 178 (Pon. 1987).

Although final judgment in a case has been entered by the Trust Territory High Court, because any effort by a party to have the High Court consider its own jurisdiction would have been futile, it is procedurally fair to later afford the party an opportunity to question that jurisdiction. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 118-19 (App. 1989).

Laches is a tool courts use to limit a party's rights when they have not been timely asserted, such that it is unfair for the court to now redress them. The period of time may be less than the statutory limitations period and each case must be judged on a case by case basis for fundamental fairness. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 155 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where there is a long delay in moving for certification of an issue and it appears the motion's sole purpose is to cause further delay, the doctrine of laches may bar the granting of the motion. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 335, 337-38 (Pon. 1992).

The elements of the equitable defense of laches include, at a minimum, inexcusable delay or lack of diligence by the plaintiff in bringing suit, and injury to the defendant from the plaintiff's inaction. For the delay to have been inexcusable, the plaintiff has to have known or had notice of the defendant's conduct giving rise to the cause of action and had an opportunity to bring suit. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (II), 6 FSM R. 180, 185-86 (Pon. 1993).

The equitable defense of laches is not available to a defendant who has not shown inexcusable delay by the plaintiff in bringing suit and injury to the defendant as a result. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (II), 6 FSM R. 180, 186 (Pon. 1993).

The basic elements of the doctrine of laches are 1) inexcusable delay or lack of diligence by the plaintiff in bringing suit, and 2) injury or prejudice to the defendant from plaintiff's delay. Delay is inexcusable when the plaintiff knew or had notice of defendant's conduct giving rise to plaintiff's cause of action, and had prior opportunity to bring suit. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 522 (Pon. 1994).

Where the plaintiff did know or should have known of defendants' claims for at least a decade, defendants should not have to be hauled into court to relitigate issues decided over ten years before because it is prejudicial to the defendants who had a reasonable right to assume that the TT High Court appellate decision had closed the matter in 1982. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 523 (Pon. 1994).

Although the doctrine of laches cannot be asserted against government land, where suit is prosecuted in the name of a government by a private individual laches may apply as a bar. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 523 (Pon. 1994).

The doctrine of adverse possession is unrelated to the defense of laches. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 176 n.8 (Pon. 1995).

The two elements to a laches defense are inexcusable delay or lack of diligence by a plaintiff in bringing suit, and injury or prejudice to the defendant from the plaintiff's delay. Inexcusable delay exists when plaintiff knew or had notice of the defendant's conduct which gave rise to plaintiff's cause of action, had an opportunity to bring suit, but failed to do so. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 177 (Pon. 1995).

The determination whether a plaintiff's delay in bringing suit is sufficient to justify the application of laches is made on a case by case basis. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 178 (Pon. 1995).

Where plaintiff inexcusably waited fifteen years after accrual of cause of action and prejudiced the state by allowing it to make substantial costly improvements the doctrine of laches will bar plaintiff's claims. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 178 (Pon. 1995).

The doctrine of laches may not be used as a defense against the government in an action brought by the government, but may be used as a defense by the government against a suit brought by a private party. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 179 (Pon. 1995).

A party whose conduct regarding the subject of the litigation is unconscionable, or its actions constitute deceit, fraud, or misrepresentation has unclean hands and thus may not invoke the equitable defense of laches. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 180 (Pon. 1995).

The equitable defense of laches and the statute of limitations are neither synonymous nor mutually exclusive. Unlike statutes of limitation, which forever bar an action after a fixed period of time, laches depends upon considerations of fairness, justice, and equity, and is invoked when the applicable statute of limitations has not yet expired. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 181 (Pon. 1995).

Laches and the statute of limitations are two different defenses. The statue of limitations defense has only one element – the passage of a specific statutory amount of time while the equitable defense of laches has two elements – the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Laches is always applied separate from and irrespective of the statute of limitations. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 489 (App. 1996).

Laches is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the elements of laches have been established in any particular case is one of fact depending on the circumstances, and calls for the exercise of a sound discretion by the trial court. But whether, in view of the established facts, relief is to be denied–that is, whether it would be inequitable or unjust to the defendant to enforce the complainant's right–is a question of law. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 489 (App. 1996).

An abuse of discretion standard is used to review whether the elements of laches have been established, but the question of law – whether it would be inequitable or unjust to the defendant to enforce the complainant's right is reviewed de novo. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 489 (App. 1996).

In order for a plaintiff to be charged with inexcusable delay or lack of diligence the plaintiff must have had knowledge of the facts that gave rise to his claim. Ordinarily, actual knowledge on the part of the complainant is necessary in order to charge him with laches. However, knowledge may in some circumstances be imputed to him by reason of opportunity to acquire knowledge, or where it appears he could have informed himself of the facts by the exercise of reasonable diligence, or where the circumstances were such as to put a man of ordinary prudence on inquiry. Ordinary prudence depends on the particular circumstances of the case. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 490 (App. 1996).

A plaintiff inexcusably delays in bringing suit when he was aware of or should have been aware of, the state's control and use of the land that had not been given over to his control and for which he had received no payment for at least fifteen years during which he could have brought suit against the state or its predecessor in interest. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 490 (App. 1996).

Delay alone does not constitute laches. Even lengthy delay does not eliminate the prejudice prong of the laches test, but the longer the delay the less need there is to show, or search for, specific prejudice, and the greater the shift to the plaintiff of the task of demonstrating lack of prejudice. The test of laches is prejudice to the other party. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 490 (App. 1996).

There are two types of prejudice that may stem from delay in filing suit. The adverse party may be unable to mount a defense because of loss of records, destruction of evidence, missing witnesses, and the like, or the prejudice may be economic. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 490 (App. 1996).

The doctrine of laches is applied only where it would be inequitable to allow a person making a belated claim to prevail. Each case is governed chiefly by its own circumstances. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 491 (App. 1996).

Generally, a party who has failed to act properly – a party who has "unclean hands" – cannot invoke an equitable doctrine such as laches. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 491 (App. 1996).

Where public lands are involved laches cannot be used as a defense against the government, but the government may use laches as a defense against another who seeks to claim public lands. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 491 (App. 1996).

Laches is a plaintiff's inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 65 (Chk. 1997).

The defenses of estoppel, unclean hands and laches are all equitable defenses which do not apply in actions sounding in personal injury. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 193 (Pon. 1997).

An officer's authority to contract for a corporation may be actual or apparent, and may result from the officer's conduct and the acquiescence thereto by the directors. The corporation may be estopped to deny the officer's authority by having accepted the benefit of the contract. Generally, an officer's authority to act for his corporation with reference to contracts is a question of fact to be determined by the trier of fact. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Generally, the laches defense is meant to prevent injustice as to a person against whom one seeks to assert rights where the one asserting the rights has slept on those rights. Thus, laches at a minimum comprehends an inexcusable delay in bringing suit, and prejudice to the defendant as a result. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 501 (Pon. 1998).

The doctrine of laches or stale demand is whereby the owner after the lapse of time is deprived of his interests because he has not exercised proper diligence in protecting his rights in court. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

Laches involves two factors, 1) inexcusable delay or lack of diligence by the plaintiff in bringing suit, and 2) injury or prejudice to the defendant from plaintiff's delay. A predicate to reliance on the doctrine of laches is that he who would invoke it must have clean hands, and must have acted properly concerning the subject matter of the litigation. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 78 (Kos. 1999).

A defendant who has had the benefit of the goods which he received without paying for them is precluded from relying on the doctrine of laches as a defense to a suit for payment. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 78 (Kos. 1999).

Both res judicata and laches are affirmative defenses and must be asserted in responsive pleading. If affirmative defenses are not raised in the answer or other responsive pleading, the defenses are waived. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 94 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The doctrine of laches applies to the actual filing of a claim rather than to any inaction that might arise following the initiation of a legal proceeding. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Since laches is an equitable defense, it is only available to a defendant when a plaintiff seeks some form of equitable relief. It is not a valid defense to an action brought solely at law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 605, 607 (Chk. 2000).

The doctrine of laches is applied only where it would be inequitable to allow a person making a belated claim to prevail. Each case is governed chiefly by its own circumstances. The equitable defense of laches has two elements: the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Laches is always applied separate from and irrespective of the statute of limitations. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 613 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

In determining whether to apply laches, the resulting prejudice to the defendant is explored first. There are two types of prejudice that may stem from delay in filing suit. The adverse party may be unable to mount a defense because of loss of records, destruction of evidence, missing witnesses, and the like, or the prejudice may be economic. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 613 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A predicate to reliance on the doctrine of laches is that he who would invoke it must have clean hands, and must have acted properly concerning the subject matter of the litigation. Generally, a party who has failed to act properly a party who has "unclean hands" cannot invoke an equitable doctrine such as laches. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 613 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When two Directors of Education failed to act properly by not acting upon the plaintiff's grievance and not making a written finding on plaintiff's grievance, as required by regulation, the State cannot invoke the equitable doctrine of laches in its defense. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 613 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a plaintiff has acted expeditiously to notify a defendant of his trespass as soon as the defendant began construction on the land, there has been no unreasonable delay prejudicing the defendant which could give rise to a laches defense. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 188 (Pon. 2001).

Laches and the statute of limitations are two different defenses. The statute of limitations defense has only one element, which is the passage of a specific statutorily set amount of time. The equitable defense of laches has two elements. One element is the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and the other element is the resulting prejudice to the defendant. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

Unlike statutes of limitation, which bar an action after a fixed period of time, laches depends upon considerations of fairness, justice, and equity, and is invoked when the applicable statute of limitations has not yet passed. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

There is a two part standard of review for a laches defense since laches is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the elements of laches have been established is a factual determination which depends upon the case's circumstances, and calls for an appellate court to apply an abuse of discretion standard of review. But whether, in view of the established facts, it would be equitable or unjust to the defendant to enforce the complainant's right is a question of law that is reviewed de novo. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

There was no abuse of discretion by the trial court in finding that the state had not satisfied the laches requirement of showing prejudice due to the passage of time before the plaintiff brought his action when any resulting prejudice due to a witness's death was not significant as other pertinent records and witnesses still existed and because there was no resulting prejudice to the state in light of its joint stipulation of facts and documents. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

The equitable doctrine of laches cannot be invoked when a party has failed to act properly or is said to have "unclean hands." Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

When a state employee did not engage in inexcusable delay or a lack of diligence in bringing suit, as the delay was caused by his engaging the administrative grievance process and waiting for the state's required response, and when the state, by its own inaction on the employee's claims, was not in compliance with the applicable regulation and statute, failed to act properly with regard to his grievance, the state, being the cause of the delay, cannot invoke the equitable doctrine of laches. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

Laches and failure to mitigate damages are not grounds on which to grant summary judgment when a sufficient factual basis to support either ground has not yet been developed. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127 (Chk. 2005).

Laches has two elements – the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Laches is always applied separate from and irrespective of the statute of limitations. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 18 (App. 2006).

When a party has not shown why the delay was inexcusable or how it was prejudiced by the delay, its assertions of laches and estoppel are without merit. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 18 (App. 2006).

The basic elements of the doctrine of laches are 1) inexcusable delay or lack of diligence by the plaintiff in bringing suit, and 2) injury or prejudice to the defendant from plaintiff's delay. Delay is inexcusable when the plaintiff knew or had notice of the defendant's conduct giving rise to the plaintiff's cause of action, and had prior opportunity to bring suit. The doctrine of laches or stale demand applies to deprive an owner of his interests after the lapse of time because he has not exercised proper diligence in protecting his rights in court. It is an affirmative defense that is raised at the time an answer is filed by a defendant or else is usually considered waived. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The question of prejudice to the other party is usually treated as a question of law and reviewed de novo on appeal. The longer the delay, the less need there is to show specific prejudice and the greater the shift to the other party to demonstrate the lack of prejudice. When a party developed the property and treated it as their own for over 50 years, the passing of witnesses and the loss of their testimony is prejudicial to them. The prejudice is economic as well, from the loss of their efforts in maintaining and developing the property during this time. With a delay of 50 years, the burden shifts to the other party to demonstrate lack of prejudice. The criteria of prejudice is met. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15

FSM R. 294, 299-300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The length of the delay is a factor in laches, too. The twenty-year statute of limitations establishes one clear limit to the time allowed for bringing a claim, but laches is a separate analysis. Both address the concern that after the passage of a length of time, a person loses the opportunity to assert their rights. When over 50 years have passed, if this is not enough time to allow someone to assert a claim of ownership to land, it is difficult to set forth what length of time is sufficient. The Land Court did not abuse its discretion when it treated the claim of ownership as stale after 50 years. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Laches is another equitable doctrine that is applied to bar relitigation of cases. Laches requires the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and the resulting prejudice to the defendant. Laches depends upon considerations of fairness, justice, and equity, and is invoked when the applicable statute of limitations has not yet passed. But when the statute of limitations passed on a claim, the question of laches will not be addressed. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 322 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A borrower's laches defense will fail when the borrower has had the use of a blast freezer securing the loan the whole time since 1998 without making any payment on the loan because the equitable doctrine of laches cannot be invoked when a party has failed to act properly or is said to have "unclean hands" regarding the litigation's subject matter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Chuuk Fresh Tuna, Inc., 16 FSM R. 335, 338 (Chk. 2009).

Laches is the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, which results in prejudice to the defendant. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 538 (Chk. 2011).

When the defendant became an employer in Chuuk sometime during 2009 and when this suit, after some initial contact and some failed negotiations between the parties during 2010, was filed in December 2010, the court can conclude that, as a matter of law, this was not an inexcusable delay. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 538 (Chk. 2011).

Since laches is an equitable defense, it is available to a defendant only when a plaintiff seeks some form of equitable relief and is not a valid defense to an action brought solely at law, such as this suit for unpaid statutory health insurance premiums which is an action at law. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 538 (Chk. 2011).

The elements of a laches defense are the plaintiff's inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273 (Chk. 2012).

Whether the elements of laches have been established in any particular case is one of fact depending on the circumstances, and calls for the trial court's exercise of a sound discretion. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273 (Chk. 2012).

When it has not been shown, that the three-and-a-half-year time period, by itself, was an inexcusable delay and when it has not been shown, instead of merely speculating, that the delay has resulted in prejudice to the defendants, the defendants cannot be granted summary judgment on their laches defense and for the same reasons, they must also be denied summary judgment on their estoppel and waiver defense. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273 (Chk. 2012).

Generally, the equitable defense of laches is only available to a defendant when the plaintiff has sought some form of equitable relief and is not available as a defense against actions at law. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 362 (App. 2012).

Laches has two elements – the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 362 (App. 2012).

Since conversion is an action at law, laches is not a defense that can be used against a conversion claim. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 362 (App. 2012).

Even if it were a permissible defense, laches cannot be applied when there was no inexcusable delay. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 362 (App. 2012).

In the Kosrae State Court, both res judicata and laches are affirmative defenses that must be asserted in responsive pleadings, and, if affirmative defenses are not raised in the answer or other responsive pleading, the defenses are waived. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 67 (App. 2016).

The equitable doctrine of laches is usually invoked only when the applicable statutory limitations period has not yet run, and not only depends upon considerations of fairness, justice, and equity, but also cannot be invoked when the party raising it has failed to act properly or is said to have "unclean hands." Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 580-81 (App. 2018).

Laches is rarely subject to summary judgment, and can rarely be resolved without some preliminary evidentiary inquiry. Generally, when a defendant asserts the laches defense, a full hearing of testimony on both sides of the issue is required. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

An appellate court uses a two-part standard to review a laches defense since it is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the elements of laches have been established in any particular case is a factual determination which depends upon the circumstances, and calls for us to apply an abuse of discretion standard of review. But whether, in view of the established facts, it would be equitable or unjust to the defendant to enforce the complainant's right is a question of law that is reviewed de novo. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 616 (App. 2018).

The equitable doctrine of laches is usually invoked only when the applicable statutory limitations period has not yet run, and not only depends upon considerations of fairness, justice, and equity, but it also cannot be invoked when the party raising it has failed to act properly or is said to have "unclean hands." Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

Laches is rarely subject to summary judgment, and can rarely be resolved without some preliminary evidentiary inquiry. Generally, when a defendant asserts a laches defense, a full hearing of testimony on both sides of the issue is required. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

Summary judgment (or dismissal) on a laches ground is particularly inappropriate when the plaintiffs' allegations, on their face, do not show that the plaintiffs neglected to or delayed in asserting their claims once they learned that another claimed to be the sole landowner and when there was no evidentiary inquiry in the trial court, although the case required one to prove the laches defense. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

The doctrines of laches and estoppel are closely allied. Laches is a form of equitable estoppel based on an unreasonable delay by a party in asserting a right. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

While laches focuses on the reasonableness of the plaintiff's delay in suit, equitable estoppel focuses on what the defendant reasonably has been led to believe from the plaintiff's conduct. While laches requires the passage of an unreasonable period of time in filing suit, estoppel does not. While estoppel requires reliance, laches generally does not. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

For an independent action for relief, no statute of limitations would apply because there is no time limit on when an independent action may be brought, but the doctrine of laches is applicable and undue delay can bar relief. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 (Pon. 2019).

Laches is an important consideration in bankruptcy proceedings because the chief purpose of the bankruptcy laws is to secure a prompt and effectual administration of and settlement of the estate of all bankrupts within a limited period. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 (Pon. 2019).

Generally, the equitable defense of laches is only available to a defendant when the plaintiff has sought some form of equitable relief and is not available as a defense against actions at law. Because an action on a judgment is an action at law, the equitable defense of laches is not available as a matter of law. The same is true for an estoppel defense. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

– Waiver

When an individual claiming an interest in land has no prior knowledge of an impending transaction of other parties concerning that land, his failure to forewarn those parties of his claim cannot be interpreted as a knowing waiver of his rights. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 418 (Pon. 1984).

Express or implied waiver, to be effective, must be the knowing, intentional and voluntary relinquishment of a known legal right. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

Waiver is the relinquishment of a known right, either by action or words, which rests upon the equitable principle that one will not be permitted to act contrary to his former position when to do so results in detriment to another. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 510, 513 (Pon. 2002).

Rescission is equitable in nature, just as waiver is. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 510, 513 (Pon. 2002).

For a party with "unclean hands," the equitable defense of waiver (as opposed to a contractual waiver) is insufficient as a matter of law. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

Appellate review of the equitable defenses of estoppel and waiver is similar to appellate review of a laches equitable defense since they are mixed questions of law and fact. An appellate court reviews an equitable estoppel defense for clear error for any factual findings and uses an abuse of discretion standard to review its application. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 616 (App. 2018).

The issue of waiver is a mixed question of law and fact for which an appellate court uses a de novo review for the law and the clearly erroneous standard for the facts. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 616 (App. 2018).

Waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right. Ordinarily, the question of waiver is one of fact. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

A waiver must be voluntary, which implies knowledge of the right, claim, or thing waived and that the plaintiffs knew they were waiving that right. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

Waiver of a right or privilege is not presumed. Waivers of rights are inherently suspect, and will not be inferred from doubtful and ambiguous factors. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

When the documentary evidence in the pleadings does not show that there is no genuine issue about whether all of the plaintiffs voluntarily and intentionally relinquished their known right to registered title to the parcel, summary judgment that waiver barred the plaintiffs' claim was inappropriate. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

ESCHEAT

Unclaimed balances of judgments paid into court may escheat to the government. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 371, 375 (Pon. 1996).

At least two Micronesian legislatures have considered some form of escheat suited for application in the FSM. Congress has enacted a limited escheat statute concerning the proceeds from property found in an unclaimed shipwreck. The Pohnpei Legislature has enacted a more general escheat statute concerning the real and personal property of an intestate who die without heirs. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 672 (App. 1996).

Escheat of property, as is property law in general, is primarily a state power. Therefore, based on the inherent power of the court in the absence of an applicable statute, any funds paid into court left unclaimed after the twenty-year statute of limitations has run will escheat to the state. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 673 (App. 1996).

EVIDENCE

An actor's intention must be inferred from what he says and what he does. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 24-25 (Pon. 1981).

The FSM Supreme Court is vested, by statute, with authority to suppress or exclude, evidence obtained by unlawful search and seizure. 12 F.S.M.C. 312. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 92 (Pon. 1982).

When a purported state employment contract erroneously and consistently recites that it is between the employee and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and contains other statements demonstrating that the contract words were not taken seriously and did not comport with reality, the document is unpersuasive evidence of the relationships among the employee, the state, and the national government. Manahane v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 161, 165-67 (Pon. 1982).

As a matter of constitutional due process, a trial court presented with an alibi defense should consider evidence concerning the alibi along with all other evidence and shall not find the defendant guilty if after considering all of that evidence, the judge feels there is a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 223-25 (App. 1982).

Unsubstantiated speculations raised after trial are not sufficient to raise reasonable doubt as to a person's guilt in the light of eyewitness testimony. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 225-27 (App. 1982).

The existence of plea negotiations says little to the court about defendant's actual guilt. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 483 (Kos. 1984).

When there is sufficient evidence of other force in the record to support a conviction for forces sexual penetration, there is no inconsistency in finding the use of force even without ruling that a knife compelled the victim to submit. Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 494 (App. 1984).

It is not unreasonable for a trial court to conclude that a police officer, claiming to effect an arrest, who hits a person four times with a mangrove coconut husker and kills him was trying to kill him. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 576 (App. 1984).

Death and the cause of death can be shown by circumstantial evidence. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 577 (App. 1984).

It is generally recognized by courts that nonmedical persons may be capable of recognizing when someone is intoxicated. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 33 n.3 (App. 1985).

An affidavit unsupported by factual detail is not sufficient to cast doubt on the proposition that a project manager of a joint venture, who is in charge of all activities of a corporate member of the joint venture within a state, is a managing or general agent of that corporation. Luda v. Maeda Road Constr. Co., 2 FSM R. 107, 110 (Pon. 1985).

That a land commission's determination is not sufficiently supported by either reasoning or evidence furnishes "good cause" to permit the reviewing court to conduct its own evidentiary proceeding. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 395, 398 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

In adopting the rules of evidence used by the United States federal courts, the Kosrae State Court also adopted the reasons for those rules and the case law which interprets them, insofar as those are appropriate for Kosrae. Nena v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 502, 506 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

A request for admission as to the genuineness of a letter, excludable as evidence under Kosrae Evidence Rule 408 because it relates to settlement negotiations, is reasonably calculated to lead to evidence which could be admissible, and an objecting party may not obtain a protective order pursuant to Kosrae Civil Rule 26 to avoid responding to the request. Nena v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 502, 507 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

An inference is not permitted if it cannot reasonably be drawn from the facts in evidence. Este v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 132, 138 (App. 1989).

In a contempt trial, the trial court may consider information in addition to evidence adduced in the contempt hearing itself when the other information came to the knowledge of the trial court in previous judicial hearings related to the matter which gave rise to the contempt charge, and when the judge identified the "outside" information and gave the defendant an opportunity to object but the defendant failed to do so. Semes v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 49, 52 (App. 1991).

The trier of fact determines what should be accepted as the truth and what should be rejected as untrue or false, and in doing so is free to select from conflicting evidence, and inferences that which it considers most reasonable. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Evidence that a customary adoption has taken place may be offered via affidavits from the natural parents of the child, consenting and attesting to the customary adoption. In re Marquez, 5 FSM R. 381, 384 (Pon. 1992).

Generally, a breach of duty is proven by the testimony of witnesses who describe what a reasonable person, acting in compliance with the duty of care, would have done or not done in the same situation. In rare circumstances when the facts are indisputable and when they raise such a strong inference that all reasonable people agree on the duty of care, the court can decide, as a matter of law, the person has breached his duty of care. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

It is error for a trial court to rely on exhibits never identified, described or marked at trial. Waguk v. Kosrae Island Credit Union, 6 FSM R. 14, 18 (App. 1993).

Where exhibits are identified and marked at trial but never introduced, and where there is extensive testimony and cross examination of witnesses concerning the contents of these exhibits except for interest and late charges, an award for interest and late charges must be deleted because it is not supported by testimony. Waguk v. Kosrae Island Credit Union, 6 FSM R. 14, 18 (App. 1993).

Unless a malfunction is alleged or proven, the printout of a functioning Global Positioning System unit will be presumed correct as to a ship's position regardless of assertions to the contrary. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (II), 6 FSM R. 159, 164-65 (Pon. 1993).

If a judge does not specifically rely on the objected to evidence, the appellate court must presume that he did not rely on that evidence and therefore that any error in admitting the evidence did not result in substantial hardship or prejudice to a party. Nakamura v. Bank of Guam (II), 6 FSM R. 345, 349 (App. 1994).

Where there is no indication that the trial court relied on certain evidence, the presumption is there was no such reliance, and any error in its admission is not prejudicial. Nakamura v. Bank of Guam (II), 6 FSM R. 345, 351 (App. 1994).

The presumption that a written contract that is complete on its face embodies the final and entire agreement between the parties may be rebutted by evidence presented at trial. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 384 (Pon. 1994).

Representations of counsel in a probable cause hearing are not a substitute for competent, reliable evidence in the form of testimony or appropriately detailed affidavits. FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 305 (Kos. 1995).

A court cannot infer that someone attended a hearing because they might have attended another hearing that might have taken place an hour beforehand at the same place. Palik v. Henry, 7 FSM R. 571, 575 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

The issue of the court's jurisdiction to try a case is a preliminary matter that the accused, by testifying upon, does not subject himself to cross-examination as to other issues in the case. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

Proof of guilt may be by either direct evidence, circumstantial evidence or both. Direct evidence is evidence, which if believed, proves the existence of facts in issue without inference or presumption. Circumstantial evidence is evidence of facts and circumstances from which the existence or nonexistence of facts in issue may be inferred. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 171 (Pon. 1997).

An appellate court will not reweigh the evidence presented at trial. Credibility determinations are uniquely the province of the factfinder, not the appellate court. Johnny v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 203, 207 (App. 1997).

It is not a manifest error of fact requiring a new trial that certain evidence that parties felt was compelling was not recited in the court's decision or given the weight they thought proper, when the parties were afforded a full hearing and the court considered all evidence on the record in reaching its decision. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 215, 217 (Pon. 1997).

A court may suppress evidence obtained by an unlawful search and seizure. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 268 (Chk. 1998).

Any reliance on the contents of a further investigation that have never been a part of the record is improper. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 172 (App. 1999).

It is improper for counsel to argue facts only within the counsel's knowledge and not in the record. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 172 (App. 1999).

Any reliance on a "proposed disposition" to prove the respondent attorney's misconduct is improper when the respondent attorney's statements show that any admissions of misconduct were only for the purpose of the reviewing justice's approval of the proposed disposition and if it was not accepted, the respondent attorney would have to call defense witnesses. Such equivocation is not an admission of professional misconduct. It is thus inadmissible under FSM Evidence Rules 410 and 408, which bar the admission of pleas, plea discussions, and related statements and compromises and offers to settle, respectively. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 172 (App. 1999).

When no party raised a best evidence objection about two checks during the trial, when the trial court did not preclude or limit the introduction of evidence about either check, when both checks were involved in much of the testimony offered by the plaintiff and both also formed the subject of direct examination testimony by defense witnesses, when the trial judge himself questioned defense witnesses at length concerning the two checks, and when defense witnesses acknowledged both checks' existence, their amounts and that they were made out to the plaintiff, the trial court cannot be said to have applied the "best evidence" rule, which is exclusionary in character, and requires the production of originals unless specified exceptions are met. Tulensru v. Wakuk, 10 FSM R. 128, 133 (App. 2001).

The weight to be accorded admissible evidence is for the trier of fact to determine. Tulensru v. Wakuk, 10 FSM R. 128, 134 (App. 2001).

Rule 59 provides a means for relief in cases in which a party has been unfairly made the victim of surprise, but relief will be denied if the party failed to seek a continuance. Surprise, along with excusable neglect, is also addressed by Rule 60(b)(1). Thus, if a party is surprised at trial he is amply protected by Rules 59(a) and 60(b). Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 383 (Pon. 2001).

A party may not derive benefit post trial from tendering evidence that which he was under a discovery obligation to produce pre-trial, and did not. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 385 (Pon. 2001).

When a sketch proffered to the appellate court, even if it had been admitted at trial, would not have been enough to demonstrate that a trial court's factual finding was clearly erroneous, the factual finding must stand. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 544 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When the plaintiff's complaint claimed he performed "over 714 hours of overtime work," the defendant was given notice of the plaintiff's overtime claims. The defendant thus cannot exclude evidence that the plaintiff worked 1184.5 overtime hours, and the plaintiff does not need to amend his complaint, because 1184.5 hours is more than 714 hours. Palsis v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 551, 552 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the alleged defect in the kerosene resulted from the contamination of the product, and not its design, logic dictates that the plaintiff must show a high degree of similarity between the accident in this case and the accidents in the other cases before the other accidents will be admitted on the question of the dangerous condition of the allegedly contaminated product. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583 (Pon. 2002).

Speculation, guess and surmise may not be substituted for competent evidence, and where there are several possible causes of one accident, one or more of which a defendant is not responsible for, a plaintiff cannot recover without proving that the injury was sustained wholly or in part by a cause for which the defendant was responsible. William v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 584, 587 (Pon. 2002).

The court is required to receive satisfactory evidence that custom or tradition applies to a case, before utilizing it. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 26, 30 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A trial court's errors in admitting or excluding evidence are not grounds for reversal when the appellants have not explained what the evidence would have shown had it been admitted and how this evidence would or could have changed the court's decision because error in admitting or excluding evidence is not ground for vacating judgment unless refusal to do so is inconsistent with substantial justice. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 216 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Authentic school and hospital documents, which reflect the correct birth date of a petitioner may be used to establish the petitioner's correct birth date. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 301, 302 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An appellate ruling that only determined that certain testimony was admissible did not instruct the trial court as to what weight to give his testimony or what inferences it must draw from it on remand. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 454, 458 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When in discovery responses the amount of the plaintiffs' damages was stated as slightly more than the amount actually proven at trial, the invoices offered and received into evidence at trial establish by a preponderance of the evidence the amount of plaintiffs' damages. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 241-42 (Pon. 2003).

The court's pretrial order did not prevent the bank from adequately defending on the question of damages when all witnesses specified in the bank's pretrial statement whose testimony summaries indicated that they had testimony to offer relevant to the question of damages were permitted to testify. Further, when the bank did not object before trial to the court's limitation of its damages witnesses, it waived any objection in this regard. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 242 (Pon. 2003).

In order to prove lost rental damages, a business should be prepared to show that all other similar available vehicles were rented and that the had to turn away customers who would otherwise had rented the damaged pickup, and the number of days it would have been rented. A long-term, ongoing business might show this by comparing the average of the total rental days of all pickups combined for each month before the pickup was damaged with the average total rental days for each month after the accident. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

Under the traditional "new business rule," which applies to any business without a history of profits, it has been recognized that evidence of expected profits from a new business is too speculative, uncertain, and remote to be considered and does not meet the legal standard of reasonable certainty. But lost profits can be recovered by a new business when it is possible to show, by competent evidence and with reasonable certainty, that profits would have been made in the particular situation, and the amount of those profits. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

When the boundary claimed by appellants was supported by testimony of a neutral observer and the appellees' was based only on their testimony, the Land Court decision, which accepted the appellees' boundary claim was not based upon substantial evidence. Heirs of Noda v. Heirs of Joseph, 13 FSM R. 21, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there was no evidence presented to the Land Court regarding the parties' acceptance of the river as the boundary between their parcels, but the Land Court relied upon an alleged settlement between the parties which was never presented or accepted as evidence at the hearing, the Land Court decision which determined the river as the boundary was not based upon substantial evidence. Heirs of Noda v. Heirs of Joseph, 13 FSM R. 21, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the parties' settlement to divide the islands in the swampy area such that each party is owner of two islands was accepted into evidence at the Land Court hearing, but was not reflected in the Land Court decision, that decision regarding the swampy area, was not based upon substantial evidence. Heirs of Noda v. Heirs of Joseph, 13 FSM R. 21, 23-24 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Representations of counsel at a hearing are not a substitute for competent, reliable evidence in the form of testimony or detailed affidavits. Counsel's statements constitute only argument of counsel and are not evidence. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A certified map is conclusive only as to the location and boundaries of the land within it. It is not conclusive as to the boundaries and locations of other parcels of land, although it may be some evidence. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99f (Chk. 2004).

Evidence first introduced in response to questioning by the trial judge during defendant's closing argument was not properly in evidence before the trial court as it was made during the closing arguments and such statements were not made under oath, not subject to cross-examination, and not subject to any rebuttal testimony by any witness. Argument does not constitute evidence. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 144 (App. 2005).

When the trial court's assessment of restitution damages was specifically calculated using a figure based on a statement made during closing argument, it was not supported by evidence properly before the trial court. As such, the amount of restitution assessed by the trial court is clearly erroneous and must be vacated and the case remanded to the trial court to determine the amount of restitution based on the evidence properly before it or to hold a further evidentiary hearing on the issue. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 144-45 (App. 2005).

When the plaintiff tendered receipts for the equipment rental, but the receipts were not original documents, nor copies of the originals: the receipts had been reconstructed recently for the purpose of the hearing, the receipts were not accepted into evidence. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 206, 208 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When at trial of the matter, the defendant had argued that only 25% of the excavated fill materials had met specifications and had actually been hauled to the road project site, but, at the hearing held on April 14, 2005, did not present any evidence in support of this argument, the plaintiff is entitled to restitution for the market value of all the materials excavated from the quarry. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 206, 208 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the Plaintiff seeks as a component of restitution, ground rent for his quarry and argues that ground rent is "normally compensated in similar contracts," but did not present any evidence during the June 2003 trial nor at the April 14, 2005 hearing in support of his claim for ground rent and did not offer any "similar contracts" to establish that ground rent is "normally compensated" for the use of land for a quarry, the plaintiff's request for restitution for ground rent must be denied. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 206, 208 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the defendants had the burden of proof to establish their claim for damages in an amount different than that presented by the plaintiffs, but failed to present any witnesses or other evidence to contradict or modify the calculations presented by the plaintiffs, the court cannot jump to an inference when the underlying testimony does not support the inference. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 249, 251 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When an unrepresented party made statements as a preamble to the questions he posed to another claimant, the Land Court, recognizing that the claimants were lay persons and not trained in legal hearing procedures, should have provided instructions that cross-examination is limited to asking questions of the witness. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Since it is error for a court to rely upon evidence never presented at a hearing or trial, the Land Court's reference in its decision to statements not in evidence properly before it was contrary to law. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The weight to be accorded admissible evidence is for the trier of fact to determine. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 30 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the defendant argued that the court should recognize custom regarding the relationship between him and the victim, but did not present any evidence of the relationship between victim and him, and did not present any evidence of custom, specifically evidence that due to the relationship between victim and the defendant, it would be customary for the defendant to show up drunk at a relative's home and commit a battery upon the relative, the court may not utilize tradition in reaching a decision because it has not received satisfactory evidence of the tradition. When a defendant has not provided any evidence of custom or tradition, it cannot be considered. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 30-31 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When there was undisputed evidence presented of the defendant's performance of other physical activity, the court can infer that the defendant's ailments did permit the defendant to complete a variety of activities requiring movement of his arms, legs and body, and did not affect his performance of the field sobriety tests. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 122 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When it is undisputed that a public road is a public place and that the defendant was carrying and possessing an open beer can on the public road, the court can draw the inference from the facts in evidence that the open beer can possessed by the defendant on the public road was an open beer can containing beer, which is an alcoholic drink. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 122 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Kosrae Rules of Evidence do not require corroboration of undisputed testimony. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 125 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Even assuming that the photos not admitted would have shown that the defendant was not at fault in the accident, that would have had no bearing on his state of intoxication because even if the other driver were 100% at fault, there is no question that the defendant was driving a vehicle, and he would still have been subject to conviction under the driving under the influence statute if he were driving that vehicle while under the influence. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 127 (App. 2007).

It was not error to exclude photos from evidence when the probative value of the photos of an accident scene taken some months after the accident, and without the vehicles present, is negligible. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 127 (App. 2007).

Japanese survey maps, alone, contain no assurance of who should be shown as owners as they were primarily concerned with boundaries. The survey maps are some evidence of ownership, but that there must be substantial evidence to support the decision of ownership. Testimony from many witnesses to determine that the appellees controlled and used the land from over ten to fifteen years prior to the survey map through the time of filing claims, in excess of fifty years, is substantial evidence. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The burden of proving custom and tradition relies on the party asserting its effect. When both parties were specifically given the opportunity to offer such evidence, but neither party took that opportunity, the court correctly concluded that no Kosraean customary transfer or acquisition of land could be considered because no party offered evidence. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 298-99 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the Land Court findings consist of testimony of a number of witnesses of a family's undisputed use, control and development of the parcel without interference for over 50 years and that family continues to do so today, the Land Court finding was based on substantial evidence to support the family's ownership, even though another's name was on the Japanese survey map and when considering the evidence in a light favorable to the appellees, the appellants, the Land Court's decision was not clearly erroneous. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The application of the Kosrae Rules of Evidence is expressly excluded from proceedings with respect to release on bail. Nedlic v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 435, 438 (App. 2007).

A defendant's suppressed statement may not be used against him at trial unless he chooses to testify on his own behalf, in which case, the statement may be used to impeach his credibility. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

The trial court used a co-defendant's pre-trial, out-of-court affidavit only against the declarant since the judge's discourses with the prosecutor stated that it was only being offered or used against the declarant and the trial court's made specific findings with regard to the affidavit that only concerned the declarant co-defendant and since the court's special findings delineated other pieces of evidence, independent of that affidavit, that supported the other defendants' participation in the conspiracy. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 556-57 (App. 2008).

The best practice for a trial court finding itself in the situation where a non-testifying defendant's out-of-court statement will be introduced into evidence in a joint or multi-defendant trial, is to make an early, clear and uniform record identifying those defendants against whom the out-of-court statement will and will not be used. A trial court is not generally prohibited from admitting the statement. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 557 (App. 2008).

When the record was uniform in signifying that the trial court did not consider one co-defendant's affidavit against the other defendants and when the trial court, in its special findings made at the trial's conclusion identified the other pieces of admitted evidence that it relied upon and that exist independent of the one co-defendant's affidavit; when a review of this specifically relied upon evidence, in addition to the complete record on appeal, presents a sufficient evidentiary basis to support the other defendants' participation in the conspiracy wholly independent of and detached from the one co-defendant's affidavit, the appellate court will conclude that the trial court was successful in excluding the one co-defendant's affidavit as evidence against the other defendants. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 557 (App. 2008).

When the trial court asked the government to redact the other defendants' names from one co-defendant's affidavit but no redacted version offered into evidence, and when a physical redaction under these circumstances would have been superfluous, merely replicating the mental exercise of compartmentalizing already successfully undertaken by the trial court, if the trial court proceeded with the trial despite the government's failure to provide a redacted copy of the statement, that choice was within the trial court's discretion and did not unfairly result in substantial hardship or prejudice to any party and thus was not reversible error. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 557-58 (App. 2008).

If challenged, previous ledger pages constituting the rest of an open account may be needed to support a plaintiff's case for any items whose accuracy the defendant has not stipulated to because when a writing or recorded statement or part thereof is introduced by a party, an adverse party may require him at that time to introduce any other part or any other writing or recorded statement which ought in fairness to be considered contemporaneously with it. Albert v. George, 15 FSM R. 574, 581 (App. 2008).

Various writings, admitted into evidence, which were signed on the behalf of Chuuk, the party to be charged, can establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff and Chuuk entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff would obtain insurance on Chuuk's vessels for the two periods in question, and that Chuuk would pay for the premiums for the insurance obtained. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 651 (Pon. 2008).

Counsel's argument about a memo's effect is not a substitute for evidence. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 653 (Pon. 2008).

The remedy for a defendant's unlawful detention over 24 hours is not the dismissal of the information against him or the suppression of all evidence and statements obtained from him. His only remedy in a criminal prosecution (as opposed to a civil suit) is suppression of any evidence obtained as a result of the illegal detention. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

When an FSM Evidence Rule is modeled after a United States rule, the court should look to United States court decisions interpreting that rule. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197 (App. 2008).

Evidence that speaks for itself is evidence that is significant or self-evident. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 198 (App. 2008).

An agreement granting fishing rights is not alone conclusive evidence of land ownership. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 241-42 (App. 2009).

Speculation may not be substituted for competent evidence. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 328 (Pon. 2009).

Although the presence of a person's name on the 1932 Japanese Survey Map as the owner of a parcel of land is not conclusive or dispositive of that person's ownership but may be overcome or rebutted by other evidence, when there was substantial evidence in the record before the Land Court that Mackwelung used, controlled, and occupied Yekula continuously after 1932, including evidence and testimony presented at the original 1979 Land Commission proceeding, the Land Court reasonably assessed this evidence as supporting the Mackwelungs' position that a kewosr to Sra Nuarar had taken place, and since the testimony that a previously unmentioned person had owned the land and had later transferred it to Kun Mongkeya was reasonably assessed as not credible, the evidence did not overcome the 1932 Japanese survey map. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 377 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

It was not error for the Land Court not to award one side all of the disputed land based on an option agreement that was never exercised and that only refers to a parcel situated somewhere in the disputed land and not all of it and so it does not support a claim to all of the land, even assuming it is some evidence of ownership of some part. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 378-79 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The FSM Rules of Evidence would appear to be inapplicable to proceedings with respect to release of an arrested vessel on bond. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 16 FSM R. 543, 546 (Yap 2009).

It is constitutional error for a trial court to rely on exhibits never identified, described, or marked at trial, but the trial court does not commit reversible error when there was extensive testimony and cross-examination of witnesses concerning the exhibits' contents. In such an instance, it is the witness testimony that is the evidence before the court. George v. George, 17 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 2010).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law for purposes of establishing legal requirements in criminal cases, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM evidence rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources on the United States Federal Rules of Evidence for guidance. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 19 (App. 2010).

A litigant's constitutional right to due process is violated when a trial court relies on evidence, not a part of the record, without prior notice to the parties or without an opportunity for the parties to comment on it, and it is constitutional error for the court to rely on exhibits never identified, described or marked at trial. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32 (App. 2010).

Trial court judgments that were, in part, based on documents that were never authenticated by affidavit or by testimony and their accuracy was never vouched for by affidavit, or testimony, or other evidence will be vacated. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32 (App. 2010).

When the receipts relied upon by the trial court were never identified, marked, described, or admitted at trial or evidentiary hearing; when those receipts were provided to the court post-trial and were never authenticated, introduced, or admitted into evidence; and when neither side had the opportunity to examine witnesses, or to produce witnesses to testify, on the accuracy, meaning, or completeness of the receipts or about the receipts that the trial court disallowed because someone else had signed them, the documents supplied to the court after trial were not evidence that was properly before that court and thus were not evidence in the record and the trial court's use of these documents violated due process. There is therefore no substantial evidence in the record to support the judgment amount. The judgment amount finding is thus clearly erroneous, and the judgment will be vacated since that figure is not supported by substantial evidence in the record, and, in fact, is not supported by any evidence in the record. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32-33 (App. 2010).

Although physical evidence or the lack thereof may be compelling in some cases, it is not a requirement of proof when the victim herself testified credibly to the alleged act and when her testimony was neither impeached nor rebutted. The lack of physical evidence may even be expected in a case charging sexual abuse because, unlike sexual assault, proof of sexual abuse does not require proof of sexual penetration, but only of sexual contact. Sexual contact is defined as any touching of the sexual or other intimate parts of a person not married to the defendant, done with the intent of gratifying the sexual desire of either party. It would be highly unlikely for a doctor examining a person days after her genitalia or intimate parts had been touched to be able to determine whether she had in fact been touched. Thus, the lack of physical evidence in a sexual abuse case is rather to be anticipated, and does not provide the defendant with a defense. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The weight to be accorded admissible evidence is for the court as trier of fact to determine. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

In reviewing a dismissal for insufficiency of evidence, once the appellate court determines the trial court's findings are not clearly erroneous, the appellate court asks whether those factual findings are sufficient or insufficient to meet the plaintiff's burden of proof. The trial court's answer to that question forms a legal conclusion, and as such is a ruling on a point of law that is reviewed de novo. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Uncontradicted and unimpeached evidence will be taken as true to the extent that it cannot arbitrarily be disregarded. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Reversible error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected and no error in the admission or the exclusion of evidence is ground for granting a new trial or for vacating, modifying, or otherwise disturbing a judgment or order, unless refusal to take such action appears to the court inconsistent with substantial justice. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 244 (App. 2010).

A conclusory argument is not evidence. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 324 (Kos. 2011).

When the FSM proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the fishing boat's HF radio was not on and it also proved that the vessel had a VHF radio, but there was no evidence whether the VHF radio was on or off or whether it was tuned to channel 16, the FSM's claim that the vessel was not monitoring a required radio frequency fails for lack of proof because the statute, the Foreign Fishing Agreement, and the foreign fishing permit all require that the vessel monitor only one of those two frequencies and the evidence shows that the vessel had the ability to monitor the VHF channel 16 and there is no evidence that it was not being monitored. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405 (Chk. 2011).

The circumstantial evidence proves proximate cause even though exactly how the reef was damaged – whether anchors and/or chains were dragged on the reef; or whether a detached or slack cable or chain used to connect the barge to the tugboat struck the reef; or whether one or both of the vessels struck the reef; or whether some combination of these was responsible – is undetermined since the damages occurred while the two vessels were on the site (or while just the barge was there) and since no other vessels were present at the time and the damage was of the type that must have been caused by one or more of the methods described. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 174-75 (Yap 2012).

The court will not attach any deference to a state agency's findings of fact when the defendant was never a party to any proceeding in that agency and was not even aware of the proceeding and no state agency ever initiated any action against the defendant or imposed any fines or penalties on it and when this court case is not a judicial review of an adversarial agency action so the agency report is not entitled to the judicial deference given such agency action. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 175 (Yap 2012).

Evidence is exculpatory if it clears or tends to clear from alleged fault or guilt. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 293 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

When the appellants do not contend that the checks are not authentic but contend that the signature endorsements are all forgeries, and when the trial court found as fact that, except for one or two or a few that she had signed herself, Lilly Iriarte had authorized Santos to sign her name on the premium checks, the appellate court cannot conclude that the finding was clearly erroneous since substantial evidence in the record supports that finding. Since a forgery is a signature of a person that is made without the person's consent and without the person otherwise authorizing it, Lilly Iriarte's signatures are not forgeries even if made by Santos and having the original checks could not have altered the finding that Lilly Iriarte were authorized. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 352 (App. 2012).

Counsel's assertion in one post-trial filing that the plaintiff's land occupied by the defendant was worth $26,000 and consisted of 2,000 square meters with an annual rental value of $20 per square meter was not competent evidence because counsel's assertions in argument do not constitute evidence before the court. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When no evidence was presented at trial that the Director of Public Safety was personally involved in the plaintiff's arrest and jailing or that he directed its manner or timing, the court cannot presume that because his wife was the complainant that he ordered or directed that the plaintiff be arrested and jailed because, in the absence of evidence, an inference just as likely is that a zealous subordinate, believing it would curry favor with his superior, decided that a quick arrest and some jail time were in order. The court therefore will not hold the Director, in his personal capacity, liable to the plaintiff. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

It is within the court's sound discretion whether to admit additional evidence after trial. Exercise of such discretion must take into account the evidence's probative value against the danger of injuring the opposite party through surprise. The opposing party cannot properly examine or counter evidence offered after trial, and so the burden is on the party offering the evidence to demonstrate good cause why the evidence should be admitted. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 269 (Pon. 2014).

While it is appropriate for a Chief Justice to engage with all the relevant stake-holders in the process of promulgating a general court order, the decision making process is quite different for a justice called upon to render an evidentiary ruling in a criminal case. Even when a party raises a question of first impression, a judge presiding over a criminal case has a responsibility to apply the law to the case's facts, and it would be an abuse of judicial discretion to delay an evidentiary ruling in order to solicit advice from non-parties suggesting what the law should be. This judicial power is curtailed by the process of appellate review. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 53 (Pon. 2015).

An affidavit, not introduced at trial and which the defendants never had the opportunity to address or to cross-examine a witness concerning its contents, will be stricken as evidence since the opposing party cannot properly examine or counter evidence offered after trial and since the burden is on the party offering the evidence to demonstrate good cause why the evidence should be admitted. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 114 (Kos. 2015).

Just because an affidavit was filed while the court was considering cross motions for summary judgment does not mean that it is automatically admitted into evidence at the later trial. To be evidence that the court can consider, the affidavit should be offered at trial in the usual manner. Then it might be admitted in the usual manner, or it might be objected to and the objection sustained, or the affiant himself might instead be called to testify. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 114 (Kos. 2015).

A court cannot award damages based on matter "introduced" during argument after the presentation of evidence has ended. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 117 (Kos. 2015).

In the FSM, a "declaration under the penalty of perjury" is not the equivalent of an affidavit as it would be in the United States where a statute makes it so. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. 2015).

Since, by its terms, a statute enacted by the U.S. Congress that permits declarations in place of affidavits affects only U.S. rules and regulations and since the FSM Congress has not enacted an equivalent statute and no procedural rule has been promulgated to bring about the same result, an unsworn declaration, even when the declarant avers or asserts that it is made "under the penalty of perjury," is not the equivalent of an affidavit required by the FSM rules. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. 2015).

A party's insistence that the case solely involved a boundary dispute within a parcel is belied by his claim to the parcel in toto. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 185 (App. 2015).

Counsel's representation does not constitute competent evidence. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 565, 573 (Pon. 2016).

When there is a dispute about the existence or effect of a local custom, and the court is not satisfied about either its existence or its applicability, such custom becomes a mixed question of law and fact, and the party relying upon it must prove it to the court's satisfaction. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642-43 (Pon. 2016).

An argument contained within a brief does not constitute evidence. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 122 (App. 2017).

Direct evidence is evidence, which if believed, proves the existence of facts in issue without inference or presumption. Circumstantial evidence is evidence of facts and circumstances from which the existence or nonexistence of facts in issue may be inferred. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

A judge is required to engage in a conscious balancing of the proffered evidence's probative value against the harms likely to result from its introduction into evidence. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 247, 249 (Pon. 2017).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 416 (App. 2018).

Evidence must be in the nature of facts – not conclusions or counsel's unsupported allegations. An argument contained in a brief does not constitute evidence. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 533 (App. 2018).

Because a preliminary injunction can be granted on basis of procedures that are less formal and evidence that is less complete than in a trial on the merits, the evidence rules are relaxed when considering requests for a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction. In re Gross Revenue Tax, 22 FSM R. 124, 129 (Pon. 2018).

Because a preliminary injunction hearing is less formal than a full trial, less complete evidence is required for an injunction than at trial. Therefore, a petitioner's affidavits submitted on the record may be sufficient evidence when considering a temporary restraining order or a preliminary injunction. In re Gross Revenue Tax, 22 FSM R. 124, 129 (Pon. 2018).

As a general rule, the state is expected to produce all evidence available to it at the time of trial. This rule exists for the purposes of judicial economy, an efficient disposition of cases, and to not delay the defendant's rights to a speedy trial. Some instances merit exception to this general rule. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130d (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Under the court's inherent common law authority to administer the order of proof before it, the court may entertain a party's motion to reopen its case in the interest of justice, such as when the state had inadvertently forgotten to introduce a piece of evidence, the other party had notice through discovery that such evidence will be introduced, and the other party was not unduly prejudiced by the evidence's introduction. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130e (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The factors that are relevant for deciding whether to grant the state's motion to reopen its case in chief are: 1) the seriousness of the crime alleged; 2) whether motion to re-open case resulted from lack of preparation for trial; 3) timeliness of motion to reopen case in chief; 4) good cause; 5) whether motion to reopen case in chief resulted from a decision of the court after the case in chief, which was contrary to the state's understanding of the applicable law; 6) whether the other party would be unfairly prejudiced by reopening such case; and 7) whether re-opening the case will unduly delay the disposition of the case. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130d-0e (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When a movant has provided an affidavit verifying an attached payment history and no contrary evidence is provided, the court normally would accept this evidence as an accurate account of what was owed if the affidavit and the ledger sheet were regular on their face, but the court will not if it is apparent that the numbers do not add up. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 376 (Pon. 2019).

Evidence-gathering orders, under 12 F.S.M.C. 1709(1)(b), involve the gathering of evidence by methods other than by a search warrant, under 12 F.S.M.C. 1709(1)(a), commanding the search for, and seizure of, particular things. An evidence-gathering order may involve taking testimony, the collecting or recording of data, or producing things, documents, or copies. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 463 (Pon. 2020).

Proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion, and the contents of writings, recordings, or photographs may be proved by the testimony of the party against whom offered, without accounting for the nonproduction of the original. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 487 (Pon. 2020).

– Admissibility

Evidence will not be stricken when most previously introduced evidence is unquestionably related to counts still before the court; when the description of the defendants' duties before and after July 12, 1981 did not vary significantly; when the auditor's activities uncovered illegal transactions both before and after July 12, 1981; when various Mobil employees' conversations before July 12, 1981 related to the existence of a pattern of conduct and planning and carrying out illegal transactions and are relevant about whether a conspiracy existed after July 12, 1981. FSM v. Jonas (II), 1 FSM R. 306, 310-12 (Pon. 1983).

Evidence of the earlier alterations is not rendered inadmissible on grounds that it relates to other crimes, wrongs, or acts when the fact a defendant was able to use his position with Mobil to embezzle funds in a particular way before July 12, 1981, lends itself to an inference that the same defendant, holding the same position after July 11, 1981, had the opportunity to carry out the same kind of transaction thereafter and because information concerning pre-July 12, 1981 transactions and activities may also: 1) suggest that defendants who engaged in illegal activities earlier still intended to do so at a later time; 2) indicate preparation for later actions; 3) establish a plan extending beyond July 12, 1981; 4) suggest knowledge of similar later actions; 5) imply identity of people involved in subsequent similar ICR alterations later; and 6) reduce likelihood that ICR alterations after July 12, 1981 occurred by mistake or accident. These legitimate purposes overcome the general prohibition against evidence of prior misconduct merely to show the defendant's character. FSM v. Jonas (II), 1 FSM R. 306, 313 (Pon. 1983).

If the offered item possesses characteristics which are fairly unique and readily identifiable, and if the substance of which the item is composed is relatively impervious to change, the trial court has broad discretion to admit merely on the basis of testimony that the item is the one in question and is in substantially unchanged condition. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 46 (App. 1985).

The FSM Rules of Evidence for identification, authentication and admissibility of evidence do not require that exhibits related to an essential element of the crime may be admitted into evidence only if identified beyond a reasonable doubt. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 47 (App. 1985).

Kosrae Evidence Rule 408, which renders evidence of settlement negotiations inadmissible in the trial, is based upon the court's commitment to encourage out of court settlements and includes offers made in the early stages of a dispute. Nena v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 502, 505-06 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Pursuant to Kosrae Evidence Rule 408, all statements, including factual assertions, made during the settlement process are protected and inadmissible in court to prove liability or invalidity of a claim. Nena v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 502, 506 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Although Kosrae Evidence Rule 408 does not require the exclusion of factual evidence "otherwise discoverable" simply because it was presented during compromise negotiations, a statement made in a letter seeking to settle a dispute, which statement is clearly connected to and part of the settlement offer, is not otherwise discoverable. Nena v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 502, 507 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

A party seeking to offer evidence after trial must show good cause why it should be admitted. The court, in exercising its discretion, must weigh the evidence's probative value against the danger of injuring the opposite party through surprise because the opposing party cannot properly examine or counter the evidence, and without good cause shown the court should deny its admission as untimely. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 121 (Pon. 1993).

It is not an abuse of the trial court's discretion for a trial court to admit testimony that is inconsistent with that witness's answer to an interrogatory. Admissions made in interrogatories are not binding and the answering party may introduce other evidence on the subject of the admissions at trial. Contradictions between a party's answers to interrogatories and court testimony go to the weight and credibility of the testimony, not to its admissibility. Conflicting testimony may be admitted, and it is the responsibility of the finder of fact to weigh all the answers and resolve the conflict. Nakamura v. Bank of Guam (II), 6 FSM R. 345, 350 (App. 1994).

Inconsistencies between a party's responses to discovery and trial testimony properly go to the weight and credibility of the testimony and not to its admissibility. Nakamura v. Bank of Guam (II), 6 FSM R. 345, 352 (App. 1994).

Hearsay is not admissible in a hearing or trial. Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered as evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted. A statement is an oral or written assertion. An affidavit is hearsay which is inadmissible unless allowed by an exception to the hearsay rule. In re Disqualification of Justice, 7 FSM R. 278, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A certified copy of a judgment from a foreign court is admissible evidence as a properly authenticated public record of that jurisdiction. Joeten Motor Co. v. Jae Joong Hwang, 7 FSM R. 326, 327 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment are not excluded from admissibility by the hearsay rule. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 436 n.28 (Pon. 1996).

Business records are normally authenticated by a custodian of records. A duplicate of an original writing is not admissible if there is a genuine issue as to the authenticity of the original. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n (III), 7 FSM R. 453, 455 (Pon. 1996).

In order for a deposition to be admissible a deponent must physically appear before someone who can identify and administer the oath even if the deposition is taken telephonically. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (III), 7 FSM R. 558, 559 (Chk. 1996).

Expert opinion testimony is admissible if the witness is qualified by knowledge, skill, experience, training, education, or otherwise; and that the expert's opinion will assist the trier of fact to understand the fact at issue. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 622 (App. 1996).

Hearsay within hearsay is inadmissible. Hearsay otherwise admissible may be excluded where it consists primarily of reiteration of a statement made by some other unidentified person. Bank of Hawaii v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n, 7 FSM R. 659, 663 (Pon. 1996).

Maps attached to a filing without any sort of foundation or any type of authentication cannot be considered as evidence. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 38 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

A statement, which if it had been made by the defendant would have been admissible as an admission of a party-opponent, is inadmissible hearsay when made by the defendant's then spouse as part of a traditional apology, and cannot be considered on a summary judgment motion. Glocke v. Pohnpei, 8 FSM R. 60, 62 (Pon. 1997).

Counsel's statements concerning an answer constitute argument of counsel, not evidence. Only the answer itself is admissible evidence. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 172 (App. 1999).

The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 182 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

On a design defect products liability claim, evidence of other accidents is admissible to show a dangerous condition so long as the proponent makes a foundational showing that the prior accidents occurred under substantially the same circumstances. Further, evidence proffered to illustrate the existence of a dangerous condition necessitates a high degree of similarity because it weighs directly on the ultimate issue to be decided by the finder of fact. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583 (Pon. 2002).

When the instant case is similar to the other accidents to the extent that the alleged defect is the same, i.e., contaminated kerosene, but the manner in which the other accidents occurred is quite different, the other accidents are not sufficiently similar to be admissible on the question of dangerousness. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583 (Pon. 2002).

Generally, evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith, but such evidence is admissible as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2002).

Production of an original document, although preferable, is not absolutely required. Other evidence of its contents could be admissible if all originals have been lost or destroyed (unless the proponent destroyed them in bad faith), or if no original can be obtained by any available judicial process or procedure, or if the original is under the control of the party against whom it is offered and he does not produce the original, or if it is not closely related to a controlling issue. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 6 (Chk. 2002).

The testimony of one Constitutional Convention delegate as to the meaning of a constitutional provision would reflect his personal opinions and beliefs on the interpretation of the subject constitutional provision, and not the opinions of the entire twenty-two member Convention, and will therefore not be admitted. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 26, 30 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

There is no "dead man's statute" barring the admission of a deceased person's statements as evidence in Kosrae state law or in the rules of evidence. Taulung v. Jack, 11 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Ultimately, the determination as to whether or not to admit evidence is left to the trial court's discretion. The weight to be accorded admissible evidence is for the trier of fact to determine. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 455 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The test for the admissibility of field sobriety test results is that the court must consider evidence of the police officers' knowledge of the tests, his training and his ability to interpret his observations. Any testimony concerning the defendant's performance would be subjected to cross-examination and defense counsel could question any inadequacy regarding the administration of the tests. The test results' admissibility must be determined at trial, following such testimony. The test results' admissibility for each accused will necessarily depend upon the facts of his or her case, and must therefore depend upon the evidence presented for each individual accused in each case. The results may be admissible in one case, but not admissible in another. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 455 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A duplicate is admissible to the same extent as an original unless a genuine question is raised as to the original's authenticity or in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original. Since an original is not required, other evidence of a writing's contents is admissible if at a time when an original was under the control of the party against whom offered, the party was put on notice that the contents would be a subject of proof at the hearing, and the party does not produce the original at the hearing. When the party had the originals and did not produce them, it has no ground to complain. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 19 (App. 2006).

Even if the evidence is of events that took place in periods for which prosecution may be time-barred, it is not necessarily inadmissible. Nor is hearsay necessarily inadmissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 140-41 (Chk. 2006).

Statements by a party-opponent offered against that party are not hearsay and are admissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 2006).

A statement by a party's co-conspirator made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 2006).

An account of evidence adduced in a hearing in another case to which the movant was not a party and a hearing at which he was not present or had an opportunity to be heard, even presuming (which the court cannot do) that the evidence presented then is accurately characterized now, is not admissible and cannot be used against the movant's summary judgment motion. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Former testimony is not admissible unless the party against whom the testimony is now offered (or a predecessor in interest) had an opportunity and similar motive to develop that testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Failure to inform an accused of his rights does not in and of itself entitle an accused to an acquittal, but no evidence obtained as a result of such violation shall be admissible against the accused. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 352 (Pon. 2007).

Evidence and statements lawfully obtained from a defendant before he had been illegally detained over 24 hours will be admissible, but the defendant is entitled to the suppression of any evidence or statements obtained from him after his first 24 hours of detention. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

By statute, 12 F.S.M.C. 218, statements taken (even if made voluntarily) and evidence obtained as a result of a violation of the defendant's statutory right to be brought before a judicial officer without unnecessary delay are inadmissible, but when none of the evidence the defendant seeks to suppress was obtained as a result of his being detained for more than 24 hours, the motion to suppress will be denied. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

Business records are normally authenticated by a custodian of records. The custodian or other qualified witness who must authenticate business records need not be the person who prepared or maintained the records, or even an employee of the record-keeping entity, as long as the witness understands the system used to prepare the records. Objections concerning the identity or competency of preparer of a record might go to the evidentiary weight or credibility of a record but not to the record's admissibility. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 20 (App. 2010).

To prove the content of a writing the original is required, but a duplicate of an original writing is admissible when the original cannot be found and if there is no genuine issue as to the original's authenticity. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 22-23 (App. 2010).

Arguments concerning the accuracy of the record go to their weight and not their admissibility. The question then is whether the photocopy was a duplicate of what the government claimed it to be. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 23 (App. 2010).

When the trial court excluded an affidavit from admission because the prima facie authenticity for notarized documents extended by Evidence Rule 902(8) was rebutted by the clerk's testimony that he should not have notarized it because the affiant had not appeared before him and it was not signed in his presence, whereupon the court concluded that the affidavit could not be authenticated under Rule 902(8) and when the proponents did not seek to authenticate the affidavit by other means such as by calling another witness to authenticate the signature on the affidavit despite its defective notary seal, the trial court, without any additional testimony to authenticate the signature, had no way of determining whether the signature on the affidavit was in fact genuine. The court's determination not to admit the affidavit was thus within its discretion. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Grounds for admission of a document that were not raised in the trial court, may be considered waived. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the proponents failed to raise any other basis for admission of an affidavit other than as a self-authenticating document, the appellate court is left to review whether the trial court's exclusion was proper on the basis that the document was not authenticated. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the trial court denies admission of documentary evidence on the basis that it was not properly authenticated, the appellate court's review is limited to determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in deciding whether the movant made a prima facie showing as to the document's authenticity. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Generally, the requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims.

Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the affidavit was not acknowledged in the manner provided for by law since the affiant was not present at the time that the affidavit was acknowledged, the trial court's determination that the presumption of self-authentication had been rebutted and that the affidavit was not otherwise authenticated was proper. There was therefore no abuse of discretion in the trial court's denial of the affidavit's admission into evidence for the reason that it was not authenticated. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When an affidavit's substance was only read into the record for the purpose of ruling on its admissibility, the better practice may have been to allow the presentation of a foundation for admission, including establishing the document's authenticity, before proceeding with testimony regarding its contents. That practice would avoid confusion as to whether the substance of inadmissible documentary evidence has become a part of the evidentiary record. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity, as a condition precedent to admissibility, is not required with respect to documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment, executed by a notary public in the manner provided by law. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 29 (App. 2016).

Although to prove the content of a writing the original writing is required, FSM Evidence Rule 1003 makes a duplicate admissible to the same extent as an original unless 1) a genuine question is raised as to the authenticity of the original or 2) in the circumstances it would be unfair to admit the duplicate in lieu of the original. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 352 (App. 2012).

When the defendant has not indicated what specific pieces of evidence he seeks to exclude and the prosecution does not appear to have informed the defendant what specific evidence it will seek to introduce at trial, the court is not in a position to rule on the evidence's admissibility and will deny the defendant's current motion in limine and will rule on the admissibility of any particular evidence that the defendant objects to if and when that issue comes properly before the court. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 447 (Chk. 2014).

When the plaintiff's claim for damages to his car from a break-in were not tried by the parties' consent during the trial on the plaintiff's claim for failure to repair his car; when the break-in damages claim was not raised by the pleadings and admitting evidence about it would prejudice the defendant who had not had adequate notice that the issue would be tried; when excluding the evidence about the break-in would not prejudice the plaintiff; and when the break-in was not part of a common nucleus of operative fact with the defendant's alleged behavior in failing to properly repair the plaintiff's vehicle but represented an entirely new claim that the plaintiff could file against the defendant for failure to properly safeguard his property, all evidence that pertained to the alleged break-in would be excluded and not considered. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 471-72 (Pon. 2014).

A motion to reopen a case should be denied when unfair prejudice towards the defendant results, such as when the state wants to introduce a document or evidence not disclosed in discovery, of which defendant lacked any notice, and against which defendant could not adequately defend due to the lack of time to prepare a defense. But when the defendant had notice of the confession statement; and when a preliminary hearing determined that the confession statement was admissible at trial, and so that the defendant was put on notice that the confession would be introduced at trial, no unfair prejudice would result from allowing the state to introduce the defendant's confession statement upon re-opening its case. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130e-0f (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A statement made by an alleged co-conspirator during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 84 n.2 (Chk. 2018).

A party's copies of the original copies in an insttution are admissible to the same extent as the institution's originals. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 183 (Pon. 2019).

– Authentication

Rule 901(a) of our Rules of Evidence provides that the requirement of authentication "is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims." Testimony of two witnesses supporting such a claim is fully adequate to justify the action of the trial court in accepting that matter as evidence. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 46 (App. 1985).

The FSM Rules of Evidence for identification, authentication and admissibility of evidence do not require that exhibits related to an essential element of the crime may be admitted into evidence only if identified beyond a reasonable doubt. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 47 (App. 1985).

A certified copy of a judgment from a foreign court is admissible evidence as a properly authenticated public record of that jurisdiction. Joeten Motor Co. v. Jae Joong Hwang, 7 FSM R. 326, 327 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Business records are normally authenticated by a custodian of records. A duplicate of an original writing is not admissible if there is a genuine issue as to the authenticity of the original. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n (III), 7 FSM R. 453, 455 (Pon. 1996).

Maps attached to a filing without any sort of foundation or any type of authentication cannot be considered as evidence. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 38 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

An open account is not self-proving. An account must be supported by an evidentiary foundation to demonstrate the accuracy of the account. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 15 (Yap 1999).

The requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 182 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An ancient document or data compilation is authenticated if evidence that the document or data compilation, in any form, is in such condition as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, was in a place where it, if authentic, would likely be, and has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 182 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

For a plaintiff to succeed, she must come forward with a preponderance of creditable evidence to establish the authenticity of the document upon which her claim is based. Lukas v. Stanley, 10 FSM R. 365, 366 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A plaintiff has not met the necessary burden of proof when the affidavit offered by plaintiff to prove her claim is highly suspect in that the plaintiff's father, whom she claims gave the property to her, did not appear in person before the Clerk of Court when he signed the document and the plaintiff presented conflicting evidence in court at which place or where the document was signed. Lukas v. Stanley, 10 FSM R. 365, 366 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Kosrae Rules of Evidence, Article IX, require authentication and identification of documentary evidence, sufficient to support a finding that the document is what its proponent claims. When the author of a written statement was not present to identify and authenticate the document and no other person was presented to identify and authenticate the subject statement the prosecution has failed to satisfy the requirements of authentication and identification of documents and the written statement will be suppressed. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 333, 335 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Business records are normally authenticated by a custodian of records. The custodian or other qualified witness who must authenticate business records need not be the person who prepared or maintained the records, or even an employee of the record-keeping entity, as long as the witness understands the system used to prepare the records. Objections concerning the identity or competency of preparer of a record might go to the evidentiary weight or credibility of a record but not to the record's admissibility. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 20 (App. 2010).

Authentication is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what it its proponent claims. The appellate court's review is limited to determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in deciding that the government made a prima facie showing as to the documents' authenticity. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 21 (App. 2010).

When the defendants did not claim that the exhibits were something other than what the government claimed them to be, but instead stated that the exhibits were illegible, incomplete, or had notes written on them raising substantial doubts as to their authenticity, that is a question of what weight or credibility the exhibits should be given, not whether they should be admitted. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 22 (App. 2010).

When the government's witnesses testified as to what the exhibits were and, if a witness did not know what an exhibit was, it was not admitted, the weight or credibility that an exhibit was given was for the trial court to decide. When the trial court took into account the defendants' stated concerns regarding the documents but there was no requirement that the exhibits be excluded after the witnesses had testified that they were what the government claimed them to be, the trial court, having heard adequate testimony, did not abuse its discretion by admitting the exhibits. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 22 (App. 2010).

Arguments concerning the accuracy of the record go to their weight and not their admissibility. The question then is whether the photocopy was a duplicate of what the government claimed it to be. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 23 (App. 2010).

When the defendants' argument is not a true objection to the records' admissibility but is instead a question concerning the weight or credibility that the exhibits should be given because the defendants dispute the exhibits' accuracy; when the government stated that the originals were unobtainable due to judicial process because the documents were collected by the court in the related criminal matters and were not available for the trial of this case; and when FSM Evidence Rule 1004 does not require originals when they cannot be obtained, the trial court did not err or abuse its discretion in admitting the government's exhibits over the defendants' best evidence objections. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 23 (App. 2010).

Prima facie authenticity is extended so long as the proffered document is accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment under the seal of a notary public or other authorized officer. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the trial court excluded an affidavit from admission because the prima facie authenticity for notarized documents extended by Evidence Rule 902(8) was rebutted by the clerk's testimony that he should not have notarized it because the affiant had not appeared before him and it was not signed in his presence, whereupon the court concluded that the affidavit could not be authenticated under Rule 902(8) and when the proponents did not seek to authenticate the affidavit by other means such as by calling another witness to authenticate the signature on the affidavit despite its defective notary seal, the trial court, without any additional testimony to authenticate the signature, had no way of determining whether the signature on the affidavit was in fact genuine. The court's determination not to admit the affidavit was thus within its discretion. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the proponents failed to raise any other basis for admission of an affidavit other than as a self-authenticating document, the appellate court is left to review whether the trial court's exclusion was proper on the basis that the document was not authenticated. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the trial court denies admission of documentary evidence on the basis that it was not properly authenticated, the appellate court's review is limited to determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in deciding whether the movant made a prima facie showing as to the document's authenticity. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Generally, the requirement of authentication or identification as a condition precedent to admissibility is satisfied by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the matter in question is what its proponent claims. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

A notarized affidavit may be authenticated without the affiant's testimony, as it is presumed to be authentic so long as it is acknowledged in the manner provided for by law. A clerk of court's manner of acknowledging an affidavit is for the affiant to swear to it under oath in the clerk's presence. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173-74 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the affidavit was not acknowledged in the manner provided for by law since the affiant was not present at the time that the affidavit was acknowledged, the trial court's determination that the presumption of self-authentication had been rebutted and that the affidavit was not otherwise authenticated was proper. There was therefore no abuse of discretion in the trial court's denial of the affidavit's admission into evidence for the reason that it was not authenticated. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When an affidavit's substance was only read into the record for the purpose of ruling on its admissibility, the better practice may have been to allow the presentation of a foundation for admission, including establishing the document's authenticity, before proceeding with testimony regarding its contents. That practice would avoid confusion as to whether the substance of inadmissible documentary evidence has become a part of the evidentiary record. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity, as a condition precedent to admissibility, is not required with respect to documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment, executed by a notary public in the manner provided by law. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 29 (App. 2016).

An ancient document is authenticated if evidence that the document, in any form, is in such condition, as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, was in a place where if authentic, would likely be, and has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 121 (App. 2017).

– Burden of Proof

In a case of civil conspiracy, the burden of proof is a preponderance of the evidence, not a clear and convincing standard, in order to establish the conspiracy. Opet v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 3 FSM R. 159, 164 (App. 1987).

A party claiming ownership in land for which there is a determination of ownership showing another as owner, with the appeal period expired, has, at a minimum, the burden of showing facts to establish that the determination of ownership is incorrect. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 508, 510 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The concept of Burden of Proof has two aspects. First the plaintiff in a civil case must produce sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case in order to avoid a nonsuit. Second, the sufficiency of evidence necessary to prove a disputed fact in a civil case is proof by a preponderance of the evidence – the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 141-42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The plaintiff, whose duty it is to introduce evidence to prove her case by a preponderance of the evidence, carries the burden of proof. This "burden of going forward with the evidence," or "burden of producing evidence," lies with the party who seeks to prove an affirmative fact. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 212 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The defendant has the burden of proving affirmative defenses. A defense raised for the first time in a defendant's written closing argument does not meet the burden of proof. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 619 (App. 1996).

The burden of producing evidence in a civil trial generally lies with the plaintiff, who must establish a prima facie case to avoid a nonsuit or other adverse ruling. Berman v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 624, 627 (App. 1996).

The defendants have the burden of proof with respect to each affirmative defense, and must prove that defense by a preponderance of the evidence. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 496 (Pon. 1998).

In a civil case where defendants seeks to advance Pohnpeian customary practice as a defense to a claim of equitable contribution, the burden is on the defendants to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the relevant custom and tradition. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 497 (Pon. 1998).

Preponderance of the evidence is not evidence to a moral certainty or clear and convincing evidence. As a standard of proof, preponderance of the evidence has been held to mean that the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. The party having the burden of establishing his claim by a preponderance of the evidence must establish the facts by evidence at least sufficient to destroy the equilibrium and overbalance any weight of evidence produced by the other party. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 12 (Yap 1999).

If the plaintiff's evidence is more convincing than that which defendant offers in opposition, then plaintiff has met its burden of showing that the facts for which it contends are more probably true than false. If, on the other hand, plaintiff's evidence is less convincing than that offered in opposition, then defendant's version of events is the more likely, and the plaintiff fails to meet its burden of proof. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 12 (Yap 1999).

When the plaintiff has demonstrated that it billed the defendant for long distance services according to its usual and customary practice, and that its billing practices accurately reflect its customers' usage of the communications services which it offers to the public and when the defendant's 1998 testimony about her long distance usage habits during September 1990 through July 1, 1992 does not persuade the court that she received inaccurate telephone bills from plaintiff at relevant times under the terms of the parties' valid and enforceable contract, the plaintiff has met its burden of proof. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 15 (Yap 1999).

A plaintiff, who has testified that in 1991 the defendant gave him $500 and that this payment was a portion of a $3,000 check issued by the FSM Finance Office as payment to the plaintiff, but who does not present any other evidence of the $3,000 check or the $500 payment and does not show that documentary proof relating to the $500 payment or the $3,000 check was unavailable through discovery or by subpoena, has failed to sustain his burden of proof. When the plaintiff has testified that in 1996 the FSM Finance Office issued another check in his name, but presents no documentary proof of this check, the plaintiff has again failed to sustain his burden of proof. Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A plaintiff must prove the allegations of the complaint by a preponderance of admissible evidence in order to prevail. Chipen v. Reynold, 9 FSM R. 148, 149 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

In a civil case when a defendant seeks to advance Pohnpeian customary practice as a defense, the burden is on the defendant to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the relevant custom and tradition. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc. v. Mauricio, 9 FSM R. 155, 158-59 (App. 1999).

The disciplinary counsel's burden is to prove attorney misconduct by clear and convincing evidence. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 171 (App. 1999).

The standard of proof for establishing allegations of attorney misconduct is clear and convincing evidence. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

Clear and convincing evidence is a higher burden of proof than mere preponderance of the evidence, but not quite as high as beyond a reasonable doubt. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

The clear and convincing evidence standard is the most demanding standard applied in civil cases. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

To be clear and convincing evidence must be of extraordinary persuasiveness. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

Clear and convincing evidence means evidence establishing that the truth of the facts asserted is highly probable. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

The clear and convincing evidentiary standard is that weight of proof which produces in the mind of the trier of fact a firm belief or conviction as to the truth of the allegations sought to be established, evidence so clear, direct and weighty and convincing as to enable the fact finder to come to a clear conviction, without hesitancy, of the truth of the precise facts of the case. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

A proposition proved by a preponderance of the evidence is one that has been found to be more probably true than not. Clear and convincing evidence, on the other hand, reflects a more exacting standard of proof. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

Although stated in terms of reasonable doubt, clear and convincing evidence is considered to be more than a preponderance while not quite approaching the degree of proof necessary to convict a person of a criminal offense. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173 (App. 1999).

The spectrum of increasing degrees of proof, from preponderance of the evidence, to clear and convincing evidence, to beyond a reasonable doubt is widely recognized, and it has been suggested that the standard of proof required would be clearer if the degrees of proof were defined, respectively, as probably true, highly probably true and almost certainly true. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 173-74 (App. 1999).

Evidence may be uncontroverted, and yet not be clear and convincing. Conversely, evidence may be clear and convincing despite the fact it has been contradicted. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 174 (App. 1999).

The clear and convincing standard is that which enables the trier of fact to come to a clear conviction, without hesitancy, of the truth of the precise facts of the case. In re Robert, 9 FSM R. 278a, 278g (Pon. 1999).

The proper standard of proof for inherent power sanctions is clear and convincing evidence standard rather than the lower standard of preponderance of the evidence standard. This heightened standard of proof is particularly appropriate because most inherent power sanctions are fundamentally punitive and because an inherent power sanction requires a finding of bad faith, and a bad faith finding requires heightened certainty. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 88 (App. 2001).

For those inherent power sanctions that are fundamentally penal – and default judgments, as well as contempt orders, awards of attorneys' fees and the imposition of fines – the trial court must find clear and convincing evidence of the predicate misconduct. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 88 (App. 2001).

The clear and convincing evidence standard of an inherent powers sanction is also consistent with the standard of proof needed to discipline an attorney. It would be inequitable if a court could avoid the heightened standard of a disciplinary proceeding by instead resorting to its inherent powers to sanction an attorney. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 88 (App. 2001).

At trial, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his breach of contract claim by a preponderance of the evidence. If he fails to do so, it is appropriate for the trial court to enter judgment against him. Tulensru v. Wakuk, 10 FSM R. 128, 132 (App. 2001).

When a trial court has found that all parties fulfilled their obligations under the contract, and the plaintiff did not offer competent evidence of breach sufficient to establish that the trial court's findings were improper, there was no clear error in the trial court's factual findings on the liability issue. Tulensru v. Wakuk, 10 FSM R. 128, 133 (App. 2001).

When defendants did not submit any proof at trial in support of their affirmative defense, they did not carry their burden of proof. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When there was no evidence presented at trial that two defendants had made any promise to the plaintiff and they were not a parties to any agreement or promise with the plaintiff, the plaintiff has not carried his burden of proof with respect to claims made against them and justice requires that the complaint against them be dismissed. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 197 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A plaintiff who establishes the existence of risk factors which may have caused the injury, must show that these risk factors did in fact cause the injury. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2001).

It is enough that the plaintiff introduce evidence from which reasonable men may conclude that it is more probable that the event was caused by the defendant than that it was not. Stated another way, it does not require that the proof eliminate every possible cause other than the one on which plaintiff relies, but only such other causes, if any, which fairly arise from the evidence. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2001).

When no product defect is found, causes of action based on strict product liability and on breach of warranty fail and res ipsa loquitur is not applicable. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2001).

The clear and convincing evidence standard involves a higher burden of proof than a mere preponderance of the evidence, but not quite as high as beyond a reasonable doubt. "Clear evidence to the contrary" would be a similar standard. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8 n.1 (Chk. 2002).

If the Chuuk State Supreme Court determines that a de novo review of an appeal from Land Commission is appropriate, the plaintiff must prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and the court may make its own findings of fact based on the total record in this case, but if the court does not conduct a de novo review of the case, it merely determines whether the Land Commission's decision was arbitrary and capricious, and whether the facts as found by the Land Commission were clearly erroneous. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 588-89 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When, at a trial de novo, the plaintiff's testimony was credible and supported by other credible testimonial and physical evidence and the defendant's claim was inconsistent and not supported by convincing evidence, the plaintiff's evidence is more convincing and he has met his burden of proving ownership. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 591-94 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The plaintiffs' reply to a defendant's written closing argument will not be stricken because the plaintiffs have the burden of proof, and therefore may have the last word. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 242 (Pon. 2003).

When a case proceeds to trial, the burden of going forward with evidence as to affirmative defenses is normally on the defendant. However, when the plaintiff seeks summary judgment on the question of liability, the plaintiff must initiate the inquiry even as to affirmative defenses. The party moving for summary judgment has the burden of clearly establishing the lack of any triable issues of fact. The burden extends to affirmative defenses as well as to the plaintiff's own positive allegations. Sigrah v. Microlife Plus, 13 FSM R. 375, 379 (Kos. 2005).

It is the claimant's burden to present his or her evidence to the Land Court and it is the claimant's burden to request admission of evidence which had been previously presented to the Land Commission in prior proceedings. Wesley v. Carl, 13 FSM R. 429, 431 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

In a civil case the burden of proof lies generally with the plaintiff, who must make a showing of a prima facie case to avoid an adverse ruling such as a nonsuit. At the same time, a defendant has the burden of proof with respect to each affirmative defense, which he must prove by a preponderance of the evidence. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 519 (App. 2005).

In a prima facie case, a party has produced enough evidence to allow the fact-finder to infer the fact at issue and rule in the party's favor. Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 64 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

The government has met the standard of proof and proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant has waived his rights knowingly and intelligently when the defendant's signed waiver showed that he was informed of his right to silence and his right to counsel and waived those rights and when, considering that signed waiver and the testimony presented, the court has considered the defendant's evidence and argument and cannot find that the manner in which the statement was elicited coerced the defendant into making it. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 152 (Chk. 2006).

The plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of a claim by a preponderance of evidence. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion. It consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 217 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In a civil case, a plaintiff must prove the allegations of their complaint by a preponderance of evidence in order to prevail. Preponderance of the evidence is not evidence to a moral certainty or clear and convincing evidence. As a standard of proof, preponderance of the evidence means that the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. But, if the plaintiff's evidence is less convincing than that offered in opposition, then defendant's version of events is the more likely, and the plaintiff fails to meet its burden of proof. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 274 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An open account is not self-proving; it must be supported by enough evidence to show the account's accuracy. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 274 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the evidence offered to support the amount claimed in the complaint is minimal and receipts, which the plaintiff's own witnesses testified were available, were not offered into evidence; when one page of the ledger was identified and marked, but never offered into evidence; when the evidence to support the plaintiff's claims consists of his former employees' testimony on the amount owed and the defendant's acknowledgment that she owes some amount but not the amount claimed; when the defendant could have used the receipts to show they did not support the amount in the ledger but did not and did not question the plaintiff's witnesses as to the specific amounts shown in the receipts, the court was given no evidence to weigh in support of an alternative explanation and can only look at the testimony offered and determine whether the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. Thus, based on the defendant's acknowledgment that some amount is owed, but not the $14,431.58 claimed by the plaintiff, and based on the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses about the ledger and the balance, the evidence weighs slightly to the plaintiff and that it is more probably true than false that the defendant owes the amount of $6,220.52. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 274-75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When evidence is available but not offered, the question is raised whether the withheld evidence supported the claim. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 274 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The parties have the responsibility to put forward the evidence to support their client's case. This is not the court's responsibility. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 275 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The burden of proof in a civil case is on the plaintiff. Plaintiffs must prove each element of their causes of action. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 320 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the plaintiff offered no evidence that he was entitled to notice in the Land Commission proceedings so there was no proof of a negligent or wrongful act or omission, he did not prove a violation of his due process rights, and when Land Commission records would have contained evidence about his entitlement to notice and whether he was served with notice, but, the plaintiff did not present those records and did not offer proof that he owned any portion of the disputed land and the only evidence of land ownership showed ownership by another, the plaintiff's claims against the government based on negligence and a violation of due process fail. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 320 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

In a civil case, a plaintiff must prove the allegations by a preponderance of evidence in order to prevail. Preponderance of the evidence is not evidence to a moral certainty or clear and convincing evidence. As a standard of proof, preponderance of the evidence means that the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. But, if the plaintiff's evidence is less convincing than that offered in opposition, then the defendant's version of events is the more likely, and the plaintiff fails to meet its burden of proof. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 327 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the receipts did not support the amount stated in the ledger and claimed by the plaintiff even though the plaintiff's witness testified that the receipts would support the full amount; when the plaintiff was specifically ordered to produce at trial the original of all receipts, ledgers, and any other documents pertaining to the defendant's account but failed to submit receipts supporting the amount in the ledger produced and failed to submit the full ledger for the defendant's account; and when the defendant acknowledged owing some amount and did not dispute the receipts signed by him, the court will award the plaintiff the amounts shown in the receipts and ledger with credit for the defendant's payments. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 327 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When a petitioner has presented sufficient evidence to support a prima facie case for relief, a respondent's motion for dismissal at the close of the petitioner's case-in-chief will be denied. Miochy v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 15 FSM R. 369, 372 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

After the parties rest, the court makes findings of fact based on the total record in the case. The petitioner (election contestant) has the burden of proof to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence. The petitioner satisfies his burden of proof if his evidence is more convincing to the court than that of the respondents. Therefore, the petitioner must establish facts in support of his claim by evidence at least sufficient to overbalance any weight of evidence produced by the other parties. Miochy v. Chuuk

State Election Comm'n, 15 FSM R. 369, 372 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When, given the weight of the evidence indicating that the petitioner was born on October 26, 1972, which was generated both before, when he did not have a vested interest in the election, and after his application for a delayed birth certificate, the court could not find that his evidence that he was born on October 26, 1971, was more convincing than that of the respondents, and therefore, he has not proven his case by a preponderance of the evidence. Miochy v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 15 FSM R. 369, 372 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the defendants did not stipulate to their ledger sheets' accuracy, that would have left one genuine issue of material fact before the court for trial because an open account is not self-proving. An open account must be supported by an evidentiary foundation to demonstrate the account's accuracy. Albert v. George, 15 FSM R. 574, 581 (App. 2008).

The burden at trial is on the party asserting the existence of a customary right to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Parties who proffer custom as a basis for a claim must prove the relevant custom by a preponderance of the evidence. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 240 (App. 2009).

When the testimony on nechop is sufficient to establish that it existed as a custom and that, when employed, it operated to disrupt the status quo of matrilineal descent, the trial court did not ignore the established custom of Chuukese matrilineal descent in accepting that a nechop took place since it was proven by a preponderance of the evidence that the nechop took place. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2009).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if he fails to do so, judgment will be entered against him. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff's testimony on the element of damages is speculative, conclusory, and lacking in foundation, the plaintiff did not meet his burden of proof on the issue of damages and a judgment in the defendant's favor is therefore appropriate. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 328 (Pon. 2009).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion. It consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 374 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When there is no way of determining what portion of an amount deposited into a bank account was also converted by another defendant and since the plaintiff has the burden of proof, that other defendant will receive the benefit of the doubt created by this question and will not be held liable for the deposited sums. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 447 (Pon. 2009).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if he fails to do so, judgment will be entered against him. The preponderance of the evidence standard also applies to a civil action for conspiracy. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2009).

In an election contest, the court makes findings of fact based on the total record in the case. The petitioner has the burden of proof to prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence. The petitioner satisfies his burden of proof if his evidence is more convincing to the court than that of the respondents. Thus, the petitioners must establish facts in support of their claim by evidence at least sufficient to overbalance any weight of evidence produced by the other parties. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When there was no evidence to contradict the election commission's finding of the dates that the election results were announced, the petitioners cannot prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the declaration of the election was after April 11, 2009, which, if it had been, would have made their petition timely and the panel would have remanded the contest to the election commission for a third time. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A plaintiff has not met her burden of showing that the state is liable to her for "summary punishment" when she did not disclose what specific conduct she believed constituted summary punishment and her complaint was silent on that point as well. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

When the first question is whether there is a valid contract, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of that claim by a preponderance of evidence. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 645 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion. It consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 33 n.3 (App. 2010).

In a prima facie case, a party has produced enough evidence to allow the fact-finder to infer the fact at issue and rule in the party's favor. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 45 n.2 (Chk. 2010).

When the discharged employee has not presented any evidence about whether and where he sought employment during a certain time period, he has introduced no evidence of his efforts to mitigate his damages by attempting to secure a job during his periods of unemployment, and he is thus precluded from recovery of damages for those periods since it is the plaintiff's burden to prove every element of his case, including all of his damages. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 95 (Chk. 2010).

Since hearsay testimony is inherently unreliable, the court cannot be required to or presumed to rely on hearsay testimony over contrary direct evidence to determine where the preponderance of evidence lies. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 2010).

The findings of fact made at the end of trial may differ somewhat from those the court made after the close of the plaintiffs' case-in-chief for the purpose of the defense Rule 41(b) motion since then it still awaited the presentations of the defendant and third-party defendant; since nothing contained in the court's Rule 41(b) memorandum was intended to foreclose the defendant and the third-party defendant of their opportunity to be heard; and since what may then have been reasonable and logical inferences from the evidence might later be shown to be something entirely different. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 121 & n.1 (Chk. 2010).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of the plaintiff's cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if the plaintiff fails to prove any one element, judgment will be entered against the plaintiff. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 123 (Chk. 2010).

In ruling on a 41(b) motion to dismiss, the trial court, in determining whether the plaintiff has shown a right to relief, is not required to view the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff but draws permissible inferences. If the court determines that the plaintiff has not made out a prima facie case, the defendant is entitled to have the case dismissed. Even if a plaintiff makes out a prima facie case, the court as the trier of fact, may, in assessing the evidence on a Rule 41(b) motion, weigh the evidence, resolve any conflicts in it, and decide for itself where the preponderance of the evidence lies. In weighing the evidence, the trial court is required to view the evidence with an unbiased eye, without any attendant favorable inferences, but it is also required to sift and to balance the evidence, and to give the evidence such weight as it deems fit. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Proof of the existence of a custom is a factual issue. The burden is therefore on the proponents to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that achemwir is a custom practiced in Chuuk, and they have the further burden of proving that the requirements of the custom were met. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 171 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Even if an affidavit were admitted, the proponents have the burden to come forward with a preponderance of credible evidence to establish the document's veracity because notarization does not conclusively establish the truth of the statements made in the document, but only the identity and signature of the person who signed the document. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

The plaintiffs' burden of proof to show the truth of the statements in a notarized affidavit is not met when the purported affiant did not appear in person to have the document notarized and there is no other evidence regarding the circumstances of its signing. Without even testimony to authenticate her signature, let alone the circumstances surrounding her signature, the trial court, as finder of fact, had no way to determine whether the purported affiant fully understood and freely signed the document, or whether she signed it under coercion, mistake, or as a result of fraud, or misunderstanding, let alone whether it was indeed her who signed her name to it. Thus, the affidavit, even if it had been admitted into evidence, would rightly be accorded little weight since significant questions were raised regarding its authenticity, reliability, and veracity. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

The mental disease, disorder or defect defense established by 11 F.S.M.C. 302 is an affirmative defense. Under 11 F.S.M.C. 302(3), the party asserting this defense has the burden of proving the existence of the physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect by clear and convincing evidence. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 216 (Pon. 2010).

Traditionally, the movant has the burden to show that the debtor has the ability to comply with the court order; once this burden has been met, it is then the debtor's burden to show that he no longer has the ability to comply through no fault of his own despite due diligence. Thus, it is the moving party's burden not only to submit a proper motion for a show cause hearing, but also, at the hearing, to prove by a preponderance that the judgment debtor has the ability to pay. If the movant cannot provide evidentiary support, or certify his information and belief that such support is likely after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery, the court must deny the motion, but if the court does set a hearing and order parties to appear, and if at the hearing the moving party presents such evidence, only then will the burden shift to the debtor to show that he does not in fact have the ability to pay. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 226-27 (Kos. 2010).

In a trespass dispute over land, the only issue properly before the court, and the only issue the court may rule upon without violating the due process rights of non-parties, is whether it is more likely than not, and not whether it is certain beyond all doubt, or whether it is certain beyond a reasonable doubt, or whether it is clear and convincing that, as between the parties, the plaintiff has the superior right to possess the land. The plaintiff only has to prove its case by a preponderance of the evidence, that is, to show that it is more likely than not that its rights are superior. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 233 & n.4 (Chk. 2010).

The standard of review on a question of the sufficiency of the evidence is whether the trial court's findings are clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous and reversible error if: 1) the findings are not supported by substantial evidence in the record; 2) the finding was the result of an erroneous conception of the applicable law; or 3) after reviewing the entire body of the evidence in the light most favorable to the appellee, the reviewing court is left with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made. Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion, and it consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 243 (App. 2010).

An element of criminal contempt is the subjective intent to defy the court's authority, and the requisite intent is specific intent. There is thus more to prove to show criminal contempt. There is also a higher burden of proof, beyond a reasonable doubt than the civil contempt burden of clear and convincing evidence of the predicate misconduct. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 (App. 2011).

When no evidence was presented at trial to support the defendants' counterclaims, those counterclaims fail and are dismissed because the defendants have not met their burden of proof. A counterclaimant has the same burden of proof as a plaintiff – to prove the counterclaim by a preponderance of the evidence. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 406 (Chk. 2011).

The substantial-evidence rule is the principle that a reviewing court should uphold an administrative body's ruling if it is supported by evidence on which the administrative body could reasonably base its decision. Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion, and it consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 655 (App. 2011).

The record may contain evidence which preponderates one way and yet include substantial evidence to support an order reaching an opposite result. Substantial evidence need not be much evidence, and though "substantial" means more than a mere scintilla, or some evidence, it is less than is required to sustain a verdict being attacked as against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. The substantial-evidence rule is a very deferential standard of review. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 656 (App. 2011).

"Some evidence" may be a higher standard than the scintilla of evidence standard, but "some evidence" still does not equate with "substantial evidence." "Substantial evidence" is a higher standard than "some evidence" but it is not as high as the "preponderance of the evidence" standard. It can be less. Substantial evidence is more than a mere scintilla or some evidence, but less than is required to sustain a verdict being attacked as against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. The trial court does not assume the role of fact finder, the issue is purely one of law. In fact, the evidence may be substantial and yet greatly preponderate the other way. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 656 (App. 2011).

The "burden of proof" is a party's duty to prove a disputed assertion or charge. The burden of proof includes both the burden of persuasion and the burden of production. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 18 FSM R. 76, 77 (App. 2011).

When a trial court ruling did not involve disputed facts, the only burden was that of persuasion. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 18 FSM R. 76, 77 (App. 2011).

The burden of proof is on the party alleging and relying on estoppel. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damage caused by the breach, and determination of the value of the damage can there be a liability for negligence. The plaintiffs have the burden of proving each these elements in order to prevail on a negligence claim, and if the plaintiffs fail to prove any one element, judgment will be entered against them. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 580 (Kos. 2013).

When damages are calculated based on figures in statements made during closing argument, those damage amounts are not supported by evidence properly before the trial court, and, as such, any judgment based on them would be vacated and the court cannot take the "judicial notice" of the plaintiffs' requested figures. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582-83 (Kos. 2013).

Determination of damages is an essential element of the plaintiffs' causes of action. Trial is the time for plaintiffs to present evidence about the amount of their damages since, in civil cases, the plaintiff has the burden of proving at trial each element of the plaintiff's cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if the plaintiff fails to do so, judgment will be entered against the plaintiff. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 583 (Kos. 2013).

When the plaintiff testified that he was uncertain whether he lost any pay because of his absences from work due to the September 8, 2010 and the November 4, 2010 arrests and no other evidence was introduced about his state employee pay or its amount, the court must find as fact that he did not lose any pay as the result of the September 8, and November 4, 2010 arrests and detentions since he had the burden of proof to establish that he lost pay and the amount of that lost pay and he did not meet that burden. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2013).

It is within the court's sound discretion whether to admit additional evidence after trial. Exercise of such discretion must take into account the evidence's probative value against the danger of injuring the opposite party through surprise. The opposing party cannot properly examine or counter evidence offered after trial, and so the burden is on the party offering the evidence to demonstrate good cause why the evidence should be admitted. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 269 (Pon. 2014).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of the plaintiff's cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if the plaintiff fails to prove any one element, judgment will be entered against the plaintiff. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 566 (Kos. 2014).

A plaintiff has the burden to persuade the court, with competent evidence, as to the amount of his damages. Parties have the responsibility to put forward the evidence to support their case. This is not the court's responsibility. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 117 (Kos. 2015).

A plaintiff must introduce his evidence during his case-in-chief so the defendants will have an opportunity to address it, or to stipulate to it, or to challenge it and to cross-examine witnesses about it, and where, if the defendants feel the need, they can introduce evidence to counter it when it their turn comes. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 117 (Kos. 2015).

Since the defendants pled the plaintiff's failure to mitigate damages as an affirmative defense, if the plaintiff had put on evidence of his damages, the burden would have shifted to the defendants to prove that the plaintiff failed to mitigate his damages or to prove to what extent he did mitigate his damages. But since the plaintiff put on no evidence about the amount of his damages, the burden of proof about damages never shifted to the defendants. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 116 (Kos. 2015).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion and it consists of more than a scintilla of evidence but may be less than a preponderance. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 20 FSM R. 188, 193 (App. 2015).

The movant bears the burden of establishing the elements of civil contempt by clear and convincing evidence, which is a higher standard than the preponderance of the evidence standard, common in civil cases, although not as high as beyond a reasonable doubt. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 (Pon. 2016).

The standard of review for a criminal contempt conviction under 4 F.S.M.C. 119(1)(b), like the standard for any criminal conviction, is whether the appellate court can conclude that the trier of fact reasonably could have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 n.11 (Pon. 2016).

A contemnor's intent must be ascertained from all the acts, words, and circumstances surrounding the occurrence. Ultimately, most bona fide representations tend to excuse, but cannot justify the act. Notably, an attorney's good faith belief that they were not obligated to appear at that time may be accepted or rejected. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

The clear and convincing standard will be applied to the evidence in a civil contempt case. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

The burden of proof is upon the plaintiffs to show the fact and extent of the injury and the amount or value of damages. Determination of damages is an essential element of the plaintiffs' cause of action, which, at trial, the plaintiffs must prove as to amount by a preponderance of evidence. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 562 (Pon. 2016).

When the evidence shows that the plaintiffs did in fact perform work during the relevant time period and that the standard operating procedure for many years was to submit employee-created time sheets similar to those that the plaintiffs submitted and when the government concedes that, if there was a valid contract, the plaintiffs would have been paid based on the submission of the same time sheets, there is sufficient evidence to carry the plaintiffs' burden on damages. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 562 (Pon. 2016).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion. It consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. Substantial evidence is also evidence of such quality and weight that reasonable and fair-minded men in the exercise of impartial judgment might reach different conclusions. Thalman v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 625, 628 (Yap 2016).

In a civil case, the party advancing Pohnpeian customary practice or law must establish, by a preponderance of the evidence, the relevant custom and tradition. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 640 (Pon. 2016).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if he fails to do so, judgment will be entered against him. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 17 (Pon. 2016).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion, and it consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. Heirs of Alokoa v. Heirs of Preston, 21 FSM R. 94, 98 (App. 2016).

Parties have the responsibility to put forward the evidence to support their case. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 122 (App. 2017).

Preponderance of the evidence is not evidence to a "moral certainty" or "clear and convincing evidence." As a standard of proof, "preponderance of the evidence" means that the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 187 (Pon. 2017).

If the plaintiff's evidence is more convincing than that which defendant offers in opposition, then the plaintiff has met its burden of showing that the facts for which it contends are more probably true than false. If, on the other hand, the plaintiff's evidence is less convincing than that offered in opposition, then the defendant's version of events is the more likely, and the plaintiff fails to meet its burden of proof. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 187 (Pon. 2017).

In a civil case, a plaintiff must prove the allegations by a preponderance of evidence in order to prevail. Preponderance of the evidence is not evidence to a moral certainty or clear and convincing evidence. As a standard of proof, preponderance of the evidence means that the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. But, if the plaintiff's evidence is less convincing than that offered in opposition, then the defendant's version of events is the more likely, and the plaintiff fails to meet its burden of proof. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 188 n.7 (Pon. 2017).

The court will not speculate as to under what authority was the plaintiff's vehicle being kept at an auto shop, because the burden is on the plaintiff to establish why the vehicle was being kept by the shop. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 189 (Pon. 2017).

A contractor may attack a contracting officer's decision to terminate on the grounds that such decision was an abuse of discretion or arbitrary and capricious, but the contractor has the burden of proving arbitrary and capricious conduct. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 283, 289 (Pon. 2017).

Even if substantial evidence were proffered to demonstrate the existence of fraud, that proffer was inadequate. Ordinarily, a proponent's burden to establish fraud is clear and convincing evidence, which is the highest burden of proof in civil cases. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 315 (App. 2017).

Since "substantial evidence" is "more than a scintilla, but less than a preponderance, substantial evidence would be insufficient to prove fraud, even if the usual, lower burden of proof – preponderance of the evidence – was applied. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 315 (App. 2017).

In reviewing the evidence in the record below, the court must recognize that it is primarily Social Security's task to assess the witnesses' credibility, the admissibility of evidence, and to resolve factual disputes since substantial evidence is a deferential standard, which is more than a scintilla or some evidence, but less than a preponderance of evidence. The court does not assume the fact-finder's role, since the issue is purely one of law. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 428 (App. 2018).

Any purportedly erroneous trial court finding about specific boundary lines' accuracy of the lot are safely ameliorated as harmless error, when the plaintiff's proffer of evidence was inadequate to show that it would have developed this lot during the divested five-month period of its respective lease. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 532 (App. 2018).

The parties have the responsibility to put forward the evidence to support their case. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 532 (App. 2018).

Evidence must be in the nature of facts – not conclusions or counsel's unsupported allegations. An argument contained in a brief does not constitute evidence. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 533 (App. 2018).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if he fails to do so, judgment will be entered against him. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 562, 565 (Pon. 2018).

Preponderance of the evidence is not evidence to a "moral certainty" or "clear and convincing evidence." As a standard of proof, preponderance of the evidence means that the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 595 (Pon. 2018).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if he fails to do so, judgment will be entered against him. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 597 (Pon. 2018).

Substantial evidence is more than a scintilla. It means such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept to support a conclusion. It is evidence affording a substantial basis of fact from which the fact in issue can be reasonably inferred. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 631 (Chk. 2018).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if he fails to do so, judgment will be entered against him. FSM v.

Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. 2018).

Preponderance of the evidence is not evidence to a "moral certainty" or "clear and convincing evidence." As a standard of proof, "preponderance of the evidence" means that the facts asserted by the plaintiff are more probably true than false. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. 2018).

Rationality is what is reviewed under both the substantial evidence rule and the arbitrary and capricious standard. An action is arbitrary and capricious when it is taken without sound basis in reason or regard to the facts. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 22 FSM R. 137, 143-44 (Pon. 2019).

Substantial evidence need not be much evidence, and though "substantial" means more than a mere scintilla, or some evidence, it is less than is required to sustain a verdict being attacked as against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 22 FSM R. 137, 144 n.4 (Pon. 2019).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion, and it consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. George v. Palsis, 22 FSM R. 165, 171 (App. 2019).

A plaintiff has the burden to persuade the court with competent evidence about the amount of damages. Reasonably calculated damages must be shown as part of a prima facie case. George v. Palsis, 22 FSM R. 165, 174 (App. 2019).

When a plaintiff fails to offer evidence of calculated damages at trial, the trial court may use its discretion to strike a document listing damages that was submitted after trial, and, in striking that submitted documentation, the trial court does not abuse its discretion because the opposing party cannot properly examine or counter evidence offered after trial. George v. Palsis, 22 FSM R. 165, 174 (App. 2019).

The burden to demonstrate good cause why evidence offered after trial should be admitted is on the party offering the evidence. George v. Palsis, 22 FSM R. 165, 174 (App. 2019).

Substantial evidence is evidence which a reasoning mind would accept as sufficient to support a conclusion, and it consists of more than a mere scintilla of evidence, but may be somewhat less than a preponderance. Jackson v. Siba, 22 FSM R. 224, 230 (App. 2019).

"Clear and convincing evidence" is the standard of proof required to prove the existence of a defendant's physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338 n.5 (Chk. 2019).

While the court recognizes the difficulties a Social Security claimant may have in substantiating her claim, the burden of proof remains with the applicant as a matter of law and does not shift to the Social Security Administration. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 396 (Kos. 2019).

To prevail on a claim of trespass, nuisance, or a civil action for a due process violation, the plaintiff must prove each element of the claims by the preponderance of the evidence. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 421 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of the plaintiff's cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if the plaintiff fails to prove any one element, judgment will be entered against the plaintiff. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 486 (Pon. 2020).

Even in a criminal case, eyewitness testimony may not be necessary if there is abundant evidence in the record to support the court's conclusion. In civil matters, a less rigorous standard of proof applies. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 487 (Pon. 2020).

– Expert Opinion

Opinion testimony by experts has no such conclusive force that there is an error of law in not following it. The trier of fact may decide what weight, if any, is to be given such testimony, and even if the testimony is uncontroverted, may exercise independent judgment. Setik v. Sana, 6 FSM R. 549, 553-54 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Expert opinion testimony is admissible if the witness is qualified by knowledge, skill, experience, training, education, or otherwise; and that the expert's opinion will assist the trier of fact to understand the fact at issue. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 622 (App. 1996).

A trial court's qualification of a witness as an expert and the admission of his opinion testimony will not be reversed unless clearly erroneous. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 622 (App. 1996).

To be qualified as an expert witness, the witness must have skill and knowledge superior to the trier of fact, but expert opinion testimony is not restricted to the person best qualified to give an opinion. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 622 (App. 1996).

Under the work product doctrine, even if a plaintiff demonstrates substantial need for factual information contained in the report of a consulting expert whose services a defendant sought in anticipation of litigation, he would have to show exceptional circumstances under FSM Civil Rule 26(b)(4)(B) before being entitled to discover the consulting expert's opinions. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 471, 476 (Pon. 1998).

Rule 26 does not authorize any discovery concerning experts who the other party does not intend to call as a trial witness absent a showing of exceptional circumstances. It would be "unfair" to allow a party to extract his adversaries' consulting expert's knowledge or opinion without having to bear any of the financial cost of retaining that expert and to take unwarranted advantage of the opponent's trial preparation or investigations. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 471, 482-83 (Pon. 1998).

Absent the requisite showing of exceptional circumstances, FSM Civil Rule 26 does not permit a party to obtain any information specific to an adversary's nontestifying experts through interrogatories. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 471, 483 (Pon. 1998).

If a person is to be used by the defendants as a testifying expert, the plaintiff would be entitled to all the discovery authorized by FSM Civil Rule 26(b)(4)(A), and all documents the expert considered in forming his opinions would be discoverable as well. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 471, 483 (Pon. 1998).

If specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 497-98 (Pon. 1998).

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise. The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to him at or before the hearing. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 15 (Yap 1999).

When an expert's testimony, although not objected to, lacks the foundation contemplated by Evidence Rule 703, it is, at best, entitled to slight weight. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 16 (Yap 1999).

The appellate court begins its review of trial court rulings by presuming that the trial court's factual findings are correct. The trial court's grant or refusal to adopt an expert's opinion is a question of fact and factual questions are reviewed by this court under the clearly erroneous standard. Sellem v. Maras, 9 FSM R. 36, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

To state an opinion is not to set forth specific facts. In the context of a summary judgment motion, an expert must back up his opinion with specific facts. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 580 (Pon. 2002).

No expert opinion arises simultaneously with the events that ultimately gives rise to that opinion, but comes to harvest in the course of a lawsuit and in the usual case is a gloss on the occurrence or events on which the lawsuit is based. In that sense an opinion is not a "fact" within the meaning of Civil Rule 56(e), but since Evidence Rules 702-704 expressly allow for expert witnesses' opinion testimony, the question is whether any given opinion is backed up with specific facts. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 580 (Pon. 2002).

The precise combustive characteristics of kerosene, gasoline, and mixtures of the two lie beyond the ordinary ken of the court. In these circumstances, an expert's opinion is indispensable to the finder of fact in determining whether questions of fact may be reasonably resolved only in favor of the moving party. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 581 (Pon. 2002).

An expert may opine on a particular case's facts as they are made known to him at or before the hearing at which the expert testifies and the expert may offer an opinion that embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 581 (Pon. 2002).

When the expert opinion offered by the nonmovant does not go to the causation issue presented by the facts, and on which the movant's expert offered his opinion, it does not create a fact issue under Rule 56. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 582 (Pon. 2002).

The litigation process is designed not only to discover information, but also to reduce it to the essentials necessary to advance a party's case. When a lawsuit deals with scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge, an expert's opinion is a useful tool in this paring process. Its value derives in no insubstantial part from the fact that it reflects a synthesis of relevant facts. When such an opinion goes to a necessary element of the case, and stands unopposed by a countervailing, factually supported expert opinion that fairly meets the moving party's opinion, it may be dispositive in the context of a summary judgment motion. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 582 (Pon. 2002).

When the plaintiff's expert's testimony does not set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue of fact as to the kerosene contamination issue and since the defect's existence goes to a necessary element of the plaintiff's case, the plaintiff has failed to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of an element essential to his case, and on which he will bear the burden of proof at trial and summary judgment in the defendants' favor is therefore appropriate. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583 (Pon. 2002).

Facts that go to the question of a contamination source are rendered immaterial in light of the defendants' expert's competent, uncontroverted expert testimony that nothing about the combustion event that caused the injury led him to believe that the kerosene was contaminated. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583-84 (Pon. 2002).

When the defendants' expert has testified, and the plaintiff conceded, that gasoline and kerosene are completely miscible, when the plain inference from expert's miscibility testimony is that the fuel which first burned normally was identical in its chemical makeup to the fuel which the plaintiff later claimed exploded, and when the defendant offers nothing in her response to address the anomaly created by the expert's specific testimony on the miscibility point as it relates to her memory of what occurred, in the absence of such evidence, and given the expert's competency to opine on a verifiable physical phenomenon like miscibility, no issue of fact exists on this specific point. George v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 590, 592 (Pon. 2002).

An economist, who holds a master's degree in economics, is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education under FSM Evidence Rule 702, since his expert testimony, if admissible, will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine the economic damages in issue. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 556-57 (Pon. 2004).

The court may appoint an expert witness to assist both the state and the defendant in evaluating a criminal defendant's mental condition. Kosrae v. Charley, 13 FSM R. 214, 215 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A Certified Public Accountant's testimony based on his compilation of financial records and some computations that a layman could have done and drawing conclusions from them is something an accountant does based on his technical knowledge, skill, experience, and education and he would therefore qualify as an expert witness. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 19-20 (App. 2006).

Expert testimony based on ideal conditions and not reality would not make the testimony irrelevant; it would only bear on the weight it would be given. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 (App. 2006).

Generally, although absent a statute or contract expert witness fees and research expenses are not taxable costs, successful litigants may be awarded their out-of-pocket expenses for an expert witness when the expert witness was an indispensable part of the trial and was crucial to the ultimate resolution of the issues and the costs were appropriate and not excessive. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 75 (Yap 2007).

The Rules of Evidence expressly permit an expert witness to testify that he had made assessments of the damage to submerged reefs in numerous other cases, and, as such, the trial court was free to assess whatever weight it saw fit with regard to the expert's testimony when determining the damages that should be assessed. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 60-61 (App. 2008).

Expert opinions have no such conclusive force that there is an error of law in refusing to follow them. It is for the trier of fact to decide whether any, and if any what, weight is to be given to such testimony. Even if the testimony is uncontroverted the trier of fact may exercise independent judgment. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 61 (App. 2008).

An issue of whether the trial court erred by failing to recognize someone as an expert witness is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197 (App. 2008).

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training or education, may testify thereto in the form of opinion or otherwise. It is not the witness, but the trial judge who has the responsibility and discretion to determine whether a witness is qualified as an expert. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197 (App. 2008).

Once faced with the proffer of an expert witness, the question of whether the witness may be qualified as an expert is a preliminary fact to be decided by the trial court. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197 (App. 2008).

When the defendant never presented a witness as an expert witness at trial, the appellate court cannot find that the trial court abused its discretion in declining or otherwise refusing to qualify that witness as an expert witness. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197 (App. 2008).

Although Evidence Rule 706 provides that the court may, on its own motion, enter an order to show cause why an expert witness should not be appointed, a trial court in not acting sua sponte to have a defense witness qualified as an expert witness did not abuse its discretion. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197-98 (App. 2008).

A motion to exclude an expert witness's deposition testimony is premature when it is made before his deposition has been completed, and any motion to exclude his trial testimony on the ground of relevance before the deposition is complete is also premature. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 648, 652 (Pon. 2009).

A trial court's grant or refusal to adopt an expert's opinion is a question of fact and will not be reversed unless clearly erroneous. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

A party needs to finish deposing the opposing party's witness far enough ahead of trial so that it would have a fair opportunity to meet that witness's expected expert opinion testimony. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 192, 194 (Pon. 2010).

Ordinarily, a determination that the care, skill, and diligence exercised by a professional engaged in furnishing skilled services for compensation was less than that normally possessed and exercised by members of that profession in good standing and that the damage sustained resulted from the variance requires expert testimony to establish the prevailing standard and the consequences of departure from it in the case under consideration. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580-81 (Pon. 2011).

Because the fact-finder is not permitted to speculate as to the standard against which to measure the acts of the professional in determining whether he exercised a reasonable degree of care, expert testimony is required. Only in a few very clear and palpable cases can a court dispense with the expert testimony requirement to establish the parameters of professional conduct and find damages to have been caused by a professional's failure to exercise reasonable care, skill, and diligence. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 581 (Pon. 2011).

Even assuming arguendo that wide recognition and practice of the custom has disappeared so as to preclude judicial notice of its existence, testimony given by the Iso Nahnken of Nett provides a sufficient basis to conclude that the custom is still practiced today when he testified that the custom is still practiced and the defendants failed to sufficiently rebut that testimony and a conclusory argument to the contrary was not evidence. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

– Hearsay

The excited utterance exception to the hearsay rule, FSM Evid. R. 803, does not permit admission of a statement made under stress of excitement caused by a startling event or condition, if the statement does not relate to the event or condition. Jonah v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 308, 313 (App. 1992).

Hearsay is not admissible in a hearing or trial. Hearsay is an out-of-court statement offered as evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted. A statement is an oral or written assertion. An affidavit is hearsay which is inadmissible unless allowed by an exception to the hearsay rule. In re Disqualification of Justice, 7 FSM R. 278, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A court may rely on hearsay evidence for the purpose of finding probable cause at a post-seizure hearing. FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 303 (Kos. 1995).

Although procedural and evidentiary rules are relaxed at a probable cause hearing a prosecutor may not rely solely on hearsay evidence when other, more competent testimony is available. FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 304 (Kos. 1995).

A court may discount inherently unreliable evidence. The more levels of hearsay or the more hearsay statements contained within an affidavit, which is hearsay itself, the more unreliable the evidence is. FSM

v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 304 (Kos. 1995).

Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment are not excluded from admissibility by the hearsay rule. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 436 n.28 (Pon. 1996).

In order for a deposition to be admissible a deponent must physically appear before someone who can identify and administer the oath even if the deposition is taken telephonically. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (III), 7 FSM R. 558, 559 (Chk. 1996).

Out of court admissions by a party-opponent are not hearsay statements. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (IV), 7 FSM R. 628, 630 (Chk. 1996).

Hearsay within hearsay is inadmissible. Hearsay otherwise admissible may be excluded where it consists primarily of reiteration of a statement made by some other unidentified person. Bank of Hawaii v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n, 7 FSM R. 659, 663 (Pon. 1996).

A statement, which if it had been made by the defendant would have been admissible as an admission of a party-opponent, is inadmissible hearsay when made by the defendant's then spouse as part of a traditional apology, and cannot be considered on a summary judgment motion. Glocke v. Pohnpei, 8 FSM R. 60, 62 (Pon. 1997).

Official government documents submitted to Congress are evidence that falls within an exception to the hearsay rule. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 364 n.8 (Pon. 1998).

Counsel's conversations with persons involved in drafting the Constitution are hearsay, especially when there is no competent evidence in the record, or in the Constitutional Convention Journal, to support counsel's assertion. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386 n.27 (Pon. 1998).

Statements in a document in existence twenty years or more the authenticity of which is established are excepted from the hearsay rule. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 182 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

The evidence rules define a letter from a criminal defendant as non-hearsay – an admission by a party-opponent, and if the defendant were not to testify on his own behalf, as is his right, it could also be admissible under the hearsay exception for statements against interest when the declarant is unavailable to testify. If produced and properly authenticated, the letter itself would be admissible evidence. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 6 (Chk. 2002).

Merely because a person who holds a public office creates a document does not necessarily make that document a public record admissible under the hearsay exception for public documents. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 6 (Chk. 2002).

As a general rule, hearsay evidence is inadmissible unless it falls within an exception to the hearsay rule. The reputation in a community, arising before the controversy, as to boundaries of or customs affecting lands in the community, and reputation as to events of general history important to the community or state or nation in which located, is such an exception and is admissible as evidence. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The subject himself cannot provide the factual basis for the date of his birth, as his knowledge of this information is based upon hearsay only. A person does not have personal knowledge of his date of birth. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 245 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae Rules of Evidence do not apply in the Land Commission or Land Court. In the case of hearsay testimony, the Land Commission or presiding justice shall determine the testimony's relevancy and the credibility of the witness. The purpose of allowing hearsay testimony and other evidence at land proceedings, without application of the Kosrae Rules of Evidence, is to allow all relevant evidence on the claims presented before the Land Commission and Land Court, without limitations imposed by the Rules of Evidence. The determination of relevancy of evidence and credibility of witnesses is made by the adjudicators, the Land Commission or a justice of the Kosrae Land Court. Taulung v. Jack, 11 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A log of payments in which entries were made at or about the same time as the transactions took place, and that they were records he kept in the normal course of business can be admitted into evidence. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 592 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Hearsay is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Hearsay is generally not admissible, and therefore cannot be relied upon to create a material issue of fact when opposing a summary judgment motion. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 147 (Pon. 2003).

It is the Land Court's duty to assess the witnesses' credibility, the admissibility of evidence, and to resolve factual disputes and it retains discretion to accord weight to evidence presented at hearing, including appropriate weight to hearsay evidence made by a person, now deceased, and therefore not subject to cross-examination. Wesley v. Carl, 13 FSM R. 429, 432 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Any requests deemed admitted may be used only against the party deemed admitting it. This is because admissions obtained under Rule 36 may be offered in evidence, but are subject to all pertinent objections to admissibility that may be interposed. It is only when the admission is offered against the party that made it that it comes within the exception to the definition of hearsay as an admission of a party opponent. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 471 (Chk. 2005).

When there was testimony concerning the world price for pepper and its relation to Pohnpei's price; when the trial court only determined that Pohnpei set its price without any regard to the world price, not that it bore a certain relationship to the world price; and when someone in the pepper export business would be expected to have first-hand knowledge concerning world prices, the trial court finding that Pohnpei set its buying price without regard to the world price or to the sustainability of the pepper processing facility as a profit-making venture is not error. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 (App. 2006).

Even if the evidence is of events that took place in periods for which prosecution may be time-barred, it is not necessarily inadmissible. Nor is hearsay necessarily inadmissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 140-41 (Chk. 2006).

Statements by a party-opponent offered against that party are not hearsay and are admissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 2006).

A statement by a party's co-conspirator made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 2006).

An FSM police report, if relevant, may be considered in a proceeding to release a vessel when it is not a criminal case, since police reports, as matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, are admissible as an exception to the rule that hearsay is generally inadmissible and since a motion for a vessel's release is in the nature of a bond or bail hearing, and the rules of evidence generally do not apply to proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 300, 302 (Chk. 2006).

An account of evidence adduced in a hearing in another case to which the movant was not a party and a hearing at which he was not present or had an opportunity to be heard, even presuming (which the court cannot do) that the evidence presented then is accurately characterized now, is not admissible and cannot be used against the movant's summary judgment motion. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Former testimony is not admissible unless the party against whom the testimony is now offered (or a predecessor in interest) had an opportunity and similar motive to develop that testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Although the strict guidelines against the admission of hearsay evidence do not apply in a probable cause determination, a prosecutor may not rely solely on hearsay testimony when other, more competent testimony is available. The court may therefore discount unreliable hearsay or other evidence that is inherently untrustworthy or suspicious, unless additional measures are taken to ensure reliability or to explain those exigent circumstances that make it impossible to produce more reliable or competent evidence. A prosecutor's own representations are not a substitute for competent, reliable evidence in the form of first-hand testimony or appropriately detailed affidavits from investigating officers who obtained first-hand accounts. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the affiant's belief that probable cause existed was based solely on affiant's review of a police report, which presumably was prepared by an officer who investigated the crime scene; when the affiant does not state whether the affiant spoke with the reporting officer, or even identify the reporting officer; when there is no explanation of how the information contained in the police report was obtained; when there is no evidence that the affiant or the unknown reporting officer interviewed witnesses or investigated the incident and there is no way to determine the extent to which the report itself was based on hearsay or any assurance that it was based on the investigating officer's reasonable belief rather than on pure speculation, then the "affidavit of probable cause" is deficient because the affidavit suffers from multiple layers of hearsay, and multiple levels of hearsay become less reliable as the number of levels of hearsay increase and because the affidavit fails to adequately identify the information's source or sources and may be based on unattributed hearsay statements of one or more declarants. As the number of included hearsay statements increases, the guarantees of reliability that justify admission become attenuated. Hearsay that is otherwise admissible may be excluded where it primarily reiterates statements of other, unidentified persons. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 98-99 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Hearsay is inadmissible unless it falls within an exception to the hearsay rule. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 20 (App. 2010).

FSM Evidence Rule 803(6) authorizes the admission, over a hearsay objection, of a record made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the record, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 20 (App. 2010).

Business records are normally authenticated by a custodian of records. The custodian or other qualified witness who must authenticate business records need not be the person who prepared or maintained the records, or even an employee of the record-keeping entity, as long as the witness understands the system used to prepare the records. Objections concerning the identity or competency of preparer of a record might go to the evidentiary weight or credibility of a record but not to the record's admissibility. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 20 (App. 2010).

Because of the general trustworthiness of regularly kept records and the need for such evidence in many cases, the business records exception has been construed generously in favor of admissibility. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 20 (App. 2010).

No evidence rule requires that the custodian have personal knowledge of the business record. The custodian is merely a person with knowledge of what the proponent claims the record to be. Rule 803 also does not require that the custodian be the author of the record or even an employee of the business from which the record originated. The witness need only be a qualified witness to satisfy the requirements of Rule 803(6). Whether the witness was qualified to satisfy those requirements is a decision within the trial court's discretion. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 21 (App. 2010).

When an extensive evidentiary foundation had been laid before the business records exhibits were admitted over the defendants' hearsay objections, the trial court, having heard adequate foundational testimony, did not abuse its discretion by admitting the exhibits. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 21 (App. 2010).

When compiling of debts owed to businesses was a regular transaction of any company regardless of whether or not it had been prepared at or near the time of pending litigation and when the accountant/bookkeeper was specifically hired to address accounts receivables information for the businesses, her compilation of debts owed by an authority was in the regular course of her duties and a typical business practice, and therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the debt compilation. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 21 (App. 2010).

When the government's witnesses testified as to what the exhibits were and, if a witness did not know what an exhibit was, it was not admitted, the weight or credibility that an exhibit was given was for the trial court to decide. When the trial court took into account the defendants' stated concerns regarding the documents but there was no requirement that the exhibits be excluded after the witnesses had testified that they were what the government claimed them to be, the trial court, having heard adequate testimony, did not abuse its discretion by admitting the exhibits. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 22 (App. 2010).

Since hearsay testimony is inherently unreliable, the court cannot be required to or presumed to rely on hearsay testimony over contrary direct evidence to determine where the preponderance of evidence lies. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 2010).

Although a criminal defendant may seek introduction of a police report as an offering against the government of a factual finding resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law and the declarant's availability would have been immaterial for the purposes of ruling on the report's admission, when the defendant did not seek to admit the report and the report was not part of the record, the court will not consider it as a basis to challenge the sufficiency of its findings. Chuuk v. Inek, 17 FSM R. 137, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

To admit statements regarding personal or family history under Evidence Rule 804(b)(4), the proponent would have to show that the declarant was unavailable. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When a letter is hearsay and the proponent does not argue its admissibility under any exception to the hearsay rule and when the letter's contents were irrelevant and inadmissible since the letter was proffered as evidence that, in terminating the proponent, the Director was acting in conformity with other wrongs he allegedly committed, the Kosrae State Court correctly granted the State's motion in limine to exclude the letter since evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove a person's character in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 244 (App. 2010).

"Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

If it appears from the complaint, or from affidavit or affidavit filed with the complaint, that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant has committed it, a warrant for the defendant's arrest will issue to any officer authorized by law to execute it. The probable cause finding may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

As the levels of hearsay included in the affidavit increase, the guarantees of reliability that justify admission become attenuated. Hearsay that is otherwise admissible may be excluded where it primarily reiterates statements of other, unidentified persons. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A statement by a party's co-conspirator made during the course and in furtherance of a conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 525 n.3 (Chk. 2011).

Hearsay as is an unsworn, out-of-court statement offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Chuuk v. Mitipok, 17 FSM R. 552, 553 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Evidence Rule 803(22) is an exception to the general rule that makes hearsay inadmissible. This exception allows evidence of a final judgment, entered after a trial or upon a plea of guilty (but not upon a plea of nolo contendere), adjudging a person guilty of a crime punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year, to prove any fact essential to sustain the judgment even when the declarant is available as a witness. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 458 (Chk. 2014).

Evidence Rule 803(22) merely makes a person's conviction admissible evidence. To make that evidence conclusive in a summary judgment motion, a plaintiff must rely on a legal principle known as collateral estoppel or issue preclusion. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 458 (Chk. 2014).

An ancient document is authenticated if evidence that the document, in any form, is in such condition, as to create no suspicion concerning its authenticity, was in a place where if authentic, would likely be, and has been in existence 20 years or more at the time it is offered. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 121 (App. 2017).

A statement made by an alleged co-conspirator during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 84 n.2 (Chk. 2018).

A court may attach the most limited amount of credibility to hearsay testimony that fails to fall under any exception, but to which no objection was made. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 422 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

It is well-established that hearsay may be used to establish probable cause. The finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 456 (Pon. 2020).

– Judicial Notice

A trial court is entitled to take judicial notice of an agreement authorizing state police officers to act on behalf of the FSM. Doone v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 103, 106 (App. 1985).

In a case in which the defendant proposes a standard of requiring clear and convincing evidence in civil conspiracy cases rather than a preponderance based upon conditions, customs and traditions in Micronesia, it is incumbent upon him to establish such conditions by evidence, because the court will not take judicial notice of such conditions, customs or traditions. Opet v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 3 FSM R. 159, 164 (App. 1987).

The trial court may take judicial notice at any stage of the proceedings and may do so when he gives his findings. Este v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 132, 135 (App. 1989).

When the trial court states that it is taking judicial notice of a fact the parties can raise the issue of the propriety thereof. Este v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 132, 135 (App. 1989).

It is mandatory for a court to take judicial notice of the amount of judgments in favor of creditors when a request has been made and the court has been given all necessary information. Senda v. Mid-Pac Constr. Co., 5 FSM R. 277, 280 (App. 1992).

Judicial notice may be taken on appeal. Welson v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 281, 284 (App. 1992).

When requested to by a party, and once it has been supplied with all the necessary information, a court must take judicial notice of an adjudicative fact, only if it is either generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. Counsel's oral argument to that effect is not enough. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 312, 313 (Chk. 1994).

A court may take judicial notice at any stage of the proceedings including during a petition for rehearing on the appellate level. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 566 (App. 1994).

A court may take judicial notice of its own reported decisions. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 11 n.2 (App. 1995).

A court may consider as evidence against pleader, in the action in which they are filed, a party's earlier admissions in its responsive pleadings even though it was later withdrawn or superseded by amended pleadings. A court may take judicial notice of them as part of the record. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 249 (Chk. 1995).

When portions of court files in other cases are introduced into evidence a court may take judicial notice of all the papers and pleadings on file in those other cases. Kaminaga v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 272, 273 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

When most documents provided in support of a party's submission are official records of the opponent state government, the Kosrae State Court may take judicial notice of the records. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 455, 459 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In a land case, the Kosrae State Court may take judicial notice of the documents in the file of a Trust Territory land case to clarify if the judgment in that case concerned the land in this case. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

In determining damages, the court may take judicial notice regarding the replacement costs for college transcripts and a college diploma, when they are easily ascertainable and available on the University of Guam Internet site and from the University of Guam Office of Admissions and Records. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When deciding the ownership of tideland, the trial court did not err in not taking judicial notice of and following the judgment in a different case that dealt only with the boundaries and ownership of adjacent filled land. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 544 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

An appellate court may receive proof or take notice of facts outside the record for determining whether a question presented to it is moot. Wainit v. Weno, 10 FSM R. 601, 610 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Judicial notice may be taken of a statutory provision. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 240 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The court may take judicial notice that a person's status as a chief implies his residence within the area of which they are chief. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 12 FSM R. 192, 199 (Yap 2003).

If it were an adjudicative fact, the court could take judicial notice of another suit's existence but not of that complaint's contents when the necessary information has not been supplied. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 641 n.3 (Chk. 2004).

In assessing damages, the court may take judicial notice of the prevailing cost in Kosrae of items similar to the ones lost. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When portions of court files in other cases are introduced into evidence, a court may take judicial notice of all the papers and pleadings on file in those other cases. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 125 n.2 (Chk. 2005).

The court may take judicial notice of a fact not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either 1) generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction or 2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. The court must take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information, but when the existence of the documents is disputed by the plaintiffs and the defendants have not provided the court with the information necessary to take judicial notice of it, such as either copies of the filed document or copy of the docket book showing that such a document was filed, the court will decline to take judicial notice. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 387 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

The court may take judicial notice that the airport departure fee from Chuuk is $15 per person and that this is included in the contractual repatriation travel costs. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 555 (Chk. 2005).

When, at argument, the state presented the defendant's certificate of live birth, which indicated his age as less than 21 years of age on the date of the offense, the court can take judicial notice of the defendant's certificate of live birth, which is an official public Kosrae state government record. Kosrae v. Jonithan, 14 FSM R. 94, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Since an appellate court may receive proof or take notice of facts outside the record for determining whether a question presented to it is moot, the court therefore may take notice of the opinion in a related appeal case. Nikichiw v. Marsolo, 15 FSM R. 177, 178 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Foreign law is a fact which must be pled and proven. But state law does not need to be expressly pled, because the court may take judicial notice of any state law. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 595 (App. 2008).

Since the court must take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information, a party, at some point, may have had to provide the trial court and the opposing party with a copy of the statute and its provisions or make them aware of it if they were not. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 595 (App. 2008).

The court can take judicial notice of a fact not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either 1) generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction or 2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned, and the court must take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 66, 69 (Chk. 2008).

When the court has not been supplied with the information necessary for the court to take judicial notice that life insurance was a state employee benefit when CPUC was created and what the insurance coverage's terms were or to conclude that CPUC has not adopted its own merit system with changed benefits, there are genuine issues of material fact that preclude either party being entitled to summary judgment: 1) whether state employees in 1997 were afforded life insurance benefits and on what terms (contributory, non-contributory; on the job only, 24-hour; etc.); 2) whether CPUC has since established its own merit system and then altered the benefits; and 3) whether, if notice of the lapse of insurance coverage was required, it was given for the July 2004 lapse. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 66, 69 (Chk. 2008).

A court may take judicial notice of its own reported decisions and of papers and pleadings on file in other cases before it when portions of those cases have been introduced into evidence. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 588 n.3 (Pon. 2009).

On a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, only the well-pled or well-pleaded facts are to be accepted as true, and, no matter how artfully the allegations may be crafted, the court does not assume the truth of legal conclusions merely because they are cast in the form of factual allegations since conclusory allegations or legal allegations masquerading as factual conclusions will not suffice to prevent a motion to dismiss. Furthermore, the court need not accept as true allegations that contradict facts which may be judicially noticed; for example, the court may consider matters of public record including pleadings, orders and other papers filed with the court. And the court does not have to credit invective, bald assertions, unsupportable conclusions, periphrastic circumlocutions, and the like. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 593 (Pon. 2009).

Although the court may take judicial notice of documents filed in earlier related cases without converting the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to a summary judgment motion, the court, when it has given notice in open court that it would consider the motions as summary judgment motions, will follow that course. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 593 (Pon. 2009).

A court must, if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information, take judicial notice of a fact not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned, but when the necessary information has not been supplied, the court cannot take judicial notice. Counsel's oral representation or argument is inadequate if the necessary information has not been supplied to the court. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74 (Chk. 2010).

Defense counsel's representations of what the testimony was in and what facts a state court proceeding found involving a defendant's statements, was inadequate for the FSM Supreme Court to take judicial notice of those adjudicative facts when the court has not been supplied with the necessary information for it to take judicial notice. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 2010).

By statute, no evidence or testimony can be considered at the appeal hearing except those matters which constituted the official record, transcripts, and exhibits received at the Land Court hearing. Thus, when a transcript of 2004 Land Court hearing testimony and 1991 testimony before the Land Registration team were part of the title registration process, they should have been part of the official Land Court record and thus reviewable by the State Court. And when a Trust Territory High Court case that was mentioned in the Land Court decision both that court and the State Court could properly take judicial notice of its files if the files had been given to the Land Court and to the other parties. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 659 (App. 2011).

When portions of court files in other cases are introduced into evidence, a court may take judicial notice of all papers and pleadings in those cases. Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 154 n.1 (Pon. 2012).

The court can take judicial notice that the social configuration of the outer islands in the State of Yap differs significantly from the Yap main island (even the vernacular language is significantly different) since it is a fact not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction and since the court's decisions are required to be consistent with the social and geographic configuration of Micronesia. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 262, 267 (Yap 2012).

When the parties neglected to put any admissible evidence of land values before the court, the Asian Development Bank valuation system, although officially adopted only for governmental transactions, is evidence of Chuuk land values of which a court may take judicial notice because it is information capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386-87 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

While it may be uncontested that the value of the reef on the main island of Yap is $600 per square meter, the court cannot presume, without evidence, that $600 a square meter is an accurate value for any particular Yap outer island reef, especially where on the outer island there may be more reef and fewer people who have the right to rely on or depend on the reef's resources. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 532, 541 (Yap 2013).

The court may take judicial notice of its files in related cases. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Waite, 20 FSM R. 282, 284 n.1 (Chk. 2016).

The court may take judicial notice of its own files in related cases. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 541 (Chk. 2016).

It is only when a local custom is firmly established and generally known and been peacefully and fairly uniformly acquiesced in by those whose rights would naturally be affected that it will be judicially noticed by the court. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

The traditional and customary right of the Nahnmwarki of each established municipality of Pohnpei to receive offerings from their respective subjects is firmly established in history and still widely known and peacefully accepted by the citizens of Pohnpei, thereby making it a judicially noticeable fact. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute, in that it is either 1) generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction or 2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 30 (App. 2016).

The fact that it was widely known that Philippine immigration stamps were frequently forged, was capable of accurate and ready determination, by resorting to official Republic of the Philippines websites, the veracity of which cannot be reasonably questioned. As such, that recitation qualified as a fact, to which judicial notice could properly be ascribed. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 30 (App. 2016).

State law does not need to be expressly pled because the court may take judicial notice of any state law. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 304 (Chk. 2017).

A party opposed to a court taking judicial notice must make a timely objection. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 514 (App. 2018).

A court may take judicial notice of its own files in related cases. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 117 (App. 2018).

A court may take judicial notice of its own reported decisions and of papers and pleadings on file in other cases before it when parts of those cases have been introduced into evidence, and the court may take judicial notice of its own files in related cases. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 352 (Pon. 2019).

A court must take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information and the necessary information is not subject to reasonable dispute. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 352 (Pon. 2019).

– Objections

FSM Evidence Rule 103 contemplates timely objection and statement of reasons in support of evidentiary objections. Failure to offer reasons in timely fashion, especially when coupled with pointed avoidance by counsel of inquiry into the matters at issue, places a party in a poor position for mounting an effective challenge to an evidentiary ruling. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 47 (App. 1985).

Failure to raise objections which must be made prior to trial constitutes a waiver of objections, FSM Crim. R. 12(f). Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 159 (App. 1991).

A defendant that has failed to raise and preserve the issue has waived his right to object to the admission of evidence, but when a plain error that affects the constitutional rights of the defendant has occurred the court may notice the error. Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 161 (App. 1991).

Generally, failure to object or to seek a continuance results in a waiver of the objection. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 383 (Pon. 2001).

An objection to the admission of evidence not made at trial is not preserved for appeal because in the absence of an objection in the trial court an issue cannot properly come before the appellate division for review and the appellate division will refuse to consider the issue. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 19 (App. 2006).

When none of the objections to admission of evidence are of the type that should be addressed in a pretrial motion to suppress, which is generally reserved for evidence allegedly obtained illegally, the motion to suppress should be denied and the issue of whether any of the evidence is admissible is a question that should, and will, come up in an orderly fashion during trial and be ruled upon if offered and objected to. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 2006).

Business records are normally authenticated by a custodian of records. The custodian or other qualified witness who must authenticate business records need not be the person who prepared or maintained the records, or even an employee of the record-keeping entity, as long as the witness understands the system used to prepare the records. Objections concerning the identity or competency of preparer of a record might go to the evidentiary weight or credibility of a record but not to the record's admissibility. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 20 (App. 2010).

If an objection to the admission of evidence is not raised at the trial level, it is not preserved for appeal and the appellate court will not consider the issue. In rulings excluding evidence, however, the issue is preserved for appeal so long as the substance of the evidence was made known to the court by offer or was apparent from the context within which questions were asked. The offering of the evidence must otherwise be on the record and it must reveal the grounds for admission. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

If an objection to the admission of evidence is not raised at the trial level, it is not preserved for appeal, and the appellate court will not consider the issue. But, in rulings excluding evidence, the issue is preserved so long as the substance of the evidence was made known to the court by an offer of proof or was apparent from the context within which questions were asked and the offering of the evidence must otherwise be on the record, and it must reveal the grounds for admission. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 244 (App. 2010).

When the trial court granted a motion in limine excluding a letter, the proponent did not need to take any further steps to preserve the issue for appeal since, as an interlocutory order excluding evidence, the denial order merged with the final judgment because the letter's substance had been made known to the trial court before its ruling. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 244 (App. 2010).

– Presumptions

By statute, only the cargo actually used illegally, or the fish actually caught illegally, are subject to forfeiture, although the burden of proof (presumptions) rest on different parties depending on whether fish or cargo is involved. It is a rebuttable presumption that all fish found a board a vessel seized for Title 24 violations were illegally taken, but there is no such presumption that the cargo found aboard was "cargo used" in the alleged violation. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (I), 7 FSM R. 550, 552 (Chk. 1996).

Since hearsay testimony is inherently unreliable, the court cannot be required to or presumed to rely on hearsay testimony over contrary direct evidence to determine where the preponderance of evidence lies. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 2010).

A notarized affidavit may be authenticated without the affiant's testimony, as it is presumed to be authentic so long as it is acknowledged in the manner provided for by law. A clerk of court's manner of acknowledging an affidavit is for the affiant to swear to it under oath in the clerk's presence. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 173-74 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

When the affidavit was not acknowledged in the manner provided for by law since the affiant was not present at the time that the affidavit was acknowledged, the trial court's determination that the presumption of self-authentication had been rebutted and that the affidavit was not otherwise authenticated was proper. There was therefore no abuse of discretion in the trial court's denial of the affidavit's admission into evidence for the reason that it was not authenticated. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Every person is competent to testify. When challenged on the basis of impairment or diminished capacity, the general rule of competency is presumed, and the witness is almost invariably pronounced competent unless shown otherwise. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2016).

The party challenging the authenticity or validity of a certificate of title, bears the burden of proving it is not authentic or valid because a certificate of title is prima facie evidence of ownership and courts must attach a presumption of correctness to it. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 120-21 (App. 2017).

There are a number of presumptions in collision law that are directed to the issue of fault. When a vessel under its own power collides with an anchored vessel or a navigational structure, the burden of proving absence of fault or inevitable accident rests with the moving vessel. The presumption also applies when an unmoored, drifting vessel hits an anchored vessel or structure. The presumption does not apply, however, in the case of an allision with a submerged hidden object. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 20 (Yap 2018).

Since the presumption of fault does not apply to allisions with sunken or hidden objects, the party who is invoking the presumption has the burden of proving either that the object was visible or that the vessel otherwise possessed knowledge of the object's location. While this presumption generally does not apply to allisions with sunken or hidden objects, knowledge of an otherwise nonvisible object warrants imposition of presumed negligence against those operating the vessel who possessed this knowledge because, if the submerged object's presence is known, then the accident was neither fortuitous nor unavoidable. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 20 (Yap 2018).

The res ipsa loquitur doctrine creates a rebuttable presumption of negligence on the part of a party who is in exclusive control of an instrumentality with regard to a mishap that ordinarily does not occur in the absence of negligence. It is primarily applicable in allision cases. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 20 (Yap 2018).

When the vessel, while moving under its own power, struck a stationary object – the outer edge of a reef – and ran hard aground on it, causing damage; when the vessel's captain knew that the reef's outer edge was located off the vessel's port side, although he was unsure of its exact location; when the vessel deliberately ran parallel to the reef while the captain looked for its outer edge with his own eyes; when the reef was submerged, but it was not hidden; and when the reef was visible when not staring directly into the sunlight's glare, the allision presumption applies and none of the exceptions to that principle applies. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 20 (Yap 2018).

When the vessel was running at 5 knots in an easterly direction toward the early morning sun; when the atoll and its reef were off the vessel's port side; when if the vessel had wanted to avoid the reef, a turn to starboard, where there was plenty of sea room, no shipping, and no reef, would have sufficed; when even the use of the vessel's sonar depth finders or the posting of lookouts should have prevented the allision, the court must discount the presence of inaccurate navigational charts on the vessel because, even if the vessel had been using the inaccurate charts to navigate when it grounded on the reef, that grounding would still have to be considered the result of maritime negligence because of the captain's other failures. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 20-21 (Yap 2018).

The argument that the presumptions "cancel each other out" is not viable. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 393 (Kos. 2019).

When a plaintiff successfully creates a presumption, he not only satisfies his burden of going forward but also shifts that burden to the defendant. The defendant then must rebut the presumption to satisfy his burden of going forward. The burden of persuasion normally remains on the plaintiff for his claim throughout the trial. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 393 (Kos. 2019).

Regardless of arguments about the application of presumptions, case law requires a determination of the adoptive children's "actual dependency" on the deceased adoptive parent. This does not regard a presumption. It is a factual inquiry and primarily focused on documentary evidence. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 394 (Kos. 2019).

– Privileges

Information concerning the source of funds for payment of attorney's fees of a particular party normally is not privileged information. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 3 FSM R. 179, 181 (Pon. 1987).

The appropriate test to determine the scope of work product protection to be afforded a document which serves the dual purpose of assisting with future litigation the outcome of which may be affected by a business decision, is that documents should be deemed prepared in anticipation of litigation if in light of the nature of the document and the factual situation in the particular case, the document can fairly be said to have been prepared or obtained because of the prospect of litigation. Where a document is created because of the prospect of litigation, analyzing the likely outcome of that litigation, it does not lose protection under this formulation merely because it is created to assist with a business decision. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 471, 479 (Pon. 1998).

Work product protection extends to subsequent litigation as long as the materials sought were prepared by or for a party to the subsequent litigation. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 471, 481 (Pon. 1998).

It is appropriate to allow the deposition of a party's attorney either when 1) the deposition is the only practical means of obtaining the information, 2) the information sought will not invade the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine, and 3) the information sought is relevant and the need for it outweighs the disadvantages inherent in deposing a party's attorney; or when it is shown that no other means exist to obtain the information, and that the information sought is crucial to the preparation of the case. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 9 FSM R. 273, 278 (Pon. 1999).

A privilege is a peculiar right, advantage, exemption, power, franchise, or immunity held by a person or class, not generally possessed by others. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 423 n.1 (Pon. 2001).

A witness's privilege is governed by common law principles as they may be interpreted by FSM courts in the light of reason and experience, including local custom and tradition. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 423 (Pon. 2001).

When the court looks to common law sources in considering the nature of the legislative privilege enjoyed by members of the Pohnpei Legislature, it is mindful of Article XI, section 11 of the FSM Constitution, which requires that FSM Supreme Court decisions be consistent with the Constitution, Micronesian customs and traditions, and the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 423 (Pon. 2001).

Legislative privilege has a long history, and was well established at common law even before the founding of the United States. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 423 (Pon. 2001).

Legislative immunity for state legislators exists under United States federal law independent of state constitutional speech or debate provisions. Legislative freedom has no less vitality in the FSM than in the United States. Our national Constitution and all four state constitutions contain speech or debate clauses. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 424 (Pon. 2001).

A member of the Pohnpei Legislature is responsible only to the Legislature for statements in the Legislature or a committee thereof. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 424 (Pon. 2001).

A lawmaker engages in many activities which are not covered by the legislative privilege, such as a wide range of legitimate errands performed for constituents, making of appointments with government agencies, assistance in securing government contracts, preparing news letters to constituents, news releases, and outside speeches. Such activities, though entirely legitimate, are political in nature rather than legislative, and such political matters do not have speech or debate clause protection. But when a legislator is acting within the legitimate legislative sphere, the speech or debate clause is an absolute bar to interference. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 424-25 (Pon. 2001).

Legislative privilege should be read broadly to include anything generally done in a session of the legislature by one of its members in relation to the business before it. The ambit of the privilege extends beyond speech and debate per se to cover voting, circulation of information to other legislators, participation in the work of legislative committees, and a host of kindred activities. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 425 (Pon. 2001).

The legislative privilege doctrine has both substantive and evidentiary aspects. In substance, the doctrine renders legislators immune from civil and criminal liability based on either speech or debate in the course of proceedings in the legislature. From an evidentiary standpoint, a legislator may claim the privilege in declining to answer any questions outside the legislature itself where those questions concern how a legislator voted, acted, or decided on matters within the sphere of legitimate legislative activity. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 425 (Pon. 2001).

A Pohnpei legislator may decline to answer any questions that fall within the legitimate legislative activity of the Pohnpei legislature. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 425 (Pon. 2001).

Questions that are casually or incidentally related to legislative affairs but not a part of the legislative process itself, do not fall within the legislative privilege. Such questions, when otherwise appropriate under Rule 26(b)(1), should be answered. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 426 (Pon. 2001).

There is no banker-client (i.e., customer) privilege, and no analytical reason to raise an understandably confidential commercial situation of principal-agent or customer-banker to a privilege. A privacy or confidentiality interest must be balanced against a litigant's interest in obtaining relevant and probative information even if the privacy interest implicated is that of non-parties. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 227 (Pon. 2002).

There is no privilege provided by law to protect the victim daughter from testifying against the defendant father. Kosrae State Code § 6.302 provides a privilege to persons from testifying against their spouse, but when the family victim is not the defendant's spouse, no privilege exists. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

For a defendant's former counsel to testify regarding communications made during the course of the case at hearing on a motion to withdraw the defendant's plea, the defendant must be advised that if counsel is permitted to testify, the attorney-client privilege must be waived. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Privilege is governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the Federated States of Micronesia in the light of reason and experience, including local custom and tradition. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 247 (App. 2006).

The general rule appears to be that there exists no common law privilege with respect to bank customer information, but a court should indulge in a careful balancing of the right of civil litigants to discover relevant facts, on the one hand, with the right of bank customers to maintain reasonable privacy regarding their financial affairs, on the other. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 247 (App. 2006).

When an attorney's fee award has been requested, matters concerning attorney's fees are generally not privileged and a blanket refusal to disclose to opposing counsel any supporting documentation showing the date, the work done, and the amount of time spent on each service for which a compensation claim was made, goes far beyond any possible assertion of attorney-client or work-product privilege. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 62 (Yap 2007).

Since the rule with respect to privileges applies at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings, it therefore applies during discovery. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

Except as otherwise required by the FSM Constitution or provided by Act of Congress or in rules prescribed by the Chief Justice, the privilege of a witness, person, government, state, or political subdivision thereof is governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by FSM courts in the light of reason and experience. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

The government, by instituting an action, does not waive any privilege it may have and thereby submit to unlimited discovery. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

Although it may be true in the general case that when the FSM is claiming executive privilege it has an initial duty to provide a sworn declaration demonstrating that the discovery at issue is privileged, but when discovery is sought from a president, no such declaration will be required since presidential communications are "presumptively privileged." This is because a court is not required to proceed against the president as against an ordinary individual. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

Although a former president may not retain the capacity to either assert or waive an executive privilege, an incumbent president can claim the privilege on his predecessor's behalf. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

The presidential executive privilege is rooted in the separation of powers doctrine and in the principle that confidentiality in communications between the president and his advisors should enhance the quality of discussion and government decisions. However, this presumptive privilege is not absolute and must be considered in the light of the rule of law. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

While the public and the courts have a right to every person's evidence, except for that protected by constitutional, statutory, or other privilege, these privileges are not expansively construed. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

A party seeking discovery, who is confronted with an executive privilege claim, may overcome that claim if the discovery would 1) lead to admissible evidence; 2) is essential to the party's case; 3) is not available through any alternative source or less burdensome means; and 4) will not significantly interfere with the official's ability to perform his governmental duties. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff contends that the depositions of the president, vice president, and former president would yield admissible evidence about the discussions during high-level national-state government meetings on replacing the plaintiff as the Project Management Unit since the presidents and vice president were the only persons present at all of those meetings and should thus have unique, relevant testimony, the plaintiff has not met its burden to show that information about those meetings cannot be obtained through alternative sources or less burdensome means since a number of other persons were present at each of those meetings. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff has corroborating testimony from two witnesses, it has not shown why the former president's testimony on the same subject is essential to its case or that what it seeks to obtain from him it has not already obtained from the alternative sources. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

When the president has unique, personal knowledge of an essential relevant issue because only the president, and no alternative source, is available to corroborate testimony, the court will limit discovery from the president to this one narrow topic. Since discovery will be limited to this one narrow point, the president's oral deposition will be more burdensome than needed. The court will therefore craft a protective order so that another means of discovery will be used – the plaintiff may seek discovery from the president through either a Rule 31 deposition upon written questions or through Rule 33 written interrogatories, whichever the plaintiff finds best-suited to its purposes. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512-13 (Pon. 2009).

It is appropriate to depose another party's attorney only when 1) the deposition is the only practical means of obtaining the information, 2) the information sought will not invade the attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine, and 3) the information sought is relevant and the need for it outweighs the disadvantages inherent in deposing a party's attorney; or when it has been shown that no other means exist to obtain the information, and that the information sought is crucial to the case's preparation. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 41a, 41d (Pon. 2015).

Since any communication made to or from an attorney can always be sought from the person or entity on the other end of the communication, there should always be another practical means of obtaining the substance of that communication if it does not violate attorney-client privilege or the work product doctrine. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 41a, 41d (Pon. 2015).

To the extent that the discovery a party seeks constitutes internal workings of the Attorney General's Office – attorney work product – it is privileged and not discoverable. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 41a, 41d (Pon. 2015).

Any confidential patient-doctor's information can be redacted from documents provided in discovery.

The fact that a medical clinic received certain sums as payments for medical services should be discoverable, but what those medical services were and for which patients, need not be provided. That the clinic received an aggregate total payment of some amount for a particular type of service may be provided without violating doctor-patient privilege. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 431, 442 (Pon. 2016).

The mere allegation that the work product doctrine applies, is insufficient to claim the privilege. The party who asserts the work product privilege must demonstrate that the doctrine applies. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 431, 443 (Pon. 2016).

Because the work product doctrine is intended only to guard against divulging the attorney's strategies and legal impressions, it does not protect facts concerning the creation of work product or facts contained within work product. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 431, 443 (Pon. 2016).

Evidence privileges will be governed by the principles of the common law, as they may be interpreted by the FSM courts. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 666 (Pon. 2016).

When prior FSM cases have not addressed a precise point, the court, in such instances, may look to authority from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition, such as the U.S. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 666 (Pon. 2016).

The attorney-client privilege protects communications between an attorney and client that were made for the purpose of providing legal services. The privilege's effect is to safeguard these communications from being disclosed in litigation, since it acts a shield, to prevent adversaries from obtaining such exchanged information. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 666 (Pon. 2016).

The attorney-client privilege is deeply rooted in public policy and essential to the administration of justice. The privilege is traditionally deemed worthy of maximum legal protection. It remains one of the most carefully guarded privileges and is not readily to be whittled down. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 666 (Pon. 2016).

The attorney-client privilege applies only if: 1) the asserted holder of the privilege is or sought to become a client; 2) the person to whom the communication was made is a member of the bar of a court or his or her subordinate and in connection with this communication, is acting as a lawyer; 3) the communication relates to a fact of which the attorney was informed by the client, without the presence of strangers, for the purpose of securing primarily either an opinion on law, or legal services, or assistance in some legal proceeding, and not for the purpose of committing a crime or tort; and 4) the client has claimed and not waived the privilege. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 667 (Pon. 2016).

A justification for the attorney-client privilege is that it promotes disclosure of all relevant information by the client; enabling the attorney to effectively represent the client and dispense thorough legal advice. Without the privilege, there would most likely be a chilling effect, in that many clients would be reluctant to disclose all relevant information to the attorney, if adverse parties could utilize same against them in subsequent litigation. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 667 (Pon. 2016).

A justification for the attorney-client privilege is that an attorney must be able to openly communicate legal advice and strategy to the client, in order to adequately represent him or her and counsel would be hesitant to engage in such discourse, if adverse litigants could discover such communication in subsequent litigation. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 667 (Pon. 2016).

Because sound legal advice or advocacy serves public ends, the attorney-client privilege is necessary to promote full and unrestricted communication; consonant with the attorney-client relationship. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 667 (Pon. 2016).

Whether the attorney-client privilege attaches depends on the nature of the communication. In examining the nature of the communication, courts look to whether the attorney was retained to act in a capacity other than as an attorney, in which case, the communications may not be privileged. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 667 (Pon. 2016).

An uncertain attorney-client privilege – or one which purports to be certain, but results in widely varying applications by courts – is little better than no privilege. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 668 (Pon. 2016).

In determining the dominant purpose of the communication and thus whether the attorney-client privilege is implicated, the relevant question boils down to: was the exchange of information relevant to the rendition of legal services. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 668 (Pon. 2016).

The attorney-client privilege does not require the communication to contain purely legal analysis or advice to be privileged. Instead, if a communication between lawyer and client would facilitate the rendition of legal services or advice, the communication is privileged. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 668 (Pon. 2016).

When the communication documents exchanged by an attorney were intended to be confidential, the attorney-client privilege prevents their disclosure. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 668 (Pon. 2016).

Since parties may obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action, a request for communication documents to and from an attorney are shielded by the attorney-client privilege and a motion to compel their production will be denied, but a motion to compel the production of communication documents to and from an engineer co-project manager will be granted. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 663, 668 (Pon. 2016).

– Relevant

"Relevant evidence" is evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. FSM v. Jonas (II), 1 FSM R. 306, 312 (Pon. 1983).

Introduction of other burn cases to show that defective fuel in those cases tended to show the fuel was defective in the present case is relevant if the other cases are similar. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 352 (Pon. 2001).

Relevant evidence means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the action's determination more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence, and all relevant evidence is admissible, except for the specific exceptions set out in the FSM Rules of Evidence. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 466, 473 (Pon. 2001).

When prosecuting criminal acts alleged to have occurred during the national election, the government may introduce evidence of acts in relation to the Chuuk state election held on the same day so long as those acts are relevant and are evidence of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident in relation to the national election offenses charged in the information. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 6 (Chk. 2002).

When the government, in prosecuting criminal acts alleged to have occurred during the national election, may introduce evidence of acts in relation to the Chuuk state election held on the same day so long as those acts are relevant and are evidence of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident in relation to the national election offenses, the defendant may have the State Election Director as a witness give evidence so long as it is restricted to relevant evidence of which he has first-hand knowledge and which is within the scope of evidence the prosecution has introduced concerning the state election during the government's case-in-chief. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 7 (Chk. 2002).

The Kosrae Rules of Evidence do not apply in the Land Commission or Land Court. In the case of hearsay testimony, the Land Commission or presiding justice shall determine the testimony's relevancy and the credibility of the witness. The purpose of allowing hearsay testimony and other evidence at land proceedings, without application of the Kosrae Rules of Evidence, is to allow all relevant evidence on the claims presented before the Land Commission and Land Court, without limitations imposed by the Rules of Evidence. The determination of relevancy of evidence and credibility of witnesses is made by the adjudicators, the Land Commission or a justice of the Kosrae Land Court. Taulung v. Jack, 11 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

All relevant documents are not necessarily those required to prove a party's case by the preponderance of the evidence. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 168 (Pon. 2003).

The Kosrae State Court Rules of Evidence do not apply to Land Court proceedings. Evidence which is relevant and material to the claim or the issues may be presented at the Land Court hearing and the presiding justice will determine the relevancy and credibility of all evidence offered at the hearing, and will determine whether the evidence is admissible in the hearing. This allows the presiding Land Court justice to hear all offered evidence and determine whether the evidence is relevant and credible. The evidentiary standard for Land Court proceedings is very broad and allows the admission and consideration of hearsay and other evidence that would normally be excluded under the Kosrae Rules of Evidence, in Kosrae State Court proceedings. This broad evidentiary standard is applied to allow all relevant evidence of claims and statements to be presented without the limitations imposed by the Kosrae Rules of Evidence. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 625, 627 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When an agreement stating that the defendant had received full payment for the 27 motors and still owed the plaintiff 14 motors is relevant and is admissible as an admission of a party-opponent, the trial court did not err by relying on it when making a finding of fact since the exhibit was properly admitted, and the trial court was entitled to give it such weight as it saw fit. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 518 (App. 2005).

When a February 19, 1999 letter clearly refers to state legislative seats, but also asks for support for the Government of Udot's candidates, the question of who are the Government of Udot's candidates allowed the court to consider all evidence relevant to the issue, and when further evidence established that the incumbent candidate for the Chuuk Fourth Congressional District was one of those candidates, it was upon this basis that defendant was convicted of interfering in the national election. Thus this evidentiary issue is not substantial. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 164, 169 (Chk. 2006).

A blanket claim that all evidence should have been excluded will not be considered a close or substantial question on appeal. Nor is a claim that prejudicial evidence was admitted a substantial issue because relevant evidence is inherently prejudicial; but it is only unfair prejudice, substantially outweighing probative value, which permits exclusion of relevant matter. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 326 (Chk. 2006).

A motion to exclude an expert witness's deposition testimony is premature when it is made before his deposition has been completed, and any motion to exclude his trial testimony on the ground of relevance before the deposition is complete is also premature. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 648, 652 (Pon. 2009).

The Land Court should not exclude any relevant evidence and the Kosrae Rules of Evidence do not apply in the Land Court, but the State Court cannot consider evidence that was not "received" in the Land Court. "Received" in the statute is read to include evidence offered or introduced but improperly excluded. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 659 (App. 2011).

Relevant evidence means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the action's determination more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. All relevant evidence is admissible, except for the specific exceptions set out in the FSM Rules of Evidence. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2013).

When the plaintiff contends that the defendants attempted to interfere with his purchase of Transco stock by trying to get the seller to rescind the sale to him and to purchase it themselves, a past pattern of stock purchases might make it more probable than it would be without the evidence that the defendants tried to get the seller to sell them the shares and, furthermore, written correspondence received by Transco about this matter must also be relevant. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2013).

Evidence must be in the nature of facts – not conclusions or unsupported allegations of counsel. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 122 (App. 2017).

Relevant evidence means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the action's determination more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. All relevant evidence is admissible, except for the specific exceptions set out in the FSM Rules of Evidence. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 247, 249 (Pon. 2017).

A state court accusation of harassment and disorderly conduct against the defendant has no bearing on the current FSM court charges of obstruction, retaliation, and tampering since the state court case's contents would not make the pending charges more or less probable because of the different facts and circumstances surrounding each case and, since the state court charges were later dropped, those accusations are no longer relevant because it will be construed as though those allegations were never filed. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 247, 249 (Pon. 2017).

Irrelevant evidence that will be extremely prejudicial towards the defendant, should be excluded from the record. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 247, 249 (Pon. 2017).

Generally, evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove a person's character in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith, but such evidence is admissible as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 247, 250 (Pon. 2017).

Evidence that the defendant suffered from a physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect is admissible whenever it is relevant to prove that the defendant did or did not have a state of mind which is an element of the crime. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 337 n.2 (Chk. 2019).

– Stipulations

Since a trial's purpose is to resolve disputed factual issues and to determine the ultimate facts, no trial would have been needed if all the necessary facts had been stipulated. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 347 n.1 (App. 2011).

In construing a stipulation, a court should not extend its terms beyond that which fair construction justifies. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 348 (App. 2011).

When, by its terms, a stipulation refers only to the attorneys' number of years of legal experience and not to the nature or quality of that experience, it cannot be relied on to prove that a party had the same qualifications as another and thus was entitled to the higher pay that other received. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 348 (App. 2011).

Notwithstanding the effect of stipulation as binding judicial admissions dispensing with the necessity of legal proof, when the court makes findings of fact contrary to such stipulations and when ample evidence supports the court's findings, the parties who failed to object or to assert the stipulation in rebuttal to such evidence, have waived their right to rely on the stipulated facts. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 348 (App. 2011).

Although parties may stipulate to factual matters, they may not stipulate to interpretations of law. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 446, 450-51 (App. 2011).

– When Evidence Rules Apply

The Kosrae Rules of Evidence do not apply in the Land Commission or Land Court. In the case of hearsay testimony, the Land Commission or presiding justice shall determine the testimony's relevancy and the credibility of the witness. The purpose of allowing hearsay testimony and other evidence at land proceedings, without application of the Kosrae Rules of Evidence, is to allow all relevant evidence on the claims presented before the Land Commission and Land Court, without limitations imposed by the Rules of Evidence. The determination of relevancy of evidence and credibility of witnesses is made by the adjudicators, the Land Commission or a justice of the Kosrae Land Court. Taulung v. Jack, 11 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Kosrae State Court Rules of Evidence do not apply to Land Court proceedings. Evidence which is relevant and material to the claim or the issues may be presented at the Land Court hearing and the presiding justice will determine the relevancy and credibility of all evidence offered at the hearing, and will determine whether the evidence is admissible in the hearing. This allows the presiding Land Court justice to hear all offered evidence and determine whether the evidence is relevant and credible. The evidentiary standard for Land Court proceedings is very broad and allows the admission and consideration of hearsay and other evidence that would normally be excluded under the Kosrae Rules of Evidence, in Kosrae State Court proceedings. This broad evidentiary standard is applied to allow all relevant evidence of claims and statements to be presented without the limitations imposed by the Kosrae Rules of Evidence. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 625, 627 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Depositions, warrants or other papers may be admitted into evidence in an extradition case if properly authenticated and the FSM Rules of Evidence by their terms do not apply to extradition proceedings. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373 (Yap 2005).

The Kosrae Rules of Evidence apply to civil, criminal and contempt proceedings, but are not applicable to miscellaneous proceedings, such as preliminary examinations for criminal cases and bail proceedings. The rules do not reference their applicability or inapplicability to juvenile proceedings or to preliminary proceedings to determine whether to treat a minor defendant as an adult. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 89 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

An FSM police report, if relevant, may be considered in a proceeding to release a vessel when it is not a criminal case, since police reports, as matters observed pursuant to duty imposed by law as to which matters there was a duty to report, are admissible as an exception to the rule that hearsay is generally inadmissible and since a motion for a vessel's release is in the nature of a bond or bail hearing, and the rules of evidence generally do not apply to proceedings with respect to release on bail or otherwise. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 300, 302 (Chk. 2006).

Although the strict guidelines against the admission of hearsay evidence do not apply in a probable cause determination, a prosecutor may not rely solely on hearsay testimony when other, more competent testimony is available. The court may therefore discount unreliable hearsay or other evidence that is inherently untrustworthy or suspicious, unless additional measures are taken to ensure reliability or to explain those exigent circumstances that make it impossible to produce more reliable or competent evidence. A prosecutor's own representations are not a substitute for competent, reliable evidence in the form of first-hand testimony or appropriately detailed affidavits from investigating officers who obtained first-hand accounts. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The Land Court should not exclude any relevant evidence and the Kosrae Rules of Evidence do not apply in the Land Court, but the State Court cannot consider evidence that was not "received" in the Land Court. "Received" in the statute is read to include evidence offered or introduced but improperly excluded. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 659 (App. 2011).

– Witnesses

At the core of the task of the trier of fact is the power and obligation to determine credibility of witnesses. The court may rely upon that testimony which he finds credible and disregard testimony which does not appear credible. To do this, the trial court must be a sensitive observer of tones, hesitations, inflections, mannerisms and general demeanor of actual witnesses. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 556 (App. 1984).

Normally, it is primarily the task of the land commission, not the reviewing court, to assess the credibility of witnesses and to resolve factual disputes, since it is the commission, not the court that is present when witnesses testify and only the commission sees the manner their testimony but commission's major findings, and if no such explanation is made, the reviewing court may conduct its own evidentiary hearings or may remand the case to the commission for further proceedings. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 395, 401 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

A witness's credibility may not be attacked by evidence of a prior criminal conviction if the crime did not involve dishonesty or false statement, or was not for a felony whose punishment ended within the past ten years, or if the prejudicial effect outweighs the probative value. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 122 (Pon. 1993).

A lawyer generally cannot appear as an advocate when he also appears as a witness, although there is an exception when the testimony relates to an uncontested issue. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 342, 344 (Chk. 2001).

A witness summons can be issued for any witness, including the victim, for his or her appearance and testimony at trial. This process is utilized frequently in trials of criminal cases where witnesses are reluctant to appear and testify. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A person's failure to obey a witness summons is considered contempt of court, and may subject the offending witness to arrest and imprisonment. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Every person is competent to be witness except as otherwise provided by the Evidence Rules. A witness must have personal knowledge of the matter testified to and must, prior to testifying, declare, by oath or affirmation that she will testify truthfully. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Rules do not specify any mental qualifications for testifying as a witness. The issue is better suited to the fact finder in its determination of the witness's weight and credibility. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The question of a witness's competency goes to the issue of credibility, which is for the trier of fact. Even a finding of criminal insanity and incompetence does not make a person incompetent to testify. As long as the person had a sufficient memory, could understand the oath, and could communicate what the person saw, the person was competent to serve as a witness. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A witness's competency to testify requires a minimum ability to observe, record, recollect and recount an event, as well as an understanding to tell the truth. The fact finder hears the testimony and judges the witness's credibility. Therefore, mental capacity generally functions as an effect on the weight of the testimony to be given, instead of precluding admissibility of the testimony. Generally, any showing of memory about the event is sufficient to make the witness competent to testify. If the witness is capable of communicating in any manner, the witness is competent. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A witness will not be disqualified to testify as witness in a trial due to her mental handicap when she took an oath to testify truthfully; had the memory of what actions had taken place; and, based upon her testimony, showed her ability to observe, record, recollect and recount that event. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Kosrae Rule of Evidence 609 permits impeachment through evidence of conviction of a felony, where the date of the conviction is less than ten years and it also requires the court to determine that the probative value of admitted the prior conviction outweighs its prejudicial effect to the defendant. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in the Rules. Rule 602 requires lay witnesses to have personal knowledge of the matters that they are testifying to. Rule 603 requires every witness to declare that he will testify truthfully. The Rules do not exclude potential witnesses based upon their status as prisoners. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 566 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When a prisoner's testimony complied with the requirements of Rules 601, 602 and 603 and the defendant had the opportunity to cross examine him and attack his credibility by evidence of prior criminal convictions, there is no legal authority for the automatic exclusion of a prisoner's testimony. Ultimately, it is the task of trier of fact to determine the witnesses' credibility and to determine what should be accepted as the truth and what should be rejected as untrue or false. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 566 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A party is entitled to question any witness as to the basis of his knowledge. This is relevant evidence. Thus when the history of the land claim is relevant, an attorney should not be prevented from asking a witness about his family's claim to the land and why his testimony on that subject differed from that of his father. Any witness may be impeached. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99e, 99f (Chk. 2004).

Criminal Rule 26.2 creates no right to production of statements of witnesses until the witness has testified on direct examination, but if the prosecution insists upon literal compliance with Rule 26.2(a) the practical result is that a recess must be taken at the conclusion of the direct examination of every witness, and the court would very likely abuse its discretion if it refused to grant a recess. The usual practice in the FSM under Rule 26.2 has been that the prosecution voluntarily provides defense counsel access to witness statements in advance of their testimony and the court finds this a salutary and commendable practice. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 267-68 (Chk. 2005).

A defendant may obtain a witness's statement in the government's hands either through Rule 16 discovery or through Rule 26.2(a) procedures. It is not obtainable by deposition. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304-05 (Chk. 2005).

A non-party under subpoena may move to quash the subpoena directed to him. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 2005).

It is for the trial judge to assess a witness' credibility, because he has the opportunity to observe the witness and the manner in which he testifies. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 514 (App. 2005).

There is no rule that would require a party wishing to prove a money transfer to do so by documentary evidence only. Every time a witness takes the stand the trier of fact must determine whether that witness is believable. A trier of fact can perform this function regardless of whether financial transactions are the subject of the testimony. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 514 (App. 2005).

The fact that the appellant challenges the credibility of a witness's testimony does not mean that the trier of fact could not accept it as true, since it is for the trier of fact to assess a witness' credibility. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 519 (App. 2005).

Civil Rule 32(a)(3) permits any party to use a witness's deposition for any purpose if the court finds that the witness is off of the island at which the trial or hearing is being held, unless it appears that the witness's absence was procured by the party offering the deposition. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 19 (App. 2006).

The use of a witness's deposition at trial because the witness was off-island was proper when the witness's current job meant he no longer traveled to the Pacific and that he did not expect to be in Pohnpei in the next six months and that, since he was in Texas, an FSM Supreme Court subpoena could not compel him to appear. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 19 (App. 2006).

A subpoena directed to someone in a foreign country is considered valid and enforceable only if the person it is directed to is an FSM national or resident. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 19 n.4 (App. 2006).

The trial court did not commit error when it denied the defendant's request during trial to permit the State Auditor to be called as a witness when the State Auditor was not on the state's witness list; he had not been subpoenaed; and the plaintiff had no prior notice that this witness would be called. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 21 (App. 2006).

Neither state law nor the Kosrae Juvenile Rules require a witness to be qualified as an expert witness under the Evidence Rules in order to accept her testimony and report in a preliminary proceeding to determine whether to treat the defendant as an adult. The court may accept the witness's qualifications based upon her training as a physician and her position as Clinical Director of the FSM National Health Substance Abuse and Mental Health Program. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 90 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A witness must obey the subpoena that summoned him or her or get that subpoena quashed. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 355, 361 n.1 (Pon. 2006).

A motion to suppress all witness statements on the ground they were given without the warnings required by law will be denied since the court is not aware of any warnings required to be given a witness before the witness makes a statement and neither the accused's written motion nor oral argument cited any authority that legal warnings are required to be given before a witness's statement may be taken. This does not mean that the FSM Rules of Evidence, especially those concerning hearsay, would not apply at trial. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

Matters regarding a person's qualification to be a witness must be determined by the trial court, and the proponent must establish the qualification. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197 (App. 2008).

Once faced with the proffer of an expert witness, the question of whether the witness may be qualified as an expert is a preliminary fact to be decided by the trial court. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 197 (App. 2008).

At the core of the trier-of-fact's task is the power and obligation to determine the witnesses' credibility. The trial court may rely upon that testimony which it finds credible and disregard testimony which does not appear credible. Fritz v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 192, 199 (App. 2008).

Although an argument that it is not logical that one outsider of the clan would know about the history of a nechop land transfer when no testifying clan member had knowledge of the nechop and that for this reason the testimony is not credible, may affect credibility, the court cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in accepting and relying upon the testimony when the witness could have attained this knowledge from his wife's uncle. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 241 (App. 2009).

Although the appellants may consider the timing of a witness's rebuttal testimony to be problematic, when the witness's testimony is not contradictory to his testimony before rebuttal and when the trial court's findings are supported by other testimony, the finding will not be set aside based on an alleged inconsistency between the witness's direct and later rebuttal testimony. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 241 (App. 2009).

A court cannot assess the credibility of parties, whose deposition testimony was admitted but who declined to appear at trial, because in order to make this assessment the court must carefully observe the witness's tone, hesitations, inflections, mannerisms, and general demeanor. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 439 (Pon. 2009).

The trial court is in the best position to judge the demeanor and credibility of the witnesses. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 17 (App. 2010).

FSM Evidence Rule 611(b) allows the court to permit a procedure where the plaintiff would call the witnesses but each party would be able to treat each witness as if the witness were its own, that is, each defendant could ask each witness any relevant question regardless of whether that question was within the scope of the plaintiff's direct examination. In effect, each party put on its case-in-chief simultaneously with the others. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 117 & n.2 (App. 2011).

The trier of fact, whose duty it is to assess a witness's credibility, could accept as true some witnesses' testimony and thereby reject another witness's contrary deposition testimony. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 352 (App. 2012).

That the trial court found other testimony more credible than one witness's is not a ground for reversal because the trial court was in the best position to judge the witnesses' demeanor and credibility since the trial judge had the opportunity to observe the witnesses and the manner in which they testified. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 352 (App. 2012).

Although the trial judge did not have the opportunity the manner in which a witness testified when she testified by deposition, the appellate court cannot presume that even if she had testified in person that the trial judge would have found her more credible than the other witnesses and then decided the case in her favor since there was substantial evidence in the record to support the trial court's findings. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 352 (App. 2012).

A witness is unavailable if he is absent from the hearing and the proponent of his statement has been unable to procure his attendance by process or other reasonable means. A foreign resident's attendance at trial cannot be secured by process since the FSM Supreme Court's subpoena power does not extend into other countries. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the plaintiffs had ample opportunity to impeach a witness's testimony at trial; when all the arguments and evidence presented by the plaintiffs in their post-trial motion were available at trial and should have been presented at trial; when, if the plaintiffs were sincere in their desire to see the witness prosecuted, then they would have brought the matter to the attention of the appropriate authorities rather than asking the court to refer the matter for a perjury prosecution by a separate branch of government; and when the motion's filing suggests that the true motive was to impeach the witness's credibility, the plaintiffs' motion for an order referring the witness to the FSM Department of Justice for violation of the perjury statute will be denied, and the court will not consider the motion's contents in reaching a decision. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 269 (Pon. 2014).

Judging the credibility of witness testimony is the exclusive responsibility of the justice presiding over the matter. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 280 n.1 (Pon. 2014).

When, in general, the witnesses' emotional attachment to the lot is irrelevant to the plaintiff's actual damages from the Board's violation of its civil right to due process, and when, without knowing what the witnesses' testimony will be, it is unknown whether testimony about the lot's necessary background history will unavoidably include some mention of emotional attachment, the court cannot make a blanket ruling barring all mention of a witness's emotional attachment to the lot. During trial, the defendant may object to any irrelevant questions and move to strike any irrelevant matter in a witness's answer to a relevant question. That should be sufficient protection. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377-78 (Pon. 2014).

Although the Civil Procedure Rules provide that FSM nationals and residents are subject to the court's subpoenas even in foreign countries, there is no similar provision in the Criminal Procedure Rules. The only relevant Criminal Procedure Rule states that a subpoena requiring the attendance of a witness at a hearing or trial may be served at any place within the FSM. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 448 n.3 (Chk. 2014).

The FSM's confrontation clause does not always require a physical confrontation before the fact-finder. For example, there are certain well-established exceptions to the rule barring hearsay that, because of their indicia of reliability or trustworthiness, allow the introduction of evidence from witnesses a defendant will be unable to confront. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 449 (Chk. 2014).

Since, generally, a lawyer must not act as advocate at a trial in which the lawyer is likely to be a necessary witness, it follows that a party should not be able to potentially disqualify another litigant's advocate by making the other litigant's lawyer into a witness by noticing that advocate's deposition. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 41a, 41d (Pon. 2015).

Testimony may be admissible so long as it contains the essential indicia of reliability, including 1) the giving of testimony under oath; 2) the opportunity for cross examination; 3) the ability of the fact-finder to observe demeanor evidence; and 4) the reduced risk that a witness will wrongfully implicate an innocent defendant when testifying in his presence. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 46 (Pon. 2015).

FSM Supreme Court justices, even temporary justices, should be guided by permissible considerations rather than by one party's unsupported supposition that other justices would have ruled differently on a question of first impression. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 52 (Pon. 2015).

Since for the issue of the admissibility of Skype testimony to be properly before the court, there must be a threshold showing that Skype testimony is feasible and since in the absence of such a showing the government would be asking for a mere advisory opinion, it was proper for the court to require the government to demonstrate Skype testimony's feasibility before ruling on the parties' legal arguments. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 52 (Pon. 2015).

A witness's prior inconsistent statement bears on his credibility. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 186 (App. 2015).

An appellate court cannot say that the trial court's finding was clearly erroneous when it was the result of weighing conflicting evidence. When the trial judge believed one witness's testimony and not the other's and gave an extensive analysis of the testimony before him that led to the conclusion, there is no reason for the appellate court to disturb the trial court's conclusion since it was supported by credible evidence and the trial judge had the opportunity to observe the witnesses and the manner of testimony and the appellate court did not have that opportunity. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 186 (App. 2015).

Every person is competent to testify. When challenged on the basis of impairment or diminished capacity, the general rule of competency is presumed, and the witness is almost invariably pronounced competent unless shown otherwise. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2016).

The burden of proof as to witness competency rests with the objecting party. In determining competence a judge has great latitude in the procedure he may follow. Typically, the court will simply permit the witness to begin direct examination testimony, and then consider the witness's competency in light of the content of that testimony and the manner in which it was given. Alternatively, the court may conduct a preliminary examination, or even hold a separate competency hearing, wherein the prospective witness is subjected to questioning, and other witnesses may testify and external evidence may be submitted to help the court assess the claim because the assistance of experts is sometimes necessary to aid in the determination. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2016).

Witness competence is a preliminary question to be decided by the judge. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2016).

A diagnosis of diabetes is insufficient to overcome the general rule that every person is competent to testify. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2016).

Under FSM Evidence Rule 601, every person is competent to testify, and, if challenged on the basis of impairment, the general rule is that competency is presumed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 431, 438 (Pon. 2016).

By trying to take a party's deposition, the parties can reach an informed opinion about that party's competence to testify. Whether she is physically or mentally incapable of testifying is a factual, not a legal, question which can be resolved by taking her deposition. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 565, 573 (Pon. 2016).

An FSM court may order the issuance of a subpoena requiring the appearance as a witness before it, or before a person or body designated by it, of an FSM national who is in a foreign country if it is necessary in the interest of justice and if it is not possible to obtain that evidence otherwise. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 21 FSM R. 327, 329 (Pon. 2017).

The FSM Supreme Court may issue a subpoena directed to an FSM citizen, who is present in a foreign country, to appear to testify at a deposition, as well as to appear and testify at a trial or hearing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 21 FSM R. 327, 329 (Pon. 2017).

In all Kosrae State Court criminal trials, the testimony of witnesses must be taken orally in open court, unless otherwise provided by an Act of the Kosrae State Legislature or by a Kosrae State Court rule. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The criminal procedure rules are silent about whether video testimony is admissible in a criminal trial, and there is no legislation on this. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Rule 26 does not seem to preclude the admissibility of video testimony because remote video testimony will be taken orally in open court as required by the rules. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Whether remote video testimony is admissible in a criminal trial is left to the court's sound discretion since Rule 26 does not seem to preclude the admissibility of video testimony because the remote video testimony will be taken orally in open court as required by the rules. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75

(Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Live video testimony is not the equivalent of in-person testimony, and the decision to excuse a witness's presence in the courtroom should be weighed carefully. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Although remote testimony via video chat is not equivalent to in-person testimony, when the testimonies of the alleged victims seem to be crucial to the determination of the issues, the court will exercise its discretion to ensure a fair and just criminal trial by allowing the alleged victims to testify via video chat at trial. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75-76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The confrontation clause requires the defendant to cross examine the adverse witness face-to-face, thereby permitting the finder of fact to evaluate the witness's credibility, but this is not an absolute right. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Confrontation rights may, in limited circumstances, be satisfied without a physical, face-to-face confrontation at trial when the reliability of the testimony is otherwise assured and when there is an individualized determination that the denial of a face-to-face confrontation is necessary to further an important public policy. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Testimony may be admissible so long as it contains the essential indicia of reliability, including 1) the giving of testimony under oath; 2) the opportunity for cross examination; 3) the ability of the fact-finder to observe demeanor evidence; and 4) the reduced risk that a witness will wrongfully implicate an innocent defendant when testifying in his presence. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When the traditional indicia of reliability safeguards remote video testimony, a court must decide whether, under the case's circumstances, allowing witnesses to testify via video chat is necessary to further an important public policy. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A defendant's constitutional right to confront his accuser is not absolute. It can be met even without a face-to-face confrontation when it is necessary to further an important public policy and it is assured that the testimony is reliable. Thus, when the alleged victims testify by appearing visibly on a screen to the court and to the defendant and her counsel, these witnesses will, through video chat, deliver their testimonies orally, under oath, and in open court where the defendant will have an opportunity to cross-examine them and the court will be able to observe their demeanor. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Considering our people's migration realities, there are important public policies to uphold as the FSM's and Kosrae's geographical configuration make the ability to use video conferencing an advantage for the process by significantly reducing costs for plane tickets to and from Kosrae, by helping to reduce delay, and by allowing testimony of witnesses who otherwise would not be able to appear at all. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

EXTRADITION

Extradition is neither a criminal nor a civil proceeding. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 12, 13 (App. 1993).

The FSM Attorney General's Office is not disqualified in an international extradition case where the accused is the plaintiff in a civil suit against one of its members because the Attorney General's office has no discretion in the matter. It did not initiate nor can it influence the course of the prosecution abroad, and the discretion of whether to extradite a citizen does not repose in the Attorney General's Office. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 12, 13-14 (App. 1993).

Certifications of extraditability are not final decisions of the trial court since the final decision-making authority rests with the Secretary of External Affairs. Therefore they are not appealable. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 23, 25 App. 1993).

Judicial review of a certification of extraditability, although not appealable, is available to an accused in custody by seeking a writ of habeas corpus. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 23, 25 (App. 1993).

Where the FSM statute governing extradition proceeding is silent on the appealability of extradition proceedings and where the statute has been borrowed from another jurisdiction where extradition proceedings are not appealable it is presumed that the meaning and application of the statute is as it was interpreted by the courts of the source. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 23, 25 (App. 1993).

Extradition is founded upon treaties between sovereign nations involving mutual agreements and commitments. There is no counterpart in Micronesia custom and tradition that is applicable. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 23, 25 (App. 1993).

Certification of extraditability is an adversarial proceeding. An advocate in an adversarial proceeding is expected to be zealous. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 26, 27 (App. 1993).

Extradition is not a criminal action although it involves a criminal accusation. The specific provisions of the international extradition statute apply rather than the general provisions of Title 12, chapter 2. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 62, 63 (App. 1993).

Once a justice certifies an accused as extraditable, the justice must then commit the person to the proper jail until surrendered. The extradition statute does not give the court the authority to release a person on bail pending any judicial review of the certification. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 62, 63 (App. 1993).

In an international extradition case, bail can be granted only if "special circumstances" are shown. Neither risk of flight nor the availability of a suitable custodian are primary considerations. Rather the primary consideration is the ability of the government to surrender the accused to the requesting government. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 62, 64 (App. 1993).

Judicial review of an extradition hearing is by petition for a writ of habeas corpus. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 97 (App. 1993).

No Micronesian custom or tradition is applicable to extradition. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 97 (App. 1993).

A person for whom extradition is sought must be brought before a justice that evidence of his criminality may be heard and considered so that he may be certified as extraditable. Such a person is entitled to notice of the hearing and an opportunity to be heard and to effective assistance of counsel. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 99 (App. 1993).

A person whose extradition is sought can always contest identification. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 100 (App. 1993).

A person whose extradition is sought may, at the extradition hearing, introduce evidence that explains the government's evidence of probable cause, but not evidence that contradicts it. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 101 (App. 1993).

By the terms of the Compact and its subsidiary extradition agreement the term "Signatory Government" includes not only the national, but also the state governments of the two nations. Therefore state as well as national law may be used to determine if the offense for which extradition is sought satisfies the dual criminality test of whether it is criminal under the laws of both signatory governments. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 102-03 (App. 1993).

Extradition treaties are to be construed liberally to effect their purpose of surrender of fugitives to be tried for their alleged offenses. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 103 (App. 1993).

The scope of a habeas corpus review of an extradition proceeding is 1) whether the judge had jurisdiction, 2) whether the court had jurisdiction over the extraditee, 3) whether there is an extradition agreement in force, 4) whether the crimes charged fall within the terms of the agreement, and 5) whether there was sufficient evidence to support a finding of extraditability. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 104 (App. 1993).

An extradition hearing justice is required to make written findings for two reasons: 1) to meet the "rule of specialty" by which prosecution is limited to those offenses upon which extradition is granted, and 2) to reflect that the offenses for which extradition is granted is criminal in both the requesting and requested countries. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 105 (App. 1993).

To satisfy the dual criminality test in extradition matters either national or state law may be used. An exact matching of the offense or elements is not required, but the acts charged must be criminal in both jurisdictions. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 105 (App. 1993).

Where a court has dismissed a criminal case for lack of jurisdiction over the crimes for which the defendant was charged, the dismissal does not act as a discharge so as to preclude extradition on the charge. "Discharge" requires both personal and subject matter jurisdiction. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 107-08 (App. 1993).

Where the extradition agreement specifically requires that the requesting government's statute of limitations be used to determine extraditability, a general provision cannot be read to apply the statute of limitations of the requested government. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 108 (App. 1993).

Extradition is neither a criminal nor a civil proceeding. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 372 (Yap 2005).

Extradition treaties are to be liberally construed to effect their purpose of surrender of the persons sought to be tried for their alleged crimes. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 372 (Yap 2005).

An extradition hearing's purpose is not to hold a trial on the merits to determine guilt or innocence, but to determine whether probable cause exists to believe that the person whose surrender is sought has committed the crime for which extradition is requested. The probable cause standard applicable in extradition proceedings is described as sufficient evidence to cause a person of ordinary prudence and caution to conscientiously entertain a reasonable belief of the accused's guilt. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373 (Yap 2005).

A person whose extradition is sought may, at the extradition hearing, introduce evidence that explains the government's evidence of probable cause, but not evidence that contradicts it. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373 (Yap 2005).

Depositions, warrants or other papers may be admitted into evidence in an extradition case if properly authenticated and the FSM Rules of Evidence by their terms do not apply to extradition proceedings. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373 (Yap 2005).

Facts and circumstances detailed in the documents admitted into evidence can constitute probable cause to believe that persons sought to be extradited committed the crime alleged therein. When the documents come with indicia of reliability, including the certifications of authenticity, the court may properly consider this evidence in making the probable cause determination for extradition. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373 (Yap 2005).

For extradition, dual, or double, criminality is a requirement, which means that the offense for which extradition is sought must be criminal in both the requesting and requested countries. A precise matching of the crime or its elements is not required, but the acts charged must be criminal in both jurisdictions. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373 (Yap 2005).

When the offense alleged in the U.S. indictment is false use of a passport, and when, in the FSM, a person commits the crime of tampering with public records under 11 F.S.M.C. 529 if he makes, presents, or uses any record, document, or thing knowing it to be false, and with the purpose that it be taken as a genuine part of information or records that are received or kept by a public servant or required to be kept by anyone for the government's information, and under 11 F.S.M.C. 524, a person commits the crime of falsification if, with purpose to mislead a public servant in performing his or her official function, he or she submits or invites reliance on any writing which he or she knows to be forged, altered, or otherwise lacking in authenticity, these two FSM statutes proscribe the conduct charged, and the requirement of dual criminality is satisfied. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373-74 (Yap 2005).

The "rule of specialty" means that the court must find that the prosecution is limited to the offense upon which extradition is granted. Specifically, the "principle of specialty" limits prosecution in the requesting country to those extraditable offenses established by the facts on which extradition has been granted by the asylum country. Under this principle, the inquiry does not end merely because the accused is found extraditable on one charge. A determination must be made as to whether each specific charge forms the basis for extradition, as the defendant may be prosecuted only on extraditable charges. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 374 (Yap 2005).

If, on a hearing to determine extraditability the judge deems the evidence sufficient to sustain the charge under the treaty provisions, the judge shall certify the same, together with a copy of all the testimony taken before him, to the Secretary of Foreign Affairs that a warrant may issue upon the requisition of the proper authorities of the foreign government, for the person's surrender according to the treaty's stipulations; and the judge shall issue his warrant for the commitment of the person to be extradited to the proper jail, there to remain until surrender is made. But when no witnesses testified at the hearing, there is no testimony to be transcribed and submitted to the Secretary of Foreign Affairs and counsel for the FSM summarized the papers it filed and when the necessary papers were admitted into evidence and are part of the record, the court will make the certification of sufficient evidence to sustain the charges, but will make no certification of testimony, and when the persons charged are already under house arrest and under FSM Immigration personnel's custody and supervision, no warrant will issue. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 374 (Yap 2005).

In extradition cases, the receiving court, under the rules of speciality and double criminality, lacks personal jurisdiction over the defendant for crimes other than the crimes for which the defendant was extradited. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 n.4 (Chk. 2017).

FEDERALISM

The Pohnpei State Constitution was established under the authority granted by article VII, section 2 of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia which mandates that a state shall have a democratic constitution and also Pohnpei State Law No. 2L-131-82, section 9, which mandated the Pohnpei State Constitutional Convention "to draft a constitution for the State of Ponape . . . [that] shall make adequate provisions for the exercise of legislative, judicial and executive functions, and shall guarantee to all citizens of the State, a democratic form of government." People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 8-9 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Although national law requires the FSM Supreme Court to protect persons against violations of civil rights, strong considerations of federalism and local self-government suggest that local institutions should be given an opportunity to address local issues, even civil rights issues, especially when this can be done without placing the rights of the parties in serious jeopardy and when the local decision may obviate the need for a constitutional ruling by the national court. Hadley v. Kolonia Town, 3 FSM R. 101, 103 (Pon. 1987).

As a general proposition, the court will not lightly assume that Congress intends to assert national powers which may overlap with, or encroach upon, powers allocated to the states under the general scheme of federalism embodied in the Constitution. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 480 (Pon. 1988).

Nothing in the language of the statute, 23 F.S.M.C. 105, or in the legislative history, indicates that Congress made an affirmative determination to enact national legislation applicable within twelve miles of prescribed baselines. Therefore, 23 F.S.M.C. 105 gives the national government regulatory power only outside the twelve mile zone. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 480 (Pon. 1988).

Statutory provisions in the Trust Territory Code concerning domestic relations are part of state law because domestic relations fall within the powers of the states and not the national government. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 224 (Pon. 1990).

Since the determination of support payments payable by a divorced husband is a matter governed by state law, the FSM Supreme Court in addressing such an issue is obligated to attempt to apply the pertinent state statutes in the same fashion as would the highest state court in the pertinent jurisdiction. Pernet v. Aflague, 4 FSM R. 222, 224 (Pon. 1990).

The FSM Supreme Court will not interfere in a pending state court proceeding where no authority has been cited to allow it to do so, where the case has not been removed from state court, where it has not been shown that the national government is a party to the state court proceeding thereby putting the case within the FSM Supreme Court's exclusive jurisdiction, and where it has not been shown that the movants are parties to the state court proceeding and thus have standing to seek national court intervention. Pohnpei v. Kailis, 6 FSM R. 460, 463 (Pon. 1994).

Congress has the sole power to legislate the regulation of natural resources in the marine space of the Federated States of Micronesia beyond 12 miles from island baselines, and the states have the constitutional power to legislate the regulation of natural resources within that twelve miles of sea. Congress may also legislate concerning navigation and shipping within the twelve-mile limit except within lagoons, lakes, and rivers. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 459 (App. 1996).

The Constitution provides three instances of mandatory unconditional revenue sharing with the states, which the framers evidently thought enough. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

When the judgment creditor has an execution remedy apart from a writ of execution directed to the state police, the court is reluctant to unnecessarily consider the constitutional issue raised when doing so could be viewed in any light as hampering voluntary cooperation between state and national law enforcement as a matter of comity, an important concern given the geographical configuration of our country and the limited law enforcement resources of both the state and national governments. Parkinson v. Island Dev. Co., 11 FSM R. 451, 453 (Yap 2003).

The Constitution's broadly stated express grants of power to the national government contain within them innumerable incidental or implied powers, as well as certain inherent powers. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

A litigant may assert a claim in state or local court based upon a right provided under both a state and FSM Constitutions, and if a state constitution grants fewer rights than the FSM Constitution, a litigant may rely upon and assert his rights under the FSM Constitution. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 307 (App. 2007).

Although a state court's determination of a litigant's rights under that state's constitution may be final and not subject to review by the FSM Supreme Court, a state court's determination of a litigant's rights guaranteed under the FSM Constitution is subject to de novo review by the FSM Supreme Court since a state constitution cannot deprive the FSM Supreme Court of its jurisdiction granted under the FSM Constitution because the FSM Constitution is the supreme law of the land. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 307 (App. 2007).

Any conflict between the Pohnpei Constitution provision that no appeal of any matter relating to the Pohnpei Constitution, Pohnpei law, customs or traditions may be made to any court except the Pohnpei Supreme Court and the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear cases under the FSM Constitution is resolved under the FSM Constitution's supremacy clause, which provides that any act of a government that conflicts with the FSM Constitution is invalid, to the extent of the conflict. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 307 (App. 2007).

When the FSM Supreme Court decides matters of tort and contract law, it will apply, in the same way the highest state court would, the state's substantive law, which includes its common law as well as its statutory law. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 479 & n.5 (Pon. 2012).

When the FSM Supreme Court is deciding matters of tort and contract law, it will apply in the same way the highest state court would the state's substantive state law, which includes the state's common law as well as its statutory law. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 524 & n.3 (Pon. 2013).

The territorial sea is the waters within 12 nautical miles seaward of FSM island baselines, and the exclusive economic zone is the water seaward of the territorial sea outward to 200 nautical miles from the island baselines. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

A decision of the highest state court about a state law matter is controlling and the FSM Supreme Court will apply it. A state court trial division decision may be deemed not to be controlling if it appears that the highest state court would decide the question differently. If there is no controlling state case law, then the court should decide the case according to how it thinks the highest state court would, and if the state's highest court later decides the issue differently, then that case will prospectively serve as controlling precedent for the national court on that state law issue. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 506-07 n.3 (Pon. 2020).

– Abstention

As the Ponape District Court bears the closest resemblance to the state court system contemplated by the Constitution, it is appropriate to provide the District Court an opportunity to render an opinion on local issues. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 97 (Pon. 1982).

State courts, rather than national courts, should normally resolve probate and inheritance issues especially where interests in land are at issue. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 97 (Pon. 1982).

It would be contrary to the desire of the framers of the Constitution that local officials retain control over local matters if the FSM Supreme Court were to relinquish jurisdiction over issues involving local and state powers to the Trust Territory High Court, which is the least local tribunal now existing in the Trust Territory. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 110 (Pon. 1982).

The Ponape District Court, although not granted jurisdiction over land matters, may be given the opportunity to hear certified questions from the FSM Supreme Court on issues in a probate case involving land in order to further the intent of the framers that local decision-makers play a part in decisions of a local nature. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 110-12 (Pon. 1982).

Even though the requirements for pendent jurisdiction are met in a case, a national court has discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction over state claims. This determination should turn on considerations of judicial economy, convenience and fairness to litigants and should be instructed by a desire of the federal or national court to avoid needless decisions of state law. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 397 (Pon. 1984).

When a Public Land Authority has erred procedurally, but there is no suggestion of bad faith or substantive violations by the Authority, the FSM Supreme Court may appropriately employ the doctrine of primary jurisdiction to remand the public land issue to the Authority for its decision. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 429 (Pon. 1984).

A reasoned request by a state that the FSM Supreme Court abstain from deciding a particular issue should be granted unless the opposing party establishes that the benefits of abstention in terms of federalism and judicial harmony, and respect for state sovereignty, would be substantially outweighed by delay, harm or injustice. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 156 (Pon. 1986).

Where neither land, inheritance nor any other crucial interest of the state is involved; where the state has developed no extensive administrative apparatus or practical knowledge relating to the state issue with which a state court would be more familiar; where the state issue is not, strictly speaking, constitutional; and where the state has tendered the issue to the FSM Supreme Court and no party has requested abstention, the FSM Supreme Court should decide the issue rather than abstaining in favor of the state court. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 157-59 (Pon. 1986).

Abstention in favor of state court jurisdiction is inappropriate in a case which concerns leasehold of a dock facility, raises issues of national commercial import, and was filed almost two years ago during which time several opinions were rendered. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage (III), 3 FSM R. 256, 260-61 (Pon. 1987).

As a general rule the FSM Supreme Court trial division is obliged to exercise its jurisdiction and may not abstain simply because unsettled issues of state law are presented. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 1988).

Because the interest of developing a dynamic and well reasoned body of Micronesian jurisprudence, is best served when all courts have the benefit of one another's opinions to consider and question; when the litigants are private parties the FSM Supreme Court normally should attempt to resolve all issues presented, even when matters of state law are involved. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage Co., 4 FSM R. 3, 13 (Pon. 1989).

A cautious, reasoned use of the doctrine of abstention is not a violation of the FSM Supreme Court's duty to exercise diversity jurisdiction, or of the litigants' constitutional rights, under article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 39 (Pon. 1989).

The FSM Supreme Court may and should abstain in a case where land use rights are at issue, where the state is attempting to develop a coherent policy concerning the disposition of public lands, where there is a similar litigation already pending in state court, where the state requests abstention as defendant in an action which may expose it to monetary damages, where Congress has not asserted any national interests which may be affected by the outcome of the litigation, and where abstention will not result in delay or injustice to the parties. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 39 (Pon. 1989).

While the FSM Constitution provides initial access to the FSM Supreme Court for any party in article XI, section 6(b) litigation, the court may, having familiarized itself with the issues, invoke the doctrine of abstention and permit the case to proceed in a state court, since the power to grant abstention is inherent in the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court, and nothing in the FSM Constitution precludes the court from abstaining in cases which fall within its jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b). Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 42-43 (Pon. 1989).

Abstention by national courts is desirable in a case affecting state efforts to establish a coherent policy concerning how private persons may obtain rights to use land currently held by the state government. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 44 (Pon. 1989).

In a case brought before the FSM Supreme Court where similar litigation involving the same parties and issues is already pending before a state court, and a decision by the state court in the litigation would resolve all controversies among the parties, the risk of costly, duplicative litigation is one factor to be considered by the national court in determining whether to abstain. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 44 (Pon. 1989).

Although foreign and interstate commerce and shipping involve profound national interests, where Congress has not seen fit to assert those interests and there is no national regulation or law to enforce, the fact that a case affects interstate and foreign commerce and shipping is not sufficient to deny abstention if other strong grounds for abstention exist. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 47 (Pon. 1989).

There are no statutory or constitutional obligations which require the FSM Supreme Court to abstain or certify questions merely because unsettled matters of state law are at issue. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 1989).

The choice of whether to abstain from a decision or certify questions is one that lies wholly within the discretion of the FSM Supreme Court, and the judge must not undertake that decision lightly. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 1989).

The list of areas in which the FSM Supreme Court will consider it appropriate to liberally defer to state courts must be open and flexible, responding to the particular state of legal and social development in Micronesia, and when issues important to Micronesians become the focus of concerted state efforts to establish a coherent body of law, the FSM Supreme Court will take those developments into account in evaluating requests for certification or abstention. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 142 (Pon. 1989).

Where two private parties are involved, special considerations of state sovereignty are not as weighty in considering requests for abstention or certification, and the FSM Supreme Court normally should attempt to resolve all issues presented, even when matters of state law are involved. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 143 (Pon. 1989).

Requiring the FSM Supreme Court to abstain from deciding virtually all state law matters of first impression would not be in the interests of the efficient administration of justice, and would not be consistent with the jurisdictional provisions of the FSM Constitution. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 143 (Pon. 1989).

In a case where there is no state party and no issues of land or other matters crucial to state interests for which the state is actively developing policy and law, the healthy and efficient administration of justice demands that the FSM Supreme Court fulfill its duty to exercise jurisdiction and refuse to abstain or certify issues. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 145 (Pon. 1989).

The FSM Supreme Court will abstain from a claim for recovery of taxes where the defendant state requests abstention, the claim is for monetary relief, and the state has endeavored to develop a body of law in the areas of excise taxes and sovereign immunity. Gimnang v. Yap, 4 FSM R. 212, 214 (Yap 1990).

On a claim for declaratory relief from an unconstitutional excise tax, the FSM Supreme Court trial division will not abstain, where the issue could later be certified to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division and result in delay, where the trial court has already retained the case longer than contemplated, where the issue is narrowly posed and not capable of varying resolutions, and where it appears that a greater service may be provided by deciding the issue. Gimnang v. Yap, 4 FSM R. 212, 214 (Yap 1990).

It is not appropriate to abstain from deciding a claim for injunctive relief where it is undisputed that the court has jurisdiction and where the interests of time can be of pressing importance. Gimnang v. Yap, 4 FSM R. 212, 214 (Yap 1990).

The national courts, in carrying out their judicial responsibilities, do have inherent power to certify issues, or to abstain partially or completely from exercising jurisdiction in a particular issue or to exercise jurisdiction over part or all of a case. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 19 (App. 1991).

A national court ordinarily should refrain from deciding a case in which state action is challenged as violating the federal constitution, if unsettled questions of state law may be dispositive and obviate the need for the constitutional determination. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 21 (App. 1991).

A national court may not abstain from exercising its constitutional jurisdiction when it is directly faced with a constitutional issue and surely may never abstain completely from exercising jurisdiction in a case where there remains to be resolved a substantial issue under the national constitution. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 25 (App. 1991).

In a case arising under national law there is an especially strong presumption against full abstention, and there is a serious question whether the trial division of a national court may ever certify a question of national law to a state court for decision unless it can reasonably be expected that the particular claim can be resolved entirely through the application of state law. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67C (Pon. 1991).

When there are identifiable, particularly strong state interests, such as questions concerning the ownership of land or where there are monetary claims against the state or its agencies, the national courts should exercise restraint, and look with sympathy upon a state request for abstention. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67D (Pon. 1991).

Although it may be appropriate to defer to state courts the resolution of land related state law issues, abstention and certification of issues should not be allowed to thwart the more fundamental goal and obligation of the judicial system to render just decisions in a speedy fashion at a minimum of costs to litigants and society alike. Therefore a reasonable balance must be sought between responsiveness to state interests and the obligation of the national courts to carry out their own jurisdictional responsibilities. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67D (Pon. 1991).

Full abstention is not appropriate where claims are not essentially state law claims, and are made against another nation, thus falling within the national court's primary jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67E (Pon. 1991).

Abstention may be appropriate for causes of action that raise issues of state law only, but may not be where substantive issues of national law are raised. A national court may not abstain from deciding a national constitutional claim. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67E (Pon. 1991).

Where a claim is against the national government and an interest in land is not placed at issue the claim is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court and it cannot abstain on the claim. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67E (Pon. 1991).

The national court should not abstain from deciding a criminal case where the crime took place before the effective date of the 1991 amendment removing federal jurisdiction over major crimes because of the firmly expressed intention by the Constitutional Convention delegates as to the manner of transition from national jurisdiction to state jurisdiction. In re Ress, 5 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 1992).

It is appropriate for the state court to rule upon the non-constitutional grounds and upon the alleged violation of the Pohnpei Constitution. The plaintiff may raise at a later time the allegation that the ordinance violates the FSM Constitution if that is still necessary after disposition by the state court. Berman v. Pohnpei, 5 FSM R. 303, 306-07 (Pon. 1992).

A bond of debt is simply a loan instrument. Therefore when determining its legal effect does not require a determination concerning interests in land there is insufficient basis for abstention. Kihara v. Nanpei, 5 FSM R. 342, 345 (Pon. 1992).

Because the FSM Supreme Court is the only court of jurisdiction in cases arising under article XI, section 6(a) of the FSM Constitution, the court has no discretion to abstain in such cases. Faw v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 33, 36 (Yap 1993).

A strong presumption exists under FSM law for deferring land matters to local land authorities. Kapas v. Church of Latter Day Saints, 6 FSM R. 56, 60 (App. 1993).

Determination of property boundaries is the responsibility of the state land commissions, and the national court should not intercede where the local agency has not completed its work. Kapas v. Church of Latter Day Saints, 6 FSM R. 56, 60 (App. 1993).

The FSM Supreme Court has a constitutional duty to hear disputes wherein the parties are diverse, even if land issues are involved, although the court may abstain from exercising such jurisdiction on a case-by-case basis where other factors weighing in favor of abstention are present. Etscheit v. Mix, 6 FSM R. 248, 250 (Pon. 1993).

Where a complaint arises from actions concerning the internal operations of municipal government, and the claims sound in tort, abstention in favor of state court adjudication is appropriate. Mendiola v. Berman (I), 6 FSM R. 427, 429 (Pon. 1994).

That a defendant files a counterclaim alleging violation of constitutional rights does not in itself make abstention of the case as a whole inappropriate. Mendiola v. Berman (II), 6 FSM R. 449, 450 (Pon. 1994).

Deference to state court jurisdiction is warranted in cases involving municipal government issues, given the greater familiarity with such issues at the state level and the greater importance to state interests. Mendiola v. Berman (II), 6 FSM R. 449, 450-51 (Pon. 1994).

Even though the national court has jurisdiction abstention may be warranted in civil forfeiture fishing case for fishing in state waters where defendants are also part of a companion criminal case in state court. Pohnpei v. M/V Zhong Yuan Yu #606, 6 FSM R. 464, 465-66 (Pon. 1994).

When a national court abstains it simply says that it is not going to decide the issue and allows the parties to file in state or local court; it does not submit or transfer anything to another court. Gimnang v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 482, 485 (App. 1994).

The choice of whether to abstain from a decision or to certify questions is one that lies wholly within the discretion of the trial court. Gimnang v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 482, 485 (App. 1994).

Abstention is left to the sound discretion of the court, but the Supreme Court may not abstain for cases involving issues of interpreting the Constitution. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 603 (Pon. 1994).

Because speedy and final resolution of questions regarding the constitutional roles of the state and national governments will avoid unnecessary conflict and possible jurisdictional tension between the state and national courts, it is proper to stay an order of abstention pending appeal in such cases. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (II), 6 FSM R. 604, 605 (Pon. 1994).

The decision whether the FSM Supreme Court will exercise its inherent power to abstain from a case is left to the sound discretion of the trial division which must exercise it carefully and sparingly. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 7 FSM R. 97, 99 (Pon. 1995).

Counseling against the unfettered use of abstention is the FSM Supreme Court's solemn obligation to consider the interests and protect the rights of those who wish to invoke its constitutional jurisdiction. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 7 FSM R. 97, 99 (Pon. 1995).

When issues of national law are involved there is a particularly strong presumption against full abstention from the case. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 7 FSM R. 97, 100 (Pon. 1995).

There is a presumption favoring abstention in claims involving state law and money damages against the state that touch upon the particularly strong state interest of fiscal autonomy and federalism. Even in those cases the FSM Supreme Court will not abstain when abstention will result in substantial delay or additional cost. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 7 FSM R. 97, 100 (Pon. 1995).

Where a case involves several substantive FSM constitutional claims the FSM Supreme Court will not and most likely cannot exercise its discretion to abstain. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 7 FSM R. 97, 101 (Pon. 1995).

Extension of the presumption of abstention in certain cases to municipalities is inappropriate. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 7 FSM R. 97, 101 (Pon. 1995).

Abstention by the FSM Supreme Court is only proper if it has concurrent jurisdiction, such as diversity jurisdiction, and the case involves state powers or interests. Ladore v. U Corp., 7 FSM R. 296, 298 (Pon. 1995).

Abstention may be proper in a case involving a private easement where there are no issues distinctly separate from those involving state powers because state courts have the primary role in setting policy and deciding legal issues concerning ownership and interests in land. Ladore v. U Corp., 7 FSM R. 296, 298 (Pon. 1995).

The choice to abstain from a decision, like the decision to certify a question, lies wholly within the sound discretion of the trial court. Thus the standard of review of the decision not to abstain is whether the trial court abused its discretion. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 322 (App. 1995).

Certain circumstances may give rise to an inclination in favor of abstention, such as a state request for abstention where there are identifiable, particularly strong state interests such as monetary claims against the state or questions concerning ownership of land, but national courts still have the obligation to carry out their own jurisdictional responsibilities. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 322 (App. 1995).

The FSM Supreme Court has original and exclusive jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases. This grant of exclusive jurisdiction is not made dependent upon constitutional grants of powers to other branches of the national government. When the Supreme Court's jurisdiction is exclusive it cannot abstain from deciding a case in favor of another court in the FSM because no other court in the country has jurisdiction. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 459 (App. 1996).

The FSM Supreme Court may not abstain in cases involving interpretation of the FSM Constitution. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 18, 20 (Yap 1999).

Neither the state's mere presence in a lawsuit by virtue of a monetary claim against it, nor its presence plus the presence of even an important issue of state law serves as a sufficient basis for abstention. Always hovering in the background of any abstention analysis is a litigant's constitutional right under the FSM Constitution to avail himself of the national court's diversity jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b). Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 18, 21 (Yap 1999).

The likelihood of abstention, always discretionary, is increased when the state is a party; when the subject matter of the requested abstention is one involving local concerns that lie solidly within a state's sphere of interest, such as land or inheritance issues; when the state has developed an administrative approach to deal with the specified issues; and when the issue presented is a "clean" legal issue, as opposed to a factual one. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 18, 21-22 (Yap 1999).

Yap's interest in establishing a body of contract jurisprudence is, without more, insufficient to cause the FSM Supreme Court to exercise its discretion and abstain in a case in which it has diversity jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 18, 22 (Yap 1999).

The standard of review for a decision not to abstain is that of abuse of discretion. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 210 (App. 1999).

An abstention request that comes after trial, and after the case had been pending for approximately five years, is untimely. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 210 (App. 1999).

Abstention requires the initiation of a new lawsuit in a state court. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 210-11 (App. 1999).

A defense is that which is offered and alleged by the party proceeded against in an action or suit, as a reason in law or fact why plaintiff should not recover or establish what he seeks. A motion for abstention has little common ground with the concept of a defense because abstention by no means precludes a plaintiff from obtaining the requested relief but rather goes to the question of the appropriate forum in which to pursue that relief. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 279, 283 (Yap 1999).

Abstention is not a defense to a lawsuit in the sense used in Rule 12(b). In abstention practice, the movant is asking the court to exercise its discretion to abstain from hearing the action for the express purpose that another court may hear the lawsuit. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 279, 283 (Yap 1999).

There is no reason that answers could not be filed in due course during the pendency of an abstention motion, and there is also no reason that discovery could not have been ongoing during an abstention motion's pendency, since discovery was just as inevitable as the answer. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 279, 284 (Yap 1999).

An abstention motion before the FSM Supreme Court should proceed as a post-answer motion, and not a motion in lieu of answer under Rule 12(b) of the FSM Civil Procedure Rules. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 279, 284 (Yap 1999).

As a general rule, the FSM Supreme Court trial division is obliged to exercise its jurisdiction and may not abstain simply because unsettled issues of state law are presented. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 635 (Pon. 2002).

The FSM Supreme Court has deferred adjudication of certain land disputes in favor of state land commissions, but has also emphasized its responsibility under article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution to hear diversity disputes, even if land issues are involved. There is no judicial, constitutional, or legislative rule that in all cases where land is concerned, the FSM Supreme Court must abstain or otherwise refrain from exercising jurisdiction. The presence of certain factors on a case-by-case basis may influence the decision to abstain in land cases. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 10 FSM R. 639, 644

(Pon. 2001).

The factors in favor of abstention are outweighed by the factors in favor of the FSM Supreme Court retaining jurisdiction over a case when there is no parallel litigation in state court which will address all of the parties' respective claims; when there is no duplicative litigation from two lawsuits as to the same subject matter; when, if the court does abstain, various claims of the parties will not be addressed, such as the numerous tort claims and the motions for preliminary injunction; and especially when the motion for remand does not seek to transfer the case to a state court, but instead to the party who allegedly committed bad faith and substantive violations in the performance of its duties. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 10 FSM R. 639, 644 (Pon. 2001).

Although national law provides for the reciprocal enforcement of child support orders, case law supports the conclusion that FSM Supreme Court should abstain from exercising its jurisdiction at least until the state court has had the opportunity to rule on the issues. Villazon v. Mafnas, 11 FSM R. 309, 310 (Pon. 2003).

A motion to abstain will be denied when the plaintiffs have a constitutional right to pursue their claims in the FSM Supreme Court as the claims arise under the Constitution and national laws and they have chosen to do so, and when the nature of the state law rulings a court might have to make in the case is not apparent at this stage of the case. Naoro v. Walter, 11 FSM R. 619, 621 (Chk. 2003).

When issues of national law are involved there is a particularly strong presumption against full abstention from the case. Naoro v. Walter, 11 FSM R. 619, 621 (Chk. 2003).

While certain circumstances, such as a state request for abstention where there are identifiable, particularly strong state interests such as monetary claims against the state or questions concerning ownership of land, may give rise to an inclination in favor of abstention, national courts still have the obligation to carry out their own jurisdictional responsibilities, but the FSM Supreme Court may not abstain in cases involving interpretation of the FSM Constitution. Naoro v. Walter, 11 FSM R. 619, 621 (Chk. 2003).

A motion to abstain may be denied when the case does not involve land and when, although it involves monetary claims against the state, it appears that interpretation of the Constitution may also be necessary. Naoro v. Walter, 11 FSM R. 619, 621 (Chk. 2003).

When a state administrative agency asks that the FSM Supreme Court not exercise jurisdiction in a case because the case involves a question about land, and land issues are best (and traditionally) left to the state court, but when a deeper analysis reveals that the case is not fundamentally a land case, but rather one in which the court is being asked to review an agency's action and determine whether that action was lawful from an administrative or procedural point of view, not a substantive one, the question presented is not whether the plaintiff is entitled to the assignment of the lease in question, but rather whether the board possessed the authority to reconsider its decision and, if so, did it do so in a manner that recognized plaintiff's rights under the FSM Constitution. In such a case, the FSM Supreme Court does not lack subject matter jurisdiction, and the plaintiff's complaint will not be dismissed. Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 90 (Pon. 2003).

While the FSM Supreme Court may abstain from a part of a case, it may not abstain from interpretation of the FSM Constitution. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 601 (Chk. 2004).

A national court has discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction over state claims, but this determination should turn on considerations of judicial economy, convenience and fairness to litigants and should be instructed by the national court's desire to avoid needless decisions of state law. Judicial economy, convenience and fairness to litigants, especially in light of the expedited determination sought by the parties, would seem to dictate that the entire case proceed in the same forum. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM

R. 597, 601 (Chk. 2004).

The rationale for abstention is that the state court is the better court to decide an issue which involves state powers and particularly strong, identifiable state interests. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 148 (App. 2005).

Motions to abstain cannot be brought before the defendants have pled by filing an answer. The only motions to dismiss that a defendant may file before answering the complaint are those based on 1) lack of subject matter jurisdiction, 2) lack of personal jurisdiction, 3) improper venue, 4) insufficiency of process, 5) insufficiency of service of process, 6) failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, or 7) failure to join a party under Rule 19. McVey v. Etscheit, 13 FSM R. 473, 476-77 (Pon. 2005).

An abstention request that comes after trial, and after the case had been pending for approximately five years, is untimely. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 2005).

Although the national courts, in carrying out their judicial responsibilities, do have inherent power to certify issues, or to abstain partially or completely from exercising jurisdiction over a particular issue, or to exercise jurisdiction over part or all of a case; and although the trial court may raise the question of abstention or certification on its own motion; it is not mandatory that the court do so. And even if such a motion had been made, the choice of whether to abstain from a decision or to certify questions is one that lies wholly within the trial court's discretion. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 2005).

When no motion to abstain or to certify a question to the state court was made, the trial court could not abuse its discretion by not abstaining from deciding or by not certifying the ownership question to the state court. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 2005).

The choice to abstain from a decision lies wholly within the trial court's sound discretion. Certain circumstances may give rise to an inclination in favor of abstention, such as a state request for abstention when there are identifiable, particularly strong state interests such as monetary claims against the state or questions concerning ownership of land, but national courts still have the obligation to carry out their own jurisdictional responsibilities. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Do It Best Hardware, 14 FSM R. 152, 158 (Pon. 2006).

A national court may not abstain from exercising its constitutional jurisdiction when it is directly faced with a constitutional issue and surely may never abstain completely from exercising jurisdiction in a case where there remains to be resolved a substantial issue under the national constitution. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Do It Best Hardware, 14 FSM R. 152, 159 (Pon. 2006).

When the case does not involve a question of land ownership, although land use rights are involved because the fairness and constitutionality of the process by which those rights were granted, is the central issue; when trying to separate the national constitutional issues from the state law issues would be difficult and impractical and would also cause considerable delay; and when abstaining from those parts of the case which do not involve interpretation of the FSM Constitution due process clause (and the FSM civil rights statute) and separating it from the rest of the case would be difficult and impractical and cause unreasonable delay, the factors that favor the court's retention of the case outweigh those that favor abstention. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Do It Best Hardware, 14 FSM R. 152, 159 (Pon. 2006).

Since an allegation of police brutality implicates both the national and state constitutions and a plaintiff asserting a right arising under national law has a right to be heard in the FSM Supreme Court even if state courts may also assert jurisdiction, the fact that the Pohnpei Supreme Court may be equally equipped to decide the case will not divest the plaintiff of his day in the FSM Supreme Court. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 201 (Pon. 2006).

That unsettled state law issues are involved in a case about the Lt. Governor's proclamation concerning a municipal election is insufficient grounds to dismiss the case, especially when a significant body of state law has already developed around the Governor's powers over municipal governments. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 220 (Chk. 2006).

Generally, a motion for the FSM Supreme Court to abstain from all or part of a case should proceed as a post-answer motion, and not a motion in lieu of answer under FSM Civil Procedure Rule 12(b) since abstention is not one of the enumerated grounds for a Rule 12(b) motion. But when, in one of those rare instances, where the material facts are not in dispute and an answer would not help to identify or to narrow the factual issues since only legal matters are contested, it may be appropriate to permit an abstention motion without an answer. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 561 (Chk. 2009).

Even cases which arise under the national Constitution sometimes call for deference to state courts. For example, courts generally strive to avoid unnecessarily or prematurely addressing issues of national constitutional law. A national court ordinarily should refrain from deciding a case in which state action is challenged as violating the national Constitution, if unsettled questions of state law may be dispositive and obviate the need for the constitutional determination. Under such circumstances, the national court may appropriately give the state court the opportunity to provide a definitive ruling as to state law. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 562 (Chk. 2009).

When there are identifiable, particularly strong state interests, such as when there are monetary claims against the state or its agencies, the national courts should exercise restraint and look with sympathy upon a state request for abstention. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 562 (Chk. 2009).

The likelihood of abstention, always discretionary, is increased when the state is a party; when the subject matter of the requested abstention is one involving local concerns that lie solidly within a state's sphere of interest; when the state has developed an administrative approach to deal with the specified issues; and when the issue presented is a "clean" legal issue, as opposed to a factual one. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 562 (Chk. 2009).

When what constitutes property and interests in property is purely a matter of state law; when the strong state interests in fiscal autonomy militate in favor of abstention in lawsuits against the state for monetary damages; and when the state is attempting (finally) to develop an administrative approach and policies to address monetary claims against it and its debts (both matters solidly within the state's sphere of interest), all of these considerations favor abstention. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 562 (Chk. 2009).

In a case arising under national law, the analysis must begin with an especially strong presumption against full abstention. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 563 (Chk. 2009).

Although, in a case arising under national law, the analysis must begin with an especially strong presumption against full abstention, when the national law question cannot even be reached unless a purely state law question is first resolved in the plaintiff's favor and is thus wholly dependent upon favorable resolution of that issue first and since the national court ordinarily should refrain from deciding a case in which state action is challenged as violating the national Constitution, if unsettled questions of state law may be dispositive and obviate the need for the constitutional determination, the state court should be given an opportunity to resolve that issue first. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 563 (Chk. 2009).

That claims in an FSM case might involve injunctive relief to enforce a state court order in aid of judgment is not an adequate basis to deny abstention or to even retain partial jurisdiction. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 563 (Chk. 2009).

National court abstention or certification of issues may also be justified on occasion by a desire to avoid unsettling a delicate balance in national-state relationships. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 564 (Chk. 2009).

The appellants' likelihood of success on their claim that the court should have abstained or certified their "novel issues" to the state court is virtually zero when they never moved for certification or abstention and when, even if they had, the court is not required to certify or abstain from every "unsettled" state law issue. FSM Dev. Bank v. Helgenberger, 17 FSM R. 266, 270 (Pon. 2010).

The choice to abstain from hearing a case, like the decision to certify a question, lies wholly within the trial court's sound discretion, and this is reviewed on an abuse of discretion standard. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 293 (App. 2010).

A trial court's abuse of discretion occurs when its decision is clearly unreasonable, arbitrary, or fanciful; when it is based on an erroneous conclusion of law; or when the record contains no evidence upon which the court could rationally have based its decision. Such abuses must be unusual and exceptional; an appeals court will not substitute its judgment for that of the trial judge. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 293 (App. 2010).

An appellant must show that there was an abuse of discretion for an appellate panel to reverse a trial court's order of abstention. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 294 (App. 2010).

When a trial court's abstention order is well-reasoned and reaches no arbitrary or fanciful conclusions because the trial court provided a careful analysis of the questions before it and citation to the legal precedents on which it relied and no erroneous conclusions of law are apparent and the record contains sufficient evidence on which it could have rationally based its decision, there is no basis under the abuse of discretion standard by which to reverse the trial court. The trial court's decision to abstain was not an abuse of discretion. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 296 (App. 2010).

When there are no clear due process rights to be preserved before the national trial court, the appellate court will not remand the matter to the trial court for modification that the trial court retain some jurisdiction over the case or to resume jurisdiction if the state court fails to act within a year. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 297 (App. 2010).

Generally, although the national courts have primary responsibility in litigation under article XI, section 6(b), cases which arise under national law are distinguishable from diversity cases, and the courts should be more reluctant to abstain in cases arising under national law. It therefore follows that the national courts' jurisdiction in cases solely within article XI, section 6(b) by virtue of diversity of citizenship is far less compelling. Villarena v. Abello-Alfonso, 18 FSM R. 100, 102 (Pon. 2011).

When the national courts are asked to rule on areas of the law which fall within state powers and in which there are identifiable, particularly strong, state interests and particularly when a state is attempting to establish a coherent administrative policy in a complex field in which there is substantial public concern, abstention becomes increasingly appropriate. Villarena v. Abello-Alfonso, 18 FSM R. 100, 102 (Pon. 2011).

The point of abstention is not to identify a particular agency to resolve questions of state law, but to relinquish jurisdiction to avoid needless conflict with a state's administration of its own affairs. Villarena v. Abello-Alfonso, 18 FSM R. 100, 102 (Pon. 2011).

Because the plaintiffs' causes of action are rooted in questions of state law, and because the field of wage and hour laws is a complex one in which there is substantial public concern and in which the State of Pohnpei has the right to establish a coherent administrative policy, it is altogether appropriate for the FSM Supreme Court to relinquish jurisdiction through abstention. Villarena v. Abello-Alfonso, 18 FSM R. 100, 103 (Pon. 2011).

When the plaintiffs have not stated a claim based on national law on which the FSM Supreme Court may grant relief and when all that remains is state law, including state environmental regulations, they have not persuaded the court to retain the case, and the court will therefore abstain. Damarlane v. Damarlane,

18 FSM R. 177, 181 (Pon. 2012).

In order to accord respect to a Kosrae State Court criminal proceeding, the FSM Supreme Court will abstain from granting a petitioner's application for a writ habeas corpus when the petitioner is currently the subject of an ongoing criminal proceeding in the Kosrae State Court that has not reached final adjudication; when those proceedings afford the petitioner an opportunity to raise his constitutional claims; when the State has an important interest in protecting the public through criminal prosecutions; and when pre-conviction habeas corpus relief is being sought; when the state court remedies have not been fully exhausted; and when no extraordinary circumstances have been presented. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 324-25 (Kos. 2012).

An appellate court reviews an abstention order on an abuse of discretion standard. A trial court abuses its discretion when its decision is clearly unreasonable, arbitrary, or fanciful; or it is based on an erroneous conclusion of law; or the record contains no evidence on which the court could rationally have based its decision. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 106 (App. 2013).

While a plaintiff's lawyer may misconceive the proper legal theory of the claim but the complaint shows that the plaintiff is entitled to some relief which the court can grant, regardless of whether it asks for the proper relief, the complaint is sufficient and will not be dismissed. This same principle applies to abstention – even if the plaintiff's lawyer has misconceived the legal theory as one under the environmental regulations rather than a common law tort, that misconception should not be the basis for a dismissal on abstention grounds. The court must consider the actual nature of the case pled. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 107 (App. 2013).

The major rationale for abstention is that the state court is the better court to decide an issue which involves state powers and particularly strong, identifiable state interests. Certain circumstances give rise to an inclination in favor of abstention, such as a state request for abstention where there are identifiable, particularly strong state interests such as monetary claims against the state or questions concerning ownership of land, but national courts still have the obligation to carry out their own jurisdictional responsibilities. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 107 (App. 2013).

When unsettled areas of state law are the key to the case's resolution, abstention may also be appropriate if it would avoid unsettling a delicate balance in national-state relationships and would avoid threatening the state's fiscal autonomy. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 107 (App. 2013).

None of the circumstances favoring abstention applies in a case where there is no state request for abstention; the state is not even a party; and none of its agencies or regulations is involved and the plaintiffs' factual allegations set forth an action between private parties based on two common law torts, nuisance and trespass, plus a breach of contract claim, none of which involves unsettled areas of state law. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 107 (App. 2013).

Parties to a dispute within the scope of article XI, section 6(b) diversity jurisdiction have a constitutional right to invoke the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction and it is the solemn obligation of the court and all others within the Federated States of Micronesia to uphold the constitutional right to invoke national court jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b). Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

While, when issues of national law are involved there is a particularly strong presumption against abstention, there is still a presumption against abstention when the court's jurisdiction is based solely on diversity of citizenship. As a general rule, the FSM Supreme Court trial division is obliged to exercise its jurisdiction and may not abstain simply because unsettled state law issues are presented. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court's solemn obligation to consider the interests and protect the rights of those who wish to invoke its constitutional jurisdiction counsels against the unfettered use of abstention. The benefit the Constitution secures to diverse parties is the right to litigate in national court. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

A diverse party's constitutional right to litigate in the FSM Supreme Court should not lightly be disregarded, and the FSM Supreme Court's discretionary power to abstain must be exercised carefully and sparingly. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

When evaluating a motion to abstain, the FSM Supreme Court must recall its responsibility to exercise its jurisdiction under article XI, section 6 of the Constitution, and a judge must not undertake the decision to abstain lightly, since the national courts do have responsibility to exercise their own jurisdiction under article XI, section 6 of the Constitution. The FSM court cannot foist off on the state courts difficult state law questions presented in cases within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108-09 (App. 2013).

Diversity cases where the causes of action are state law are not subject to abstention and dismissal at a judge's whim. That would make the constitutional right for diverse parties to litigate in the FSM Supreme Court an empty one. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

The presumption is always that the FSM Supreme Court will exercise its constitutionally-defined jurisdiction. For the trial court to abstain, this presumption must be overcome. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

Another court's assumption of jurisdiction should be made with restraint, cognizant of the limitation that if a court has already assumed jurisdiction over the matter, a second court will not interfere and assume in rem jurisdiction over the same res. In those cases, abstention may be the appropriate course of action. A probate matter filed only in national court, however, causes no such conflict. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

The FSM Supreme Court may and should abstain in a case where land use rights are at issue, where the state is attempting to develop a coherent policy concerning the disposition of public lands, where there is a similar litigation already pending in state court, where the state requests abstention as defendant in an action which may expose it to monetary damages, where Congress has not asserted any national interests that may be affected by the litigation's outcome, and where abstention will not result in delay or injustice to the parties. Carius v. Johnson, 20 FSM R. 143, 146 (Pon. 2015).

When there is similar litigation involving the same parties and issues already pending in a state court, and a state court decision in that litigation would resolve all disputes between the parties, the risk of costly, duplicative litigation is an important factor for the FSM Supreme Court to consider in determining whether to abstain. Carius v. Johnson, 20 FSM R. 143, 146 (Pon. 2015).

When the case involves a leasehold of public land and is between a plaintiff with a recorded lease and an occupier of the lot; when the lessee's children have been added as third-party beneficiaries so this court would have diversity jurisdiction; when the usual third-party beneficiary claim is by a third-party beneficiary to a contract against a defendant who is one of the contracting parties; when the defendant is not a party to any contract of which the lessee's children would be third-party beneficiaries; when there already is a pending case in the Pohnpei Supreme Court over possession of the leasehold lot; and when the parties may have a remedy in the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division through mandamus or procedendo for the trial division's neglect or dilatory behavior, the FSM Supreme Court will abstain from the case. Carius v. Johnson, 20 FSM R. 143, 146 (Pon. 2015).

The exclusive nature of the national court jurisdiction is such that the FSM Supreme Court does not have the power to abstain from admiralty and maritime cases. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 448 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court should consider and weigh in each pendent jurisdiction case, and at every stage of the litigation, the values of judicial economy, convenience, fairness, and comity in order to decide whether to exercise jurisdiction over a case brought in that court involving pendent law state-law claims. When the balance of these factors indicates that a case properly belongs in state court, as when the national-law claims have dropped out of the lawsuit at its early stages and only state-law claims remain, the national court should decline to exercise jurisdiction by dismissing the case without prejudice. The doctrine of pendent jurisdiction thus is a doctrine of flexibility. When the national law claims must all be dismissed, it may be an abuse of discretion to take pendent jurisdiction of a claim that depends on novel questions of state law. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 513-14 (Pon. 2020).

– Certification to State Court

Where litigation in which a state of the Federated States of Micronesia is a defendant involves an issue concerning the meaning of a provision of the state Constitution, and the parties in that litigation request that the issue of the meaning of the provision be certified to the supreme court of the state, it is an appropriate exercise of the inherent powers of the FSM Supreme Court to devise a procedure for tendering the issue to the state supreme court, so long as the state court approves. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (III), 2 FSM R. 244, 246 (Pon. 1986).

The factors to be considered in the decision about whether the FSM Supreme Court should certify an issue to the state supreme court include: possible harm to the party seeking relief; the likelihood of significant delay; and the objections raised by the opposing party. Hadley v. Kolonia Town, 3 FSM R. 101, 103 (Pon. 1987).

Certification of appropriate issues to the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division by the FSM Supreme Court is consistent with the interaction between state and national courts, as contemplated by the FSM Const. art. XI, §§ 7, 8, 10, and as interpreted in earlier case law. Hadley v. Kolonia Town, 3 FSM R. 101, 103-04 (Pon. 1987).

The FSM Supreme Court has earlier explained that in the interests of judicial harmony and out of respect for state sovereignty, it is an appropriate exercise of the FSM Supreme Court's inherent powers to devise a procedure for tendering state constitutional issues to the state courts, so long as the state court approves. Hadley v. Kolonia Town, 3 FSM R. 101, 104 (Pon. 1987).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division is required to decide all national law issues presented to it. Certification to state court is only proper for state or local law issues. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 354 (Pon. 1988).

The FSM Constitution, article XI, section 8, as well as general principles of federalism and considerations of judicial harmony, give the FSM Supreme Court power to certify state law issues to state courts. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 361 (Pon. 1988).

Considerations of federalism and state sovereignty create a presumption in litigation when a state is defendant in an action for money damages that a request by the state defendant for certification to state court of unresolved and significant issues of state law will be granted. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 362 (Pon. 1988).

While the FSM Supreme Court may certify legal issues in a case before it to the highest state court, questions which require application of law to facts may not be certified. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 1988).

Certification of issues to other courts typically causes delay and increases the cost of litigation and therefore should be employed only for unsettled legal issues. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 1988).

FSM Supreme Court's trial division does not lose jurisdiction over a case merely because land issues are involved, but if such issues are presented, certification procedures may be employed to avoid encroachment upon state decision-making prerogatives. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 381 (Pon. 1988).

There are no statutory or constitutional obligations which require the FSM Supreme Court to abstain or certify questions merely because unsettled matters of state law are at issue. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 1989).

The choice of whether to abstain from a decision or certify questions is one that lies wholly within the discretion of the FSM Supreme Court, and the judge must not undertake that decision lightly. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 1989).

The list of areas in which the FSM Supreme Court will consider it appropriate to liberally defer to state courts must be open and flexible, responding to the particular state of legal and social development in Micronesia, and when issues important to Micronesians become the focus of concerted state efforts to establish a coherent body of law, the FSM Supreme Court will take those developments into account in evaluating requests for certification or abstention. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 142 (Pon. 1989).

Where two private parties are involved, special considerations of state sovereignty are not as weighty in considering requests for abstention or certification, and the FSM Supreme Court normally should attempt to resolve all issues presented, even when matters of state law are involved. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 143 (Pon. 1989).

Because it is appropriate to seek to develop legal standards through careful consideration of every individual case and all its attendant facts, to certify questions of law in a factual vacuum as a regular and frequent practice ill serves the primary purpose of the courts to address the justice of each separate case. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 144-45 (Pon. 1989).

In a case where there is no state party and no issues of land or other matters crucial to state interests for which the state is actively developing policy and law, the healthy and efficient administration of justice demands that the FSM Supreme Court fulfill its duty to exercise jurisdiction and refuse to abstain or certify issues. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 145 (Pon. 1989).

In a case where there is no state party and no issues of land or other matters crucial to state interests for which the state is actively developing policy and law, the healthy and efficient administration of justice demands that the FSM Supreme Court fulfill its duty to exercise jurisdiction and refuse to abstain or certify issues. Pryor v. Moses, 4 FSM R. 138, 145 (Pon. 1989).

The national courts, in carrying out their judicial responsibilities, do have inherent power to certify issues, or to abstain partially or completely from exercising jurisdiction in a particular issue or to exercise jurisdiction over part or all of a case. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 19 (App. 1991).

In a case arising under national law there is an especially strong presumption against full abstention, and there is a serious question whether the trial division of a national court may ever certify a question of national law to a state court for decision unless it can reasonably be expected that the particular claim can be resolved entirely through the application of state law. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67C (Pon. 1991).

Although it may be appropriate to defer to state courts the resolution of land related state law issues, abstention and certification of issues should not be allowed to thwart the more fundamental goal and obligation of the judicial system to render just decisions in a speedy fashion at a minimum of costs to litigants and society alike. Therefore a reasonable balance must be sought between responsiveness to state interests and the obligation of the national courts to carry out their own jurisdictional responsibilities.

Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67D (Pon. 1991).

Where a case requires decisions as to the rights of owners of land in Pohnpei, it is appropriate that these issues be certified for presentation to the Pohnpei Supreme Court if it can be done without undue expense to the litigants, or extended delay. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67F (Pon. 1991).

If national court jurisdiction exists the national court should promptly grant the petition to remove. Thereafter the national court can entertain a motion to abstain or to certify specific issues to the state court. Proceedings in the national court do not have to stop while a certified issue is presented to a state court. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 246 (Pon. 1991).

Where there is a long delay in moving for certification of an issue and it appears the motion's sole purpose is to cause further delay, the doctrine of laches may bar the granting of the motion. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 335, 337-38 (Pon. 1992).

The circumstance that decisions of the Appellate Division of the Chuuk State Supreme Court may be appealed to the Appellate Division of the FSM Supreme Court and the method chosen by the sovereign State of Chuuk to select members of their appellate panels will not foreclose the FSM Supreme Court trial division from certifying a question to the Chuuk State Supreme Court Appellate Division where there are other elements in favor of certification. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 478, 479-80 (Chk. 1994).

Certification of questions to a state court is appropriate where the decision of the state court on state law may be dispositive, eliminating the need to address the FSM Constitutional issues and where important questions as to the source of authority of one of its political subdivisions to impose a tax and the nature of the exercise of municipal taxing authority are involved. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 478, 480 (Chk. 1994).

Considerations of federalism and local self-government lead to the utility of certification. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 478, 480 (Chk. 1994).

Certification to a state court does not prevent the FSM Supreme Court from addressing the FSM constitutional issues if that becomes necessary. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 478, 480 (Chk. 1994).

Where the validity of a municipal tax ordinance is questioned under the state constitution and right of the taxpayer to a refund it is appropriate for the FSM Supreme Court to certify the question to the appellate division of the state court. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 480, 481 (Chk. 1994).

Unlike abstention, when a national court certifies a state law issue it poses specific questions to the appellate division of the state court. Gimnang v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 482, 485 (App. 1994).

The choice of whether to abstain from a decision or to certify questions is one that lies wholly within the discretion of the trial court. Gimnang v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 482, 485 (App. 1994).

Certification is normally granted by the court that will be applying the guidance sought to its decision, not yet made, not by the court that is requested to hear the certified question. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 608, 610 (App. 1994).

National courts are not required to certify to state courts state law issues of first impression. Whether to certify a question to state court is left to the sound discretion of the trial court on a case by case basis. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 7 FSM R. 34, 36 (App. 1995).

A most important issue in determining whether to certify an issue to state court is whether it will result in undue delay and whether that delay will prejudice a party. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 7 FSM R. 34, 36 (App. 1995).

Extension of the presumption of abstention in certain cases to municipalities is inappropriate. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 7 FSM R. 97, 101 (Pon. 1995).

Only "clean" questions of law are appropriate for certification, not questions of fact or mixed questions of law and fact. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 322 (App. 1995).

The decision to certify a question to a state court lies wholly within the sound discretion of the trial court. Thus the standard of review of the decision not to certify a question is whether the trial court abused its discretion. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 322 (App. 1995).

The FSM Supreme Court is not obligated to certify every unsettled issue of state law, and it does have a constitutional obligation to exercise its own jurisdiction, but there may be a preference for referring a matter to state court when the state court's decision on an unsettled matter of state law would be dispositive and obviate the need for an adjudication of the national constitution. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 322 (App. 1995).

Certification as practiced in the FSM is a judicially devised procedure that is entirely discretionary with the court. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 209 (App. 1999).

Just as the trial court could exercise its discretion to certify the questions on its own motion, it could properly exercise that discretion to grant plaintiffs' unopposed motion to withdraw the certification after nearly a year had elapsed without any indication from the Chuuk state court appellate division that it would hear the question. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 209 (App. 1999).

Events transpiring in other litigation before the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division did not have the capacity, by their mere occurrence, to create reversible error in a different case before a different court. The FSM trial court was not obliged to be aware of and draw inferences from those events, which did not constitute controlling precedent, in order to discern the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division's mind with respect to the certification question. When Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division did not speak to the certification issue, the FSM Supreme Court trial division properly exercised its discretion to withdraw the certification. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 209-10 (App. 1999).

A motion to certify issues to a state court may be denied when there is an absence of legal authority in the movant's memorandum and when the issues are imprecisely and inaccurately defined. Island Cable TV v. Gilmete, 9 FSM R. 264, 266-67 (Pon. 1999).

A court is hesitant to initiate the somewhat cumbersome certification procedure until it is satisfied that putative issues raised exist, and that they have been precisely defined. Island Cable TV v. Gilmete, 9 FSM R. 264, 266-67 (Pon. 1999).

A strong presumption exists under FSM law for deferring land matters to local land authorities, along with federalism principles and concerns for judicial harmony. The FSM Supreme Court can certify such questions of state law to the state courts. But when, if the equitable or mechanic's lien claims had been presented in the original complaint, the court could then have certified the questions to the state court to determine whether such liens exist under state law and when the original complaint's factual allegations support such claims, there was no reason why that claim could not have been made then with discovery on-going while the state court considered the question. But when, considering the circumstances, it has become too late to bring this claim, a motion to amend the complaint to add a declaratory judgment claim that the plaintiffs have such a lien will be denied. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 233 (Pon. 2002).

Although the national courts, in carrying out their judicial responsibilities, do have inherent power to certify issues, or to abstain partially or completely from exercising jurisdiction over a particular issue, or to exercise jurisdiction over part or all of a case; and although the trial court may raise the question of abstention or certification on its own motion; it is not mandatory that the court do so. And even if such a motion had been made, the choice of whether to abstain from a decision or to certify questions is one that lies wholly within the trial court's discretion. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 2005).

When no motion to abstain or to certify a question to the state court was made, the trial court could not abuse its discretion by not abstaining from deciding or by not certifying the ownership question to the state court. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 2005).

National court abstention or certification of issues may also be justified on occasion by a desire to avoid unsettling a delicate balance in national-state relationships. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 564 (Chk. 2009).

The appellants' likelihood of success on their claim that the court should have abstained or certified their "novel issues" to the state court is virtually zero when they never moved for certification or abstention and when, even if they had, the court is not required to certify or abstain from every "unsettled" state law issue. FSM Dev. Bank v. Helgenberger, 17 FSM R. 266, 270 (Pon. 2010).

The choice to abstain from hearing a case, like the decision to certify a question, lies wholly within the trial court's sound discretion, and this is reviewed on an abuse of discretion standard. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 293 (App. 2010).

The choice to abstain from hearing a case, like the decision to certify a question, lies wholly within the trial court's sound discretion, and this is reviewed on an abuse of discretion standard. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 293 (App. 2010).

When no motion to certify was ever made, the trial court could not abuse its discretion by not certifying a question to the state court. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

– National/State Power

There appears nothing of an indisputably national character in the power to control all lesser crimes. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 32 (Pon. 1981).

The Trust Territory High Court's former exclusive jurisdiction over lawsuits against the Trust Territory government has been delegated to the constitutional governments covered by Secretarial Order 3039. Within the Federated States of Micronesia, the allocation of this former exclusive High Court jurisdiction between the Supreme Court of the Federated States of Micronesia and the various state courts will be determined on the basis of jurisdictional provisions within the Constitution and laws of the Federated States of Micronesia and its respective states. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 68 (Kos. 1982).

The Federated States of Micronesia Supreme Court is specifically given jurisdiction over disputes between citizens of a state and foreign citizens. FSM Const. art. XI, § 6(b). This jurisdiction is based upon the citizenship of the parties, not the subject matter of their dispute. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 101 (Pon. 1982).

The Constitution places diversity jurisdiction in the Supreme Court, despite the fact that the issues involve matters within state or local, rather than national, legislative powers. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 102 (Pon. 1982).

The power to regulate probate of wills or inheritance of property is not "beyond the power of a state to control" within the meaning of article VIII, section 1 of the Constitution and is consequently a state power. Nothing about the power to regulate probate or inheritance suggests that these are beyond the power of a state to control. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107 (Pon. 1982).

State officials generally should have greater knowledge of use, local custom and expectations concerning land and personal property. They should be better equipped than the national government to control and regulate these matters. The Constitution's framers specifically considered this issue and felt that powers of this sort should be state powers. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107, 109 (Pon. 1982).

The allocation of judicial authority is made on the basis of jurisdiction, generally without regard to whether state or national powers are at issue. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 108 (Pon. 1982).

The prosecution of criminals is not a power having indisputably national character. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 178 (Truk 1982).

Exclusive national government jurisdiction over major crimes is not mandated by the Constitution; such jurisdiction would be exclusive in any event only if criminal jurisdiction was a power of indisputably national character. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 181 (Truk 1982).

When jurisdiction exists by virtue of diversity of the parties, the FSM Supreme Court may resolve the dispute despite the fact that matters squarely within the legislative powers of states (e.g., probate, inheritance an land issue) may be involved. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 396 (Pon. 1984).

While the FSM Constitution is the supreme law of the land and the FSM Supreme Court may under no circumstances acquiesce in unconstitutional governmental action, states should be given a full opportunity to exercise their legitimate powers in a manner consistent with the commands of the Constitution without unnecessary intervention by national courts. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 428 (Pon. 1984).

There is nothing absurd about a weapons control scheme that recognizes that both the national and the state governments have an interest in controlling the possession, use and sale of weapons. While Congress and the states may eventually wish to allocate their respective roles with more precision, the current Weapons Control Act appears to provide a workable system during these early years of transition and constitutional self-government. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 44 (App. 1985).

The Weapons Control Act seems well attuned to the recognition of shared national-state interest in maintaining an orderly society and the goal of cooperation in law enforcement as reflected in the Major Crimes Clause, article IX, section 2(p) of the Constitution as well as the Joint Law Enforcement Act, 12 F.S.M.C. 1201. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 44 (App. 1985).

Major crimes obviously were not viewed by the framers as simply a local or state problem. The Major Crimes Clause undoubtedly reflects their judgment that the very integrity of this new nation could be threatened if major crimes could be committed with impunity in any part of the nation, with the national government forced helplessly to stand aside. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 58 (App. 1985).

The framers of the Constitution stipulated that the line for determining whether a crime is major be drawn on the basis of severity or gravity of the crime rather than by reference to principles of federalism developed under the Constitution of the United States. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 58 (App. 1985).

The scope of state police powers under the FSM Constitution must be determined by reference to the powers of the national government under the Major Crimes Clause. It follows that legitimate exercise of the national government power to define major crimes cannot be viewed as an unconstitutional encroachment upon the police powers of the states. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 59 (App. 1985).

The members of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention obviously did not believe the Major Crimes Clause was improperly at odds with their general view that governmental power should be less centralized under the FSM Constitution than it had been in Trust Territory days. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 59

(App. 1985).

The power to impose taxes, duties, and tariffs based on imports is a national, not a state, power and where Congress has exercised the power and shares the revenues with the states, a state may not also impose an additional import tax. Wainit v. Truk (II), 2 FSM R. 86, 88 (Truk 1985).

The nature of the expressly delegated powers in article IX, section 2, of the Constitution – including the powers to impose taxes, to provide for the national defense, ratify treaties, regulate immigration and citizenship, regulate currency, foreign commerce and navigation, and to provide for a postal system – strongly suggests that they are intended to be the exclusive province of the national government, since they call for a uniform nationally coordinated approach. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 181-82 (App. 1986).

The Pohnpei State Constitution was established under the authority granted by article VII, section 2 of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia which mandates that a state shall have a democratic constitution and also Pohnpei State Law No. 2L-131-82, section 9, which mandated the Pohnpei State Constitutional Convention "to draft a constitution for the State of Ponape . . . [that] shall make adequate provisions for the exercise of legislative, judicial and executive functions, and shall guarantee to all citizens of the State, a democratic form of government." People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 8-9 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Congress, under section 5 of article XV, had the power to provide for transition from government under the Trusteeship to government under the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia. Pohnpei v. Mack, 3 FSM R. 45, 49 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Trust Territory statutes applicable to the states became part of the state's laws, regardless of whether they were published in the FSM Code. Such holdover Trust Territory laws become laws of the states until superseded. Pohnpei v. Mack, 3 FSM R. 45, 55 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

All Trust Territory statutes that were applicable to the State of Pohnpei prior to Pub. L. No. 2-48 and immediately before November 8, 1984, the effective date of the Pohnpei State Constitution, and which have not been amended, superseded, or repealed, are laws of the State of Pohnpei. Section 3 of S.L. 3L-33-84 made those Trust Territory statutes into laws of the State of Pohnpei, and that includes Title 15 of the Trust Territory Code. Pohnpei v. Mack, 3 FSM R. 45, 55 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Determination as to whether a statute is a state or national law must be made on a statute-by-statute or a section-by-section basis. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 355 (Pon. 1988).

The fact that Congress included a particular law in the FSM Code does not indicate conclusively whether the law is to be applied by this court as part of national law, for some parts of the Code were intended to apply only to the Trust Territory High Court in its transitional role until state courts were established. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 356 (Pon. 1988).

If a power is not enumerated in the Constitution, the likelihood is that the framers intended it to be a state power, for the only unexpressed powers which may be exercised by the national government are powers of "such an indisputably national character as to be beyond the power of a state to control." FSM Const. art. VIII, § 1. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 357 (Pon. 1988).

Primary lawmaking powers for the field of torts lie with the states, not with the national government, but the national government may have an implied power to regulate tort law as part of the exercise of other general powers. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 359 (Pon. 1988).

Wrongful death statutes, including the $100,000 ceiling on wrongful death claims, are part of the law of the states and are not national law. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 359 (Pon. 1988).

A FSM Supreme Court decision applying state law in a case before it is final and res judicata; but if in a subsequent case a state court decides the same issue differently, the state decision in that subsequent case is controlling precedent and the national courts should apply the state court rule in future cases. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 360 n.22 (Pon. 1988).

Lack of mention of state and local courts in FSM Constitution article XI, section 6(b) reveals that national courts are to play the primary role in handling the kinds of cases identified in that section, but nothing in article XI, section 6(b) may be read as absolutely preventing state courts from exercising jurisdiction over those kinds of cases. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 379 (Pon. 1988).

Parties to a dispute in which there is diversity have a constitutional right to invoke the jurisdiction of a national court, but if all parties agree, and if state law permits, a state court may hear and decide the kinds of cases described in article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 379 (Pon. 1988).

Article XI, section 6(c) of the Constitution places authority to prescribe jurisdiction only in the national Congress, and not in state legislatures. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 379 (Pon. 1988).

Failure to mention national courts in section 25 of the Pohnpei State Real Property Mortgage Act should not be read as an attempt to deprive litigants of access to the FSM Supreme Court's trial division. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 380 (Pon. 1988).

A lawsuit to enforce a mortgage is an attempt to enforce a type of lien against a delinquent debtor. Such a case bears a relationship to the power to regulate "bankruptcy and insolvency," which the Constitution in article IX, section 2(g), places in the national Congress. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 381 (Pon. 1988).

The national Constitution does not prohibit state courts from hearing cases described in article XI, section 6(b) if all parties accept state court jurisdiction, but parties to a dispute within scope of article XI, section 6(b) have a constitutional rights to invoke jurisdiction of FSM Supreme Court trial division. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 392 (Pon. 1988).

The intent of framers of the Constitution was that national courts would handle most types of cases described in article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution and national courts therefore should not lightly find a waiver of right to invoke its jurisdiction. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 394 (Pon. 1988).

Under the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia, the national government, not the state governments, assumes any "right, obligation, liability, or contract of the government of the Trust Territory." Salik v. U Corp. (I), 3 FSM R. 404, 407 (Pon. 1988).

Powers not expressly delegated to the national government nor prohibited to the states are state powers. FSM Const. art. VIII, § 2. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 473 (Pon. 1988).

The fact that control over marine areas within the twelve-mile zone is not mentioned in the Constitution is a strong indication that the framers intended the states to control ownership and use of marine resources within that area. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 473 (Pon. 1988).

Regulatory power beyond twelve miles from island baselines lies with the national government. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 479 (Pon. 1988).

Decision making concerning allocation of functions as state and national roles falls most squarely within the role of Congress, for Congress is the most political branch of the national government and is best suited to resolve policy issues. In re Cantero, 3 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 1988).

Article XI, section 8 of the Constitution, providing for state court certification of issues of national law, gives the FSM Supreme Court appellate division another tool to oversee the development of national law jurisprudence, but also provides the option of remand so that the state court may address issues of national law. Bernard's Retail Store & Wholesale v. Johnny, 4 FSM R. 33, 35 (App. 1989).

No jurisdiction is conferred on state courts by article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution, but neither does the diversity jurisdiction of section 6(b) preclude state courts from acting under state law, unless or until a party to the litigation invokes national court jurisdiction. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 89 (App. 1989).

In the course of the formation of the FSM, the allocation of responsibilities between states and nation was such that the impact of the national courts in criminal matters was to be in the area of major crimes and as the ultimate arbiter of human rights issues. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 93 (App. 1989).

Questions regarding the validity of the provisions of promissory notes for personal loans, executed with a national bank operating in each state of the FSM and having in part foreign ownership, are closely connected to the powers of the national legislature to regulate banking, foreign and interstate commerce, and bankruptcy, and to establish usury limits, and they have a distinctly national character. The FSM Supreme Court therefore will formulate and apply rules of national law in assessing such issues. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 218 (Pon. 1990).

A state law provision attempting to place "original and exclusive jurisdiction" in the Yap State Court cannot divest a national court of responsibilities placed upon it by the national constitution, which is the "supreme law of the Federated States of Micronesia." Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 23 (App. 1991).

Under traditional constitutional analysis, taxpayers' efforts to recover tax moneys unlawfully extracted from them by a state may be relegated to state procedures and decision-makers so long as there is a reasonable procedure under state law whereby the taxpayer may obtain meaningful relief. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 23-24 (App. 1991).

The power of the national government under article IX, section 2(e) of the Constitution, "to impose taxes on income," is an exclusive national power that may not be exercised by the states. Youngstrom v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 73, 74 (Kos. 1991).

The Kosrae transaction tax of KC 9.301 is a selective tax rather than an income tax and is not an encroachment upon the national government's exclusive power to tax income. Youngstrom v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 73, 76 (Kos. 1991).

Under national law, the governor of a state is the allottee for all Compact of Free Association funds unless he delegates in writing his right to be allottee, so where a state statute allots such funds to the legislative branch without written delegation from the governor, the statute violates national law. Gouland v. Joseph, 5 FSM R. 263, 265 (Chk. 1992).

The national court should not abstain from deciding a criminal case where the crime took place before the effective date of the 1991 amendment removing federal jurisdiction over major crimes because of the firmly expressed intention by the Constitutional Convention delegates as to the manner of transition from national jurisdiction to state jurisdiction. In re Ress, 5 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 1992).

The scheme of national, constitutionally-authorized foreign investment legislation is so pervasive there is no room for the state to supplement it. Non-FSM citizen attorneys and their private practice of law are expressly subjected to the national legislative scheme. Insofar as attorneys who are engaged in the private practice of law and whose business activities are within the scope of the national FIA, the state FIA is invalid. Berman v. Pohnpei, 5 FSM R. 303, 306 (Pon. 1992).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has the constitutional power to use its discretion to review a case from a state trial court, generally, proper respect for the state court requires that state appeal rights be exhausted before the FSM Supreme Court would grant appellate review especially when important state interests are involved. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 322, 324 (App. 1992).

The FSM Constitution distinguishes national powers from state powers, FSM Const. art. VIII. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 69 (Pon. 1993).

If a power is of an indisputable national character such that it is beyond the state's power to control, then that power is to be considered a national power, even though it is not an express power granted by the Constitution. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 70-71 (Pon. 1993).

A state power can be concurrently national to the extent that the state cannot adequately exercise that power in the manner in which it is intended either by statute or by or constitutional framework for circumstances not foreseen by the framers of our Constitution. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 72 (Pon. 1993).

To the extent that the state is unable to police its waters and enforce its fishing regulations of its own, the national government has an obligation to provide assistance. However, to the extent that the national government must provide assistance, the power to regulate state waters is beyond the state's control and is in fact a concurrent national power. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 73 (Pon. 1993).

A condition on an MMA fishing permit which prohibits fishing within 12 miles of the FSM unless authorized by the state which has jurisdiction is an exercise of the national government's unexpressed concurrent national power. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 73 (Pon. 1993).

Nothing in the FSM constitutional framework suggests that a state can unilaterally avoid the effect of a valid international agreement, constitutionally arrived at, between the Federated States of Micronesia and another nation. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 103-04 (App. 1993).

The national government has the exclusive power to tax income and imports. The power to levy other taxes, unless specifically barred by the Constitution, is an exclusive state power. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 168, 169-70 (App. 1993).

A transaction tax oriented toward individual transactions and not total income, and only triggered by the transactions it covers, even though paid by the vendor, is analogous to a selective sales tax and is not an unconstitutional encroachment on the national government's exclusive power to tax income. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 168, 170 (App. 1993).

Comity, the respect of one sovereign for another, and respect for state sovereignty are important principles. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 6 FSM R. 221, 222-23 (App. 1993).

A Chuuk state tax on a lessor or landowner who rents or leases land, building or housing unit, for residential, or office space, or other use is not an unconstitutional encroachment on the national government's exclusive power to tax income. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 310, 311 (Chk. 1994).

The Constitution prohibits state and local governments from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 312, 313 (Chk. 1994).

The absence of an express grant of authority to the national government to regulate marine resources within twelve miles of island baselines indicates the framers' intention that states have control over these resources. However, the state authority to regulate marine resources located within twelve miles of island baselines is primary but not exclusive. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 598 (Pon. 1994).

The nonexclusive constitutional grant to the states of regulatory power over marine resources located within twelve miles of island baselines cannot be read as creating exclusive state court jurisdiction over marine resources within the twelve mile limit. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 598-99 & n.7 (Pon. 1994).

The framers of the FSM Constitution favored state control over marine resources within twelve miles of island baselines. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 601 (Pon. 1994).

Even when a national court places itself in the shoes of the state court and interprets state law, the state court is always the final arbiter of the meaning of a state law. State court interpretations of state law which contradict prior rulings of the national courts are controlling. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 601 (Pon. 1994).

A fishing permit issued by the national government prohibiting fishing in state waters unless authorized by the state which has jurisdiction does not constitute regulation of state waters by the national government because it merely tries to prevent a vessel that fishes illegally in state waters from continuing to fish in national waters. FSM v. Hai Hsiang No. 63, 7 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 1995).

Only the national government may constitutionally tax income. The states' taxing power does not include the power to tax income. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 117, 119 (App. 1995).

If a state wishes to obtain funding from a consumption tax, it can avoid a constitutional confrontation by making the taxable incident the sale or rental transaction, and by expressing the requirement that the tax be paid by the consumer. Therefore a state tax on the gross rental receipts of a landlord is an unconstitutional tax on income. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 117, 120 (App. 1995).

Among the powers reserved to the states is the control of administration and policy-making of all branches of state government. Berman v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 1996).

The Constitution reserves to the states all powers not prohibited to them or expressly delegated to the national government or of such indisputably national character as to be beyond the power of a state to control. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 672 (App. 1996).

State autonomy should be as wide-ranging as possible, but it is subject to the limits of the FSM Constitution. A state may not exceed the scope of its power by reliance on a state constitutional provision where to do so prevents enforcement of national civil rights legislation. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 208, 212-13 (Chk. 1997).

The supremacy clause of the FSM Constitution does not admit a result where a state constitutional provision prevents the enforcement of a national statute which gives a private cause of action for rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution, especially when it is the solemn obligation of state governments to uphold the principles of the FSM Constitution and to advance the principles of unity upon which the Constitution is founded. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 208, 213 (Chk. 1997).

Article I, section 1 of the Constitution defines the FSM's national boundaries, and section 2 defines the states' boundaries in the event marine resources revenues should accrue to the state wherein the resources are found, but the Constitution's framers did not intend to confer ownership of marine resources, or revenues derived from such resources, when they defined the state boundaries. Offshore marine resources, and the division between national and state power with respect to these resources, are addressed in other articles of the Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 367-68 (Pon. 1998).

Article IX, section 2(m) of the FSM Constitution expressly grants to the FSM Congress the power to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of natural resources beyond 12 miles from island baselines. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 368 (Pon. 1998).

The line between national and state power in a particular area of government is not always clear, and must be carefully and thoughtfully drawn. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 369 (Pon. 1998).

Although article IX, section 2(m) of the Constitution does not expressly state how revenues derived from regulatory activities in the EEZ should be distributed, the FSM Congress constitutionally is empowered to collect and distribute fishing fees as implied or incidental to the express grant of power in article IX, section 2(m), and that discretion over the ultimate division or appropriation of the fishing fees rests with the FSM national government. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 369-70 (Pon. 1998).

All express powers delegated to the national government contain within them innumerable incidental or implied powers. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 370 (Pon. 1998).

Each of the express powers delegated to the national government in Article IX of the FSM Constitution include the full authority for the national government to enact legislation and engage in activities necessary to exercise that express power. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

The express grant of power to the national government to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of natural resources, implicitly includes the power of the national government to collect revenues that are generated as a result. Thus, the national government has the authority to enact legislation related to offshore marine resources, including legislation related to collection and distribution of revenues derived therefrom. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

To empower the national government to regulate ownership and exploitation of fishery resources within the EEZ, without the power to collect and distribute revenues derived from these regulatory functions, would violate the intention of the Constitution's framers and unduly limit the national government in the exercise of its exclusive power over natural resources in the area beyond 12 miles from the island baselines. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

Since the national government has the express authority to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of fishery resources in the EEZ, the power to promulgate legislation which generates revenue from the regulation of these resources and provides for collection and distribution of such revenue, is incidental to or implied in the express grant. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

The Constitution's framers intended to vest complete control of the EEZ in the national government, and the expressed intent of legislation passed by the Interim Congress which terminated the practice of distributing fishing fees from the EEZ to the districts, or states, was to bring certain provisions of the Fishery Zone legislation into conformity with the provisions of the FSM Constitution and the powers granted to the national government under the Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371-74 (Pon. 1998).

That the states currently are dissatisfied with the national government's power over the fishing fees does not change the constitutional division of powers that each of the states agreed to when it ratified the FSM Constitution and entered the Federated States of Micronesia. The states clearly delegated all power over offshore fishing resources beyond 12 miles from their baselines to the national government in the Constitution. Thus, the FSM has the power to collect and distribute the fishing fees under article IX, section 2(m). Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 374 (Pon. 1998).

The national government's authority to collect and distribute the fishing fees derived from the FSM EEZ is indisputably of a national character and beyond the ability of a single state to control because of the numerous national powers which the national government is required to exercise in order to effectively regulate and control the FSM EEZ and because the individual states are incapable of regulating and controlling the EEZ. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 374-75 (Pon. 1998).

Management and control of the FSM's fishing resources in its EEZ requires the national government to exercise its exclusive treaty powers under article IX, section 2(b) of the FSM Constitution. The FSM national government has specific international rights, and has undertaken specific international obligations, with respect to its EEZ under certain treaties. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 375 (Pon. 1998).

Negotiating fishery agreements with foreign governments and foreign companies necessarily involves foreign affairs, another exclusive national power. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 375 (Pon. 1998).

The process of determining the appropriate level of the fishing fees, the best method to collect the fishing fees, and ultimately how to distribute the fishing fees, is indisputably of a national character. Thus the national government, not the states, has the power to collect and distribute the fishing fees. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 375 (Pon. 1998).

That Congress has legislated sharing revenues from fines and forfeitures with the states and that each of the states has a delegate on the Board of the MMA is not an admission or indication that the states are the owners of the underlying resources. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 376 (Pon. 1998).

The Law of the Sea Convention first recognized that the Federated States of Micronesia as a nation has the exclusive right to exploit resources in its 200-mile EEZ. The FSM Constitution was drafted to vest authority over the EEZ in the national government with this in mind. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 378 & n.19 (Pon. 1998).

Issues related to the EEZ cannot be determined by relying on custom and tradition, as the commercial value of the EEZ to the Federated States of Micronesia was first realized when the nation acceded to the Law of the Sea Convention. While the rights of individual Micronesians, families and clans to living marine resources under particular circumstances might be amenable to determination by custom and tradition, the states' legal entitlement to share in fishing fees derived from commercial fishing ventures, extending to 200 miles from island baselines, is not. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 378 (Pon. 1998).

Any claim to resources in the EEZ based upon custom and tradition must rest with clans, families and individuals rather than with the states. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 379 (Pon. 1998).

The FSM national government has the exclusive right to harvest living marine resources in its EEZ, just as it has the exclusive right to harvest offshore mineral resources. As the holder of this exclusive right, the national government is allowed to dispose of this resource and receive revenue in return. Under the Convention on the Law of the Sea, each nation is entitled to exploit its marine resources to the extent it is able to achieve a maximum sustainable yield. When the FSM does not fully exploit its own resources, it is entitled to compensation at the appropriate market rate from foreign fishing vessels which it allows to fish in its waters. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386 (Pon. 1998).

Because a Congressional statute set up Telecom to serve the public interest and foster economic development, because Telecom may seek appropriations from Congress and, to the extent approved by the President, grants from sources outside of the FSM, because Telecom's board of directors must submit an annual report reflecting its activities, including financial statements, to the government, and because Telecom has no independent shareholders and is fully owned by the national government, Telecom is deemed, for taxation purposes, to be a part of the national government, and its efforts to carry out its mission should not be hindered by any state's efforts to tax its business activities. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 385 (Pon. 2000).

By making the taxing powers allocated between the national and state governments of Micronesia exclusive and distinct and allocating the exclusive power to tax income and imports, the Constitution's framers sought to avoid vertical multiple taxation and ensure a consistent fiscal policy for Micronesia. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 387-89 (Pon. 2000).

Internal waters are those waters on the landward side, or inside, of the baselines of the territorial sea. The exclusive economic zone starts twelve nautical miles seaward of the baseline and extending outward for another 188 nautical miles. A desire to maximize the area that might be included within the baselines, subject to the FSM's international treaty obligations, cannot be interpreted as a recognition of state ownership of the ocean resources 12 to 200 nautical outside of those baselines when drawn. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 430-31 (App. 2000).

The framers' intent that the equidistance method be used to establish fair and equitable marine boundaries between the states in the event marine resource revenue should accrue to the state wherein the resources are found does not indicate state resource ownership because the Constitution explicitly provides for an event when such revenues would accrue to the state – when ocean floor mineral resources are exploited. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 (App. 2000).

When the Constitution defined state boundaries, the Constitution's framers did not intend to confer on the states the ownership of the exclusive economic zone's resources or all the revenues derived from them. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 (App. 2000).

When a government has the power to collect money, it has the power to disburse that money at its discretion unless the Constitution or applicable laws should provide otherwise. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 (App. 2000).

The Constitution's broadly stated express grants of power to the national government contain within them innumerable incidental or implied powers, as well as certain inherent powers. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 n.2 (App. 2000).

Because regulating the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of the exclusive economic zone's natural resources is a power expressly and exclusively delegated to the national government and because the incidental power to collect assessments levied pursuant to that delegated power is indisputably a national power, the power to disburse those funds is also a national power, except where the Constitution provides otherwise (such as in Article IX, section 6). Thus even were the states the underlying owners of the exclusive economic zone's resources, such a conclusion would not entitle the states to the exclusive economic zone's revenues except where the Constitution so provides. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431-32 (App. 2000).

Under the fishery statute enacted by the FSM Interim Congress, the only portion of the fishing fees subject to mutual determination with the states was that attributable to the foreign catch within twelve nautical miles of the baselines, an area whose natural resources the Constitution places under state control. The rest of the fishing fees – those for the area now known as the exclusive economic zone – went directly to the national government. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 433 (App. 2000).

The four states are not entitled to the net proceeds of revenues from exploitation of the living resources in the FSM exclusive economic zone on the basis of ownership. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not assessed under the national government's constitutional authority to impose taxes on income. They are levied instead under the national government's constitutional authority to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of natural resources within the marine space of the Federated States of Micronesia beyond 12 miles from island baselines. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

Unearmarked foreign financial assistance is divided into equal shares for each state and the national government, which means that the national government and every state each receive a 20% share. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

Not less than half of the national taxes must be paid to the state where collected, but fishing fees are not national taxes because they are imposed, not under the national government's power to impose taxes, but under its power to regulate exploitation of natural resources within the FSM exclusive economic zone. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

Revenue sharing is also mandated for net revenue derived from FSM EEZ ocean floor mineral resources exploited, which is to be divided equally between the national government and the appropriate state government. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

The Constitution grants the national government the exclusive right to regulate the exploitation of the natural resources within the EEZ, which necessarily includes the generation of revenue from the EEZ and the use of that revenue. The Constitution requires that of the EEZ-generated revenues, half of the net revenues derived from ocean floor mineral resources be given to the state governments. There is no Constitutional requirement that any revenue from the EEZ's living resources be shared with the state governments although the framers could have easily included one. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435-36 (App. 2000).

Article IX, section 2(g) of the Constitution expressly delegates to Congress the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. A delegation of power to the national government under section 2 of Article IX is exclusive. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 581-82 (App. 2000).

Import taxes are an exclusive national power, and as such it is a power that is prohibited to the states. MGM Import-Export Co. v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2001).

The states have the residual authority to regulate ownership, exploration and exploitation of natural resources within 12 miles from island baselines. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 63 (Pon. 2001).

The power of the states to regulate ownership, exploration and exploitation of natural resources in the marine area within 12 miles from the island baselines is not absolute as it is limited by the national powers to regulate navigation and shipping, and to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 63 & n.8 (Pon. 2001).

Control over areas within 12 miles from island baselines was reserved to the states, subject to the national government's control over foreign and interstate commerce, and navigation and shipping. Thus, under the transition clause, the "government" ownership referenced in 67 TTC 2 should be interpreted as "state" ownership within 12 miles from island baselines. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 65 n.13 (Pon. 2001).

In our federal system of government, state courts are not inferior tribunals to the FSM Supreme Court trial division. The national and state court systems are separate systems created by and serving different sovereigns. Neither system is superior to the other. Rather the systems are parallel. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

A Trust Territory statute (except to the extent it is amended, repealed, or is inconsistent with the Constitution), which related to matters that now fall within the national government's legislative powers became national law upon the Constitution's ratification, and the other Trust Territory laws presumably became law of each of the states at the same time; and if neither state nor national powers alone are sufficient to carry out the statute's original purpose, or if state and national powers are invoked, then the statute is enforceable as both state and national law. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 414-15 (Pon. 2001).

Because the national government has the exclusive power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, the Consumer Protection Act is the law of the FSM insofar as any advertising, sale, offer or distribution involves commerce between the states of the FSM or with any foreign entity. The Consumer Protection Act also is the law of the states of the FSM, insofar as it involves commerce which is intrastate and has not been repealed by the state legislatures. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 415 (Pon. 2001).

A national statute whose term "public officer" refers to state and municipal public officials as well as national officials does not raise a constitutional issue involving the allocation of powers between the two sovereigns – state and national – and the three levels of government – national, state, and local because it applies to persons based upon their status as public officers – persons holding posts and exercising governmental functions. It does not matter whether that status is defined and bestowed upon a person by the national government or by another level of government in the FSM. It only matters that the person holds that status. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

A Pohnpei state law exempting it from anticompetitive practices liability does not apply to a case brought under the national anticompetitive practices statute since the lawsuit is based on a cause of action created by the national, not the state, statute covering an activity – foreign and interstate commerce – over which the national government may legislate. It would, of course, apply to an action brought under the state anticompetitive practices statute. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

A state cannot nullify a valid exercise of national power by enacting a state statute. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

A municipality is not a separate sovereign. A municipality is a creature of a state's sovereignty. Unlike states, municipalities are not sovereigns, but exercise that portion of a state's sovereignty that the state authorizes it to. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 315 (Chk. 2006).

The national government has the power to ban the possession and use of Philippine slingshots in those places under its jurisdiction and in those circumstances that make the offense "inherently national in character" such as when the offense is committed in the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone or in FSM airspace, or on FSM-flagged vessels, or is committed against an FSM public servant in connection with that servant's service. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 175-76 (Chk. 2007).

The regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition involved a national activity or function because of the international commerce aspects of their manufacture and movement together with the national government interest in protecting the national security under the national defense clause, and that these, in combination, provided the national government's jurisdictional basis to regulate the possession of firearms and ammunition. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

In an examination to determine whether it is a national crime, the focus is: Does the regulation involve a national activity or function, or is it one of an indisputably national character? FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

The possession or use of a Philippine slingshot does not implicate the national government's functions and activities in the sphere of national defense or security and the connection, if there is one, is too tenuous to give the national government authority to regulate Philippine slingshots. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

The national government certainly has the power to criminalize possession or use of explosive, incendiary or poison gas bomb, grenade, mine or similar devices on the same basis that it has the power to regulate the possession and use of firearms and ammunition because these items definitely implicate both national defense and security and foreign commerce interests on which the Jano court concluded that the national government had the authority to regulate firearms and ammunition. But Philippine slingshots do not. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

Weapons control has long been recognized as a subject on which both the national and state governments may legislate. It is thus within the power of the State of Chuuk to regulate the possession and use of Philippine slingshots. If it has not done so, that does not mean that it cannot. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2007).

It has long been recognized that both the national and state governments may enact legislation regulating the possession of firearms. There is nothing particularly absurd about a weapons control scheme that recognizes that both the national and the state governments have an interest in controlling the possession, use 1and sale of weapons. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 211 (Pon. 2007).

Congress has an independent jurisdictional basis for the Weapons Control Act under FSM Constitution Article IX, Section 2(g) on foreign and interstate commerce and Article IX, Section 2(a) on national defense. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

Congress has always had the power to define national crimes. The power to define national crimes is inherent in the national government and existed before the 1991 amendment made the power express. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

The 1991 constitutional amendment did not proscribe Congress's authority to enact legislation pursuant to its independent authority under the national defense and foreign and interstate commerce clauses. Thus, the 1991 amendment did nothing to curtail Congress's authority to regulate the possession of firearms. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

Congress does not lack the authority to regulate possession of firearms because it was the framers' clear intent that commerce within a particular state should be regulated locally since there is an international commerce aspect to the regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition that is related to its manufacture outside of the FSM and to its movement through the nation's customs and immigration borders. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

In concluding that Congress has the authority to regulate the possession of firearms as part of its power to provide for the national defense, the court does not focus on the defendant's intended use of the firearm at issue, but instead focuses on the potential uses of firearms in general. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

Congress's authority to regulate firearms is not dependent on the defendant's subjective intent because the national government interest in regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition in order to provide for the national security in combination with the international commerce aspects provides a jurisdictional basis for the national government's regulation of the possession of firearms and ammunition. Congress's jurisdiction over the possession of firearms is not tied to the intent of a particular defendant. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

The national government's power to regulate firearms is derived from both its ability to protect the national security under its power to provide for the national defense and its power to regulate international commerce aspects because of the international commerce aspect of firearms manufacture and movement. In combination, these provide the national government with a jurisdictional basis to regulate the possession of firearms and ammunition. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 238, 239 (Chk. 2007).

The national government's jurisdiction over firearms is not limited to only certain circumstances or certain quantities. What the national government can regulate in aggregate, it is able to regulate piece by piece; otherwise it would not be able to regulate it at all, and that, is clearly not the case. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 238, 239 (Chk. 2007).

Since engaging in business is defined as carrying out any activity relating to the conduct of a business and expressly includes leasing property of any kind for commercial purposes, when a foreign investment permittee engaged in the business of providing operational and maintenance support to helicopters servicing fishing vessels in the FSM, its leasing helicopters is one aspect of its business that relates to its fishing activity and is therefore that leasing activity is subject to the FSM's exclusive jurisdiction and regulation for foreign investment purposes. Thus Pohnpei may not require it to apply for a foreign investment permit. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 335 (Pon. 2007).

Since, by statute, an economic sector included in any of the Categories for National Regulation must not appear in any of the Categories for State Regulation, the statutory provision contemplates that state and national regulation will be mutually exclusive, and works hand in glove with the stated purpose of the Foreign Investment Act, which is to encourage foreign investment. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 335-36 (Pon. 2007).

A state constitution cannot control or restrict the actions of the national government, whose powers and limitations are derived solely from the national constitution, which is the supreme law of the land. Thus, a state constitution's protections cannot be invoked against the national government. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 182 (Chk. 2008).

The dual sovereignty doctrine provides an important limitation on the application of double jeopardy to related state and national prosecutions. Under the dual sovereignty doctrine, a state prosecution does not bar a subsequent national prosecution of the same person for the same acts, and a national prosecution does not bar a subsequent state prosecution. The reason is that the national government and its individual states are independent sovereigns, and prosecutions under the laws of those separate sovereigns do not subject a defendant to be twice put in jeopardy. If the constitutional protection against double jeopardy did apply to prosecutions under the laws of independent sovereigns, then prosecution by one sovereign for a relatively minor offense might bar prosecution by another sovereign for a much graver offense, effectively depriving the latter of the right to enforce its laws, and defendants would always race to stand trial in the court where the charges were less severe in order to bar the second action. Chuuk v. Kasmiro, 16 FSM R. 404, 406 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court is perfectly competent to adjudicate a civil rights claim against the state made under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) (violation of national constitutional rights) and also claims made under Chuuk's own constitutional provision barring deprivation of property. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 564 (Chk. 2009).

No national statute regulates a state's duties and functions, except to the extent that a national statute may limit the state's lawmaking ability in specific areas through the supremacy clause. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 659 (App. 2009).

The Constitution grants the national government, not the state governments, the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce and taxation is regulation just as prohibition is. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2010).

A service tax on plane passengers does not have only an incidental effect on foreign commerce; its only effect is on foreign commerce. A tax on shipping cargo or freight affects only foreign commerce or interstate commerce since the airline does not fly to anywhere in Chuuk except Weno. Since state and local governments are prohibited from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce, to the extent that the tax is imposed on freight or cargo shipped from Chuuk to other FSM states, would appear to be specifically barred by the Constitution and to the extent it is imposed on cargo or freight shipped elsewhere, it would be regulation of foreign commerce – in effect, an export tax. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2010).

While the interplay between national and state power does mean that, in land cases, the court must apply state law, or certify unsettled questions to the state courts, when the national court has maintained jurisdiction, national rules of procedure prevail. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 325 (Kos. 2011).

The Constitution's investment in the national government of the power to regulate immigration, emigration, naturalization, and citizenship does not deprive the states of the ability to regulate employment within their own jurisdictions whenever such employment involves non-residents. To the degree that a state law regulating employment of non-resident workers does not directly conflict with national law, such state law is not preempted; and when there is possible conflict, the state law should be construed so as to avoid such conflict. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 333, 337-38 (Pon. 2011).

When the FSM Supreme Court decides a matter of state law its goal is to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. If there is a decision of the highest state court it is controlling. If there is no controlling state law, then the court would decide the case according to how it thinks the highest state court would. Should the state's highest court later decide the issue differently, then that case will prospectively serve as controlling precedent for the national court on that state law issue. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 446 (App. 2011).

The unconditional 50% transfer of national taxes to the state treasuries is part of the constitutional framework that, through mandatory revenue sharing, allows the states a high degree of fiscal autonomy while at the same time avoiding undesirable vertical multiple taxation. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 530 n.3 (Chk. 2011).

Under the FSM Constitution's Supremacy Clause, a national statute must control over a conflicting state statute. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 619 (Chk. 2011).

Under the FSM Constitution, the power to establish systems of social security and public welfare may be exercised concurrently by Congress and the states. The State of Chuuk therefore has the constitutional authority to establish a system of health insurance since it is a system created to promote and advance the public welfare of Chuuk. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 496 (Chk. 2013).

Payment of Chuuk state employees' contributions and of the employer's contribution out of the Chuuk state funds held in the FSM Treasury is not be a tax or a levy on the national government or an illegal expenditure of FSM funds since the payment would be from Chuuk state funds and, because the obligation to withhold the Plan insurance premium contributions arises by operation of law, the Plan insurance premium contributions would be properly obligated and should be paid. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 496-97 (Chk. 2013).

The Constitution does not mandate such a sweeping expansion of the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction over probate cases as would result if creditors were considered parties for jurisdictional purposes. The better view is that only the heirs, potential heirs, or devisees in a probate case be considered parties for jurisdictional purposes and that, in the usual case, the decedent's creditors would file their claims in a state court probate proceeding. This view comports with the proper respect due to the state courts as courts of general jurisdiction that should normally resolve probate and inheritance issues. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 62 (Kos. 2013).

Only the national government can impose taxes on imports and no state may impose taxes that restrict interstate commerce. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 153 (Chk. 2013).

While a state may be designated as the administrator and allottee of Compact sector funds that are used to pay state employees, those funds are appropriated by the FSM Congress and remain subject to the provisions of the FSM Financial Management Act and the Compact of Free Association financial controls. The FSM Secretary of Finance has full and complete oversight over, and at all times full and complete access to all financial records for, all Compact funds of the state and national governments of the FSM. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460 (Chk. 2014).

Taxing income and taxing imports are both powers reserved exclusively to the national government, and therefore forbidden to municipal governments. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57 (Pon. 2015).

A state law vesting exclusive jurisdiction in a state court cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of jurisdiction over a matter it would otherwise have jurisdiction, as mandated by the FSM Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2016).

The regulation of banking and of commercial paper are powers expressly delegated to the national government. "Commercial paper" is any instrument, other than cash, for the payment of money and is generally viewed as synonymous with negotiable paper or bills. Promissory notes are commercial paper. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 170 n.4 (Pon. 2017).

A national power is one which is expressly delegated to the national government, or a power of such an indisputably national character as to be beyond the power of the state to control. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 466 (Pon. 2018).

The Constitution expressly grants the FSM national government the power to tax income, and the further provides that not less than 50% of the tax revenues be paid into the treasury of the state where collected. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 90 (Chk. 2018).

The Constitution's framers intended that at least half of all income taxes and import taxes received by the national government would be paid to the states. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 90-91 (Chk. 2018).

The Constitution's framers contemplated and created a system wherein (at least) half of the income tax money received by the national government would go into one or another state treasury. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 91 (Chk. 2018).

The state share of a major corporation's income tax should be paid into state treasury of the state of incorporation and this share is determined after the Micronesia Registrar Advisor has first taken its percentage of the corporate income taxes paid by the major corporations it induced to incorporate in the FSM – the state's 50% share should be calculated from the net amount "collected" by the national government, that is, 50% of the amount of tax levied after the Registration Advisor's percentage is deducted. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 92 (Chk. 2018).

National government revenues derived from constitutional provisions other than its authority to tax income and imports, are not (with one exception) constitutionally subjected to revenue-sharing. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 93 (Chk. 2018).

A power expressly delegated to the national government, or a power of such an indisputably national character as to be beyond the power of a state to control, is a national power, and a power not expressly delegated to the national government or prohibited to the states is a state power. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 329, 331 (Pon. 2019).

The power to regulate banking is expressly delegated to Congress. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 329, 330 (Pon. 2019).

The Constitution establishes a federal system of government in which the national government reigns supreme in its very limited and narrowly defined sphere of responsibility and the state governments are supreme in their much broader sphere. The powers of the national are "express powers" and those of the states, "residual." Included within the "indisputedly national" category are numerous powers, many of which are of minor significance, but which nevertheless collectively contribute to the national government's ability to function. This includes its power to buy land. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 329 (Pon. 2019).

Determination of whether a power falls within the indisputedly national category lies initially with the national legislature and national chief executive, and if their conclusions are challenged, the final decision rests with the Supreme Court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 329 (Pon. 2019).

The enactment of FSM Code, Title 30 falls squarely within the Congress's express powers as delegated by the FSM Constitution. That 30 F.S.M.C. 137 deals with the FSM Development Bank's ability to acquire title to land places this activity squarely in the category of indisputedly national government powers. To function, the Bank must be able to deal with mortgages, as well as deeds and land titles, as land is the primary collateral possessed by most Micronesians. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 330 (Pon. 2019).

Powers that are indisputedly national include the national government's power to buy land, and, as an instrumentality of the national government, the FSM Development Bank has the authority to act in that capacity according to laws enacted by the Congress under its express and implied powers under the Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 330 (Pon. 2019).

Since the FSM Congress specified in 30 F.S.M.C. 137 that the FSM Development Bank must have and retain the legal capacity to acquire, own title to, dispose of, and otherwise deal in land and waters in the FSM, restrictions imposed by Pohnpei must fail as applied to the Bank's ability to acquire title to Pohnpei land. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 330 (Pon. 2019).

If the FSM Development Bank's right to acquire, own title to, dispose of, and otherwise deal in FSM land and waters could be impaired in different ways by each of the four states, based on the states' Constitutions or statutes, it would eviscerate the national government's power to regulate the Bank under the express powers granted to it under the FSM Constitution. If each state could deny the Bank the right to acquire land, its essential functions would be impaired, and it would be unable to achieve the stated purpose of operating as an independent financial institution within the framework of the national government's general economic plans, policies, and priorities. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 330-31 (Pon. 2019).

The states generally have power over land law and other local issues including personal property law, inheritance law, and domestic law including marriage, divorce, and adoption. However, where the national government concurrently has the power to acquire title to land within the FSM under powers expressly delegated to it, and state law purports to restrict it, the state law must fail as applied to the national government. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 331-32 (Pon. 2019).

Pohnpei may not, by Constitution or statute, restrict the national government in the exercise of its expressly delegated powers under the FSM Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 332 (Pon. 2019).

FOREIGN INVESTMENT LAWS

The national government has neither the constitutional authority nor the law enforcement capacity to oversee, on a worldwide basis, every noncitizen acquisition of an interest in a business operating within the FSM. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 423 (Pon. 1988).

The "applicant" referred to in the Foreign Investment Act is one interested in doing business, not just investing money, in the Federated States of Micronesia, and the considerations to be employed in determining whether to grant an application relate to business operations within the FSM, not to investment of funds. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 425 (Pon. 1988).

The Foreign Investment Act regulates the operation of noncitizen business within the Federated States of Micronesia, not individual investors. 32 F.S.M.C. §§ 203(2) and 204 have no application to acquisitions of interests in a business operating in the Federated States of Micronesia with a national foreign investment permit. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 426 (Pon. 1988).

Since Congress used the Trust Territory Investment Act as the overall model in drafting the FSM Foreign Investment Act and adopted language similar to that employed in the Trust Territory statute for describing the activities to be covered in the FSM law, analysis of the new Act must begin with a presumption that Congress intended that the FSM Foreign Investment Act would regulate essentially the same activities as those covered by the Trust Territory Investment Act. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 26 (App. 1989).

Based on the language and legislative history of the FSM Foreign Investment Act, 32 F.S.M.C. 201-232, and on that law's similarity to its Trust Territory predecessor, there is no indication that Congress intended the Foreign Investment Act to apply to the provision of legal services. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 28-29 (App. 1989).

Since Congress did not give any consideration to, or make any mention of, the services enumerated in article XIII, section 1 of the FSM Constitution in enacting the Foreign Investment Act, 32 F.S.M.C. 201-232, the avoidance of potential conflict with the Constitution calls for the conclusion that Congress did not intend the Foreign Investment Act to apply to noncitizen attorneys or to any other persons who provide services of the kind described in article XIII, section 1 of the Constitution. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 30 (App. 1989).

A foreign investment permit applicant aggrieved by a final permit decision may appeal the decision to the FSM Supreme Court. 32 F.S.M.C. 215. Michelsen v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 249, 252-53 (App. 1991).

By statute the practice of law is specifically included in businesses engaged in by noncitizens requiring a foreign investment permit. 32 F.S.M.C. 203. Michelsen v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 249, 254 (App. 1991).

The Foreign Investment Act does not explicitly limit judicial review therefore an aggrieved person affected by an agency decision may seek review under the Administrative Procedures Act. Michelsen v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 249, 254 (App. 1991).

When considering a foreign investment permit application, the Secretary of Resources and Development must consider "the extent to which the activity will contribute to the constitutional policy of making education, health care, and legal services available to the people of the Federated States of Micronesia." 32 F.S.M.C. 210(8). Michelsen v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 249, 254 (App. 1991).

The scheme of national, constitutionally-authorized foreign investment legislation is so pervasive there is no room for the state to supplement it. Non-FSM citizen attorneys and their private practice of law are expressly subjected to the national legislative scheme. Insofar as attorneys who are engaged in the private practice of law and whose business activities are within the scope of the national FIA, the state FIA is invalid. Berman v. Pohnpei, 5 FSM R. 303, 306 (Pon. 1992).

An isolated, interest-free, unsecured loan is not engaging in business within the meaning of the Pohnpei State Foreign Investment law. Kihara v. Nanpei, 5 FSM R. 342, 345 (Pon. 1992).

By statute, the national government guarantees that there will be no compulsory acquisition or expropriation of any foreign investment property for which a Foreign Investment Certificate has been issued and that the national government will not take action, or permit any state or other entity within the FSM to take action that although not formally designated or acknowledged as compulsory acquisition or expropriation, indirectly has the same injurious effect ("creeping expropriation") and that if such action nevertheless takes place, the national government is responsible for the prompt and adequate compensation of any injured noncitizen. This statute creates a cause of action by the aggrieved alien against the FSM for compensation for a state's conduct in violation of § 216(1) and (4). AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 120 (Pon. 2003).

While injunctive relief would be available to prospectively enforce 32 F.S.M.C. 219, noticeably absent from this section is any language which creates a cause of action for damages on the aggrieved party's part. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 122 (Pon. 2003).

An isolated interest-free, unsecured loan transaction plainly is not engaging in business within the meaning of the applicable Pohnpei law and regulations. Similarly, execution of an isolated promissory note and security agreement, to establish payment on an open account, is not engaging in business within the meaning of the Pohnpei foreign investment laws. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

A foreign owned entity's isolated attempt to secure payment of a debt should not require that the foreign entity obtain a foreign investment permit. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 147 (Pon. 2003).

The national government guarantees that there will be no compulsory acquisition or expropriation of the property of any foreign investment as to which a Foreign Investment Certificate has been issued. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 166 (Pon. 2003).

When a party has not alleged that the state has dispossessed it of any property, and that property is now in the possession of the state or its designee, the party has not stated a cause of action for expropriation under the FSM foreign investment statutes. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167 (Pon. 2003).

While § 219 of the Foreign Investment Laws admits of a cause of action for prospective, injunctive relief against the FSM, it does not permit an action for damages. Chapter 3 provides a remedy for damages, but notwithstanding the fact that the remedy is against Pohnpei, and not the FSM, it is nevertheless a remedy. If the plaintiff prevails, the conduct alleged will not go unsanctioned. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167 (Pon. 2003).

There is no meaningful distinction between the terms "compulsory acquisition" and "expropriation." AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167 (Pon. 2003).

The unilateral cancellation of a foreign investment permit in derogation of the procedures provided for under Kos. S.C. § 15.308(10) is arbitrary and grossly incorrect, and as such constitutes a violation of the national civil rights statute. Wortel v. Bickett, 12 FSM R. 223, 226 (Kos. 2003).

The Kosrae State Code provides that a state foreign investment permit may be temporarily suspended only if the permit holder a) begins operation in a different economic sector from the one(s) for which the permit was issued, or b) alters, changes, modifies or transfers the amount of the ownership interest which the non-citizen retains. Wortel v. Bickett, 12 FSM R. 223, 226 (Kos. 2003).

When a canceled foreign investment permit was ultimately reinstated, it renders moot the cancellation itself and leaves no administrative remedy for the permit holder to pursue. What then remains as a live court issue is the arbitrary and grossly incorrect manner in which the permit was originally canceled. This conduct constitutes a violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701 et seq., and entitles the plaintiff to a summary judgment. Wortel v. Bickett, 12 FSM R. 223, 226 (Kos. 2003).

A noncitizen cannot engage in business in the FSM unless that noncitizen holds a valid foreign investment permit. A "noncitizen" is any business entity in which any ownership interest is held by a person who is not a citizen of the FSM. Geoffrey Hughes (Export) Pty, Ltd. v. America Ducksan Co., 12 FSM R.

413, 414-15 (Chk. 2004).

By statute, the national government guarantees that there will be no compulsory acquisition or expropriation of the property of any foreign investment as to which a foreign investment certificate has been issued. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 23 (App. 2006).

By statute, the national government will not take action, or permit action, or permit action to be taken by any state or other entity within the FSM, that although not formally designated or acknowledged as compulsory acquisition or expropriation, indirectly has the same injurious effect ("creeping expropriation"), and that if such action takes place, the national government will be responsible for the prompt and adequate compensation of any injured noncitizen. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 23 (App. 2006).

By statute, the national government will not take action, or permit any state to take action, that would result in a foreign investor being given treatment that is less favorable than the treatment given to citizens, or business entities wholly owned by citizens, engaging in business in the FSM. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 23 (App. 2006).

A state would have to actually acquire the property in some fashion for there to be an expropriation, and 32 F.S.M.C. 219 only authorizes injunctive relief and does not create a cause of action for damages. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 24 (App. 2006).

The Foreign Investment Act of 1997 establishes a system of Categories of economic sectors for the purposes of implementing the FSM policy to welcome foreign investment in all sectors of the FSM economy. Three of these categories are made up of economic sectors that are of special national significance and therefore fall within the national government's jurisdiction in respect of foreign investment regulation. The first is the National Red List. No foreign investment is permitted in the activities specified on this list, which includes the minting of money and arms manufacture. The second is the National Amber List. Banking (other than as defined in Title 29 of the FSM Code) and insurance are included on this list. Certain criteria specified in the FSM Foreign Investment Regulations must be met before investment is permitted in these areas. A third category of activities that fall within the jurisdiction of the national government appear on the National Green List. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 333-34 (Pon. 2007).

Foreign investment Category C (National Green List) comprises the set of economic sectors that are subject to national government regulation but as to which no special criteria need to be met before a foreign investment permit is to be issued. It includes banking, as defined in title 29 of the FSM Code; telecommunications; fishing in the FSM's Exclusive Economic Zone; international and interstate air transport; international shipping; and such other economic sectors as the Secretary may, after consultation with States, designate in the FSM Foreign Investment Regulations as being on the National Green List. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2007).

In contrast to the three areas subject to national regulation, economic sectors that are not of special national significance are delegated to the jurisdiction of the state governments in respect of foreign investment regulation, which are to be established separately by each state, except that an economic sector included in any of the categories for national regulation cannot appear in any of the categories for state regulation. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2007).

Fishing and international air transport are areas of foreign investment regulation that are subject to exclusive regulation by the national government. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 334 (Pon. 2007).

The Marine Resources Act of 2002 amended the prior fisheries law for the purpose of ensuring the sustainable development, conservation and use of the marine resources in the exclusive economic zone by promoting development of, and investment in, fishing and related activities. Included in the definition of "fishing" under the Act is the actual or attempted searching for fish; the placing of any fish aggregating device or associated electronic equipment such as radio beacons; and the use of an aircraft in relation to any activity described in this subsection. "Fishing gear" is equipment or other thing that can be used in the act of fishing, including any aircraft or helicopter. Helicopters, which are used to search for fish and to place radio devices near schools of fish to assist fishing boats in locating fish, fall within the express definition of fishing equipment. Therefore, since fishing in the FSM's EEZ is subject to the exclusive national government jurisdiction and regulation, and since a company's helicopters, based on fishing vessels and piloted by the company's employees, are used to search for fish within the FSM's EEZ, those helicopters are engaged in fishing for purposes of the statutory definition and thus the helicopters, which the company charters to the purse seine operators, and their pilots are subject to the national government's exclusive regulation. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 334-35 (Pon. 2007).

Since helicopter pilots engaged in fishing are thus subject to the national government's exclusive jurisdiction for foreign investment purposes, it follows that the company which is the pilots' principal, is bound by that conduct. Thus, that company's fishing activities in the FSM's EEZ are also subject to the FSM's exclusive regulation. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 335 (Pon. 2007).

Since engaging in business is defined as carrying out any activity relating to the conduct of a business and expressly includes leasing property of any kind for commercial purposes, when a foreign investment permittee engaged in the business of providing operational and maintenance support to helicopters servicing fishing vessels in the FSM, its leasing helicopters is one aspect of its business that relates to its fishing activity and is therefore that leasing activity is subject to the FSM's exclusive jurisdiction and regulation for foreign investment purposes. Thus Pohnpei may not require it to apply for a foreign investment permit. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 335 (Pon. 2007).

Since, by statute, an economic sector included in any of the Categories for National Regulation must not appear in any of the Categories for State Regulation, the statutory provision contemplates that state and national regulation will be mutually exclusive, and works hand in glove with the stated purpose of the Foreign Investment Act, which is to encourage foreign investment. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 335-36 (Pon. 2007).

When a company has obtained a national foreign investment permit in an area in which the FSM's jurisdiction is exclusive and the company has complied with national laws and regulations in this regard, Pohnpei may not require it to obtain a state foreign investment permit in addition to the FSM permit that it already has. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 336 (Pon. 2007).

When the court has granted summary judgment on the basis that the plaintiff's helicopters are engaged in fishing, the court need not address the plaintiff's further contention that it is also subject to exclusive national regulation by virtue of the fact that its helicopters are engaged in interstate and international air transport and international shipping. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 336 (Pon. 2007).

Public hearings are a standard part of the foreign investment permit application process. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 45 (Pon. 2011).

A foreign investment permit holder is required to, by the terms of his foreign investment permit, to abide by all laws and regulations applicable to the business(es) that his foreign investment permit allows him to engage in. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165 (App. 2015).

A Kosrae Island Resource Management Authority sea cucumber permit is the only sea cucumber permit needed so as not to violate either Kosrae State Code § 13.523(5) or § 13.523(6). A foreign citizen also needs a foreign investment permit to engage in a sea cucumber (or any other) business, and the lack of a foreign investment permit or the violation of one or more of its conditions would be charged under the foreign investment statutes, not under § 13.523(5) or § 13.523(6). Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 229, 231

(App. 2015).

Under the foreign investment laws requiring noncitizens "engaging in business" to hold a valid foreign investment permit, "engaging in business" includes providing professional services as an attorney for a fee. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 346, 349 (Pon. 2016).

Someone providing professional services for a fee, such as an attorney, is not considered to be "engaging in business" unless he or she, while present in the FSM, performs his or her respective professional services for more than 14 days in any calendar year. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 346, 349 (Pon. 2016).

A noncitizen attorney, licensed to practice in the FSM since 1985 and a member of the Bar in good standing but currently resident and practicing on Guam, is excepted from the foreign investment permit requirement when he works in tandem with an FSM citizen licensed to practice in the FSM and when his involvement in the case has been from a remote location and, as a result, he has not been present in the FSM rendering professional services for more than 14 days in any calendar year. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 346, 349 (Pon. 2016).

Under 55 F.S.M.C. 419(1) and (2), no foreign investment permit is required of a noncitizen attorney when his representation directly involves "contract management activities" that relate to a public contract awarded for a civil works project to implement part of the Infrastructure Development Plan and that is supported by funds through the Amended Compact of Free Association Section 211. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 346, 349-50 (Pon. 2016).

An attorney cannot be said to come within the ambit of the 32 F.S.M.C. 204, which otherwise would require a foreign investment permit, when his legal representation, to date, has been conducted in absentia, and thus cannot be said to have rendered his professional services "while present in the FSM for more than 14 days in any calendar year" and when the present action involves an Infrastructure Development Plan project and the construction by his client was undertaken pursuant to a contract underwritten with Compact monies. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 346, 350 (Pon. 2016).

A corporation's legal inability to engage in business on Pohnpei is not a legal impediment to its ability to own personal property on Pohnpei, although its inability to legally conduct business on Pohnpei could be a persuasive indication that any equipment used to conduct a Pohnpei business was, in fact, not owned by it, but owned by another. Pohnpei Arts & Crafts, Inc. v. Narruhn, 21 FSM R. 366, 368 (Pon. 2017).

The FSM is not required to permit a person's entry into or continued presence in the FSM just because a state government has granted that person a foreign investment permit. Only the national government (Congress) may regulate immigration even though the state governments retain some authority to regulate the business or employment of non-FSM citizens within their state, but, when deciding whether to permit or deny someone's entry or continued presence in the FSM, the FSM must take into consideration that that person has a state-issued foreign investment permit. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 552 (Chk. 2020).

GAMBLING

Poker machines are not included within the term "slot machines" under Truk State law and a search warrant authorizing the seizure of slot machines does not permit the seizure of poker machines. In re Slot Machines, 3 FSM R. 498, 500 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Courts should not broaden statutes beyond the meaning of the law as written, even if it means that gambling devices just as harmful socially as slot machines, such as poker machines, will be excluded from statutory prohibition of slot machines. In re Slot Machines, 3 FSM R. 498, 500-01 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Poker machines involve the use of some skill, and are not based simply upon mere chance, therefore are not "slot machines," and are not subject to current Truk State legislative prohibition, specifically Truk District Law No. 25-3. In re Slot Machines, 3 FSM R. 498, 502 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

While under the Chuuk Constitution the "powers and functions of a municipality with respect to its local affairs and government are superior to statutory law," the key phrase in this constitutional provision is "local affairs." Gambling is of statewide concern and an area properly within the state legislative function and does not fall under the cloak of "local affairs." Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 546 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When an act lists 23 different and distinct prohibited gaming devices, including "slot machines," but makes no mention of "poker machines" whatsoever, by its failing to list "poker machines" in an extended list of prohibited items, the legislature excluded such machines from the application of the law, and the court will not include the machines into the proscription of the statute something which the Legislature intended to exclude. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 547 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Although there is an element of chance involved in the operation of both slot and poker machines, the fundamental difference between a slot machine and a poker machine is that a poker machine, as opposed to a slot machine, allows the user to exercise his skill to affect the odds and thereby the manner and result of its operation. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 547 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

HABEAS CORPUS

Article XI, section 6(b) of the Federated States of Micronesia Constitution requires that the FSM Supreme Court consider a petition for writ of habeas corpus alleging imprisonment of a petitioner in violation of his rights of due process. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 243-44 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction to consider writs of habeas corpus is undiminished by the fact that the courts whose actions are under consideration, the Trust Territory High Court and a Community Court, were not contemplated by the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 244, 246 (Pon. 1983).

In a habeas corpus proceeding, the court must apply due process standards to the actions of the courts which have issued orders of commitment. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 249 (Pon. 1983).

Judicial review of a certification of extraditability, although not appealable, is available to an accused in custody by seeking a writ of habeas corpus. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 23, 25 (App. 1993).

4 F.S.M.C. 117 gives both the trial division and the appellate division the powers to issue all writs not inconsistent with law or with the rules of civil procedure. FSM Appellate Rule 22(a) requires petitions for writs of habeas corpus be first brought in the trial division. When the circumstances have been shown to warrant, the appellate division clearly has the authority to suspend the rule. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 31, 32 (App. 1993).

Judicial review of an extradition hearing is by petition for a writ of habeas corpus. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 97 (App. 1993).

The scope of a habeas corpus review of an extradition proceeding is 1) whether the judge had jurisdiction, 2) whether the court had jurisdiction over the extraditee, 3) whether there is an extradition agreement in force, 4) whether the crimes charged fall within the terms of the agreement, and 5) whether there was sufficient evidence to support a finding of extraditability. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 104 (App. 1993).

Because a habeas corpus petition is a civil action (although the proceeding is unique), the clerk will assign the petition a civil action number and enter it on the civil side of the docket. Sangechik v. Cheipot, 10 FSM R. 105, 106 (Chk. 2001).

When the pleadings clearly name a person as the de facto keeper of the detention facility where the petitioner is currently incarcerated and the petitioner seeks a writ of habeas corpus directed to that person in that capacity, that person is properly named as the respondent to the petition. Sangechik v. Cheipot, 10 FSM R. 105, 106 (Chk. 2001).

Habeas corpus proceedings are commenced with an order, directed to the person having custody of the person detained, to show cause why the writ should not be issued. Sangechik v. Cheipot, 10 FSM R. 105, 106 (Chk. 2001).

In order to ensure a citizen's right to life and liberty, Chuuk Constitution Article III, § 7 provides that the writ of habeas corpus shall exist in Chuuk and that it may not be suspended, except by the Governor and only when the public safety requires it in case of war, rebellion, insurrection or invasion. Consideration of the writ must take precedence over all other business of the court, and, if the court determines there is a proper basis, the writ shall issue without delay. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Only under certain limited and severely proscribed circumstances may the Governor suspend the writ of habeas corpus, thereby affecting the rights of detainees to petition the court for their release from unlawful detention. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Governor may declare a state of emergency and issue appropriate decrees if required to preserve public peace, health or safety at a time of extreme emergency caused by civil disturbance, natural disaster, or immediate threat of war or insurrection. A declaration of emergency may impair civil rights to the extent actually required for the preservation of peace, health or safety. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Article XI, § 12(b) of the Chuuk Constitution clearly provides that citizens' civil rights may be impaired by a declaration of emergency, but that impairment rights may only occur to the extent actually required for the preservation of peace, health or safety, so that when the Governor's declaration of emergency made no reference to the suspension of civil rights, or of the need to do so to preserve peace, health or safety, it was solely addressed to the creation and implementation of emergency response and recovery efforts to Tropical Storm Chata'an. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The writ of habeas corpus, like the civil rights of citizens, may under certain circumstances be suspended by the Governor, but suspension of the writ of habeas corpus may only occur when "the public safety requires it in case of war, rebellion, insurrection or invasion. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In circumstances short of war, rebellion, insurrection or invasion where suspension of the Chuuk citizens' civil rights is warranted require the Governor's clear and unambiguous statement in the declaration of emergency itself, and even if such a clear and unambiguous statement were made, a citizen's continued right to petition for a writ of habeas corpus, except in cases of war, rebellion, insurrection or invasion, would provide a remedy to any improper suspension of civil rights by the declaration of emergency. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A writ of habeas corpus will issue when the Governor's declaration of emergency did not suspend civil rights to due process of law, and when the petitioner's detention without charge and without initial appearance was unlawful and in violation of his right of due process. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Kosrae State Code, Title 6, Chapter 34, states the prompt timeframe in which habeas corpus petitions must be considered. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 297-98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Kosrae State Court has jurisdiction to hear a petition for a writ of habeas corpus while the prisoner's appeal is pending. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The requirements for issuance of a writ of habeas corpus under Kosrae State Code § 6.3401, have not been satisfied when there has been no evidence presented to the court that the prisoner is being unlawfully imprisoned at the Kosrae state jail. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A writ of habeas corpus may be issued upon a finding that there is an unlawful restraint of the prisoner's liberty. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Under 4 F.S.M.C. 117, the FSM Supreme Court has the power to issue all writs and other process as may be necessary for the due administration of justice and, under 6 F.S.M.C. 1503, the court may grant a writ of habeas corpus to inquire into the cause of imprisonment or restraint of a person, who has applied or who has had an application made on his behalf, and who is unlawfully imprisoned or restrained of his liberty under any pretense whatsoever. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403 (Chk. 2009).

An applicant for a writ of habeas corpus should name as the respondent the person who has custody over him. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403 (Chk. 2009).

Since habeas corpus proceedings are commenced with an order, directed to the person having custody of the person detained, to show cause why the writ should not be issued, an application is deficient when it does not name a respondent. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403 (Chk. 2009).

When the issues raised in an application for a writ of habeas corpus are moot because the applicants have already been granted the relief sought – release from jail – any consideration or relief would thus be ineffectual. No justiciable case or dispute is presented when events subsequent to a case's filing make the issues presented moot. Since the FSM Supreme Court lacks jurisdiction to consider moot cases or issues, it must dismiss a moot application because, when the court lacks jurisdiction over a case, it should not remain lifelessly on the docket however harmless that may seem. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403 (Chk. 2009).

To the extent that the issues that the applicants for a writ of habeas corpus seek to raise in a moot application are significant and relevant to other issues to be raised and considered in a criminal case, they should be raised for consideration in that case in the proper manner or in a civil suit for damages. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403-04 (Chk. 2009).

A writ of habeas corpus may be used in situations involving an individual incarcerated without probable cause. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 320 (Kos. 2012).

The FSM Supreme Court has the power to issue all writs and must consider a petition for a writ of habeas corpus alleging imprisonment of the petitioner in violation of his rights under the FSM Constitution. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 321 (Kos. 2012).

In the absence of any statutory restrictions, the FSM Supreme Court will, under the proper circumstances, consider applications for a writ of habeas corpus on the grounds that a person is in custody in violation of the FSM Constitution. The overriding purpose of such a writ is to protect an individual's right to be free from wrongful intrusions and restraints upon their liberty. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 322 (Kos. 2012).

In considering a pretrial petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the FSM Supreme Court will consider that the evidence for probable cause need not be sufficient to support a conviction and that the trial court is the most appropriate place to determine whether probable cause exists. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 324 (Kos. 2012).

In order to accord respect to a Kosrae State Court criminal proceeding, the FSM Supreme Court will abstain from granting a petitioner's application for a writ habeas corpus when the petitioner is currently the subject of an ongoing criminal proceeding in the Kosrae State Court that has not reached final adjudication; when those proceedings afford the petitioner an opportunity to raise his constitutional claims; when the State has an important interest in protecting the public through criminal prosecutions; and when pre-conviction habeas corpus relief is being sought; when the state court remedies have not been fully exhausted; and when no extraordinary circumstances have been presented. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 324-25 (Kos. 2012).

6 F.S.M.C. 906 gives the court authority to stay the execution of a sentence pending appellate review, but nothing in 6 F.S.M.C. 906 specifically authorizes the court to grant a stay pending the review of a writ of habeas corpus petition, and there is no authority in Titles 4 and 6 of the 2014 FSM Code or the FSM Rules to stay execution of sentence pending a habeas corpus proceeding. FSM v. Wolphagen, 22 FSM R. 237, 238 (Pon. 2019).

Regardless of whether the issued writ of habeas corpus is a final order, the court may entertain FSM Civil Rule 59 and 60 motions while the matter is subject to an appeal and, if it determines such motion(s) shall prevail, it must so indicate in the record for the appellate court's consideration. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 386 (Pon. 2019).

The respondents' motion for reconsideration will be denied when there is no compelling new legal authority on which to vacate the court's grant of petitioners' motion for a writ of habeas corpus, and when there has been no executive or legislative action to address the issue of refugees that may arrive in the FSM, because the court retains the authority, on a case-by-case basis, to address alleged FSM Constitutional violations with respect to the government's treatment of refugees. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 388 (Pon. 2019).

IMMIGRATION

An alien must willfully fail to depart the Federated States of Micronesia upon expiration of entry authorization to be guilty of a violation of 50 F.S.M.C. 112. Knowledge of the requirement to depart coupled with failure to depart is not enough. There must be an element of voluntariness or purposefulness in the noncitizen's conduct, which will generally require showing a reasonable opportunity to depart, voluntarily rejected, without some justification for the rejection beyond mere personal preferences. FSM v. Jorg, 1 FSM R. 378, 384 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Supreme Court and the Federated States of Micronesia must not be lured into the role of mediator between visitors and their nations of citizenship. Only in the rarest of circumstances, if ever, would the court second-guess and scrutinize the conditions which other nations place upon offers of funds to their own citizens to assist those persons to comply with FSM immigration laws. FSM v. Jorg, 1 FSM R. 378, 385-86 (Pon. 1983).

A rule that treats aliens unequally to citizens involves immigration and foreign affairs. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 366 (Pon. 1992).

Congress and the President respectively have the power to regulate immigration and conduct foreign affairs while the Chief Justice may make rules governing the admission of attorneys. Therefore a rule of admission that treats aliens unequally promulgated by the Chief Justice implicates powers expressly delegated to other branches. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 366 (Pon. 1992).

All aircraft entering FSM ports of entry are subject to immigration inspection, customs inspections, agricultural inspections and quarantines, and other administrative inspections authorized by law. In Chuuk, the Chuuk International Airport is the only port of entry for aircraft. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 (Chk. 1999).

The government may be directed to allow a plaintiff to enter the FSM as required for the limited purpose of prosecuting her lawsuit through trial. O'Sullivan v. Panuelo, 9 FSM R. 229, 232 (Pon. 1999).

If the court were to take the plaintiff at his word that November 26, 2010 is the date of the demand for an immigration hearing, that 17 F.S.M.C. 109(4) obliges the court to view December 26, 2010 as the effective date of rejection, and that 51 F.S.M.C. 165 is now applicable, the court must deny his administrative appeal of the rejection because he filed his motion 15 days after December 26, 2010 and, under 51 F.S.M.C. 165(1), he had to make the appeal within 10 days following the date of the effective rejection. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 333, 337 (Pon. 2011).

The Constitution's investment in the national government of the power to regulate immigration, emigration, naturalization, and citizenship does not deprive the states of the ability to regulate employment within their own jurisdictions whenever such employment involves non-residents. To the degree that a state law regulating employment of non-resident workers does not directly conflict with national law, such state law is not preempted; and when there is possible conflict, the state law should be construed so as to avoid such conflict. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 333, 337-38 (Pon. 2011).

No national statute directly addresses overtime pay for private sector employment although 51 F.S.M.C. 139(2) does require an employer of a nonresident worker to present a copy of the worker's contract, which must contain certain information including a wage scale for regular and overtime work, before approval of the nonresident worker's entry to the FSM. Villarena v. Abello-Alfonso, 18 FSM R. 100, 102 & n.1 (Pon. 2011).

U.S. citizens, like all other non-citizens, must hold a valid passport at the time of entry into the FSM. A valid passport means a passport that is valid for a period of not less than 120 beyond the date of entry. Harden v. Continental Air Lines, Inc., 18 FSM R. 141, 145 (Pon. 2012).

Absent any express regulatory or statutorily established exceptions, the FSM Immigration Regulations and Title 50, F.S.M.C., as amended, control the FSM entry requirements for all non-citizens, including U.S. citizens, regardless of whether they are habitual residents and/or spouses of FSM citizens. Harden v. Continental Air Lines, Inc., 18 FSM R. 141, 145 (Pon. 2012).

No express statutory language declares that habitual residents, as provided under 50 F.S.M.C. 104(2), have an exemption from complying with Part 2.2 of the FSM Immigration Regulations since Part 2.2 does not contradict 50 F.S.M.C. 104(2). The statutory and regulatory provisions' plain meaning is that for a habitual resident there is no exception to Part 2.2's application. Harden v. Continental Air Lines, Inc., 18 FSM R. 141, 146 (Pon. 2012).

The grant of an entry permit to any non-citizen spouse is specifically authorized on a showing of being an FSM citizen's lawful spouse. A non-citizen spouse can invoke this specific statutory grant when applying to the government for an entry permit, but an FSM citizen's U.S. citizen lawful spouse is not exempted from the passport validity requirements under Part 2.2 of the Regulations. Harden v. Continental Air Lines, Inc., 18 FSM R. 141, 146 (Pon. 2012).

The statutory and regulatory provisions dealing with entry permits, habitual residents, and spouses of FSM citizens, are independent of Part 2.2 of the FSM Immigration Regulations and do not provide an exception to the regulations' passport validity requirements. Harden v. Continental Air Lines, Inc., 18 FSM R. 141, 147 (Pon. 2012).

Unless statutory or regulatory amendments mandate otherwise, "non-citizens" include U.S. citizens and do not except habitual residents or U.S. citizen spouses of FSM citizens. Since there are no exceptions to the 120-day passport validity requirement under the regulations and Title 50 of the F.S.M.C., as amended, no non-citizen, including U.S. citizens who are habitual residents or spouses of FSM citizens are exempt from the operational reach of Part 2.2 of the FSM Immigration Regulations. Harden v. Continental Air Lines, Inc., 18 FSM R. 141, 147 (Pon. 2012).

Sea vessels and aircraft arriving in the FSM must compensate the FSM Treasury for the actual costs of overtime that immigration officials accrue clearing sea vessels and aircraft into the FSM. These costs must be 1) associated with the arrival of sea vessels and aircraft into the FSM; 2) actual; 3) originate in the official duties of immigration officers carrying out Title 50's requirements; and 4) accrue outside immigration officers' normal working hours. "Actual hours worked" will always correlate with hours that have already been worked or performed and the FSM Treasurer will not be compensated for subjective or imputed work. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

Reading 52 F.S.M.C. 164(3) and 50 F.S.M.C. 115, jointly in order to ensure that the FSM Treasurer is compensated for all actual overtime expenses, the cost of overtime compensation allotted to employees under § 164(3) must equal the compensation the treasury receives under the second part of § 115, and as the treasury is compensated only for actual hours worked, it is clear that the treasury may remunerate employees only for actual hours worked. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

Passage by Vietnamese through the FSM territorial waters was not innocent and therefore unlawful when it was for the purpose of illegal sea cucumber harvesting, and thus it provides a sufficient factual basis for a guilty plea to entry without a permit. FSM v. Bui Van Cua, 20 FSM R. 588, 590-91 (Pon. 2016).

Congress has the sole authority to regulate immigration, and it exercised this power by enacting Title 50, chapter 1 of the FSM Code. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 551 (Chk. 2020).

The Immigration Act authorizes the President to issue immigration regulations that are consistent with the immigration statute. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 551 (Chk. 2020).

The court only becomes involved with an immigration matter when it has to determine if a challenged executive action or omission is consistent with immigration law, procedure, and the Constitution. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 551 (Chk. 2020).

A person aggrieved by a decision of the Division of Immigration and Labor is entitled, first to an informal hearing before the officer in charge of the local immigration office, and then, if still aggrieved by that officer's decision, to appeal to a hearing before a committee consisting of the Chief of Immigration, or, in the event of a conflict of interest on the Chief's part, his designee, the Secretary of the Department of Justice or his designee, and a representative of the Department of Foreign Affairs. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 551 (Chk. 2020).

An immigration appeal committee's decision constitutes the final agency action for the purposes of title 17 of the FSM Code, and under Title 17, a person adversely affected or aggrieved by agency action is entitled to judicial review thereof in the FSM Supreme Court, except to the extent that statutes explicitly limit judicial review, but no statute explicitly limits judicial review of a 50 F.S.M.C. 116(2) final action. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 551 (Chk. 2020).

Once a final immigration agency action is properly before the court, the court can conduct a de novo trial of the matter and receive in evidence any or all of the record from the administrative hearing that is stipulated to by the parties, and to the extent necessary for the decision and when presented, the court can decide all relevant questions of law and fact, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 551 (Chk. 2020).

Under Rule 56, unless a court, viewing the facts and inferences in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, finds that there is no genuine issue of material fact and that the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, the court must deny a motion for summary judgment. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 551-52 (Chk. 2020).

The FSM is not required to permit a person's entry into or continued presence in the FSM just because a state government has granted that person a foreign investment permit. Only the national government (Congress) may regulate immigration even though the state governments retain some authority to regulate the business or employment of non-FSM citizens within their state, but, when deciding whether to permit or deny someone's entry or continued presence in the FSM, the FSM must take into consideration that that person has a state-issued foreign investment permit. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 552 (Chk. 2020).

An immigration appeal committee's decision cannot merely list the mitigating factors that were put before it, but must give some explanation of how those factors affected, or did not affect, its decision or how its reason outweighed or overcame all of the mitigating factors. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 552-53 (Chk. 2020).

The statute that authorizes the President to delegate his authority to issue entry permits and to permit entry into the FSM of persons, vessels, and aircraft under the provisions of this chapter and regulations promulgated thereto also authorizes the President to delegate his authority to deny issuance of an entry permit and his authority to deny entry of persons, vessels, and aircraft into the FSM because if an official has the delegated authority to issue an entry permit, then that official must also have the authority not to issue the entry permit – that is, to deny an entry permit application or renewal. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 553 (Chk. 2020).

Although the immigration regulations do not delegate the power to enforce the Immigration Act any further than the Secretary of Justice and the Chief of the Division of Immigration and Labor, the Chief obviously must act through subordinates who staff the ports of entry and the immigration offices in each of the four states. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 553 (Chk. 2020).

A person who is not an FSM national may be denied an entry permit based on a finding by the President that the entry of the applicant or his presence in the FSM would not be in the FSM government's best interest, and the statute does not authorize the President to delegate his statutory authority to make that finding. What constitutes the national government's best interest is a policy decision best made by a high-level official such as the President, not a lower level official. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 553-54 (Chk. 2020).

Congress can authorize the President to delegate the finding of the national government's best interest to some other (presumably high-ranking) official, but any such authorization and delegation must be more explicit than the current statutory authorization and regulatory delegation. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 554 n.8 (Chk. 2020).

When the President did not make a finding that a person's continued presence in Chuuk was not in the national government's best interest, the FSM Immigration Officer in Charge in Chuuk did not have the delegated authority to make such a finding, and therefore his denial of an entry permit renewal, and the appeal committee's affirmance of that denial, on that ground was unlawful because, under 50 F.S.M.C. 107(1)(k), a Presidential finding is necessary for the FSM to deny an entry permit on the ground it is in the national government's best interest. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 554 (Chk. 2020).

Since the court can compel agency action unlawfully withheld or unreasonably delayed, the court, in such situations, can order that a person's entry permit be renewed as of the date when his last entry permit expired. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 555 (Chk. 2020).

INSURANCE

A municipal license fee ordinance which separately defines banking and insurance businesses and specifically imposes a different rate upon those businesses than would be imposed upon other kinds of businesses on its face appears to be an effort to regulate banking and insurance and is unconstitutional and void. Actouka v. Kolonia Town, 5 FSM R. 121, 122 (Pon. 1991).

An insurance company that has no contractual obligation to persons other than its insured until a court determines the liability of its insured, cannot be joined as a party to a lawsuit to determine that liability. Wilson v. Pohnpei Family Headstart Program, Inc., 7 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 1996).

In the absence of a contractual or statutory provision authorizing a direct action against or the joinder of a liability insurer, an injured person, for lack of privity between himself and the insurer, has no right of action at law against the insurer and cannot join the insured and the liability insurer as parties defendant. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 52 (Chk. 2001).

An insurance company that has no contractual obligation to persons other than its insured until a court determines its insured's liability, cannot be joined as a party to a lawsuit to determine that liability. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 52 (Chk. 2001).

When no national or state statute or contractual provision authorizes a third party's suit against or joinder of an insurer, an injured party's causes of action against and joinder of an insurer will be dismissed. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 52-53 (Chk. 2001).

When there was no legal requirement for the lessor to offer insurance to the lessee in a car rental agreement, the lessor's failure to offer insurance to the lessee in a rental agreement does not serve as a defense to the damages assessed against the lessee for an accident. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 527 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The FSM Supreme Court does not look kindly upon contractual provisions that can only be understood by individuals who possess an advanced degree in insurance law. Clear, understandable, precise language is a condition to a finding that an insured must bear the cost of litigating in a remote forum. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 562 n.3 (Pon. 2003).

To the extent that a purported forum selection clause could be interpreted to require suit in a foreign country, it must be struck down as void as against public policy unless it is a freely negotiated, arms-length agreement between parties with relatively equal bargaining power. An insurance contract that seeks to oust the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction will not be upheld when the insured is an FSM citizen and resident, the insurance policy is obtained in the FSM from an FSM-based agent, the premiums are paid in the FSM to cover vehicles operating in the FSM, and the incident giving rise to a claim occurred in the FSM. The clause is against public policy because it impedes the administration of justice relating to insurance claims, and would undermine the public's confidence in business dealings if upheld. To require such lawsuits to be filed in a foreign country would not only be onerous, but would essentially render insurance companies immune from suit. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 562-63 (Pon. 2003).

Contracts impose on the parties thereto a duty to do everything necessary to carry them out, and there is an implied undertaking in every contract on each party's part that he will not intentionally and purposely do anything to prevent the other party from carrying out his part of the agreement, or do anything which will have the effect of destroying or injuring the right of the other party to receive the fruits of the contract, and the FSM Supreme Court will entertain such claims in the context of insurance contracts, where the insurer possesses greater sophistication, can be expected to assist local insureds in understanding the relevant legal terminology, and has a specialized role in processing claims. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 307 (Pon. 2004).

A measure of damages for the tort of negligent misrepresentation (also called deceit) employs the benefit of the bargain rule when damages can be proved with reasonable certainty. Under this principle, the insurer would be entitled to its premium, which would be set off against what it owed its insured. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 469 (Pon. 2004).

Rescission of an insurance contract would, if granted, absolve an insured from liability for the premium and could even entitle him to return of the premium paid. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470

(Pon. 2004).

Reformation of an insurance contract may be sought under a theory of mutual mistake or mistake or fraud of the insurance agent. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

Reformation is an equitable doctrine that allows a court to conform a contract (even an insurance contract) to the true agreement between the parties rather than the agreement as written. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

Courts have permitted attorney's fee awards under the vexatious conduct exception when the plaintiff has proven the defendant's breach of the implied covenant or implied duty of good faith and fair dealing (also called the bad faith tort). If a plaintiff were to prevail on a bad faith tort claim against an insurer, the insurer would be liable to him for reasonable attorney's fees that are proximately caused by the bad faith conduct. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

The Foreign Investment Act of 1997 establishes a system of Categories of economic sectors for the purposes of implementing the FSM policy to welcome foreign investment in all sectors of the FSM economy. Three of these categories are made up of economic sectors that are of special national significance and therefore fall within the national government's jurisdiction in respect of foreign investment regulation. The first is the National Red List. No foreign investment is permitted in the activities specified on this list, which includes the minting of money and arms manufacture. The second is the National Amber List. Banking (other than as defined in Title 29 of the FSM Code) and insurance are included on this list. Certain criteria specified in the FSM Foreign Investment Regulations must be met before investment is permitted in these areas. A third category of activities that fall within the jurisdiction of the national government appear on the National Green List. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 333-34 (Pon. 2007).

When there is no evidence before the court that, if it were not for the employer's maintaining life insurance for the employees, the employee would have either quit his job and taken a job with a different employer that provided life insurance benefits or that he would have purchased his own life insurance policy from another source, the employee's widow cannot recover on a promissory estoppel or detrimental reliance theory since she cannot show that the employee relied on the employer's alleged promise to provide life insurance and her mere assertion, first made in her closing argument, that had they known they might have found another policy is insufficient to prove reliance. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. 2008).

In the absence of special circumstances, such as the existence of an incontestable clause in the policy, fraud is fully available to the insurer as a defense in an action at law on the policy. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 258 (Kos. 2009).

An insurer may void an insurance contract on the grounds that the insured willfully misrepresented a material fact since the misrepresentation prevents a meeting of the minds, or mutual assent, as to the risk to be insured. A material representation or omission of fact in an insurance application, relied on by the insurer in issuing the policy, renders the coverage voidable at the insurance company's option. This protects the insurer's right to know the full extent of the risk it undertakes when an insurance policy is issued. The mutual good faith which is required in a life insurance contract will not permit a recovery where the insured intentionally withholds or conceals material changes in the condition of his health. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 259 (Kos. 2009).

An insurer seeking rescission of an insurance contract based on a misrepresentation in an insurance application must tender the premiums back to the insured. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

An insurer seeking to rescind a life insurance policy upon a ground which rendered it voidable from the beginning must return or tender the premium paid thereunder because rescission of an insurance contract would, if granted, absolve an insured from liability for the premium and entitle him to return of the premium paid since the general rule is that a contract must be rescinded in whole and cannot be rescinded in part. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

Reinstatement of an insurance policy cannot take place until after the insurer learned of the insured's misrepresentation and then waived it. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 n.3 (Kos. 2009).

The court will not hesitate to deny rescission and order enforcement of the contract when the party seeking rescission has not made a timely tender of the premiums (or benefit) it received under the contract. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 261 (Kos. 2009).

Under the FSM Constitution, the power to establish systems of social security and public welfare may be exercised concurrently by Congress and the states. The State of Chuuk therefore has the constitutional authority to establish a system of health insurance since it is a system created to promote and advance the public welfare of Chuuk. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 496 (Chk. 2013).

The FSM does not need each state employee to individually notify it that the employee is enrolled in the Chuuk Health Care Plan since the Act provides for universal coverage for Chuuk residents. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 496 (Chk. 2013).

When the insurance carrier approved the patient's off-island referral within two days and was ready to put her on the earliest possible flight but the patient did not leave until 20 days later and when this long delay was the proximate cause of the patient's death, the insurance carrier's actions were not the proximate cause of her death because the insurance carrier did not cause the delay. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

A 1991 memorandum of understanding between the insurer and the Kosrae State Hospital that required that the hospital provide all necessary health care services within Kosrae to all covered persons and that these services would include the cost of a medical or other attendant to accompany a covered person to a health care facility is an agreement that allocates the cost of attendants between the parties to the memorandum and it does not, by itself, allocate costs or create duties between the state and the insureds ("covered persons") and their families. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582 (Kos. 2013).

When the statute is silent about what result should follow if the Health Care Board does not submit draft legislation for the selection of its members by citizen enrolles and when that statute only directs the submission of draft legislation but does not require (nor could it) its enactment, the Board's failure to comply does not render the Board's composition illegal or its acts ultra vires. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 188 (Chk. 2013).

A plaintiff's claim under a promissory estoppel and detrimental reliance cause of action is supported when the plaintiff has timely paid the insurance premiums since 1996; when her reasonable expectation was that she and her dependents would receive life and cancer insurance coverage; when she expected that, as an insured, that the insurer's agents would provide her with accurate and reliable information about the policies, which would include when a dependent is no longer covered and what steps to take when coverage has ceased; when the insurer did not fulfill these expectations, to the detriment of her and her dependents; and when, if the insurer had properly advised her, she would have had the opportunity to take out a separate cancer policy for her daughter and her daughter would have been eligible for cancer policy benefits once she was diagnosed with cancer in 2009. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 359-60 (Pon. 2014).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment does not apply when there is a legally binding agreement in the form of life and cancer insurance policies that the parties agreed to and executed. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

The statutory requirement that an insurance policy must be signed by two major officers of the insurance company is fulfilled when the cover page of the policy shows the signatures of the company's Secretary and President. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 361 (Pon. 2014).

Contracts impose on the parties a duty to do everything necessary to carry them out, and there is an implied undertaking in every contract on each party's part that he will not intentionally and purposely do anything to prevent the other party from carrying out his part of the agreement, or do anything which will have the effect of destroying or injuring the right of the other party to receive the fruits of the contract. The FSM Supreme Court will entertain such claims in the context of insurance contracts, when the insurer possesses greater sophistication, provides the policy, can be expected to assist insureds in understanding the relevant terminology in the policy, and has a specialized role in processing claims. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 361-62 (Pon. 2014).

Under the circumstances of an insurance case, there may be a duty to disclose information, based on a relationship of confidence or trust between the parties, or based on one party's superior knowledge or means of knowledge. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 362 (Pon. 2014).

As used in the insurance context, bad faith does not refer to misconduct of a malicious or immoral nature. Rather, the bad faith concept emphasizes unfaithfulness to an agreed common purpose or to the justifiable expectations of the other party to the contract. In short, a showing of bad faith requires that insurers not act unreasonably or arbitrarily when dealing with their insureds. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 362 (Pon. 2014).

Insuring vessels that later navigate through FSM waters is not, by itself, sufficient to give the court personal jurisdiction over the insurer. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 210 (Yap 2015).

Since the FSM long-arm statute only requires for personal jurisdiction that the defendant be a party to a contracting to insure a risk located in the FSM, it may cover an agency providing underwriting and claims services for the actual insurers at Lloyd's of London. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 210-11 n.2 (Yap 2015).

Since the FSM long-arm statute specifically provides for personal jurisdiction over non-residents contracting to insure any person, property, or risk located within the FSM at the time of contracting, it does not allow the court to exercise personal jurisdiction over an insurer that insured a vessel that was not located in the FSM, but was in Singapore at the time of contracting for marine insurance. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 211 (Yap 2015).

Without a direct action statute, an injured third-party cannot sue an insurer directly because an insurer has no contractual obligation to persons other than its insured, at least until a court determines the liability of its insured and the insurer cannot be joined as a party to a lawsuit to determine that liability. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 211 (Yap 2015).

Even without a direct action statute, an insurer with world-wide coverage could expect to be called upon to help defend its insured in FSM courts. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 211 (Yap 2015).

Generally, an insurer has the duty to defend, the duty to indemnify, the duty to settle, and the duty (or implied covenant) of good faith and fair dealing. These duties are all owed to its insured with whom the insurer has a contractual relationship, not to injured third-party claimants. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 213 (Yap 2015).

An injured claimant may not sue an insurer for breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing. The duty is a product of the fiduciary relationship created by the contract between the insurer and its insured. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 213 (Yap 2015).

An insured's cause of action for the insurer's breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing is assignable to the injured third-party claimant, and the assignee may sue on it. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 213 (Yap 2015).

When an insurance carrier's endorsement contained within an employer's policy limited the applicability of the CNMI Workers' Compensation Program to "the benefits provided under the Workers' Compensation Law of the CNMI," (which would entail that statute's "determination of pay," that statute's exclusive remedy provision setting forth tort immunity does not apply, and an employee would not be forestalled from also bringing a civil action sounding in negligence. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 409 (Pon. 2016).

When the insurance agents' failure to differentiate between the insured's life and cancer policies was careless, but not arbitrary and unreasonable, and did not deprive the insured of her bargained-for benefit, the trial court's conclusion that the insurers breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing or that they engaged in bad faith conduct was reversible error. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 428-29 (App. 2016).

A plaintiff's averment that the defendant engaged in practices designed to discourage employee enrollment in health insurance is merely a conclusory allegation insufficient to state a claim because there are no facts alleged in support of the conclusion. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 309 (Chk. 2017).

Breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is a common law cause of action. It is a tort claim that arises out of a contractual relationship between the parties, and it rests on the premise that whenever a party's cooperation is necessary for the performance of a contractual promise, there is a condition implied that the cooperation will be given. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

A supplemental term life insurance rider does not constitute an individual insurance plan. It is in name and in function an attachment to an existing insurance plan. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 256 (Pon. 2019).

A "policy endorsement" is an insurance-specific document that may add, remove or modify existing coverage. It is not a stand-alone document. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 256 (Pon. 2019).

A "conversion privilege" allows term life insurance to convert to a permanent or individual policy. Term life insurance cannot be or become an individual policy without a conversion option. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 256 (Pon. 2019).

– Agents and Brokers

An insurance broker is an independent middleman between the insured and the insurance company who does not represent any particular insurance company. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 651 (Pon. 2008).

An agreement to perform the service of obtaining insurance is different from the contract of insurance itself. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 651 (Pon. 2008).

When an insurance agent's contract with the insurer contains language regarding the agent's duty to make certain that the premium checks were sent to the insurer, the agent is liable to the insurer for breach of contract when the agent failed to fulfill the contractual obligation to send the premium checks to the insurer's office in Kansas City. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 437-38 (Pon. 2009).

Since insurance agents are required to exercise the utmost good faith, loyalty, and honesty toward the insurer during the times that they acted as the insurer's agents, by cashing the premium checks, and thereby failing to send the checks on to the insurer, they breached this duty. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 441 (Pon. 2009).

An insurer has no duty to its agents to undertake an investigation for the agents' benefit in order to stop the agents from converting the insurer's property. When the insurer's property was converted by the agents' intentional actions, the agents cannot argue that the insurer should have known that they were converting – stealing – the insurer's property, and that since the insurer should have stopped them but did not stop them from doing what they had no right to do, the agents should not have to pay back what they took. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 443 (Pon. 2009).

The insurer ratified, or approved, the check cashing activities of its agents to the extent that they distributed the money obtained from the checks to policy holders for legitimate insurance purposes, and that the insurer gave credit to its agents for these distributions shows this conclusively. But the insurer never ratified the agents' conversion of the funds that were not accounted for, or were not used for insurance purposes since the insurer's efforts to figure out what had happened, to stop it from happening, to arrive at an accounting for the missing money, and to restore order to its Pohnpei operation, manifest its disapproval of the practice of cashing premium checks initiated and continued by its agents. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 444 (Pon. 2009).

While there may be no general duty to explain the type of insurance involved, insurance agents may be found to have additional duties when specifically questioned by the insured as to the appropriate level of insurance. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 358 (Pon. 2014).

A principal is bound by, and liable for, the acts which his agent does with or within the actual or apparent authority from the principal, and within the scope of the agent's employment, and an insurance company's general agent is one who has authority to transact all the business of an insurance company of a particular kind, or in a particular place, and whose powers are coextensive with the business entrusted in the agent's care. Agents have been regarded as general agents when they fully represent the insurance company in a particular district and are authorized to solicit insurance, receive money and premiums, issue and renew polices, appoint subagents, and adjust loses. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 362-63 (Pon. 2014).

Not every mistake by an insurer or its agent rises to the level of bad faith – is automatically unreasonable or arbitrary. An insurance agent's misrepresentation, particularly an unintentional misrepresentation, may breach the agent's duty of care toward the insured rather than constitute bad faith and unreasonable and arbitrary conduct towards an insured. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 428 (App. 2016).

– Application for and Acceptance

An insurance contract, like all contracts, requires an offer and acceptance to be effective, and, like any contract, an insurance contract is formed when an unrevoked offer by one person is accepted by another, thus satisfying the two prerequisites of mutual assent. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 257 (Kos. 2009).

An application for insurance standing alone does not constitute a contract upon which judgment can be recovered. It is merely an offer or request for insurance which may either be accepted or rejected by the insurer. An insurer is at liberty to choose its own risks and is not bound to accept an insurance application for insurance. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 258 (Kos. 2009).

An insurance contract may be established when one of the parties to the contract proposes to be insured and the other party agrees to insure, and the subject, the amount, and the rate of insurance are ascertained or understood and the premium is paid if demanded. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 258 (Kos. 2009).

An insurer may rely on an applicant's representations as truthful, and, in the absence of information that gives an insurer notice that an insurance applicant has misrepresented facts, an insurer has no duty to investigate an applicant's representations. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 258 (Kos. 2009).

An insurance applicant has a duty to be truthful and accurate in making representations when applying for insurance. In insurance law, a representation is a statement made prior to the issuance of a policy which tends to cause the insurer to assume the risk. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 259 (Kos. 2009).

A misrepresentation in a negotiation for a life insurance policy is a statement as a fact of something that the insured knows or should know is untrue. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 259 (Kos. 2009).

It is a long-established common law rule that an insurance applicant has a duty to inform the insurer of answers that would need to be changed between the date of the application and the insurance policy's effective date. The rule is that the insured must inform the company of any change in his physical condition of which he becomes cognizant after making the application for the policy and prior to the delivery thereof. This duty to disclose any change in health exists regardless of whether there is a policy provision requiring such disclosure. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 259 (Kos. 2009).

An insurer may void an insurance contract on the grounds that the insured willfully misrepresented a material fact since the misrepresentation prevents a meeting of the minds, or mutual assent, as to the risk to be insured. A material representation or omission of fact in an insurance application, relied on by the insurer in issuing the policy, renders the coverage voidable at the insurance company's option. This protects the insurer's right to know the full extent of the risk it undertakes when an insurance policy is issued. The mutual good faith which is required in a life insurance contract will not permit a recovery where the insured intentionally withholds or conceals material changes in the condition of his health. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 259 (Kos. 2009).

An insurer seeking rescission of an insurance contract based on a misrepresentation in an insurance application must tender the premiums back to the insured. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

If an insurer seeks to avoid liability for the policy death benefit because of the insured's misrepresentation in the application process, it must tender the premiums to the beneficiaries. If it does not, it cannot prevail on the defense that the insured's misrepresentation made the policy voidable. This is because, after an insured's death, if a tender of the premium in avoidance of the life insurance policy for misrepresentation is not made to the beneficiaries in a timely manner or within a reasonable time, the defense of fraud or misrepresentation is deemed waived, and if the beneficiaries refuse the tender, it should then be paid into court before the insurer seeks a decision on the merits of its defense of fraud or misrepresentation. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

An insurance contract was formed when there was an invitation made by the insurer to provide life and cancer insurance coverage to the plaintiff and the plaintiff offered to enroll under the policy and the insurer accepted the offer by issuing life and cancer insurance policies and accepting premiums that the plaintiff paid through bi-weekly allotments. The parties' reasonable expectations were that the plaintiff would make timely payments on the policy, and that the insurer would provide coverage subject to the policy's terms. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 357 (Pon. 2014).

When the insurer's denial of insurance benefits was lawful, the insured does not have a breach of contract claim. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

– Claims and Benefits

The court cannot say that an insurance claims process which consumed between 3 and 4 months from the filing of the claim to the issuance of a denial is so lengthy, so egregious, as to constitute bad faith as a matter of law. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 308 (Pon. 2004).

An insurance policy beneficiary has standing to sue for unpaid insurance policy benefits. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

Only if a life insurance policy had no designated or named beneficiary, would the policy benefits be payable to his estate to be distributed through probate to his heirs or devisees. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

When the plaintiff alleges that she is the third-party beneficiary of an insurance contract, the six-year statute of limitations for breach of contract generally applies. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

Only if a life insurance policy has no designated or named beneficiary, would the policy benefits be payable to a decedent's estate to be distributed through probate to his heirs or devisees. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the decedent's life insurance policy named his mother, who predeceased the decedent, as beneficiary, the rights in the policy became part of her estate when she died and descended to the devisees according to her will, if she had one, or her heirs according to the law of intestate succession, if she had no will. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Generally rights of a beneficiary pass to the beneficiary's estate in the event of the beneficiary's death during the lifetime of the insured, but if a policy reserves to the insured the right to change the beneficiary, the beneficiary's rights may cease in the event of the beneficiary's death during the insured's lifetime. In re Estate of Manas, 16 FSM R. 82, 83 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

An insurance policy's benefits are payable only to those who are beneficiaries. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 256 n.1 (Kos. 2009).

If an insurer seeks to avoid liability for the policy death benefit because of the insured's misrepresentation in the application process, it must tender the premiums to the beneficiaries. If it does not, it cannot prevail on the defense that the insured's misrepresentation made the policy voidable. This is because, after an insured's death, if a tender of the premium in avoidance of the life insurance policy for misrepresentation is not made to the beneficiaries in a timely manner or within a reasonable time, the defense of fraud or misrepresentation is deemed waived, and if the beneficiaries refuse the tender, it should then be paid into court before the insurer seeks a decision on the merits of its defense of fraud or misrepresentation. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

Cash advances are deducted from the policy's cash value and if the insured dies before repaying it that amount (plus interest) is deducted from the death benefit. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 n.10 (App. 2012).

When the insurance benefit is a amount of $10,000 lump sum payment; when the agreement does not specify if expenses incurred for an attendant accompanying a patient for off-island treatment is covered under the policy; and when there was no evidence presented at trial as to the nature and amount of expenses incurred, the expenses claim will be denied. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360-61 (Pon. 2014).

When certain expenses had been covered by a different insurance plan, the court will not grant relief that would provide the plaintiff with a double recovery. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 361 (Pon. 2014).

When the damages amount was a liquidated sum and the insurance contract involved a promise to pay money if certain events occurred, the plaintiff will be awarded the 9% statutory rate of interest from a reasonable time of 60 days after the diagnosis of her daughter's cancer was submitted to the insurer in a claim form for accident and health policies. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 2014).

An insurance contract in the FSM that made reference to "the benefits provided under the Workers' Compensation of the CNMI," only intended to merely utilize 4 N. Mar. I. Code § 9310 to ascribe a dollar amount to the benefits to which an injured employee would be entitled, as opposed to adopting the entire CMNI Workers' Compensation Program. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 408 (Pon. 2016).

When the insurer's denial of insurance benefits was lawful, the insured does not have a breach of contract claim. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

When the insured's remaining claims are all based on the insurer's denial of insurance coverage and when that denial was lawful, the insured's remaining claims will be dismissed. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

– Coverage

When the insurance contract language excludes bailment leases, a plaintiff vehicle rental business is not entitled to judgment as a matter of law on a claim that the defendants breached the insurance contract when they did not pay for a damaged rental vehicle. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 305 (Pon. 2004).

In an insurance contract that provides that when the word "insured" is utilized in an "unqualified" manner within the contract, the word will be understood to include all individuals who operate an insured vehicle with the permission of the named insured, but where an exclusion provision does not utilize the word "insured" in an unqualified manner and instead specifies that the provision applies to the "Named Insured," the effect of that qualification is to narrow the definition of "insured" to only those individuals who are actually named on the policy. The term "Named Insured" does not include permissive users. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 306 (Pon. 2004).

When there is a contradiction between the first and second sentences of an insurance policy exclusion, it must be construed against the insurance company that drafted the language and was in a superior bargaining position when the contract was entered into. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 306 n.3 (Pon. 2004).

As the vessels' owner, and as a named insured under the policies along with the four states, the FSM received a benefit as a result of the fleet insurance coverage, but in order to establish a claim for quantum meruit, the insurance broker must demonstrate that the FSM was unjustly enriched by the benefit of the broker paying the premium for Chuuk. But the agreement between Chuuk and the FSM was that FSM would permit Chuuk to use vessels that the FSM owned and Chuuk, in return, would pay for insurance coverage for those vessels; so by advancing the insurance premium, the broker met Chuuk's obligation to the FSM in this regard. The primary benefit conferred by the insurance premium payments went to Chuuk, and not to the FSM, since Chuuk was also an insured along with the FSM under the policies and it was Chuuk's, not the FSM's, obligation to provide coverage for the vessels. To suggest that when Chuuk failed to meet its obligation to the FSM to insure the vessels, the FSM became liable for the premiums on the vessels is to lose sight of the fact that the vessels were being operated by Chuuk and for Chuuk's benefit on the condition that Chuuk provide the insurance. The broker's remedy for the premium nonpayment is against Chuuk, who breached its agreement with the FSM by failing to pay for the premiums. The broker's remedy does not extend to the FSM. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 655 (Pon. 2008).

Every Chuuk resident is enrolled in the Chuuk Health Care Act and is eligible to receive benefits under it, except for unemployed noncitizens residing in the State who are not dependents of enrollees. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 620 (Chk. 2011).

Under the Chuuk Health Care Act, a "resident" is any Chuuk citizen for whom Chuuk is his principal residence, or any noncitizen who has established an ongoing physical presence in Chuuk and whose presence is sanctioned by law and is not merely transitory in nature. The non-citizen workers' ongoing physical presence in Chuuk is clearly sanctioned by law when the non-citizen employees apply annually for labor certification and for entry permits in order to maintain their employment in Chuuk. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 620 (Chk. 2011).

Even though a contractor's non-citizen employees cannot be domiciled in Chuuk, they might have a legal residence here, but, even if they are not considered to have a legal residence here, they do have an actual residence in Chuuk that is legally sanctioned, and they are thus, by statute, enrolled in and eligible for Chuuk Health Care Plan benefits and their employer is therefore liable, as a matter of law, to the Plan for the employees' and the employer's contributions of the health insurance premiums for its non-citizen as well as citizen employees on Chuuk. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 620 (Chk. 2011).

Under a fleet insurance policy, the premiums must be paid for all the ships in the fleet before any has coverage. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 118 (App. 2011).

Every Chuuk state employee is automatically an enrollee in the Chuuk Health Care Plan by operation of law since under the Chuuk Health Care Plan Act every Chuuk resident (except unemployed noncitizens who are not dependents of enrollees) is enrolled in and is eligible to receive benefits and "resident' means any citizen of Chuuk for whom Chuuk is his principal residence or any noncitizen who has established an ongoing physical presence in Chuuk and whose presence is sanctioned by law and is not merely transitory in nature. Chuuk is an employer as defined by the Act. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 496 (Chk. 2013).

Non-citizen employees who reside in Chuuk are covered by the Chuuk Health Care Plan and required to make health insurance premium contributions. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 409, 411 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

The insurer did not breach an insurance policy's terms when it denied coverage because the dependent was not a covered family member since, although she was under 25, she had not been enrolled as a full time student in a post-secondary institution of higher learning for five calendar months or more. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 358 (Pon. 2014).

The promises made by the insurer's agents bind the insurer and must be enforced in order to avoid manifest injustice because if the plaintiff had enrolled her daughter under a separate cancer policy, she would have been covered under her own policy, but instead, the agent's misrepresentation caused her to keep her daughter under her cancer policy, making the daughter ineligible at the time she was diagnosed with cancer because she did not qualify as a covered family member under that policy's provisions. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 359 (Pon. 2014).

When an agent has been employed by the insurer for approximately 25 years and, although he may not have had the power to unilaterally amend policies, he informed the plaintiff that cancer coverage was up to 25 years of age; and when, because he was the manager of the insurer's office in Pohnpei and aside from a subordinate he was the only insurer's representative whom the plaintiff was in contact with, the plaintiff had ample reason to rely and accept his statements as the truth. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 2014).

When the medical insurance coverage excludes treatment of injuries that are attributable to the member's own intemperate use of drugs or alcohol and when the insured was extremely intoxicated and admittedly under the heavy influence of sakau, the court will consider whether the plaintiff, despite his intoxication, would have fallen from the ridge since if the fall would have occurred even if the insured was not drunk, then the insured's injuries should have been covered because the denial of insurance benefits was attributed to his intoxication. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 596-97 & n.3 (Pon. 2018).

When, because of the insured's misconduct, the insurer was not obligated to cooperate by extending medical coverage to the insured, the insured's cause of action for breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is void. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

A "policy endorsement" is an insurance-specific document that may add, remove or modify existing coverage. It is not a stand-alone document. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 256 (Pon. 2019).

A "universal life insurance policy" is a permanent, individual policy that accumulates cash value. Term insurance covers only a period of time and therefore does not accrue cash value. Accordingly, premium refunds do not normally apply to term insurance. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 256 (Pon. 2019).

– Credit Life Insurance

Where a creditor accepts a premium payment for insurance that he has agreed to procure, where he makes a diligent effort to fulfill his agreement to do so, promptly notifies the debtor of his inability to procure insurance, he would not be held liable to the debtor, as he would have fulfilled his contract to attempt to procure insurance which is not a contract of insurance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 250 (Chk. 1995).

The general rule is that where a creditor has failed to both procure credit insurance paid for by the debtor and to notify the debtor of his failure to procure the insurance requested, prior to loss, the debtor may plead such failure as a defense or setoff. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 250 (Chk. 1995).

Both contract and tort theories can be pursued by a debtor who alleges that a creditor has failed to procure credit insurance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

A creditor who undertakes to secure credit insurance for a debtor is liable to the debtor for negligent performance of that duty or of duty to notify debtor if insurance not obtained. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

Failure of a creditor to notify the debtor of its failure to obtain insurance is negligence. As a consequence the creditor is liable to the debtor for the entire amount of the debtors' loss, otherwise the debtor is only entitled to return of full amount of insurance premiums paid. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7

FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

A creditor who undertakes to secure credit insurance for a debtor is liable to the debtor for negligent performance of that duty or of duty to notify debtor if insurance not obtained. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 592, 593 (Pon. 2016).

When the debtor has not produced evidence to show that credit insurance was obtained when the loan was entered into, the court will not rule that the debt has been discharged although, if credit insurance had been obtained, the debtor would have had a valid claim of discharge of the debt. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 592, 594 (Pon. 2016).

When a borrower's credit life insurance policy was for a four-year term and expired about eighteen years before the borrower's death, the claim for insurance coverage to cover the borrower's debt is invalid. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 642-43 (Pon. 2018).

– Lapse and Cancellation

When a group insurance policy is non-participatory in that the employee contributes nothing to the payment of the premiums, no contractual relationship arises between the employee and the insurer. Therefore the insurer was under no contractual obligation to provide the decedent employee with notice that the group policy lapsed. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 66, 68 (Chk. 2008).

The effect of an employer's cancellation of the master policy in regard to an employee's coverage depends primarily on the time at which the employer does so. If it occurs before liability under the policy has attached, the insurer is released from any liability that might subsequently accrue so that when the insurer's coverage of CPUC employees lapsed before its employee died, and therefore before liability under the policy attached, the insurer, as a matter of law, was not liable. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 66, 68 (Chk. 2008).

When the court has not been supplied with the information necessary for the court to take judicial notice that life insurance was a state employee benefit when CPUC was created and what the insurance coverage's terms were or to conclude that CPUC has not adopted its own merit system with changed benefits, there are genuine issues of material fact that preclude either party being entitled to summary judgment: 1) whether state employees in 1997 were afforded life insurance benefits and on what terms (contributory, non-contributory; on the job only, 24-hour; etc.); 2) whether CPUC has since established its own merit system and then altered the benefits; and 3) whether, if notice of the lapse of insurance coverage was required, it was given for the July 2004 lapse. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 66, 69 (Chk. 2008).

When the group insurance plan is non-contributory – when the employee does not contribute anything towards payment of the insurance premiums – the employee is not entitled to notice that the employer has ceased paying the premiums. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 16 FSM R. 226, 227 (Chk. 2008).

37 F.S.M.C. 404, by its terms, does not apply to the cancellation of a life insurance policy when there are no issues of non-payment of a premium. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 255 (Pon. 2019).

When 37 F.S.M.C. 404 does not apply to a life insurance policy's cancellation, the court will evaluate the matter according to the terms of the agreements among the parties. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 256 (Pon. 2019).

When the continuation of a supplemental term life insurance policy was contingent upon sufficient enrollment in the group policy, and when, according to the plan's terms, if the plan enrollment fell below "35% of those eligible" to participate, the insurer could terminate the policy, the insurer was entitled to terminate the policy as set forth in the supplemental term life insurance policy. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 257 (Pon. 2019).

When the supplemental term life insurance rider provided that 61 days' notice was required to terminate the supplemental life insurance plan, the insurer's notice to the employer, given 66 calendar days before termination, was sufficient notice as required by the policy. It was incumbent upon the employer, not the insurer, to provide notice to policyholders. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 257 (Pon. 2019).

When the insureds received refunds through their employer, as what should occur only for group insurance policies, not individual insurance policies, and when the insurer instructed the employer to stop all employee payroll deductions for supplemental group life insurance, the insurer did not convert the insureds' money and was not unjustly enriched. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 257 (Pon. 2019).

– Premiums

Insureds frequently pay premiums by executing a promissory note – a "premium note," and, depending on the circumstances of its execution, may pay the premium in full through the execution of a premium note. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 309 (Pon. 2004).

Before an insurance company can obtain summary judgment on an action for enforcement of a premium note, the defenses available to the enforcement of a premium note must be addressed. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 309 (Pon. 2004).

A measure of damages for the tort of negligent misrepresentation (also called deceit) employs the benefit of the bargain rule when damages can be proved with reasonable certainty. Under this principle, the insurer would be entitled to its premium, which would be set off against what it owed its insured. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 469 (Pon. 2004).

Rescission of an insurance contract would, if granted, absolve an insured from liability for the premium and could even entitle him to return of the premium paid. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

Various writings, admitted into evidence, which were signed on the behalf of Chuuk, the party to be charged, can establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff and Chuuk entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff would obtain insurance on Chuuk's vessels for the two periods in question, and that Chuuk would pay for the premiums for the insurance obtained. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 651 (Pon. 2008).

A marine insurance broker who advances fleet insurance premiums may obtain reimbursement from the insured on whose behalf it advanced those premiums under an implied-in-law contractual right to reimbursement of the premiums it advanced on another's behalf when the implied-in-law contractual right is integrally related both to the contract whereby the broker was to procure insurance and to the insurance contracts that resulted from that agreement. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 652 (Pon. 2008).

When, although Chuuk did not pay the premiums, they were paid by the broker on Chuuk's behalf and the policies were in full force and effect for the vessels operated by Chuuk, Chuuk is responsible for these premiums because the broker established by a preponderance of the evidence at trial that the broker and Chuuk had entered into an agreement whereby the broker would procure insurance for the Chuuk-operated vessels and that Chuuk would pay for that insurance. This express contract serves as the basis for an implied-in-law contract that Chuuk is liable for reimbursement to the broker. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 653 (Pon. 2008).

The elements of a cause of action for quantum meruit are that 1) valuable goods or services are provided 2) to someone against whom recovery is sought 3) when the goods or services are enjoyed or used by the one against whom recovery is sought 4) under such circumstances that notified the person that the one performing the services or providing the goods expected payment. The fact that Chuuk did not know that its insurance broker had paid the premiums relates to the quantum meruit claim's fourth element, which is whether the benefit conferred by the in-force policies was enjoyed by Chuuk under circumstances such that Chuuk knew that the insurance broker expected payment. Since it is beyond question that Chuuk knew that the broker expected payment because Chuuk acknowledged in writing that the premiums were owed, the notice requirement to Chuuk is met by Chuuk's express acknowledgment that it owed the premiums pursuant to its enforceable contract with the broker. Accordingly, Chuuk's contention that it is not liable because it did not know that the broker had advanced the premiums on its behalf is without merit. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 654 (Pon. 2008).

An insurance broker did not violate the Chuuk Financial Management Act by advancing the premium on Chuuk's behalf when it was not a state officer, employee, or allottee within the meaning of the statute and it thus did not create an obligation within the statute's meaning because no evidence suggests that the broker was anything other than one of Chuuk's many vendors with whom Chuuk entered into a binding contract. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 654 (Pon. 2008).

When the evidence did not suggest that it was ever the understanding of those concerned that if one of the state operators failed to pay for insurance covering its vessels, the FSM would become liable for the insurance premiums because it owned the vessels, no contract to which the FSM was a party imposed such liability on the FSM. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 655 (Pon. 2008).

As the vessels' owner, and as a named insured under the policies along with the four states, the FSM received a benefit as a result of the fleet insurance coverage, but in order to establish a claim for quantum meruit, the insurance broker must demonstrate that the FSM was unjustly enriched by the benefit of the broker paying the premium for Chuuk. But the agreement between Chuuk and the FSM was that FSM would permit Chuuk to use vessels that the FSM owned and Chuuk, in return, would pay for insurance coverage for those vessels; so by advancing the insurance premium, the broker met Chuuk's obligation to the FSM in this regard. The primary benefit conferred by the insurance premium payments went to Chuuk, and not to the FSM, since Chuuk was also an insured along with the FSM under the policies and it was Chuuk's, not the FSM's, obligation to provide coverage for the vessels. To suggest that when Chuuk failed to meet its obligation to the FSM to insure the vessels, the FSM became liable for the premiums on the vessels is to lose sight of the fact that the vessels were being operated by Chuuk and for Chuuk's benefit on the condition that Chuuk provide the insurance. The broker's remedy for the premium nonpayment is against Chuuk, who breached its agreement with the FSM by failing to pay for the premiums. The broker's remedy does not extend to the FSM. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 655 (Pon. 2008).

Life insurance premiums paid after the insured's death are unearned premiums and may be recovered from the date of the insured's death, provided that the date can be satisfactorily established. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 257 (Kos. 2009).

If an insurer seeks to avoid liability for the policy death benefit because of the insured's misrepresentation in the application process, it must tender the premiums to the beneficiaries. If it does not, it cannot prevail on the defense that the insured's misrepresentation made the policy voidable. This is because, after an insured's death, if a tender of the premium in avoidance of the life insurance policy for misrepresentation is not made to the beneficiaries in a timely manner or within a reasonable time, the defense of fraud or misrepresentation is deemed waived, and if the beneficiaries refuse the tender, it should then be paid into court before the insurer seeks a decision on the merits of its defense of fraud or misrepresentation. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

The court will not hesitate to deny rescission and order enforcement of the contract when the party seeking rescission has not made a timely tender of the premiums (or benefit) it received under the contract. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 261 (Kos. 2009).

Under a fleet insurance policy, the premiums must be paid for all the ships in the fleet before any has coverage. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 118 (App. 2011).

Under the Chuuk Health Care Act of 1994, it is the employer who is liable to the Health Care Plan for all health insurance premiums including the employee's contribution. Liability is not imposed on the employee. The Act also imposes sanctions on the employer for non-payment of the premiums. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 409, 411 (Chk. 2012).

In order to collect overdue premiums or any amount imposed or authorized under the Chuuk Health Care Act of 1994, the Act authorizes civil actions against any person liable to pay any amount under the Act, that is, against the employer because under the Act that is who is liable. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 409, 411 (Chk. 2012).

Non-citizen employees who reside in Chuuk are covered by the Chuuk Health Care Plan and required to make health insurance premium contributions. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 409, 411 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

Payment of Chuuk state employees' contributions and of the employer's contribution out of the Chuuk state funds held in the FSM Treasury is not be a tax or a levy on the national government or an illegal expenditure of FSM funds since the payment would be from Chuuk state funds and, because the obligation to withhold the Plan insurance premium contributions arises by operation of law, the Plan insurance premium contributions would be properly obligated and should be paid. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 496-97 (Chk. 2013).

A plaintiff has a reasonable probability of success on the merits that insurance premiums will be ruled an income tax when the contributions are computed as a percentage of income earned as wages or salaries. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 506 (Chk. 2013).

A statute that provides only that the Plan's Board "may prescribe" or "may establish" differing premium amounts based on the number of the enrollee's dependants, or on their risk factors, does not appear to require that differing premium amounts be set. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 506 (Chk. 2013).

The balance-of-harms factor favors the defendant when the harm that it would suffer is that it would receive 16⅔% less revenue than it had expected or budgeted for on the basis of the 3% contribution it has been collecting instead of the 2½% that the plaintiff asks the court to enforce and when the harm to the plaintiff is the extra ½% contribution he is paying which could be credited to future health insurance premium contributions if found unlawful. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 506 (Chk. 2013).

When the statute provides only that the Chuuk Health Care Plan's Board "may prescribe" or "may establish" differing premium amounts based on the number of the enrollee's dependants or on their "risk" factors, the statute does not require it, but leaves it to the Board's discretion, the Board may choose to assess premiums in a different manner. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 189 (Chk. 2013).

When the health care assessments or premiums are not imposed by the Chuuk Legislature but are imposed by a public corporation, the Chuuk Health Care Plan through its Board and when the assessments or premiums are not deposited in the Chuuk General Fund but into a special trust fund, these attributes of the premium assessments are characteristic of a classic fee and the opposite of a classic tax. Even though the funds raised will be spent, at least indirectly, for the benefit of the entire Chuuk community since the funds will be spent for the benefit of people needing or using health care services, which is nearly everyone in Chuuk at one time or another, the premium assessments lie nearer the fee end of the spectrum than the tax end. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

When the health insurance premiums and assessments are not raised for general revenue purposes and cannot be used for any Chuuk state government activity and can only be used for the purposes of the Health Care Plan Act and when the premiums or assessments help defray the cost of providing medical care, the benefits they provide are not of the sort often financed by a general tax. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

When discretionary language "may" is used, which indicates that the insurance board has the power to consider these factors when assessing the insurance premiums and may exercise the power of applying these factors in the future, the discretion to do so is left with the board, and not with the court. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 26 (App. 2015).

While it may be true that an agent and a principal may be sued in the same case for the same cause of action even when the principal's liability is predicated solely on the agency, when the principal's liability is not based on the agency but is based on a statute, the Chuuk Health Care Act of 1994, that imposes the liability only on the principal – the employer – and absolves the employee from any liability, the employee agent is not a proper party to the litigation. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Waite, 20 FSM R. 282, 284 (Chk. 2016).

When the legal issue of whether the foreign citizen CPUC Chief Executive Officer could be a defendant in a lawsuit by the Chuuk Health Care Plan to collect unpaid health insurance premiums, thereby creating diversity jurisdiction, was previously litigated and a final decision rendered concluding that it could not be done; when the time to appeal that decision has expired; and when the same parties are present, res judicata bars the action in the FSM Supreme Court and the case will be dismissed without prejudice to any action in the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Waite, 20 FSM R. 282, 285 (Chk. 2016).

The Chuuk Health Care Plan enabling statute clearly imposes liability for the payments of premiums on all employers employing eligible residents of Chuuk. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 305 (Chk. 2017).

Chuuk State Law No. 2-94-06 contemplates a comprehensive health insurance system whereby premium payments were required on behalf of eligible enrollees employed by the national government. The statute's language contemplates a system of "universal" coverage automatically extending to all eligible enrollees, which includes all employed Chuuk residents regardless of their employer. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 306 (Chk. 2017).

When, although the regulations for the Chuuk Health Care Plan implement the actual premium amounts due, the statute itself provides for liability to make the premium payments, the Plan has shown facts that, if proven, entitle it to the relief sought for the defendant's non-payment of premiums. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 308 (Chk. 2017).

A "universal life insurance policy" is a permanent, individual policy that accumulates cash value. Term insurance covers only a period of time and therefore does not accrue cash value. Accordingly, premium refunds do not normally apply to term insurance. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 256 (Pon. 2019).

When the insureds received refunds through their employer, as what should occur only for group insurance policies, not individual insurance policies, and when the insurer instructed the employer to stop all employee payroll deductions for supplemental group life insurance, the insurer did not convert the insureds' money and was not unjustly enriched. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 257 (Pon. 2019).

INTEREST AND USURY

Although FSM Public Law No. 2-33, regarding usury, did not appear in the 1982 codification of FSM statutes, it remained effective as did every other law which took effect after October 1, 1981 and it is currently in effect as codified in the 1987 supplement to the FSM Code at 34 F.S.M.C. 201-207. Bernard's Retail Store & Wholesale v. Johnny, 4 FSM R. 33, 36 (App. 1989).

Questions regarding the validity of the provisions of promissory notes for personal loans, executed with a national bank operating in each state of the FSM and having in part foreign ownership, are closely connected to the powers of the national legislature to regulate banking, foreign and interstate commerce, and bankruptcy, and to establish usury limits, and they have a distinctly national character. The FSM Supreme Court therefore will formulate and apply rules of national law in assessing such issues. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 218 (Pon. 1990).

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. Bank of Guam v. Nukuto, 6 FSM R. 615, 616 (Chk. 1994).

Interest on unpaid social security taxes is assessed at 12% from date due until paid even if part of a court judgment and even though court judgments normally bear a 9% interest rate. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 370 (Yap 1996).

Plaintiff's waiver of a portion of its monetary claim cannot summarily disprove an affirmative defense of usury. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n (III), 7 FSM R. 453, 455 (Pon. 1996).

In commercial credit transactions, no person may directly or indirectly receive or charge interest which exceeds an annual percentage rate of twenty-four percent. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 475, 477 (Pon. 2001).

Even assuming that the seller historically did not charge interest on its account with the buyer, nothing precludes the parties to a commercial transaction from coming to a new agreement regarding installment payments on the outstanding indebtedness that also included an interest component calculated over the prior 26 months period, so long as the interest rate charged did not contravene FSM public policy as set out in 34 F.S.M.C. 204. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 502, 504 (Pon. 2002).

When an agreement provides for 18% interest per annum on the principal remaining after the debtor's last payment, no usury issue arises, and when the interest charged cannot be said to be arbitrary and capricious on any other basis, the interest portion of the agreement is binding. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 502, 504 (Pon. 2002).

No person in a commercial credit transaction may directly or indirectly receive or charge interest which exceeds an annual percentage rate of twenty-four percent. Bank of the FSM v. Mori, 11 FSM R. 13, 14 (Chk. 2002).

Because the repeal of a statutory prohibition against usury releases any penalties imposed and permits enforcement of the debtor's obligation in accordance with the parties' agreement, it follows that as to a usury defense, the parties' agreement is governed by the law existing when the agreement is enforced. Bank of the FSM v. Mori, 11 FSM R. 13, 15 (Chk. 2002).

A plaintiff is only entitled to a judgment which represents the amount of money he lent to the defendants and the $100,000 in interest he seeks cannot be awarded when it is the product of an unlawful and usurious interest rate. Walter v. Damai, 12 FSM R. 648, 649 (Pon. 2004).

A creditor who engages in a usurious credit transaction has no right to collect or receive any interest and this prohibition extends to prejudgment interest. Walter v. Damai, 12 FSM R. 648, 650 (Pon. 2004).

Interest on unpaid social security taxes continues to accrue at 12% until paid, even though a judgment normally bears interest at 9%. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Lelu Town, 13 FSM R. 60, 62 (Kos. 2004).

The general rule is that, in the absence of express authorization, interest is to be computed on a simple basis rather than compounded. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 68, 71 (Chk. 2004).

When there is no authorization for compound interest in the settlement agreement and when it is apparent that the parties, in settling their prior lawsuit, intended to apply the legal or judgment rate of interest to any unpaid settlement balances, the plaintiff's damages must therefore be calculated on a simple interest basis. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 68, 71 (Chk. 2004).

A lease agreement's penalty provision, which charged either one or two per cent per day (365% or 730% per annum respectively), is void since either interest rate is usurious. The penalty for charging a usurious interest rate is that the person charging such a rate has no right to receive or collect any interest. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 225-26 (Chk. 2006).

The legal interest rate is nine per cent per annum simple interest – not compounded. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 421 n.2 (Yap 2006).

If appellants post a supersedeas bond, they are automatically entitled to stay once the court has approved the bond. Statutory post-judgment interest, however, will continue to accrue until the judgment is paid. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 501, 505 (Yap 2006).

The court has the discretion to award pre-judgment interest, but it is not a matter of right unless the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when payment is due. The purpose of awarding interest is to compensate the complaining party for losing use of the funds. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 275 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the parties have a written agreement stating that interest would be added to the unpaid balance, an award of pre-judgment interest has been upheld. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 275 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A court has the discretion to award pre-judgment interest, but it is not a matter of right unless the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when payment is due. The purpose of awarding interest is to compensate the complaining party for losing use of the funds. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 328 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the parties have a written agreement stating that interest would be added to the unpaid balance, an award of pre-judgment interest will be upheld. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 328 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the defendant agreed to make regular payments but there was no written agreement to pay interest on the defendant's open account; when the ledger page showing payments contains a 25-cent charge at the time of each payment but this does not correspond to an interest calculation; and when there is no evidence to show interest was discussed or agreed to by the defendant, the plaintiff is not entitled to pre-judgment interest. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 328 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Pre-judgment interest cannot be awarded until the court has determined when payment would reasonably have been due. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 148 (Chk. 2008).

Since 18% per annum is not a usurious rate of interest under FSM law, the defaulting defendants will be liable for this item of damages when the defaulting defendants agreed, by their agent's signature on the invoices, to pay this rate on overdue accounts. Oceanic Lumber, Inc. v. Vincent & Bros. Constr. Co., 16 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2008).

If the additional 33% charge for collection were considered a penalty instead of attorney's fees, it would then have to be added to the any other penalties and interest to determine the true interest rate, and adding 33% to the 18% contract rate would yield an interest rate over 50%, which is usurious interest. When a creditor seeks a usurious interest rate, the penalty is that the creditor will not be permitted to recover any interest whatsoever. Oceanic Lumber, Inc. v. Vincent & Bros. Constr. Co., 16 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2008).

The legal rate of interest is 9%, and is simple interest, not compounded. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 16 FSM R. 543, 546 (Yap 2009).

When there is no evidence in the record that the defendant knew of, or had agreed to, a contractual requirement that he pay interest and the ledger sheets admitted into evidence do not show any interest charges and when none of the situations where the courts have previously allowed prejudgment interest is present, prejudgment interest will be denied. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 33 (App. 2010).

When the parties have had an agreement stating that interest would be added to an unpaid balance, the FSM court has awarded prejudgment interest, and, prejudgment interest at the 9% statutory judgment rate has also been awarded when the defendant knew precisely the amount to which he was obligating himself and the effective date of that commitment to pay, and when the defendant was liable for conversion. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 33 (App. 2010).

The statutory interest rate is 9% per year, which the court may impose prejudgment when the defendant knew precisely the amount to which he was potentially obligating himself, and the effect date of that commitment. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 35 n.6 (Pon. 2011).

The general rule is that in applying partial payments to an interest-bearing debt which is due, in the absence of an agreement or statute to the contrary, the payment will be first applied to the interest due. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 140 (Pon. 2015).

At the start of a typical loan repayment, the installment payments are usually not much larger than the amount of interest accrued and due. The bulk of the installment payment is then applied to interest and the remaining amount goes to reducing the principal so that at the next installment payment, if made on time, a little less is needed to pay the accrued interest and a little more can go to the reduction of principal. This does not constitute usury unless the interest rate itself is higher than permitted by statute. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 140-41 (Pon. 2015).

If the loan payments are late, more interest will accumulate and more of the payment will go to cover the interest and less will go to reducing the principal. Enough late payments or a missed payment and the next payment may end being applied all to accrued interest with nothing left over to apply to the principal. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 2015).

When a court finds a lack of an enforceable contract, and no evidence was submitted to support the plaintiff's request for interest, the plaintiff may not recover on a claim for 1.5% interest per month based on the parties' unenforceable agreement. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 19 (Pon. 2016).

Usury is the exacting, taking, or receiving of an interest charge in an amount or at a rate in excess of that allowed by law for the use of money or extension of credit. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 556-57

(App. 2018).

In a commercial credit transaction, no person may directly or indirectly receive or charge interest which exceeds an annual percentage rate of 24 percent. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 557 (App. 2018).

In applying partial payments to an interest-bearing debt which is due, in the absence of an agreement or statute to the contrary, the payment will be first applied to the interest due. Thus, at the start of a loan repayment, the bulk of a monthly payment is applied to the accrued interest and the remaining amount goes to reducing the principal so that at the next monthly payment, if made on time, a little less is needed to pay the accrued interest and a little more will go to reducing the principal. This is not usury unless the interest rate (including fees) is itself higher than the statutory cap. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 557 (App. 2018).

A 9% interest rate is not usurious. The court thus has no power to disregard it, or to otherwise vary it, lower it, or raise it because the parties agreed to the 9% rate – the bank offered to lend the loan applicants money at 9%, and those applicants, who borrowed money, agreed to borrow it at 9%. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 474 n.1 (Pon. 2020).

Congress created the FSM Development Bank, and gave it the power to lend money either with or without security, and if with security upon such terms as may from time to time seem expedient. The bank's ability to set terms is, of course, limited by the usury statutes. Those statutes prohibit (make usurious) credit transactions that directly or indirectly exceed an annual interest rate of 24%. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 594 (Kos. 2020).

FSM law prohibits (make usurious) commercial credit transactions that directly or indirectly exceed an annual interest rate of 24%, and consumer credit transactions made after October 31, 1998, that directly or indirectly exceed 24% annual interest. Yoruw v. FSM Dep't of Educ., 22 FSM R. 596, 599 (Yap 2020).

A "late fee" of 15% per month on unpaid invoices is an annual interest rate of 180%, and these "late fees" charge interest, either directly or indirectly, at a rate that is usury and that is thus prohibited. Yoruw v. FSM Dep't of Educ., 22 FSM R. 596, 599 (Yap 2020).

The penalty for charging, or trying to charge, a usurious rate, is that the person or entity charging, or trying to charge, such a rate, has no right to collect or receive any interest. It does not matter whether the other party agreed to pay the usurious rate or not or whether the interest sought is prejudgment or post-judgment. This penalty cannot be avoided by reducing the interest to a legal rate or by calling it a fee because that would defeat the statute's purpose. Yoruw v. FSM Dep't of Educ., 22 FSM R. 596, 599 (Yap 2020).

The statutory penalty is that the creditor, who charges or tries to charge a usurious interest rate, has no right to any interest whatsoever. Yoruw v. FSM Dep't of Educ., 22 FSM R. 596, 599 (Yap 2020).

When a debtor has paid a creditor's invoice that included usurious interest, the debtor is entitled to restitution of all the usurious interest "late fees" paid. Yoruw v. FSM Dep't of Educ., 22 FSM R. 596, 599 (Yap 2020).

The FSM usury statutes prohibit (make usurious) commercial credit transactions that directly or indirectly exceed an annual interest rate of 24%, and consumer credit transactions made after October 31, 1998, that exceed an annual interest rate of 24%. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 606-07 (Pon. 2020).

INTERNATIONAL LAW

The Trust Territory is not a foreign state such as to give the FSM Supreme Court diversity jurisdiction over a suit against the Trust Territory. Neimes v. Maeda Constr. Co., 1 FSM R. 47, 51 (Truk 1982).

The concept of admiralty is related uniquely to the law of nations. It consists of rules in large part intended to govern the conduct of various nations in their shipping and commercial activities. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 71 (Kos. 1982).

Retention of the power to play a major role in executive functions, to suspend legislation enacted by the Congress, and to entertain appeals from the court of last resort, the very essence of government suggests that the Trust Territory government remains, not a foreign state, but an integral part of the national government here. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 73-74 (Kos. 1982).

Under the present state of affairs, the Trust Territory government cannot be considered a foreign state, citizen or subject thereof within the meaning of article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 74 (Kos. 1982).

Under international law punitive damages are but rarely and then only reluctantly allowed against foreign national governments. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 361 (Pon. 1994).

Comity is a recognition which one nation extends within its own territory to the legislative, executive, or judicial acts of another. It is not a rule of law, but one of practice, convenience, and expediency. Under principles of comity, courts will enforce foreign judgments, but not when the foreign court lacked jurisdiction, or where enforcement of the foreign judgment would violate a public policy, or where granting comity would result in prejudice to the forum's citizens. J.C. Tenorio Enterprises, Inc. v. Sado, 6 FSM R. 430, 431-32 (Pon. 1994).

Any attempt to breathe new life into tort claims time barred by the relevant and analogous statutes should be approached with caution because they are the type of personal claims for money damages that become increasingly difficult of proof and difficult to defend with the passage of time. Ordinarily such claims are resolved by political and diplomatic efforts. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 498 (App. 1996).

International law does not impose vicarious liability on the chief of state or elected or appointed officials to whom governmental authority has been delegated to make military decisions having collateral consequences to noncombatants in theaters of operations. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 498 (App. 1996).

The Law of the Sea Convention first recognized that the Federated States of Micronesia as a nation has the exclusive right to exploit resources in its 200-mile EEZ. The FSM Constitution was drafted to vest authority over the EEZ in the national government with this in mind. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 378 & n.19 (Pon. 1998).

The FSM national government has the exclusive right to harvest living marine resources in its EEZ, just as it has the exclusive right to harvest offshore mineral resources. As the holder of this exclusive right, the national government is allowed to dispose of this resource and receive revenue in return. Under the Convention on the Law of the Sea, each nation is entitled to exploit its marine resources to the extent it is able to achieve a maximum sustainable yield. When the FSM does not fully exploit its own resources, it is entitled to compensation at the appropriate market rate from foreign fishing vessels which it allows to fish in its waters. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386 (Pon. 1998).

The determination of whether Tonga and its agents are immune from suit is a decision that is better made by the FSM government's executive branch because the FSM Constitution expressly delegates the power to conduct foreign affairs to the President and because whether a party claiming immunity from suit has the status of a foreign sovereign is a matter for the executive branch's determination and is outside the competence of the courts. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 373 (Kos. 2000).

International organizations, their property, and their assets wherever located, and by whomsoever held, are accorded the same immunity from suit and every form of judicial process by the Federated States of Micronesia government that it accords to foreign governments, but the nature of the immunity the FSM affords foreign governments is still an open question. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 373 n.5 (Kos. 2000).

Internal waters are those waters on the landward side, or inside, of the baselines of the territorial sea. The exclusive economic zone starts twelve nautical miles seaward of the baseline and extending outward for another 188 nautical miles. A desire to maximize the area that might be included within the baselines, subject to the FSM's international treaty obligations, cannot be interpreted as a recognition of state ownership of the ocean resources 12 to 200 nautical outside of those baselines when drawn. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 430-31 (App. 2000).

Under the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, an international treaty to which the FSM has acceded and which is now in effect, coastal nations do not have sovereign ownership of the resources in their exclusive economic zones. Coastal nations only have sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring and exploiting, conserving and managing natural resources, whether living or non-living. These rights are subject to numerous duties, including the duty to allow other nations access to the living resources of its exclusive economic zone if the coastal nation does not have the domestic capacity to harvest the entire allowable catch in its exclusive economic zone. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 432 (App. 2000).

Under the Law of the Sea Convention, a coastal nation does not "own" the fish in its exclusive economic zone. But a coastal nation does "own," if "own" is the right word, the sovereign right to exploit those fish and control who is given the access to its exclusive economic zone and the opportunity to reduce those fish to proprietary ownership. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 432 (App. 2000).

A suit over an incident involving a foreign vessel, will not be dismissed when the vessel was engaged in commercial activity, and not in sovereign acts. Kosrae v. Kingdom of Tonga, 9 FSM R. 522, 523 (Kos. 2000).

Conduct attributable to a state that is intended to, and does, effectively deprive an alien of substantially all of the benefit of his interest in property, constitutes a taking of the property, even though the state does not deprive him of his entire legal interest in the property. If a government harasses a foreign entrepreneur in such a way as to make the enterprise unprofitable, one of two outcomes may follow: the entrepreneur may abandon the property or the entrepreneur may sell it to the government at a price which reflects only the diminished potential of the firm. The first is usually classified as a "creeping expropriation" and the second becomes a case of coercion. However, conduct attributable to a state may deprive an alien's property of value without constituting a taking. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 120-21 (Pon. 2003).

What is now the Federated States of Micronesia was a part of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands during the United Nations Trusteeship, and the government of the Trust Territory was not an agency of the United States. When the present Federated States of Micronesia was part of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia was a foreign country relative to the United States, and not a U.S. territory. In re Neron, 16 FSM R. 472, 473-74 (Pon. 2009).

The Federated States of Micronesia is not, and historically was not, a U.S. territory. In re Neron, 16 FSM R. 472, 474 (Pon. 2009).

Although the court will not judge the actions of the U.S. government, when the case's disposition does not require the court to judge those actions, the court can and will judge the actions of the parties to the case if there are satisfactory criteria to do so. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 485 (Pon. 2009).

The international nature of admiralty and maritime law would necessitate that FSM statutory maritime law be applied uniformly throughout the FSM and not vary from island to island because the concept of admiralty law is related uniquely to the law of nations and it consists of rules in large part intended to govern the conduct of various nations in their shipping and commercial activities. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 532, 538 (Yap 2013).

Pacta sunt servanda ("agreements must be kept"), is the rule of law that applies to all agreements made within the framework of the international legal system, and is the basis of the law of treaties, and once in force treaties are binding on the parties to them and must be performed in good faith. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 492 & n.5 (Pon. 2014).

Although the FSM has not acceded to, ratified, or otherwise adopted Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of May 1969, pacta sunt servanda is international customary law that binds the FSM independently. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 492 n.5 (Pon. 2014).

Customary international law can be derived from a variety of sources, but most often from a general and consistent practice of states, and the "practice of the states" includes: 1) all manner of actual behaviors as well as public statements and instructions from diplomatic and official governmental bodies; 2) international agreements codifying or contributing to the emergence of international law; 3) and can also be derived from general principles common to all legal systems. There is no precise formula to indicate how widespread a practice must be before it is accepted as a general practice. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 492 & n.8 (Pon. 2014).

All nations have a duty and obligation over its territory and general authority over its nationals. This duty requires: 1) prescription, 2) adjudication, and 3) enforcement of international law. Prescription is the nation's responsibility to make sure that its laws, whether created by legislation, executive order, rule or regulation, or court order enable it to carry out its international obligations. Adjudication is the requirement that persons or things are subject to the process of its courts or administrative tribunals, whether civil or criminal proceedings. Finally, enforcement of the law requires the nation to induce or compel compliance and punish noncompliance with its laws through the courts, police, or by other action. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 493 (Pon. 2014).

Since the FSM became a member state of the United Nations, it has reciprocal obligations to the international community to redress wrongs in good faith under the provisions of the U.N. Charter. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 496 n.15 (Pon. 2014).

The territorial sea is the waters within 12 nautical miles seaward of FSM island baselines, and the exclusive economic zone is the water seaward of the territorial sea outward to 200 nautical miles from the island baselines. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

Passage by Vietnamese through the FSM territorial waters was not innocent and therefore unlawful when it was for the purpose of illegal sea cucumber harvesting, and thus it provides a sufficient factual basis for a guilty plea to entry without a permit. FSM v. Bui Van Cua, 20 FSM R. 588, 590-91 (Pon. 2016).

– Diplomatic Relations

It would seem, as a matter of comity among sovereign nations, the Korean Embassy would expect that after the receipt of its diplomatic note, the FSM Department of Foreign Affairs would promptly and voluntarily, long before the trial court ordered it, file its determination that the Korean defendants had diplomatic immunity from suit. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 507 (App. 2003).

The FSM President is authorized to enter into diplomatic relations with foreign governments and to consent to the establishment of diplomatic missions in the FSM. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 491 (Pon. 2014).

Members of diplomatic missions, and their families and private servants, and diplomatic couriers assigned to the mission must be afforded the privileges, immunities, protections, and exemptions specified in the April 18, 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, and the diplomatic mission's premises is inviolable. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 491 (Pon. 2014).

An embassy's inviolability and protection is law, made by treaty, and the magnitude of the infraction is irrelevant since inviolability is a foundation of international law that precludes even the slightest violation because there is no more fundamental prerequisite for the maintenance of good relations between the countries in today's interdependent world than the inviolability of diplomatic envoys and embassies. The inviolability rule applies to the embassy building, or parts of buildings and land ancillary thereto, irrespective of ownership and to a diplomatic agent's private residence. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 491 & n.4 (Pon. 2014).

Under the Vienna Convention, the receiving country is under a special duty to protect diplomatic persons, places, and things against any intrusion or damage, and to prevent any disturbance of peace of the mission or impairment of its dignity. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 491 (Pon. 2014).

Since the Constitution explicitly grants the FSM Supreme Court trial division concurrent and original jurisdiction over any cases arising under treaties and since a breach of the inviolability of the embassy premises is a direct violation of an international treaty and international law, the FSM Supreme Court trial division has original jurisdiction over a prosecution for a misdemeanor trespass and theft committed in a foreign embassy. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 491-92 (Pon. 2014).

Internationally protected persons are entitled to special protection. Those persons are entitled to a higher degree of protection than afforded to ordinary citizens. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 493 n.9 (Pon. 2014).

Under international law, the state is expected to provide an effective civil remedy, and/or criminal sanction when damage or injury to a diplomatic mission occurs. If it does not do so, the claim might proceed before an international tribunal. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 493 (Pon. 2014).

In order to fulfill its treaty obligations to protect diplomats, as governed through the application of international law, the FSM must apply its national criminal code of law to private citizens acting within its territorial control. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 493 (Pon. 2014).

Exclusive national jurisdiction over a trespass and theft at the Chinese Embassy is proper under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(ii) as an otherwise undefined national crime, but jurisdiction is not proper under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(i) where an exclusive list of national crimes is defined. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 494 (Pon. 2014).

The Chinese Embassy does not enjoy full extraterritoriality under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, but is afforded special privileges therein because the status of diplomatic premises arises from the rules of law relating to immunity from the prescriptive and enforcement jurisdiction of the receiving state; the premises are not a part of the territory of the sending state. That embassy premises are inviolable does not mean that they are extraterritorial. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 495 n.13 (Pon. 2014).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(a)(ii), the FSM Supreme Court's trial division has exclusive jurisdiction over a trespass and theft at the Chinese Embassy because ambassadors, and all foreign officials, are explicitly intended to be protected by the national government and breaching of an embassy's sanctity affects the personal residence of the ambassador, and directly affects the ambassador's staff, many of whom are legally protected foreign officials; because, although the embassy's physical premises are not explicitly listed in the Constitution as protected property they are necessarily, and implicitly, included within relationship with the ambassador and other foreign diplomats; because the duty of protecting the physical diplomatic mission is an express requirement of the agreement between the FSM and China and the Vienna Convention, statutorily incorporated by reference, requires the protection of the embassy itself; and because this is of an indisputably international character, a fortiori of a national character, and therefore beyond the reach of the state power to control. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 496 (Pon. 2014).

The FSM has enacted legislation that gives positive effect to the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of April 18, 1961. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

Diplomatic missions, members of the mission, and their families and private servants, and diplomatic couriers assigned to the mission shall be afforded the privileges, immunities, protections, and exemptions specified in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations of April 18, 1961. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

The FSM statute explicitly incorporates the Vienna Convention's diplomatic immunity provisions into FSM law. Thus, the Vienna Convention's diplomatic immunity provisions apply in the FSM, regardless of whether the Vienna Convention is self-executing. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

Since no reciprocal determination has been made concerning the Chinese Embassy, the Vienna Convention's diplomatic immunity provisions apply unaltered to the Chinese Embassy in the FSM. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

Any action or proceeding brought against an individual who is entitled to diplomatic immunity with respect to such action or proceeding under any FSM law extending diplomatic privileges and immunities, must be dismissed. Such immunity may be established upon motion or suggestion by or on behalf of the individual, or as otherwise permitted by law or applicable rules of procedure. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

The Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations embodies customary international law, including the "practice of states," and under international law and FSM statute, the Chinese Embassy premises is inviolable, and its premises shall be immune from search, requisition, attachment, or execution. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

Embassy premises, since they are held on behalf of the sending state for the purposes of the mission, are thus immune from suit. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

The Chinese Embassy is immune from litigation. This immunity is established by treaty (the Vienna Convention), by customary international law, and by FSM statutory law. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 (Pon. 2018).

An embassy's immunity from litigation is not dependent on the FSM's issuance of a diplomatic note or effective only once the FSM has issued a diplomatic note, and not before; it is effective upon the establishment of the diplomatic mission. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 (Pon. 2018).

When an embassy has, as permitted by statute, established its immunity by motion, it must be dismissed as a party. No pleading defect, real or imagined, can alter that and produce a different result. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 (Pon. 2018).

When, because an embassy is immune from suit, it will be dismissed. Since the court cannot exercise jurisdiction over it, and, as a prevailing party, it is also entitled to its costs. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 (Pon. 2018).

An embassy is immune from attachment or execution, and cannot be ejected from its premises. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 (Pon. 2018).

Under the Vienna Convention, embassy land remains inviolable, and the host country or its agents cannot enter the embassy grounds without the consent of the head of the mission or the sending state. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 n.2 (Pon. 2018).

When the plaintiffs' basic claim is that the state defendants deprived them of their property (the land on which an embassy sits) without just compensation, they would have a viable remedy of monetary damages assessed against the Pohnpei state defendants if they prove that claim, but no remedy against the embassy since it is immune. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 (Pon. 2018).

JUDGMENTS

The courts must apply three guidelines in determining whether a decision should be given retroactive effect. First, the decision, to be applied non-retroactively, must establish a new principle of law, either by overruling clear past precedent on which litigants may have relied or by deciding an issue of first impression whose resolution was not clearly foreshadowed. Second, the court must weigh the merits and demerits in each case by looking to the prior history of the rule in question, its purpose and effect, and whether retrospective operation will further or retard its operation. Finally, the court must weigh the inequity imposed by retroactive application. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 185-86 (App. 1986).

Earlier legislation similar to the legislation at issue cannot serve as "past precedent" within the meaning of the first guideline for determining whether a decision should be given retroactive effect where that legislation has not been subjected to court review for constitutionality. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 185 (App. 1986).

The court may, in the interest of justice, make the application of its decision prospective where the court is overruling a previous decision or declaring a statute unconstitutional and the present ruling does not prejudice those who might have relied on such ruling or on such statute. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 222 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The action of a trial court in refusing to vacate a judgment will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that the trial court has abused its discretion. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 564 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

Under Civil Rule 54(c) the court has full authority except in default judgments, to award the party granted judgment any relief to which it is entitled whether that party prayed for it or not. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where a judge's pretrial order states that the only issue for trial is the ownership of land within certain boundaries as described on a certain map later litigants cannot claim that the determination of title does not include land that they admit is within those boundaries. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 49-50 (App. 1995).

Unclaimed balances of judgments paid into court may escheat to the government. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 371, 375 (Pon. 1996).

An order granting summary judgment does not constitute a judgment. Before an adjudication can become an effective judgment, the judgment must be set forth in writing on a separate document, and the judgment so set forth must be entered in the civil docket. Bank of the FSM v. Kengin, 7 FSM R. 381, 382 (Yap 1996).

Because dicta does not create a precedent and is not binding, no rehearing can be granted on dicta in an opinion. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 481, 484 (App. 1996).

In the Chuuk State Supreme Court a trial judge has the discretion to order on his own motion a hearing for the plaintiff to prove to the court by the applicable legal standard the amount of damages or other relief sought to be awarded by an offer of judgment. Rosokow v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 507, 509-10 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1996).

All judgments, by statute, accrue nine percent simple interest a year from date of entry of judgment until satisfied. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 670 (App. 1996).

When a second action and judgment is necessary to enforce and satisfy an earlier judgment, the statutory interest on judgments will be computed from the date of entry of the original judgment. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 670 (App. 1996).

A judgment that is reversed and remanded stands as if no trial has yet been held. A party whose convictions have been reversed stands in the position of an accused who has not yet been tried. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

An obligation of the state to pay a litigant a sum in exchange for dismissal of claims sought that arises from the judgment of dismissal of that case is not contrary to the legislative intent expressed in any provision of the Financial Management Act. Otherwise, no settlement of litigation requiring payment by the state could ever be made. Ham v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 300i, 300k (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

It is the purpose of the Financial Management Act to ensure that public funds are only used or promised in a manner provided by law and a judgment of the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division is a manner provided by law. Ham v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 300i, 300k (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The FSM does not have a statute which prescribes when a plaintiff may obtain prejudgment interest, but prejudgment interest has been awarded in the FSM. Coca-Cola Beverage Co. (Micronesia) v. Edmond, 8 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. 1998).

As a general rule, a judgment for a defendant based on lack of jurisdiction does not bar the plaintiff from bringing another action on the same cause in another court having jurisdiction. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 147, 148 (Pon. 1999).

A judgment entered upon a dismissal for lack of jurisdiction should recite that fact, so as to make clear that the dismissal is without prejudice to a different suit in a court that does have jurisdiction. Similar reasoning applies to the granting of a motion to dismiss for improper forum. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 147, 148 (Pon. 1999).

Before the Chuuk State Supreme Court can enter a judgment against the state's public funds pursuant to an offer and acceptance of judgment under Civil Procedure Rule 68, a hearing for the purpose of having the benefit of evidence or hearing testimony as to the value of the plaintiff's claim, or the validity thereof, is an absolute necessity. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Attorney fee awards that are part of money judgments are entitled to bear interest at the judgment rate until satisfied. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 9 FSM R. 569, 570 (Chk. 2000).

Unsatisfied judgments accrue nine percent simple interest from date of entry because the statute does not authorize compounding. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 9 FSM R. 569, 570 (Chk. 2000).

The generally recognized rule is that interest should not bear interest, but compound interest may be awarded if authorized by statute. When the statute reads "nine percent a year" it is not an express authorization to compound interest annually, but is instead, without more, merely a statement of the rate of simple interest. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 9 FSM R. 569, 570 (Chk. 2000).

Judgments in the Federated States of Micronesia are valid and enforceable for twenty years, and therefore generally do not need to be "revived." Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 315 (Chk. 2001).

A revived or renewed judgment is not a novation of contract. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 315 (Chk. 2001).

Under early common law and prior to the creation of the writ of scire facias, it was necessary to sue on the judgment in a new action, affording the defendant an opportunity of proving that he had discharged it, if he had really done so. The purpose of a writ of scire facias or of a revival of the judgment is to give a dormant judgment a new vitality so that it may be executed upon, although it is not a new action or judgment. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 315-16 (Chk. 2001).

An action upon a judgment must be commenced within 20 years after the cause of action accrued. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 316 (Chk. 2001).

Enforcement of a judgment may also be effected, if the court deems justice requires and so orders, by a civil action on the judgment or in any other manner known to American common law or common in courts in the United States. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 316 (Chk. 2001).

There is no provision in FSM law that makes a judgment dormant or that extinguishes a judgment-creditor's right to execution before the twenty-year statute of limitations has run. A dormant judgment is one upon which the statute of limitations has not yet run but which, because of lapse of time during which no enforcement action has been taken, may not be enforced unless certain steps are taken by the judgment holder to revive the judgment. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 316 (Chk. 2001).

An eight-year-old judgment not being dormant in the FSM (although some other jurisdiction may consider it dormant), it cannot be revived by an FSM court. The general rule is that a judgment, to be revived, must be dormant; if a judgment is not dormant, revivor is not necessary. An FSM judgment creditor may proceed by bringing a new action on the judgment. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 316 (Chk. 2001).

Neither Rule 68, nor any principle of contract law, requires an acceptance to be on a different piece of paper from the offer of judgment in order for it to be valid. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 599 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When the original trial judge had the discretion to hold, or not to hold, a Rule 68(b) hearing and when it appears that, based on the memorandum submitted with the offer and acceptance and the attorney general's authority to settle claims against the state, the trial judge exercised his discretion not to hold a Rule 68(b) hearing and instead issued the judgment, the holding that a Rule 68(b) hearing was an absolute necessity was an erroneous conclusion of law. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 599 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

In the FSM, a court judgment remains in effect for twenty years, which gives a judgment holder plenty of time to collect her judgment so that for although the judgment gives the plaintiff $5,000 worth of auto repairs and she may not have a vehicle now, that is not to say that she will never have one at any time in the future and be able to collect on her judgment. Farata v. Punzalan, 11 FSM R. 175, 178 (Chk. 2002).

When the trial court concluded that its ruling would not change what had been established long ago and continued until today and what had been habitually practiced on an island but did not make a finding of what had been established long ago and what had been the habitual and normal practice on the island, the case will be remanded to the trial court for it to determine if the appellants had customary and traditional use rights to the island and what the extent of those rights is. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 216-17 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

In the FSM, judgments, by statute, remain valid and enforceable for twenty years from date of entry. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 525 (Chk. 2003).

While the court may determine (and has in the absence of statute) the priority of its judgments as to a debtor, the court is reluctant to assume that it may order the discharge of a judgment against a debtor when, by statute, the judgment is to remain valid and enforceable for twenty years. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 525 (Chk. 2003).

Any post-judgment charges for attorney's fees and costs – any attorney's fees and costs beyond those awarded in the judgments themselves – must first be determined as reasonable and awarded by the court before the judgment-creditors are entitled to these amounts. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 534 (Chk. 2003).

A court has the inherent power to tailor its decision and remedies to prevent any adverse impact on the affairs of the public because it may, if it determines that the best interests of the parties and of the public require it, render a judgment in plaintiffs' favor on constitutional and statutory claims, and make the application of the judgment prospective only. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 580 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

In any case brought under 11 F.S.M.C. 701 et seq., a plaintiff must prove each element of his case by the preponderance of the evidence. In the case of a stipulated judgment under a settlement agreement, an equally basic jurisprudential principle dictates that a stipulated judgment will be entered only if it is well grounded both in law and in fact. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 24, 26 (Chk. 2003).

A quiet title court judgment is only good against the parties to the case and those in privity with them, while a certificate of title to registered land is presumptively valid against the world. Dereas v. Eas, 12 FSM R. 629, 633 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Every judgment must be set forth on a separate document. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 136 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

The principle of stare decisis is one of the guiding lights of our jurisprudence, and without a principled and compelling reason for overruling a long line of FSM cases, the court is disinclined to do so. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 149 (App. 2005).

The courts are not given the responsibility of interpreting the law, but deprived of the authority to apply it. The judiciary's power to pass judgment goes hand in hand with its power to enforce those judgments as justice requires. Chuuk v. Davis, 13 FSM R. 178, 185 (App. 2005).

A court which lacks personal jurisdiction over a defendant cannot enter a valid judgment against that defendant. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 256 (Chk. 2005).

Civil Rule 71 only permits enforcement of orders and judgments against non-parties "when obedience to an order may be lawfully enforced against a person who is not a party." The key word here is "lawfully." Ordinarily a judgment may be enforced only against a party. However, an injunction may be enforced upon parties to the action, their officers, agents, servants, employees and attorneys, and upon those persons in active concert or participation with them who receive actual notice of the order by personal service or otherwise. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 389 (Chk. 2005).

In the case of an injunction, non-parties who are persons who are the defendant's "officers, agents, servants, employees and attorneys," or "persons in active concert or participation" with the defendant and successors to a party, are the only non-parties against whom judgments and orders may be lawfully enforced, that is, enforced without violating the non-party's constitutional right to due process and Rule 71. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 389 (Chk. 2005).

Previously awarded attorney's fees as sanctions for repeated non-compliance with the court's orders compelling discovery will, if unpaid, be added to the judgment. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 556 (Chk. 2005).

If a detrimental reliance cause of action was pled and tried, or tried by the parties' express or implied consent, the plaintiff is entitled to have the trial court rule on this cause of action when the plaintiff's judgment is reversed for the statutory claim. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 26 (App. 2006).

A defendant may, without waiving defendant's right to offer evidence in the event the motion is not granted, move to dismiss the plaintiff's case after the plaintiff has completed his case-in-chief on the ground that upon the facts and the law the plaintiff has shown no right to relief. The court as trier of the facts may then determine them and render judgment against the plaintiff or may decline to render any judgment until the close of all the evidence. If the court renders judgment on the merits against the plaintiff, the court must make findings as provided in Rule 52(a). Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 64 (Chk. 2006).

If the awarded sanctions are unpaid at judgment and payable to the prevailing party they should be included as taxable costs. If the sanctions are unpaid at judgment and payable to the non-prevailing party, they ought to be deducted from the money judgment due the prevailing party. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 475 (Pon. 2006).

When unpaid Rule 37 sanctions are not specifically named and included as costs in either the judgment or the later order that fixed and entered the costs and fees that were to be added to the judgment, they should be included in the original judgment by implication, if not specifically, since the court was unaware that the sanctions fixed seven months earlier had not been paid. It would be better practice for the plaintiffs to ask that the amount of unpaid sanctions be specifically included in the court's judgment. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 475-76 (Pon. 2006).

Chuuk State Supreme Court Civil Procedure Rule 62(a) automatically stays court enforcement of all money judgments for ten days. Billimon v. Marar, 15 FSM R. 87, 89 (Chk. 2007).

Rule 52(a) requires a trial judge, after trial, to make special findings of fact and separate conclusions of law. Mathias v. Engichy, 15 FSM R. 90, 95 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The requirement that the trial court "find the facts specially" serves three major purposes: 1) to aid appellate court review by affording it a clear understanding of the ground or basis of the trial court's decision; 2) to make definite precisely what the case has decided in order to apply the doctrines of estoppel and res judicata in future cases and promote confidence in the trial judge's decision-making; and 3) to evoke care on the trial judge's part in ascertaining the facts. Mathias v. Engichy, 15 FSM R. 90, 95 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The trial court satisfies its responsibility to make specific findings of fact when the findings are sufficiently detailed to inform the appellate court of the basis of the decision and to permit intelligent appellate review, but the trial court need not mention evidence it considers of little or no value. As long as the trial court clearly relates the findings of fact upon which the decision rests and articulates in a readily intelligible manner the conclusions it draws by applying the controlling law to the facts as found, no more is needed. The trial court has the obligation to ensure that the basis for its decision is set out with enough clarity to enable the reviewing court to perform its function. Mathias v. Engichy, 15 FSM R. 90, 96 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since a trial court can only hold that, as between the parties to the case, who has the better claim to ownership, but that is all the trial court can decide regarding ownership, its ruling cannot apply to any claims to ownership by non-parties. Since the state never claimed title to Unupuku, a judgment against the state for title, even if it were valid against the state, would be utterly meaningless. It is certainly no good against anyone else. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 111 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A judgment can only be enforced against a party to the case. For a judgment to be enforceable, the court rendering the judgment must have jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action and personal jurisdiction over the parties to the action and against whom the judgment is to be enforced. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 111 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Once a judgment has been entered does not mean it is enforceable against anyone and everyone who is not a party. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 111 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

An order or judgment that may be lawfully enforced against someone who is not a party is an injunction may be enforced upon parties to the action, their officers, agents, servants, employees and attorneys, and upon those persons in active concert or participation with them who receive actual notice of the order by personal service or otherwise and against a non-party opponent for costs incurred by his misbehavior. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 112 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A trial court can determine no more than who among the parties before it has a better claim to title or in the case of trespass, possession. A court cannot determine who has title good against the world. Land registration (determination of title presumptively good against the world) is the province of the Land Commission and its procedures, not of a court. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 112 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In order for a judgment granting ownership to land to which someone else has a certificate of title to be valid, the judgment would first have to have set aside the other's certificate of title and as a general rule a certificate of title can be set aside only on the grounds of fraudulent registration. When the pleadings never addressed, or even mentioned the existence of, the certificate of title, this was a fatal flaw. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 113 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a fees and costs order was hand carried, along with some other papers, by a traveler to Yap and those other papers were received, as expected, by the court staff in Yap on the next day, March 23, 2007 and an inquiry the next day satisfied the court that the papers had been received and dealt with, but the fees and costs award did not come to the clerk's attention, or into her possession, until June 5, and was then entered on June 6, 2007, the court can direct that the order awarding fees and costs be entered nunc pro tunc as of March 23, 2007, the day the court expected the order to be, and thought it had been, entered because a court may issue an order nunc pro tunc to supply a record of an action previously done but omitted from the record through inadvertence or mistake, to have effect as of the former date. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 133, 134 (Yap 2007).

Trust Territory judicial decisions are not stare decisis, that is, they are not binding precedent on FSM courts. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 218 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Civil Procedure Rule 52(a) requires a trial judge, after trial, to make special findings of fact and separate conclusions of law before a judgment is entered. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the Trust Territory judgment that the appellant relies upon explicitly states that the judgment will not affect any rights of way there may be over the lands in question and when it is undisputed that the appellees were granted their right of way prior to the Trust Territory judgment, the Trust Territory judgment did nothing to alter the preexisting right of way. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 397-98 (App. 2007).

"Law of the case" refers to the principle that once issues are decided in a case, they will not be redetermined later in the same case. This is a policy relied on by courts out of concern for judicial economy and to avoid the confusion that would result if a court reversed its own decisions during the course of a case. In the absence of statute the phrase, "law of the case," as applied to the effect of previous orders on the later action of the court rendering them in the same case, merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, not a limit to their power. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 15 FSM R. 450, 453 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When an issue is decided at trial and later reversed on appeal due to legal error, the findings of fact still bind the trial court on remand as law of the case. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 15 FSM R. 450, 453-54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the original decision had been reviewed by the Kosrae State Court on appeal and remanded for the purpose of considering new evidence and when the only new evidence was rejected, the findings of fact made in the original decision should bind the Land Court on remand. When, in its second decision, it reconsidered the evidence previously offered and made different, conflicting findings than in the original decision, applying the principle of law of the case, the findings in favor of the appellants' ownership of the subject parcel in the original decision are upheld. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 15 FSM R. 450, 454 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When an issue is decided at trial and later reversed on appeal due to legal error, the findings of fact still bind the trial court on remand as law of the case. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 15 FSM R. 450, 453-54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the original decision had been reviewed by the Kosrae State Court on appeal and remanded for the purpose of considering new evidence and when the only new evidence was rejected, the findings of fact made in the original decision should bind the Land Court on remand. When, in its second decision, it reconsidered the evidence previously offered and made different, conflicting findings than in the original decision, applying the principle of law of the case, the findings in favor of the appellants' ownership of the subject parcel in the original decision are upheld. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 15 FSM R. 450, 454 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the Land Court's first decision, assessed the evidence and made findings of fact supporting the appellants' ownership of the parcel and its second decision, issued two years later, rejected new evidence and assessed the identical evidence to make findings of fact supporting the appellees' ownership of the parcel, the matter presents the kind of confusion that results when a court reopens what it has already decided. Evidence often conflicts and may reasonably support inconsistent findings. But the Land Court cannot redetermine factual issues decided earlier in the case without new evidence to support a different decision. When the Kosrae State Court was presented with the question of whether the original decision was based on substantial evidence at the time of the first appeal and remanded the case back to Land Court for the purpose of looking at new evidence but did not remand based on a lack of substantial evidence to support the original decision, the doctrine of law of the case applies to uphold the original findings of fact as based on substantial evidence and the original determination of title in favor of the appellants. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 15 FSM R. 450, 454 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the original judgment with respect to trebling the pepper business lost profits damages was ultimately correct in its entirety as the same amount was awarded by the later judgment on remand, that leads to the conclusion that the trebled damages were fully ascertained as of the date of the original judgment. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 524 (Pon. 2008).

An order in aid of judgment is not appropriate when the prevailing party seeks an order evicting an alleged successor-in-interest and non-party because an order in aid of judgment is only appropriate when seeking satisfaction of a money judgment and the matter does not involve a money judgment. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 537 (Pon. 2008).

A judgment affecting an interest in land becomes enforceable, by registering the judgment with the appropriate land authority. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 537 (Pon. 2008).

An option for enforcing a judgment as provided by statute is the filing of a new civil action based on the judgment. This option is most appropriate avenue and is likely to lead to an efficient and just resolution when the earlier judgment dismissed claims raised by the plaintiff in connection with a land use agreement he had entered into with the defendant and the defendant, some two decades later, seeks to use this judgment to prevent the others, who are not parties to the action and seemingly not involved in the underlying dispute until recently, from using land that may or may not be subject to the judgment and a dispute clearly exists as to whether the other should be deprived of using the land in dispute even if that land is subject to the judgment because new evidence is needed to resolve this dispute between the defendant and the other. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 538 (Pon. 2008).

When the prevailing party's proposed form of judgment includes matters that are tantamount to new findings of fact not found anywhere in the former justice's oral findings and conclusions, the court will decline to enter the submitted proposed form of judgment. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 538 (Pon. 2008).

The court is required to find the facts specially and state its conclusions of law thereon but is not required to be reduce findings and conclusions to writing. A justice is under no obligation to reduce his findings and conclusions to writing so long as he stated the findings and conclusions orally in open court. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 538 (Pon. 2008).

A successor judge may not make findings of fact and conclusions of law and enter judgment solely upon the record developed by his predecessor except upon agreement of the parties, and a second judge is prohibited from making factual determinations as to a first judge's intent when he interprets an order issued by the first judge. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 539 (Pon. 2008).

Although the plaintiffs' summary judgment motion was granted, no judgment will be entered at this time when one cause of action remains outstanding and unadjudicated. Ruben v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 605, 609 (Chk. 2008).

Under Rule 58, upon a decision by the court the clerk must enter judgment as directed by the rule or the court, and every judgment must be set forth on a separate document. A judgment is effective only when so set forth and when entered as provided in Rule 79(a). FSM Dev. Bank v. Kaminanga, 16 FSM R. 45, 46 (Chk. 2008).

The court can, as an act of grace to prevent undue hardship, permit withholding from payment to the judgment-creditor any sums that might be due in taxes because of the order in aid of judgment since the court may make provision for tax payments to non-parties in its court judgments when a judgment causes a party to incur tax liability. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 137-38 (Pon. 2008).

In the absence of a stay obtained in accordance with Rule 62(d), the pendency of an appeal does not prevent the judgment creditor from acting to enforce the judgment. But a person who cannot furnish a supersedeas bond does not lose the right to appeal, although he does assume the risk of getting his money back again if the judgment is reversed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 142 (Pon. 2008).

When one of two defendants against whom a judgment is to be entered is a d/b/a of the other, the other is essentially the only defendant against whom the judgment will be entered. Oceanic Lumber, Inc. v. Vincent & Bros. Constr. Co., 16 FSM R. 222, 223 n.1 (Chk. 2008).

Generally, parties must bear their own attorney's fees unless otherwise authorized by law or by contract between the parties. Thus, when the sales contract provides that the buyer will pay the seller's attorney's fees and costs if an attorney is hired to collect the debt, the court will determine and award the seller its reasonable attorney's fees, which, except in unusual circumstances involving bad faith and vexatious litigation, will not exceed 15% of the outstanding principal and interest. Oceanic Lumber, Inc. v. Vincent & Bros. Constr. Co., 16 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2008).

If, after the plaintiff has completed the presentation of plaintiff's evidence, the defendant, without waiving the defendant's right to offer evidence in the event the motion is not granted, moves for a dismissal on the ground that upon the facts and the law the plaintiff has shown no right to relief, and if the court then renders judgment on the merits against the plaintiff, the court must make findings as provided in Rule 52(a). Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 453 (Pon. 2009).

Trial court judgments that were, in part, based on documents that were never authenticated by affidavit or by testimony and their accuracy was never vouched for by affidavit, or testimony, or other evidence will be vacated. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32 (App. 2010).

When the receipts relied upon by the trial court were never identified, marked, described, or admitted at trial or evidentiary hearing; when those receipts were provided to the court post-trial and were never authenticated, introduced, or admitted into evidence; and when neither side had the opportunity to examine witnesses, or to produce witnesses to testify, on the accuracy, meaning, or completeness of the receipts or about the receipts that the trial court disallowed because someone else had signed them, the documents supplied to the court after trial were not evidence that was properly before that court and thus were not evidence in the record and the trial court's use of these documents violated due process. There is therefore no substantial evidence in the record to support the judgment amount. The judgment amount finding is thus clearly erroneous, and the judgment will be vacated since that figure is not supported by substantial evidence in the record, and, in fact, is not supported by any evidence in the record. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32-33 (App. 2010).

The usual rule is that the parties are responsible for their own attorney's fees. Generally, a prevailing party will be awarded attorney's fees only if they are authorized by contract or by statute, or when the opposing party has acted vexatiously, or in bad faith, or presses frivolous claims, or employs oppressive litigation practices. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 34 (App. 2010).

The prevailing plaintiff will not be awarded attorney's fees when the defendant did not act vexatiously or in bad faith, or press frivolous claims, or employ oppressive litigation practices and when no statute or contractual provision authorized attorney's fees in the case. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 34 (App. 2010).

Whether a defendant is liable to the plaintiff for an attorney's fee award is properly part of the matters that must be heard at trial and decided before judgment. The amount of the attorney's fees to be awarded will, however, be determined in response to a post-judgment motion. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 34 (App. 2010).

The court renders judgment and grants relief based on what has been proven, not on what was pled. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 49 (Chk. 2010).

A court cannot order as relief a de facto practice that is actually contrary to law, even if it has been the usual practice. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 176, 179 (Pon. 2010).

Trust Territory High Court decisions are not stare decisis in the Federated States of Micronesia, but their rationale may be adopted when persuasive. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

A default judgment is not a judgment obtained on the merits. In fact, it makes no claim as to the merits of the case at all. Instead, defaults and default judgments are procedural mechanisms which enable courts to avoid delay by an unresponsive party and to deter parties from using delay as a litigation strategy. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 298 (App. 2010).

The Barrett decision does not stand for the proposition that a judgment is a property right which affords judgment-creditors due process rights under the national Constitution. The FSM Supreme Court has not to date, made such a determination. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 299 (App. 2010).

Dicta are expressions in the court's opinion which go beyond the facts before the court and therefore are individual views of the author of the opinion and are not binding in subsequent cases. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 300 n.4 (App. 2010).

A person with a judgment may initiate contempt proceedings when enforcement of a favorable judgment is required to prevent irreparable injury to the winning party's interests and is otherwise in the interests of justice. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 17 FSM R. 307, 309 (Pon. 2010).

A default judgment is not a judgment obtained on the merits. In fact, it makes no claim as to the merits of the case at all. Stephen v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 496, 499 (App. 2011).

A statement by a court that, to the extent that it is not dicta, is a finding of fact, a conclusion of law, and a reprimand, cannot be used as a basis for any future action when it is vacated on appeal. In re Sanction of George, 17 FSM R. 613, 617 (App. 2011).

Damages are contractual in nature when they arose either from the various lease agreements between the plaintiff and the state or from the settlement agreement between them even though the settlement agreement included a claim for a state court partial (and thus probably not final and enforceable) judgment for some of the unpaid periods of the leases because this court used the parties' memorandum of understanding for its determination of damages. Thus the damages judgment in this case was not based on a state court "judgment" but on the parties' contractual stipulation about the amount the state owed the plaintiff as of March 9, 2006. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 & n.1 (Chk. 2011).

Once the parties have finished presenting all their evidence, the trial court's duty is to weigh the evidence and make its findings of fact and conclusions of law and to render judgment on whether the plaintiff has shown a right to relief. Thus, a Rule 41(b) motion to dismiss during closing arguments is pointless. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 117 (App. 2011).

The property right created by a judgment against a government entity is not a right to payment at a particular time but merely the recognition of a continuing debt of that government entity. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Since the court, adhering to the authority vested in the judicial branch, should only interpret the laws regarding property in Chuuk and should not take over the legislative branch's role, when there has been no legislative intent shown of a specific desire to ascribe a property right to judgments, therefore, absent a specific Chuuk State legislation creating a specific property right, such a right cannot be ascribed to judgments. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Although no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law is the mandate of the constitution, a party cannot be said to be deprived of his property in a judgment because at the time he is unable to collect it. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Plaintiffs are not deprived of their judgments, so long as they continue to be existing liabilities against the entity. Therefore a failure to timely fulfill a judgment does not constitute a taking in violation of the due process clause as there continues to be an existing liability against the state. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the issued judgment s valid, it represents an existing liability against the State of Chuuk. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When no property right can be ascribed to the judgment at issue; the due process standard is not applicable. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A judgment can be confirmed when it is undisputed that the judgment exists even though a mere recognition of an existing legal obligation would be redundant. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 335 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When no evidence was presented that supports the liability of the Director of Public Safety in his official capacity, judgment for an illegal arrest by the Pohnpei state police will be entered solely against the Pohnpei state government. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

Whatever arrangements regarding who would be responsible for the payment of the plane tickets that might have been made between an employee's mother and sister and an employee who charged plane tickets for her mother and her sister to her employer does not affect the employee's liability to her employer for all of the tickets because the employee cannot shift liability to another party without her employer's agreement although the employee will be credited for any payments she and her sister made since the employer is not entitled to double recovery. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 531 (Pon. 2013).

No ruling can be made or judgment entered against persons over whom the court does not have personal jurisdiction. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 579 n.1 (Kos. 2013).

When facts are designated established and then those facts are used to render summary judgment, the judgment then rendered is a decision on the merits. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 24 (Chk. 2013).

While the better view may be that the dollar value in the judgment reflect the amount the Japanese yen is valued at on the day the court enters judgment because that is the only way the plaintiff would receive the Japanese yen amount equal to the yen she spent on necessary medical bills and other services, the court will not decide this issue when the plaintiff's damages total between $28,454.13 and $30,310.37 depending on the conversion date, and the FSM has waived its sovereign immunity only to the extent of the first $20,000 in damages so only a $20,000 judgment can be entered. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 85-86 (Pon. 2013).

As a general rule, when one of several defendants who is alleged to be jointly liable defaults, judgment should not be entered against that defendant until the matter has been adjudicated with regard to all defendants, or all defendants have defaulted. This principle guards against inconsistent judgments when the relationship between the parties requires joint and several liability. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 110 (App. 2013).

"Law of the case" refers to the principle that once issues are decided in a case, they will not be redetermined later in the same case. This is a policy relied on by courts out of concern for judicial economy and to avoid the confusion that would result if a court reversed its own decisions during the course of a case. In the absence of statute the phrase, "law of the case," as applied to the effect of previous orders on the later action of the court rendering them in the same case, merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, not a limit to their power. Berman v. FSM Nat'l Police, 19 FSM R. 118, 126 (App. 2013).

When a trial court has already ruled against the plaintiffs on all the issues and arguments they raised in their summary judgment motion, it could refuse to reopen what it had already been decided unless there was new evidence presented or a there had been a change in the controlling law. This is true even though any decision, however designated, which adjudicates fewer than all the claims does not terminate the action as to any of the claims or parties, and is subject to revision at any time before the entry of judgment adjudicating all the claims. Berman v. FSM Nat'l Police, 19 FSM R. 118, 126-27 (App. 2013).

Generally, the filing of a notice of a appeal divests the trial court of jurisdiction over the appealed case. Notwithstanding the general effect of the filing of a notice of appeal, the trial court retains jurisdiction to determine matters collateral or incidental to the judgment, and may act in aid of the appeal. For example, because the mere filing of a notice of appeal does not affect the validity of a judgment, the trial court retains jurisdiction to enforce the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 19 FSM R. 128, 130 (Pon. 2013).

When the issue of the trial court's jurisdiction is being appealed on various constitutional grounds but there has been no determination that the trial court lacks jurisdiction, the trial court retains jurisdiction to enforce the judgment and is not acting without authority or jurisdiction. The extraordinary writ of prohibition will not serve as a substitute for that appeal. Ehsa v. Johnny, 19 FSM R. 175, 177-78 (App. 2013).

When, although the judge signed the judgment on September 13, 2007, the clerk did not enter it until September 17, 2007, September 17, 2007 is the judgment date. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 215 n.2 (App. 2013).

When the plaintiffs failed to raise the issue of nuisance, or damages arising from nuisance, at trial, that count of the complaint is waived. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

It is not necessary for the court to make findings on undisputed or stipulated facts. Nor are findings required on issues that are not material. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 281 (Pon. 2014).

Uncontested findings need only be included in the court's findings of fact if they form a basis for its conclusion of law. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 281 (Pon. 2014).

Under the Kosrae statute, a judgment from a Trust Territory court with jurisdiction over Kosrae land matters should be accorded res judicata status. Even if it did not, the general legal doctrine of res judicata, which the statute does not abolish, would accord res judicata status to Trust Territory High Court judgments when the elements are met. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 302 (App. 2014).

A Trust Territory High Court judgment is entitled to res judicata effect unless (or until) that judgment is successfully collaterally attacked. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 303 (App. 2014).

An argument that citizens' rights must be upheld over a Trust Territory High Court judgment because the Trust Territory High Court was not a constitutional court must be rejected when there were no constitutional courts in 1960 when the judgment was issued and the Trust Territory courts were the only functioning court system then. The impropriety of the Trust Territory High Court deciding cases when both the Trust Territory High Court and constitutional FSM courts were simultaneously in existence and functioning thus offers no support. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 303-04 (App. 2014).

Rule 69 applies only to money judgments. Thus, it is generally not applicable to judgments that direct specific acts, which are covered by Rule 70. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 74 n.2 (Pon. 2015).

A judgment for a defendant based on lack of jurisdiction does not bar the plaintiff from bringing another action on the same cause in another court having jurisdiction. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Waite, 20 FSM R. 282, 285 n.4 (Chk. 2016).

A trial judge is not required to limit his analysis to the causes of action pled in the complaint because, under the rules, except as to a party against whom a judgment is entered by default, every final judgment must grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 430 (App. 2016).

To grant a judgment against the state government for funds that the national government admits that it still holds and is willing to pay would permit double recovery. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 489 n.2 (Chk. 2016).

Stare decisis is the doctrine of precedent, under which it is necessary for a court to follow earlier judicial decisions when the same points of law arise again in litigation. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R.

498, 514-15 (App. 2016).

There is no Chuuk statute making judgments against the state (or a municipality) a vested property interest, and there are no statutes requiring that judgments be paid within a certain time, or providing the means to effect payment if the governmental entity does not have the funds available. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 529 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The state's failure to appropriate funds to pay a judgment debt does not constitute a taking in violation of the due process clause because the property right created by a judgment against a government entity is merely the recognition of a continuing debt of that government entity. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 529 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

A money judgment against the state is not property such that its non-payment constitutes a taking, but a money judgment against the state is a recognition of the state government's continuing debt or obligation. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 529-30 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

If a judgment creditor wants Chuuk to furnish money to pay his judgment now, he must seek an appropriation from the Chuuk Legislature that includes it or that can be used to pay it. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 530-31 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Since the principle that funds appropriated for other purposes cannot be redirected to pay judgments is inherent in the separation-of-powers scheme in the Chuuk Constitution, the Chuuk State Supreme Court cannot levy any writs on Chuuk state funds because those writs would be levied on money that the Chuuk Legislature has already appropriated for another purpose. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The statutory presumption that judgments over twenty years old have been satisfied is a rebuttable presumption. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

A money judgment against the state is not a property interest but an existing, continuing liability against the state, and a failure to timely satisfy that judgment does not constitute a taking in violation of due process or equal protection. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

To grant a judgment against the state government for funds that the national government admits that it still holds and is willing to pay would permit double recovery. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 540 n.4 (Chk. 2016).

If, and when, a party is awarded its expenses under Rule 37, and if that party is not paid those expenses reasonably promptly, that expense award will, at final judgment, be deducted from any money judgment awarded to the opposing party or added to any money judgment awarded to the party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 565, 575 (Pon. 2016).

While Trust Territory High Court opinions are not binding precedent on the FSM Supreme Court, they serve as useful advisory precedent, especially considering they contain important information regarding the customs and traditions of the people of Micronesia. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 n.2 (Pon. 2016).

When the plaintiff obtains a judgment in his favor, his claim "merges" in that judgment; he may seek no further relief on that claim in a separate action. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 69 (App. 2016).

When a judgment is rendered for a defendant, the plaintiff's claim is extinguished; the judgment acts as a "bar." Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 69 (App. 2016).

A proposition that it is mandatory that separate sections specifically entitled "Findings of Fact" and "Conclusions of Law" appear within an order, is misguided. Kosrae Civil Procedure Rule 52 plainly states that if an opinion or memorandum of decision is filed, it is sufficient if the findings of fact and conclusion of law appear therein. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 119 (App. 2017).

A presiding judge is under no obligation to reduce his findings and conclusions to writing, so long as he has stated the findings and conclusions orally in open court. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 119 (App. 2017).

Once the parties have finished presenting all their evidence, the trial court's duty is to weigh the evidence and make its findings of fact and conclusions of law and to render judgment on whether the plaintiff has shown a right to relief. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 119 (App. 2017).

When an order in question disposes of all the claims against one of several parties, it clearly has the requisite finality to be appealable under Civil Procedure Rule 54(b) if the trial court has made a proper certification under that rule. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 224 (App. 2017).

A decree nisi is a court's decree that will become absolute unless the adversely affected party shows the court, within a specified time, why it should be set aside. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 360 n.4 (App. 2017).

A notice of appeal divests trial court of jurisdiction, except to take action in aid of the appeal. Examples of orders in aid of an appeal include, but are not limited to, applications for release from jail pending appeal, applications for stays pending appeal, taxation of costs on a judgment after notice of appeal filed, considering and denying a Rule 60(b) relief from judgment motions (but not granting one unless the case is remanded), and, since the mere filing of a notice of appeal does not affect a judgment's validity, the trial court also retains jurisdiction to enforce the judgment, unless a stay has been granted. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

While trial division decisions are precedents, they are not binding precedents since they are only trial court decisions. They are thus not "controlling law." Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 561 (App. 2018).

The court's denial of a person's motion to dismiss him "in his individual capacity" put that person on notice that any judgment in the plaintiff's favor would, unless the court ordered otherwise, be against him personally. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 134 (Pon. 2019).

When prior judge's findings all indicate that the individual defendant was the plaintiff's actual employer and liable to him on the judgment, the court will conclude that the prior judge considered his judgment to be against either just the individual defendant or against both him and the co-defendant corporation, jointly and severally, since the judgment was based on the holding that the individual defendant was the employer and thus liable under the employment contract. That being the "law of the case," the court will direct that a clarified judgment be entered naming the individual defendant as the judgment debtor and include the corporation as a joint and several judgment debtor since it was the plaintiff's nominal employer. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 135 (Pon. 2019).

Even though the plaintiff did not plead an ejectment cause of action, the court could, if he proves he has a greater current possessory right to the land, grant the plaintiff actual possession of land through an ejectment remedy because, except as to a party against whom a judgment is entered by default, every final judgment shall grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

The court can, in a proper case, after notice and after severing a previously consolidated case, then dismiss that severed case, but when there was no order of severance, the cases remained consolidated and any dismissals were the partial adjudication of one (consolidated) case. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 180 (Pon. 2019).

A judgment of any court is presumed to be paid and satisfied at the expiration of twenty years after it is rendered. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

Since except as to a party against whom a judgment is entered by default, every final judgment must grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings, when the sum of expenses that the party is entitled to is larger than the amount sought, the court will grant judgment for the larger figure. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 479 (Pon. 2020).

Since an attorney is the real party in interest for any sanction imposed on her personally, the court cannot include the sanction, for which the attorney's clients are not liable, in the judgment against the clients and will enter the sanction solely against the liable attorney. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 479 (Pon. 2020).

A litigant's judgments against Chuuk are not vested property rights, and Chuuk's failure to pay those judgments is not a due process or civil rights violation. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

When the only basis the plaintiff asserts for subject-matter jurisdiction is that his state court judgments are property and the state's failure to pay is a taking of his property without due process, the plaintiff's suit does not involve subject matter over which the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction because the plaintiff's state court judgments are not property, and the state's failure to pay his judgments against it does not violate his due process or civil rights. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

"Law of the case" refers to the principle that once issues are decided in a case, they will not be redetermined later in the same case. This is a policy relied on by courts out of concern for judicial economy and to avoid the confusion that would result if a court reversed its own decisions during the course of a case. In the absence of a statute, the phrase, "law of the case," as applied to the effect of previous orders on the later action of the court rendering them in the same case, merely expresses the practice of courts generally to refuse to reopen what has been decided, not a limit to their power. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 521 (App. 2020).

Under the law of the case doctrine, unless corrected by an appellate tribunal, a legal decision made at one stage of a civil or criminal case constitutes the law of the case throughout the pendency of the litigation. Strictly speaking, the doctrine is not implicated for interlocutory orders because they remain open to trial court reconsideration, and do not constitute the law of the case. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 521-22 (App. 2020).

A court judgment is not a vested property right or interest because a party has no absolute right to a trial court judgment; otherwise, an appeal would be futile. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 525 (App. 2020).

– Action on a Judgment

An action on a judgment may be maintained up to twenty years after the date of entry of the judgment. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 672 (App. 1996).

An action on a judgment filed more than twenty years after the judgment was announced, but less than twenty years after the written judgment was served on the parties is timely filed and not barred by the statute of limitations. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

FSM statutory law recognizes the existence of an action on a judgment because it provides a time limit

– 20 years – within which one must be brought. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371 (Pon. 2019).

An action may be maintained up to twenty years after the date of entry of the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371 (Pon. 2019).

When a valid and final personal judgment is rendered in the plaintiff's favor, the plaintiff cannot thereafter maintain an action on the original claim or any part thereof, although the plaintiff may be able to maintain an action upon the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371-72 (Pon. 2019).

An action on a judgment is a new and independent action, and not merely a means of enforcing a judgment, as is a writ of execution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

To be available as a cause of action, the judgment must be a definite and personal judgment for the payment of money, final in its character and not merely interlocutory, remaining unsatisfied, and capable of immediate enforcement. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

An action based on a judgment is an action based on contract. The judgment becomes a debt which the judgment debtor is obligated to pay and the law implies a contract on his part to pay it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

A suit on a judgment is separate and independent from the underlying cause of action that led to the judgment, and is deemed distinct from the original suit in which the prior judgment was rendered. It must be commenced and prosecuted in the same way as any other civil action brought to recover judgment on a debt. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

In an action on a judgment, the original cause of action is merged in the judgment, and, unless void, the judgment is conclusive. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

An action on a judgment is not an action on the original claim, which has merged into the original judgment. It is a new and independent action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

An action on a judgment must be prosecuted by the owner of it, and it must be brought against the defendant of record in the judgment or the defendant's successor in interest, and not an entity or person not named in the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

An action on a judgment is especially apt for resolution by means of a motion for summary judgment. Usually, the plaintiff establishes his prima facie case by producing certified copies of the judgment on which the action is based and the identity of the defendant as obligee. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 373 (Pon. 2019).

When, in an action on a judgment, the plaintiff has produced a copy of the judgment on which the action is based, but it is not certified, that deficiency may be disregarded where the original judgment on which the action is based was entered in the same court and venue in which the action on the judgment is filed, and thus the copy's accuracy can easily be verified. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 373 (Pon. 2019).

When one co-defendant's "affirmative defense" may more accurately be a cross-claim against its co-defendant, to which the co-defendant has not responded (or even been specifically asked to respond), it may be disregarded for the purpose of the plaintiff's summary judgment motion against the two co-defendants. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 373 (Pon. 2019).

The defenses against an action on a judgment are limited. In an action on a judgment, the original cause of action is merged in the judgment, and, unless void, the judgment is conclusive, and no defense is available which was, or might have been, urged in defense of the original action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl,

22 FSM R. 365, 373 (Pon. 2019).

In an action on the judgment, the defendant cannot avail himself of defenses he might have interposed, or did interpose, in the first action. It is immaterial whether the defendant interposed the defense or failed to do so or even defaulted in the original action. Nor does the fact that the judgment was erroneous preclude the plaintiff from maintaining an action upon it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

In an action on the judgment, the defendant may interpose matters which have arisen since the rendition of the judgment and constitute defenses to its enforcement such as payment, release, accord and satisfaction, or the statute of limitations. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

Generally, the equitable defense of laches is only available to a defendant when the plaintiff has sought some form of equitable relief and is not available as a defense against actions at law. Because an action on a judgment is an action at law, the equitable defense of laches is not available as a matter of law. The same is true for an estoppel defense. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

The defenses of fraud, misrepresentation, and illegality are unavailable as defenses to an action on a judgment unless they are part of the recognized defenses – payment, release, accord and satisfaction, or the statute of limitations (the court also recognizes that a discharge in bankruptcy of a judgment debt would likely constitute a good defense as a release) – but fraud would be an available defense if there was fraud on the court in obtaining the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

An action on a judgment's main purpose is to obtain a new judgment, which will facilitate the ultimate goal of securing satisfaction of the original cause of action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374 (Pon. 2019).

A party has a right to maintain an action on a judgment when some advantage will be secured thereby. Often the advantage to be secured is to domesticate a judgment from another jurisdiction so that the other jurisdiction's judgment can be enforced domestically against the defendant or the defendant's property. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374-75 (Pon. 2019).

A judgment for the plaintiff awarding him a sum of money creates a debt in that amount in his favor. The plaintiff may maintain proceedings by way of execution for enforcement of the judgment, the plaintiff may also be able to maintain an action upon the judgment. Ordinarily no useful purpose is served by bringing an action in the same state upon the judgment instead of executing upon it, but if the statute of limitations period has almost run, the plaintiff can bring an action upon the judgment and obtain a new judgment upon which the limitations period will run again. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

While ordinarily no advantage is gained by bringing an action in the same court upon a judgment, if the statute of limitation period has almost run upon the judgment, the judgment creditor can start the limitation period anew by bringing an action upon the judgment and obtaining a new judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

The twenty-year statute of limitations would be an effective affirmative defense against an action on a February 11, 1999 judgment filed after February 11, 2019, but when the action on a judgment was filed January 8, 2019, it was begun within the statutory period, and is thus timely and may proceed to judgment. This is because once an action on a judgment has begun within the statutory period, the creditor's right to recover remains alive, even though the limitation period may subsequently expire. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

The institution of an action on a judgment within the statutory period tolls the statute although it is not followed by rendition of judgment, or even service of an answer, within such time. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl,

22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

The institution of an action on a judgment within the twenty-year statutory period set by 6 F.S.M.C. 802(1)(a) tolls that limitation statute even though the court has not yet rendered a judgment and even despite that a defendant did not file and serve her answer within the statutory time period. Because the timely filing of the action tolled the statutory time period, the statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 801, that creates a presumption of satisfaction after the twenty years has passed, does not come into play. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

The defenses of payment, release, and accord and satisfaction are defenses that are available against an action on a judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375-76 (Pon. 2019).

Although release and accord and satisfaction are both defenses that are available against an action on a judgment, when they were mentioned as affirmative defenses in a defendant's answer, but were neither raised nor mentioned in her opposition to the plaintiff's summary judgment motion, these defenses are deemed waived or abandoned. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 376 (Pon. 2019).

In an action on a judgment there is a rebuttable presumption that a judgment remains in full force and unsatisfied. The plaintiff does not bear the burden of proving that the judgment has not been satisfied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 376 (Pon. 2019).

– Action on a Judgment – Foreign

Comity is a recognition which one nation extends within its own territory to the legislative, executive, or judicial acts of another. It is not a rule of law, but one of practice, convenience, and expediency. Under principles of comity, courts will enforce foreign judgments, but not when the foreign court lacked jurisdiction, or where enforcement of the foreign judgment would violate a public policy, or where granting comity would result in prejudice to the forum's citizens. J.C. Tenorio Enterprises, Inc. v. Sado, 6 FSM R. 430, 431-32 (Pon. 1994).

An FSM court may reduce the amount of attorney's fees provided for under a foreign judgment, where that judgment is unenforceable as against public policy to the extent that the attorney fees in excess of 15% of debt are repugnant to fundamental notions of what is decent and just in the FSM. J.C. Tenorio Enterprises, Inc. v. Sado, 6 FSM R. 430, 432 (Pon. 1994).

Averment of a foreign judgment states a claim upon which relief could be granted. Allegations that the foreign judgment was obtained without notice are outside the complaint and cannot be considered in evaluating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Latte Motors, Inc. v. Hainrick, 7 FSM R. 190, 192 (Pon. 1995).

A certified copy of a judgment from a foreign court is admissible evidence as a properly authenticated public record of that jurisdiction. Joeten Motor Co. v. Jae Joong Hwang, 7 FSM R. 326, 327 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The FSM Supreme Court will not enforce the part of a Northern Marianas' judgment imposing a CNMI statutory treble damages penalty for writing bad checks when the FSM has no similar public policy. Recovery will be limited to the outstanding principal amount of the bad checks and the plaintiff's undisputed additional costs – bank charges and court costs. Coca-Cola Beverage Co. (Micronesia) v. Edmond, 8 FSM R. 388, 391 (Kos. 1998).

When the FSM Supreme Court's concern in inquiring into a Guam bankruptcy case was not to determine whether the principles of comity should be applied, but rather whether any order the court might issue would subject a party to liability for contempt in the other court because the party was required by two courts to obey contradictory orders and when that concern has been assuaged, the court will take no position on whether, and under what circumstances, it might recognize U.S. bankruptcy law or proceedings and whether or when comity would apply in such a case. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 366 (Chk. 2003).

Under principles of comity, the FSM Supreme Court will enforce foreign judgments, but not when the foreign court lacked jurisdiction, or where enforcement of the foreign judgment would violate a public policy, or where granting comity would result in prejudice to the forum's citizens. Northern Marianas Housing Corp. v. Finik, 12 FSM R. 441, 444 (Chk. 2004).

The FSM Supreme Court will not enforce a foreign judgment entered by a court that lacked personal jurisdiction over the defendant when it entered its judgment against her. Northern Marianas Housing Corp. v. Finik, 12 FSM R. 441, 446-47 (Chk. 2004).

Since the only prejudgment interest recognized so far in breach of contract cases is where the contract itself specifically provides for such a remedy, the part of a foreign judgment containing such prejudgment interest may thus be unenforceable in the FSM as against public policy. Northern Marianas Housing Corp. v. Finik, 12 FSM R. 441, 447 (Chk. 2004).

Under principles of comity, courts will enforce foreign judgments, but not when the foreign court lacked jurisdiction, or where enforcement of the foreign judgment would violate a public policy, or where granting comity would result in prejudice to the forum's citizens. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 162 (App. 2013).

A party has a right to maintain an action on a judgment when some advantage will be secured thereby. Often the advantage to be secured is to domesticate a judgment from another jurisdiction so that the other jurisdiction's judgment can be enforced domestically against the defendant or the defendant's property. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 374-75 (Pon. 2019).

– Alter or Amend Judgment

Because until a final judgment has been entered a trial court has plenary power over its interlocutory orders, it may, without regard to the restrictive time limits in Rule 59, alter, amend, or modify such orders any time prior to the entry of judgment. Youngstrom v. Phillip, 8 FSM R. 198, 201 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

A court may alter or amend a judgment under Rule 59 on any of four grounds: 1) to correct a manifest error of law or fact upon which the judgment is based; 2) the court is presented with newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence; 3) to prevent a manifest injustice; or 4) there is an intervening change in the controlling law. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 100 (Pon. 1999).

A timely motion to alter or amend judgment is one served not later than 10 days after entry of the judgment. O'Sonis v. Bank of Guam, 9 FSM R. 356, 359 (App. 2000).

A post-judgment motion for supplemental attorney's fees is not a motion to alter or amend judgment under FSM Civil Procedure Rule 59(e), and does not extend the time for the filing of the notice of appeal under Appellate Procedure Rule 4(a)(4). O'Sonis v. Bank of Guam, 9 FSM R. 356, 359 (App. 2000).

A motion that a judgment be amended to include a statement of the statutory interest and that its title be corrected to read "judgment" instead of "proposed order," is not one to amend, but rather more properly one to correct a judgment. As such Rule 60 applies, not Rule 59. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 315 (Chk. 2001).

The ten day time limit for a motion to alter or amend a judgment does not apply to an order which adjudicates fewer than all the claims or the rights and liabilities of fewer than all the parties because that order does not terminate the action as to any of the claims or parties, and is subject to revision at any time before the entry of judgment. The appropriate means by which to raise concerns about such an order is not by a Rule 59 motion to alter or amend judgment, but by a Rule 54 motion for reconsideration. A motion for reconsideration can be brought any time before entry of judgment, and is not subject to the 10 day limit. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 466, 470 (Pon. 2001).

A Rule 59 motion must be brought within ten days of entry of judgment and can either be for a new trial or to alter or amend the judgment. Farata v. Punzalan, 11 FSM R. 175, 177 (Chk. 2002).

A motion to alter or amend the judgment will be denied when it does not state what the judgment should be altered to or amended to read, but only states the movant's dissatisfaction with its current form and asks that the judgment be opened. Farata v. Punzalan, 11 FSM R. 175, 178 (Chk. 2002).

Although the trial court, absent a remand, lacks jurisdiction to vacate or alter its judgment pending appeal, the trial court retains the power throughout the pendency of the appeal to simply preserve the status quo by granting a stay of the judgment. Konman v. Esa, 11 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The defendants have not presented adequate grounds to support their motion to alter judgment or for a new trial when there has been no manifest error of law or fact made by the court in its memorandum and judgment and when there has been no newly discovered evidence presented by the defendants in support of their motion. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 249, 251 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the court's findings have not been disputed and have not been amended, a motion to reconsider and modify an order will be denied. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 14 FSM R. 91, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A party may seek the addition of supplemental findings to a judgment within ten days of the judgment being entered. Such action should only be taken by the judge who presided over the proceedings and who entered the judgment and while the facts underlying the proceedings are fresh within the presiding judge's mind. A motion for amended judgment or supplemental findings under Rule 52(b), nearly two decades after entry of judgment and with a new presiding judge, is untimely and inappropriate. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 539 (Pon. 2008).

A letter that does not certify that it has been served upon the plaintiff as required and that does not certify that the defendant sought the plaintiff's acquiescence, as required, is procedurally deficient because the court will treat the letter as a motion for amended judgment and/or supplemental findings. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 540 (Pon. 2008).

A motion to reconsider that was filed 22 days after the judgment had been entered, cannot be a Rule 54(b) motion to reconsider since those motions must be made before entry of judgment, or a Rule 59(e) motion to alter or amend judgment since a Rule 59(e) motion must "be served not later than 10 days after entry of the judgment." It can only be a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 588 (App. 2008).

A timely-filed motion to reconsider an order of dismissal is considered a Rule 59(e) motion to alter or amend a judgment. Alanso v. Pridgen, 15 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2008).

The timely filing of a motion to alter or amend judgment destroys a previously filed notice of appeal and even a subsequent notice of appeal if that notice is filed while the motion to alter or amend is still pending. Alanso v. Pridgen, 15 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2008).

An order of dismissal is not a final decision if a timely motion under Rule 59 has been made and not disposed of, since the case lacks finality. For that reason, the subsequent filing of a notice of appeal is a nullity and does not deprive the trial court of power to rule on the motion. Alanso v. Pridgen, 15 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2008).

A motion to reconsider made more than ten days after entry of judgment can only be considered a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 120 n.1 (App. 2008).

A motion to reconsider or vacate a judgment filed within ten days of the judgment is a Rule 59 motion to alter or amend judgment and a motion filed after ten days is a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 138 n.3 (Pon. 2008).

A Rule 52(b) motion is one that asks the court to amend the findings of fact that the court has already made as required by Rule 52(a). The Rule 52(b) term "motion for judgment," when referring to a motion made after the start of trial, refers to a Rule 41(b) motion, not to a motion made after closing arguments. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 17 FSM R. 247, 250 (Yap 2010).

A Rule 52(b) motion is timely – that is, is made at a time permitted by the rule – when it is made after the court has indicated the action it would take but has not yet entered judgment, but when the court has neither issued its written findings of fact nor indicated what those findings will be, such a motion is premature since the court's findings, when issued, may be favorable and no motion would be needed. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 17 FSM R. 247, 250 (Yap 2010).

A motion for judgment as a matter of law that is made too late to be cognizable under Rule 41(b) and that is made too early to be cognizable under Rule 52(b), will, on the opposing party's motion, be stricken, but may be renewed, if need be, after the court has entered its findings. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 17 FSM R. 247, 251 (Yap 2010).

The grounds on which a court may grant a new trial or alter or amend the judgment is either when the court has made a manifest error of law or fact, or for newly discovered evidence. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 199, 201 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A litigant may, under Rule 59(e), move for reconsideration of an order granting summary judgment or move to alter or amend the judgment derived from that order and the court has a responsibility to hear that motion. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 199, 201 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Summary judgment will ordinarily not be altered or vacated on the basis of supplemental exhibits or affidavits filed after summary judgment is granted, particularly when the party seeking to alter or amend the judgment has made absolutely no showing that the additional evidence offered could not have been timely submitted in the exercise of reasonable diligence. Motions for reconsideration cannot in any case be employed as a vehicle to introduce new evidence that could have been adduced during pendency of the summary judgment motion. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 199, 201 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A motion to alter or amend judgment will be denied when no valid reason was given why the movant could not have produced, as part of his summary judgment motion or his opposition to his opponent's summary judgment motion, the evidence now relied on to seek reconsideration because it was all available to him before the cross motions for summary judgment were filed and before those motions were heard. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 199, 202 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A litigant may not sit idly by during the course of litigation and then seek to present additional defenses in the event of an adverse outcome. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 199, 202 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Summary judgment will not be altered on the basis of a movant's supplemental exhibits and affidavits since that additional evidence could have been timely submitted if he had exercised due diligence. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 199, 202 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The court must decline to amend its findings when the proposed finding would require speculation about future events. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 282 (Pon. 2014).

The trial court may, in an effort to assist the appellate division in its review of the matter, amend its findings even though the amendments requested by the defendants did not form the basis for the court's conclusions of law. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 282 (Pon. 2014).

One of the grounds for amending a judgment under FSM Civil Rule 59(e) is to prevent a manifest injustice. This ground is a catch-all basis for relief, and is usually coupled with another ground. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 282 (Pon. 2014).

To alter or amend a judgment to prevent a manifest injustice, it is not enough for the defendants to show that the court's reasoned decision would result in hardship; rather, a successful Rule 59(e) motion will present a flaw in the fact finding or decision making process, and demonstrate that failure to correct the flaw would lead to manifest injustice. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 282 (Pon. 2014).

A motion to alter, or amend, under FSM Civil Rule 59(e), or reconsideration of a mistake through inadvertence under FSM Civil Rule 60(b) are post-judgment motions that are appropriately filed in the trial division, not the appellate division, and, under the final judgment rule, these post-judgment motions prohibit filing an appeal until they have been either granted or denied. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 416, 418 (App. 2014).

A timely filed motion to reconsider a final order is considered an FSM Civil Rule 59(e) motion to alter or amend a judgment. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 421, 422 (Pon. 2014).

The court may alter or amend a final order under Rule 59(e) on any of the following four grounds: 1) to correct a manifest error of law or fact upon which the judgment is based; 2) the court is presented with newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence; 3) to prevent a manifest injustice; or 4) there is an intervening change in controlling law. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 421, 422 (Pon. 2014).

A Rule 59(e) motion may not be used to relitigate old matters, and arguments that could have been raised before may not be raised for the first time in a motion for reconsideration. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 421, 423 (Pon. 2014).

Since the plaintiffs' argument that the delay in the imposition of sanctions is evidence of the reasonableness of their complaint is an extension of their argument of a meritorious complaint, it will be considered on a motion for reconsideration, but when the plaintiffs' argument that the delay in imposing sanctions prejudiced them is clearly a new argument that could and should have been raised in their original opposition, this latter timeliness argument is a new issue that the court must decline to consider. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 421, 424 (Pon. 2014).

The defendants do not present adequate grounds to support a motion to alter judgment or a motion for a new trial when there has been no manifest error of law or fact made by the court in its memorandum and judgment and when there has been no newly discovered evidence presented by the defendants in support of their motion. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM), Inc. v. Gallen, 20 FSM R. 3, 6 (Pon. 2015).

The court may alter or amend a judgment under Rule 59(e) on any of four grounds: 1) to correct a manifest error of law or fact upon which the judgment is based; 2) the court is presented with newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence; 3) to prevent a manifest injustice; or 4) there is an intervening change in controlling law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 315, 317 (Pon. 2016).

A Rule 59(e) motion may not be used to relitigate old matters. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 315, 317-18 (Pon. 2016).

A trial court has jurisdiction to consider and deny a Rule 59(e) motion after an appeal has been filed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 315, 318 (Pon. 2016).

When the movants have failed to satisfy any of the four grounds for altering or amending a judgment, a reconsideration of the court's order transferring title is unwarranted and the motion for reconsideration of that order will be denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 315, 319 (Pon. 2016).

Regardless of whether the issued writ of habeas corpus is a final order, the court may entertain FSM Civil Rule 59 and 60 motions while the matter is subject to an appeal and, if it determines such motion(s) shall prevail, it must so indicate in the record for the appellate court's consideration. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 386 (Pon. 2019).

– Collateral Attack

In a case in which the High Court of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands did not transfer the case to the FSM Supreme Court or to the Truk State Court because it failed to act in conformity with the purpose of Secretarial Order No. 3039 which was to provide maximum permissible self government to the newly self-governing entities, and because the High Court's determination that the case was in active trial and therefore need not be transferred was incorrect, the High Court is not deprived of jurisdiction where the presently objecting party failed to make any objection before the High Court and where the judgment by the High Court is being collaterally attacked. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 3 FSM R. 445, 451-52 (Truk 1988).

In some cases failure to join an indispensable party may subject a judgment to collateral attack, but failure to join a necessary party will not. A necessary party is one who has an identifiable interest in the action and should normally be made a party to the lawsuit, but whose interests are separable from the rest of the parties or whose presence cannot be obtained; whereas an indispensable party is one to whom any judgment, if effective, would necessarily affect his interest, or would, if his interest is eliminated, constitute unreasonable, inequitable, or impractical relief. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 517 (Pon. 1994).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and subject to direct or collateral attack. Pastor v. Ngusun, 11 FSM R. 281, 285 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

If the court enters a default judgment different in kind from or exceeds in amount the relief that was prayed for in the demand for judgment, such a default judgment would be void and subject to collateral attack. Serious due process questions would be raised. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. 2005).

It is doubtful whether a court judgment in an election contest case can be collaterally attacked since election contests are purely statutory, and the courts have no inherent power to determine election contests. The determination of election contests is a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Thus, the jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests. An election contest must follow the path set out for it in the statute and no other. Puchonong v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 67, 69 (Chk. 2006).

A judgment (or final order) entered against a person without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time, and a court that lacks personal jurisdiction over a person cannot enter a valid judgment against that person. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The failure to join an indispensable party may subject a judgment to collateral attack. A judgment (or final order) entered against a person without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time, and a court that lacks personal jurisdiction over a person cannot enter a valid judgment against that person. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the plaintiff was an interested party and never received notice or an opportunity to be heard, he could have pursued his claim by filing an appeal of the issuance of title because without notice, his time to file an appeal is extended beyond the statutory sixty-day time limit. The Kosrae State Court favors this approach when Land Commission or Land Court actions are at issue because an appeal ensures that the records needed to make a fair determination are before the court and because this approach promotes finality in decisions on land ownership by encouraging full participation of all interested parties at Land Court proceedings instead of allowing later, collateral attacks on their decisions. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

As the purpose of probate is not to determine issues of ownership, probate petitioners should resolve issues regarding land ownership, if any, before they proceed with probate. Otherwise, the probate proceeding may be subject to collateral attack from those who may claim an interest in the property and who were not given notice or made a party to this proceeding. In re Land Noota, Neppi, 15 FSM R. 518, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A judgment or final order entered against a person without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A 1930s ¥400 purchase price for over 600,000 square meters of land on Kosrae does not make the whole transaction very questionable and thus the Trust Territory High Court judgment confirming it suspect when ¥400 would have equaled $200 in the 1930s and $200 was a sizeable sum then. The "sale" amount cannot be used to undermine the Trust Territory High Court judgment. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 302 (App. 2014).

As recognized by general law and as provided for in Compact of Free Association § 176, Trust Territory judgments that are final, although accorded res judicata status, can be subject to collateral attack or to relief from judgment. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 304 (App. 2014).

When a judgment has been entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard, it is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. A judgment cannot be collaterally attacked merely because it is wrong. It can only be attacked on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction or due process violations that make the judgment void. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 304 (App. 2014).

Parties can, as a defense to the application of res judicata, collaterally attack a Trust Territory High Court judgment and should be permitted the opportunity to try to do so. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 305 (App. 2014).

Trust Territory High Court judgments should be afforded res judicata status but, like any judgment, those judgments may be subject to collateral attack on due process grounds. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 305 (App. 2014).

Kosrae Civil Procedure Rule 60(b) does not limit the power of the court to entertain an independent action. A party collaterally attacking a judgment has the burden to establish its prerequisites. The five essential elements that an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment must satisfy are: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident, or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. If any one of the elements is missing the court cannot take equitable jurisdiction of the case. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour,

19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and subject to direct or collateral attack. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

An argument that the appellants are bound by a Trust Territory High Court judgment but cannot attack that judgment because they were not parties to that case is nonsense and must be rejected. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 364, 367 (App. 2014).

It is well established, that when a judgment has been entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard, it is void and subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 121 (App. 2017).

A collateral attack is not an opportunity to appeal or relitigate the matter. Merely leveling a claim of fraud, without connecting up such an allegation in terms of propounding sufficient evidence, does not satisfy the requisite burden of proof for a collateral attack of a Trust Territory judgment and fails to satisfy the five-prong test required to pierce a judgment via a collateral attack. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 122 (App. 2017).

– Finality of

The basic tenets of due process of law are notice and an opportunity to be heard. As applied to judgments, this means that a judgment may not be rendered in violation of these constitutional limitations and guaranties. An elementary and fundamental requirement of due process in any proceeding which is to be accorded finality is notice reasonably calculated to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action, which is itself a corollary to another requisite of due process, the right to be heard. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 96-97 (App. 2001).

One of the basic tenets of our system of jurisprudence is that of finality of judgments. The principle of finality is essential to ensure consistency and certainty in the law. This salutary principle is founded upon the generally recognized public policy that there must be some end to litigation. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

There is a sharp conflict about whether a judgment from which an appeal is pending has the finality requisite for the application of the res judicata doctrine. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 71 (App. 2016).

– Final Judgment

A final judgment that precisely defines a disputed boundary cannot be entered until the Land Commission completes the survey partitioning the land. Once the boundary is determined, the defendant may then meaningfully assess his situation for purposes of considering any appeal. Therefore a motion to stay the survey's completion pending appeal will be denied. Youngstrom v. Phillip, 9 FSM R. 103, 106 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the court approves a stipulation that does not adjudicate all the claims or the rights and liabilities of all the parties, the stipulation does not constitute a final judgment. Bank of the FSM v. Hebel, 10 FSM R. 279, 287 (Pon. 2001).

Final judgments, as a rule, generally bind only the parties to the case and all those in privity with them. If a judgment is final, then the doctrine of res judicata applies, and that doctrine bars any further litigation of the same issues between the same parties or anyone claiming under those parties. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 546 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

An order that does not adjudicate all claims and the rights and liabilities of all parties is not a judgment or an order from which a judgment could be derived. Nor is such an order a partial final judgment when it does not have an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and an express direction for entry of judgment, both of which are required for the entry of a partial final judgment. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An order that did not adjudicate any of the claims against the defendants or adjudicate any of the defendants' defenses and did not dispose of or dismiss either the case or the complaint, but only disposed of and dismissed the plaintiffs' and both sets of intervenors' claims against each other was therefore not a judgment because all it did was to combine both sets of intervenors and the plaintiffs together as joint plaintiffs against the two defendants. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 40-41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court may correct any errors in judgments or orders resulting from oversight or omission prior to final judgment, which under Rule 54 does not occur until the rights and duties of all parties have been finally determined. Konman v. Adobad, 11 FSM R. 34, 35 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Under Rule 58, every judgment must be set forth in a separate document, and becomes effective only when docketed by the clerk under Rule 79(a). While an order may be final in some circumstances without Rule 58 compliance, the better course, and the one that the court endeavors to follow, is for the trial court to avoid any ambiguity on the finality point by following Rule 58. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. George, 11 FSM R. 86, 87 (Kos. 2002).

When summary judgment is granted for a portion of the plaintiff's claim and when the court finds pursuant to Rule 54(b) that as to this portion of the claim there is no just reason for delay, the court will expressly direct entry of final judgment for that amount. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. George, 11 FSM R. 86, 88 (Kos. 2002).

A cause of action that alleges that the plaintiffs' customary and traditional rights to use an island might be better described as intentional interference with a customary and traditional property right than trespass. That the plaintiffs referred to it as a trespass should not, in itself, be an obstacle to them prevailing on this point if the evidence warrants, because except for judgments rendered by default, every final judgment shall grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in his pleadings. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Judgment can be entered on less than all claims in a case if the court makes an express determination that there is no just cause for delay and expressly directs entry of judgment. Both elements must be present to give a partial adjudication final judgment status. When either element is absent, even if only because of oversight or a failure to appreciate that the case is one that is within Rule 54(b), the partial adjudication does not carry final judgment status. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 622, 628 (App. 2003).

A partial adjudication in a consolidated case generally falls within Rule 54(b). Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 622, 628 (App. 2003).

When the provisions of the trial court's consolidation order and later order assigning one docket number indicated that the cases were consolidated for all purposes including trial, and when the trial court dismissed the claims between certain parties but did not make the required findings under Rule 54(b), that dismissal was not a final judgment and thus the plaintiff in one of the consolidated actions remained a party to the consolidated action for purposes of later appeal. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 622, 629 (App. 2003).

A final judgment will issue when the court expressly determines that there is no just cause for delay and hereby directs that judgment be entered. Dereas v. Eas, 12 FSM R. 629, 633 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The general rule is that, in the absence of express authorization, interest is to be computed on a simple basis rather than compounded. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 68, 71 (Chk. 2004).

When a judgment on less than all claims in the pleadings is entered upon an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and upon an express direction for entry of judgment, that judgment is a final adjudication with regard to the claims disposed of by the judgment. A second judgment will issue later at the appropriate time that addresses the remaining claim. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Jonas, 13 FSM R. 171, 173 (Kos. 2005).

Civil Rule 54(c)'s clear command is that a default judgment cannot be different in kind from or exceed in amount that prayed for in the demand for judgment. This is in contrast to a case decided on the merits where every final judgment will grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 277-78 (Chk. 2005).

If a complaint shows that the plaintiff is entitled to any relief which the court can grant, regardless of whether the complaint asks for the proper relief, the complaint is sufficient, and since, (except as to a party against whom a judgment is entered by default), every final judgment must grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings, the trial court should consider whether to find liability and award damages on a cause of action not specifically named in the complaint but for which evidence was presented at trial. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 26 (App. 2006).

The court in every final judgment shall grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

When, although the issue of continued monitoring of the marine environment remains unresolved and the attorney fees and costs award remains to be determined, there is no just cause for delay, and the clerk shall accordingly enter an appropriate judgment forthwith. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 422 (Yap 2006).

A grant of partial summary judgment is not a final judgment when the court did not expressly determine that there was no just reason for delay and did not then expressly direct the entry of a judgment, both of which are required for the entry of a partial final judgment. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Final judgments, as a rule, generally bind only the parties to the case and all those in privity with them. If a judgment is final, then the doctrine of res judicata applies, and that doctrine bars any further litigation of the same issues between the same parties or anyone claiming under those parties. Nakamura v. Chuuk, 15 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since a previously-awarded $770 discovery sanction will be incorporated into the final judgment as a matter of course, summary judgment for this amount is redundant, and will accordingly be denied. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 429, 431 (Pon. 2007).

Any final judgment, when it is not entered by default, must grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 148 (Chk. 2008).

A denial of a request for reconsideration does not mean that a partial adjudication order is not subject to revision at any time. Even though the trial court may be very unlikely to revise it, the order remains legally capable of being revised (under the appropriate circumstances) any time before the trial court enters a final judgment. Smith v. Nimea, 16 FSM R. 346, 348 (App. 2009).

A court can enter judgment on less than all of the claims in a case only if the court makes both an express determination that there is no just cause for delay and an express direction for entry of judgment. Both elements must be present to give a partial adjudication final judgment status. When either element is absent, even if only because of oversight or a failure to appreciate that the case is one that is within Rule 54(b), the partial adjudication does not carry final judgment status. Smith v. Nimea, 16 FSM R. 346, 348-49 (App. 2009).

When a trial court dismisses less than all of the claims but does not expressly make the required findings under Rule 54(b), that dismissal is not a final decision. When the trial court did not expressly determine that there was no just cause for delay and did not expressly direct the entry of judgment, the appeal is not from a final decision since the trial court must do both for a partial adjudication to be deemed a final decision capable of being appealed. Smith v. Nimea, 16 FSM R. 346, 349 (App. 2009).

Final judgments may be enforced by contempt proceedings provided that enforcement at such time is required to prevent irreparable injury or multiple damage to the interests of the winning party and is otherwise in the interests of justice. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 17 FSM R. 307, 310 (Pon. 2010).

A trial court can enter a final judgment on less than all claims in a case only if the trial court makes an express determination that there is no just cause for delay and if it then also expressly directs entry of judgment. Both elements must be present to give a partial adjudication final judgment status. When either element is absent, even if only because of oversight or a failure to appreciate that the case is one that is within Rule 54(b), the partial adjudication does not carry final judgment status. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 17 FSM R. 356, 358 (App. 2011).

When, even though the trial court may have expressly directed entry of a judgment, it never made an express determination that there was no just cause for delay, the judgment is not an appealable final judgment since in the absence of such determination and direction, any order or other form of decision, however designated, which adjudicates fewer than all the claims or the rights and liabilities of fewer than all the parties will not terminate the action as to any of the claims or parties, and the order or other form of decision is subject to revision at any time before the entry of judgment adjudicating all the claims and all the parties' rights and liabilities. Thus, although a filing designated as a "Judgment" was entered, it was, under Rule 54(b), not a final decision and therefore not appealable. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 17 FSM R. 356, 358-59 (App. 2011).

A contention that a trial court could not make as a ground for relief a claim that was not in the plaintiff's complaint is incorrect because, except as to a party against whom a judgment is entered by default, every final judgment must grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 373 n.5 (App. 2011).

While the res judicata doctrine formally addresses situations involving prior and subsequent lawsuits, its reasoning and purpose may apply in a lawsuit that has already been adjudged since under the doctrine of merger, all interlocutory orders merge into the final judgment. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 373 (App. 2012).

When a final judgment is entered, temporary orders cease to be valid, subsisting orders. In general, a trial court's temporary orders issued during the pendency of a proceeding are superseded by the trial court's final order. Temporary orders are always subject to revision or repeal by the final judgment, even if not explicitly mentioned in that judgment. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 373-74 (App. 2012).

Interlocutory orders do not survive, but merge in, the final judgment. They are not accorded res judicata effect or final judgment status since interlocutory orders made in the course of an action or proceeding are not binding on the trial court when fashioning the controversy's final adjudication. This should be clear from the operation of FSM Civil Procedure Rule 54(b). Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 374 (App. 2012).

A motion to enforce a trial court's previous interlocutory order must be denied when it was not included in the final judgment or explicitly made a separate final judgment under Civil Rule 54(b). Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 374 (App. 2012).

An appellate opinion that merely dismissed the appeal for the lack of jurisdiction could not, and did not, convert any interlocutory order into an enforceable final order. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 374 (App. 2012).

When a May 1991 interlocutory order and a March 1991 preliminary injunction were neither included in the 1995 final judgment nor made into a separate final judgment, they were overruled, superseded, or made irrelevant by the 1995 amended judgment dissolving the injunction even though the May 17, 1991 order was not explicitly mentioned in the judgment. They ceased to be valid orders. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 375 (App. 2012).

Final judgments, as a rule, generally bind only the parties to the case and all those in privity with them. If a judgment is final, then the doctrine of res judicata applies, and that doctrine bars any further litigation of the same issues between the same parties or anyone claiming under those parties. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 302 (App. 2014).

A Kosrae State Court order cannot be a partial final judgment when the court failed to include the express determination required by Kosrae Civil Procedure Rule 54(b) "that there is no just reason for delay" and the "express direction for the entry of judgment" which would allow the entry of a partial final judgment. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 337-38 (App. 2014).

When the plaintiffs made two claims in their complaint – trespass and due process violation – and sought damages for both, but the trial court did not calculate any damages, neither claim has been fully adjudicated and therefore neither claim could be granted partial final judgment status under Rule 54(b). Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 338 (App. 2014).

Since a permanent injunction is imposed only as part of a final judgment and since there is no final judgment in the absence of either a final judgment including the ruling on damages or an order containing express language that there is no just cause for delay and directing the clerk to enter a final judgment, the permanent injunction must be vacated, which would leave the earlier preliminary injunction in place. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 338 (App. 2014).

A dismissal with prejudice constitutes a judgment on the merits. Saito v. Siro, 19 FSM R. 650, 654 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

When the movants have failed to cite any reasons for the elongated delay in filing their motion for relief from judgment, much less extraordinary circumstances that would warrant having their Rule 60(b)(4) motion supersede the doctrine of res judicata, prejudice would invariably inure to the judgment creditor, in light of its justified reliance on the relevant December 28, 2007 default judgment's finality. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509-10 (App. 2016).

When an appeal is pending, the underlying decision is generally not considered final for the purposes of claim preclusion. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 71 (App. 2016).

When, in a partial summary judgment, the court did not make an express determination that there is no just reason for delay and direct the entry of a judgment, that order is subject to revision at any time before the entry of judgment adjudicating all the claims and the rights and liabilities of the parties and cannot be a final judgment. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 474 (Chk. 2018).

Final judgments, as a rule, generally bind only the parties to the case and all those in privity with them, and, when a judgment is final, res judicata then applies. That doctrine bars any further litigation of the same issues between the same parties or anyone claiming under those parties. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 477, 487 (Pon. 2018).

Although a default judgment is not an adjudication on a claim's merits, it is a final judgment with res judicata and claim preclusion effect. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 554-55 (App. 2018).

A partial adjudication (one on less than all of the claims and parties) is not a final (and appealable) order unless the court, after expressly determining that there is no just reason for delay, expressly directs the entry of a final judgment. When either element is absent, even if only because of oversight or a failure to appreciate that the case is one that is within Rule 54(b), the partial adjudication does not carry final judgment status. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 180-81 (Pon. 2019).

When both Rule 54(b) elements are absent from a partial adjudication because the court did not make any determination that there was no just reason for delay and did not direct the clerk to enter a final judgment on those claims, the order is subject to revision at any time before the entry of judgment adjudicating all the claims and the rights and liabilities of all the parties, should circumstances ever arise that would warrant its revision. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 181 (Pon. 2019).

When a party's production of its entire file, including correspondence, should satisfy the opposing six of the parties' ten requests for production, the opposing parties' motion to compel, to the extent Salomons' counsel said it was needed, has thus already been granted and production ordered. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 185 (Pon. 2019).

– Interest on

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. Bank of Guam v. Nukuto, 6 FSM R. 615, 616 (Chk. 1994).

Interest on unpaid social security taxes is assessed at 12% from date due until paid even if part of a court judgment and even though court judgments normally bear a 9% interest rate. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 370 (Yap 1996).

All judgments, by statute, accrue nine percent simple interest a year from date of entry of judgment until satisfied. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 670 (App. 1996).

When a second action and judgment is necessary to enforce and satisfy an earlier judgment, the statutory interest on judgments will be computed from the date of entry of the original judgment. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 670 (App. 1996).

As a general rule interest ceases to accrue on a judgment when the money is paid into a court of competent jurisdiction pursuant to the court's order, unless a statute provides otherwise. If a part of the principal is paid, then the statutory interest stops on that part. Partial payments on a judgment are first to be applied to the accrued interest and then to reduction of the principal. The subsequent statutory interest is computed only on the remaining principal. Payments into court accrue interest for the benefit of the ultimate recipient as earned in the court's depository institution. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 670-71 (App. 1996).

Interest on a judgment is payable under 6 F.S.M.C. 1401 at nine percent a year. 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), which provides for an award of attorney's fees in a civil rights action, should be construed to permit interest on an unpaid fee award. Davis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 338, 341 n.2 (Chk. 1998).

The FSM does not have a statute which prescribes when a plaintiff may obtain prejudgment interest, but prejudgment interest has been awarded in the FSM. Coca-Cola Beverage Co. (Micronesia) v. Edmond, 8 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. 1998).

Generally, interest is usually included as an element of damages as a matter of right when a debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it. The complaining party has been deprived of funds to which he was entitled by virtue of the contract, the defaulting party knew the exact amount and terms of the debt, and the goal of compensation requires that the complainant be compensated for the loss of use of those funds. This compensation is made in the form of interest. In the absence of statute, an award of prejudgment interest is in the discretion of the court. Coca-Cola Beverage Co. (Micronesia) v. Edmond, 8 FSM R. 388, 392-93 (Kos. 1998).

Pre-judgment interest at the statutory, judgment rate of 9% is appropriate when the defendant wrote the insufficient funds checks to plaintiff because the defendant knew precisely the amount to which he was obligating himself, and the effective date of that commitment. Coca-Cola Beverage Co. (Micronesia) v. Edmond, 8 FSM R. 388, 393 (Kos. 1998).

When the amount awarded for prejudgment interest is more than the amount designated as usurious, it is excessive and must be reduced. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Attorney fee awards that are part of money judgments are entitled to bear interest at the judgment rate until satisfied. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 9 FSM R. 569, 570 (Chk. 2000).

Unsatisfied judgments accrue nine percent simple interest from date of entry because the statute does not authorize compounding. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 9 FSM R. 569, 570 (Chk. 2000).

The generally recognized rule is that interest should not bear interest, but compound interest may be awarded if authorized by statute. When the statute reads "nine percent a year" it is not an express authorization to compound interest annually, but is instead, without more, merely a statement of the rate of simple interest. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 9 FSM R. 569, 570 (Chk. 2000).

Generally, pre-judgment interest is only included as an element of damages as a matter of right when a debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it. This occurs when a party has been deprived of funds to which he was entitled by virtue of the contract, and the defaulting party knew the exact amount and terms of the debt. In those types of cases, the goal of compensation requires that the complaining party be compensated for the loss of use of those funds. This compensation is made in the form of interest. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

In the absence of a statute, an award of prejudgment interest is in the court's discretion. If pre-judgment interest is awarded, the statutory, post-judgment interest rate of 9% per annum is appropriate. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Pre-judgment interest is not appropriate and a claim for it will be denied when there was no agreement involving a promise to pay money, when the plaintiff was not deprived of funds that he was entitled to because there was no contract made between the parties to pay money, and when the plaintiff was awarded damages based upon the equitable doctrine of promissory estoppel for the plaintiff's expenditures made in reliance on a promise. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 197 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Payments on judgments are credited first to accrued interest, and then to principal. Interest accrues as simple interest. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 52 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

If money on deposit with the court is eventually paid out in partial satisfaction of a judgment, the statutory interest, at least on the sum paid into court, stops accruing on the date the money was paid into court and the only interest the judgment creditor would be entitled to on that money would be the amount it earned while on deposit with the court. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 514, 517 (Chk. 2003).

As a general rule, interest on a judgment ceases to accrue when money is paid into a court of competent jurisdiction pursuant to the court's order. If a part of the principal is paid, then the statutory interest stops on that part. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 514, 517 (Chk. 2003).

If money currently deposited with the court ultimately goes toward satisfaction of a judgment, then the statutory interest on whatever part of it that was attributable to the principal when paid into court will have ceased accruing on the date it was paid into court. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 514, 517 (Chk. 2003).

Partial payments on a judgment are first to be applied to the accrued interest and then to reduction of the principal. The subsequent statutory interest is computed only on the remaining principal. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 514, 517 n.1 (Chk. 2003).

As a general rule, interest on a judgment ceases to accrue when money is paid into a court of competent jurisdiction pursuant to the court's order. If a part of the principal is paid, then the statutory interest stops on that part. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 514, 517 (Chk. 2003).

The deposited money's ultimate recipient is entitled to the interest the money earned while deposited with the court. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 514, 517 (Chk. 2003).

In calculating the amounts due on judgments, the 9% statutory interest ceases to accrue at the point the judgment-debtor pays the money credited to the principal into court and after that time the only interest a judgment-creditor is entitled to is that paid by the court's depository institution on the deposited money. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 534 (Chk. 2003).

The only interest remitted to a judgment-creditor other than that earned before the money was deposited with the court will be whatever amount the court's depository institution has paid on the deposited money. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 71 (Chk. 2003).

A plaintiff is only entitled to a judgment which represents the amount of money he lent to the defendants and the $100,000 in interest he seeks cannot be awarded when it is the product of an unlawful and usurious interest rate. Walter v. Damai, 12 FSM R. 648, 649 (Pon. 2004).

Interest on unpaid social security taxes continues to accrue at 12% until paid, even though a judgment normally bears interest at 9%. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Lelu Town, 13 FSM R. 60, 62 (Kos. 2004).

Nine percent a year is the legal or statutory interest rate on judgments. Such interest is only simple interest and is not compounded. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 68, 71 (Chk. 2004).

A judgment will accrue 9% interest thereon from the date the clerk enters judgment. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227-28 (Chk. 2006).

In those few cases in which the court has awarded prejudgment interest when it was not provided for by contract or statute, the court has always awarded the legal interest rate – 9% simple interest. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420-21 (Yap 2006).

All money judgments bear nine percent interest. As part of the judgment, taxable costs bear that same interest imposed by statute and attorney's fee sanctions are a form of "costs" which will bear interest after judgment has been entered. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 475 (Pon. 2006).

Since, if costs are allowed without express mention in the judgment, the date of the judgment starts the accrual of interest on the costs due, therefore earlier awarded Rule 37 attorney fee sanctions would bear interest from the date the judgment was entered because failing to allow attorneys' fees awards to bear interest would give parties against whom such awards have been entered an artificial and undesirable incentive to appeal or otherwise delay payment. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 476 (Pon. 2006).

If the money is paid into court, interest ceases to accrue on a judgment, and if only a part of the principal is paid, then the statutory interest stops on that part. Partial payments on a judgment are first to be applied to the accrued interest and then to reduction of the principal. The subsequent statutory interest is computed only on the remaining principal. Payments into court accrue interest for the benefit of the ultimate recipient as earned in the court's depository institution. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 501, 504 (Yap 2006).

A court has the discretion to award pre-judgment interest, but it is not a matter of right unless the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when payment is due. The purpose of awarding interest is to compensate the complaining party for losing use of the funds. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 328 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

If a money judgment in a civil case is affirmed, whatever interest is allowed by law will be payable from the date the judgment was entered in the court appealed from, but if a judgment is modified or reversed with a direction that a judgment for money be entered in the court appealed from, the mandate must contain instructions with respect to allowance of interest. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 523 (Pon. 2008).

A prevailing party should not be deprived of statutory interest accrued on a judgment simply because further court proceedings become necessary to collect that judgment. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 523 (Pon. 2008).

The FSM Supreme Court is reticent to issue an inequitable decision denying post-judgment interest that would punish the prevailing party and possibly encourage losing parties to instigate post-judgment litigation for the purpose of lessening its eventual financial liability, a particularly relevant concern in a case involving a substantial award with the potential to accrue substantial interest. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 525 (Pon. 2008).

A judgment should not earn interest if it 1) is not supported by applicable law, 2) needs further factual/evidentiary findings for its support, and/or 3) is ultimately reversed as to the underlying finding of liability. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 527 (Pon. 2008).

The equitable purpose of post-judgment interest is to compensate the successful plaintiff for being deprived of the compensation for the loss from the time between the ascertainment of the damage and the payment by the defendant. A judgment lacking a sufficient legal or evidentiary basis or requiring further factual development should not accrue interest. A legally sufficient judgment that is basically sound but on remand is modified to include additional clarification or explanation without consideration of new evidence or the making of additional findings should accrue interest. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 528 (Pon. 2008).

Equitable principles favor calculating the interest in a manner that more fully compensates the prevailing party so that once a final judgment has been entered as to liability and damages, vacation of the damage award on appeal and issuance of an order requiring further proceedings to explain the basis for the recoverable damages will not prevent accrual of post-judgment interest on the amount common to the earlier and later judgments from the date the original judgment was entered. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 528 (Pon. 2008).

When the appellate division affirmed the underlying liability as well as the base award for the pepper business lost profits and, although the appellate division vacated the trebled portion of the award, it was not vacated for legal or evidentiary insufficiency and it did not request entry of any additional findings, but rather requested further explanation as to why the trial court applied the statute to the damages at issue and explicitly allowed for reinstatement of the trebled damages; and when, on remand, the trial court explained that the statute compelled a mandatory trebling of damages and reinstated the same award for a second time without the consideration of any additional evidence or the making of any additional factual findings with respect to the award of pepper business lost profits damages, the first and second judgments in this matter are identical, and both are supported by the exact same evidentiary and legal basis, and since the trebled award for the pepper business lost profits damages was fully ascertainable on the date the first judgment was entered, interest on the award will accrue from that date. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 520, 528 (Pon. 2008).

Pre-judgment interest cannot be awarded until the court has determined when payment would reasonably have been due. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 148 (Chk. 2008).

The legal rate of interest is 9%, and is simple interest, not compounded. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 16 FSM R. 543, 546 (Yap 2009).

When there is no evidence in the record that the defendant knew of, or had agreed to, a contractual requirement that he pay interest and the ledger sheets admitted into evidence do not show any interest charges and when none of the situations where the courts have previously allowed prejudgment interest is present, prejudgment interest will be denied. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 33 (App. 2010).

The statutory interest rate is 9% per year, which the court may impose prejudgment when the defendant knew precisely the amount to which he was potentially obligating himself, and the effect date of that commitment. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 35 n.6 (Pon. 2011).

Injured parties in maritime tort cases are typically awarded prejudgment interest. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 175 (Yap 2012).

While the FSM statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 1401, by its terms, applies solely to judgments from the date of entry, the court has judicially adopted 9% simple interest per annum as the legal interest rate to be applied when prejudgment interest is awarded and the interest rate has not been otherwise designated by statute or contract. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 176 (Yap 2012).

When a stipulated judgment waived the statutory interest if the judgment was satisfied within 90 days and the judgment was not satisfied within that time, then the post-judgment interest must accrue from the date of entry of judgment. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 335 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When a limitation of liability fund has been constituted, any judgment covered by that fund would not include any further prejudgment interest because as a general rule, once the funds are paid into court, the only interest that the prevailing party is entitled to is the interest earned by the money in the court's depository institution. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 88, 94 (Yap 2013).

Money judgments bear interest as provided by law. Under the applicable Kosrae statute, the Kosrae State Court has no discretion. All judgments for the payment of money bear nine percent interest from the date the judgment is entered. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 216 (App. 2013).

All Kosrae State Court money judgments automatically bear 9% interest regardless of whether the court specifically ordered it, or remembered to put it in the judgment, or whether it is stated in the judgment. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 217 (App. 2013).

A judgment holder might voluntarily agree to waive his or her statutory right to 9% interest on a money judgment either as an inducement for the defendant to stipulate to a judgment or to pay it off quickly (pay in full by ___ and I'll waive the interest) or for some other reason, but the Kosrae State Court does not have the authority to suspend or vacate liability for the 9% post-judgment interest as that would be an act inconsistent with the law. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 217 (App. 2013).

The nine percent on Kosrae State Court judgments is simple interest from date of entry since the statute does not authorize compounding. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 217 n.4 (App. 2013).

Partial payments on a judgment are to be first applied to the accrued interest and then to reduction of the principal with the subsequent statutory interest being computed only on the remaining principal. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

In the absence of a statute an award of prejudgment interest is in the court's discretion. Prejudgment interest is recoverable in cases where the plaintiff is entitled to recover a liquidated sum of money. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 2014).

When the damages amount was a liquidated sum and the insurance contract involved a promise to pay money if certain events occurred, the plaintiff will be awarded the 9% statutory rate of interest from a reasonable time of 60 days after the diagnosis of her daughter's cancer was submitted to the insurer in a claim form for accident and health policies. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 2014).

Statutes, 6 F.S.M.C. 1401; 8 TTC 1, that read: "Every judgment for the payment of money shall bear interest at the rate of nine percent a year from the date it is entered" are statutes of general application to money judgments and not statutes that specifically address judgments against sovereign defendants. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 7, 11 (Chk. 2015).

In the absence of an express statutory waiver of immunity against post-judgment interest, the Chuuk government is not liable for such interest even though there is a statute of general application imposing 9% post-judgment interest on money judgments, but Chuuk is liable for the 5% interest it agreed to on a loan. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 7, 11-12 (Chk. 2015).

Since injured parties in admiralty and maritime tort cases are typically awarded prejudgment interest, when the plaintiff pled a claim for prejudgment interest, the 9% statutory interest will start on the damages award on the day the vessel ran aground. The 9% statutory interest will start on the costs award on the day the amended judgment is entered. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 80 (Pon. 2015).

When, under prior precedent and the law of the case doctrine, the state government is immune from an interest award as a part of a judgment against the state unless the state has expressly consented to the imposition of interest and when the state government has not expressly consented, by statute or by contract, to the imposition of interest for claims or for a conversion claim, no interest will be permitted. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 489 (Chk. 2016).

Sovereign immunity does bar the imposition of interest as part of or on a judgment against the State of Chuuk. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

A declaratory judgment is not a money judgment and does not need to mention interest. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

When part of the plaintiff's damages claim rests on their legal conclusion that interest can be imposed and included in a money judgment against the state, but this legal conclusion is incorrect, a default judgment against the State of Chuuk will be entered, but no interest will accrue on the judgment amount. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 543 (Chk. 2016).

When no payments have been made on the judgment, it has, since it was entered, accrued interest at the rate of 9% per year, simple interest. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

If a money judgment is affirmed, the interest allowed by law will be payable from the date the judgment was entered in the court appealed from. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

When the judgment on which it accrues is joint and several, the defendants' liability for the post-judgment interest is also joint and several. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

Post-judgment interest compensates a successful litigant for being deprived of compensation for the litigant's loss for the time between the court's ascertainment of the damages amount owed and the defendant's payment. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

When a legally sufficient judgment is basically sound but is, on remand, modified to include additional clarification or explanation, without considering new evidence or making additional findings, it will accrue interest from the date of the original judgment. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

When a final judgment has been entered as to liability and damages, the vacation of the damage award on appeal and issuance of an order requiring further proceedings to explain the basis for the recoverable damages will not prevent accrual of post-judgment interest on the amount common to the earlier and later judgments from the date the original judgment was entered. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

When the appellate division did not vacate, but affirmed, the damages award, and when it did not alter the judgment amount, but merely required that the judgment be clarified so as to name the liable defendant(s), both defendants will be liable, jointly and severally, for the accrued interest since the judgment date. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

A litigant does not lose his judgment's accrued interest merely because further proceedings are needed to enforce the judgment. Smith v. Nimea, 22 FSM R. 131, 136 (Pon. 2019).

The interest on judgments is simple interest; it is not to be compounded. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 376 (Pon. 2019).

– Payment and Satisfaction

Judgment creditors will be paid in their priority order except for those who release their claims in writing. Payment of a released judgment may be returned to the judgment debtor. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 371, 373-75 (Pon. 1996).

As a general rule interest ceases to accrue on a judgment when the money is paid into a court of competent jurisdiction pursuant to the court's order, unless a statute provides otherwise. If a part of the principal is paid, then the statutory interest stops on that part. Partial payments on a judgment are first to be applied to the accrued interest and then to reduction of the principal. The subsequent statutory interest is computed only on the remaining principal. Payments into court accrue interest for the benefit of the ultimate recipient as earned in the court's depository institution. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 670-71 (App. 1996).

A court should retain in its trust account any unclaimed judgments paid into court until the twenty years has run. Otherwise, a judgment creditor may appear and be unable to recover funds rightfully his without yet more litigation and collection efforts, and, if the funds have escheated to a government, a legislative act and appropriation. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 672 (App. 1996).

Generally, a judgment debtor who has paid damages for his wrongful act has no right to receive any part of the payment left unclaimed by the parties because the judgment debtor is not the rightful owner of unclaimed portions of the judgment. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 672 (App. 1996).

Payments totaling the principal amount of a judgment have been paid do not fully satisfy the judgment when the judgment expressly provides for 9% interest and for attorney's fees incurred in enforcing the judgment. Even if it did not so state, the judgment creditor would be entitled to statutory interest of 9% under 6 F.S.M.C. 1401. Until such time as all interest and a reasonable attorney's fee is paid, the judgment remains unsatisfied. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

Payments should be applied first to interest, then principal. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 224, 226 (Chk. 2001).

Any person or entity authorized by law to pay the state's debts, in the absence of legislation to the contrary, must use money appropriated by the Legislature to pay judgments against the state in the order in which the judgments were entered, paying the oldest judgment in full before any payments are made on the next oldest judgment. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Assuming that the transfer of title to property by the judgment-debtors to a judgment-creditor was not a sham transaction with the judgment-debtors retaining ownership of it and the judgment-creditor merely selling it for them, but was a bona fide transfer of title, it was within the judgment-creditor's rights to take property instead of cash as payment on its judgment. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2003).

When a judgment-creditor decides to take title to property as full payment for the outstanding judgment in lieu of a cash payment for the remainder of the judgment, the judgment is satisfied at that point, not at some later time when the judgment-creditor has managed to sell the property for cash. A judgment-creditor accepting title to property in lieu of cash as full satisfaction of its judgment takes the risk that its later sale of the property could amount to less (or the chance it could be more) than amount due on the judgment or that the sale might fall through. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2003).

While the Chuuk Financial Control Commission is precluded from paying any court ordered judgments unless specifically appropriated by law, it must, in a timely manner, develop in consultation with the Governor and Attorney General subsequent legislation for appropriation or other purposes for consideration by the Chuuk Legislature to address court judgments. That the Commission has disclaimed this responsibility imparted is in material part a basis for the court's ruling that ordering Chuuk to pay the judgment through taking the first step in that direction by proposing a payment plan is not a workable means of obtaining a satisfaction of the judgment, and the parlous state of Chuuk's finances is more reason, not less, why it should have been forthcoming with a plan for payment. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 540 (Chk. 2003).

A civil rights judgment must not depend on legislative action for satisfaction. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 541 (Chk. 2003).

In the usual case payment of a money judgment against the state must abide a legislative appropriation, but a judgment for the violation of rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution is a species apart. If there is no meaningful remedy for such a violation, which means a judgment subject to satisfaction in a reasonably expeditious manner, then that right afforded constitutional protection is an illusion, and, if that right is reduced to an illusion, then our Constitution itself is reduced to a solemn mockery. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 541 (Chk. 2003).

When a judgment was entered in a plaintiff's favor and against a defendant prior to the defendant's death, dismissal of the matter is not appropriate as the claim has not been extinguished. The unsatisfied portion of the judgment still exists. Bank of the FSM v. Rodriguez, 11 FSM R. 542, 544 (Pon. 2003).

Even if the Chuuk Financial Control Commission were at some future time to assume its responsibility to develop legislation for appropriation to address court judgments when it has thus far declined to do so, payment of the judgment would still have to await legislative appropriation, a state of affairs that the principle of supremacy of the FSM Constitution does not countenance where a judgment based on a civil rights violation is concerned. Davis v. Kutta, 11 FSM R. 545, 549 (Chk. 2003).

The remedy for violation of a constitutional right, to be meaningful, must be one that can be realized upon in a reasonably expeditious manner. When more than six and a half years have elapsed since the judgment was entered, 6 F.S.M.C. 707, which prohibits the garnishment of funds owed by the FSM to a state, is unconstitutional as it applies to the case's judgment for a violation of civil rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution. In practical terms, that statute takes from the plaintiff the only means of securing a reasonably expeditious satisfaction of the judgment. Davis v. Kutta, 11 FSM R. 545, 549 (Chk. 2003).

Process to enforce a judgment for the payment of money will be a writ of execution, unless the court directs otherwise. The procedure on execution will be in accordance with the practice and procedure of the state in which the court is held, existing at the time the remedy is sought, except that any FSM statute governs to the extent that it is applicable. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 560 (Chk. 2004).

Failure to pay a judgment in accordance with a court order may in the appropriate case constitute conduct that is sanctionable by an order of contempt under 4 F.S.M.C. 119. For such an order to issue, it must be shown that the putative contemnor had knowledge of the order and the ability to obey, and that he did not do so. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 561 (Chk. 2004).

Repeated, intentional instances of failure of a state to pay a judgment does not constitute a separate, constitutional claim for deprivation of property without due process where the original underlying claim is not constitutional in character, but is based on common law contract and when there is no constitutional claim that supports the judgment itself, nor a national statute applicable that implicates a "clear and substantial" national interest. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 561-62 (Chk. 2004).

In the usual case, payment of a money judgment against a state must abide a legislative appropriation. A state will have the ability to pay a judgment as contemplated by 6 F.S.M.C. 1409 when its legislature appropriates money for that purpose. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 562 (Chk. 2004).

The parties are free to stipulate how any payment on a judgment should be applied – what part of the judgment it should be applied to – but that in the absence of such an agreement, the court would usually presume any payment to be a general payment on the judgment as a whole. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 27 (Chk. 2011).

While a statute of limitations bars a claim after the passage of a specified time, the common-law rebuttable presumption of payment is, on the other hand, used as evidence, based on the lapse of time, to create a rebuttable inference that the debt has been paid or otherwise satisfied. The presumption is based on the assumption that a person, before the passage of twenty years, would have recovered what belonged to that person unless prevented by some impediment. The persuasiveness of the presumption may be strengthened or diminished by evidence supporting or contradicting the significance of the lapse of time. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 335 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The presumption of payment of a judgment cannot be raised until after the lapse of 20 years from when the debt is either due or demandable. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 335 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The presumption of payment of a judgment is prima facie only and may be rebutted. An acknowledgment of the debt within twenty years preceding the action, if made by the debtor, rebuts such presumption. Such acknowledgment need not recognize the debt as a valid and subsisting obligation, and need not expressly nor impliedly contain a promise to pay. It is sufficient if it shows that the debt in question has never been paid. An admission of non-payment coupled with a refusal to pay is sufficient to rebut the presumption of payment. Finally, part payment by a debtor within twenty years before action is begun rebuts such presumption. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 335-36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The 6 F.S.M.C. 801 provision that: "[a] judgment of any court shall be presumed to be paid and satisfied at the expiration of twenty years after it is rendered" reflects the common-law rebuttable presumption of payment after a lapse of twenty years. It can therefore be implied that the 20-year statute of limitations for enforcing a judgment is a rule that creates a rebuttable presumption of payment. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 336 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The doctrine of prescription or presumption of payment of a judgment does not apply when 20 years has not yet elapsed. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 336 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Partial payments on a judgment are to be first applied to the accrued interest and then to reduction of the principal with the subsequent statutory interest being computed only on the remaining principal. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

A $300 payment on a 1998 judgment could not have reduced the principal by $300, and considering the age of the judgment and how little has been paid, it likely did not reduce the principal at all. Therefore the part of the trial court order in aid of judgment reducing the judgment principal by $300 is reversed. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219-20 (App. 2013).

When the current matter is in the post-judgment phase and a separate civil action raises claims that the debt has been discharged, the court will defer those issues to be determined in that other civil action and deny the defendant's motion for court order declaring satisfaction of account. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 592, 594 (Pon. 2016).

– Relief from Judgment

Rule 60(b)(6) of the FSM Rules of Civil Procedure permits the court to relieve a party from judgment for any reason justifying the relief. Bank of the FSM v. Bartolome, 4 FSM R. 182, 184 (Pon. 1990).

Trial courts have jurisdiction to set aside judgments either by a Rule 60 relief from judgment motion or by an independent action in equity. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The purpose of Civil Rule 60(b) is to provide the trial court with a tool for navigating between the conflicting principles that litigation must be brought to an end and that justice should be done. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 129, 133 (Pon. 1995).

A Rule 60 motion for relief from judgment cannot be granted when the order from which relief is sought is not a final judgment. In re Estate of Hartman, 7 FSM R. 409, 410 (Chk. 1996).

After a judgment has been appealed, a trial court, without appellate court permission, has the power to both consider, and deny Rule 60(b) relief from judgment motions. A trial court, however, cannot grant a Rule 60(b) motion while an appeal is pending. If the trial court is inclined to grant the motion, it should issue a brief memorandum so indicating. Armed with this, movant may then request the appellate court to remand the action so that the trial court can vacate judgment and proceed with the action accordingly. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 517-18 (Chk. 1996).

Because relief from judgment may be granted upon such terms as are just, a court may order as relief that the trial be resumed at some point other than the beginning. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 518 (Chk. 1996).

Relief from judgment is addressed to the discretion of the court, which must balance the policy in favor of hearing a litigant's claims on the merits against the policy in favor of finality. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 518 (Chk. 1996).

A stay of judgment may be granted while a motion for relief from judgment is pending. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 519 (Chk. 1996).

When a judgment is on appeal, a trial court, without appellate court permission, has the power to both consider and deny Rule 60(b) relief from judgment motions, but cannot grant such a motion while an appeal is pending. If inclined to grant the motion, the trial court issues a brief memorandum so indicating. Armed with this, the movant can then request the appellate court to remand the action so that judgment could be vacated. If the Rule 60(b) motion is denied, the movant may appeal from the order of denial. A trial court's jurisdiction to consider and deny a Rule 59(e) motion (motion to alter or amend judgment) after an appeal has been filed is similar to its power with respect to a Rule 60(b) motion. Stinnett v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 142, 145 & n.1 (Chk. 1997).

In the Kosrae State Court, motions for relief from judgment or to alter or amend a judgment are non-hearing motions. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 455, 457 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A Rule 60(b) motion is for relief from the judgment of a trial court, not the reconsideration of an appellate order. A motion to reconsider before the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division is not analogous to a relief from judgment motion. It is instead analogous to the types of motions to reconsider specifically mentioned in FSM Appellate Rule 4(a)(4). Damarlane v. Pohnpei, 9 FSM R. 114, 118-19 (App. 1999).

A motion to vacate an order of dismissal under Rule 60(b) that is not brought under any of the six enumerated bases set out in Rule 60(b), and reurges the same points made in the response to the original motion to dismiss is plainly not a Rule 60(b) motion, but is considered as a motion for reconsideration. Kosrae v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 536, 538 (Kos. 2000).

A motion that a judgment be amended to include a statement of the statutory interest and that its title be corrected to read "judgment" instead of "proposed order," is not one to amend, but rather more properly one to correct a judgment. As such Rule 60 applies, not Rule 59. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 315 (Chk. 2001).

With the exception of void judgments under Rule 60(b)(4), the grant or denial of Rule 60 relief rests with the trial court's sound discretion. The discretion is not an arbitrary one to be capriciously exercised, but a sound legal discretion guided by accepted legal principles. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 377 (Pon. 2001).

Rule 59 provides a means for relief in cases in which a party has been unfairly made the victim of surprise, but relief will be denied if the party failed to seek a continuance. Surprise, along with excusable neglect, is also addressed by Rule 60(b)(1). Thus, if a party is surprised at trial he is amply protected by Rules 59(a) and 60(b). Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 383 (Pon. 2001).

A successor trial court judge has the same power to grant relief from judgment under Rule 60(b) that the original trial court judge had. A successor judge may vacate a judgment when the original judge would have had an adequate legal basis to do so. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 597 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Appellate review of a grant or denial of a motion for relief from judgment is limited to determining whether the trial court abused its discretion. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 598 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The right to seek relief from judgment under Rule 60(b) is restricted to a party or a party's legal representative. Rule 60(b) explicitly requires a motion from the affected party, not from the trial court acting sua sponte. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 598 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The Rule 60(b) requirement that a party seek relief is unlike a Rule 60(a) correction of a clerical error in a judgment, which may be corrected by the court of its own initiative or on any party's motion. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 598 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

It was an erroneous conclusion of law for a trial court to hold it had the authority to move sua sponte to relieve a party from judgment. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 598 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When the trial court sua sponte set aside a judgment without notice and an opportunity to be heard, it set aside the judgment without due process of law. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 598 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Relief from judgment must be sought by motion with notice to opposing party and an opportunity for him to be heard. The motion must state the grounds for the relief, including the facts and the law on which the grounds are based, and why the movant believes that the motion is brought within a reasonable time, that is, the movant must show good reason for its failure to take appropriate action sooner. If the motion is brought pursuant to Rule 60(b)(6), the movant must also state the nature of the extraordinary circumstances that are the ground for relief. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 600 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The movant for relief from judgment must keep in mind that generally the standard for reopening a consent final judgment is a strict one. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 600 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When an offer of judgment and an acceptance of offer of judgment were made solely between the plaintiff and one defendant and neither party had the power to bind the other defendants to any judgment by such offer and acceptance, the judgment will be modified under Civil Rule 60(a) to clearly reflect that the judgment is only against the one defendant. Konman v. Adobad, 11 FSM R. 34, 35-36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When there is no judgment in the case but only an interlocutory order confirming a settlement agreement between fewer than all the parties to the action, a motion for relief from judgment will properly be characterized, not as one for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b), but as one to reconsider an interlocutory order. A party cannot seek relief from a judgment that does not exist. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The standard test for whether a judgment is final for Rule 60(b) purposes is usually stated to be whether the judgment is sufficiently final to be appealed. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. George, 11 FSM R. 86, 87 (Kos. 2002).

In the absence of the Rule 60(b) finality requirement, the court will deem a putative Rule 60(b) motion as one for reconsideration of the court's order. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. George, 11 FSM R. 86, 88 (Kos. 2002).

Defendants' failure to move for relief from judgment until after a writ of execution has been issued and their property seized was not an unreasonable delay when the plaintiff was so prompt in obtaining a default judgment, a writ of execution, and then levying on the writ. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 122 (Chk. 2002).

Bad checks that, in part, gave rise to the lawsuit are not culpable conduct after the lawsuit's inception that would bar relief from judgment, and neither are the defendants' other instances of alleged culpable conduct (such as moving or closing other businesses) that do not appear to be related to the lawsuit. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 123 (Chk. 2002).

Relief from judgment may be granted only on motion and upon such terms as are just. The requirement of a bond is a just term upon which to grant relief from judgment, especially in a close case that tips in the defendants' favor because of the court's policy favoring resolutions on the merits over defaults. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 123 (Chk. 2002).

Rule 60(b) may not allow a party in whose favor a judgment is entered to seek relief from that judgment because stipulated judgments, while they are judicial acts, also have many attributes of voluntarily-undertaken contracts, and when the parties have made a freely calculated, deliberate choice to submit to an agreed upon judgment rather than seek a more favorable litigated outcome (or risk a less favorable litigated outcome), the burden under Rule 60(b) is probably more formidable than had they litigated and lost. Farata v. Punzalan, 11 FSM R. 175, 178 (Chk. 2002).

Although the trial court, absent a remand, lacks jurisdiction to vacate or alter its judgment pending appeal, the trial court retains the power throughout the pendency of the appeal to simply preserve the status quo by granting a stay of the judgment. Konman v. Esa, 11 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a motion to relieve a party from a final order on the basis of surprise is filed after the order has been appealed, the court may deny the motion and leave the order appealed from intact, or, if the court is inclined to grant the motion it may only state on the record what it would do in the event that the case were remanded to it since the filing of the notice of appeal transferred jurisdiction to the appellate division. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 3, 9 (Chk. 2003).

A trial court may stay the execution of any proceedings to enforce a judgment pending the disposition of a motion for relief from a judgment or order made pursuant to Rule 60. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 3, 12 (Chk. 2003).

Chuuk state trial courts have jurisdiction to set aside judgments either by a Rule 60 relief from judgment motion or by an independent action in equity. The FSM Supreme Court trial division therefore also has the power in a proper case to entertain an independent action for relief from a state court judgment. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 189-90 (Chk. 2003).

The grant or denial of relief under Civil Procedure Rule 60 rests with the sound discretion of the trial court. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 372 (App. 2004).

An appellate court reviews a trial court denial of a Rule 60(b) motion under an abuse of discretion standard. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 372 (App. 2004).

Relief from judgment is addressed to the discretion of the court, which must balance the policy in favor of hearing a litigant's claims on the merits against the policy in favor of finality. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. 2005).

When a case has been dismissed for the plaintiff's failure to prosecute, the plaintiff's possible remedies are either to appeal the dismissal or a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment (the more viable, quicker, and usual remedy) if he wishes to have the dismissal set aside. (Filing a new case when there has been a dismissal on the merits is not a possible remedy.) Success by either method would reinstate the case at the point it was dismissed. If neither of these routes is taken successfully, the plaintiff, depending on his ability to prove that he would have succeeded at trial, may have a cause of action against his counsel. Kishida v. Aizawa, 13 FSM R. 281, 284 (Chk. 2005).

A trial court's request for clarification of the attorneys' fee request documentation was not a grant of relief from judgment or analogous to relief from judgment, and a trial court's permitting the submission of the attorney fee request one day late was within its discretion. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 22 (App. 2006).

It is an error of law for the trial justice to even consider setting aside a judgment sua sponte or on his own motion since only an affected party may seek relief from judgment. Rule 60(b) explicitly requires a motion from the affected party, not from the trial court acting sua sponte. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 108-09 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since a party cannot seek relief from a judgment that does not exist, a motion for relief from a partial summary judgment is therefore properly characterized, not as one for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b), but as one to reconsider an interlocutory order. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A motion to reconsider that was filed 22 days after the judgment had been entered, cannot be a Rule 54(b) motion to reconsider since those motions must be made before entry of judgment, or a Rule 59(e) motion to alter or amend judgment since a Rule 59(e) motion must "be served not later than 10 days after entry of the judgment." It can only be a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 588 (App. 2008).

Even after a judgment has been properly appealed, a trial court, without appellate court permission, has the jurisdiction to both consider, and to deny a Rule 60(b) relief from judgment motion, but cannot grant a Rule 60(b) motion while an appeal is pending. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 589 (App. 2008).

When the trial judge has a Rule 60(b) motion before him, which is within his jurisdiction to consider and deny even though the case is on appeal, and also a motion to recuse, and when, upon receipt of a recusal motion, a justice must rule on it before proceeding any further in the matter, the trial judge is required to rule on the recusal motion before proceeding on to the Rule 60(b) motion. The trial judge therefore had the jurisdiction to, and a duty to, rule on the recusal motion. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 589 (App. 2008).

If a judgment has been appealed and a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from that judgment is afterwards denied, a separate notice of appeal from that denial must be filed for an appellate court to have jurisdiction to review the Rule 60(b) denial. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 589 (App. 2008).

If the defendants succeed in vacating the judgment, then the next step would be to order a new trial because if the judgment were left in place and only its enforcement barred, the result would the anomalous situation of a valid money judgment which could not be enforced even though the judgment-debtors are solvent and within the jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 630 (Pon. 2008).

Relief from a judgment may be sought either by a Rule 60(b) motion or by an independent action – through filing a separate case. It cannot be sought by both. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 636 (Pon. 2008).

When the defendants have not filed their Rule 60(b) motion seeking relief in a separate action in equity collaterally attacking the judgment, but have instead filed it as a post-judgment motion in the original case, the motion may only be treated as a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment, and not as an independent action, despite the defendants styling their motion as one "in the nature of an independent action." FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 636 (Pon. 2008).

A motion to reconsider made more than ten days after entry of judgment can only be considered a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 120 n.1 (App. 2008).

A motion to reconsider or vacate a judgment filed within ten days of the judgment is a Rule 59 motion to alter or amend judgment and a motion filed after ten days is a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 138 n.3 (Pon. 2008).

Rule 60(b) permits only motions for relief from judgment under that rule or independent actions.

There is no such motion as one in the nature of an independent equitable action for relief filed in the original case. If a party wishes to seek relief through an independent action, it must file a separate independent action. If a party files a motion in the case in which the judgment was issued, it is a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 139 (Pon. 2008).

A motion to vacate a judgment filed in the original case cannot be anything other than a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 139 (Pon. 2008).

Generally, relief from a judgment may be sought either by a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment filed in the original case or by a separate, independent action (a new case), but it cannot be sought by both. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 596 (Pon. 2009).

A litigant may not sit idly by during the course of litigation and then seek to present additional defenses in the event of an adverse outcome. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 599 (Pon. 2009).

When the dismissal for failure to exhaust administrative remedies was without prejudice to any later court action after administrative relief had been sought, granting relief from the dismissal would not be in the interest of justice, and any future litigation would be conducted on a new and accurate pleadings. Aake v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 607, 609 (Chk. 2009).

Relief from a judgment under Rule 60 is addressed to the court's discretion, which is not an arbitrary one to be capriciously exercised but a sound legal discretion guided by accepted legal principles. An appellate court therefore reviews a trial court's denial of a Rule 60(b) motion under an abuse of discretion standard. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 657 (App. 2009).

It is not important whether the trial judge considered the attack upon the judgment under 60(b) or as an independent equitable action, if based on all the evidence the trial judge in the exercise of his judicial and equitable discretion, denied relief. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 658 (App. 2009).

In an independent action, it is fundamental that equity will not grant relief if the complaining party has, or by exercising proper diligence would have had an adequate remedy at law, or by proceedings in the original action to open, vacate, modify or otherwise obtain relief against, the judgment. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 658-59 (App. 2009).

When, in essence this is an appeal of an earlier final appellate court determination of the appellants' liability based on a defense they could have raised but waived in the trial court, it is yet another attempt to have a second bite of the appellate apple. When the appellants assert that the trial court erred in failing to vacate the judgment and raise claims either already argued and decided in their first appeal or not raised at the trial level, this is not an opportunity or an appropriate occasion for them to have a second bite of the appellate apple or to address issues that were not raised at the trial level. The trial court thus did not abuse its discretion by not vacating the judgment. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 661 (App. 2009).

A plaintiff seeking to maintain an action for unjust enrichment as the result of having paid money on a judgment must first have that judgment vacated or reversed before that plaintiff can pursue an unjust enrichment or restitution claim. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 2011).

To maintain an action for unjust enrichment or for money had and received or for restitution, the recipient of the money had and received must be shown to be unjustly enriched. Unless and until a judgment on which the plaintiffs have paid the money is vacated or reversed that is something the plaintiffs are manifestly unable to do. They thus fail to state a claim for unjust enrichment or restitution when the judgment has not been set aside and remains valid and enforceable. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 2011).

Although the plaintiffs' argument for restitution which asserts that an earlier judgment should not be enforced does not explicitly say so, the court must consider the case to be an independent action for relief from judgment joined with, and thus presuming success on the independent action for relief, an action for unjust enrichment and restitution with the necessary element of the prior judgment having been set aside to be accomplished in the same action. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 8 (Pon. 2011).

There are only three methods by which judgment-debtors may have a judgment against them set aside. One is to appeal the judgment and convince the appellate court to reverse it. The second is a motion for relief from judgment as provided for in Civil Procedure Rule 60(b). The third is an independent action in equity (as acknowledged in Rule 60(b)) to set aside a judgment. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 11 & n.5 (Pon. 2011).

When there is no final judgment in a case but only an interlocutory order, a motion for relief from the interlocutory order will properly be characterized, not as one for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b), but as one to reconsider an interlocutory order under Rule 54(b). People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 307, 312 (Yap 2012).

The Compact of Free Association requires that, subject to the constitutional power of FSM courts to grant relief from judgments in appropriate cases, res judicata status be given to Trust Territory judgments. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 302 (App. 2014).

As recognized by general law and as provided for in Compact of Free Association § 176, Trust Territory judgments that are final, although accorded res judicata status, can be subject to collateral attack or to relief from judgment. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 304 (App. 2014).

Under the Compact of Free Association, final judgments in civil cases rendered by any Trust Territory court continue in full force and effect, subject to the constitutional power of the courts of the Federated States of Micronesia to grant relief from judgments in appropriate cases. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

A trial division justice does not have jurisdiction to issue an order granting relief from the summary judgment when the matter has been timely appealed and the jurisdiction lay in the appellate division when he issued the relief order. Kuss v. Joseph, 19 FSM R. 380, 381 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

After a judgment has been appealed, a trial court, without appellate court permission, has the power to both consider, and deny Rule 60(b) relief from judgment motions, but the trial court cannot grant a Rule 60(b) motion while an appeal is pending. If the trial court is inclined to grant the motion for relief from judgment, it should issue a brief memorandum so indicating, and, armed with this, the movant may then request the appellate court to remand the action so that the trial court can vacate judgment and proceed with the action accordingly. Kuss v. Joseph, 19 FSM R. 380, 381 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

An appellate court may consider a trial justice's order setting aside the summary judgment to be his "brief memorandum" indicating that he is inclined to grant the motion to set aside the summary judgment as void and remand the case to the trial division so that the trial justice can, if he is so inclined, re-enter his order vacating the summary judgment. Kuss v. Joseph, 19 FSM R. 380, 381-82 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

A motion to alter, or amend, under FSM Civil Rule 59(e), or reconsideration of a mistake through inadvertence under FSM Civil Rule 60(b) are post-judgment motions that are appropriately filed in the trial division, not the appellate division, and, under the final judgment rule, these post-judgment motions prohibit filing an appeal until they have been either granted or denied. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 416, 418 (App. 2014).

Although Rule 60(b) does not limit the court's power to entertain an independent action to relieve a party from a judgment, the procedure for obtaining any relief from a judgment is either by a Rule 60(b) motion or by an independent action; not by both. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 72 (Pon. 2015).

The court, in its discretion and on such condition for the adverse party's security as is proper, may, pending the disposition of a Rule 60 motion for relief from judgment, stay the execution of or any proceedings to enforce a judgment. The criteria to be utilized when determining the propriety of a such a stay are: 1) whether the applicant has made a strong showing that the applicant is likely to prevail on the merits of the appeal; 2) whether the applicant has shown that without the stay, the applicant will be irreparably harmed; 3) whether issuance of the stay would substantially harm other parties interested in the proceedings and 4) whether the public interest would be served by granting the stay. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 89 (Pon. 2015).

A Rule 59 motion for a new trial must be served not later than ten days after entry of the judgment, but a motion that purports to be a Rule 59(b) motion for a new trial will not be denied merely because it is untimely since a Rule 59 motion served after the ten days has expired will be, and can only be, considered a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 176 (Kos. 2015).

When almost a month has elapsed from the July 17th entry of an order and the August 14th filing of a motion to set it aside, coupled with the redress sought therein, the court will characterize it as a motion under FSM Civil Rule 60(b) seeking relief from an order. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 227 (Chk. 2015).

A movant, as a precondition to rule 60(b) relief, must give the court reason to believe that vacating the judgment will not be a futile gesture or an empty exercise; in other words, there must exist a meritorious defense. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 228 (Chk. 2015).

When a final order has been properly appealed, a trial court has the jurisdiction, without appellate court permission, to both consider and to deny a Rule 60(b) relief from judgment motion, but it cannot grant a Rule 60(b) motion while an appeal is pending, but if the trial court is inclined to grant the motion, it may only state on the record that it would do so if the case were remanded. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 289 (Pon. 2016).

Rule 60(b)'s purpose is to provide the trial court with a tool for navigating between the conflicting principles that litigation must be brought to an end and that justice should be done. To meet this intended purpose, Rule 60(b), which combines aspects of both law and equity, reposes a high degree of discretion in the trial court. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 460 (Pon. 2016).

The decision to grant or deny a motion for relief from a final judgment is committed to the trial court's sound discretion. Accordingly, the lower court's decision about relief from judgment should be reviewed only upon a showing that the trial judge's ruling manifested an abuse of discretion. Such abuses must be unusual and exceptional; an appellate court will not merely substitute its judgment for that of the trial court. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 506 (App. 2016).

It is just as important that there should be a place to end litigation, as there should be a place to begin. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 506 (App. 2016).

The provisions of Rule 60(b) must be carefully interpreted to preserve the delicate balance between the sanctity of final judgments and the incessant command of the court's conscience, that justice be done in light of all the facts. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

A party seeking relief from a final judgment must do so pursuant to Rule 60(b). Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 508 (App. 2016).

The decision to grant or deny a motion for relief from a final judgment is committed to the trial court's sound discretion. Accordingly, the lower court's decision should be scrutinized, with an eye toward determining whether the trial judge's ruling manifested an abuse of discretion. Such abuses must be unusual and exceptional; an appellate court will not merely substitute its judgment for that of the trial court. Heirs of Alokoa v. Heirs of Preston, 21 FSM R. 94, 98 (App. 2016).

An appellate court's review of a trial court's grant or denial of a Rule 60(b)(1) motion focuses on whether there was an abuse of discretion. An abuse of discretion occurs when 1) the court's decision is clearly unreasonable, arbitrary, or fanciful; 2) the decision is based on an erroneous conclusion of law; 3) the court's findings are clearly erroneous; or 4) the record contains no evidence on which the court rationally could have based its decision, and such an abuse must be unusual and exceptional. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 383-84 (App. 2017).

A party's failure to proffer adequate evidence to identify where the judgment amount was inaccurate, fails to persuade that the party was entitled to relief from that judgment. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 385 (App. 2017).

Rule 60(b)'s purpose is to provide the trial court with a tool for navigating between the conflicting principles that litigation must be brought to an end and that justice be done. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 385 (App. 2017).

When there is no final judgment but only an interlocutory order, a motion for relief from the interlocutory order will properly be characterized, not as one for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b), but as one to reconsider an interlocutory order under Rule 54(b). Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 474 (Chk. 2018).

When there is no final judgment in the matter but only an interlocutory order, a party's motion for relief from the interlocutory order is properly characterized, not as one for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b), but as one to reconsider, under Rule 54(b), the interlocutory order granting partial summary judgment. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 474 (Chk. 2018).

Since Rule 60(b) relief from judgment is addressed to the court's sound discretion, an appellate court reviews the trial court's denial of relief from judgment using the abuse of discretion standard. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 514 (App. 2018).

A litigant, as a precondition to Rule 60(b) relief, must give the trial court reason to believe that vacating the judgment will not be a futile gesture or an empty exercise, that is, that the litigant has a meritorious defense. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 514 (App. 2018).

Relief from a judgment may be sought either by a Rule 60(b) motion or by an independent action – through filing a separate case. It cannot be sought by both. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 552 (App. 2018).

It is proper to require a party to advance in the first Rule 60(b) motion all matters that were reasonably available at that time. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 552 (App. 2018).

Successive Rule 60(b) motions for relief from judgment are impermissible unless the later motion is brought on a different ground. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 552 (App. 2018).

The older a judgment grows, the greater finality it should be accorded and the greater the burden on the party seeking to set it aside. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 554 (App. 2018).

The denial of a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment may have res judicata effect on a subsequent independent action to set aside a judgment, if the subsequent action is brought on the same ground as the earlier motion. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

A motion to reconsider a final order made over ten days after entry of that order is a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 617 (App. 2018).

The debtor, as an interested party, has sufficient stake in the matter for standing to try to reopen his own bankruptcy case. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

Although under Bankruptcy Rule 5010, a case may be reopened on motion of the debtor or other interested party pursuant to 31 F.S.M.C. 311(2), a lawsuit is not a motion and 31 F.S.M.C. 311(2) applies only to a corporate debtor that is unable to implement a part of its reorganization plan or comply with a provision of the court's confirmation order. Bankruptcy Rule 5010 does not apply to an individual debtor or to a liquidation case. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356-57 (Pon. 2019).

Bankruptcy Rule 9024 permits reopening a bankruptcy case by providing that FSM Civil Procedure Rule 60 applies in cases under Title 31. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 357 (Pon. 2019).

The administratrix of an estate of a former debtor would have standing to seek relief under Bankruptcy Rule 9024 for alleged overpayments to creditors and to the bankruptcy receiver because she seeks reconsideration of, or relief from, the bankruptcy case orders allowing those claims by the creditors and the receiver. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 357 (Pon. 2019).

A new lawsuit obviously cannot be a motion to reopen a case under Bankruptcy Rule 9024 (or for relief from judgment under Civil Procedure Rule 60), since such a motion would necessarily be filed in the original bankruptcy case, but Civil Procedure Rule 60 (and thus Bankruptcy Rule 9024) authorizes one other procedure for relief – an independent action for relief. Rule 60(b) does not limit a court's power to entertain an independent action to relieve a party from a judgment. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 357 (Pon. 2019).

Regardless of whether the issued writ of habeas corpus is a final order, the court may entertain FSM Civil Rule 59 and 60 motions while the matter is subject to an appeal and, if it determines such motion(s) shall prevail, it must so indicate in the record for the appellate court's consideration. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 386 (Pon. 2019).

Civil Procedure Rule 60 governs all motions to set aside a judgment or for relief from judgment including default judgments. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

– Relief from Judgment – Default Judgments

Under circumstances where the defendant has failed to set forth a meritorious defense and has exhibited culpable conduct, defendant will not succeed on a motion to set aside a judgment of default. Truk Transp. Co. v. Trans Pacific Import Ltd., 3 FSM R. 512, 514 (Truk 1988).

A motion to set aside a default judgment is addressed to the discretion of the court. In the exercise of discretion the court is guided by the principle that cases should normally be decided after trials on the merits. Truk Transp. Co. v. Trans Pacific Import Ltd., 3 FSM R. 512, 515 (Truk 1988).

The criteria to be met in order to justify the setting aside of a default judgment are whether the default was willful, caused by culpable conduct of the defendant, whether there is meritorious defense, and whether setting aside the default would prejudice the plaintiff. Truk Transp. Co. v. Trans Pacific Import Ltd., 3 FSM R. 512, 515 (Truk 1988).

Under Civil Procedure Rule 55(c), relief from an entry of default may be granted for good cause shown. A default entry may thus be set aside for reasons that would not be enough to open a default judgment. A Rule 55(c) motion is addressed to the trial court's discretion. Good cause is a mutable standard, varying from situation to situation, and it is likewise a liberal one, but not so elastic as to be devoid of substance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 375, 377 (Chk. 2000).

The standard for setting aside an entry of default under Rule 55(c) is the liberal and less rigorous "good cause" standard rather than the more restrictive standard of excusable neglect for setting aside a default judgment under Rule 60(b). FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 375, 377-78 (Chk. 2000).

The "good cause" threshold for Rule 55(c) relief is lower, ergo more easily overcome, than that which obtains under Rule 60(b) and the trial court should not read "good cause" too grudgingly. This more flexible approach reflects a policy decision that a default judgment should enjoy a greater degree of finality and, therefore, should be more difficult to disturb than a mere default. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 375, 378 (Chk. 2000).

A default judgment will be set aside when one defendant was served the complaint and summons not by a policeman or some other specially appointed person in compliance with Civil Procedure Rule 4(c) but by plaintiff's counsel and the other defendant was not served at all. Simina v. Rayphand, 9 FSM R. 500, 501 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An entry of default may be set aside for good cause shown. Rule 55 distinguishes between relief from default, which is an interlocutory matter, and relief from a judgment by default, which involves final judicial action. Thus, a more liberal standard is applied to reviewing entry of default, as opposed to default judgments. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 159, 162 (Pon. 2001).

A common statement of the criteria to set aside a default judgment is whether the default was willful, that is, caused by culpable conduct of the defendant, whether there is a meritorious defense, and whether setting aside the default judgment would prejudice the plaintiff. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 180 (Pon. 2001).

Any of the reasons sufficient to justify the vacation of a default judgment normally will justify relief from a default entry and in various situations a default entry may be set aside for reasons that would not be enough to open a default judgment. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 180 (Pon. 2001).

Courts generally disfavor default judgments and readily set them aside rather than deprive a party of the opportunity to contest a claim on the merits. O'Sullivan v. Panuelo, 10 FSM R. 257, 260 (Pon. 2001).

Even when service on the defendants was proper, they may still obtain relief from a default judgment if they qualify under Rule 60. Courts generally disfavor default judgments and will, in proper Rule 60(b) cases, readily set them aside rather than deprive a party of the opportunity to contest, and the court to resolve, a claim on its merits, instead of on procedural grounds. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 122 (Chk. 2002).

The criteria to be met in order to justify setting aside a default judgment are whether the default was willful, caused by the defendant's culpable conduct, whether the defendant has a meritorious defense, and whether setting aside the default would prejudice the plaintiff. Relief from judgment is addressed to the discretion of the court, which must balance the policy in favor of hearing a litigant's claims on the merits against the policy in favor of finality. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 122 (Chk. 2002).

In order to obtain relief from a default judgment, the defendant must have a meritorious defense. A defense that would constitute a complete defense to the action if proven at trial would be a meritorious defense justifying relief from judgment when some evidence to support the defense has been produced, although more evidence may be needed to prevail at trial. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 123 (Chk. 2002).

Relief from judgment may be granted only on motion and upon such terms as are just. The requirement of a bond is a just term upon which to grant relief from judgment, especially in a close case that tips in the defendants' favor because of the court's policy favoring resolutions on the merits over defaults. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 123 (Chk. 2002).

When a default judgment that affects persons, who claim ownership of the land and who were never made parties to the suit, but against whom the judgment is sought to be enforced those persons are clearly entitled to relief from the default judgment under Chuuk Civil Rule 60(b)(6), and no time limits are imposed on the granting of such relief because the court may, in its discretion, treat a complaint as a Rule 60(b)(6) motion for relief from judgment. Pastor v. Ngusun, 11 FSM R. 281, 285 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

After a default judgment has been entered, a motion to dismiss cannot be granted unless the motion to set aside the default is successful. Konman v. Esa, 11 FSM R. 291, 294 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a party moves for relief from judgment under Civil Procedure Rule 60(b)(4) on the ground that the judgment was void, there is no requirement, as is usual when a default judgment is attacked under Rule 60(b), that the movant show that he has a meritorious defense. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 256 (Chk. 2005).

Courts generally disfavor default judgments and will set them aside rather than deprive a party of the opportunity to contest a claim on the merits so as to permit the claim to be resolved on its merits instead of on procedural grounds. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. 2005).

The standard for analyzing whether relief from a default judgment is warranted is whether the default was willful, that is, caused by the defendant's culpable conduct, whether there is a meritorious defense, and whether setting aside the default judgment would prejudice the plaintiff, so when a plaintiff does not want the opportunity to contest a claim or assert a meritorious defense to a claim but wants to add a claim, the inapplicability of this standard to the case highlights the novelty of what the plaintiff is trying to do. No cases support the claim that Rule 60(b) relief is available for a prevailing plaintiff to be granted relief from a default judgment in its favor when the defendant had not appeared in the case prior to the default judgment. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. 2005).

A plaintiff should seek to amend its complaint to ask for prejudgment interest before asking for a default judgment if it wants an unpled interest claim included in the judgment. When it does not do so, the court cannot grant it leave to amend its complaint after the default judgment has been entered because that would make meaningless Rule 54(c)'s clear command limiting default judgments to the kind and the amount prayed for in the demand for judgment. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 55(c) governs the setting aside of a default, but when a default judgment was already entered, FSM Civil Rule 60 applies. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 69 n.1 (Pon. 2013).

The criteria to be met in order to justify setting aside a default judgment are whether the default was willful, caused by the defendant's culpable conduct, whether the defendant has a meritorious defense, and whether setting aside the default would prejudice the plaintiff. Relief from judgment is addressed to the court's discretion, which must balance the policy in favor of hearing a litigant's claims on the merits against the policy in favor of finality. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 69 (Pon. 2013).

Relief from judgment will be granted when the culpability and meritorious defense requirements are met because the defendant has a meritorious statute of limitation defense as to part of the default judgment and because if the defendant had had legal representation during the case's early stages, the statute of limitation defense would have been raised, which would affect a part of the amount granted in the plaintiff's default judgment and when not setting aside the default judgment would prejudice the defendant, instead of the plaintiff, because as it stands, the defendant would be liable for an amount greater than what he is supposed to pay by law. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 69-70 (Pon. 2013).

The standard for setting aside an entry of default under Rule 55(c) is the liberal and less rigorous "good cause" standard rather than the more restrictive standard of excusable neglect for setting aside a default judgment under Rule 60(b). The "good cause" threshold for Rule 55(c) relief is lower, ergo more easily overcome, than that which obtains under Rule 60(b) and the trial court should not read "good cause" too grudgingly. This more flexible approach reflects a policy decision that a default judgment should enjoy a greater degree of finality and, therefore, should be more difficult to disturb than a mere default. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 19 FSM R. 614, 616 (Pon. 2014).

The court may refuse to set aside a default judgment when the default is due to willfulness or bad faith or when the defendant offers no excuse at all for the default. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 89 (Pon. 2015).

In order to obtain relief from a default judgment, the defendant must have a meritorious defense that would constitute a complete defense to the action if proven at trial. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 89 (Pon. 2015).

A default judgment will not be set aside when the defendants' averments were made more than one year after the judgment was entered and as such, fail to come within the time frame prescribed in Rule 60(b) and when the default was a direct result of the defendants' willful conduct and there has been no meritorious defense or extraordinary circumstance(s) depicted to justify the coveted relief. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 89 (Pon. 2015).

The court may refuse to set aside a default judgment when the default is due to the defendant's willfulness or bad faith. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104 (Chk. 2015).

When a meritorious defense has not been portrayed, the defendants' requests to set aside or vacate the default judgment, order(s) in aid of judgment, and writ of garnishment will be denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104 (Chk. 2015).

Rule 55(c) governs only the setting aside of an entry of default. It is Rule 60(b) that governs the setting aside of a default judgment (and all other judgments). If a court determines that, under Rule 60(b)'s requirements, a default judgment should be set aside, then the entry of default will also be set aside. That is because, if the Rule 60(b)'s higher requirements for relief from judgment have been met, then Rule 55(c)'s lower requirement of good cause is also met. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 514 (App. 2018).

When relief is sought only from the entry of default the standard is "good cause," and when relief is also sought from the entry of a default judgment the "reasons" set forth in Rule 60(b) may supply the good cause. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 514 (App. 2018).

If a default judgment has been entered when the court lacked personal jurisdiction over the defendant, then that default judgment is void and relief can be sought under Rule 60(b)(4), for which there is no time limit to seek relief. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

Civil Procedure Rule 60 governs all motions to set aside a judgment or for relief from judgment including default judgments. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

The criteria to be satisfied in order to justify setting aside a default judgment are: 1) whether the default was willful, caused by the defendant's culpable conduct; 2) whether the defendant has a meritorious defense; and 3) whether setting aside the default would prejudice the plaintiff. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 593 (Kos. 2020).

To obtain relief from a default judgment, the defendant must have a meritorious defense – a defense that would constitute a complete defense to the action if proven at trial. But when the defendant has failed to set forth a meritorious defense and has exhibited culpable conduct, the defendant will not succeed on a motion to set aside a default judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 593 (Kos. 2020).

Section 128, Title 30 grants the FSM Development Bank tax exemption and prohibits it from paying dividends because the bank exists and operates "solely for the benefit of the public." It does not create a private cause of action against the FSM Development Bank, and thus a borrower cannot raise it as an affirmative defense. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 594 (Kos. 2020).

To invoke the equitable estoppel doctrine, the proponent must allege that 1) another party made representations or statements; 2) the party reasonably relied upon the representations; and 3) the party will be harmed if estoppel is not allowed. But when the movant does not allege any specific facts that would satisfy these elements, he does not allege a meritorious defense. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 594 (Kos. 2020).

The 38 U.S.C. § 5301 ban on assigning U.S. military retirement benefits does not constitute a meritorious defense because 38 U.S.C. § 5301 is a United States statute that is applicable wherever the United States is sovereign, but which has no effect in the separate and distinct sovereignty of the Federated States of Micronesia. Since there is no similar FSM statute in effect, the defendant's assignment is not an illegal contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 595 (Kos. 2020).

When the court must deny a defendant's motion for relief from, or to set aside, the default judgment, the court must also deny his motion to enlarge time to file an answer. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 595 (Kos. 2020).

The "good cause" threshold for Rule 55(c) relief is a lower, and more easily overcome, than that which obtains under Rule 60(b) and this approach reflects a policy decision that a default judgment must enjoy a greater degree of finality and, therefore, should be more difficult to disturb than a mere entry of default. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 604 (Pon. 2020).

Rule 55(c) governs the setting aside of a default, but when a default judgment has already been entered, FSM Civil Rule 60(b) applies and must be used to set aside the default judgment. But, if a court determines that, under Rule 60(b)'s requirements, a default judgment should be set aside, then the entry of default will also be set aside, as a matter of course, because, if the Rule 60(b)'s higher requirements for relief from judgment are met, then Rule 55(c)'s lower requirement of good cause is also met. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 604 (Pon. 2020).

A prompt motion for relief from judgment once a default judgment is entered and served on the movant is a sign of good faith. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 604 (Pon. 2020).

In addition to meeting the Rule 60(b)(1) excusable neglect standard, there are three other criteria that must be satisfied in order to justify setting aside a default judgment: 1) whether the default was willful, caused by the defendant's culpable conduct; 2) whether the defendant has a meritorious defense; and 3) whether setting aside the default judgment would prejudice the plaintiff. Most importantly, the defendant must have a meritorious defense in order to obtain relief from a default judgment. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 604 (Pon. 2020).

A meritorious defense is required for relief from a default judgment. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 604 (Pon. 2020).
