As a matter of law, no individual can ever have the apparent authority to cash a check that has a corporation as the payee, and, as a matter of law, any business that cashes such a check with a corporate payee is not engaged in a commercially reasonable business practice. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 359-60 (App. 2012).

COMMON LAW

There appears to be uniform acceptance by common law jurisdictions of the principle that government officials are considered employees for income tax purposes. This amounts to a common law rule of taxation and yields a result in harmony with the underlying principles of the taxation system established by the Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 12 (Pon. 1985).

By its terms, 1 F.S.M.C. 203 pointing to the Restatements as a guide for determining and applying the common law applies only to "courts of the Trust Territory." Since only courts established by the Trust Territory administration existed when the section was issued, it plainly was intended only for those courts at that time. In absence of any persuasive considerations to the contrary, it is logical to conclude that 1 F.S.M.C. 203 applies only to courts of the Trust Territory, not to courts of the Federated States of Micronesia or the various states. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 14 (Pon. 1985).

1 F.S.M.C. 203, with its sweeping mandate that the Restatements and other common law rules as applied in the United States be the "rules of decision," would lure the courts in a direction other than that illuminated by the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Provisions, FSM Const. art. XI, § 11, which identifies as the guiding star, not the Restatement or decisions of United States courts concerning common law, but the fundamental principle that decisions must be "consistent" with the "Constitution, Micronesian custom and tradition, and the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia." Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 14 (Pon. 1985).

The FSM Supreme Court can and should consider the Restatement and reasoning of courts in the United States and other jurisdictions in arriving at its own decisions although it is not bound by those decisions and must not fall into the error of adopting the reasoning of those decisions without independently considering suitability of that reasoning for the Federated States of Micronesia. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 14-15 (Pon. 1985).

No common law rule has been applied universally in all contexts to determine the status of government officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 15 (Pon. 1985).

The common law for the Federated States of Micronesia referred to at 54 F.S.M.C. 112(3) is not based upon the law of England at the time of the American Revolution but upon the law of the United States, the Trust Territory and other nations in the common law tradition up to the initiation of constitutional government in 1979. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 17 (Pon. 1985).

Common law principles may be drawn from statutes as well as court decisions. While the common law is articulated through court decisions, it has its source in legislative action as well as court decisions. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 17 (Pon. 1985).

Comparative negligence, which has displaced contributory negligence in most jurisdiction in the United States, should be given careful consideration by courts even though the Restatement (Second) of Torts refers only to contributory negligence and is silent about comparative negligence. There is reason to doubt that the FSM Supreme Court is bound by 1 F.S.M.C. 203 pointing to the Restatements as a guide for determining and applying the common law. Ray v. Electrical Contracting Corp., 2 FSM R. 21, 23 n.1 (App. 1985).

The Micronesian Constitutional Convention anticipated that judges in the new constitutional court system would find it necessary to draw on experience and decisions of courts in other nations to develop a common law of the Federated States of Micronesia. The framers recognized the desirability of such a search and amended the earlier draft of the provision to be sure to leave it open to the constitutional courts to do so. Nonetheless, judges now are not to consider the relationship between the common law of the United States and the legal system here in the same way that relationship was viewed prior to self-government. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 139 (Pon. 1985).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for this court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. Review of decisions of courts of the United States, and any other jurisdictions, must proceed however against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 142 (Pon. 1985).

A generally recognized principle of the common law is that questions neither brought to the attention of the court nor ruled upon are not to be considered as having been decided so as to constitute precedents. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (II), 2 FSM R. 200, 204 (Pon. 1986).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance in addressing claims of abuse of process within the Federated States of Micronesia. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 2 FSM R. 265, 268 (Pon. 1986).

In considering the law concerning secured transactions, the FSM Supreme Court must look for guidance of the pre-UCC common law and may only declare the existence of such security interests as have been found by other courts to exist in the absence of statutes. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc., 2 FSM R. 281, 288 (Pon. 1986).

When confronted with an issue of first instance, the Pohnpei Supreme Court may look beyond prior state experience for guidance, including looking towards the common law and United States precedents. People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 10 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court may look to Pohnpeian customs and concepts of justice when there are no statutes governing the subject matter, but it may also draw from common law concepts when they are appropriate. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 64 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

A "general security agreement," without more does not establish a lien under common law or pursuant to any statute in the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 342 (Pon. 1988).

United States statutes regarding ships' mortgages will not be adopted as the common law of the Federated States of Micronesia, because their purposes are not applicable to the FSM and because their changing nature and complexity are not conducive to forming the basis of the common law of this nation. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 57, 59-60 (Truk 1989).

Where there are no directly controlling statutes, cases or other authorities within the Federated States of Micronesia, it may be helpful to look to the law of other jurisdictions, especially the United States, in formulating general principles for use in resolving legal issues bearing upon the rights of public employees and officers, in part because the structures of public employment within the Federated States of Micronesia are based upon the comparable governmental models existing in the United States. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 191 (Pon. 1990).

Statutory changes overruling previous judicial rulings may fundamentally alter the general law in the area newly governed by statute. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 372 (App. 1990).

Chuuk State has adopted common law tort principles as the law of Chuuk State where no specific constitutional or traditional impediment to its adoption exists. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 165 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Under the common law the death of a criminal appellant pending appeal abates the proceedings ab initio – not only the appeal but all proceedings from the inception of the prosecution, thus requiring the appellate court to dismiss the appeal, and remand the case to the trial court to vacate the judgment and dismiss the information. Palik v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 362, 364 (App. 1994).

Common law tort principles from other jurisdictions have previously been adopted by the Chuuk State Supreme Court where there has been no constitutional or traditional impediment to doing so. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 455 (Chk. 1994).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of the constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia, but review of decisions of courts of the United States or other jurisdictions, must proceed against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture. Black Micro Corp. v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 311, 314 (Pon. 1995).

The common law of the United States and other nations in the common law tradition, up to the initiation of constitutional self-government in the FSM in 1979, is an essential part of the common law of Yap, but a court ought not fall into the error of adopting the reasoning of other common law jurisdictions' decisions without independently considering their suitability for Yap. Gimnang v. Yap, 7 FSM R. 606, 609 (Yap S. Ct.

Tr. 1996).

United States common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for this court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. United States courts have generally followed the provisions of the Restatement of Torts in situations where a plaintiff alleges that a defendant has negligently prevented a third party from rendering assistance. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293-94 (Pon. 1998).

When FSM courts have not yet addressed an issue, the court may look to the Restatement and to decisions from jurisdictions in the common law tradition outside the FSM, all the while keeping in mind the suitability for the FSM of any given common law principle. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 495 (Pon. 1998).

United States common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for the Kosrae State Court for tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 234, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The legislature has the power to modify or abolish common law rights or remedies and may supersede the common law without an express directive to that effect, as by adoption of a system of statutes comprehensively dealing with a subject to which the common law rule related. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 416 (Pon. 2001).

When the court looks to common law sources in considering the nature of the legislative privilege enjoyed by members of the Pohnpei Legislature, it is mindful of Article XI, section 11 of the FSM Constitution, which requires that FSM Supreme Court decisions be consistent with the Constitution, Micronesian customs and traditions, and the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 423 (Pon. 2001).

Although the court has previously recognized claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, in the absence of a contractual provision it will not create a common law indemnity claim, therefore, in the absence of any contractual provisions between the parties, there is no basis for a claim of indemnity by a defendant against a plaintiff, the court will dismiss the defendant's counterclaim for indemnity. Primo v. Semes, 11 FSM R. 324, 329 (Pon. 2003).

At common law, a person is free to adopt and use any name he or she chooses, so long as there is no fraudulent purpose, and the name does not infringe on the rights of others. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The right to assume any name, absent fraud or infringement of the rights of others, operates at common law independently of any court order. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, any person may ordinarily change his name at will, without any legal proceedings, merely by adopting another name. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The court will recognize claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, but, in the absence of a contractual provision, it will not create a common law indemnity claim. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 347 (Pon. 2004).

The court may employ a common law principle from other jurisdictions with a common law tradition when it is not contrary to the FSM Constitution, statutes, or custom and tradition and if it is suitable for adoption here. Lee v. Han, 13 FSM R. 571, 576 n.2 (Chk. 2005).

Although the FSM Code permits the restatements to be used when applying rules of common law in the absence of written law, the court can give the Restatement no such weight when interpreting written law – a congressionally-enacted statute. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 24 (App. 2006).

U.S. courts' common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the FSM. The FSM Constitution's judicial guidance clause requires that the court's review of U.S. courts' decisions proceed against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture, but where the business activities which gave rise to the lawsuit are not of a local or traditional nature, and the work setting and the work itself are of a markedly non-local, international character, the court need not conduct an intense search for applicable customary laws and traditional rules when none have been brought to its attention by the parties and none are apparent. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 430 n.1 (Yap 2006).

Stare decisis is the doctrine of precedent, under which it is necessary for a court to follow earlier judicial decisions when the same points of law arise again in litigation. Stare decisis requires that the same rule of law previously announced be applied to any succeeding cases with similar facts. Nakamura v. Chuuk, 15 FSM R. 146, 149-50 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When there is no guidance from FSM case law or statutes, it is appropriate to look to the common law of the United States because United States common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition in the FSM. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

Where there is no specific precedent in FSM case law, the court may consider cases from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 652 (Pon. 2008).

When no FSM case has discussed the specific elements of the causes of action for interference with contractual relations or interference with prospective business advantage, the court may consider authorities from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

When prior FSM cases have not addressed a precise point, the court, in such instances, may look to authorities from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438 n.3 (Pon. 2009).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has recognized claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, and required precise clarity in the indemnification clause language, it is not prepared to create a common law indemnity claim. Thus, even assuming the court had found any defendant liable, when no contractual provision for indemnification between the plaintiff and any of the defendants was presented to the court, the plaintiff's claim for indemnity fails. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 458 (Pon. 2009).

In instances where there is no FSM precedent, such as whether to require an attorney to appear for a corporation (although it has been a rather long-standing practice in the FSM Supreme Court), the court may consider cases from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Helgenberger, 17 FSM R. 407, 410 n.2 (Pon. 2011).

Although the FSM Supreme Court may not be bound by 1 F.S.M.C. 203, which points to the Restatements as the rules of decision for courts in determining and applying the common law, that FSM Code provision does permit the Restatements to be used when applying common law rules in the absence of written law, while keeping in mind the suitability for the FSM of any given common law principle. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 n.14 (Pon. 2011).

Courts are statutorily authorized to consider the common law as expressed in the ALI Restatements of Law. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 355 n.3 (App. 2012).

Since, although courts are not bound to adopt common-law doctrines, they may, by statute, use the Restatements of the Law as the rules of decision to determine and apply the common law in the absence of written law while keeping in mind the suitability of any given common law principle for the FSM, if a court were to recognize an equitable indemnity cause of action, its elements would be those set forth in the Restatement. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 365 (App. 2012).

Statute law authorizes the court to consider the common law as expressed in the ALI Restatements of Law. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

Common law decisions from U.S. sources are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes or decisions of constitutional courts within the FSM. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 526 (Pon. 2013).

Customary law takes precedence over the common law. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 272 n.3 (Pon. 2015).

When presented with an issue of first impression and the absence of FSM case law on point, the court will examine relevant U.S. decisions for guidance and may look to authorities from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

Before the 1979 initiation of constitutional government in the FSM, it may be said that the common law of the FSM was based on the law of the United States, the Trust Territory, and other nations in the common law tradition. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 364-65 (App. 2017).

In the absence of Micronesian precedent, the FSM Supreme Court can and should consider the reasoning from the courts of other common law jurisdictions. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 365 n.10 (App. 2017).

Although FSM courts are not bound to adopt common-law doctrines, they are statutorily authorized to use the ALI Restatements of the Law to consider, determine, and apply the common law in the absence of written law while keeping in mind the suitability of that common law principle for the FSM. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 201 n.11 (Pon. 2019).

Although FSM courts are not bound to adopt common-law doctrines, the courts can, by statute, use the Restatements of the Law as the rules of decision to determine and apply the common law in the absence of written law while keeping in mind any given common law principle's suitability for the FSM. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2019).

The rules of the common law, as expressed in the restatements of the law approved by the American Law Institute are the rules of decision in applicable cases. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2019).

A private litigant is absolutely privileged to publish defamatory matter concerning another in communications preliminary to a proposed judicial proceeding, or in the institution of or during the course and as a part of, a judicial proceeding in which he participates, if the matter has some relation to the proceeding. This privilege is based upon the public interest in according to all men the utmost freedom of access to the courts of justice for the settlement of their private disputes. Like the privilege of an attorney, it is absolute. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 249-50 (Pon. 2019).

At common law, parties to judicial proceedings are granted an absolute privilege to use defamatory language because of the overriding public interest that persons should speak freely and fearlessly in litigation, uninfluenced by the possibility of being brought to account in an action for defamation. This common law principle is eminently suitable for the FSM because it is difficult to see how any court system could function otherwise. It is sound public policy. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

While FSM courts are not bound to adopt common-law principles, they are authorized by statute to use the Restatements of the Law to determine and apply the common law in the absence of written law while keeping in mind the principle's suitability for the FSM. Courts are statutorily authorized, under both FSM national and Pohnpei state law, to consider the common law as expressed in the ALI Restatements of Law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 n.1 (Pon. 2019).

FSM courts may look for guidance from U.S. common law decisions if there are no statutes or decisions of constitutional courts within the FSM. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 393 n.4 (Kos. 2019).

Pohnpei state law provides that the rules of the common law, as expressed in the restatements of the law, shall be the rules of decision in the courts of the state of Pohnpei in applicable cases, in the absence of written law applicable to the state of Pohnpei or applicable local customary law. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 506 (Pon. 2020).

COMPACT OF FREE ASSOCIATION

Under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement, civilian employees of the United States government have immunity from civil and criminal process for wrongful acts and omissions done within the scope and in performance of official duty, unless expressly waived by the U.S. government. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 95 (Pon. 1991).

A United States federal employee does not waive immunity from civil liability under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement when the civilian employee initiated litigation in the FSM Supreme Court in a separate lawsuit with different claims against different parties and where the affirmative misconduct is within the scope and in the performance of the official duty. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 97 (Pon. 1991).

It is the duty of the FSM Supreme Court to review any national law, including a treaty such as the Compact of Free Association, in response to a claim that the law or treaty violates constitutional rights, and if any Compact provision is contrary to the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, then that provision must be set aside as without effect. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 98 (Pon. 1991).

The Compact of Free Association's immunization provisions, which limit a plaintiff's right to sue a physician for malpractice, do not affect a fundamental right, and therefore, the provisions need not be subjected to a strict scrutiny, but instead should be tested under the less stringent rational relationship test. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 104 (Pon. 1991).

The Compact of Free Association provides to the United States immunity from the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court for claims arising from the activities of United States agencies or from the acts or omissions of the employees of such agencies. Samuel v. United States, 5 FSM R. 108, 111 (Pon. 1991).

By the terms of the Compact and its subsidiary extradition agreement the term "Signatory Government" includes not only the national, but also the state governments of the two nations. Therefore state as well as national law may be used to determine if the offense for which extradition is sought satisfies the dual criminality test–is criminal under the laws of both signatory governments. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 102-03 (App. 1993).

Although the Compact waives the sovereign immunity of the U.S. government, it does not create new causes of action or fashion a remedy where one was previously not available. The Compact does not authorize monetary damages to individuals for breach of the Trusteeship Agreement. Alep v. United States, 6 FSM R. 214, 218-19 (Chk. 1993).

Although the Compact of Free Association waives U.S. sovereign immunity it does not create new causes of action or remedies beyond what was available to private litigants before the Compact. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 526 (Pon. 1994).

The waiver of sovereign immunity clause in the Compact did not create any new causes of action, but merely waived sovereign immunity with respect to valid existing claims. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 497 (App. 1996).

The only new cause of action created by the Compact is where the U.S. government accepts responsibility for losses or damages arising out of nuclear testing in the Marshall Islands between 1946 and 1958. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 498-99 (App. 1996).

Nothing in the Compact suspends or tolls the statute of limitations. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 499 (App. 1996).

After the commencement of full self-government in 1986, the Federated States of Micronesia remained, from the United States's perspective, a foreign country. Under the Compact of Free Association with the United States, the Federated States of Micronesia is a sovereign and independent nation. In re Neron, 16 FSM R. 472, 474 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM's argument that the court is without jurisdiction to hear the defendant's counterclaims in the ground that they are nonjusticiable political questions because the Compact is a treaty between the FSM and the United States and the improvement of infrastructure through grants to the FSM is specifically contemplated by the Compact, the implementation of which must comply with requirements spelled out in the Compact, is without merit because, carried to its logical end, it would also bar the FSM from asserting its contract claims against the defendant since the contract was entered into to facilitate improving infrastructure in compliance with the Compact requirements attached to the FSM receiving the funds to pay for infrastructure improvements. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 482 (Pon. 2009).

When none of the questions to be decided by the court directly touch upon treaty relations between the FSM and the United States, the FSM Supreme Court may determine whether the FSM wrongfully provided false information to U.S. officials, whether, if proven, those actions were actionable, and if so, what damages the defendant-counterclaimant suffered since the court can also decide the issue of whether either party breached the contract, and if so, who owes what sums to the other. The mere existence of a funding mechanism agreed to by two sovereign nations cannot strip the court of jurisdiction to issue a decision on the merits of this case. Nor does the Compact intend to so hobble the court. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 484 (Pon. 2009).

Title 1 of the Compact governs the relationship between and amongst the parties to the Compact and its environmental protection section does not create a private cause of action since it provides that actions brought pursuant to that section may be initiated only by the FSM government. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 18 FSM R. 177, 179 (Pon. 2012).

The Compact of Free Association requires that, subject to the constitutional power of FSM courts to grant relief from judgments in appropriate cases, res judicata status be given to Trust Territory judgments. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 302 (App. 2014).

In an appropriate case, the Kosrae State Court has the power to grant a party relief from a Trust Territory High Court judgment through an independent action in equity. This has even been acknowledged by treaty with the United States. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

Under the Compact of Free Association, final judgments in civil cases rendered by any Trust Territory court continue in full force and effect, subject to the constitutional power of the courts of the Federated States of Micronesia to grant relief from judgments in appropriate cases. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

While a state may be designated as the administrator and allottee of Compact sector funds that are used to pay state employees, those funds are appropriated by the FSM Congress and remain subject to the provisions of the FSM Financial Management Act and the Compact of Free Association financial controls. The FSM Secretary of Finance has full and complete oversight over, and at all times full and complete access to all financial records for, all Compact funds of the state and national governments of the FSM. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460 (Chk. 2014).

The FSM has standing to sue for conversion when it was Compact sector funds that were converted. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460 (Chk. 2014).

The Compact of Free Association has a provision by which sentences imposed by FSM courts on U.S. citizens may be served in U.S. penal institutions, but if they go through the diplomatic channels and comply with transfer procedures and eligibility, but the Compact does not have a section that deals with an FSM citizen under a sentence rendered by a FSM court who seeks to serve the remaining term of his sentence in a U.S. jurisdiction. FSM v. Bisalen, 20 FSM R. 471, 473 (Pon. 2016).

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

A fundamental principle of statutory interpretation is that when a statute can be read in two ways, one raising constitutional issues and the other interpreting the language as affecting matters clearly within the constitutional reach of Congress, the latter interpretation should prevail so that the constitutional issue is avoided. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 32 (Pon. 1981).

When interpreting a statute, courts should try to avoid interpretations which may bring the constitutionality of the statute into doubt. Tosie v. Tosie, 1 FSM R. 149, 157 (Kos. 1982).

While courts will not refuse to pass on the constitutionality of statutes in a proceeding in which such a determination is involved, needless consideration of attacks on their validity and unnecessary decisions striking down statutes will be avoided. Legislative acts are presumed to be constitutional; where fairly possible a construction of a statute will be made that avoids constitutional questions. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 180-81 (Truk 1982).

Courts should avoid, where possible, selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt the constitutionality of that statute. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1982).

Constitutional issues should not be decided if the statute in question may be interpreted in such a way as clearly to conform with constitutional requirements. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 205 (Pon. 1982).

A court should not decide a constitutional issue when there remains a possibility that an administrative decision will obviate the need for a court decision. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 205 (Pon. 1982).

The Constitution does not contemplate that FSM citizens must first petition any person or body outside the Federated States of Micronesia as a condition to consideration of their constitutional claims by courts established under this Constitution. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 267 (Pon. 1983).

An unconstitutional statute may not be redeemed by voluntary administrative action. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 357 (Pon. 1983).

Unnecessary constitutional adjudication is to be avoided. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 357 (Pon. 1983).

If construction of a statute by which a serious doubt of constitutionality may be avoided is fairly possible, a court should adopt that construction. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 357-58 (Pon. 1983).

Article III, sections l and 2, of the FSM Constitution are self-executing and do not contemplate, or imply the need for, court action to confirm citizenship where no challenge exists. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 1985).

If a dispute properly may be resolved on statutory grounds without reaching potential constitutional issues and without discussing constitutional principles, the court should do so. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 230 (Pon. 1987).

No clause in the FSM Constitution is equivalent to the eleventh amendment of the United States Constitution, which generally bars citizens from using United States federal courts to seek monetary damages against states. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 361 (Pon. 1988).

When dealing with statutes, before discussing constitutional issues a court must first address any threshold issues of statutory interpretation which may obviate the need for a constitutional ruling. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 419 (Pon. 1988).

As a matter of constitutional law, the authority to exercise executive, legislative and judicial powers came to the Federated States of Micronesia under the FSM Constitution, by operation of law, not through delegation of Trust Territory functions. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 103 (App. 1989).

The appellate court will not decide a constitutional issue if not raised below and because unnecessary constitutional adjudication is to be avoided. Jonah v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 308, 313 (App. 1992).

The Chapman rule, which holds that a constitutional error can be found harmless only when it is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, is suitable for the FSM. Jonah v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 308, 314 (App. 1992).

A statute is repealed by implication by a constitutional provision when the legislature, under the new constitutional provision, no longer has the present right to enact statutes substantially similar to the statute in question. FSM v. Jano, 6 FSM R. 9, 11 (Pon. 1993).

In the absence of any authority or compelling policy arguments the court cannot conclude that a law, the enforcement of which entails a harsh result, is unconstitutional, and can only note that the creation of potentially harsh results is well within the province of the nation's constitutionally empowered legislators. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes, 7 FSM R. 102, 104 (Pon. 1995).

A court should avoid unnecessary constitutional adjudication. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 228, 229 (Chk. 1998).

Acts of Congress are presumed to be constitutional. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 374, 387 (Pon. 1998).

Article I, section 1 of the Constitution defines the FSM's national boundaries, and section 2 defines the states' boundaries in the event marine resources revenues should accrue to the state wherein the resources are found, but the Constitution's framers did not intend to confer ownership of marine resources, or revenues derived from such resources, when they defined the state boundaries. Offshore marine resources, and the division between national and state power with respect to these resources, are addressed in other articles of the Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 367-68 (Pon. 1998).

The constitutional government works not to override custom, but works in cooperation with the traditional system in an atmosphere of mutual respect. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 497 (Pon. 1998).

Micronesian custom, and the constitutional legal system established by the people of the FSM, flow from differing (not necessarily inconsistent) premises and purposes. These two systems, then, can be seen as supplementary and complementary, not contradictory. Each has a valuable role to perform, independent of the other. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

The right guaranteed in the Chuuk Constitution to move and migrate within the State and the right in the FSM Constitution to travel and migrate within the Federated States, do not protect travel or migration outside these boundaries. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A municipal ordinance restricting absentee voting in municipal elections to persons in the state of Chuuk is not unconstitutional. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Internal waters are those waters on the landward side, or inside, of the baselines of the territorial sea. The exclusive economic zone starts twelve nautical miles seaward of the baseline and extending outward for another 188 nautical miles. A desire to maximize the area that might be included within the baselines, subject to the FSM's international treaty obligations, cannot be interpreted as a recognition of state ownership of the ocean resources 12 to 200 nautical outside of those baselines when drawn. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 430-31 (App. 2000).

The framers' intent that the equidistance method be used to establish fair and equitable marine boundaries between the states in the event marine resource revenue should accrue to the state wherein the resources are found does not indicate state resource ownership because the Constitution explicitly provides for an event when such revenues would accrue to the state – when ocean floor mineral resources are exploited. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 (App. 2000).

When the Constitution defined state boundaries, the Constitution's framers did not intend to confer on the states the ownership of the exclusive economic zone's resources or all the revenues derived from them. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 (App. 2000).

When a government has the power to collect money, it has the power to disburse that money at its discretion unless the Constitution or applicable laws should provide otherwise. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 (App. 2000).

The Constitution's broadly stated express grants of power to the national government contain within them innumerable incidental or implied powers, as well as certain inherent powers. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 n.2 (App. 2000).

Because regulating the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of the exclusive economic zone's natural resources is a power expressly and exclusively delegated to the national government and because the incidental power to collect assessments levied pursuant to that delegated power is indisputably a national power, the power to disburse those funds is also a national power, except where the Constitution provides otherwise (such as in Article IX, section 6). Thus even were the states the underlying owners of the exclusive economic zone's resources, such a conclusion would not entitle the states to the exclusive economic zone's revenues except where the Constitution so provides. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431-32 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not assessed under the national government's constitutional authority to impose taxes on income. They are levied instead under the national government's constitutional authority to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of natural resources within the marine space of the Federated States of Micronesia beyond 12 miles from island baselines. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not income taxes because the national government's power to impose them does not derive from its power to tax income. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

The Constitution provides three instances of mandatory unconditional revenue sharing with the states, which the framers evidently thought enough. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

If a statutory provision is unconstitutional and can be severed from the rest of the legislative act, only that provision will be struck down. MGM Import-Export Co. v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2001).

The FSM Constitution does not apply to a lawsuit in a CNMI court over a transaction that occurred in Saipan. Northern Marianas Housing Corp. v. Finik, 12 FSM R. 441, 444 (Chk. 2004).

The Constitution's broadly stated express grants of power to the national government contain within them innumerable incidental or implied powers, as well as certain inherent powers. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

The power to provide for the national defense includes the inherent authority to protect the nation from threats both foreign and domestic. Protecting from these threats includes regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

A litigant may assert a claim in state or local court based upon a right provided under both a state and FSM Constitutions, and if a state constitution grants fewer rights than the FSM Constitution, a litigant may rely upon and assert his rights under the FSM Constitution. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 307 (App. 2007).

Although a state court's determination of a litigant's rights under that state's constitution may be final and not subject to review by the FSM Supreme Court, a state court's determination of a litigant's rights guaranteed under the FSM Constitution is subject to de novo review by the FSM Supreme Court since a state constitution cannot deprive the FSM Supreme Court of its jurisdiction granted under the FSM Constitution because the FSM Constitution is the supreme law of the land. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 307 (App. 2007).

The only explicit right to suffrage found in the FSM Constitution is the right to "vote in national elections." So an alleged denial of a right to suffrage in a Chuuk state election would be the denial of a right under the Chuuk Constitution's suffrage provisions, and not a denial of FSM constitutional right to suffrage. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

The FSM Constitution contains no privileges and immunities clause. In re Neron, 16 FSM R. 472, 474 (Pon. 2009).

Constitutional rights are generally prospective, not retroactive. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 304 (App. 2014).

The FSM Constitution's Article VII, section 2 provides no basis for a party to seek relief in the FSM Supreme Court and no basis on which the party is likely to prevail when the party does not argue that the Chuuk has an undemocratic constitution but instead contends that the Chuuk executive branch is expending Chuuk state funds (albeit originally appropriated by Congress) without an appropriation of those funds by the Chuuk Legislature and that this is a violation of Chuuk's democratic constitution. Mailo v. Lawrence, 20 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2015).

– Amendment

The National Constitutional Convention is given broad authority to revise the very foundation of government, and every institution and office of government may come within its reach. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 326 (App. 1990).

The nature of a constitutional convention as authorized by the FSM Constitution, with direct control of the people over the identity of convention delegates, and ultimate acceptance of the products of the convention's efforts, and the fact that the framers view a constitutional convention as a standard and preferred amendment mechanism, preclude congressional control over the convention's decision-making. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 327 (App. 1990).

Congress has no power to specify voting requirements for the Constitutional Convention and therefore any attempt to exercise this power so as to uphold tradition is also outside the powers of Congress under article V, section 2 of the Constitution, which is not an independent source of congressional power but which merely confirms the power of Congress, in exercising national legislative powers, to make special provisions for Micronesian tradition. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 328 (App. 1990).

The national court should not abstain from deciding a criminal case where the crime took place before the effective date of the 1991 amendment removing federal jurisdiction over major crimes because of the firmly expressed intention by the Constitutional Convention delegates as to the manner of transition from national jurisdiction to state jurisdiction. In re Ress, 5 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 1992).

An amendment to the Constitution may be proposed by a constitutional convention, popular initiative, or Congress in a manner provided by law. A proposed amendment becomes part of the Constitution when approved by ¾ of the votes cast on that amendment in each of ¾ of the states. These are the only methods by which the Constitution may be amended. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 149 (App. 2005).

– Bill of Attainder

A bill of attainder is any legislative act that applies to either named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial by substitution of a legislative for a judicial determination of guilt. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

A statute making all persons convicted of a felony in the Trust Territory courts ineligible for election to the FSM Congress does not constitute criminal punishment and does not substitute a legislative for a judicial determination of guilt and thus is not an unconstitutional bill of attainder. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

The statutory ineligibility of persons convicted of Trust Territory felonies is a valid exercise of Congress's constitutional power to prescribe additional qualifications for election to Congress, and is not unconstitutional as a deprivation of a liberty interest without due process of law, or as an ex post facto law, or as a bill of attainder. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

A case that alleges that a state law is, or contains, a bill of attainder in violation of the FSM Constitution is a claim that arises under the Constitution and over which the FSM Supreme Court may exercise jurisdiction. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

The Constitution's prohibition of bills of attainder in the Declaration of Rights applies to all legislative bodies within the FSM, not just to the FSM Congress. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

A bill of attainder is any legislative act that applies to either named individuals or to easily ascertainable members of a group in such a way as to inflict punishment on them without a judicial trial by substituting a legislative determination of guilt for a judicial one. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

As the constitutional prohibition of bills of attainder bars all such legislative acts, if a state law is a bill of attainder, the FSM Supreme Court has the jurisdiction to strike it (or the part of it that is a bill of attainder) down as unconstitutional and to enjoin its enforcement. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

A state governmental agency, entity, or subdivision does not have any national constitutional rights or national civil rights that it may enforce against the state (or one of its agencies) of which it is a part or which created it. Thus it cannot raise an FSM civil rights or constitutional claim against the state of which it is a part, since it has no such rights against the state that created it. This includes the constitutional right not to be subjected to a bill of attainder. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

A legislature's suspension of a state commission's activities does not constitute either a finding of guilt or an imposition of punishment on the commission's members. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 264 (Chk. 2019).

Punishment is a prerequisite to an act's being a bill of attainder. The determination of the existence of the punishment element of a constitutionally prohibited bill of attainder is dependent for resolution upon the facts and circumstances of individual cases. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 265 (Chk. 2019).

There are three tests to determine the existence of punishment element of a bill of attainder – the historical experience test, the functional test, and the motivational test. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 265 (Chk. 2019).

Under the historical experience test, the punishment element of a bill of attainder is met if the named individual or the easily ascertained group member is subjected to any of the penalties associated with bills of attainder or with bills of pains and penalties in England or in colonial or pre-Constitution America – namely death, imprisonment, banishment, or confiscation or forfeiture of property to the sovereign. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 265 (Chk. 2019).

The punishment element of a bill of attainder can also be met under the historical experience test by barring designated individuals or groups from participation in specified employments or vocations, a mode of punishment commonly employed against those legislatively branded as disloyal. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 265 (Chk. 2019).

The functional test for the punishment element of a bill of attainder looks beyond mere historical experience and analyzes whether the law under challenge, viewed in terms of the type and severity of burdens imposed, reasonably can be said to further nonpunitive legislative purposes. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 265 (Chk. 2019).

A legislature has furnished a nonpunitive legislative purpose for the statute's enactment when it has relied on its responsibility to control the state's finances and expenditures and to align those expenditures with the state's available revenues. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 265 (Chk. 2019).

The third recognized test for the punishment element of a bill of attainder is strictly a motivational one: inquiring whether the legislative record evinces a legislative intent to punish. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

A statute that suspends a state commission's activities but that does not punish the commission, its members, or any particular commission member, is not a bill of attainder because it does not inflict any punishment, either of the kind normally imposed in criminal cases or any punitive civil sanctions. In re

Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

When a state statute is not a bill of attainder and the court otherwise lacks jurisdiction, the plaintiffs' likelihood of success on the merits of their claims is zero. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 267 (Chk. 2019).

– Case or Dispute

A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 5 (Pon. 1985).

One reason the judicial power is limited to cases or disputes is to prevent the Judiciary from intruding into areas committed to other branches of government. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 1985).

The principal objectives of the case and dispute requirement are to enhance the ability of the courts to make fair and intelligent decisions, and to keep the judicial power within its proper role. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 178-79 (App. 1986).

A concrete case or dispute clearly exists where a state legislature contends that an act of the legislature requires payment of a tax on imports and others insist that the act is null and void, and, depending on the outcome of the controversy, money may or may not be collected, and penalties may or may not be imposed. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 179 (App. 1986).

Where there is no indication that the sentencing order in question is an attempt to modify or affect the powers of the Director of Public Safety, absent indications that the order prevents the director from doing anything he wishes, the order creates no case or dispute as to the scope of the director's powers, and the court is thus without jurisdiction to speak on the issue. Loch v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 224, 237 (App. 1986).

While the court has statutory authority to hear appeals regarding the conduct of elections, its power to grant relief is limited to ordering a recount or a revote. Only Congress can decide who is to be seated and once it has seated a member unconditionally the matter is nonjusticiable. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 & n.1 (App. 1993).

A suit against the national government by the states alleging that the states are constitutionally entitled to 50% of all revenues from the EEZ is justiciable because the Supreme Court must reconcile any conflict between sections of the Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 7 FSM R. 563, 569 (Pon. 1996).

Our Constitution's "case or dispute" clause, FSM Const. art. XI, § 6, mirrors the U.S. Constitution's "case or controversy" clause. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 481 (App. 2000).

Article XI, section 6 of the Constitution restricts the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction to cases and disputes and the court is thereby precluded from making policy pronouncements on the basis of hypothetical or academic issues. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 481 (App. 2000).

While our Constitution's wording is otherwise similar to that in article III, section 2, clause 1 of the U.S. Constitution, the FSM national courts have jurisdiction over "cases" and "disputes" while the U.S. federal courts have jurisdiction over "cases" and "controversies," but no significance can be attached to the difference between controversies and disputes. The FSM Constitution's case or dispute clause is thus similar to the U.S. Constitution's case or controversy clause. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

The Constitution does not authorize the FSM Supreme Court to declare the law anytime a justice feels moved to do so or authorize the court to respond to every request for a legal ruling directed to it by citizens. Instead, Article XI, section 6 of the Constitution grants jurisdiction, and the power to exercise judicial powers, only in five specific kinds of "disputes" and five types of "cases." FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

A case is not non-justiciable, one not proper for judicial review, when the plaintiff only seeks a fair chance to apply, through a constitutional procedure, for funds for which it is eligible. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 560, 563 (Chk. 2000).

The FSM Constitution's case or dispute clause is similar to the U.S. Constitution's case or controversy clause, and it has been determined that no significance could be attached to the difference between the terms "controversies" and "disputes." Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

One of the rationales for limiting a court's power to deciding the cases before it is to prevent the court from intruding into areas committed to the executive or legislative branches. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 98, 99 (Chk. 2001).

Legislative houses are the final judges of their memberships and under the Chuuk Constitution each house is the sole judge of the election and qualification of its members. This does not make an election case about a member-elect non-justiciable until such time as the house has taken its final action. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

It is settled law in the FSM that the FSM Supreme Court has the ability to issue declaratory judgments so long as there is a case or dispute within the meaning of article XI, sections 6(a) or 6(b). Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. 2001).

A court may decide only the case before it, and may not render an advisory opinion. A request for clarification that asks the court to opine on facts not before it, will be denied. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 24, 26 (Chk. 2003).

In order for a case to be "justiciable," or one over which the court has jurisdiction for purposes of rendering a decision, it must be one that is concrete and definite, and not abstract or hypothetical in nature. A case may not present questions that are moot or hypothetical, but rather must put forth issues that bear on the relationships of parties who have adverse legal interests. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 584 (App. 2004).

Although the extent and depth of either party's commitment to its view does not resolve the question of whether a justiciable dispute exists, the very divergence of those views highlights the fact that the important issues presented in the case bear in a fundamental way on the relationships between parties who have adverse legal interests. The issues resulting from these differing positions present a justiciable dispute. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 584-85 (App. 2004).

When a question is hypothetical, academic, or abstract, the court will not rule, and is generally precluded from ruling, on it. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 641 (Chk. 2004).

When the parties have stipulated to a judgment and one claim remains, in order for the court to exercise its jurisdiction to dispose of this one remaining claim, a case or dispute under Article XI, Section 6 of the FSM Constitution must exist. The case or dispute must exist at the time the court acts. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Jonas, 13 FSM R. 171, 173 (Kos. 2005).

While it is within Congress's sole power to determine, by statute, how, and for what, the national government will spend its funds, it is always within the judicial branch's power or jurisdiction to determine, in a proper case, whether those funds were spent in conformity with the statute. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 130 (Chk. 2006).

A trial justice may not, sua sponte, assert jurisdiction over a case which has been fully dismissed, particularly when that case was dismissed by another justice. When a case has been dismissed, there is no case or dispute remaining before the court. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 183 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The Constitution does not limit the grounds upon which the President can veto bills. The President can veto any bill for any reason he chooses. The Constitution requires the President to return to Congress, within ten days, a bill he has vetoed along with his objections. Congress then makes its own determination of whether those objections will stand by either overriding or sustaining the veto. Invalidation or nullification of a Presidential veto is textually committed by the Constitution to Congress because the power to override a Presidential veto is expressly delegated to Congress. Christian v. Urusemal, 14 FSM R. 291, 294 (App. 2006).

The President's reasons for vetoing a bill cannot be questioned in the judicial branch. The court has no jurisdiction to grant the relief of declaring the President's vetoes void regardless of what the President's objections were. Christian v. Urusemal, 14 FSM R. 291, 294 (App. 2006).

When the Congress Speaker asks the court, before any enactment process has been completed, to advise the parties on exactly where in the process they stand, the Speaker asks the court for an advisory opinion, which it cannot give. The Constitution restricts the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction to actual cases and disputes. It does not sit to render advisory opinions. Christian v. Urusemal, 14 FSM R. 291, 294 (App. 2006).

It is a basic principle of justiciability that a court will not render an advisory opinion. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 21 (Pon. 2008).

The FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction is constitutionally limited to actual cases and disputes thereby precluding it from making pronouncements on hypothetical, abstract, or academic issues or when the matter is moot. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

When the constitutional issues the plaintiffs raise are either a part of an election contest over which the court has no jurisdiction or are hypothetical, abstract, or academic, the court lacks jurisdiction over the case. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

The legal principles of justiciability, separation of powers, the political question doctrine do not apply to a case that, at its core, is one in which each party alleges the other breached a contract, and in which the defendant also counterclaims for civil rights violation, abuse of process, civil conspiracy, intentional interference with contractual relations, libel, and slander. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 484 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM Supreme Court does not have the jurisdiction or power to render advisory opinions since the Constitution only grants the court jurisdiction to decide actual or concrete cases or disputes. Kosrae v. Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 2010).

The court will not provide a decision in a case that is not currently before it and it will not render advisory opinions. Further, the court cannot opine on facts that are not currently before it. Lee v. FSM, 18 FSM R. 106, 108 (Pon. 2011).

A court will address the part of a motion to dismiss concerning subject-matter jurisdiction first since if the movant were to prevail on this ground any court ruling on the other grounds would be nothing more than advisory opinions, and the court does not have the authority to render advisory opinions. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 182, 183-84 (Chk. 2012).

When the defendant has filed a summary judgment motion and a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, the court will consider the motion to dismiss first because if the court were to grant the motion to dismiss, any ruling the court made on the summary judgment motion would, at best, be an advisory opinion since it would have been made without jurisdiction and the FSM Supreme Court does not have the authority to render advisory opinions. Hauk v. Mijares, 18 FSM R. 185, 186-87 (Chk. 2012).

A motion for preliminary approval of a settlement must be denied when the class plaintiffs seek approval of a compromise of a hypothetical cause of action that they have not pled against a party that is neither a defendant nor a cross-defendant. Because there is no case or dispute for the settlement agreement to settle, the settlement agreement cannot be approved since there is no real settlement to approve or reject and since the court cannot make hypothetical rulings. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 227, 231 (Yap 2013).

An appellate court does not sit to render decisions on abstract legal propositions or issue advisory opinions. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 513 (App. 2016).

Even when the court generally has jurisdiction over a case's subject matter, that case still must be justiciable in order for the court to be able to grant any relief. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 280 (Pon. 2017).

– Case or Dispute – Mootness

A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 5 (Pon. 1985).

A claim becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. If an appellate court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 7 FSM R. 11, 16 (App. 1995).

A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

The FSM Supreme Court's lack of jurisdiction over, or inability to decide, a moot case is firmly rooted in the FSM Constitution's requirement that there be a case or a dispute. A case or dispute becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

If an appellate court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

When even if the court reversed the garnishment order, any relief it could grant the FSM on the sovereign immunity issue would be ineffectual since 6 F.S.M.C. 707 makes the FSM no longer subject to garnishment of funds it owes to a state, and when, although the general rule is that the payment of a judgment does not make an appeal moot, the FSM has stated that it will not seek repayment of the funds that it paid the plaintiff, the FSM would have no interest in the case's outcome and the issues it raised on appeal are moot. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482-83 (App. 2000).

An exception to the mootness doctrine exists when there is a situation in which an otherwise moot case may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 483 (App. 2000).

When other trial division cases recognize the principle of sovereign immunity and the trial court decision appealed from only observed that in the absence of a specific expression by the legislature, sovereign immunity would not prevent the court from garnishing property held by the FSM for a state, when the constitutionality of the FSM's sovereign immunity statute was not before the court, and when the FSM served only as a mere garnishee in a situation which Congress has prevented from recurring by the enactment of 6 F.S.M.C. 707, the trial court decision will not effect future litigation involving the FSM and the FSM's appeal is thus moot. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 483-84 (App. 2000).

When it appears that the problem will arise again, and would otherwise be incapable of review, the court has jurisdiction because the most notable exception to the mootness doctrine is a situation in which an otherwise moot case may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. 2000).

Because the FSM Supreme Court generally (with some exceptions) lacks jurisdiction over a moot cause of action, it must be dismissed. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 119 (Pon. 2001).

Earmarking $50,000 of a prior appropriation to be spent in the plaintiff municipality does not take away the municipality's standing by making its claim moot when the appropriation still has an undifferentiated category called "other needs," and when the municipality's past inability to apply for funds already spent, and the likelihood that the situation would arise again, but be incapable of review, all favor a finding of continuing standing. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. 2001).

An argument that a party once had standing but no longer does is an argument that the case is now moot. One exception to the mootness doctrine is that the court retains jurisdiction when the problem will arise again, and would otherwise be incapable of review. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. 2001).

No justiciable controversy is presented if events subsequent to an appeal's filing make the issues presented in a case moot. A claim becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome, and if an appellate court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot. Enactment of a statute after judgment is entered and before the appeal is heard can make an appeal moot. Wainit v. Weno, 10 FSM R. 601, 610 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

An appellate court may receive proof or take notice of facts outside the record for determining whether a question presented to it is moot. Wainit v. Weno, 10 FSM R. 601, 610 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When an appeal is dismissed as moot, the established rule is for the appellate court to reverse or vacate the judgment below and dismiss the case. Wainit v. Weno, 10 FSM R. 601, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The FSM Constitution's "case or dispute" clause restricts the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction to cases and disputes, and the court is thereby precluded from making policy pronouncements on the basis of hypothetical or academic issues. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 409-10 (App. 2003).

The Supreme Court's lack of jurisdiction over, or inability to decide, a moot case is firmly rooted in the Constitution's requirement that there be a case or a dispute. A case or dispute becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. If an appellate court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 410

(App. 2003).

When the issues presented in a petition for a writ of mandamus concerning the discovery of non-party borrower records have become moot because, by virtue of a trial court order, no further discovery will take place, the issuance of a writ of mandamus to the trial court to disallow or restrict the discovery would be ineffectual since there will be no further discovery. The petition will therefore be dismissed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 410 (App. 2003).

There may be exceptions to the mootness doctrine, e.g., for situations in which an otherwise moot case may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 410 n.5 (App. 2003).

When the sole issue before the appellate court was whether the Director's rejection of an election petition as untimely was in compliance with the applicable statute and when the only relief the court could have granted would have been to vacate the Director's denial, remand the matter to the Director, and order the Director to consider the petition on the merits and when the Director himself has resolved this one issue in petitioner's favor and considered and ruled on the petition's merits, there is no further relief that the court could grant that the Director has not already granted. The appeal is moot. Fritz v. National Election Dir., 11 FSM R. 442, 444 (App. 2003).

If an appellate court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot. Fritz v. National Election Dir., 11 FSM R. 442, 444 (App. 2003).

Article XI, section 6 of the Constitution restricts the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction to actual cases and disputes. The court is thereby precluded from making pronouncements on the basis of hypothetical, abstract, or academic issues or when the matter is moot. Fritz v. National Election Dir., 11 FSM R. 442, 444 (App. 2003).

An appellate court does not sit to render decisions on abstract legal propositions or to render advisory opinions. Fritz v. National Election Dir., 11 FSM R. 442, 444 (App. 2003).

When any relief that a court would grant would be ineffective, then the court must deem the dispute moot. The mootness doctrine precludes a court from addressing a dispute's merits when the court can no longer grant any relief which would have any practical effect. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 506 (App. 2003).

When the submission of a letter constitutes compliance with the court order to file a brief, the petitioners' central claim that it cannot be compelled to submit a brief is rendered moot, and in the usual case, this would preclude the consideration of any of the petition's issues because the FSM Supreme Court lacks jurisdiction over, and cannot decide, moot cases since the Constitution requires that there be a case or a dispute. But an exception to the mootness doctrine exists when an otherwise moot case may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation, and when it appears that the problem will arise again, and would otherwise be incapable of review, a court may still have jurisdiction under this exception. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 506 (App. 2003).

A case or dispute becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 506 (App. 2003).

A claim is moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, as distinguished from an hypothetical or abstract dispute. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse interests. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 580 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Even when the real parties in interest have already taken office, both the plaintiffs and the real parties in interest have a legally cognizable interest in the outcome, because if the election is declared unconstitutionally void, the plaintiffs may have another chance at victory and if the election is declared valid, then the real parties in interest may savor their victory and because it is not an abstract dispute, but a very real problem which threatens the very foundation of democracy, the right of the people to vote in free and fair and democratic elections. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 580 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

An exception to the mootness doctrine clearly applies when it appears to the court that the problem may rise again, and when a determination of the issues may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 580 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When an appeal was from an order revoking pretrial release and the issue on appeal was the right to pretrial release, the appellant's subsequent conviction and release makes the appeal moot. Reddy v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 595, 596 (App. 2003).

No justiciable controversy is presented if events subsequent to the filing of an appeal make the issues presented moot, and an appellate court may receive proof or take notice of facts outside the record for determining whether a question presented to it is moot. Reddy v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 595, 596-97 (App. 2003).

The court is without jurisdiction to consider and will dismiss a moot appeal. Reddy v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 595, 597 (App. 2003).

When the appellants have not in fact been required to perform any non-statutory accounting and another appellant has already submitted an accounting, the appellants' challenge of a trial court order that others complete a proper accounting is moot. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 42 (App. 2003).

A dispute becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome and if any relief it could grant would be ineffectual. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 42 (App. 2003).

When even if the issue of mootness had been raised, the case still fell within the exception to the mootness doctrine that it may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation and may be capable of repetition, yet evading review, the court will address the issue. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 49 (App. 2003).

An interlocutory appeal may be considered moot when the trial court has issued a final judgment in the case below and the appellant has since filed a notice of appeal on the same issues. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 12 FSM R. 456, 460 (App. 2004).

Under an exception to the mootness doctrine, when the court's rulings will have a continuing effect on future events and future litigation and will offer guidance to future litigants, which should have the positive effect of eliminating or lessening unwarranted attempts at interlocutory appeals, thus conserving judicial resources, the court will review the matter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 12 FSM R. 456, 460 (App. 2004).

A criminal defendant's claim that if he is not granted a stay of his sentence of imprisonment pending appeal his appeal will become moot can only be deemed frivolous or for the purpose of delay since even if a criminal appellant has finished his sentence before his appeal is decided, that will not render his appeal moot because of a criminal conviction's collateral consequences, such as the legal disabilities that ensue. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 463, 469 (Chk. 2006).

A case becomes moot when the party raising an issue lacks a legally cognizable interest in the outcome of the issue, and if the relief sought would, if granted, be ineffectual. Wainit v. FSM, 14 FSM R. 476, 478 (App. 2006).

No justiciable controversy is presented if events subsequent to the filing of an appeal make the issues presented moot. The FSM Supreme Court lacks jurisdiction to consider cases or issues that are moot, and therefore must dismiss or deny the same. Wainit v. FSM, 14 FSM R. 476, 478 (App. 2006).

When the appellant has been released from jail on parole, any relief that the appellate court could grant the appellant on his request for release pending the outcome of his appeal, would be entirely ineffectual. As such, the appellant's request for release pending appeal is moot and will be denied as moot. Wainit v. FSM, 14 FSM R. 476, 478 (App. 2006).

Since an appellate court may receive proof or take notice of facts outside the record for determining whether a question presented to it is moot, the court therefore may take notice of the opinion in a related appeal case. Nikichiw v. Marsolo, 15 FSM R. 177, 178 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

No justiciable controversy is presented if events subsequent to an appeal's filing make the issues presented in a case moot. A claim becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome, and if an appellate court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot, and if the appeal has become moot, the court no longer has jurisdiction to hear and decide it. Nikichiw v. Marsolo, 15 FSM R. 177, 179 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the opinion and the writ of prohibition issued in a different appeal has already granted the appellants all of the relief that they first sought in this case, this appeal has become moot because any relief the court could now grant would be ineffectual, and a motion to dismiss will therefore be granted. Nikichiw v. Marsolo, 15 FSM R. 177, 179 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When an appeal is dismissed as moot, the established rule is for the appellate court to reverse or vacate the judgment below and dismiss the case. Nikichiw v. Marsolo, 15 FSM R. 177, 179 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

An exception to the mootness doctrine clearly applies when it appears to the court that the problem may rise again, and when a determination of the issues may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation. Kinemary v. Siver, 16 FSM R. 201, 208 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A case becomes moot when the party raising the issue lacks a legally cognizable interest in the issue's outcome, and if the relief sought would, if granted, be ineffectual. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403 (Chk. 2009).

When the issues raised in an application for a writ of habeas corpus are moot because the applicants have already been granted the relief sought – release from jail – any consideration or relief would thus be ineffectual. No justiciable case or dispute is presented when events subsequent to a case's filing make the issues presented moot. Since the FSM Supreme Court lacks jurisdiction to consider moot cases or issues, it must dismiss a moot application because, when the court lacks jurisdiction over a case, it should not remain lifelessly on the docket however harmless that may seem. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403 (Chk. 2009).

Even if the prosecution succeeded in convincing an appellate court that a trial court's rulings were erroneous, the prosecution would be constitutionally barred from retrying an accused found not guilty and that would make the prosecution appeal a moot appeal seeking an advisory opinion on statutory interpretation and the appellate court does not have jurisdiction to consider or decide moot appeals. Kosrae v. Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 2010).

A case or dispute becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 634, 635 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character or one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 634, 635 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A case would fall within the exception to the mootness doctrine when it may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation, and may be capable of repetition yet evading review. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 634, 635-36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A motion to dismiss for mootness will be denied when the court record demonstrates that the action in question has occurred in the past, and but for the injunction, would have occurred in this instance absent the issue being considered, the action in question will likely occur in the future, thereby effectively evading review save for the application of the doctrine of "capable of repetition, yet evading review." Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 634, 636 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A motion is not "moot" when the parties still have a legally cognizable interest in the case's outcome because a case or dispute becomes moot only when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome. Berman v. FSM Nat'l Police, 19 FSM R. 118, 126 (App. 2013).

An appellate court may receive proof or take notice of facts outside the record to determine whether a question presented to it is moot, and, if events after an appeal is filed make the issue presented moot, no justiciable dispute is presented and the court is without jurisdiction to consider the appeal – it must dismiss a moot appeal. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 143-44 (App. 2013).

A claim becomes moot when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the litigation's outcome. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 144 (App. 2013).

A court is precluded from making pronouncements on the basis of a hypothetical, abstract, or academic issue or when the matter is moot. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 144 (App. 2013).

When an appellant asserts that the six-year statute of limitations means he is not legally liable for any payments that were due over six years before the lawsuit was filed and all the extra interest that accrued because those payments were missed and the appellee has conceded that the judgment against the appellant should be reduced by those amounts, the parties no longer have a legally cognizable dispute about this issue's outcome and the issue is moot. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 144 (App. 2013).

Since no justiciable case or dispute is presented when events after the filing of an appeal make the issues presented moot, the appellate court lacks jurisdiction to consider or decide moot appeals. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 20 FSM R. 629, 631 (App. 2016).

An appeal will be dismissed if events after its filing make the issues presented moot because the court lacks jurisdiction to consider moot cases. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 118 (App. 2018).

A moot case does not present a justiciable dispute. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 118 (App. 2018).

An appellate court may receive proof of, or take notice of, facts outside the record to determine if an appeal has become moot. In most cases, it would be difficult to determine mootness any other way. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 118 (App. 2018).

Among the circumstances that create mootness are rulings in other adjudicatory proceedings, including rulings by the same court in the same or companion proceedings. Generally, an intervening judicial decision entered in a collateral proceeding will render moot a case or an issue arising therein when the decision resolved the controversy or the issue. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 118 (App. 2018).

All the appellants' substantive claims are moot and will be dismissed when those claims no longer present a justiciable dispute because previous appellate decisions have resolved them in their entirety. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 120 (App. 2018).

Although the usual result when an appeal becomes moot is for the appellate court to vacate the judgment below and order that the case be dismissed, when the case below has already been dismissed, no purpose would be served by vacating that dismissal and then dismissing it again. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 120 (App. 2018).

Article XI, § 6 of the Constitution restricts the court's jurisdiction to only actual "cases" or "disputes." A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 386-87 (Pon. 2019).

The court is precluded from making policy pronouncements on the basis of hypothetical or academic issues. If the court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 387 (Pon. 2019).

A well-established exception to the mootness doctrine exists when an otherwise moot case may have a continuing effect on future events, including future litigation. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 387 (Pon. 2019).

Although the appellant contends that if its helicopter is sent to Guam, its appeal is in danger of becoming moot, mootness is not even a consideration for all of the issues turning on U.S. federal law because those issues, if raised, will then be properly before the court where they should be determined, and, if there are any remaining issues restricted solely to FSM law, the appellant, if it chooses, can rely on the capable-of-repetition-yet-evading-review doctrine to avoid a dismissal based on mootness. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 580, 585 (Pon. 2020).

– Case or Dispute – Political Question

Where there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of the issue to a coordinate branch of government, such as Congress being the sole judge of the elections of its members, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 (App. 1993).

Placement of proposed constitutional amendments on the ballot does not transform a claim into a non-justiciable political question. It does not constitute a commitment of the issue to any of the branches of government. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 73, 74-75 (Pon. 1999).

When there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, such as Congress being the sole judge of the elections of its members, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by a court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16-17 (App. 2006).

When there is no textually demonstrable constitutional commitment that declaring a trochus harvest is reserved solely to one branch of government without the involvement of any other branch or that the power to engage in commercial activity is reserved solely to one branch of government, the political question doctrine does not apply. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 17 (App. 2006).

An argument that the political question doctrine bars the court from becoming involved in a case because a state law gives a state regulatory body the power followed to its logical conclusion would mean that no court could ever rule an executive action illegal because some law empowers the executive to make that decision. In other words, the principle of judicial review, enshrined in both the FSM and Pohnpei Constitutions, would be overthrown and the government's actions could never be questioned or reviewed in any court. That cannot be so. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 17 (App. 2006).

When there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of the issue to a coordinate branch of government (such as Congress being the sole judge of the elections of its members) it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 130 (Chk. 2006).

A President's reason for vetoing the bills passed during the Fourteenth Congress's Second Special Session is a non-justiciable issue because when the Constitution has a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Christian v. Urusemal, 14 FSM R. 291, 294 (App. 2006).

If Congress seats a candidate unconditionally an election contest becomes a non-justiciable political question. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 356, 359 (Chk. 2009).

The FSM's argument that the court is without jurisdiction to hear the defendant's counterclaims in the ground that they are nonjusticiable political questions because the Compact is a treaty between the FSM and the United States and the improvement of infrastructure through grants to the FSM is specifically contemplated by the Compact, the implementation of which must comply with requirements spelled out in the Compact, is without merit because, carried to its logical end, it would also bar the FSM from asserting its contract claims against the defendant since the contract was entered into to facilitate improving infrastructure in compliance with the Compact requirements attached to the FSM receiving the funds to pay for infrastructure improvements. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 482 (Pon. 2009).

The legal principles of justiciability, separation of powers, the political question doctrine do not apply to a case that, at its core, is one in which each party alleges the other breached a contract, and in which the defendant also counterclaims for civil rights violation, abuse of process, civil conspiracy, intentional interference with contractual relations, libel, and slander. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 484 (Pon. 2009).

When the Constitution contains a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the Constitution's requirements for the separation of powers. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 186 (Pon. 2010).

Under the political question doctrine, when there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by a court because of the separation of governmental powers provided for by the Constitution. Chuuk v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 373, 375 (Chk. 2016).

Among the formulations describing a political question is a case where there is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of respect due coordinate branches of government; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question. Chuuk v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 373, 375-76 (Chk. 2016).

Since the national government, and therefore Congress, has no discretion but must remit the first 50% of the national tax collected to the state treasury of the state it was collected in, a dispute about that first 50% would not be a nonjusticiable political question, although a dispute over a percentage higher than 50% would be a nonjusticiable political question textually committed to a discretionary Congressional decision. Chuuk v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 373, 376 (Chk. 2016).

The matter does not present a nonjusticiable political question when it is not apparent why the constitutional mandate that 50% of national tax revenues be paid into the treasury of the state where collected would not be self-executing (except if Congress wants a higher percentage remitted to the states). Chuuk v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 373, 376 (Chk. 2016).

When the Constitution contains a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a non-justiciable political question not to be decided by a court because of the constitutionally mandated separation of powers. This is as true of the Pohnpei Constitution as it is of the FSM Constitution. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 280 (Pon. 2017).

The Pohnpei Constitution clearly and demonstrably textually commits the investigation of, and the impeachment of Pohnpei state government officials, including the Pohnpei Chief Justice, to the Pohnpei Legislature. An impeachment proceeding's procedure, including its timing, is thus also a non-justiciable political question. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 280 (Pon. 2017).

The Pohnpei Legislature's procedures for, including the timing of, its investigation and possible impeachment of the Pohnpei Chief Justice, are non-justiciable. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 280 (Pon. 2017).

A preliminary injunction seeking to enjoin the possible impeachment of the Pohnpei Chief Justice, will be denied when there is no possibility of success on the merits because the case involves a non-justiciable political question, and the equities all favor the Pohnpei Legislature, and the public interest will be served by permitting the Legislature's investigation of a possible impeachment to proceed. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 281 (Pon. 2017).

Whether Congress should discipline, or should have disciplined, a member is nonjusticiable – it is a political question that is beyond the court's power or authority. This is because when there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by a court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution, and the question of disciplining Congress members is textually and demonstrably committed to a coordinate branch of government – Congress itself. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 511 (Pon. 2020).

The decision whether to discipline a member is a nonjusticiable political question left to Congress's discretion. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 511 (Pon. 2020).

– Case or Dispute – Ripeness

When a party has been specifically warned by the attorney general that he is required to obtain a foreign investment permit under national statute which imposes criminal sanctions for failure to comply, the question of whether a permit is required is sufficiently ripe to support a suit seeking declaratory judgment. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 418-19 (Pon. 1988).

When the government is attempting to enforce against the plaintiffs tax statutes which the plaintiffs believe, by the statutes' own terms, do not properly apply to them, and the plaintiffs have been warned that they are potentially subject to criminal and civil penalties if they do not comply, it is a case or dispute sufficiently ripe for the plaintiffs to seek a declaratory judgment. Dorval Tankship Pty, Ltd. v. Department of Finance, 8 FSM R. 111, 115 (Chk. 1997).

When the plaintiff argues it is exempt from the tax under state and national law as an entity wholly owned and operated by the national government functioning solely for public benefit and the state asserts that the plaintiff's corporate status exposes it to state taxation (regardless of the national government's stock ownership and indirect control) and claims that the FSM Constitution does not authorize the national government to prevent the imposition of a "use tax" on imported goods used or consumed in the state, and when the state requests a declaration that its use tax scheme does not violate the FSM Constitution and makes its motion aware that the court's resolution of the plaintiff's motion does not require it to address whether the use tax law conflicts with the FSM Constitution even though the plaintiff's complaint includes a cause of action raising that very argument, all of the issues addressed in the motions are properly raised by the pleadings and involve justiciable controversies of special public concern worthy of resolution at this time. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 292, 293-94 (Pon. 1999).

An objection based on lack of ripeness in a case concerning appropriated funds that have not yet been distributed cannot prevail when the manner of the funds' distribution appears (at this stage of the proceedings) to violate the Constitution. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 560, 562-63 (Chk. 2000).

The court lacks jurisdiction to hear an election appeal filed too soon because the statute does not grant the court jurisdiction over election cases until the administrative steps and time frames in 9 F.S.M.C. 902 have been adhered to. Such an appeal is therefore dismissed as premature (unripe). Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

When the plaintiff's claims all derive from the common allegation that its facility will be taken from it at the end of the parties' lease, when the parties have signed a lease agreement that purports to confer ownership of the facility on the defendant at a specified time, and when the parties have a good faith dispute as to the validity of this result under the National Constitution, this renders the case ripe for adjudication. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 229 (Pon. 2005).

Standing is a threshold issue going to this court's subject matter jurisdiction and thus is addressed first. Standing must be found for each count of a complaint or that count will be dismissed. Ripeness is also a threshold issue. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 362 (Pon. 2005).

A matter must also be ripe for adjudication for there to be a case or dispute over which the court can exercise jurisdiction. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

When any attorney's fee forfeiture (which is the plaintiff's allegedly threatened injury) could not possibly occur until after trial and conviction of his clients in another case, and, since only if that occurs, the government might (but not even then, certainly) seek forfeiture of any fee earned by the plaintiff, the alleged injury is, at this time, too speculative and remote for this case to be ripe for adjudication. It is thus not a concrete controversy capable of adjudication now since none of the four counts, to the extent that they seek redress for or protection of the plaintiff's allegedly threatened fees, are ripe for adjudication. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

When the complaint either asserts the rights of others not a party to the case or seeks relief not available here or seeks redress for or protection of the plaintiff's allegedly threatened attorney's fees and the fee claim is not ripe for adjudication, the entire complaint will be dismissed for lack of standing and ripeness. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

Although it is doubtful whether the Constitution's Professional Services Clause protects an attorney's fee from forfeiture in any or all circumstances where the law would seem to allow it, that is an issue that must await another day when there is a case or dispute before the court ripe for adjudication. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

When Chuuk has warned Continental that it is required to collect a service tax as set forth in a regulation implementing a tax statute and that criminal penalties may be imposed on Continental or its employees for failure to comply, the question of whether the Chuuk service tax on Continental passengers and freight shippers is lawful is sufficiently ripe to support a suit seeking declaratory judgment. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 157-58 (Chk. 2010).

Ripeness is also a threshold justiciability issue. For the FSM Supreme Court to exercise its jurisdiction, the issue raised must be ripe for adjudication. A matter is ripe when there is an actual, present controversy not merely a hypothetical or speculative conflict. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 133 (Pon. 2011).

When the plaintiffs allege a possible, theoretical injury, but have asserted no real injury to them and when they have also not alleged a threatened injury, they have not alleged any actual harm to them under the aforementioned circumstances, and therefore as to this contention, the matter is not ripe for adjudication. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 133 (Pon. 2011).

A party cannot sue until its cause of action has accrued. A matter must be ripe for adjudication for there to be a case or dispute over which the court can exercise jurisdiction. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 545 (Chk. 2016).

For the FSM Supreme Court to exercise its jurisdiction, the issue raised must be ripe for adjudication. Ripeness is a threshold issue. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 10 (Pon. 2018).

A matter is ripe when there is an actual, present dispute not merely a hypothetical or speculative conflict. A matter must be ripe for adjudication for there to be a case or dispute over which the court can exercise jurisdiction. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 10 (Pon. 2018).

When, to whatever extent the plaintiff's claim is based on any defendant's alleged failure to comply with Pohnpei Supreme Court orders, the claim is not ripe for adjudication because the Pohnpei Supreme Court has not yet ruled whether the defendant was within its rights to take the action it did. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 11 (Pon. 2018).

– Case or Dispute – Standing

Standing to sue was an unsettled area of United States law when the FSM Constitution was ratified and the issue of standing to sue within the FSM is one that calls for independent analysis rather than rigid adherence to the decisions of United States courts construing that Constitution. Aisek v. Foreign Inv. Bd., 2 FSM R. 95, 98-99 (Pon. 1985).

In deciding who may litigate in the FSM Supreme Court, the goal is to develop principles consistent with the language of the Constitution and calculated to meet the needs of the people and institutions within the Federated States of Micronesia. Aisek v. Foreign Inv. Bd., 2 FSM R. 95, 100 (Pon. 1985).

Where dive shop operators allege actual or threatened economic injury as a result of increased competition flowing from business activities of a pleasure cruise ship providing diving opportunities in the same geographical area where the plaintiffs operate, and where they have placed before the court information sufficient to establish the reasonableness of their fear of economic injury, their law suit challenging the legality of the issuance of a foreign investment permit to a cruise ship may not be dismissed for lack of standing. Aisek v. Foreign Inv. Bd., 2 FSM R. 95, 100 (Pon. 1985).

Where plaintiffs seek to challenge issuance to a third party of a permit which plaintiffs reasonably allege will cause them harm, and where they allege that the actions of a national senator were crucial to issuance of the permit, those plaintiffs have standing to be heard on the question of whether the senator's membership on the board is violative of the "incompatibility clause," article IX, section 13 of the FSM Constitution. Aisek v. Foreign Inv. Bd., 2 FSM R. 95, 101 (Pon. 1985).

There is in the FSM no separate requirement that there be a nexus, that is, a logical connection between persons threatened by injury from the actions of an administrative agency and the statutory provisions under which the agency is operating. Aisek v. Foreign Inv. Bd., 2 FSM R. 95, 102 (Pon. 1985).

The issue of standing to sue, because it was a particularly unsettled area in United States law when the FSM Constitution was drafted and ratified, is an area especially calling for independent analysis rather than adherence to decisions construing similar provisions in the United States Constitution. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 178-79 (App. 1986).

The standing requirement is not expressly stated in the Constitution but implied as an antecedent to the constitutional case or dispute requirement, and should be interpreted so as to implement the objectives of that requirement. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 179 (App. 1986).

Business people have standing to challenge the constitutionality of an excise tax based on imports where the addition of the tax increases the cost that business people must pay for goods intended for resale to consumers. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 180 (App. 1986).

Plaintiff's possessory interest in land is sufficient to maintain standing to bring action for damages wrought when a road was built across the land. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 508, 511 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

When a public officer is requested to perform a duty mandated by law which he feels would violate the constitution, he has standing to apply to the court for a declaratory judgment declaring the statute unconstitutional. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 334 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

A party has standing to sue when that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable controversy to obtain judicial resolution of that controversy. The implied requirement that a party have standing should be interpreted so as to implement the objectives of the constitutional requirement that a case or dispute exist. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 153 (Pon. 1993).

A leasehold interest in land is a sufficient possessory interest to give a party standing to maintain an action for trespass. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 154 (Pon. 1993).

Private individuals lack standing to assert claims on behalf of the public. When the state government has certified ownership of land, and the traditional leaders' suit to have that land declared public land failed, private individuals cannot raise the same claim. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 157 (Pon. 1993).

Noncitizen plaintiffs have standing to sue for trespass if they have a leasehold interest in the land. Ponape Enterprises Co. v. Soumwei, 6 FSM R. 341, 343 (Pon. 1994).

The FSM will not apply a Trust Territory rule based on Trust Territory Code provisions that only the government had standing to challenge title to land to deny standing to private persons challenging title to land under entirely separate FSM Constitutional provisions on citizenship, especially since the authority for the Trust Territory rule was derived from now-deleted language in an American legal encyclopedia. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 383-84 (Pon. 1994).

A party who denies ownership of the seized items has no standing to ask for return of the property. Chuuk v. Mijares, 7 FSM R. 149, 150 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A surviving co-obligor has standing to sue for failure to obtain credit life insurance for a deceased co-obligor. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 249 (Chk. 1995).

The states have standing to sue the national government where the states claim they are entitled to 50% of all revenues from the EEZ because it is an otherwise justiciable controversy in which they have a sufficient stake or interest. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 7 FSM R. 563, 570 (Pon. 1996).

While it may be that in the usual case a judgment debtor would not have standing to contest or appeal the distribution of funds collected pursuant to the judgment, but where the result of the case will have a substantial financial impact on the judgment debtor, he is an aggrieved party with standing to appeal because standing exists where a party has a direct pecuniary interest in the outcome of the litigation. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 669 (App. 1996).

While it is generally true that parties may not assert the rights of third parties or non-parties, where the plaintiff ship charterers would be subject to the obligations and liabilities of an employer, such as withholding taxes, and that failure to perform those obligations would expose the plaintiffs to civil and criminal penalties if the crew is subject to FSM wage and salary taxes, the plaintiffs are attempting to assert only their own rights and have standing. Dorval Tankship Pty, Ltd. v. Department of Finance, 8 FSM R. 111, 115 (Chk. 1997).

Private individuals lack standing to assert claims on behalf of the public and cannot bring claims against the state on behalf of the public with respect to state land. Therefore a private landowner does not have standing to sue the state with respect to black rocks deposited below the ordinary high water mark because that is state land, but he does have standing to sue with respect to black rocks located above the high water mark and on his land. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 341 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When, at the formal hearings, a person testified that her father had willed the parcel at issue to her brother and she did not submit any testimony in support of her own personal claim even though she was given an opportunity at the end of her testimony to give a statement about any "last word will" made by her father, neither she, nor her daughter, now claiming under her, had a right to notice of the parcel's Determination of Ownership because she was not an interested party, and her daughter cannot now claim to be an interested party. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 513, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A municipality that is one of eight eligible to receive development funds has standing to raise whether it has been fairly allowed to apply for some of them. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. 2000).

Because the court must have a case or dispute before it in order to exercise jurisdiction, if a plaintiff lacks standing to bring a suit there is then no case or dispute to adjudicate. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 51 (Chk. 2001).

A contention that a plaintiff is not singled out and thus suffers no irreparable harm peculiar to itself because it is one of eight in the same boat, does not indicate a lack of standing on the plaintiff's part, but rather that any of the eight would also have had standing to sue if it so chose. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. 2001).

Earmarking $50,000 of a prior appropriation to be spent in the plaintiff municipality does not take away the municipality's standing by making its claim moot when the appropriation still has an undifferentiated category called "other needs," and when the municipality's past inability to apply for funds already spent, and the likelihood that the situation would arise again, but be incapable of review, all favor a finding of continuing standing. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. 2001).

An argument that a party once had standing but no longer does is an argument that the case is now moot. One exception to the mootness doctrine is that the court retains jurisdiction when the problem will arise again, and would otherwise be incapable of review. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. 2001).

A person may act as a clan representative and be a party-plaintiff in his representative capacity when he was an acknowledged lineage representative prior to and during the negotiations over the lineage land and was named as a lineage representative on the land's certificate of title. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 158-59 (Chk. 2002).

An afokur has no right to sue for himself over lineage land and will be dismissed from such a lawsuit as a party in his individual capacity, because even if the lineage should prevail in the suit, the court could not award the afokur anything since whatever he might personally receive would be contingent on the lineage granting him permission to share in its recovery. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2002).

By not granting a defendant's motion to dismiss on the grounds that plaintiffs lacked standing, the court does not somehow imply that it, at that stage of the proceedings, has made any findings of ownership or right to possession of the property in question. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 333, 336 (Pon. 2003).

Since a finding of contempt is final and appealable, the legality of the specific sanction of imprisonment should be reviewed at the same time in the interest of judicial economy. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 380 (App. 2003).

The standing issue is addressed first as it is a threshold issue going to a court's subject matter jurisdiction. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 496 (Kos. 2003).

The standing requirement is not expressly stated in the FSM Constitution, but is implied as an antecedent to the Article XI, Section 6 "case or dispute" requirement and should be interpreted so as to implement that requirement's objectives. The issue of standing to sue is an area which calls for the FSM Supreme Court's independent analysis rather than adherence to decisions construing similar provisions in the U.S. Constitution. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 496 (Kos. 2003).

A party has standing to sue when that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable controversy to obtain judicial resolution of that controversy. The implied requirement that a party have standing should be interpreted so as to implement the objectives of the constitutional requirement that a case or dispute exist. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 496 (Kos. 2003).

This court is mandated by Article XI, Section 11 of the Constitution to first consult and apply sources from within the FSM. The overall goal is to develop principles of standing which are consistent with the Constitution's language and designed to meet the needs of the nation's people and institutions. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 496-97 (Kos. 2003).

Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing. First, the party must allege a sufficient stake in the outcome of the controversy and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action. Second, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. While not constitutionally based, three additional factors or prudential principles need to be considered before the standing question can be resolved. First, generalized grievances shared by substantially the whole population do not normally warrant standing. Second, even when an injury sufficient to satisfy the constitutional requirement is alleged, the petitioner generally must assert its own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest its claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties. Third, the petitioner's complaint must fall within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 497 (Kos. 2003).

The first standing factor to be addressed is whether the plaintiff has alleged a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and whether it has suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the defendant's allegedly illegal action. The injury must be an invasion of a legally protected interest which is concrete and particularized, and actual or imminent. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 497 (Kos. 2003).

The second standing factor is that there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of. The injury must be fairly traceable to the defendant's challenged action and not the result of the independent action of some third party not before the court. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 497 (Kos. 2003).

The Kosrae Legislature's alleged injury of not having its policy decisions abided by or infringed upon, cannot be fairly traced to the Development Bank's challenged actions under the Investment Development Act because while the bank has the responsibility to evaluate and comment upon a project's commercial feasibility and public infrastructure need, the FDA, not the bank has the loan's final approval. Therefore, the alleged injury cannot be traced to the bank's allegedly faulty or incomplete reports that may or may not have led to the loan's approval when the loan's approval was the result of independent action of the FDA which is not a party before the court. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 497-98 (Kos. 2003).

Another standing factor to be addressed is redressability. Will the relief requested make any legal difference that will redress the petitioner's injury? Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 498 (Kos. 2003).

When the statutory language states only that a state government shall submit a project and when no evidence was offered that the Kosrae Legislature had any formal role in the submittal process, either by way of formal approval or the ability to disapprove a project, the court can find no legally delineated role for the Kosrae Legislature in the submittal process and therefore no injury to it from the governor's submittal. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 499 (Kos. 2003).

Passage of a legislative resolution that submits a request to the Governor which the Governor may or may not carry out at his discretion creates no legally enforceable rights by which the Kosrae Legislature may compel the Governor's compliance, especially when the Governor is not a party to the action. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 499 (Kos. 2003).

A law enacted by the Kosrae Legislature is the highest form of setting forth the legislature's policy decisions and such laws can create legal rights that may be enforceable in the courts. But when the subject bill is not yet law, having been vetoed by the Governor, and the bill requires action by the Governor who is not a party to the action, there is no injury to the plaintiff created from noncompliance with the bill's provisions. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 499 (Kos. 2003).

The three additional factors to be examined for determining standing are: 1) generalized grievances shared by substantially the whole population do not normally warrant standing; 2) the petitioner generally must assert its own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest its claim to relief on third parties' legal rights or interests; and 3) the petitioner's complaint must fall within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 500 (Kos. 2003).

When the plaintiff's grievances with regard to possible harmful ramifications of the proposed disposition of the Kosrae IDF state earmarked subaccount funds, is the type of generalized grievance shared by substantially the whole population, such generalized grievances do not warrant standing. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 500 (Kos. 2003).

When the plaintiff's grievances with regard to the bank's inadequate and incomplete reporting to the FDA go to the FDA's legal rights or interests and not to the Kosrae Legislature's, and when it is purely speculative as to what effect more accurate and complete reports might have had on the FDA's decision making especially since the FDA had "pre-approved" the loan before the report was made, it is likely that the result would not be different. The report is therefore not reviewable and the injury not redressable. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 500 (Kos. 2003).

When a complaint does not fall within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question and neither the statute or constitutional provisions involved provide support for standing, the complaint does not fall within the zone of interest to be protected by the Investment Development Act's provisions which do not provide the plaintiff a cause of action where there was no intent by the FSM Congress to create one. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 500-01 (Kos. 2003).

When the Attorney General could not protect the state's interest since he was personally involved in the matter but when independent legal advice was offered by another attorney in the Attorney General's office who could have been used to protect the state's interest or alternatively, outside counsel could be retained for the same purpose, this does not give the Legislature as a co-equal branch of the state government, standing to sue to protect the state's interest. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 501 (Kos. 2003).

Since the Kosrae Legislature is not the intended beneficiary of the Investment Development Act's statutory provisions requiring the bank to make reports to the FDA, its alleged injury is not directly traceable to the bank's reports. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 501 (Kos. 2003).

When the plaintiff does not have standing to pursue an action for a preliminary injunction, the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over the action and the case will be dismissed. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 501 (Kos. 2003).

Issues of standing are discussed first, for a party's standing is a potentially dispositive threshold issue going to the court's subject matter jurisdiction. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 39 (App. 2003).

Whether a party has standing is a question of law reviewed de novo on appeal. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 40 (App. 2003).

The standing requirement is not expressly stated in the Constitution, but is implied as an antecedent to the "case or dispute" requirement found in Article XI, section 6 of the Constitution, and should be interpreted so as to implement that requirement's objectives. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 40 (App. 2003).

When deciding a question of standing, the FSM Supreme Court utilizes a case-specific analysis and as mandated by Article XI, section 11 of the Constitution, it first consults and applies sources from within the FSM. The overall goal is to develop principles of standing which are consistent with the Constitution's language and designed to meet the needs of our nation's people and institutions. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 40 (App. 2003).

A party has standing to sue when that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable controversy to obtain judicial resolution of that controversy. The implied requirement that a party have standing should be interpreted so as to implement the objectives of the constitutional case or dispute requirement. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 40 (App. 2003).

Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing. First, the party must allege a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action or erroneous court ruling. Second, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 40 (App. 2003).

While not constitutionally based, three additional rules need to be applied before the question of standing can be resolved. First, generalized grievances shared by substantially the whole population do not normally warrant standing. Second, even when an injury sufficient to satisfy the constitutional requirement is alleged, the party generally must assert its own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest its claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties. Third, the interests which the party is seeking to protect must fall within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 40 (App. 2003).

When some appellants' interests are sufficiently distinct from those of other appellants and when they have suffered some injury which would be redressible by appeal's resolution in their favor, they have standing to raise issues in the appeal that the other appellants did not raise. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 41 (App. 2003).

When some appellants have interests, responsibilities, and functions that are distinguishable from the other appellants because Congress has delegated them authority to create legally enforceable contracts and because they have a significant role in implementing public projects, and when they have been injured in the performance of their duties by the trial court's order and their alleged injury can be traced to the challenged action and is not a generalized grievance shared by substantially the whole population, those appellants have competing contentions and are adversaries with sufficient interest in the outcome to have standing to challenge the trial court rulings on appeal. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 42-44 (App. 2003).

A party has standing to challenge both the legality of the process and compliance with the Financial Management Act and related regulations to the extent that such compliance impacts upon the relief that it requests when it has more than a general interest in the legality of this process as it contends that, under a fair and transparent application process, it would receive at least the opportunity to apply for and receive some of the funds for its own projects. Thus, the trial court in finding standing properly recognized and focused on the party's threatened economic injury when the process by which the Faichuk appropriations were being administered was alleged to be unlawful. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 45 (App. 2003).

Although the Financial Management Act does not create a private right of action for parties in general to contest violations of its provisions, a party has standing when it requests the opportunity to seek funding from the challenged public laws without participating in an unlawful process and the FSM's failure to comply with the Act and its related regulations impacts upon the relief that it requests and when, in order for it to seek funding, determination of what portion of funds remained unobligated and might still be available was necessary and an accounting was a necessary and appropriate tool to achieve this. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 45 (App. 2003).

A municipality may have standing when it has demonstrated a threatened economic injury and a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and this threatened economic injury is a direct result of, and can be traced to, the illegality of the subject provision in the appropriation and the manner in which it was being implemented, when the injury would be redressed by a favorable decision, when the injury is not a generalized injury shared by substantially the whole population, but it is asserting its own legal rights and interests, and is not resting its claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties, and when its complaint falls within the zone of interest to be protected by the statutory and constitutional provisions in question. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 46 (App. 2003).

When a plaintiff obtained an assignment that was registered and subsequently dissolved by the Public Lands Board, the plaintiff was directly and adversely affected by the Board's decision, and thus has standing to sue the Board. There can be no question that the plaintiff is the real party in interest. Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 90 (Pon. 2003).

When the deceased's brother failed to provide the court with evidence of his representation of the deceased's heirs in the matter, his appearance is accepted as a pro se representation of himself and his claimed interests, but when the brother is not an heir, he does not have standing to file a motion for reconsideration on his own behalf because he is not a party to the matter, and on this basis his motion will be denied. Edwin v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 12 FSM R. 220, 222 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The two concepts of standing and justiciability interrelate, since standing is a prerequisite to a justiciable "case or dispute" under Article XI, Section 6(a) and (b) of the Constitution. There can be no case or dispute if a party lacks standing to bring suit in the first place. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 583 (App. 2004).

While the requirement of standing is not set forth in so many words in the Constitution, it is implicit in the "case or dispute" requirement found in Article XI, Section 6 of the Constitution. A party has standing sufficient to allow him to sue when that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable case or dispute to obtain judicial resolution of the controversy. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 583 (App. 2004).

Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing. First, the party must allege a sufficient stake in the outcome of the controversy and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action or erroneous court ruling. Second, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 583 (App. 2004).

Since the President, as the country's Chief Executive and by virtue of that office the chief law enforcement officer, has a stake or interest in insuring that disruption of the judicial process does not occur from the delay in the administration of justice resulting from a specially assigned justice's disapproval, when he has suffered actual injury resulting from an allegedly illegal action, which can be traced to the challenged action and can be redressed by a court decision (that is to say by a judicial determination that both the resolution and the statute on which it is based are unconstitutional), he thus has a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome to have standing. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 583 (App. 2004).

When the President is contesting, not the manner in which the special justice was assigned, but the manner in which he was removed, the delay resulting from a specially assigned justice's removal pursuant to 4 F.S.M.C. 104(2) is a real injury sufficient to bestow standing on the President to contest the constitutionality of that statute. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 584 (App. 2004).

A party has standing to sue where that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable controversy to obtain a judicial resolution of that controversy. Edgar v. Truk Trading Corp., 13 FSM R. 112, 115 (Chk. 2005).

The plaintiffs have a sufficient stake or interest to maintain a case when they allege that they were not paid a portion of the funds they were specifically entitled to under the terms of the agreement to sell land to the defendant, but that someone else wrongfully received those funds and when they claim as damages only those funds that they are entitled to, but were not paid. The court is thus in a position to resolve the matter by awarding appropriate damages. Edgar v. Truk Trading Corp., 13 FSM R. 112, 115 (Chk. 2005).

Standing is a threshold issue going to this court's subject matter jurisdiction and thus is addressed first. Standing must be found for each count of a complaint or that count will be dismissed. Ripeness is also a threshold issue. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 362 (Pon. 2005).

Although standing is not an expressly-stated requirement of the FSM Constitution, it is implied as an antecedent to the "case or dispute" requirement found in the Constitution's jurisdictional grant to the court, and must be interpreted so as to implement that requirement's objectives. That is, there must be a case or dispute in order for the FSM Supreme Court to have jurisdiction over the subject matter. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 362 (Pon. 2005).

The issue of standing to sue is an area which calls for this court's independent analysis rather than adherence to decisions construing similar provisions in the United States Constitution. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 363 (Pon. 2005).

For there to be standing, opposing parties must have sufficiently competing contentions and adverse interests such that the adversaries will thoroughly consider, research, and argue the points of law at issue.

The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing. First, he must allege a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and he must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action, and, second, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 363 (Pon. 2005).

While not constitutionally based, three additional, prudential principles need to be considered before the standing question can be resolved. First, generalized grievances shared by substantially the whole population do not normally warrant standing. Second, even when an injury sufficient to satisfy the constitutional requirement is alleged, the plaintiff generally must assert his own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest its claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties. Third, the plaintiff's complaint must fall within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 363 (Pon. 2005).

The first factor to be addressed in a standing inquiry is whether the plaintiff has alleged a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and whether he has suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from defendants' allegedly illegal action. The injury must be an invasion of some legally protected interest which is concrete and particularized, and actual, or imminent. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 363 (Pon. 2005).

To have standing, a plaintiff must suffer some threatened or actual injury resulting from defendant's allegedly illegal action and the injury must be an invasion of a legally protected interest which is concrete and particularized, and actual or imminent, but when the plaintiff's assertion of injury that runs to all counts of his complaint is that his threatened injury of attorney fee forfeiture is too speculative, it does not pass the first factor of the standing test. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 363-64 (Pon. 2005).

When no fee forfeiture proceeding has been instituted against the plaintiff and the government has stated that it has no intention of seeking pre-conviction attachment or seizure of attorney fees and would consider seeking forfeiture only if the criminal defendants are convicted; when in spite of the plaintiff's assertion of a chilling effect on representation of those defendants, he entered an appearance on their behalf; when that case has yet to go to trial and no one has been convicted; and when no determination has been made of the status of any of the funds that might be subject to forfeiture, there is yet no injury or likelihood of any injury to the plaintiff and the dispute is purely of a hypothetical or abstract character. To be a threatened injury which is actual or imminent, the court would have to presume that the plaintiff's clients are guilty, before that has been proven, or that they will be convicted, before a verdict has been rendered. Since that case may end with the plaintiff's clients' acquittal or dismissal, the threatened injury may remain forever hypothetical, is thus neither actual nor imminent. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 364-65 (Pon. 2005).

The second factor in a standing inquiry is that the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Part of this standing factor is redressability – will the relief requested make any legal difference that will redress the plaintiff's injury? Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 365 (Pon. 2005).

A party cannot raise the claims of third persons; he may raise only his own claims. He generally must assert his own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest his claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 365 (Pon. 2005).

Since the alleged wrongful interference with the plaintiff's ability to represent his clients is an alleged violation of his clients' rights, not of his rights, those rights are for his clients to assert. Thus to the extent that a cause of action is based on the violation of the rights of others, the plaintiff lacks standing to bring it because it is not redressible – he cannot seek redress for these allegations. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 365 (Pon. 2005).

When a request for relief is a declaration of when an attorney may accept a fee without the fee being subject to forfeiture at a later time by a confiscation order, it asks for an advisory opinion. The court has no jurisdiction to give advisory opinions, because to do so would violate the Constitution's case or dispute requirement. An advisory opinion is thus not a form of redress available to a plaintiff. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 365 (Pon. 2005).

When the plaintiff seeks as relief an order unsealing another case, even if it were his own rights he was asserting and not those of other non-parties, he would have to seek that relief in the court handling that case or a criminal case that arose from it, not in this case since that proposed relief does not redress the threatened injury – loss of attorney's fees – in this case. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 365 (Pon. 2005).

When the complaint either asserts the rights of others not a party to the case or seeks relief not available here or seeks redress for or protection of the plaintiff's allegedly threatened attorney's fees and the fee claim is not ripe for adjudication, the entire complaint will be dismissed for lack of standing and ripeness. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

It is generally true that a litigant cannot assert someone else's rights, but this does not apply when it is not a matter of asserting another's rights but of maintaining the integrity of the judicial process. McVey v. Etscheit, 14 FSM R. 207, 214 (Pon. 2006).

When the claim against the FSM asserts that the FSM published false and misleading information about certain crewmen and the vessel's captain is the only crew member who is a party to the action, the court must assume that this is his personal claim since a party must assert his own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest his claim to relief on third parties' legal rights or interests. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 368, 373 (Chk. 2006).

A party has standing to sue when that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable controversy to obtain judicial resolution of that controversy. The implied requirement that a party have standing is interpreted so as to implement the objectives of the constitutional case or dispute requirement. Standing exists when a party has a direct pecuniary interest in the litigation's outcome. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 414 (Yap 2006).

When the plaintiffs "own" the natural resources through the tabinaw, the plaintiffs' exclusive rights to use and exploit the marine resources of the area affected by a grounding and subsequent oil spill give them standing to maintain a class action with respect to the issues at trial – damages to the marine resources from the grounding and oil spill. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 415 (Yap 2006).

A party has standing to challenge a certificate of title when, although he admits that some of the land was sold to others, he asserts that even after those sales, he still retained part of the land. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 453-54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Generally, a party has standing to sue when that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable controversy to obtain a judicial resolution of that controversy. Ehsa v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 14 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 2006).

When the amended complaint names as plaintiffs Timakio Ehsa, PMS, and "all foreign fishing vessels (dba) FSM Access Agreement," and when PMS, whose financial viability depends on the services it provides the commercial vessels and the fees it collects from those vessels, has more than an incidental interest in the action's outcome, the court will decline to dismiss the complaint on the basis of lack of standing. Ehsa v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 14 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 2006).

When the debt the defendant owes the plaintiff was assigned by the plaintiff to its credit insurer and thereafter the insurer paid $48,554.11 to the plaintiff pursuant to its insurance arrangement and then made attempts to collect the outstanding debt from the defendant but its collection efforts were unsuccessful and when the plaintiff then procured a reassignment of the debt from its insurer and agreed to reimburse the insurer first and in full from any recovery, net of reasonable attorney's fees incurred in the plaintiff's recovery attempts, the plaintiff, as a result of the reassignment, is the proper party in interest and has standing to bring the action to recover the debt from the defendant. American Trading Int'l, Inc. v. Helgenberger, 15 FSM R. 50, 51-52 (Pon. 2007).

A party cannot raise the claims of third persons. She may raise only her claims. She must assert her own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest her claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of a third party. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 114 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

An insurance policy beneficiary has standing to sue for unpaid insurance policy benefits. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

Whether a party has standing to sue is a question of law reviewed de novo on appeal. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 59 (App. 2008).

The issue of standing is a threshold issue going to a court's subject matter jurisdiction and therefore standing is properly challenged in the form of a motion to dismiss brought under Rule 12(b)(1) because when a plaintiff does not have standing to pursue an action, the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over the action and the case will be dismissed. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

To the extent that the prisoners are asserting that Chuuk has a right to be paid money by the national government because of their incarceration in Chuuk state jail, the prisoners are asserting, not their own rights, but the State of Chuuk's rights, which they cannot do because they lack standing to raise a non-party's rights. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 664 (Chk. 2009).

It is inconceivable that a party could be made to suffer criminal or civil penalties for the failure to collect a tax but would not have standing to challenge the tax's constitutionality (and thus the requirement that the party must collect it). The inability of a party required by law to collect a tax to challenge that tax's validity would deprive that party of its property (compliance costs, tax collection costs, remittance costs, etc.) without any due process of law. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 158-59 (Chk. 2010).

If the requirement of standing is given a narrow construction when there is involved constitutional or important statutory rights then there is, in effect, no practical remedy for anyone with an interest in enforcing the right – and the right becomes a mockery. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2010).

Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing: 1) the party must allege a sufficient stake in the dispute's outcome and it must have suffered some actual or threatened injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action, and 2) the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind a favorable decision will likely redress. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2010).

When Continental has alleged a sufficient stake in the action's outcome and is threatened not only with substantial costs if it complies but also with civil and criminal penalties if it does not and these threatened injuries are all traceable to the Chuuk service tax and would be addressed by a favorable decision, it may therefore challenge the legal requirement that it collect the tax (and remit it to the State) even if technically, only the statutorily defined taxpayer has the legal ability to challenge the tax's validity. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2010).

Whether Pohnpei had reasonable suspicion to stop someone or probable cause to arrest him is not an issue his wife has standing to raise. A party cannot rest her claim for relief on the rights of third persons since she lacks standing to raise a non-party's claims and rights. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 370 (App. 2011).

A party lacks standing to make any contention about an unequal application of state policy for completing accident reports when it is her husband's claim, and not hers, since that "policy" was not applied to her (she had not been in an "accident") but to her husband. Only he could raise a claim arising from an unequal application of accident report obligations. She lacks standing. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 370 (App. 2011).

Although generally only a client or a former client has standing to move to disqualify counsel in a civil case on the basis of a conflict of interest, even then a non-client may seek disqualification when the ethical breach so infects the litigation in which disqualification is sought that it impacts the moving party's interest in a just and lawful determination of her claims since she may have the constitutional standing needed to bring a motion to disqualify based on a third-party conflict of interest. Marsolo v. Esa, 17 FSM R. 480, 484-85 (Chk. 2011).

Opposing counsel may have standing to seek counsel's disqualification even though they are not representing an aggrieved client or former client because bar members have an ethical obligation and are authorized to report any ethical violations in a case. Marsolo v. Esa, 17 FSM R. 480, 485 (Chk. 2011).

A trustee, guardian, or custodian of funds has standing to sue to obtain control of or to prevent the loss of funds that it should be holding in trust, guarding, or having custody of, so it could discharge its legal duties and responsibilities toward the party for whose benefit it was holding those funds. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 64 (Chk. 2011).

It is doubtful whether a movant, who is a defendant only in the second cause of action, has standing to move to dismiss the third or the first cause of action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 93 (Yap 2011).

When the complaint alleges that a person is bound by the mortgage because another defendant, who signed the mortgage, held that person's power of attorney to act on his behalf in regard to the land, the plaintiff is estopped from and cannot deny that that person is a party to the mortgage and, since he is a party to the mortgage, he has standing to enforce its provisions. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 94 (Yap 2011).

Standing and justiciability are threshold issues going to the FSM Supreme Court's subject matter jurisdiction and thus are addressed first. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 133 (Pon. 2011).

Standing must be found for each count of a complaint or that count will be dismissed. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 133 (Pon. 2011).

A vessel owner's right to seek a limitation of its liability is created by an FSM statute, and as the vessel's owner at the time of its grounding and thus the potentially liable party, a company has standing to raise this statute as a defense to limit its liability for the vessel's grounding, regardless of any arguments that the FSM Secretary of Transportation and Communications, as the receiver of wrecked and abandoned vessels, may have current ownership rights over the vessel. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 307, 312 (Yap 2012).

A plaintiff has a personal stake in the litigation's outcome when the Plan's insurance premiums are taken from his senatorial salary and when, since he is one of the two co-equal heads of the Chuuk Legislature, it appears that he has standing in his representative capacity. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care

State employees suing for unpaid compensation for work they performed, obviously have a sufficient stake in the case's outcome when they allege that they each have suffered an actual injury (insufficient pay) and that that injury can be traced to the Director's challenged action and their claim is one that a favorable court decision can redress by awarding damages. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

When the State Tax Act provides that no person shall have a right of action to challenge the validity of any tax levied by the Act unless that person first pays to the state the tax in question, under protest, and when the state has seized by tax levy $2,931.29, and the state rightly considers that seizure to be a partial payment under protest, the court, without having to analyze it further, unquestionably has jurisdiction over a challenge to the cigarette tax because a cigarette tax payment was made under protest. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 152 (Chk. 2013).

The FSM has standing to sue for conversion when it was Compact sector funds that were converted. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460 (Chk. 2014).

An intervention, whether as of right or permissive, hinges upon whether the court can properly recognize the would-be intervenor's alleged interest in the subject cause of action. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 214, 218 (Pon. 2015).

To intervene to prosecute a third-party beneficiary claim when the movant lacks privity of contract and there is no existing statutory provision that the movant might be able to avail itself, the movant must make a showing that it has actually suffered a loss or injury, which would be capable of being redressed through its proposed intervention, and which is separate from the rights and claims asserted by the existing parties. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 214, 218 (Pon. 2015).

Standing exists when a party has a direct pecuniary interest in the litigation's outcome. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 214, 218 (Pon. 2015).

In order to intervene under Rule 24, an applicant must have an interest which is of such a direct and immediate character, that the proposed intervenor will either gain or lose by the immediate operative effect of that judgment, but when the would-be intervenor has no direct pecuniary interest in the litigation's outcome, it lacks the requisite standing to intervene as an interested party. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 214, 219 (Pon. 2015).

Although the standing requirement is not expressly delineated within the FSM Constitution, it is implied as an antecedent to the "case or dispute" requirement found in Article XI, § 6 and should be interpreted, so as to implement that requirement's objectives. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 511 (App. 2016).

Whether a party has standing is a question of law reviewed de novo on appeal. Since standing cannot be waived, an appellate court is obliged to conduct an independent inquiry, with respect to the parties' standing to challenge national laws, even though the parties have not raised, and the trial court not ruled on, the standing issue. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 511 (App. 2016).

Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing. Initially, a party must allege a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action or erroneous court ruling. Next, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 511 (App. 2016).

While not constitutionally based, three additional rules need to be applied before the question of standing can be resolved. First, generalized grievances shared by substantially the whole population do not normally warrant standing. Second, even when an injury sufficient to satisfy the constitutional requirement is alleged, the party must generally assert its own legal rights and interests and cannot rest its claim to relief on the legal rights and interests of third parties. Third, the interests which the party is seeking to protect, must fall within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 511-12 (App. 2016).

Generalized grievances shared by the public at large, do not confer standing on specific individuals. An interest in having the government conform to the limitations imposed by the Constitution, without more, is clearly a shared interest and therefore, the government's alleged failure represents a generalized grievance. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 512-13 (App. 2016).

In any matter before the court, the issue of standing should be addressed first as it is a threshold issue going to the court's subject matter jurisdiction. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 639 (Pon. 2016).

Although not expressly stated in the FSM Constitution, the "case or dispute" requirement in Article XI, Section 6 of the FSM Constitution is interpreted to imply the requirement that a party has standing to bring a suit. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 639 (Pon. 2016).

A party has standing to sue when that party has a sufficient stake or interest in an otherwise justiciable controversy to obtain judicial resolution of that controversy. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 639 (Pon. 2016).

The implied requirement that a party have standing should be interpreted so as to implement the objectives of the constitutional requirement that a case or dispute exist. Thus, the opposing parties must have sufficiently competing contentions and adverse interests such that the adversaries will thoroughly consider, research, and argue the points of law at issue, and the controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of the parties having adverse legal interests. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 639-40 (Pon. 2016).

The two central factors for determining whether a party has standing are: 1) the party must allege a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action, and 2) the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Three additional prudential principles also need to be considered: 1) generalized grievances shared by substantially the whole population do not normally warrant standing; 2) even when an injury is sufficient to satisfy the constitutional requirement is alleged, the petitioner generally must assert its own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest its claim on the legal rights or interests of third parties; and 3) the petitioner's complaint must fall within the zone of interest to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 640 (Pon. 2016).

When deciding a question of standing, the FSM Supreme Court utilizes a case-specific analysis and as mandated by Article XI, Section 11 of the FSM Constitution, the court will first consult and apply sources from within the FSM. The overall goal is to develop principles of standing which are consistent with the Constitution's language and designed to meet the needs of our nation's people and institutions. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 640 (Pon. 2016).

Because it is the plaintiffs who invoke the court's jurisdiction, it is the plaintiffs' burden to prove that standing exists. Therefore, when the defendants challenge standing in a motion to dismiss or as an affirmative defense, the plaintiffs' complaint must contain facts that, if true, would be sufficient to establish that standing exists. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 640 (Pon. 2016).

The court recognizes the customary and traditional rights of municipalities, clans, families, and individuals to control the use of, or material in, marine areas below the ordinary high watermark and otherwise engage in the harvesting of fish and other marine resources from reef areas, but any traditional and customary right to control the use of, or material in, marine areas below the ordinary high watermark is subject to, and limited by, the inherent rights of the Pohnpei Public Lands Trust as the owner of such marine areas. Accordingly, the Mwoalen Wahu does not have standing on the basis that there exists a customary law that gives the traditional leaders the right to control the use of marine areas in their respective municipalities. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 641-42 & n.1 (Pon. 2016).

To the extent a claimed customary right is still in effect, the Mwoalen Wahu members have a legal right under the Pohnpei Constitution to institute legal proceedings in order to protect their constitutionally protected interests. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

Standing to sue was an unsettled area of United States law when the FSM Constitution was ratified and the issue of standing to sue within the FSM is one that calls for independent analysis rather than rigid adherence to the decisions of United States courts construing that Constitution. Based on this, the court will continue applying the prudential standing principles in determining whether a particular plaintiff has standing. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 644 n.3 (Pon. 2016).

For there to be standing, the plaintiff must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the defendants' allegedly illegal action, and the injury must be an invasion of a legally protected interest which is concrete and particularized, and actual or imminent. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 644 (Pon. 2016).

For there to be standing, the "injury in fact" test requires more than an injury to a cognizable interest. It requires that the party seeking review be himself among the injured. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 644 (Pon. 2016).

The first prong of the test for standing is satisfied when the customary right to receive oferings from their constituents and subjects is shared among each member of the Mwoalen Wahu, is protected by the Pohnpei Constitution, and is imminently threatened by the defendants' allegedly illegal conduct because it has been shown that sea cucumber declines pose an intensified threat to Pohnpei's nearshore coral-reef ecosystem and thus all marine life within that ecosystem, thereby posing an increased threat to the Mwoalen Wahu members' rights to receive offerings from marine life that inhabit that ecosystem. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 644 (Pon. 2016).

The plaintiffs' reasonable fears of environmental pollution is sufficient injury-in-fact to support standing. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 (Pon. 2016).

Although the court is mandated to first consult and apply sources from within the FSM, it is appropriate to look to United States case law for guidance on a complex standing issue, while proceeding against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian law, society, and culture. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 n.4 (Pon. 2016).

For there to be standing, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 (Pon. 2016).

When, without a sea cucumber harvest, the Mwoalen Wahu will remain in the same posture as in the past and its members will continue to receive offerings by their constituents and subjects whereas a sea cucumber harvest threatens to reduce the structure and habitat of Pohnpei's reefs and negatively impact marine life, including marine life that Mwoalen Wahu members have a customary right to receive from their people, the threatened injury is directly traced to the challenged action and would be redressed by a decision in the plaintiffs' favor. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 (Pon. 2016).

Standing's prudential principles do not necessarily go to the core of the court's jurisdiction based on the "case or dispute" constitutional principle, but rather reflect an effort by the court to determine whether it should exercise judicial self-restraint when it seems wise not to entertain a case. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 n.5 (Pon. 2016).

Generalized grievances shared by substantially the whole population do not normally warrant standing and the petitioner generally must assert its own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest its claim on the legal rights or interests of third parties, but organizational standing to sue based on the rights of its members is proper. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 (Pon. 2016).

For there to be standing, the petitioner's complaint must fall within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 646 (Pon. 2016).

When the customary right the Mwoalen Wahu seek to protect is clearly within the zone of interests sought to be protected under Article 5 of the Pohnpei Constitution which upholds, respects, and protects the customs and traditions of the traditional kingdoms of Pohnpei and when sea cucumber commercialization is regulated by Pohnpei statute, the plaintiffs' complaint has fallen within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 646 (Pon. 2016).

If the requirement of standing is given a narrow construction when constitutional rights are involved, then there is, in effect, no practical remedy for anyone with an interest in enforcing the right – and the right becomes a mockery. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 646 (Pon. 2016).

The plaintiffs have standing to bring the matter before the court when they have alleged facts establishing a concrete injury and a sufficient causal relationship between the injury and the alleged violation and if the injury can be remedied by a judicial decree. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 646 (Pon. 2016).

Under the Pohnpei Marine Sanctuary and Wildlife Refuge Act of 1999, any person may commence a civil suit on his own behalf to enjoin any person who is alleged to be in violation of § 5-107 of that Act, and "person" includes any individual, corporation, partnership, association or other entity, and any governmental entity including, but not limited to, the FSM or any of the FSM states or any political subdivision thereof, and any foreign government, subdivision of such government, or any entity thereof. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 647 (Pon. 2016).

Since, unlike 26 Pon. C. § 5-115 which expressly grants to the Attorney General the right to bring a suit to enjoin a person who is in "imminent violation," the citizen suit provision of 26 Pon. C. § 5-117 only allows a person to commence a civil suit to enjoin a person who is "alleged to be in violation" of § 5-107," the plain statutory language can only be read to allow the Attorney General the power to seek equitable relief for an imminent violation but not private persons who do not allege facts that are sufficient to grant traditional constitutional standing when it has not asserted injury to itself. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 647 (Pon. 2016).

When a plaintiff has not alleged a concrete injury and a sufficient causal relationship between the injury and the alleged "violation," its claims will be dismissed because standing must be found for each count of a complaint or that count will be dismissed. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 648 (Pon. 2016).

A standing issue is addressed first, as it is a threshold issue going to a court's subject matter jurisdiction. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 56 (App. 2016).

Although standing is not expressly stated within the FSM Constitution, it is implied as an antecedent to the "case or dispute" requirement found in Article XI, § 6 and should be interpreted so as to implement the objectives of that requirement. Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing: 1) the party must allege a sufficient stake in a controversy's outcome and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action or erroneous court ruling, and 2) the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 57 (App. 2016).

When the asserted ownership of a parcel constitutes a sufficient stake in the outcome; and when a challenge to the Kosrae State Court's ruling is capable of being redressed by a favorable decision in the FSM Supreme Court appellate division, an appellant, who did not appeal the Land Court decision to the Kosrae State Court, possesses standing to bring the present appeal. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 57 (App. 2016).

Whether a party has standing is a question of law, to be reviewed de novo on appeal. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 57 (App. 2016).

Standing and justiciability are threshold issues going to the FSM Supreme Court's subject-matter jurisdiction and thus are addressed first. Welson v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 348, 350 (Pon. 2017).

Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing. First, the party must allege a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action or erroneous court ruling. Second, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Welson v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 348, 350 (Pon. 2017).

Even when an injury sufficient to satisfy the constitutional standing requirement is alleged, the party generally must assert its own legal rights and interests, and cannot rest its claim to relief on the legal rights or interests of third parties. Welson v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 348, 350 (Pon. 2017).

A mother cannot sue, as "next of kin," on behalf of her son when her son has reached the age of majority. Welson v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 348, 350-51 (Pon. 2017).

When a plaintiff, since she lacks standing to sue, cannot identify any specific interests that her son would assert if her interest was transferred to him, the matter will be dismissed without prejudice to allow the son to assert any claims he may have against the FSM Social Security Administration. Welson v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 348, 351 (Pon. 2017).

An entity that claims to own certain property has standing to sue another for what it perceives as wrongful interference with its rights in that property. Pohnpei Arts & Crafts, Inc. v. Narruhn, 21 FSM R. 366, 368 (Pon. 2017).

A decedent's estate ceased to own Pohnpei land once the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure ruled on the heirship petition for that land and the time to appeal that decision expired. Because the decedent's estate does not have, and, since Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure ruling, has not had, any interest in the property, it has no standing to seek the relief regarding that land. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

When the estate's ownership of the property ended in 2001 when the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure issued its decision in the heirship proceeding for that property, the estate could not state a claim against the bank or its agents for events that occurred after the estate's ownership ended. It lacked standing. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

When no particular powers were expressed in an administrator's temporary appointment, although he was expected to help resolve the "overlappings" between two estates, and when the subsequent order granted extensive powers to the co-administrators without making any distinction between the two full co-administrators and the temporary one, the court must, solely for the purpose of the pending motions, take as true the temporary administrator's assertion that he remains the estate's co-administrator and assume that since his administrator's powers were not otherwise limited, he has the power to sue on the estate's behalf to preserve the estate's assets. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 9 (Pon. 2018).

A plaintiff generally cannot assert the rights of a third party as her own. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 154 (Chk. 2019).

Any person in the actual and exclusive possession of the property may maintain the trespass action, although the person has no legal title, and is in wrongful occupation, as for example under a void lease, or in mere adverse possession. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 155 (Chk. 2019).

Standing is a threshold issue. To have standing to bring a matter before a court, the plaintiff must allege facts establishing a concrete injury and a sufficient causal relationship between the injury and the alleged violation and that the injury can be remedied by a judicial decree. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

To have standing, a party must allege a sufficient stake in the controversy's outcome and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action or erroneous court ruling. And, the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

An individual lacks standing and should be dismissed when she has no sufficient stake in the outcome of a dispute over a bankruptcy receiver's compensation or payments to creditors because she was neither an "interested party" nor a co-debtor, but, since her involvement with the case was as an insider who had improperly received property of the debtor's estate and converted it to her use, she as an individual, arguably, as the insider recipient of a fraudulent transfer, may be an "interested party" solely with respect to the fraudulently transferred property. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

If the decedent would, if living, have standing to bring the suit, then the administratrix of his estate would have standing to do so. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

The debtor, as an interested party, has sufficient stake in the matter for standing to try to reopen his own bankruptcy case. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 356 (Pon. 2019).

The administratrix of an estate of a former debtor would have standing to seek relief under Bankruptcy Rule 9024 for alleged overpayments to creditors and to the bankruptcy receiver because she seeks reconsideration of, or relief from, the bankruptcy case orders allowing those claims by the creditors and the receiver. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 357 (Pon. 2019).

A party generally cannot assert the rights of a third party as its own when challenging a search warrant. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 464 (Pon. 2020).

– Certification of Issues

When a case in a state or local court involves a substantial question requiring the interpretation of the Constitution, national law, or a treaty, on application of a party or on its own motion the court shall certify the question to the Supreme Court appellate division. The Supreme Court appellate division may decide the case or remand it for further proceedings. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products Co., 1 FSM R. 496, 501 (Pon. 1984).

Under article XI, section 8 of the FSM Constitution, a state court receiving a proper motion is required to certify any substantial constitutional question to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division for proper disposition. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products Co., 1 FSM R. 496, 501 (Pon. 1984).

Article XI, section 8 of the Constitution, providing for state court certification of issues of national law, gives the FSM Supreme Court appellate division another tool to oversee the development of national law jurisprudence, but also provides the option of remand so that the state court may address issues of national law. Bernard's Retail Store & Wholesale v. Johnny, 4 FSM R. 33, 35 (App. 1989).

Under normal circumstances, the decision as to whether to decide or remand a question certified under article XI, section 8 of the Constitution will be made only by the constitutionally appointed justices of the FSM Supreme Court, without convening a third judge and without oral argument. Bernard's Retail Store & Wholesale v. Johnny, 4 FSM R. 33, 35 (App. 1989).

Unless definite articulable reasons to the contrary appear, questions certified under article XI, section 8 of the Constitution normally will be remanded to the state court. Bernard's Retail Store & Wholesale v. Johnny, 4 FSM R. 33, 35 (App. 1989).

Where the issues certified to the FSM Supreme Court by a state court under article XI, section 8 of the FSM Constitution are narrowly framed and not capable of varying solutions, and it appears that a greater service may be provided by simply answering the questions posed by the state court, the FSM Supreme Court will not remand the certified questions to the state court. Bernard's Retail Store & Wholesale v. Johnny, 4 FSM R. 33, 35 (App. 1989).

Certified questions are decided by those constitutionally appointed justices who are not disqualified. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 608, 609 (App. 1994).

The Constitution provides that the FSM Supreme Court Appellate Division may decide questions certified from state and local courts, not from the FSM Supreme Court Trial Division. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 608, 610 (App. 1994).

Certification is normally granted by the court that will be applying the guidance sought to its decision, not yet made, not by the court that is requested to hear the certified question. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 608, 610 (App. 1994).

When the FSM Supreme Court appellate division receives a certified question from a state or local court it has the discretion to decide the question or to remand it for decision. Jackson v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 504, 505 (App. 1996).

Certified questions will normally be remanded to state court unless well-articulated reasons are presented for their resolution by the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. When the state court might resolve the case without reaching the certified constitutional question remand is proper. Jackson v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 504, 506 (App. 1996).

Certified questions narrowly framed and not capable of varying resolutions may be accepted by the FSM Supreme Court appellate division when a greater service would be provided by answering the questions posed. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 241 (App. 2001).

– Chuuk

Lease agreement executed by the Chuuk State is void insofar as it purports to "incur public indebtedness" without legislative authority by way of an appropriation or statute. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 135-36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The framers did not intend that the constitutional provision barring persons convicted of a felony from serving in the legislature, even if pardoned, to have retroactive effect so as to bar a person who was both convicted and pardoned before the enactment of the Chuuk State Constitution from appearing on the official ballot for state legislator. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 178, 179-80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The Chuuk State Constitution recognizes all traditional rights and ownership over all reefs, tidelands, and other submerged lands subject to legislative regulation of their reasonable use. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 209 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

It was the intent of the framers of the Chuuk State Constitution to return the rights and ownership of all reefs, tidelands (all areas below the ordinary high watermark), and other submerged lands to the individual people of Chuuk State. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 210 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Statutes and case law inherited from the Trust Territory are invalid to the extent that they are inconsistent with the state constitution which is the supreme law of Chuuk. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 210 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The constitutional grant of ownership of the tidelands back to the rightful individual owners, shall be given prospective application only. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 212 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The reversion of reefs, tidelands and other submerged lands to private owners granted by article IV, section 4 of the Chuuk Constitution does not apply to any tidelands that were previously filled or reclaimed. Nena v. Walter, 6 FSM R. 233, 236 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Under the FSM Constitution the FSM Supreme Court may hear cases on appeal from the highest state court in which a decision may be had if that state's constitution permits it. The Chuuk State Constitution permits such appeals, which, in civil cases, Chuuk statute provides be made by certiorari. Gustaf v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 284, 285 (App. 1993).

A court begins its analysis with the presumption that all legislative enactments are constitutional. The burden is on the plaintiff to clearly demonstrate to the court that the ordinance is unconstitutional. Wainit v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 121, 122 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The Chuuk Constitution protects persons from an unreasonable invasion of privacy. The right to privacy depends upon whether a person has a reasonable expectation that the thing, paper or place should remain free from governmental intrusion. A person's right to privacy is strongest when the government is acting in its law enforcement capacity. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Under the Chuuk Constitution, statutory authorization is required as a predicate to expenditure of state funds, and the Chuuk state court does not have the power to issue an execution order against state property. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 208, 210 (Chk. 1997).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that existing Chuukese custom and tradition shall be respected. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 578 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Because the Chuuk Constitution provides that Chuukese is the state language, but both Chuukese and English are official languages, a criminal appellant in the Chuuk State Supreme Court has no constitutional right to a transcript in both Chuukese and English. Reselap v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

No resident entitled to vote may be denied the privilege to vote or be interfered with in voting. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The right guaranteed in the Chuuk Constitution to move and migrate within the State and the right in the FSM Constitution to travel and migrate within the Federated States, do not protect travel or migration outside these boundaries. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A municipal ordinance restricting absentee voting in municipal elections to persons in the state of Chuuk is not unconstitutional. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The secret ballot provision of Chuuk Constitution article XII, section 2 relates only to general elections and has no application to proceedings in the House of Representatives. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 507 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that no person, otherwise qualified to vote, may be denied the privilege to vote. The unreasonableness of candidate qualifying fees is an effective denial of the privilege to vote. Nameta v. Cheipot, 9 FSM R. 510, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

While the Chuuk Constitution may not make voting abroad a constitutionally-protected right, it does not prohibit voting out-of-state. Such voting is a privilege that the Legislature may create and regulate by statute and it has done so. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The prevailing rule is that when the Constitution provides no direct authority to establish qualifications for office in excess of those imposed by the Constitution, such qualifications were unconstitutional by their very terms and under equal protection, due process, and freedom of speech and assembly. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Tideland ownership derives from the Chuuk Constitution's recognition (as of its effective date, October 1, 1989) of traditional rights in the tidelands. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 544 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The Governor may declare a state of emergency and issue appropriate decrees if required to preserve public peace, health or safety at a time of extreme emergency caused by civil disturbance, natural disaster, or immediate threat of war or insurrection. A declaration of emergency may impair civil rights to the extent actually required for the preservation of peace, health or safety. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Article XI, § 12(b) of the Chuuk Constitution clearly provides that citizens' civil rights may be impaired by a declaration of emergency, but that impairment rights may only occur to the extent actually required for the preservation of peace, health or safety, so that when the Governor's declaration of emergency made no reference to the suspension of civil rights, or of the need to do so to preserve peace, health or safety, it was solely addressed to the creation and implementation of emergency response and recovery efforts to Tropical Storm Chata'an. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In circumstances short of war, rebellion, insurrection or invasion where suspension of the Chuuk citizens' civil rights is warranted require the Governor's clear and unambiguous statement in the declaration of emergency itself, and even if such a clear and unambiguous statement were made, a citizen's continued right to petition for a writ of habeas corpus, except in cases of war, rebellion, insurrection or invasion, would provide a remedy to any improper suspension of civil rights by the declaration of emergency. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Where the Chuuk Constitution specifically authorizes the appointment of qualified attorneys in Chuuk as temporary appellate justices on a per case basis and the Constitution's framers therefore must have contemplated that counsel in one appeal may well be a temporary justice on a different appeal, the presence of qualified attorneys on an appellate panel is not a ground to grant a rehearing. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 454, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

In keeping with the Chuuk Constitution Judicial Guidance Clause's requirement that court decisions must be in conformity with "the social and geographical configuration of the State of Chuuk," parol evidence may be used to impeach a written election return that was based upon an oral communication by radio because Chuuk's geographical configuration is such that the transmission of election returns from the outer islands is oral (by radio). In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

There will be an independent Election Commission, vested with powers, duties and responsibilities, as prescribed by statute, for the administration of elections in Chuuk. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk Constitution's supremacy clause provides that the Chuuk Constitution is the supreme law of the state, and that an act of government in conflict with it is invalid to the extent of the conflict. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 577 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk Constitution bans taxes on real property. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 n.6 (Chk. 2003).

In determining the extent of the powers of the judiciary under a state constitution, the rule is that the state constitution confers on the judicial department all the authority necessary to exercise powers as a co-ordinate department of the government. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

With regard to grants of legislative and judicial power by state constitutions, and especially regarding the principle barring implied limitations on such powers, the whole of such legislative and judicial power reposing in the sovereignty is granted to those bodies, except as it may be restricted in the same instrument. Thus the state courts have and should maintain vigorously all the inherent and implied powers necessary to function properly and effectively as a separate department in the scheme of government. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262-63 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The relevant Chuuk constitutional provisions do not bar the Legislature from providing by statute for an appeal directly from the Chuuk State Election Commission to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. The Constitution does provide for appeals from administrative agencies to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division, but the Constitution does not make the trial division's jurisdiction exclusive, and the trial division's jurisdiction is further qualified with the proviso "as may be provided by law." Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The Legislature, under its power to prescribe by statute for the regulation of the certification of elections and under its power to provide by law for review of administrative agency decisions, has the power to place the jurisdiction to review Election Commission decisions in the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division rather than in the trial division with an appeal to the appellate division and a further possible appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The court's only authority in election matters is to hear appeals from Chuuk State Election Commission decisions regarding the conduct of elections. Only a house of the Legislature can decide who is to be seated as a member. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A member of the Chuuk Legislature may hold no other public office or public or private employment with a few exceptions and membership on an election tribunal is not one of those exceptions. The Chuuk Constitution is the supreme law of Chuuk and a governmental act by a municipality that violates it is invalid to the extent of the violation. The inclusion of state legislature members on a municipal Special election tribunal commission violated the Chuuk Constitution and so that that body's composition was improper and its acts invalid. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 204 (Chk. 2007).

The Chuuk Board of Education has eight members who are appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Education Department head, who is also appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate, serves as the Board's executive director. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 60 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The Director's responsibilities to the Board of Education include duties and functions as assigned by the Board, attendance at Board meetings, and providing logistical and administrative needs to the Board and other needs as declared by the Board, and the Board is the only authority that may remove the Director, which is by a majority vote of all Board members for misconduct, incompetency, neglect of duty, or other good cause. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 61 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The FSM Constitution's Article VII, section 2 provides no basis for a party to seek relief in the FSM Supreme Court and no basis on which the party is likely to prevail when the party does not argue that the Chuuk has an undemocratic constitution but instead contends that the Chuuk executive branch is expending Chuuk state funds (albeit originally appropriated by Congress) without an appropriation of those funds by the Chuuk Legislature and that this is a violation of Chuuk's democratic constitution. Mailo v. Lawrence, 20 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2015).

When a Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule conflicts with a Chuuk statute, the statute's language prevails because the Chuuk Constitution vests the Chief Justice with the authority to promulgate Criminal Procedure Rules, which the legislature may amend by statute, but the Chief Justice has no authority to amend a statute enacted by the legislature. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When a Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule conflicts with a Chuuk statute, the statute's language prevails because the Chuuk Constitution vests the Chief Justice with the authority to promulgate Procedure Rules, which the legislature may amend by statute, but the Chief Justice has no authority to amend a statute enacted by the legislature. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Chuuk State Constitution's transition clause provides that statutes in force at the time the Constitution took effect remain in effect to the extent they comply with the Constitution, or until amended or repealed. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

While the Chuuk Constitution provides the Chuuk State Supreme Court with concurrent jurisdiction over land disputes, Article VII, § 3(d) of the Chuuk Constitution allows the specific court to be prescribed by statute. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Chuuk – Case or Dispute

The judicial decision-making power is typically exercised by a court which has heard competing contentions of adversaries having sufficient interests in the outcome to thoroughly consider, research, and argue the points at issue. Even then, a court's declarations of law should be limited to rulings necessary to resolve the dispute before it. Thus, the case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the plaintiff seeks declaratory relief, the court has jurisdiction to issue a declaratory judgment so long as there is a case or dispute within the meaning of Chuuk Constitution, article VII, §§ 3 and 4. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the primary issue is whether the Board had legal authority to terminate a director at the time the termination was allegedly made and when that issue remains a living controversy regardless of who the current Board members are, the action will continue unabated. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 221 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

An appellate court does not sit to render decisions on abstract legal propositions or to render advisory opinions. Selifis v. Robert, 22 FSM R. 569, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

The appellate court will not consider a municipal election ordinance's validity when that ordinance's two alleged defects may be remedied or addressed before the next municipal election. Selifis v. Robert, 22 FSM R. 569, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Chuuk – Case or Dispute – Mootness

Chuuk courts are restricted in hearing only "live" cases, meaning the case must be one appropriate for judicial determination. A matter is appropriate for judicial determination when there is a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. Selifis v. Robert, 21 FSM R. 352, 353 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2017).

No justiciable controversy is presented when the parties lack a legally cognizable interest in the outcome, and if an appellate court finds that any relief it could grant would be ineffectual, it must treat the case as moot. Selifis v. Robert, 22 FSM R. 569, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When an appeal is dismissed as moot, the established practice is for the appellate court to reverse or vacate the judgment below and dismiss the case, but when the case below has already been dismissed, no purpose is served by vacating that dismissal and then dismissing it again. In such cases, the appellate court will make no order about dismissal addressed to the trial court. Selifis v. Robert, 22 FSM R. 569, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

An action for declaratory relief is moot when the government has rescinded the orders that the plaintiff sought to have declared unlawful. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 630 (Pon. 2020).

– Chuuk – Case or Dispute – Ripeness

Chuuk courts are restricted in hearing only "live" cases, meaning the case must be one appropriate for judicial determination. A matter is appropriate for judicial determination when there is a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. Thus, when a defendant has not yet stood trial and thus may not be convicted, the question of whether a potential sentence constitutes a cruel and unusual punishment is merely hypothetical and academic and not yet appropriate for judicial determination. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 656 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Chuuk – Case or Dispute – Standing

Although the standing requirement is not explicitly stated in the Chuuk constitution, the implied requirement that a party have standing should be interpreted to implement the constitutional requirement that a "case" or "dispute" exist. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When jurisdictional issues are inextricably intertwined with the case's merits and issues of fact remain, a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction will be denied, and if a motion to dismiss for lack of standing is denied, the court does not somehow imply that, at that stage of the proceedings, it has made any findings on a claim's merits. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the record is not sufficiently developed to enable the court to either resolve the factual and legal issues as to whether Board members' terms had expired when the decision to terminate the director was made, or to determine if, as a matter of law, the Board members were legally entitled to act in a de facto capacity despite the expiration of their terms, there are still significant factual and legal issues that need resolution before the court can make a final determination on the Board's standing to sue the director. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 219-20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the Board has a clear statutory mandate allowing it to terminate a director for cause; when there is no authority to support the argument that a governmental agency or department must obtain the Attorney General's consent in order to file suit over a matter that is committed to its discretion; and when the Attorney General is a defendant in the lawsuit, it would severely test the notion that the Board has certain matters committed to its discretion if it could not enforce the exercise of its discretion without an adversary's consent. When it is alleged that the Director failed to comply with the Board's decision to terminate his directorship, and the Board has the discretion to terminate the director for cause, the Board has standing to enforce the exercise of its discretion since whether the Board's exercise of its statutory duty to terminate the director was legal and enforceable is a justiciable controversy in which the Board has a direct interest. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 220 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the Attorney General did have exclusive authority to determine when suits could be brought by instrumentalities of the executive branch, then all matters committed to the discretion of executive officials would, in effect, really be within the Attorney General's discretion. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 220 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the Attorney General's office is representing an opposing party and therefore disqualified from representing the Board and when the question of whether the Board had the authority to terminate a directorship and of whether that termination was valid creates a case or dispute that is ripe for judicial determination, the Attorney General's consent is not required for there to be standing. And any issues regarding the Board's chosen counsel may be addressed through a motion to disqualify or other means, but it is not relevant to standing analysis. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 220-21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

– Chuuk – Due Process

A person's constitutional right to due process of law, and his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment is violated when an officer instead of protecting the person from attack, threw him to the ground, and beat the person in the jail. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Since retrospective application of a constitutional provision barring persons convicted of felonies, even if pardoned, from holding legislative office is not an invalid ex post facto law, retrospective application of the provision is also not invalid as a bill of attainder or a denial of due process. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 271-72 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The FSM Constitution's due process provision protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution, and does not create causes of action against private parties. The Chuuk Constitution due process provision functions in the same manner. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Among the fundamental rights of Chuuk citizens set forth in Article III of the Chuuk Constitution is the right of due process of law. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

It is fundamental that no person may be deprived of liberty without due process of law. Due process of law, in the case of citizens accused of a crime, includes the right to be promptly brought before a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice, or other judicial officer, and to be informed of the charges being brought against him. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

One of the fundamental due process rights afforded to criminal defendants is the right to be brought without unnecessary delay before a judicial officer, and that the period of confinement prior to initial appearance cannot exceed, except in extraordinary cases, twenty-four hours. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The right of a person arrested for the commission of a crime to due process of law, including the right to be promptly brought before a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice or other judicial officer for initial appearance within 24 hours of his arrest, is a fundamental right afforded to all Chuuk citizens. Only under the most extraordinary circumstances, and then only with a specific, clear, and unambiguous statement, may a Governor's declaration of emergency suspend this due process right or other civil rights of Chuuk citizens. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Termination resulting from the decision of any government employee (other than a "principal officer" or "advisor") to run for public office violates that employee's free speech and association rights as guaranteed by the Chuuk Constitution, as well as depriving the employee of a property interest (his right to continued employment) without due process of law. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 271-72 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When no court notice of the case's hearing on the merits was ever served on the defendants, the defendants' and the real party in interest's rights to due process of law under the Chuuk and FSM constitutions were violated because a trial court commits plain error, and violates a litigant's right to due process, when the court fails to serve the notice of a trial date and time on that litigant. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 224 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Any order in aid of judgment may be modified by the court as justice may require, at any time, upon application of either party and notice to the other, or on the court's own motion. But a court cannot decide its own motion without first giving either party notice or an opportunity to be heard because that would violate a litigant's due process rights guaranteed by both the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions since notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 234 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a court's notice of trial on the merits is not served on a party, that party's rights to due process of law under the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions are violated, and the failure to serve notice of a trial date and time is plain error. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 247, 250 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2012).

Notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process as guaranteed by both the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 247, 250 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2012).

The Chuuk Constitution mandates that no person may be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, and the essence of due process is notice and an opportunity to be heard. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130l (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The titleholder is an indispensable party to any action to set aside, void, nullify, or alter the titleholder's certificate of title because due process makes that person an indispensable party to the action. Courts generally hold court orders void when the real party of interest was not present and the matter concerned the removal of that (indispensable) party from a certificate of title. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130L (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Default judgments against a real party of interest will be voided for lack of due process when that party lacked a notice and hearing before being disposed of its claim to a property – even when the real party of interest lacked a certificate of title. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130L (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A stipulated motion, that proffers no proof of service on the real party of interest, but asks the court to void the real party in interest's years-old, un-appealed determination of ownership and thus seeks to dispossess her of her property rights without notice or hearing, asks the court to issue an order in violation of the real party in interest's due process rights. The court will deny any such motion because voiding a determination of ownership based on stipulation that fails to provide notice to the real party of interest violates the real party of interest's due process rights under the Chuuk Constitution. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130m (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Chuuk Public Utilities Corporation is a semi-public entity where the governor of Chuuk appoints its board of directors; it is thus a government actor whose actions are subject to the mandates found within the Chuuk Constitution – including the declaration of rights clause. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Chuuk state law requires a public utility to consult with the land owner and announce entry before it works on public utilities – but provides no relief for failure to consult. Due process requires consultation with the landowner before installing a new structure on the land (or extending another easement through that land), but the replacement of existing pipes falls outside that due process requirement since that easement already existed. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The respect for real property, as implicitly recognized under the Chuuk Constitution, requires that if the real property owner is known, a public utility must consult with the landowner before creating a new easement over a land – in part to alleviate the landowner's concerns and to create a practical easement which limits the easement's effect on the owner. But consultation with the real landowner may sometimes be impossible; so when the real property owner is absent or unknown, a public utility company may broadcast two radio announcements about its intent to place a new structure on a particular parcel of land and invite any parties who might have an ownership claim to attend a consultation meeting. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Chuuk – Equal Protection

The protection afforded by the Chuuk Constitution due process and equal protection provisions can only be asserted when the denials of such rights is based on account of race, sex, religion, language, dialect, ancestry, national origin, or social status. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 507 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A state court litigant's right to equal protection is not violated because he can only get a judgment in the state court and cannot get a judgment in the FSM Supreme Court. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Each court system, national and state, treats all persons before it equally under the law and the difference in each court system's jurisdictional requirements is not unequal treatment under the laws. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

– Chuuk – Impairment of Contracts

The prohibition against the impairment of contracts is not absolute. The contract must be valid and enforceable when made. A contract which is illegal when made is unenforceable because no obligation arises from an illegal contract, thus there is no obligation that may be impaired. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 341 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

No obligation may arise from an agreement that lacks consideration, since consideration is required for a valid contract to exist. Therefore, the termination of a contract that lacks consideration does not violate the prohibition against impairment of the obligations of contracts. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 341 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

When the State of Chuuk is a party to a contract there is a distinction between a breach of a contract by the state and impairment of the obligation of the contract. The distinction depends on the availability of a remedy in damages. If the state's action does not preclude a damage remedy the contract has been breached and the non-breaching party can be made whole. The state has the same power as an individual to break or terminate contracts. As long as the private individual or company that is the other party has a remedy at law no impairment of the obligation of contracts occurs. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 341 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Reading the constitutional provision barring impairment of contracts in harmony with the provision allowing general reduction of salaries, the exclusion of contract employees does not preclude the Chuuk Legislature from enacting a general reduction of salaries. Chuuk State Supreme Court v. Umwech (II), 7 FSM R. 630, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

– Chuuk – Interpretation

When a constitutional provision is ambiguous and no constitutional convention journal was ever compiled then the constitutional convention reports may be consulted to discern the framers' intent. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 209 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

In deciding whether the new rule should be applied retroactively from the date of the court's judgment, or prospectively when rendering judgments on new constitutional rules, courts are to be guided by the following three factors: 1) the purpose to be served by the particular new rule; 2) the extent of reliance which had been placed upon the old rule; and 3) the effect on the administration of justice of a retroactive application of the new rule. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 210-11 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Where there has been good-faith reliance on an old rule, and retroactive application of the new rule would defeat such reliance, and where retroactive application would only unjustifiedly burden the administration of justice with meritless claims doubting the good faith reliance on the old rule, the new constitutional rule will apply to the parties of the case and be given prospective effect. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 211-12 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

When the language of the Chuuk Constitution does not define the term "tidelands" contrary to the common usage of the word or its accepted legal definition, and the legislative history does not indicate that the framers intended another meaning the court will employ the meaning of the term consistent with its legal usage at the time of the Constitution's enactment. Nena v. Walter, 6 FSM R. 233, 236 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Where constitutional language is borrowed from another constitution the borrowed language will be interpreted in the light of the interpretation of the original language, but insertion of new or different language must be interpreted to intend that some sort of new or different meaning be given to that altered portion of the constitutional text. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Statutes and constitutional provisions must be read together when the statutes are pre-constitution and because they are only effective to the extent they are not in conflict with the Chuuk Constitution. Sana v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 252, 254-55 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

In interpreting a provision of the Chuuk Constitution that is identical to the same provision in the United States Constitution it is appropriate, in the absence of any local precedent, to look to the law of the jurisdiction from which the provision was drawn. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 341 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

It is true that when a provision of the Chuuk Constitution is ambiguous, and because no constitutional convention journal was ever compiled, the constitutional convention reports may be consulted to discern the framers' intent. But the constitutional provision must first be ambiguous, unclear, or inconclusive before a court can proceed to the legislative history to determine the provision's meaning. Stinnett v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 142, 146 (Chk. 1997).

Statements prepared afterward for use in a lawsuit are not satisfactory legislative history and cannot be used to show the framers' intent. Stinnett v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 142, 146 (Chk. 1997).

Language in a committee report in support of language that did not become part of the constitution cannot be relied upon to discover the real intent of the framers. At best it can only be used to show what was not their intent. Stinnett v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 142, 147 (Chk. 1997).

When the meaning of a constitutional provision is forthright, a court will apply its analysis to the constitutional provision's language as it appears on its face. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

The language, "and may delegate certain taxing powers to the municipal governments by statute," contemplates that municipal governments are invested with the power to tax only insofar as they receive that power from the state government. Without express delegation to a municipality of the authority to tax, the municipality lacked this power. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

When the Chuuk Constitution says the state "may delegate certain taxing powers to the municipal governments by statute," it is plain that "certain" in this context means nothing more, and nothing less, than that the state government may delegate such of its taxing powers as it sees fit – the point is that the option is the state government's. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

When a section of the Chuuk Constitution is clear on its face, consideration of this provision's legislative history is inappropriate. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 208 (App. 1999).

A committee report that refers to language that is not in the Constitution and that accompanied a committee proposal that was killed by the Constitutional Convention cannot be relied upon to discover the real intent of the framers. At best it can only be used to show what was not their intent. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 208 (App. 1999).

The only conclusion to be fairly drawn from the deletion of a sentence giving the municipal governments the exclusive power to levy head taxes and business license fees from the proposal as adopted is that the Chuuk Constitution's framers did not intend that the municipal governments should have the power to levy head taxes and business license fees. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 208 (App. 1999).

When constitutional language is clear, no outside reference is needed to explain any ambiguity. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 507 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a case's disposition and the plaintiffs' sought relief do not require construction of statute as to its constitutionality, courts will not undertake a decision based upon a constitutional issue. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

While courts will not refuse to pass on the constitutionality of statutes in any proceeding in which such a determination is necessarily involved, the courts' invariable practice is not to consider the constitutionality of state legislation unless it is imperatively required, or unavoidable. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The principle of avoiding constitutional questions was conceived out of considerations of sound judicial administration and is in accord with the principle of separation of powers of government. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The court will not rule on a statute's constitutionality when it can limit the case's disposition to interpretation of the statute's language as it applies to the question. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Because the constitutional provision states that only one Chuuk State Supreme Court justice may hear or decide an appeal, and because "may" is permissive, not mandatory language, the Constitution contemplates that there may be an occasion when no Chuuk State Supreme Court justice would hear an appeal. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

Analysis of the constitution must start with the words of the constitutional provision. If these words are clear and permit only one possible result, the court should go no further. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Any part of a constitution should be interpreted and considered against the background of other provisions of the same constitution. An effort should be made to reconcile all provisions so that none is deprived of meaning. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

If the wording of the constitutional provisions is unambiguous, the words should control, and when more than one constitutional provision has an effect on the question being decided, the varying provisions must be interpreted in a manner which gives effect to each provision, so that no provision of the constitution is rendered meaningless. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In interpreting constitutional provisions, courts must seek to ensure that the purposes sought to be accomplished by the constitution are not defeated by the interpretation of any particular provision. No court is authorized to so construe any clause of a constitution as to defeat its obvious ends when another construction will enforce and protect it. A constitution must be interpreted so as to carry out the general purposes of the government, and not defeat them. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A constitution is to be liberally construed, not only according to its letter, but also according to its true spirit, to carry into effect the principles of government which it embodies and the general purpose of its enactment. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The principle of practicality provides that when two interpretations of constitutional language are available and one is productive of invalidity and chaos, while the other saves validity and avoids chaos, the latter interpretation will be adopted. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When a particular interpretation of a constitutional provision has been in effect for a long period without objection, any practice adopted through such an interpretation may create acceptance of the practice by acquiescence. A long-continued understanding and application of a provision amounts to a practical construction of it. Such a construction, acquiesced in for many years, is frequently resorted to by the courts because it is entitled to great weight and will not be disregarded unless it clearly appears that it is erroneous. The general rule is that the exercise of powers and general acquiescence therein for a long period of years, especially if commencing with the government's organization, may be treated as fixing the construction of the Constitution and as amounting to a contemporary and practical exposition of it. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the constitution must be interpreted in such a way as to carry out is purposes and since the purpose of the unified judiciary must be to ensure that fair and impartial justice be provided to every citizen of Chuuk, in a case where all sitting justices are disqualified, unavailable, or have recused themselves, fair and impartial justice will be unavailable unless the Chief Justice has some method available to ensure a fair and impartial hearing. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 263 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the constitution must be liberally, not restrictively, construed, any attempt to place limitations on the Chief Justice's power, where no words of limitation appear, would require a restrictive interpretation of the constitution, and would violate the rules of interpretation as applied to judiciaries. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 263 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Interpreting the Chief Justice's rule-making authority and his authority to "appoint and prescribe duties of other officers and employees, as prohibiting the appointment of a special trial justice unless the appointee meets the Article VII, § 9 qualifications of associate justices, would invite invalidity and chaos. Instead, the principle of acquiescence controls. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 263-64 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk Constitution provides no guidance, positively or negatively, regarding whether special trial justices are permissible, and if so, what their minimum qualifications must be. Absent any words of limitation in the constitution, the Chief Justice has and should maintain vigorously all the inherent and implied powers necessary to permit the judiciary to function properly and effectively as a separate department in the scheme of government. These inherent and implied powers include the power to adopt general court orders for the appointment of special trial justices and to establish minimum qualifications for those special justices which equal the qualifications for temporary appellate justices under the constitution. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A constitutional provision that requires things to be done without prescribing the result that should follow if those things are not done, is directory in character, not mandatory. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 293 (Chk. 2004).

In analyzing constitutional questions, a court should consider all provisions of that constitution, because different sections may relate to the same subject matter, giving the specific provision questioned added meaning. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Because issues of statutory construction and constitutional construction are issues of law, courts have final authority over them, and the issues are ripe for summary judgment, which will be granted to the party that is entitled to it as a matter of law. In ruling on these issues of law, the language of the statutory and constitutional provisions is controlling and the court will construe and give effect to the provisions' plain meaning. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 60 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A court must be careful not to read into a constitution provisions which are not there nor rewrite a constitution to include provisions that seem to be omitted. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The Chuuk Constitution is clear and unambiguous that when referring to the Governor's office, a Governor's "term" is a fixed four-year period. Thus, the phrase "current term" clearly means that if a governor is re-elected for a second four-year term, new nominations (or re-nominations) must be submitted to the Senate but otherwise a cabinet official may remain in office for a full four years unless the Governor earlier removes him (or he is impeached or he resigns). But when a new governor fills out the remainder of his predecessor's unexpired term, the new governor may retain the existing cabinet officials and special assistants without submitting their names for reconfirmation. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 137, 139-40 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The specific meaning of the phrase "current term" or "term" as used in the Chuuk Constitution means a fixed number of years, as set by the Constitution. From the Chuuk Constitution's context, "term" when applied to the executive branch office-holders can only refer to the fixed four-year period. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 137, 140 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

In rendering a decision, the Chuuk State Supreme Court must first consult and apply legal sources of Chuuk State. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When it is an issue of first impression, U.S. court decisions may be used for guidance. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that the trial division of the State Supreme Court has "concurrent original jurisdiction with other courts to try all civil, criminal, probate, juvenile, traffic, and land cases." The word "concurrent" modifies the term "original jurisdiction" and when jurisdiction is concurrent, the appropriate court may be prescribed by statute. The appropriate court for land cases in declared land registration areas was prescribed by statute as an administrative agency, the Chuuk Land Commission. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 574, 575 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

Because Chuuk's people have continuously recognized that "land is life"and because of the particular sacredness with which the Chuukese as a community, value land, this must be reflected in the court's interpretation of the Chuuk Constitution. The protections extended to "real property" under the Chuuk Constitution are more extensive than those guaranteed under the FSM Constitution. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Unnecessary adjudication of Chuuk constitutional questions should be avoided, if possible. Selifis v. Robert, 22 FSM R. 569, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Chuuk – Municipalities

The general grant of the taxing power to the state, which allows taxing power to be delegated to the municipalities, is not an exclusive grant preventing municipalities from levying taxes. Wainit v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 121, 123 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A municipality in Chuuk has the power to tax so long as the state has not preempted the area. Wainit v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 121, 123 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The power to tax is vested in the state which may delegate certain taxing powers to a municipality. Without such delegation a municipality has no power to tax. Stinnett v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 560, 561 (Chk. 1996).

The Chuuk Constitution provision that permits continued operation of existing municipalities pending the adoption of their own constitutions does not permit the continuation of functions outside "the limits prescribed by" the Chuuk Constitution. Stinnett v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. 1996).

A municipal ordinance levying taxes did not continue in effect after the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution because it is inconsistent with that Constitution. Stinnett v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. 1996).

Chuuk municipalities do not have the power to levy taxes until such time as that power has been delegated to them by statute. No such delegation has occurred. Stinnett v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 142, 147 (Chk. 1997).

The Chuuk Constitution provides for the creation of the state taxing power and its delegation, as the state government may elect, to the municipal governments. Article XIII, section 1 of the Chuuk Constitution provides that the two levels of government are state and municipal. As between these two levels of government the one holding the right to delegate is superior. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

Because the express provision for delegation of the taxing authority is inconsistent with the notion that municipalities already had this power, in the absence of specific legislative action authorizing a municipality to impose taxes, the municipality does not have the authority to impose business license fees. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

While under the Chuuk Constitution the "powers and functions of a municipality with respect to its local affairs and government are superior to statutory law," the key phrase in this constitutional provision is "local affairs." Gambling is of statewide concern and an area properly within the state legislative function and does not fall under the cloak of "local affairs." Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 546 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Chuuk Constitution provision granting municipalities "superior" powers is of such unique character that no similar constitutional provision has been found which gives municipalities such extensive control over legislative affairs. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 546 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Because the Chuuk Constitution gives municipalities full power over local affairs and government the Governor cannot, by Executive Order, require municipalities to relinquish any control over municipal employees. Udot Municipality v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 586, 588 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Each municipality in Chuuk must adopt its own constitution, which must be democratic and may be traditional. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Chuuk municipalities must adopt their own constitutions within limits prescribed by the Chuuk Constitution and by general law, but a municipality's powers and functions with respect to its local affairs and government are superior to statutory law. Neither term "general law" or "statutory law" is defined. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 581 n.6 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk Constitution provides for each existing municipality to adopt a municipal constitution within three years of the Chuuk Constitution's effective date and for the state legislature to enact enabling legislation to carry that out. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 292 (Chk. 2004).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that a municipality existing on the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution will continue to exercise its powers and functions under existing law, pending adoption of its constitution. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 292 (Chk. 2004).

There is no provision in Chuuk law to classify a municipality under the Chuuk Constitution as a "quasi-municipality." Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 293 (Chk. 2004).

Both the constitutional and statutory provisions providing for Chuuk municipalities to adopt their own constitutions within three years of the state constitution's effective date are directory, not mandatory because neither prescribes what result should follow if a municipality fails to adopt a constitution within the allotted time and since the Chuuk Constitution provides that a municipality will continue to exercise its powers and functions under existing law, pending its adoption of a constitution. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 294 (Chk. 2004).

Neither the constitutional nor the statutory provision directs the Governor to implement the provisions that each municipality adopt its own constitution. The direction is aimed at the others – the municipalities and the Legislature. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 294 (Chk. 2004).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that final decisions of municipal courts may be appealed to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division, and, in addition, the Chuuk Legislature, by statute, has conferred jurisdiction upon the trial division to hear appeals from municipal court criminal decisions. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 356 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

While the Chuuk Constitution expressly authorizes appeals of municipal court decisions to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division, and does not specifically confer authority in the Legislature to permit appeals to the trial division but is silent on the issue and does not prohibit it, and since the Legislature is empowered to enact any and all laws not inconsistent with the state and national constitutions, the trial division thus has jurisdiction, by statute, over an appeal from a municipal court. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 356-57 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Chuuk municipalities are barred from imposing taxes except as specifically permitted by state statute. Municipalities have been delegated, by statute, the authority to require persons to obtain and pay for a business license before engaging or continuing in a business within the municipality in which the business is located. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

– Chuuk – Taking of Property

To consider a lease valid when the lessee state government cannot be compelled to honor it would be unconstitutional taking of lessor's property. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

In an eminent domain case, just compensation must be fully tendered before a taking may occur and the Chuuk government must deposit in court, for the benefit of the landowners entitled thereto, the amount of just compensation stated in the declaration. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 458 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Even if the Trust Territory statute requiring payment for the improvements on land taken by eminent domain, 67 TTC 453 and 454, has been repealed by implication (it was not expressly repealed), the constitutional provision requiring just compensation for property taken would require compensation for a permanent structure on the land at its fair market value. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

– Declaration of Rights

In developing the Constitution's Declaration of Rights, the Committee on Civil Rights, and subsequently the Constitutional Convention, drew almost exclusively upon constitutional principles under United States law. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 83 (Pon. 1982).

In interpreting the Declaration of Rights, courts should emphasize and carefully consider United States Supreme Court interpretations of the United States Constitution. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 85 (Pon. 1982).

The provisions in the Constitution's Declaration of Rights are to a substantial degree patterned upon comparable provisions in the United States Constitution; the FSM Supreme Court should consider carefully decisions of the United States courts interpreting the United States counterparts. Tosie v. Tosie, 1 FSM R. 149, 154 (Kos. 1982).

As the provisions set forth in the Constitution's Declaration of Rights are based on counterparts in the United States Constitution, it is appropriate to review decisions of United States courts, especially those in effect when the Constitution was approved and ratified, to determine the content of the words employed therein. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 249 (Pon. 1983).

Statutory provisions which carried over from the Trust Territory Code and were reproduced and referred to as a "Bill of Rights" in 1 F.S.M.C. 101-114, may retain some residual vitality in the unlikely event that they furnish protection beyond those available under the Constitution's Declaration of Rights. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 454-55 (Kos. 1984).

The provisions in the Declaration of Rights in the FSM Constitution concerning due process and the right to be informed are traceable to the Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 541 (App. 1984).

Because the Declaration of Rights is patterned after provisions of the United States Constitution, and United States cases were relied on to guide the constitutional convention, United States authority may be consulted to understand the meaning. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 263 (Truk 1986).

While the constitutional provision barring invasion of privacy only protects persons from governmental intrusion into their affairs, not from intrusions by private persons, it does indicate a policy preference in favor of protection of privacy. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 455 (Chk. 1994).

The Declaration of Rights expresses ideals held sacred by all who cherish freedom and is the essential core of the FSM Constitution. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 208, 212 (Chk. 1997).

The Declaration of Rights protects persons from acts of the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 526 (Chk. 1998).

Because the Declaration of Rights is to a substantial degree patterned after provisions of the U.S. Constitution, and U.S. cases were relied on to guide the constitutional convention, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

The FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights is based on the United States Constitution's Bill of Rights, and a court may look to United States precedent in this regard. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

The Declaration of Rights (article IV of the FSM Constitution) protects persons from acts of the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution, and does not create causes of action against private parties. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc. v. Mauricio, 9 FSM R. 155, 157 (App. 1999).

When a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Primo v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 412 n.2 (App. 2000).

When a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 265 (Chk. 2001).

When an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning, and where the FSM Constitution's framers borrowed phrases from the U.S. Constitution, it may be presumed that those phrases were intended to have the same meaning given them by the U.S. Supreme Court. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 409 (Chk. 2004).

The protection offered by the FSM Constitution against compulsory self-incrimination is traceable to the U.S. Constitution's fifth amendment, and when a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 643 (Chk. 2004).

The FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights search and seizure provision, FSM Const. art. IV, § 5, is similar to and drawn from a provision in the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights, U.S. Const. amend. IV. When an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Constitution provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 444 (Chk. 2005).

When a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

Since the article IV, section 7 protection against self-incrimination was based upon the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution, FSM courts may look to United States decisions to assist in determining the meaning of article IV, section 7 because when an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Constitution provision, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 151 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

The Constitution does not contain a right of privacy or financial or business privilege in bank records emanating from Article IV, Section 5 of the FSM Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 247 (App. 2006).

The Declaration of Rights protects persons from acts of the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. The constitutional provision barring the invasion of a person's privacy only protects persons from governmental intrusion into their affairs, not from intrusions by private persons. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 247 (App. 2006).

The Constitution's Declaration of Rights protects persons from acts of the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. Harper v. William, 14 FSM R. 279, 282 (Chk. 2006).

U.S. authority may be consulted to understand the meaning of a Declaration of Rights provision patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision since the provisions in the Constitution's Declaration of Rights are traceable to the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights. Where the Constitution's framers drew upon the U.S. Constitution, it may be presumed that phrases so borrowed were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the U.S. Supreme Court. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

The provisions in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights are traceable to the United States Constitution's Bill of Rights, and when a FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. The FSM speedy trial right is patterned after the United States Constitution. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 387 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Since the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights protection against unreasonable search and seizure is similar to and drawn from a provision in the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 527 n.2 (Chk. 2009).

Employment is not listed as a fundamental right in the Declaration of Rights and the court should be wary of requests that it identify as fundamental any rights beyond those specified in the Declaration of Rights. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' cases, when an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning since it may be presumed that the borrowed phrases were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the U.S. Supreme Court. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 n.2 (Chk. 2012).

When an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Constitution provision (such as Section Five of the Declaration of Rights which is patterned after the U.S. Constitution's Fourth Amendment), U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 n.4 (Pon. 2012).

While the court must first look to FSM sources of law to rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when a FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision and when there is no FSM case law on point, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 n.1 (Chk. 2014).

The FSM Declaration of Rights was modeled after the U.S. Bill of Rights, and so the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting similar Declaration of Rights provisions, such as the right to confrontation, found in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights in Article IV, section 6, and in the U.S. Constitution in its Sixth Amendment. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 46 n.3 (Pon. 2015).

While the court must first look to FSM sources of law rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Constitution provision, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 49, 53 n.2 (Chk. 2018).

The Constitution's prohibition of bills of attainder in the Declaration of Rights applies to all legislative bodies within the FSM, not just to the FSM Congress. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

The FSM Declaration of Rights provisions, FSM Const. art. IV, apply to all governments in the FSM. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 n.2 (Chk. 2019).

Because the FSM Declaration of Rights is to a substantial degree patterned after provisions in the U.S. Constitution and because U.S. cases were relied upon to guide the Micronesian constitutional convention that framed it, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 264 n.4 (Chk. 2019).

Since Section Five of the Declaration of Rights is patterned after the U.S. Constitution's Fourth Amendment, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 462 n.16 (Pon. 2020).

– Due Process

Due process may well require that, in a National Public Service System employment dispute, the ultimate decision-maker reviews the record of the ad hoc committee hearing, at least insofar as either party to the personnel dispute may rely upon some portion of the record. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 206 (Pon. 1982).

The words "due process of law" shall be viewed in the light of history and the accepted meaning of those words prior to and at the time the Constitution was written. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 216-17 (App. 1982).

The Constitution's Due Process Clause requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt as a condition for criminal conviction in the Federated States of Micronesia. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 217-23 (App. 1982).

As a matter of constitutional due process, a trial court presented with an alibi defense should consider evidence concerning the alibi along with all other evidence and shall not find the defendant guilty if after considering all of that evidence, the judge feels there is a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 223-25 (App. 1982).

Article XI, section 6(b) of the Federated States of Micronesia Constitution requires that the FSM Supreme Court consider a petition for writ of habeas corpus alleging imprisonment of a petitioner in violation of his rights of due process. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 243-44 (Pon. 1983).

Preservation of a fair decision-making process, and even the maintenance of a democratic system of government, requires that courts and individual judges be protected against unnecessary external pressures. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 247 (Pon. 1983).

Strict judicial observance of due process is necessary to insure respect for the law. In re Iriarte (I), 1

FSM R. 239, 248 (Pon. 1983).

In a habeas corpus proceeding, the court must apply due process standards to the actions of the courts which have issued orders of commitment. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 249 (Pon. 1983).

The Federated States of Micronesia Constitution does not contemplate that FSM citizens should be required to travel to Saipan or to petition anyone outside the FSM to realize rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 253 (Pon. 1983).

The defendant of a criminal contempt charge is entitled to those procedural rights normally accorded other criminal defendants. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 260 (Pon. 1983).

The Constitution does not contemplate that FSM citizens must first petition any person or body outside the Federated States of Micronesia as a condition to consideration of their constitutional claims by courts established under this constitution. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 265 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Supreme Court is entitled and required to assure that the Trust Territory High Court, exercising governmental powers within the Federated States of Micronesia, does not violate the constitutional rights of its citizens. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 268 (Pon. 1983).

A nahniken, just as any ordinary citizen, is entitled to bail and due process. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 272 (Pon. 1983).

Government employment that is "property" within the meaning of the Due Process Clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the Constitution, there must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 351-52 (Pon. 1983).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of life, liberty or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner. When such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision-making process. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 354-55 (Pon. 1983).

If, pursuant to section 156 of the National Public Service System Act, the highest management official declines to accept a finding of fact of the ad hoc committee, the official will be required by statutory as well as constitutional requirements to review those portions of the record bearing on the factual issues and to submit a reasoned statement demonstrating why the ad hoc committee's factual conclusion should be rejected. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 360-61 (Pon. 1983).

Due process demands impartiality on the part of adjudicators. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 362 (Pon. 1983).

There is a presumption that a judicial or quasi-judicial official is unbiased. The burden is placed on the party asserting the unconstitutional bias. The presumption of neutrality can be rebutted by a showing of conflict of interest or some other specific reason for disqualification. When disqualification occurs, it is usually because the adjudicator has a pecuniary interest in the outcome or has been the target of personal abuse or criticism from the party before him. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 362-63 (Pon. 1983).

The highest management officials cannot be said to be biased as a class and they cannot be disqualified, by virtue of their positions, from final decision-making as to a national government employee's termination under section 156 of the National Public Service System Act, without individual consideration. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 363 (Pon. 1983).

When there is reason to believe that provisions of a public land lease may have been violated by the lessee, and where another person has notified the Public Lands Authority of his claim of a right to have the land leased to him, the Public Lands Authority may not consider itself bound by the lease's renewal provision but is required to consider whether it has a right to cancel the lease and, if so, whether the right should be exercised. These are decisions to be made after a rational decision-making process in compliance with procedural due process requirements of article IV, section 3 of the FSM Constitution. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 421 (Pon. 1984).

Governmental bodies' adjudicatory decisions affecting property rights are subject to the procedural due process requirements of article IV, section 3 of the Constitution. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 422-23 (Pon. 1984).

The government in any criminal case is required, as a matter of due process, to prove all elements of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 35 (App. 1985).

The Due Process Clause, FSM Const. art. IV, § 3, is based upon the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution and courts can look to interpretations under the United States Constitution for guidance. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 35 (App. 1985).

A trial court may not simply presume that a person who possesses a firearm is not keeping it as a curio, ornament or for historical significance. This would be an irrational or arbitrary, hence unconstitutional, presumption or inference because one cannot determine from mere possession of a firearm alone the purpose or nature of that possession. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37 (App. 1985).

Where a seizure is for forfeiture rather than evidentiary purposes, the constitutional prohibitions against taking property without due process come into play. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

The Constitution's Due Process Clause is drawn from the United States Constitution and FSM courts may look to decisions under that Constitution for guidance in determining the meaning of this Due Process Clause. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

Any attempt to grant statutory authority to permit seizure of a fishing vessel upon a lesser standard than probable cause would raise serious questions of compatibility with article IV, sections 3 and 4 of the Constitution. Such an interpretation should be avoided unless clearly mandated by statute. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

Due process does not require that a second judge decide motions for recusal where the trial judge accepts as true all of the factual allegations in the affidavit of the party seeking recusal, and must rule only on matters of law in making the decision to recuse or not recuse himself. Skilling v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 209, 213 (App. 1986).

The procedure for recusal provided in the FSM Code, whereby a party may file a motion for recusal with an affidavit, and the judge must rule on the motion, stating his reasons for granting or denying the motion, before any further proceeding is taken, allows the moving party due process. Skilling v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 209, 214 (App. 1986).

Actions of a police officer in stripping a prisoner to punish and humiliate him, then beating him and damaging his pickup truck, constituted violation of the prisoner's constitutional rights to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and his due process rights. Tolenoa v. Alokoa, 2 FSM R. 247, 250 (Kos. 1986).

A claim that decision-makers in a land adjudication were biased raises serious statutory and constitutional due process issues and is entitled to careful consideration. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 92, 99 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

There is no deprivation of due process in a case in which the government at the trial elicited testimony revealing that it had custody of certain physical evidence but did not attempt to introduce it, and in which the defendant made no request that it be produced. Loney v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 151, 155 (App. 1987).

An expectation of being paid for work already performed is a property interest qualifying for protection under the Due Process Clause of the FSM Constitution. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 200 (Pon. 1987).

An expectation of continued government employment, subject only to removal by a supervisor, is a property interest qualifying for protection under the Due Process Clause of the FSM Constitution. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 200 (Pon. 1987).

The Due Process Clause of article VI, section 3 of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt as a condition for criminal convictions in the Federated States of Micronesia. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 311 (App. 1988).

Where purchasers at a judicial sale are not served by summons and complaint pursuant to FSM Civil Rule 3 but receive notice of a motion seeking confirmation of the sale and made by a creditor of the party whose property was sold, and where the purchasers do not object to the motion, confirmation of the sale is effective and binding on the purchasers and is not violative of their rights of due process. Sets v. Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 365, 368 (Pon. 1988).

The National Public Service System Act and the FSM Public Service System Regulations establish an expectation of continued employment for nonprobationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds and specifying procedures necessary for their dismissal; this is sufficient protection of the right to continued national government employment to establish a property interest for nonprobationary employees which may not be taken without fair proceedings, or "due process." Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 73 (App. 1989).

Once it is determined that a statute establishes a property right subject to protection under the Due Process Clause of the FSM Constitution, constitutional principles determine what process is due as a minimum. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 74 (App. 1989).

In the absence of statutory language to the contrary, the National Public Service System Act's mandate may be interpreted as assuming compliance with the constitutional requirements, because if it purported to preclude constitutionally required procedures, it must be set aside as unconstitutional. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 74 (App. 1989).

In assessing the government's shorter term, preliminary deprivations of private property to determine what, if any procedures are constitutionally necessary in advance of the deprivation, the FSM Supreme Court will balance the degree of hardship to the person affected against the government interests at stake. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 75 (App. 1989).

The Due Process Clause of the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights is based on the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution. Paul v. Celestine, 4 FSM R. 205, 208 (App. 1990).

In determining whether the constitutional line of due process has been crossed, a court must look to such factors as the need for application of force, the relationship between the need and the amount of force that was used, the extent of the injury inflicted, and whether the force was applied in a good faith effort to maintain and restore discipline or maliciously and sadistically for the very purpose of causing harm. Paul v. Celestine, 4 FSM R. 205, 208-09 (App. 1990).

To be property protected under the Federated States of Micronesia and Kosrae State Constitutions, the employment right must be based on governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons as stated in statute, regulation, formal contract or actions of a supervisory person with authority to establish terms of employment. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 302 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr.

Although neither the Environmental Protection Act nor the earthmoving regulations contain any absolute requirement that a public hearing be held before an earthmoving permit may be issued, the issuance by national government officials of a permit authorizing earthmoving by a state agency without holding a hearing and based simply upon the application filed by the state agency and the minutes prepared by the state officials, is arbitrary and capricious where the dredging activities have been long continued in the absence of a national earthmoving permit and where the parties directly affected by those activities have for several months been vigorously opposing continuation of the earthmoving activities at the dredging site. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 1, 8 (Pon. 1991).

If a judge has participated as an advocate in related litigation touching upon the same parties, and in the course of that previous activity has taken a position concerning the issue now before him as a judge, the appearance of justice, as guaranteed by Due Process Clause, requires recusal. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 43 (App. 1991).

There are certain circumstances or relationships which, as a per se matter of due process, require almost automatic disqualification, and, if a judge has a direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest in the outcome of the case, recusal is constitutionally mandated. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 43 (App. 1991).

To prevent the "probability of unfairness," a former trial counselor or attorney must refrain from presiding as a trial judge over litigation involving his former client, and many of the same issues, and the same interests and the same land, with which the trial judge has been intimately involved as a trial counselor or attorney. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 45 (App. 1991).

A person's constitutional right to due process of law, and his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment is violated when an officer instead of protecting the person from attack, threw him to the ground, and beat the person in the jail. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Plaintiff's due process rights were not violated where the government did not use condemnation procedures specified in 67 TTC 451, but followed land registration procedures to obtain title and treated the plaintiff fairly and in the same way it treated other landowners. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 152-54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Constitutional provisions applicable to a prisoner may vary depending on his status. A pre-trial detainee has a stronger right to liberty, which right is protected by the Due Process Clause, FSM Const. art. IV, § 3. A convicted prisoner's claims upon liberty have been diminished through due process so that person must rely primarily on article IV, section 8 which protects him from cruel and unusual punishment. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 190 (Pon. 1991).

When a panel hearing in a summary dismissal was closed to the public and the injured party and counsel were present to attend and participate in the hearing and the panel accepted and considered all testimony and evidence offered by the parties, due process was not violated. Palsis v. Kosrae State Court, 5 FSM R. 214, 217 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Variance between charge of striking police car windshield with fists and evidence adduced at trial of damaging headlights with a beer can is not so misleading and prejudicial that defendant was denied a fair trial or suffered from a lack of notice as to the evidence to be offered at trial on a charge of damaging the property of another. Otto v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 218, 222 (App. 1991).

The actions of a private corporation partly owned by a government should not be considered "state action" for the purposes of due process analysis. Alik v. Kosrae Hotel Corp., 5 FSM R. 294, 298 (Kos. 1992).

Under FSM law there is no property right to particular levels of tort compensation triggering due process protections. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 362-63 (Kos. 1992).

Aliens are persons protected by the due process and equal protection clause of the Constitution. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 366 (Pon. 1992).

Employment opportunity is a liberty interest protected by due process. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 366 (Pon. 1992).

When a landowner voluntarily signs a statement of intent for an easement for a road even though the state failed in is duty of care to inform him that he could refuse to sign, the state has not violated the landowner's due process rights. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 424 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

When counsel is allowed such a short preparation time that counsel's effectiveness is impaired then the accused is deprived of due process and effective assistance of counsel. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 101 (App. 1993).

Something more than a state merely misinterpreting its own law, such as that the state's interpretation was arbitrary, grossly incorrect, or motivated by improper purposes, is needed to raise a legitimate due process issue. Simon v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 314, 316 (Pon. 1994).

The statutory ineligibility of persons convicted of Trust Territory felonies is a valid exercise of Congress's constitutional power to prescribe additional qualifications for election to Congress, and is not unconstitutional as a deprivation of a liberty interest without due process of law, or as an ex post facto law, or as a bill of attainder. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

The constitutional guarantee of due process only protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. Semwen v. Seaward Holdings, Micronesia, 7 FSM R. 111, 113 (Chk. 1995).

A plaintiff's firing by a private employer does not state a cause of action for unconstitutional deprivation of due process because no governmental entity or official is a defendant; the defendant is not alleged to be performing an essential governmental function; and a government action is not at issue. Semwen v. Seaward Holdings, Micronesia, 7 FSM R. 111, 113 (Chk. 1995).

Physical abuse committed by police officers may violate a prisoner's right to due process of law. Persons who are not suspects have no less protection from physical abuse and injury at the hands of the police. The right to due process of law is violated when a police officer batters a person instead of protecting her from harm because persons who are not in police custody have a due process interest in personal security that may be violated by the acts of police officers. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 547-48 (Chk. 1996).

The commission of the intentional tort of battery by police officers in the scope of their employment is a denial of due process of law. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 548 (Chk. 1996).

The failure of the state to adequately train police officers, and the excessive use of force used by officers is a violation of a victim's right to due process of law. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 548 (Chk. 1996).

An official state practice of allowing untrained and unqualified police officers to use deadly force may be shown from the chief of police's testimony that convicted felons were hired although regulations prohibited it and that requalification on firearms had been waived for at least three years although regulations required requalification when it is within his power to allow variation from written regulation, and from the lack of any internal discipline as the result of improper use of deadly force. If, as a result of this policy a person suffers serious bodily injury, it is a violation of her right to due process of law. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 548 (Chk. 1996).

The FSM Constitution due process provision is derived from the United States Constitution and thus United States cases may be consulted for guidance in interpretation, emphasizing cases in effect at the times of the framing (1975) and the ratification (1978) of the FSM Constitution. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 556-57 (Chk. 1996).

Because a government employee's pay is a form of property a government cannot deprive the employee of without due process of law, a state's failure to pay to the allottees money withheld from employees' paychecks for allotments constitutes a government deprivation of the employees' property without due process. Oster v. Cholymay, 7 FSM R. 598, 599 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

A due process challenge to a criminal contempt charge on the ground of the court's or its personnel's actions may be resolved by the judge's recusal and reassignment of the case to a judge whose impartiality has not been questioned. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 638-39 (Chk. 1996).

The FSM Supreme Court appellate division has jurisdiction over an appeal where a motion to recuse filed by the appellant in the state court appellate division raised an issue of due process under the FSM Constitution. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 8 FSM R. 23, 27 (App. 1997).

A justice whose extrajudicial statements exhibit a bias towards a party's counsel must disqualify himself under Pohnpei statute, and failure to do so is a denial of due process. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 8 FSM R. 23, 27-28 (App. 1997).

A trial judge abuses his discretion when, without due process of law, he sua sponte imposes a Rule 11 sanction on an attorney. In re Sanction of Michelsen, 8 FSM R. 108, 111 (App. 1997).

State law specifically prohibits persons with an interest from being members of a land registration team, but no such statute specifically requires the disqualification of land commissioners with an interest from reviewing the registration team's determination. This brings constitutional due process concerns into play. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

Adjudicatory decisions affecting property rights are subject to the procedural due process requirements of article IV, section 3 of the Constitution. Due process demands impartiality on the part of adjudicators, including quasi-judicial officials, such as land commissioners. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

Grounds that require a person's recusal from the land registration team also require his disqualification as a land commissioner reviewing the land registration team's adjudication. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

The commission of the intentional tort of battery by the police officers in the scope of their employment is a denial of due process of law. Physical abuse committed by police officers may violate a prisoner's right to due process of law. The right to due process of law is violated when a police officer batters a person. The public at large has the right to be free of invasions of their person and personal security by any government agent and suspects have the right to be free from the use of excessive force during their arrest. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 195 (Pon. 1997).

In order to assert due process, one must point to a property or liberty interest of one's own that is subject to due process. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 228, 230 (Chk. 1998).

The Kosrae State Charter's due process clause, in effect in 1982, did not extend any greater protection than the FSM Constitution's. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 275 (App. 1998).

The essential features of procedural due process, or fairness, require notice and an opportunity to be heard. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 275 (App. 1998).

The procedural due process requirements of notice and an opportunity to be heard are met when Kosrae provides a limited-term employee being suspended for two weeks the notice mandated by 61 TTC 10(15)(a) and an opportunity to be heard by the official suspending him. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 275 (App. 1998).

The constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection extend to aliens. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 295 n.8 (Pon. 1998).

It is a due process violation for a former trial counselor or attorney to preside as a trial judge over litigation involving the same issues and interests he had been intimately involved with as a trial counselor or attorney, particularly where he had represented one of the litigants. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 8 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 1998).

A party has a due process right to a hearing before an unbiased judge and a judge without an interest in the case's outcome. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 8 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 1998).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of "life, liberty or property" in an unfair, arbitrary manner. Where such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision making process. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 333 (Pon. 1998).

Title 52 F.S.M.C. 151-57 and PSS Regulation 18.4 establish an expectation of continuous employment for nonprobationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds, and specifying necessary procedures, for their dismissal. This is sufficient to establish a "property interest" for the nonprobationary employee which cannot be taken without fair proceedings, or "due process." Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 333 (Pon. 1998).

A permanent employee cannot be demoted to his former position based on a regulation which, by its terms, only applies to a temporary promotion. A permanent employee's constitutional right to due process is violated by the national government when it has thus demoted him. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 335 (Pon. 1998).

In the vast majority of criminal contempt cases, the defendant is given substantially those procedural rights normally accorded to defendants in other criminal cases. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

Although the statutory time periods are directory and not mandatory, a significant delay in proceedings can deprive the Executive Service Appeals Board procedure of its meaningfulness, in violation of the due process rights protected by the Constitution. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 435 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

It is a violation of a litigant's constitutional right to due process for a trial court to rely on evidence, not a part of the record, without prior notice to the parties and an opportunity for the parties to comment on it. Thomson v. George, 8 FSM R. 517, 523 (App. 1998).

It is error for a trial court to rely on exhibits never identified, described, or marked at trial. Thomson v. George, 8 FSM R. 517, 523 (App. 1998).

A special master commits reversible error when its decision has relied on unidentified sketches not a part of the record and about which there was not extensive testimony and cross examination. Thomson v. George, 8 FSM R. 517, 523 (App. 1998).

An illegally-hired public employee has a constitutionally protected interest in employment because the Secretary of Finance must give notice and an opportunity to be heard after taking the action to withhold his pay, and the government must terminate his employment after it determines his hiring had violated public policy, giving him notice and an opportunity to be heard. Failure to take such steps violated the employee's due process rights. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1999).

As a general proposition, a governmental entity's breach of a contract, without more, does not constitute a due process violation. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 18, 20 (Yap 1999).

Voters' due process and equal protection rights are not violated by regulation or restriction of voting by absentee ballots. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

From June 1997 when Kos. S.L. No. 6-131 became law to February 1998 when new PSS regulations were adopted, there was no administrative appeals process for grievances, which void raises substantial due process concerns under the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions. Abraham v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 57, 60 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

To obtain personal jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant in a diversity action, a plaintiff must show that jurisdiction is consistent with the "long arm" statute, 4 F.S.M.C. §§ 203-04, and that the exercise of jurisdiction does not deny the defendant due process of law as guaranteed by article IV, section 3 of the FSM Constitution. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 128 (Pon. 1999).

Because Article IV, section 3 is based on the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution, FSM courts can look to interpretations of the United States Due Process Clause to determine the extent to which the FSM long-arm statute may be used consistently with due process to exert jurisdiction over a non-forum defendant. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 128-29 (Pon. 1999).

Under the doctrine of minimum contacts a defendant must have certain minimum contacts with a forum such that maintenance of the suit does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. The FSM Supreme Court applies a minimum contacts analysis to determine the extent to which the FSM long-arm statute may be used consistently with due process to exert jurisdiction over a non-forum defendant. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 129 (Pon. 1999).

The mere allegation that an out-of-state defendant has tortiously interfered with contractual rights or has committed other business torts that have allegedly injured a forum resident does not necessarily establish that the defendant possesses the constitutionally required minimum contacts. In order to resolve the jurisdictional question, a court must undertake a particularized inquiry as to the extent to which the defendant thus purposefully availed itself of the benefits of the forum's laws. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 129 (Pon. 1999).

Generalized legal conclusions in an affidavit have no bearing on the particularized inquiry, which a court must undertake in order to determine whether defendants have minimum contacts with the forum in order to make a prima facie case that the court has personal jurisdiction over the defendants. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 130 (Pon. 1999).

Two – possibly four – letters and unspecified phone calls sent into the FSM are insufficient in themselves to establish the minimum contacts necessary to establish personal jurisdiction. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 130 (Pon. 1999).

Personal jurisdiction is not established when the alleged tortious conduct resulted only in economic consequences in the FSM because mere economic injury suffered in the forum is not sufficient to establish the requisite minimum contacts so as to sustain long-arm jurisdiction. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 130 (Pon. 1999).

When the tortious conduct is not shown to have occurred in FSM, and the alleged harm flowing from the conduct cannot be said to have been "targeted" to the FSM, it does not persuade the court that the defendants have caused an "effect" in this forum sufficient to justify jurisdiction over them under the FSM long-arm statute. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 131 (Pon. 1999).

When the defendants are not parties to the contract they tortiously interfered with and have no meaningful presence in the FSM, although the economic harm was allegedly targeted to an FSM plaintiff, it is insufficient to establish personal jurisdiction over the defendants. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 132 (Pon. 1999).

Any reliance on the contents of a further investigation that have never been a part of the record is improper. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 172 (App. 1999).

A hearing cannot qualify as the full evidentiary hearing contemplated by Disciplinary Rule 5(b) when neither side had an opportunity to present evidence. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 174 (App. 1999).

A hearing cannot qualify as the full evidentiary hearing contemplated by Disciplinary Rule 5(b) when the decision finding the allegations of misconduct proven had been made and announced before the hearing was held. Such a hearing must take place before the decision is made. Otherwise it is a denial of due process. In re Attorney Disciplinary Proceeding, 9 FSM R. 165, 174 (App. 1999).

Since the Due Process Clause in the Declaration of Rights of the FSM Constitution is based on the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment, the FSM Supreme Court may properly consider U.S. cases in construing due process under the FSM Constitution. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 213 (App. 1999).

Cases involving either prisoners or someone confronted with or being arrested by a police officer – someone in custody or being taken into custody – or cases involving intentional acts, are inapplicable to claims that other state actions that are either negligence, gross negligence or reckless disregard constitute a civil rights or due process violation. Primo v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 411-12 (App. 2000).

Historically, the guarantee of due process has been applied to deliberate decisions of government officials to deprive a person of life, liberty, or property. Mere negligence did not raise a constitutional violation. The Due Process Clause does not purport to supplant traditional tort law and does not transform every tort by a state actor into a constitutional violation. Primo v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 412 (App. 2000).

Neither the state defendants' alleged deliberate indifference to the dredging site's neighbors' safety nor their failure to warn those neighbors of any known risks can properly be characterized as a constitutional violation that would take the case out of the realm of ordinary tort law. Primo v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 412 (App. 2000).

When an amended complaint's deliberate indifference or negligence allegations do not rise to the level of a constitutional due process claim, it does not state a claim upon which the FSM Supreme Court can grant relief and the trial court's dismissal of the amended complaint will therefore be affirmed. Primo v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 412 (App. 2000).

Because conduct alone without regard to the doer's intent is often sufficient to convict someone of a crime, because there is wide latitude to declare an offense and to exclude elements of knowledge and diligence from its definition, and because the defendant knew, by his own admission, that he was not permitted to take a weapon on board the plane, the strict criminal liability imposed by 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) for boarding or attempting to board a commercial aircraft while carrying a firearm or dangerous device does not violate due process. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 449-50 (App. 2000).

When the failure to refer a detainee for medical treatment is arbitrary and purposeless, it constitutes punishment of someone who has not been convicted of any crime. This punishment is a denial of the right to due process. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 13 (Chk. 2001).

A court must exercise its inherent powers with caution, restraint, and discretion and must comply with the mandates of due process. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 85 (App. 2001).

No one should ever be penalized or sanctioned by a court for successfully insisting upon those constitutional rights which are his due. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 87 (App. 2001).

A judgment may not be rendered in favor of or against a person who was not made party to the action. A party to an action is a person whose name is designated on the record as a plaintiff or defendant. A person may not be made a party to a proceeding simply by including his name in the judgment. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

When someone is accorded none of these due process guarantees with respect to a "judgment" against it, the judgment and ensuing order in aid of judgment and writ of execution are void as a matter of law, and these procedural infirmities inherent in the judgment are subject to attack at any time, and thus are outside the adjudicative framework established by the rules of procedure. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

In land cases, statutory notice requirements must be followed. Personal service of the notice of hearing and the Determination of Ownership upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to have an interest in the parcel is required. Failure to serve actual notice on a claimant is a denial of due process and violation of law, which will cause a Determination of Ownership to be set aside as void, and the case remanded to the Land Commission to hold the formal hearings and to issue the determination of ownership for that parcel. Kun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 214, 216 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

To be property protected under the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions, the employment right must be based on governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. A person who has been hired under an employment contract, for a specific length of time, with no provisions for renewal of the contract and no entitlement for renewal of the contract, does not have a property interest in his continued employment and is not entitled to a hearing before termination. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A person who has been employed for twelve years under a series of one year contracts could prove that by that length of employment, there was unwritten claim to continued employment under tenure. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

As a general proposition, a governmental entity's breach of a contract, without more, does not constitute a due process violation. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Adjudicatory decisions of governmental bodies affecting property rights are subject to the procedural due process requirements of the Constitution. Due process requirements are applicable to the proceedings of the Kosrae Land Commission. Ittu v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 10 FSM R. 446, 447 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Due process demands impartiality on the part of adjudicators, such as land commissioners. Langu v. Heirs of Jonas, 10 FSM R. 547, 549 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Due process generally requires some form of fair hearing and rational decision making process when an important interest is at stake. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 635 (Pon. 2002).

In evaluating an alleged due process violation, courts usually are looking at the procedure that was followed by the government when, for example, the government is denying a benefit or taking some property from a party. Three important elements in establishing a procedural due process claim are: 1) whether the government is involved; 2) whether there is a life, liberty or property interest at stake; and, if so, 3) whether adequate due process procedures are employed by the government before a party is deprived of such an interest. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 635 (Pon. 2002).

The constitutional guarantee of due process only protects parties from governments, and those acting under them. To establish a due process claim, a plaintiff must show that a government entity or official, or one acting at the direction of the government, is involved. When the defendants were merely acting as individuals and not as representatives of Congress, or at the direction of Congress, the plaintiff cannot demonstrate the requisite government involvement, and when there is no government action, there can be no due process violation. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 635 (Pon. 2002).

The wording of the due process provisions in both the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions are identical. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 665 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Government employment that is "property" within the meaning of the due process clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions, there must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 665-66 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The due process requirements applicable to employment that is a property interest are: to be property protected under the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions, the employment rights must be based on governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons as stated in statute, regulations, formal contract or actions of a supervisory person with authority to establish terms of employment. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 666 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

There is no assurance of continued employment given by statute when the statute provides that the Corporation may retain and terminate the services of employees, agents, attorneys, auditors, and independent contractors upon such terms and conditions as it deems appropriate, or given by regulation when no regulations exist. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 666 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The due process clause prevents governmental authorities from depriving individuals of property interests without first giving an opportunity to be heard. The clause protects against governmental rather than private deprivations of property. The party alleging a due process violation has the burden of showing that the defendant is a state actor and that the conduct in question was a state action. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 666 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The actions of a private corporation which is partly owned by a government are not "state action" for purposes of due process analysis. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 666 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the statutory provisions intend and ensure that an entity is run as a corporation with its own management and employees, and not as a Kosrae state government agency and when, although the state government remains its sole shareholder, the state government does not assume its debts, does not own its assets, and has no control over its day to day operations, it is not a "state actor," and its termination of an employee is therefore not a "state action." Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 666-67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A party alleging a due process violation has the burden of showing that the defendant is a state actor and that the conduct in question was a state action. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 667 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The defendant employer will be granted summary judgment on a plaintiff's due process claim when the plaintiff has not satisfied his burden showing that the employer is a state actor and that its termination of his employment was a state action because the due process clause may only be invoked through state action. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 667 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title. It is therefore not a proper proceeding for the defendant to challenge title and allege due process violations in the proceedings that determined the plaintiff's title to the parcel. The defendant may challenge the title through separate proceedings as appropriate. Shrew v. Killin, 10 FSM R. 672, 674-75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The personal nature of constitutional rights, and prudential limitations on adjudicating constitutional questions, preclude a criminal defendant from challenging a law on the basis that it may be unconstitutionally applied to others in situations not before the court. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 75 (Pon. 2002).

The twenty year statute of limitation does not apply to claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process, violation of statute and for failure to apply an earlier judgment as they are not claims for the recovery of land. These claims are subject to a limitations period of six years and are barred by the statute of limitations and will be dismissed when the Land Commission actions all occurred more than six years ago. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 175 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A claim of taking of property without due process of law is effective only against governmental entities or officials. The constitutional guarantee of due process only protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The FSM Constitution's due process provision protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution, and does not create causes of action against private parties. The Chuuk Constitution due process provision functions in the same manner. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Once the governmental defendants were dismissed there was no one against which to bring due process claims and civil rights taking claims so those claims were thus properly dismissed. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

A plaintiff's claims for damages resulting from violation of his due process rights depend upon whether the defendant's actions were "state action." Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 240 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

If the court is unable to declare that the defendant authority is a quasi-governmental authority subject to the provisions of the due process clause of the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions, then the plaintiff's due process claims must fail. The plaintiff has the burden of proving that the defendant is a state actor. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 240 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An Authority that has its own Board of Directors, is solely empowered to select its own officers, may sue and be sued in its own name and is responsible for its own debts, and owns its own assets is an autonomous agency that cannot be declared to be subject to the due process provisions of the FSM and state constitutions, and must be declared a private entity and not a "state actor" for due process purposes. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 240-41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Except in extraordinary circumstances, due process requires that parties receive notice of motions because all parties must be served with all papers unless the party is in default, and the default is for a failure to ever appear at any stage of the proceeding. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. David, 11 FSM R. 262j, 262L (Pon. 2002).

When testimony presented at the first formal hearing was not heard by the full panel of adjudicators due to a Land Commissioner's late disqualification and the addition of temporary adjudicators, only one person of the adjudication panel heard that testimony. This resulted in a due process violation because the testimony was not heard by the full adjudication panel when the acting replacement commissioners did not hear the testimony, yet they participated in the findings of fact, opinion and decision. The Land Commission exceeded it constitutional and statutory authority by the adjudication panel's failure to hear all the evidence presented at the hearings. Heirs of Henry v. Palik, 11 FSM R. 419, 422 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When counsel, who now claims he was surprised and unprepared by the scheduling of oral argument, did not ask for a couple of days' (or even a few hours') continuance when the case was called, although such a continuance would have been possible and when counsel argued ably, it is not a ground to grant a rehearing. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 454, 456 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When the Land Commission did not exceed its constitutional or statutory authority, and did conduct a fair proceeding for determination of title, there was no violation of state law and no violation of constitutional and statutory due process based upon the Land Commission's failure to notify the appellant in writing of the planting of monuments. Tulenkun v. Abraham, 12 FSM R. 13, 16 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A mortgagee's due process rights are not violated by a statute making another lien superior to its mortgage when the statute was enacted prior to the mortgage's execution. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

The public entity responsible for public lands is required to make its decisions openly and after giving appropriate opportunity for participation by the public and interested parties. Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 91 (Pon. 2003).

The fundamental concept of due process is that government may not take from a citizen his life, liberty, or property in an unfair or arbitrary fashion, but must follow procedures that ensure a fair and rational decision-making process. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 118 (Pon. 2003).

To satisfy constitutional due process concerns, absent class members must be afforded adequate representation before entry of a judgment which binds them. Resolution of two questions determines legal adequacy: 1) do the named plaintiffs and their counsel have any conflicts of interest with other class members and 2) will the named plaintiffs and their counsel prosecute the action vigorously on behalf of the class? The second part of this question may also be stated in the affirmative as that it must appear that the class representatives will vigorously prosecute the interests of the class through qualified counsel. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 12 FSM R. 192, 199 (Yap 2003).

No court could grant as relief a sweeping request to nullify all certificates of title to all persons who are not heirs of legatees pursuant to a will when such a request would reverse long-settled, final cases not now before the court, with parties not now before the court, and award others title to land for which certificates of title have already been issued because that would have the court void certificates of title in a manner that would violate every notion of due process of law. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 277 (App. 2003).

All co-tenants are indispensable parties to the litigation when someone else claims complete ownership of the land. Otherwise, the co-tenants would either be deprived of their property interest without due process of law or they would be forced to share their property with a hostile co-owner who believes he should be the sole owner. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 279 (App. 2003).

An appellate court will first consider an appellant's due process contentions, when, if the appellant were to prevail on these, the decision below would be vacated (without the appellate court considering its merits), and the matter remanded for new proceedings. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 284 (App.

An assertion that a Land Commission decision was tainted and a party denied due process because various members of the Land Commission and Land Registration Team were close relatives of the appellee or the appellee's wife is a serious allegation that, if true, would usually be enough to vacate the decision and remand the case to the Land Court for new proceedings with a new determination to be made by impartial adjudicators. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 284 (App. 2003).

When the appellant does not name the persons who he claims were the appellee's or the appellee's wife's "close relatives" or state how they are related, or what positions they held, or how they were involved in the Land Commission decision, the appellate court, without knowing the answers to these questions, cannot find plain error and conclude that, as a matter of law, the appellant's due process rights were violated and thereby vacate the determination and remand it for a new determination before other adjudicators. When the appellant did not raise this claim in the Land Commission or later in the Kosrae State Court, having failed to raise it earlier, the appellant cannot raise it now. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 284-85 (App. 2003).

No court could grant as relief a far-reaching request to nullify all certificates of title to all persons who are not heirs of legatees pursuant to a will when such a request would reverse long-settled, final cases not now before the court, with parties not now before the court, and award others title to land for which certificates of title have already been issued because that would have the court void certificates of title in a manner that would violate every notion of due process of law. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 288-89 (App. 2003).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of "life, liberty or property" in an unfair, arbitrary manner. Before such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision making process. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 374 (App. 2004).

The omission of an adopted daughter's name from a verified probate petition, signed under oath by the petitioner, resulted in the failure to provide the adopted daughter her constitutional due process rights to be notified of the probate proceeding, have an opportunity to be heard and may have also affected her rights as an heir of the decedent. In re Skilling, 12 FSM R. 447, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When a plaintiff has a judgment based on a common law contract, and there is no FSM statute that affects ordinary contracts in a way that shows a substantial national interest in such matters, the law of contracts is generally one in which state law controls. A governmental entity's breach of a contract, without more, does not constitute a due process violation. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 561 (Chk. 2004).

Repeated, intentional instances of failure of a state to pay a judgment does not constitute a separate, constitutional claim for deprivation of property without due process where the original underlying claim is not constitutional in character, but is based on common law contract and when there is no constitutional claim that supports the judgment itself, nor a national statute applicable that implicates a "clear and substantial" national interest. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 561-62 (Chk. 2004).

A new law that results in a state employee's loss of his accumulated sick leave hours is not unconstitutional and a deprivation of property without due process because the right to take payment for sick leave to be taken in the future is a mere expectancy, and does not constitute a vested right entitling the employee to compensation. "Vested" means having the character or given the rights of absolute ownership. Sam v. Chief of Police, 12 FSM R. 587, 589 (Kos. 2004).

When there are multiple dates upon which an election result was certified, the date of making the certification public and notifying the candidates would comport best with due process as the certification starting point for election contests. Wiliander v. National Election Dir., 13 FSM R. 199, 204 (App. 2005).

If the court enters a default judgment different in kind from or exceeds in amount the relief that was prayed for in the demand for judgment, such a default judgment would be void and subject to collateral attack. Serious due process questions would be raised. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 277 (Chk. 2005).

A default judgment that included damages for claims not raised in the complaint or sums not prayed for by the plaintiff and that was rendered against a defendant who never appeared would violate due process. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. 2005).

In the case of an injunction, non-parties who are persons who are the defendant's "officers, agents, servants, employees and attorneys," or "persons in active concert or participation" with the defendant and successors to a party, are the only non-parties against whom judgments and orders may be lawfully enforced, that is, enforced without violating the non-party's constitutional right to due process and Rule 71. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 389 (Chk. 2005).

The general rule is that orders cannot be enforced against non-parties without violating the non-parties' constitutional rights to due process, and if an order can lawfully be enforced against someone it is because either that person is a party or it is an injunction being enforced and that person is a party's "officers, agents, servants, employees and attorneys," or a person "in active concert or participation" with a party. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 390 (Chk. 2005).

A defendant's statutory right to be brought before the court within the 24 hours period goes to the heart of the procedural due process guaranteed to FSM citizens. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 499 (Pon. 2005).

The FSM Constitution's due process provision protects persons from governments, and those acting under them, and does not create causes of action against private parties. The Kosrae Constitution due process provision functions in the same manner. A party alleging a due process violation has the burden of showing that the defendant is a state actor and that the conduct in question was a state action. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The usual cause of action when a governmental entity has exercised its regulatory powers improperly is a constitutional due process claim. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 15 (App. 2006).

When the presiding Land Court justice was required to disqualify himself, his failure to recuse himself was a violation of due process making the Land Court's decision contrary to law because the Land Court proceeding's presiding justice failed to recuse himself, and the matter must be remanded to the Kosrae Land Court with instructions and guidance for re-hearing the matter. Isaac v. Saimon, 14 FSM R. 33, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In the FSM, claims of police brutality or excessive force generally implicate due process, rather than equal protection. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 202 (Pon. 2006).

A public officer is not denied due process of law by the abolition of his office before his term expires or by his removal or suspension according to law. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 218 (Chk. 2006).

While procedural due process requires governmental decision-making to conform with the concept of what is fair and just, substantive due process, on the other hand, addresses the legislature's rationality. Substantive due process protects individual liberty interests against certain governmental actions regardless of the fairness of the procedure used to implement them. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 248 n.6 (App. 2006).

It is error for a trial court to rely on exhibits never marked at trial. A justice commits reversible error when his decision has relied on a document that is not a part of the record. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Taulung, 14 FSM R. 287, 289 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In order to recover compensatory damages, the plaintiffs must prove actual injury from the civil rights deprivation. When, if proper procedure had been followed, the plaintiffs still would have been terminated from their positions, there is no actual injury to compensate with back pay or other benefits. Nominal damages may, however, be awarded for the deprivation of the important right to procedural due process. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 444 (Chk. 2006).

Common-law courts traditionally have vindicated deprivations of certain "absolute" rights that are not shown to have caused actual injury through the award of a nominal sum of money. By making the deprivation of such rights actionable for nominal damages without proof of actual injury, the law recognizes the importance to organized society that those rights be scrupulously observed; but at the same time, it remains true to the principle that substantial damages should be awarded only to compensate actual injury or, in the case of exemplary or punitive damages, to deter or punish malicious deprivation of rights. Because the right to procedural due process is "absolute" in the sense that it does not depend upon the merits of a claimant's substantive assertions, and because of the importance to organized society that procedural due process be observed, the denial of due process should be actionable for nominal damages without proof of actual injury. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 444 (Chk. 2006).

No court can grant as relief a request to set aside or nullify a certificate of title to a person who is not a party before the court and effectively award someone else ownership to some or all of the land for which the certificate of title was issued because that would have the court void a certificate of title in a manner that would violate every notion of due process of law. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 454 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In any lawsuit to remove someone's name from a certificate of title, that is, to deprive a person of ownership of the registered land that the certificate represents, due process requires that that person is an indispensable party to the action. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

No court can set aside, void, nullify, invalidate, or alter a person's certificate of title to land without that person first having been made a party to the action before the court. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

One alleged due process violation does not justify an aggrieved party's retaliatory due process violations. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 n.4 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the parties received a Land Commission determination from the Land Court, which then granted the appellants' request for a continuance after issuing its decision and which agreed to consider the appellants' motion to vacate the determination, if it was filed in writing; when the appellants filed their appeal, the Kosrae State Court agreed to hear the matter; when the appellants had notice and an opportunity to be heard at the preliminary and formal hearings and they participated in both the preliminary and final hearings and presented evidence regarding the parcel's alleged transfer; and when they were not served with the Land Commission adjudication, the appeals period did not run, the Land Commission and Land Court complied with statutory requirements and conducted a fair proceeding. Heirs of Tara v. Heirs of Kurr, 14 FSM R. 521, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When no hearing was held before the court issued its December 14, 2001 order in aid of judgment and no finding was made on the debtor's ability to pay in December 2001, the December 14, 2001 order was issued in violation of the State's right to due process and the order constitutes an abuse of the trial court's discretion. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

It is error and a due process violation for a trial court to award attorney's fees without giving the opposing party (who will be paying the fee award) notice and an opportunity to challenge the proposed award's reasonableness. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 62 (Yap 2007).

By failing to refer motions to recuse and to disqualify the presiding justice to another justice, as required by the State Judiciary Act, the trial justice violated the movants' rights to due process of law. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 108 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In any lawsuit to, in effect, remove someone's name from a certificate of title, that is, to change the registered ownership of the land that the certificate represents and deprive the certificate titleholder of the titleholder's property interest, due process requires that that person is an indispensable party to the action. Any action that seeks to claim an interest in land for which a certificate of title or a determination of ownership has already been issued, must, at a minimum, name the registered titleholder as a party. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The fundamental concept of due process is that government may not take from a citizen his life, liberty, or property in an unfair or arbitrary fashion, but must follow procedures that ensure a fair and rational decision-making process. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

It is generally considered violative of the constitutional right to due process to apply a law retroactively that would divest someone of a vested right or property interest. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 205 (Chk. 2007).

In an election dispute, the person whose right to the office is contested is the real party in interest. When a plaintiff is contesting the right of a candidate to participate in an election but fails to name the candidate as a party in the complaint, the court will deny injunctive relief because the real parties in interest are not parties to the action, since without naming the candidates as parties to this action, and giving them the benefit of due process of law, the court is unwilling and unable to adjudicate their rights in the proceeding. Bisaram v. Suta, 15 FSM R. 250, 255 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An argument that the trial court denied a litigant due process by depriving her of her property without allowing her to be heard is without merit when the trial court decision being appealed was handed down in response to the litigant's own summary judgment motion, through which she is assumed to have stated her position, and when a hearing was held on the motion at which the litigant was represented by counsel. She was afforded full opportunity to be heard. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 398 (App. 2007).

Plaintiffs' due process civil rights were violated when police officers beat them without reason or justification. Further due process violations occurred when one of them was detained and arrested without being told the reason, and when he was held in police custody for six hours. Hauk v. Emilio, 15 FSM R. 476, 479 (Chk. 2008).

A person commits an offense if he willfully, whether or not acting under color of law, deprives another of, or injures, oppresses, threatens, or intimidates another in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right, privilege, or immunity secured to him by the FSM Constitution or laws and a private cause of action is provided for any such violation. Due process is a right secured by the FSM Constitution. Hauk v. Emilio, 15 FSM R. 476, 479 (Chk. 2008).

Due process issues are questions of law, and questions of law are reviewed de novo. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

There is no constitutional due process right to a trial if the matter may properly be resolved by summary judgment. Trial is a process used to resolve disputed issues of material fact. A court must deny a summary judgment motion unless, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the party against whom judgment is sought, it finds there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and the moving party is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Thus a decision without trial would violate due process rights only if there was a genuine issue of material fact that would preclude summary judgment because that issue would need to be tried. It is also an abuse of the trial court's discretion to grant summary judgment if a genuine issue of material fact is present. Albert v. George, 15 FSM R. 574, 579-80 (App. 2008).

The due process concerns in a Rule 11 plea hearing do not apply with equal force to the context of a revocation of probation or supervised release. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 8 (Chk. 2008).

A single justice's reprimand of a legal services corporation law firm must be reversed where it was based on a factual error that the attorney appearing for the appellants was appearing as a member of the law firm when he was appearing only on his own behalf and his close relatives. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 16 FSM R. 100, 106-07 (App. 2008).

The Constitution's due process protections do not require appellate oral argument. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 16 FSM R. 100, 111 (App. 2008).

The Constitution's due process protections do not require appellate oral argument. Oral argument on appeal is not an essential ingredient of due process. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 127 (App. 2008).

It is essential that the trial court insure that its own notice procedures satisfy the requirements of due process. In order to comply with due process, Chuuk State Supreme Court Civil Procedure Rule 5(a) requires that service of all notices and other papers must be made upon each party affected. Under Rule 5(b), service must be made on a party's counsel, if represented, and may be effectuated either by "delivering a copy to him or by mailing it to him at his last known address or, if no address is known, by leaving it with the clerk of court." Rule 5(b) further specifies that delivery of "a copy" means handing it to counsel; or leaving it at his office with his clerk of other person in charge thereof; or if there is no one in charge, leaving it at his dwelling house or usual place of abode with some person of suitable age and discretion residing therein. Service by placing a notice in a counsel's box in the clerk's office is not a method of service recognized by Rule 5(b). Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 156-57 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A variance is a discrepancy or disagreement between the allegations of the charging instrument and the proof adduced at trial. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 245 (App. 2009).

When considering whether a variance warrants relief, the court must examine whether the variance was material or prejudicial, that is, whether it affected the substantial rights of the accused. Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights is disregarded. The issue is whether the accused is given sufficient notice of the charges against him so as to be able to present his defense and not be taken by surprise by the evidence offered at the trial and also to be protected against another prosecution for the same offense. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 245 (App. 2009).

When the prosecution failed to incorporate the accused's alleged possession of a rifle into its prosecution even after witness testimony, choosing instead to remain within the parameters of its original allegations all the way through closing argument, namely that the accused's presence in the boat alone supported conviction, it is reasonable to conclude that the accused was never given proper notice of his alleged conduct, and, even if the accused was given notice of the conduct underlying the violation after the witness testimony, such notice coming midway through the FSM's case-in-chief is not sufficient notice for the accused to prepare his defense against the factual allegations ultimately used to convict him. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 246 (App. 2009).

Allegations in the information alleging a criminal violation must be proven in order to obtain a conviction. It is not sufficient that the evidence show a violation of the statute specified in the information if the actual violation is different from the one alleged. Kasmiro v. FSM, 16 FSM R. 243, 247 (App. 2009).

The Constitutions of both Kosrae and the Federated States of Micronesia state, in identical wording, that a person may not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law and these two clauses are treated as identical in meaning and in scope and may be analyzed together. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

For the due process clause to apply, a life, property, or liberty interest must be implicated. In an employment case, to be property protected under the Constitution, the employment right must be supported by more than merely the employee's own personal hope. There must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 307 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A government's breach of a contract, without more, does not violate due process rights. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 484 (Pon. 2009).

Although an employment opportunity is a liberty interest protected by due process, the right to governmental employment in Pohnpei is not a constitutionally-protected fundamental right, requiring invoking a strict scrutiny test. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 497 (Pon. 2009).

Government employment that is "property" within meaning of Due Process Clause cannot be taken without due process, but, in order for property to be protected under FSM Constitution, there must be claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons, and when the plaintiff does not allege that she was ever given an assurance of any kind of continual employment beyond the specific dates set forth in her short-term contract, her claim will be dismissed with prejudice. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 497 (Pon. 2009).

A distinction exists between a mere opportunity for employment and employment itself. When a plaintiff was not denied any employment opportunity by the defendant and she was not guaranteed employment but was allowed to apply – on two separate occasions – for the position and interviewed after each such job application and was granted employment after the first job announcement but was not selected for employment after the second job announcement because the defendant deemed another the most qualified, the plaintiff's claim that she was denied, without due process, any opportunity to be employed by the defendant is without merit and will be dismissed with prejudice. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 497-98 (Pon. 2009).

An election contest petitioners' failure to name all real parties in interest in their pleadings can subject the court's rulings to being later challenged by the real parties in interest as a violation of their due process rights to defend their interest in the action. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 513, 516 n.1, 517 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

It is constitutional error for a trial court to rely on exhibits never identified, described, or marked at trial, but the trial court does not commit reversible error when there was extensive testimony and cross-examination of witnesses concerning the exhibits' contents. In such an instance, it is the witness testimony that is the evidence before the court. George v. George, 17 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 2010).

When the trial court did not rely on unadmitted evidence to reach its decision and when there was substantial trial testimony from which the trial court could reasonably find that the defendant owed the plaintiff $6,220.52, the trial court decision did not violate the defendant's due process rights and its factual finding that $6,220.52 was the amount owed was not clearly erroneous. George v. George, 17 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 2010).

A litigant's constitutional right to due process is violated when a trial court relies on evidence, not a part of the record, without prior notice to the parties or without an opportunity for the parties to comment on it, and it is constitutional error for the court to rely on exhibits never identified, described or marked at trial. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32 (App. 2010).

Trial court judgments that were, in part, based on documents that were never authenticated by affidavit or by testimony and their accuracy was never vouched for by affidavit, or testimony, or other evidence will be vacated. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32 (App. 2010).

When the receipts relied upon by the trial court were never identified, marked, described, or admitted at trial or evidentiary hearing; when those receipts were provided to the court post-trial and were never authenticated, introduced, or admitted into evidence; and when neither side had the opportunity to examine witnesses, or to produce witnesses to testify, on the accuracy, meaning, or completeness of the receipts or about the receipts that the trial court disallowed because someone else had signed them, the documents supplied to the court after trial were not evidence that was properly before that court and thus were not evidence in the record and the trial court's use of these documents violated due process. There is therefore no substantial evidence in the record to support the judgment amount. The judgment amount finding is thus clearly erroneous, and the judgment will be vacated since that figure is not supported by substantial evidence in the record, and, in fact, is not supported by any evidence in the record. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 32-33 (App. 2010).

It is inconceivable that a party could be made to suffer criminal or civil penalties for the failure to collect a tax but would not have standing to challenge the tax's constitutionality (and thus the requirement that the party must collect it). The inability of a party required by law to collect a tax to challenge that tax's validity would deprive that party of its property (compliance costs, tax collection costs, remittance costs, etc.) without any due process of law. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 158-59 (Chk. 2010).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not strip citizens of life, liberty, or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner. When such important individual rights are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision-making process. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 215 (Pon. 2010).

When a defendant has submitted no evidence showing that the government's failure to inform him of the state correctional facility's rules, procedures, and schedules unconstitutionally deprived him of a life, liberty, or property interest and when, since such an admonition is unnecessary, the "Prisoner Rights and Responsibilities" document which the defendant cites does not inform inmates that they have a responsibility to not commit unlawful acts while incarcerated, the defendant cannot claim that he did not know he was not permitted to leave the correctional facility premises without a court order or police escort while incarcerated and a motion for dismissal on that ground will be denied. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 215 (Pon. 2010).

Both the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions provide that "a person may not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The wording of each of these clauses is identical in meaning and scope. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 240 (App. 2010).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not deprive citizens of life, liberty or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner. A taking occurs whenever a public entity substantially deprives a private party of the beneficial use of his property for a public purpose. Ladore v. Panuel, 17 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2010).

In any lawsuit that, in effect, seeks to change the registered ownership of the land that a certificate of title represents and deprive the certificate titleholder of the titleholder's property interest, due process would require that that person be an indispensable party to the action. Any action that seeks to claim an interest in land for which a certificate of title or a determination of ownership has been issued, must, at a minimum, name the registered titleholder as a party. Setik v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 304, 306 (Chk. 2010).

An arrestee's right to be informed of her right to counsel when arrested is a due process right.

Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 371 (App. 2011).

Due process demands impartiality on the part of the adjudicators, including Kosrae Land Court judges. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503 (App. 2011).

If a presiding Land Court judge fails to recuse himself when he is required to, it is a due process violation and the matter must be remanded to the Kosrae Land Court with instructions and guidance for re-hearing the matter. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503-04 (App. 2011).

It generally violates the constitutional right to due process to apply a law retroactively that would divest someone of a vested right or property interest. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 592 (Pon. 2011).

As a general proposition, a governmental entity's breach of a contract, without more, does not constitute a civil rights or due process violation. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 (Chk. 2011).

Government inaction, or even deliberate indifference, is not a due process violation. Berman v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 67, 73 (Pon. 2011).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process proscribes the government from stripping its citizens of property in an unfair or arbitrary manner. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 134 (Pon. 2011).

A statute that restricts the sale of alcohol during the Christmas and New Year's holidays serves legitimate governmental purposes in the areas of the public health and welfare and the allowance of on-sale alcohol purchases during these holidays also support the operations of the hotels and cabarets who have a demand for such sales from its customers during the holidays. This legislation carries out the purposes for which the statute was amended by further regulating the sale of alcohol in a manner which promotes the State's legitimate governmental objectives. This statute regulating and restricting alcohol is within the scope of legislative authority, has a reasonable purpose, is not arbitrary, and carries out the purposes prescribed and is thus not unconstitutional. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 135-36 (Pon. 2011).

Since property may not be taken by the government, even in aid of a judgment, without due process of law, due process of law in executing the writ may be assured by directing the executing officer to strictly comply with the statutory provisions for levying a writ of execution. Saimon v. Wainit, 18 FSM R. 211, 215 (Chk. 2012).

A pretrial detainee has a stronger right than a convicted prisoner to liberty, and that right is protected by the Due Process Clause while a convicted prisoner's claims upon liberty have been diminished through due process so the convicted prisoner must rely primarily on the protections from cruel and unusual punishment. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 231 (Pon. 2012).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not strip a citizen of life, liberty, or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner. Before such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision making process. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 245 (Pon. 2012).

When an impeached U official was arrested on the U Impeachment Panel's bench warrant and brought within 24 hours before the only court competent to try him for the contempt charge, the U Impeachment Panel, where he was heard and then convicted of contempt, he received the process of law due him. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 (Pon. 2012).

In order to prevail on a claim of deprivation of liberty or property without due process of law, a plaintiff must: 1) identify a liberty or property right which implicates the Due Process Clause; 2) identify a governmental action which amounts to a deprivation of that liberty or property right; and 3) demonstrate that the deprivation occurred without due process of law. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When no property right can be ascribed to the judgment at issue; the due process standard is not applicable. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The police, as state officers, have no constitutional duty to rescue persons because due process considerations are not implicated when the state fails to help someone already in danger. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 429 (Chk. 2012).

A police officer's threat of arrest does not constitute a violation of constitutional rights, and merely investigating a suspicious occurrence or merely patrolling the area where someone fled is not a violation of any clearly established constitutional right. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 429 (Chk. 2012).

Although there was no Kosrae or FSM Constitution in 1960 and constitutional rights are generally prospective, not retroactive, the Trust Territory Bill of Rights, whose due process clause was presumed to have the same meaning as in the United States, was in effect then. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 304 (App. 2014).

Due process issues are generally questions of law that are reviewed de novo. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 305, 309 (App. 2014).

For either a trespass cause of action or a cause of action against a municipal government for due process violations, the plaintiffs did not have to prove title or ownership, just a greater right to possession. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 338 (App. 2014).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not strip a citizen of life, liberty, or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner. Before such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to ensure a fair and rational decision making process. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 390-91 (Pon. 2014).

A prisoner's unlawful 161-day detention after the end of his sentence meant that he was deprived of his constitutional right not to be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

Generally, the alleged mistreatment of pre-trial arrestees is subject to a due process analysis while that of convicted prisoners is analyzed under the cruel and unusual punishment standard. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

A convicted prisoner whose sentence had already ended but who was still kept imprisoned for 161 more days can assert a procedural due process claim – he was denied his liberty without due process when, without a hearing or an opportunity to be heard, his prison term was effectively extended and his release date bypassed. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

The constitutional guarantee of due process only protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. Thus, a person's termination by a non-governmental employer does not state a cause of action for unconstitutional deprivation of due process because no governmental entity or official is a defendant; the defendant is not alleged to be performing an essential governmental function; and a government action is not at issue. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 569 (Kos. 2014).

An employer is not a governmental entity when it was not created by the FSM national government nor by any government established or recognized (national, state, or local) by the FSM Constitution; when it is merely funded, in part, by the FSM national and four state governments; when it is incorporated in the United States Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas and its parent corporation was created by the act of the United States Congress so that even if it were a governmental entity, it would be an entity of a government to which the FSM Constitution's due process clause does not apply. It will therefore be entitled to summary judgment on a former employee's wrongful termination in violation of constitutional due process cause of action. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 569 (Kos. 2014).

There is no due process violation from the different composition of the two appellate panels when the first appellate panel had before it an interlocutory appeal and the later appeal was from a final judgment on the merits. There is no due process reason why a different panel could not be constituted for the second appeal case when the first panel had completed its work on the appeal case before it and then, after a new and final trial division decision, a different group of three judges was empaneled to hear the new appeal case. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 603, 607 (App. 2014).

In order to assert due process, one must point to a property or liberty interest of one's own that is subject to due process. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 68 (Pon. 2015).

Government employment that is "property" within the meaning of the Due Process Clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the Constitution, the employment right must be supported by more than merely the employee's own personal hope. There must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 68 (Pon. 2015).

Since the full rights of continued employment only vest upon appointment, when an applicant was not selected from the certified list, was never appointed to the position he applied for, and no agreement for employment was entered into between the parties, he was never a public employee, and therefore his due process rights never vested. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 68 (Pon. 2015).

An arrest based upon probable cause does not violate the constitutional right to due process. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

Due process requires that for a warrant to issue, the report must demonstrate "probable cause" and this determination must be made by a judicial officer before jurisdiction is extended. Thus, the sentencing court takes primary responsibility for initiating probation revocation proceedings. To delegate that authority would be tantamount to abdicating the judiciary's sentencing responsibility to the executive. Ultimately, the court retains the discretion to reject or accept the probation officer's recommendations. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 339 (Pon. 2016).

Regardless of the lesser standards that apply in revocation proceedings, due process is required. FSM v. Edward, 20 FSM R. 335, 340 (Pon. 2016).

A money judgment against the state is not a property interest but an existing, continuing liability against the state, and a failure to timely satisfy that judgment does not constitute a taking in violation of due process or equal protection. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The fundamental concept of due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of life, liberty or property in an unfair or arbitrary manner. When such interests are subject to possible government taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision-making process. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 557 (Pon. 2016).

In order to prevail on a claim of deprivation of liberty or property without due process of law, a plaintiff must: 1) identify a liberty or property right which implicates the due process clause; 2) identify a governmental action which amounts to deprivation of that liberty or property right; and 3) demonstrate that the deprivation occurred without due process of law. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 557 (Pon. 2016).

When no property right can be ascribed to the alleged property at issue, the due process standard does not apply. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 557 (Pon. 2016).

Government employment that is property within the meaning of the due process clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the FSM Constitution, there must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. These assurances may come from various sources, such as statute, formal contract, or actions of a supervisory person with authority to establish terms of employment. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 558 (Pon. 2016).

Although a governmental entity's breach of contract, without more, does not constitute a civil rights or due process violation, a person who has been employed for twelve years under a series of one year contracts could prove that by that length of employment, there was an unwritten claim to continued employment. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 558 (Pon. 2016).

When no one ever notified the plaintiffs that they must stop working in their respective positions or that they would not be paid for the work done from October 2014 to April 2015; when the government continued to assign them projects and retained the benefits conferred by their work, but did not compensate them for the work; when the plaintiffs never received notification from the government that their contracts had not or would not be renewed although the plaintiffs eventually became aware that the Project Control Documents that controlled their contracts were unsigned; when the government's consistent delay in renewing the contracts and disbursing wages was a common occurrence experienced by the plaintiffs during their previous years' contracts; and when the government continued to accept, approve, sign, and maintain the plaintiffs' submitted time sheets thereby implying assurances of forthcoming wages, the evidence, viewed in its entirety, presents a situation whereby the plaintiffs had a reasonable justified expectation to continued employment and, therefore, payment for those services rendered to the government's benefit between October 2014 and April 2015. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 558 (Pon. 2016).

A government employee's pay is a form of property that a government cannot deprive the employee of without due process. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 559 (Pon. 2016).

When the government has willingly deprived the plaintiffs of wages that they are entitled to without due process of law, it is civilly liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) for violating the plaintiffs' civil rights. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 559 (Pon. 2016).

When the trial court clearly considered the petition for a writ of mandamus, it did not deprive the petitioner of his procedural due process by denying the writ without first having a hearing. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 93 (App. 2016).

When the appellant's designated family representatives acted on her behalf and were her agents for the Land Court proceedings, she cannot aver that she was unaware of the proceeding and her due process deprivation claims are wanting. Lonno v. Heirs of Palik, 21 FSM R. 103, 108 (App. 2016).

Litigants cannot argue that, in their view, they were deprived of due process because the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division wrongly decided a matter of state law. A Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division decision on Pohnpei state law is always correct. It is not correct because the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division is infallible. It is correct because, until the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division reverses or overrules its prior decision, it is final. Edwin v. Kohler, 21 FSM R. 133, 137 (App. 2017).

When the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division granted the appellant's requests for 124 days of enlargement to file her brief and when, a month after the brief had actually been filed, that court effectively denied her timely request for the four days of enlargement by concluding that she "chose to remain silent in the end" and then dismissed her appeal, under these circumstances, this denial of the appellant's timely request to file her brief three or four days late was so arbitrary and capricious as to be an abuse of discretion that violated the appellant's right to due process under the FSM Constitution, and which would require reversal. Silbanuz v. Leon, 21 FSM R. 336, 341 (App. 2017).

When a defendant's claim for due process violation is unsubstantiated and uncorroborated except by the defendant's testimony, the defendant's motion to suppress and to dismiss his case in its entirety will be denied. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 377 (Pon. 2017).

The due process clause may only be invoked through state action. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 500 (Pon. 2018).

An autonomous agency cannot be declared to be subject to the due process provisions of the FSM and state constitutions, and must be declared a private entity, and not a "state actor" for due process purposes. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 500 (Pon. 2018).

When the owner of registered land sells or gifts registered land, all that is needed for a valid transfer is the delivery to the Land Court of a properly notarized deed (with each needed signature properly notarized) combined with the surrender of the grantor's old duplicate certificate of title. Proper and strict compliance with those requirements is the due process that is sufficient (and required) for the valid issuance of a new certificate of title to the grantee. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

When a person has not been tried, convicted, and sentenced, no question of cruel and unusual punishment arises. That is why the alleged mistreatment of pre-trial arrestees is subject to a due process analysis while that of convicted prisoners is analyzed under the cruel and unusual punishment standard. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 653, 656 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The constitutional guarantee of due process only protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. The due process guarantee does not apply to the actions of private parties. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 11 (Pon. 2018).

When a civil rights claim neither alleges that the actions were pursuant to governmental policy or custom, nor that the actions were taken by officials responsible for final policy-making, it fails to state a claim upon which relief may be granted and will be dismissed because the plaintiffs fail to state a claim that their civil right to due process was violated. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 11 (Pon. 2018).

A court may abuse its judicial discretion by an unexplained, lengthy delay or by the failure to exercise its discretion within a reasonable time because the failure to exercise discretion is an abuse of the discretion. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 67 (Pon. 2018).

Since the right to procedural due process is "absolute" in the sense that it does not depend upon the merits of a claimant's substantive assertions, and because of the importance to organized society that procedural due process be observed, the denial of due process is generally actionable for nominal damages without proof of actual injury. And a plaintiff who is awarded nominal damages in a civil rights action is also entitled to his attorney's fees and costs. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 67 (Pon. 2018).

A court's long, unexplained delay or its failure to exercise its discretion within a reasonable time is an abuse of discretion that denies a right to procedural due process. Luhk v. Anthon, 22 FSM R. 69, 70 (Pon. 2018).

Procedural due process is a constitutional civil right covered by 11 F.S.M.C. 701. When the right to procedural due process has been violated and there are no provable, actual damages (thus the damages are only nominal), it is a civil rights violation for which attorney's fees and costs may be awarded. Luhk v. Anthon, 22 FSM R. 69, 71 (Pon. 2018).

The constitutional guarantee of due process was established to protect persons from governmental actions and not private persons or entities not acting under the law. Micronesian Legal Services Corporation is not a governmental entity created by the national, state, or local government. George v. Palsis, 22 FSM R. 165, 175 (App. 2019).

The FSM Constitution's due process clause is derived from the U.S. Constitution and thus U.S. cases may be consulted for guidance in interpretation, emphasizing those cases in effect at the times of the FSM Constitution's framing (1975) and the ratification (1978). Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 n.1 (App. 2018).

Since the knowing use of perjured testimony is fundamentally unfair, such a conviction must be set aside if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the fact-finder's judgment. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

The prosecution, as an entity, has a constitutional obligation not to deceive the fact-finder or to allow the fact-finder to be deceived by the prosecution's witnesses; thus, the prosecution cannot let false testimony by any of its witnesses stand uncorrected. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

If the evidence sought actually has no probative significance at all, no purpose would be served by requiring a new trial simply because an inept prosecutor incorrectly believed the prosecution was suppressing a fact that would be vital to the defense. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102-103 (App. 2018).

If the prosecution's suppression of evidence results in constitutional error, it is because of the evidence's character, not the prosecutor's. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 103 (App. 2018).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of life, liberty, or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner, and when such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision making process. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2020).

The constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection extend to aliens. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 633 n.8 (Pon. 2020).

– Due Process – Notice and Hearing

In criminal contempt proceedings, reasonable notice of a charge and an opportunity to be heard are basic in our system of jurisprudence; these rights include a right to examine witnesses against one, to offer testimony, and to be represented by counsel. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 250 (Pon. 1983).

A hearing on a charge of contempt is less critical to fairness where the events occur before the judge's own eyes and a reporter's transcript is available. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 250 (Pon. 1984).

A summary punishment always, and rightly, is regarded with disfavor. When conviction and punishment is delayed it is much more difficult to argue that action without notice or hearing of any kind is necessary to preserve order and enable the court to proceed with its business. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 251 (Pon. 1983).

Once a contemner has left the courtroom, there presumably is no immediate necessity to act without a normal hearing to preserve the integrity of the court proceedings. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 251 (Pon. 1983).

When the accused disrupts courtroom proceedings and the judge must act immediately to restore order, a trial judge may immediately convict a defendant (the accused) through a "summary contempt" procedure, that is, without prior notice or hearing. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 260 (Pon. 1983).

The Constitution secures to the criminal defendant, as a minimum, the right to receive reasonable notice of the charges against the defendant, right to examine any witnesses against the defendant, and the right to offer testimony and be represented by counsel. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 260 (Pon. 1983).

No judge should mete out criminal punishment except upon notice and due hearing, unless overriding necessity precludes such indispensable safeguards for assuring fairness. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 262 (Pon. 1983).

Failure to proceed with a contempt hearing offered by the court without prior notice cannot be deemed a loss or waiver of the hearing right itself when no clear and unmistakable warning is issued that a failure to proceed immediately with the hearing will constitute a loss or waiver of that right. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 264-65 (Pon. 1983).

When the plaintiff has been given reasonable notice of his trial and he and his attorney failed to appear to adduce evidence and prosecute the claim, his inactivity amounts to abandonment of his claim and it is subject to dismissal under FSM Civil Rule 41(b). Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 414-15 (Pon. 1984).

Basic notions of fair play, as well as the Constitution, require that Public Lands Authority decisions be made openly and after giving appropriate opportunity for participation by the public and interested parties. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 420-21 (Pon. 1984).

A fundamental requisite of due process of law is the opportunity to be heard. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 423 (Pon. 1984).

Parties whose rights are to be affected are entitled to be heard; and in order that they may enjoy that right they must be notified. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 423 (Pon. 1984).

Radio announcement is a common and generally effective method of notice. Yet radio notice alone of a proposed hearing to determine rights to future use of public lands is not constitutionally sufficient to a person who: 1) asserts a direct and serious claim based on his activities on, and actual possession of, the land; 2) had given written notice to the decision-maker of his wish to assert the claim; 3) lives relatively near the decision-maker's office; and 4) had a work location where telephone or written messages to him could have been received during the day. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 427 (Pon. 1984).

It is normally required that a hearing be held prior to seizure of a property. In extraordinary situations a seizure may take place prior to hearing, but the owner must be afforded a prompt post-seizure hearing at which the person seizing the property must at least make a showing of probable cause. Unreasonable delay in providing a post-seizure hearing may require that an otherwise valid seizure be set aside. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

The Due Process Clause prevents governmental authorities from depriving an individual of property interests, without first according an opportunity to be heard as to whether the proposed deprivation is permissible. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 200 (Pon. 1987).

Only in extraordinary circumstances, where immediate action is essential to protect crucially important public interests, may private property be seized without a hearing. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 200 (Pon. 1987).

Any withholding of private property, such as a government employee's paycheck, without a hearing can be justified only so long as it takes the authorized payor to obtain a judicial determination as to the legality of the payment being withheld. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 200 (Pon. 1987).

A party is not deprived of due process of law in a case in which a judgment is entered against it on a cause of action raised by the trial court, where the party had notice and an opportunity to be heard, even though the cause of action does not appear in the pleadings and no amendment of the pleadings was made. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 3 FSM R. 445, 453 (Truk 1988).

Only in extraordinary circumstances where immediate action is essential to protect crucially important public interests, may private property be seized without a prior hearing of some kind. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 74 (App. 1989).

Constitutional due process requires that a nonprobationary employee of the national government be given some opportunity to respond to the charges against him before his dismissal may be implemented; including oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 76 (App. 1989).

Implementation of the constitutional requirement that a government employee be given an opportunity to respond before dismissal is consistent with the statutory scheme of the National Public Service System Act, therefore the Act need not be set aside as contrary to due process. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 77 (App. 1989).

A prisoner's rights to procedural due process have been violated when he received neither notice of the charges against him nor an opportunity to respond to those charges before or during confinement. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 212 (Pon. 1991).

A person for whom extradition is sought must be brought before a justice that evidence of his criminality may be heard and considered so that he may be certified as extraditable. Such a person is entitled to notice of the hearing and an opportunity to be heard and to effective assistance of counsel. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 99 (App. 1993).

Where a party attended the meeting at which the common boundary was set and thus had actual notice, and filed no adverse claim to the boundary location that would trigger the statutory right to notice, but claimed he was not aware of the adverse boundary until eight years later, and waited another four years before filing suit, the claimant's repeated failure to timely assert his rights does not demonstrate a due process violation. Setik v. Sana, 6 FSM R. 549, 553 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

One who receives actual notice cannot assert a constitutional claim that the method of notice was not calculated to reach him. Setik v. Sana, 6 FSM R. 549, 553 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Where parties had no claims to the land at the time the title was determined they were not entitled to notice. The lack of notice to them does not raise a genuine issue of material fact as to the validity of a Certificate of Title. Where a court proceeding determined title, the lack of a record of notice in the Land Commission files does not raise a genuine issue of material fact as to the validity of the Certificate of Title because the Land Commission did not conduct the hearing on title and so would not have any record of notice. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 49 (App. 1995).

Where a vessel has been arrested pursuant to a warrant, a post-seizure hearing is required by the constitutional guarantee of due process. FSM v. M.T. HL Achiever (II), 7 FSM R. 256, 257 (Chk. 1995).

An owner of seized property cannot challenge the statute it was seized under as unconstitutional because the statute fails to provide for notice and a hearing, if procedural due process, notice and a right to a hearing, are provided. FSM v. M.T. HL Achiever (II), 7 FSM R. 256, 258 (Chk. 1995).

The Due Process Clause does not require an immediate post-seizure probable cause hearing in advance of a civil forfeiture trial. It only requires that the government begin the forfeiture action within a reasonable time of the seizure. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 557 (Chk. 1996).

A civil forfeiture statute is not unconstitutional in failing to set out a requirement for a post-seizure hearing and a notice of that right; nor is the government constitutionally required to inform the defendant of such notice and a right to a hearing. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 557 (Chk. 1996).

It is constitutional error for the trial court to rely on a special master's report, not a part of the record, without prior notice to the parties and an opportunity for the parties to comment on it. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 669 (App. 1996).

Notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process of law. In re Sanction of Michelsen, 8 FSM R. 108, 110 (App. 1997).

The manner in which Rule 11 sanctions are imposed must comport with due process requirements. At a minimum, notice and an opportunity to be heard are required. In re Sanction of Michelsen, 8 FSM R. 108, 110 (App. 1997).

A court's failure to provide adequate notice and the opportunity to be heard when imposing sanctions sua sponte in itself provides the ground for reversal of an order imposing sanctions. In re Sanction of Michelsen, 8 FSM R. 108, 110 (App. 1997).

Normally, notice and an opportunity to be heard is given prior to governmental deprivation of property, but governments need not follow this in the case of taxes. Governments must, however, provide a post-deprivation opportunity to challenge the tax and a clear and certain remedy. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 126 (Chk. 1997).

Persons entitled to notice of a proceeding generally are those who are to be affected by a judgment or order therein and the requirement of notice applies only to those whose substantial interests are affected by the proceeding in question. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 228, 230 (Chk. 1998).

When a party's possession of land was not hostile so as to give rise to an adverse possession or to a prescriptive profit à prendre claim, failure to give the party notice is not a violation of the party's due process rights. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 240 (App. 1998).

When an appellant has failed to comply with the appellate rules' timing requirements for filing its opening brief, a single article XI, section 3 justice may, on his own motion, dismiss the appeal after the appellant has been afforded its constitutional due process right to notice and an opportunity to be heard. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 264, 265 (App. 1998).

A non-party is deprived of due process of law when a case is started against it without notice or it having been made a party, when an order in aid of judgment has been issued against the non-party without a judgment and a hearing held following notice, and when a writ of execution has been issued against a non-party and without notice or hearing to determine the amount to be executed upon. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 8 FSM R. 301, 304 (Chk. 1998).

Due process requires that the parties be given the opportunity to comment upon evidence. A fundamental requisite of due process of law is the opportunity to be heard. Notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process of law. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 455, 458 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When a person, who has applied for registration of land included within the boundaries of an area on which hearings are held and who, based upon his application, was, as required by 67 TTC 110, entitled to be served notice of the hearings, was not served notice of the hearings and was also not served a copy of the Determination of Ownership, there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties, and is required to post notice on the land, at the municipal office and principal meeting place at least thirty days in advance of the hearing. Failure to provide notice to an interested party is violation of due process. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

In land cases, notice requirements must be followed. Failure to serve actual notice is a violation of due process of law and contrary to law. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 94 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The policy reasons supporting actual notice of hearings to land claimants, as required by law, are very important. There is a substantial interest in assuring that land disputes are decided fairly because of the fundamental role that land plays in Kosrae and throughout Micronesia. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 94-95 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

In land cases, notice requirements shall be followed. Failure to serve actual notice on a claimant is a denial of due process and violation of law. Due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, Determinations of Ownership and Certificates of Title will be set aside as void. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 95 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When a person appeared as a witness at the formal hearing for a parcel and testified in support of another's claim to that parcel and did not make her own claim to the land, she was not entitled to notice of the Determination of Ownership for the parcel because she was not an "interested party." Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 513, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When parties had no claims to the land at the time the title was determined they were not entitled to notice. Without a claim to the land in question there is no right to notice of a land commission proceeding or finding. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 513, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a party had no claim to the land at the time ownership was determined, that party was not entitled to statutory notice of the determination of ownership for a parcel and she does not have standing to appeal the Land Commission's decision and the court does not have jurisdiction over her appeal claims. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 519, 521 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties. Failure to provide notice to an interested party is violation of due process. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 9 FSM R. 523, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a person, entitled to be served notice of the hearing, was not served notice of the hearing and was also not served a copy of the Determination of Ownership, there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law, and the Determination of Ownership will be set aside as void and remanded to the Land Commission to hold formal hearings. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 9 FSM R. 523, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

In land cases, statutory notice requirements must be followed. Failure to serve actual notice on a claimant is a denial of due process and violation of law. Due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, Determinations of Ownership and Certificates of Title will be set aside as void. Nena v. Heirs of Nena, 9 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Personal service of the Determination of Ownership is required upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to have an interest in the parcel. Nena v. Heirs of Nena, 9 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a party, who had shown an interest in the parcel, was not served the Determination of Ownership as required by law, the parcel's Determination of Ownership and the Certificate of Title will, due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, be vacated and set aside as void and remanded to the Land Commission to again issue and serve the Determination of Ownership for the parcel in accordance with statutory requirements. Nena v. Heirs of Nena, 9 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When the land commission voids one person's certificate of title and issues a new certificate of title covering the same land to another person without notice to the first person and affording the first person an opportunity to be heard, it is a denial of due process and the certificates of title will be vacated and the case remanded to the land commission to conduct the statutorily-required hearings. Enlet v. Chee Young Family Store, 9 FSM R. 563, 564-65 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Notice that the court has been requested to issue an order affecting a litigant's rights and an opportunity for that party to be heard are constitutionally mandated by the due process clause. O'Sullivan v. Panuelo, 9 FSM R. 589, 595 (Pon. 2000).

An attorney is entitled to appropriate notice and an opportunity to be heard before any sanction is imposed on him, whether that sanction is imposed on him under the civil procedure rules, the criminal contempt statute, or some other court power. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 84 (App. 2001).

A court hears before it condemns, and that while a court that has announced a decision without notice and an opportunity to be heard can always be asked to recall its decision and listen to argument this opportunity, as every lawyer knows, is a poor substitute for the right to be heard before the decision is announced. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 89 (App. 2001).

The basic tenets of due process of law are notice and an opportunity to be heard. As applied to judgments, this means that a judgment may not be rendered in violation of these constitutional limitations and guaranties. An elementary and fundamental requirement of due process in any proceeding which is to be accorded finality is notice reasonably calculated to apprise interested parties of the pendency of the action, which is itself a corollary to another requisite of due process, the right to be heard. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 96-97 (App. 2001).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

The Land Commission does not conduct a fair proceeding when it issues a determination of ownership without compliance with statutory notice requirements. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties. Failure to provide notice to an interested party is violation of due process. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The registration team is required to service actual notice of the hearing, either by personal service or registered air mail, upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to have an interest in the parcel, and is also required to serve actual notice of a determination of ownership upon all persons shown to have an interest in the parcel. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the land registration team was informed at the preliminary inquiry that someone was an interested party due to his boundary dispute, but the land registration team failed to serve him actual notice of the formal hearing and the determination of ownership issued for the parcel, there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law, and due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, the determinations of ownership for both adjoining parcels must be set aside as void and remanded to the Land Commission. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 598 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When the trial court sua sponte set aside a judgment without notice and an opportunity to be heard, it set aside the judgment without due process of law. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 598 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

A trial court abuses its discretion when it sua sponte sets aside a judgment because the court, and not a party or his legal representative made the motion; when the judgment holder was denied due process because he was not given notice and an opportunity to be heard before the decision against him was announced; and when the decision was based upon an erroneous conclusion of law that a trial court Rule 68(b) hearing was an absolute necessity before this judgment could be entered. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 599 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When a court makes a motion sua sponte, it generally gives the parties notice and an opportunity to respond before it decides; just as when a party makes a motion the other party is generally given an opportunity to respond before the court rules. Notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process. Wainit v. Weno, 10 FSM R. 601, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When an appellant had no notice of the court's sua sponte motion to dismiss the appeal before the dismissal order was entered, the dismissal was a violation of the appellant's right to due process because of the lack of notice and an opportunity to be heard. Wainit v. Weno, 10 FSM R. 601, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

A court hears before it condemns, and that while a court that has announced a decision without notice and an opportunity to be heard can always be asked to recall its decision and listen to argument this opportunity is a poor substitute for the right to be heard before the decision is announced. Wainit v. Weno, 10 FSM R. 601, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Due process generally requires that the government provide an individual with notice and an opportunity to be heard before taking away that person's liberty. A person has a liberty interest in not being criminally prosecuted without notice of what conduct is prohibited. A statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law, as it fails to give people notice of what conduct is prohibited. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 75 (Pon. 2002).

It would seem that due process would require that in any lawsuit to remove someone's name from a certificate of title that that person would be an indispensable party to the action. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 158 n.4 (Chk. 2002).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and subject to direct or collateral attack. Pastor v. Ngusun, 11 FSM R. 281, 285 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties. Failure to provide notice as required by law to an interested party is violation of due process. Albert v. Jim, 11 FSM R. 487, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The registration team is required to serve actual notice of the hearing upon all parties shown to have an interest in the parcel either by personal service or registered air mail. Albert v. Jim, 11 FSM R. 487, 490

(Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When a person, entitled to be served notice of the hearing, was not served actual notice of the hearing by personal service, there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law and when there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law, the Certificate of Title and the Determination of Ownership will be vacated and set aside as void, and the matter remanded to Kosrae Land Court for further proceedings. Albert v. Jim, 11 FSM R. 487, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the two issues a party seeks reconsideration of were raised in the other parties' filings and at the scheduled conference (which it declined to attend), the party thus had the opportunity to (and did) respond to other parties' claims, then the party was given the process that was due it. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 66 (Chk. 2003).

When the plaintiff received notice of the hearing and had an opportunity to present its arguments to the agency, when, although the agency would have done well to explain its reasons for rejecting plaintiff's arguments, it was not legally required to do so, and when the record shows that a hearing was held, a rehearing was held, the parties were allowed to have their attorneys present, the parties were given the opportunity to file written briefs and did so, and the agency thereafter issued a 13-page written decision, the plaintiff's claim that its due process rights were violated will be dismissed for failure to state a claim, as will a civil rights claim inextricably tied to the due process claim. Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 91-92 (Pon. 2003).

A court cannot order a stay in cases in another court with parties not before it and who have had no notice and opportunity to be heard; nor should it prevent other, unknown persons from seeking future court relief. Even for cases where the parties are the same, there is no authority for such extraordinary relief. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

It violates due process for the Land Commission to hold a hearing and adjudicate ownership of a parcel of land without giving notice to a party with a demonstrated interest in that land. George v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 310, 316 (App. 2004).

The trial court has an obligation to insure that a defendant was served with the notice of trial issued by the trial court, and on that basis an appellate court will reverse the trial court judgment and remand the case for a new trial. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 372 (App. 2004).

When the fundamental tenets of due process are violated by the trial court's failure to provide notice of the trial to a pro se litigant, the trial court's later denial of his motion for relief from judgment under Rule 60 is an abuse of discretion. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 374 (App. 2004).

Notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process of law. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 374 (App. 2004).

Specific requirements of due process may vary depending on the nature of decisions to be made and the circumstances. At the core however is the right to be heard. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 374 (App. 2004).

Even when a litigant was provided with a subpoena by opposing counsel, which accurately stated the trial date, it is essential that the trial court insure that its own notice procedures satisfy the requirements of due process, especially where pro se litigants are involved. When unrepresented parties are deluged with legal documents drafted by attorneys on the opposing side, it is conceivable that confusion will result. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 374 (App. 2004).

When the trial court easily could have concluded a trial on the full merits of the case by extending or delaying the proceedings for a few extra hours, but chose instead to base its determination of liability upon evidence that a litigant did not have an opportunity to oppose because of lack of court-issued notice of trial, and when the law favors the disposition of cases on their merits, the trial court's error in failing to insure that it provided the litigant with notice of the trial date and time brings into question the fairness, integrity, and public reputation of judicial proceedings. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 375 (App. 2004).

The procedural due process guarantee of notice protects not only the parties involved but upholds the court's integrity as well. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 375 (App. 2004).

A trial court commits plain error, and violates the litigant's right to due process, when it fails to serve notice of a trial date and time on a pro se litigant. It therefore abuses its discretion when it denied the litigant's motion for a new trial. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 375 (App. 2004).

A sua sponte summary judgment motion is proper so long as the court provides adequate notice to the parties and adequate opportunity to respond to the court's motion. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Jonas, 13 FSM R. 171, 173 (Kos. 2005).

It is a violation of due process for the Land Commission to hold a hearing and adjudicate ownership of a parcel of land without giving notice to a party with a demonstrated interest in that land. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 13 FSM R. 418, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the Land Commission has not followed statutory notice requirements for the formal hearings and there was no substantial compliance with the requirements specified by law, the Kosrae State Court must set aside the determination of ownership as void and remand to Kosrae Land Court for further proceedings. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 13 FSM R. 418, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

That the Kosrae Land Court went beyond the statutory requirements for notice, and provided too many notices to persons who were not entitled to personal notice by law and that this "extra" notice created a dispute, does not result in or cause a violation of the appellant's constitutional due process protections. Kun v. Heirs of Abraham, 13 FSM R. 558, 560-61 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a party had at least six days notice that it might be found in contempt and that Rule 37(b)(2)(A) sanctions might be imposed and those six days should have been sufficient and when the party took the opportunity to file various papers concerning the issues raised but did not directly address the prospect of contempt or of Rule 11 or Rule 37(b)(2)(A) sanctions although it was on notice they would be considered at the hearing, thus if the party was not heard on the Rule 37(b) sanctions, it was not because it did not have an opportunity to be heard after it was on notice that Rule 37(b)(2) sanctions would be considered. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 250-51 (App. 2006).

Rule 11 sanctions may be imposed on a party or his attorney or both. Since the constitutional guarantee of due process requires that the person, upon whom a sanction might be imposed, must be given notice of that possibility and the opportunity to be heard before any sanction can be imposed, before the court could consider the sanctions motion as a whole, the party's former counsel, who had withdrawn before the sanctions motions were filed, had to be given notice that Rule 11 sanctions might be imposed and an opportunity to be heard on the issue as it might relate to him. The court therefore ordered that the motion be served on former counsel, and that the clerk serve a copy of the court order on him. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 355, 359 (Pon. 2006).

The essence of due process is notice and an opportunity to be heard. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 454 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A judgment (or final order) entered against a person without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time, and a court that lacks personal jurisdiction over a person cannot enter a valid judgment against that person. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the Board of Trustees gave a party a lease to Lot No. 014-A-08 (which was duly recorded at the State Land Registry) and took its lease payments for years up to and including the January, 2005 lease payment, even assuming that the Board's later ruling that the party's lease is invalid is correct, the Board is estopped from asserting that the party had no rights in Lot No. 14-A-08 in January 2005 and the party had a right to, at a minimum, notice and an opportunity to be heard when the Board was determining whether there was a valid lease to the lot or should it be advertised for lease. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 14 FSM R. 458, 461-62 (Pon. 2006).

When a party had some right to a lot, it was, at a minimum, entitled to notice that the Board of Trustees believed the party's lease was invalid and that the Board intended to revoke the lease and put that lot up for public bid. The party was also entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard on the issue of the lease's validity before the Board revoked the lease. When the Board did not give the party any notice and revoked its lease and issued a lease to another, this lack of notice to the party would thus make the later issuance of a lease invalid. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 14 FSM R. 458, 462 (Pon. 2006).

Actual notice as required by statute must be given for preliminary and formal hearings at the Land Commission. Notice is required because it gives a chance to be heard. However, the consequences for failing to give notice of decisions are different. The party has had a chance to be heard and to present evidence. Serving notice of an adjudication, or decision, is required in order to give the party a chance to appeal. If a party is not properly served notice of a determination of ownership, the statutory appeals period that an appeal shall be made within sixty days of the written decision's service upon the party, does not run. Heirs of Tara v. Heirs of Kurr, 14 FSM R. 521, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

If a party was not served notice and was then denied the right to appeal, his due process rights are violated. Heirs of Tara v. Heirs of Kurr, 14 FSM R. 521, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The issuance of an order against the State without permitting the State both notice and an opportunity to be heard, either orally at a hearing or by giving sufficient time to submit a written response, violates the State's right to due process. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since, in any lawsuit that would remove someone's name from a certificate of title or that would deprive a person of ownership of the registered land that the certificate or determination represents, the constitutional right to due process requires that that person is an indispensable party to the action, an August 20, 1998 judgment that was rendered without either titleholder having been made a party to the case and having had an opportunity to be heard is thus void, and could be collaterally attacked by later civil actions. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Civil Rule 71 does not (and cannot) overthrow the due process clauses of the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions. Notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process of law. No court can grant as relief a request that would nullify a certificate of title to a person who is not before the court and award different person with the title to land for which a certificate of title had already been issued because that would have the court void certificates of title in a manner that would violate every notion of due process of law. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 111 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the appellants' counsel was given notice of the hearing and chose not to appear, request a continuance, or take any other action, the appellants' due process rights were not violated because due process requires notice and an opportunity to be heard and this was provided. Heirs of Obet v. Heirs of Wakap, 15 FSM R. 141, 144 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When, before issuing title to someone else, the Land Court never gave the plaintiff notice or an opportunity to be heard on his claim of ownership based on a subdivision and since having notice and an opportunity to be heard are the core requirements of due process and fundamental fairness, the Land Commission and Land Court deprived the plaintiff of his right to due process when title was issued in 2002 without giving the plaintiff notice or an opportunity to be heard on his claim of ownership filed with the Land Commission in 1987, and therefore, the 2002 title is not valid as to the plaintiff. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 194-95 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When no court notice of the case's hearing on the merits was ever served on the defendants, the defendants' and the real party in interest's rights to due process of law under the Chuuk and FSM constitutions were violated because a trial court commits plain error, and violates a litigant's right to due process, when the court fails to serve the notice of a trial date and time on that litigant. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 224 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Any order in aid of judgment may be modified by the court as justice may require, at any time, upon application of either party and notice to the other, or on the court's own motion. But a court cannot decide its own motion without first giving either party notice or an opportunity to be heard because that would violate a litigant's due process rights guaranteed by both the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions since notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 234 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a court makes a motion sua sponte, it must give the parties notice and an opportunity to respond before it decides; just as when a party makes a motion, the other party generally must be given an opportunity to respond before the court rules. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 234 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since a suit maintained as a class action under Rule 23 has res judicata effect on all class members, due process requires that notice of a proposed settlement be given to the class. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 443, 445 (Yap 2007).

The statute requires that a notice of a land registration hearing be given to all interested parties and claimants, and to the public. "Interested parties" is not defined. Claimants are presumably those persons who are known to have filed a claim to register the land. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

In a Torrens land registration system, it is in the land owner's interest for notice to be given as broadly as possible since the certificate of title the landowner gets at the end of the process is conclusive upon any person who had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under that person, but only prima facie evidence of ownership against all others. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

Adjoining landowners, even if not claimants, would, because of their common boundaries, be interested parties, along with anyone else who holds some interest in the land, such as a mortgagee, an easement holder, or a holder of a covenant running with the land. But even if the adjoining landowners were not interested parties, Land Court notice to them is not contrary to law. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

Notice of land registration hearings must be given to the public in general. The hearings are public, and anyone may attend. Land Court proceedings are not ones which only the known claimants may attend. One purpose of public notice at various stages of the registration process is to reach as many persons as possible so that, at the end, the certificate of title will be conclusive against as many persons as possible, which is to the certificate holder's considerable benefit. The statute requiring that actual notice be given to claimants, is a minimum requirement, not the maximum permissible. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 572 (App. 2008).

Once a new claim arose, the other claimants were entitled to notice of it and to have a preliminary map showing the claims in dispute posted during a formal hearing. Due process requires that the new claim be surveyed, a new preliminary map prepared showing the overlapping claims, and a new, or second, formal hearing held with the new preliminary map posted. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567,

It is a due process violation and constitutional error for a court to base its decision, in whole or in part, on evidence of which a party has not had both notice and the opportunity to be heard. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 573 (App. 2008).

The process due to land claimants under the Kosrae Land Court Rules requires that a preliminary map showing all claims be posted at a formal hearing so that the presiding judge and the witnesses can view it and the claimants have an opportunity to be heard on any disputes. When the Land Court based its decision on a map prepared long after the formal hearing and on which the appellants had no opportunity to comment and no map showing the overlapping claims was available at the hearing, a second formal hearing should have been held once the new (second) preliminary map was prepared showing both sides' claims. The matter will therefore be remanded to the Land Court for that court to hold another formal hearing at which a map showing all the claimed boundaries must be posted and at which the parties will have the opportunity to be heard on the matter of the overlapping claims and the two preliminary maps and for which the Land Court will give actual notice to all claimants and to all interested parties. Interested parties shall be interpreted to include the adjoining landowners. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 573 (App. 2008).

Imposition of Rule 46(c) disciplinary sanctions is subject to due-process scrutiny. Adequate notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 16 FSM R. 100, 107 (App. 2008).

When, although the notice did not cite any of the Rules of Professional Conduct that the reprimand found that the attorney violated, it was adequate notice because it did state what act or omission of counsel may lead to discipline and cited the relevant appellate rule. The attorney ought to have been aware that he was facing some sort of sanction for not timely filing a brief and that the sanction would be imposed under Rule 46(c). Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 16 FSM R. 100, 108 (App. 2008).

Motions may be decided without oral argument. Where argument would not be helpful to the decisional process, it will not be required on a dismissal issue when the appellants have had, and have taken, their opportunity to be heard by filing written submissions. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 16 FSM R. 100, 111 (App. 2008).

When the court, through a single justice, has made its own motion to dismiss as a matter of docket management, it cannot decide its own motion without first giving the parties notice and an opportunity to be heard because that would violate a litigant's due process rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution since notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 16 FSM R. 100, 113 (App. 2008).

When an order constituted the sua sponte motion to dismiss and the notice to the appellants of the motion to dismiss and when, although it did not cite Rule 27(c), the order did give notice that the appeal was subject to dismissal and the factual basis (failure to file a brief and thus failure to comply with Rule 31) for the possible dismissal, the appellants had notice of the facts they had to respond to and the probable result if they were unable to show cause. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 16 FSM R. 100, 113 (App. 2008).

Imposition of Appellate Rule 46(c) disciplinary sanctions is subject to due-process scrutiny. Adequate notice and an opportunity to be heard is therefore required. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 123 (App. 2008).

An order that never mentions the legal services corporation law firm was inadequate on its face to serve as notice to sanction the firm, and when it was not served separately on the firm so that the firm could respond, the firm thus had no notice of any possible sanction. Although the firm is definitely responsible for supervising its attorneys, its reprimand, no matter how deserving, must be reversed because of the complete absence of any separate notice to it. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 123 (App. 2008).

Although the notice provided to an attorney in an order did not cite any of the Rules of Professional Conduct that the later reprimand found that the attorney violated, when it was notice that, if the attorney could not show good cause why no opening brief had been filed, he would then be subject to disciplinary action under Rule 46(c). Since it stated what act or omission of counsel may lead to discipline and cited Rule 46(c), the notice given was adequate for the attorney to have understood that he was facing a possible sanction for not timely filing a brief, and that, if it were imposed, the sanction would be imposed under Appellate Rule 46(c). Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 123 (App. 2008).

Motions may be decided without oral argument. When it does not appear that argument would help the decisional process, oral argument is not required on a dismissal issue, when the appellant has had, and has taken, his opportunity to be heard by filing written submissions. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 127 (App. 2008).

The court may, through a single justice, make its own motion to dismiss as a matter of appellate docket management. A court cannot decide its own motion without first giving the parties notice and an opportunity to be heard because that would violate a litigant's due process rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution since notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 16 FSM R. 116, 128-29 (App. 2008).

Service of a notice of trial by placing the notice in a counsel's box in the clerk's office is deficient service and tantamount to non-service when it results in a party's failure to be informed of the noticed trial date. When a court's notice of trial on the merits is not served on a party, that party's rights to due process of law under the Chuuk and FSM constitutions are violated, and the trial court's failure to serve notice of a trial date and time is plain error. Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A judgment or final order entered against a person without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A trial court's failure to notify the appellants of trial was plain error and the judgment that was entered is therefore void. Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Although appellants could have addressed the issue of deficient notice of trial with an appropriate filing in the trial court, they were not required to before filing an appeal since a trial court may not shirk its responsibility to provide notice in compliance with due process merely because a party has a measure of recourse when notice is deficient. Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Where a plain error is involved that is obvious and substantial and that seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of judicial proceedings, a party will not be deemed to have waived the right to challenge the issue on appeal. In such cases, where the court's integrity is brought into question because the court did not follow its own procedures for providing notice of trial, the only remedy is to permit a new trial where adequate notice is given. Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 157-58 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Although Kosrae statutes do not specifically state that a pre-dismissal hearing is required, constitutional due process in the FSM does require that a governmental, non-probationary employee be given some opportunity to respond to the charges against him before his dismissal may be implemented, which includes: oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Although Kosrae statutes do not specifically state that a pre-dismissal hearing is required, once it is determined that the statute establishes a property right subject to protection under the due process clause, constitutional principles determine what process is due as a minimum. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The constitution is consistent with the Kosrae State Code and the Public Service System statutes which will not be set aside as contrary to due process since, in the absence of statutory language to the contrary, the statutory mandate may be interpreted as assuming compliance with the constitutional requirements. Thus, when the Kosrae State Code states that written notice setting forth the specific reasons for the dismissal or demotion and the employee's rights of appeal must be transmitted to the employee but is silent as to whether a dismissal may be implemented before some kind of hearing is provided, this is not read as an attempt to authorize immediate dismissal for all purposes without giving the employee a right to respond but instead as an indication of solicitude, demonstrating the intention to assure that employees' rights be observed. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306-07 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When, at the time of her termination, the plaintiff was a permanent state employee and since a "regular employee" or "permanent employee" means an employee who has been appointed to a position in the public service and who has successfully completed a probation period, the plaintiff's claim to employment was supported by more than her mere personal hope of employment and the state had a legal obligation to employ the plaintiff. Thus, the plaintiff had a property right which was protected by the due process clause. Procedural due process requires notice and an opportunity to be heard, so as to protect the employee's rights and insure that discipline is not enforced in an arbitrary manner. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 307 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A state employee with a property right is entitled to a pre-termination hearing that includes notice and an opportunity to be heard. The employee is entitled to oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 307 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

An essential principle of due process is that a deprivation of life, liberty, or property be preceded by notice and an opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case. This requires some type of hearing prior to the discharge of an employee who has a constitutionally-protected interest in his or her employment. The pre-termination hearing, though necessary, need not be elaborate. The formality and procedural requisites for the hearing can vary, depending upon the importance of the interest involved and the nature of the subsequent proceedings that are available. In general, something less than a full evidentiary hearing is sufficient prior to adverse administrative action. The pre-termination hearing does not definitively resolve the propriety of discharge, but is an initial check against mistaken decisions. The essential requirements are notice and an opportunity to respond. The state employee is entitled to oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story and to require more than this prior to termination would intrude to an unwarranted extent on the government's interest in quickly removing an unsatisfactory employee. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 309 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Since a state employee's pre-termination hearing need not be elaborate and since a notice of a hearing can be oral and is highly informal, given that the employee is given the opportunity for a post-deprivation hearing, where the employee was given notice on August 7, 2007 when she received a notice-of-dismissal letter and the dismissal did not become effective until August 30, 2007 and thus she was not deprived of benefits until then, an August 7, 2007 meeting constituted a pre-termination hearing as did a later August 15, 2007 meeting because, at both meetings, she was given an opportunity to respond to the charges against her and she had not yet been deprived of benefits and because the meetings served as an initial check of the charges since she was given an opportunity to explain her side of the story and the Director discussed the evidence for dismissal as stated in the termination letter and was open to questions regarding the reasons for dismissal. Also, when, at the August 15, 2007 meeting, her representative took the opportunity to be heard on her behalf, asked questions to the Director; tried to negotiate a settlement; and presented her side of the story, the requirements of notice and an opportunity to respond were met. Because she had notice and an opportunity to be heard prior to dismissal, her due process rights were not violated as a pre-termination hearing was held. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 311 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

There was no reversible error when the parties certainly had adequate notice of a "subdivision" before the October 18, 2005 Land Court hearing since they knew of it before the 2003 appeal and the 2005 remand and hearing; when one side's assertion that they were not "given the chance to stake out their claims" before the land was subdivided would be a cause of concern if they had claimed less than the entire land, but they claimed the whole unsurveyed land, as did the other side; and since, if the Land Commission erred, it was harmless error because neither side can show that they were prejudiced by this "subdivision" and both sides had the opportunity to assert and to prove their respective claims to both parcels and because the "subdivision" did not prevent or hinder either side from claiming, and trying to prove, that they had title to both parcels. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 376 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Even if the Land Commission thinks it is only correcting its own error, due process still requires that it give notice and an opportunity to be heard to any party which the "correction" might appear to adversely affect. Although the Land Commission may think it is only correcting its own error, it is always possible that its "correction" could be an error. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When a plaintiff has alleged violation of her due process rights, but it is proven otherwise, the plaintiff cannot recover under the civil rights statute. When, at trial, the plaintiff did not present evidence that she was treated differently than any other person in the same class and did not present evidence that she was denied notice and an opportunity to be heard, the state is not liable to her on the claims of denial of equal protection of the laws, violation of due process, and violation of her civil rights. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 577 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff's lease had not been voided after notice and an opportunity to be heard before its leased lot was advertised for immediate commercial lease, the Board violated the plaintiff's civil rights because it denied the plaintiff the due process of law when it did not give the plaintiff prior notice and an opportunity to be heard on the validity of its lease. This is because notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process of law. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 110 (Pon. 2010).

Defendants did not violate the plaintiff's civil rights when neither defendant was a government agency or was claiming to act under color of law or injured, oppressed, threatened, or intimidated the plaintiff's exercise or enjoyment of its civil rights and when neither was responsible for giving the plaintiff notice and an opportunity to be heard; neither prevented the plaintiff from being given notice; and neither injured, oppressed, threatened, or intimidated the plaintiff to prevent it from having an opportunity to be heard. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 110 (Pon. 2010).

Determination of a land's exact boundaries, certification of a survey map for the area, and the issuance of a certificate of title for the land, are all acts that a court is legally unable to do when the court would need before it all the current owners of the part of the land not claimed by the plaintiff, all owners of all property abutting the land's purported boundaries, and any other landowners in the vicinity whose property or property lines would have to appear on a certified survey map for the land and when none of these necessary parties, with the exception of the defendant are before the court and because the court cannot make rulings that would affect or determine their rights without their presence or participation. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 233 (Chk. 2010).

A court does not need the presence of all owners of all property abutting the land's purported boundaries, and any other landowners in the vicinity whose property or property lines would have to appear on a certified survey map to decide the limited issue raised by a plaintiff's cause of action for trespass, that is, to decide whether the defendant is trespassing or occupying land to which the plaintiff church has a better right to possess or occupy. The court does not need to (and without the other necessary parties cannot) determine where all of the other boundaries lie because the only issue properly before the court, and the only issue the court may rule upon without violating the due process rights of non-parties, is whether it is more likely than not that the land the plaintiff leased was owned by the lessor and because the determination of boundaries of any other parts of the land which the plaintiff does not claim a leasehold or of the boundaries of any other parcels of land in the area is not before the court. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 233-34 (Chk. 2010).

Procedural due process, or fairness, requires notice and an opportunity to be heard. Fundamentally, the government may not strip its citizens of property in an unfair or arbitrary manner; the Constitution requires the government to follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision-making process. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 240 (App. 2010).

The essential features of procedural due process require notice and opportunity to be heard. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 241 (App. 2010).

When a terminated state employee, since she was given an immediate opportunity to respond and another opportunity to respond one week later, had two opportunities to be heard after being informed of the reasons for her dismissal, and when after these two opportunities, she had two full post-termination evidentiary hearings that analyzed the Hospital's decision to terminate her employment, her procedural due process rights were not violated. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2010).

Before a land registration team commences hearing with respect to any claim, the Land Commission must provide notice at least thirty (30) days in advance. Specific notice must be served upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to be interested. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 473 (App. 2011).

In failing to make a reasonable inquiry as to the Setiks' occupation of the land, in failing to provide notice to the Setiks of the determination of ownership hearing, and in issuing the determination of ownership to another without an application by her, the Land Commission deprived the Setiks of due process. The determination of ownership was thus not valid, and the matter must be remanded to the Land Commission for a new determination. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 474 (App. 2011).

A court hears before it condemns, and that while a court that has announced a decision without notice and an opportunity to be heard can always be asked to recall its decision and listen to argument this opportunity, as every lawyer knows, is a poor substitute for the right to be heard before the decision is announced. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 621, 629 (App. 2011).

When the court is considering revision of a partial summary judgment, it must provide the parties with notice adequate to give them an opportunity to present evidence relating to any revived issues at trial. FSM v. Shun Tien 606, 18 FSM R. 79, 82 (Pon. 2011).

The National Public Service System Act and the Public Service System Regulations establish continued employment for non-probationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds and specifying the necessary procedures for their dismissal. This is sufficient protection of the right to continued national government employment to establish a non-probationary employee's property interest which may not be taken without due process, including notice and an opportunity to be heard. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 244 (Pon. 2012).

When a court's notice of trial on the merits is not served on a party, that party's rights to due process of law under the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions are violated, and the failure to serve notice of a trial date and time is plain error. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 247, 250 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2012).

Notice and an opportunity to be heard is the essence of due process as guaranteed by both the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 247, 250 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2012).

Since any application to the court for an order is a motion, when a shipowner filed an application for the limitation of its liability in a pending case, it is a motion, which, unless lengthened or shortened by court order or rule, a party has ten days to respond to. Thus, when the other parties were not allowed the ten days to respond to shipowner's limitation motion because the court granted the motion and issued the orders after only five or six days, they were not given the procedural due process afforded them by the civil procedure rules and for that reason alone, the orders should be considered voidable and vacated. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 307, 313 (Yap 2012).

A party's written Rule 11 motion constituted notice that it was seeking sanctions in the form of attorney's fees and the adverse parties' written opposition was their opportunity to be heard and they were heard on the papers. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 376 (App. 2012).

When a sanction is the result of the court's own motion, it must be vacated if the trial court did not give notice that it was making a motion because a trial judge abuses his discretion when, without prior notice and an opportunity to be heard, the court sua sponte imposes a Rule 11 sanction on an attorney. The manner in which Rule 11 sanctions are imposed must comport with due process requirements, and, at a minimum, notice and an opportunity to be heard are required. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 376 (App. 2012).

Since a defendant must receive notice of all claims for relief on which the court might find him liable and enter judgment against him, a default judgment that was rendered against a defendant who never appeared and that included damages for claims not raised in the complaint served on him or sums not prayed for by the plaintiff would violate due process. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 412, 416 (Yap 2012).

It is a due process violation and constitutional error for a court to base its decision, in whole or in part, on evidence of which a party has not had both notice and the opportunity to be heard, but when the defendants were served with all documents since the beginning of the matter and had the opportunity to respond but failed to do so, their claim for a violation of due process has no merit. Helgenberger v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 498, 501 (App. 2013).

A plaintiff, who challenges another's right to an interest in land and seeks to exercise an interest in land that excludes that other's supposed rights to the land, ought to, as a matter of due process, name that other as a party defendant. Otherwise that other party will be deprived of its interest without notice and an opportunity to be heard. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 573, 575 (Pon. 2013).

Notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process of law. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

Due process would seem to require a prompt post-seizure hearing before the administrative agency that has administratively levied execution of unpaid taxes. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

A statute that permits a taxpayer to file an action in court to recover any challenged taxes is likely an inadequate substitute for a prompt post-seizure hearing before the tax authorities that might resolve the matter without the need for court proceedings and from which a still aggrieved taxpayer may then resort to a court suit. It may be that such an administrative hearing is available through the statute governing administrative hearings although that is not entirely clear. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

The imposition of disciplinary sanctions is subject to due-process scrutiny. Adequate notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 305, 309 (App. 2014).

When the notice of the hearing did not mention that the subject of the hearing was the plaintiffs' request for a temporary restraining order and a preliminary injunction, the defendant's opportunity to be heard at the hearing was rather meaningless, especially when shortly into the hearing the trial judge stated that he had enough in the file to issue a temporary restraining order preventing the defendant from entering the land. Since the defendant had inadequate notice of the hearing and its subject matter, he did not have an adequate opportunity to be heard before the decision to grant a temporary restraining order was announced during the hearing or before the preliminary injunction entered the next day. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 326 (App. 2014).

The National Public Service System Act and the Public Service System Regulations establish continued employment for non-probationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds, and specifying the necessary procedures for their dismissal. This is sufficient protection of the right to continued employment to establish a property interest for non-probationary employees which may not be taken without due process, including notice and an opportunity to be heard. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 390 (Pon. 2014).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division certainly has jurisdiction to consider an attack on a Land Commission determination of ownership as void due to the lack of notice of the formal hearings and lack of notice of the issuance of the determination of ownership because the Chuuk State Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review administrative agency decisions as provided by law, its trial division can exercise appellate review of Land Commission decisions. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 537 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

When at a minimum, the Education Director should have been given notice of the allegations and evidence on which the Board based its resolution to terminate her, and she should have been given an opportunity to respond or to explain her actions or omissions and to rebut any false allegations but was not, her likelihood of success on her due process claim seems almost certain because this is the essence of due process – notice and an opportunity to be heard. Macayon v. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ., 19 FSM R. 644, 649 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

A customer of a government-owned utility does have a due process right to proper notice before the utility is disconnected. Wainit v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 20 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. 2015).

Notice and an opportunity to be heard constitute the core requirements of due process and fundamental fairness. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 187 (App. 2015).

It is a due process violation and constitutional error for a court to base its decision, in whole or in part, on evidence to which a party has not been provided both notice and an opportunity to be heard. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 187 (App. 2015).

A land claimant was dutifully allowed to be heard on his claim, when he actively participated in the proceedings, when during the Land Court hearing, he proceeded to "open the door," in terms of an attempt to transform the complexion of the relief sought from a boundary dispute into a claim encompassing an entire parcel; when it was undisputed between the parties, that he owned land situated on a plat, which lies adjacent to the parcel; and when the Land Court received testimony regarding that adjacent plat in order to determine the exact location of the respective properties. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 187 (App. 2015).

When the right of way determination was part of the 1997 remand and therefore cannot be characterized as a surprise to the appellant; when he was provided ample opportunity to be heard and present evidence, with respect to where the boundary between land he owned and that of the appellee was located; when he took the opportunity to claim a boundary that would award him the entire parcel; and when there was zealous participation on his part during the relevant proceedings, he received both notice and an opportunity to be heard. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 187 (App. 2015).

A party's assertion, sounding in a deprivation of an individual's unassailable right to be afforded both notice and an opportunity to be heard, is refuted by the fact that he actively participated in the subject proceedings. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 187 (App. 2015).

An allegation of a procedural due process violation, that takes issue with a purported lack of notice, strains credulity when it is belied by previously-filed, repeatedly unsuccessful motions to stave off the transfer of ownership that show that, not only were the claimants provided adequate notice, but they were also afforded ample opportunity to be heard and took full advantage of such participation. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 38-39 (Pon. 2016).

When raising res judicata sua sponte, due process requires that the court give the opposing party notice and an opportunity to respond. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 68 (App. 2016).

When service of the Land Court decision was made on someone who did not reside with the appellant, that service was insufficient, and the fact that the appellant became aware of the Land Court's decision later is not equivalent to being properly served to safeguard her due process rights. If a party was not served notice and was then denied the right to appeal, his or her due process rights are violated. Esau v. Penrose, 21 FSM R. 75, 80-81 (App. 2016).

It is well established, that when a judgment has been entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard, it is void and subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 121 (App. 2017).

A customer of a government-owned utility does have a due process right to proper notice before the utility is disconnected, and must therefore also have other due process rights. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 21 FSM R. 408, 409 (Pon. 2017).

Due process requires that a non-probationary government employee be given some opportunity to respond to the charges against him before his dismissal may be implemented; including oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 444 (Pon. 2018).

Even though the lessee's inertia could lead the Board to reasonably conclude that the leased lot would remain undeveloped, this dormancy did not relieve the Board from providing notice and an opportunity to be heard with regard to the improperly executed lease to a different lessee. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 534 (App. 2018).

When the owner of registered land sells or gifts registered land, all that is needed for a valid transfer is the delivery to the Land Court of a properly notarized deed (with each needed signature properly notarized) combined with the surrender of the grantor's old duplicate certificate of title. Proper and strict compliance with these requirements is the due process that is sufficient (and required) for the issuance of a new certificate of title to the grantee. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 582 (App. 2018).

Notice and opportunity to be heard are the core requirements of due process and fundamental fairness, and, although specific requirements of due process may vary depending on the nature of decisions to be made and the circumstances, the right to be heard is at the core. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2020).

The right to appeal a decision under the Education Code is set forth in 40 F.S.M.C. 114, which provides for administrative appeals under 17 F.S.M.C. 108-113. The statutes do not require that applicants for administrative relief be given notice of their right to appeal an adverse decision, but personal notice is required of all hearings after a petition for administrative review is filed. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2020).

A letter seeking clarification about the criteria used to assess a college's faculty and curriculum, the constituents and qualifications of the evaluation taskforce, and the legality of certain agreements, and that offered to discuss the report and findings, does not constitute a petition for a review hearing, which would trigger the requirement of personal notice of hearings. Nor does a telephone call asking "Why are you doing this?" constitute such a petition. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 634 (Pon. 2020).

– Due Process – Substantive

Because there is a rational basis, linked to legitimate government purposes of increasing the availability of health care services, for providing immunity from patient suits to U.S. Public Health Service physicians, the Federal Programs and Services Agreement's immunity provisions are not in violation of a plaintiff's due process rights. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 106 (Pon. 1991).

Among the rational bases supporting the constitutionality of a state statute capping wrongful death recovery are a desire to create foreseeable limits on government liability; to promote insurance; to encourage settlement of claims; and to ease the burden on courts and families of valuing losses incurred through the death of a family member. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 363 (Kos. 1992).

A Governor's proclamation that continues municipal officials in office indefinitely, violates the people's rights to substantive due process, in that they have no say in their municipal government since all of its officials are now appointed by and now hold office due to the Governor; and to equal protection of the laws, in that the municipal citizens are treated differently based on their ancestry (they and their ancestors are from Romalum) from citizens of other Chuuk municipalities in not being allowed an elected municipal government. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 295 (Chk. 2004).

While procedural due process requires governmental decision-making to conform with the concept of what is fair and just, substantive due process, on the other hand, addresses the legislature's rationality. Substantive due process protects individual liberty interests against certain governmental actions regardless of the fairness of the procedure used to implement them. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 248 n.6 (App. 2006).

With substantive due process, the court looks at the rationale or legitimacy of the governmental interest. In subjecting a statute or court rule to the requirement of substantive due process, the court asks: 1) Does the government have power to regulate the subject matter? If the statute or rule is not within the power of the government, such statute or rule will be struck down. 2) If the government has the power to regulate, the court next asks if what the statute or rule proposes to do bears a rational relationship to the implementation of the legislative goal. 3) Finally, where the statute or rule involved arguably infringes upon individuals' fundamental rights, the court must ask how important is the legislative objective. The court must ask if there is a compelling governmental interest to justify holding the statute or rule valid, even though the statute might limit fundamental rights. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 248 n.6 (App. 2006).

When the plaintiff's reasoning neglects to cite what constituted an alleged illegal termination since the only factual averments which depict allegedly untoward conduct on the defendants' part, albeit nebulous, only apply to one defendant, the requisite nexus to support a substantive due process violation is wanting. Solomon v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 396, 402 (Pon. 2016).

Substantive due process protects individual liberty interests against certain governmental actions regardless of the fairness of the procedure used to implement them. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 444 (Pon. 2018).

While procedural due process requires governmental decision-making to conform with the concept of what is fair and just, substantive due process, on the other hand, addresses the rationality of the legislature. With substantive due process, the court basically looks at the rationale or legitimacy of the governmental interest. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 444 (Pon. 2018).

– Due Process – Vagueness

A statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law. FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 304 (Truk 1983).

A criminal statute must not be so vague and indefinite as to fail to give fair notice of what acts will be punished but the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation does not require absolute precision or perfection of criminal statutory language. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 1984).

The right to be informed of the nature of the accusation requires that a statute be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that persons of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 1984).

The required degree of precision under the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation may be affected by considerations such as limits upon the capacity for human expression and difficulties inherent in attempts to employ alternative methods of stating the concept. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 508 (App. 1984).

Some generality may be inescapable in proscribing conduct but the standard of precision required under the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation is greater in criminal statutes than in civil statutes. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 508 (App. 1984).

Courts are far more inclined to set aside as unconstitutionally vague statutes or ordinances reaching into marginal areas of human conduct such as prohibitions against loitering or vagrancy aimed at conduct often thought of as offensive or undesirable, but not directly dangerous to others. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 509 (App. 1984).

Prohibitions against assaults with dangerous weapons fall within the more traditional realm of criminal law and therefore are entitled to greater deference by courts in determining whether they are unconstitutionally vague. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 509 (App. 1984).

Commonly accepted meanings arising out of prior court interpretations in the jurisdictions from which statutes are borrowed may be considered in testing a claim that the statute is unconstitutionally vague. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 509-10 (App. 1984).

There is no suggestion in the Constitutional Convention Journal that the framers of the FSM Constitution wanted to depart from or expand upon United States constitutional principles concerning particularity and definitions in criminal statutes. Reliance in the Report of the Committee on Civil Liberties upon United States court decisions in explaining the words confirms that the intent was to adopt the American approach concerning the statutory specificity needed so as not to be unconstitutionally vague. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 513 (App. 1984).

In considering whether the term "dangerous weapon" is so vague as to render 11 F.S.M.C. 919 unconstitutional, it is relevant that a court in the United States has held that term sufficiently definite to meet United States constitutional standards. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 513 (App. 1984).

"Dangerous device" as defined under the Weapons Control Act is not unconstitutionally vague. The language, properly interpreted, affords sufficient notice so that conscientious citizens may avoid inadvertent violations, and constructs sufficiently definite standards to prevent arbitrary law enforcement. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 45 (App. 1985).

When an information alleges violation of a statute, that statute must be drawn so as to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that the contemplated conduct was forbidden. Laws must provide explicit standards for those who apply them. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

When a vague statute abuts upon sensitive areas of basic freedoms, it operates to inhibit the exercise of those freedoms. Uncertain meanings inevitably lead citizens to steer far wider of the unlawful zone than if the boundaries of the forbidden areas were clearly marked. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

Congress did not exceed its constitutional authority when it defined a national crime as one committed "against a national public servant in the course of, in connection with, or as a result of that person's employment or service;" nor was this definition so vague that it does not give reasonable notice of what conduct is prohibited, or encourages arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 73 (Pon. 2002).

Due process generally requires that the government provide an individual with notice and an opportunity to be heard before taking away that person's liberty. A person has a liberty interest in not being criminally prosecuted without notice of what conduct is prohibited. A statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law, as it fails to give people notice of what conduct is prohibited. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 75 (Pon. 2002).

The right to be informed of the nature of the accusation requires that a statute be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that persons of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. Some generality may be inescapable in proscribing conduct, but the standard of precision required under the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation is greater in criminal statutes than in civil statutes. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 75 (Pon. 2002).

Certain types of criminal prohibitions are subject to greater scrutiny on grounds of vagueness. Courts are far more inclined to set aside as unconstitutionally vague statutes or ordinances reaching into marginal areas of human conduct such as prohibitions against loitering or vagrancy aimed at conduct often thought of as offensive or undesirable, but not directly dangerous to others, but prohibitions against assaults with dangerous weapons, for example, fall within the more traditional realm of criminal law and are therefore entitled to greater deference by courts in determining whether they are unconstitutionally vague. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 75 (Pon. 2002).

There are two aspects to consider in determining whether a criminal statute is unconstitutionally vague. First, the statute must ensure fair notice to the citizenry, and second it must provide standards for enforcement by the police, judges and juries. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 75 (Pon. 2002).

Because it is assumed that people are free to steer between lawful and unlawful conduct, it is necessary that laws give the people of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited, so that they may act accordingly. Vague laws may trap the innocent by not providing fair warning. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 75-76 (Pon. 2002).

If arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement is to be prevented, laws must provide explicit standards for those who apply them. A vague law impermissibly delegates basic policy matters to policemen, judges and juries for resolution on an ad hoc and subjective basis, with the attendant dangers of arbitrary and discriminatory application. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 76 (Pon. 2002).

A statute that provides clear notice and fair warning that an assault on a national public servant while she is working in her national government office is conduct prohibited by national law. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 76 (Pon. 2002).

Laws cannot define the boundaries of impermissible conduct with mathematical certainty. Whenever the law draws a line there will be cases very near to each other on the opposite side. The precise course of the line may be uncertain, but no one can come near it without knowing that he does so. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 76 (Pon. 2002).

When the purpose, intent and meaning of the Act can be ascertained by reading the disjunctive provisions of the statute together, and it is clear that Congress intended that conduct like that charged in this case be prohibited under national law the law is not unconstitutionally vague. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 76 (Pon. 2002).

The definition of the offense of "defamation" does not provide detailed warning of what type of speech is regulated whereas in other criminal offenses where speech is regulated, the specified words constituting the offense are listed. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 391 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of defamation does not provide adequate notice of what speech is regulated. A statute, properly interpreted, must give sufficient notice so that conscientious citizens may avoid inadvertent violations. The statute must also provide sufficiently definite standards to prevent arbitrary law enforcement. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 391 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When an information alleges violation of a statute, that statute must be drawn so as to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that the contemplated conduct is forbidden. Laws must provide explicit standards for those who apply them. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 391-92 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Kosrae criminal offense of "defamation" does not contain specific language defining the conduct or speech which forms the offense. There are no specific words or conduct listed in the offense which forms the basis for the defamatory conduct. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the Kosrae criminal defamation statute does not protect tradition, it may not impair a defendant's fundamental right of freedom of expression. The defamation statute impairs the fundamental right of freedom of expression because it fails to provide a specific standard of criminal conduct, thereby persons would not have adequate notice of what type of speech was regulated under it. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The standard for consideration whether a statute is unconstitutionally vague is that a criminal statute must give fair notice of what acts are criminal conduct and subject to punishment; and the statute must be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that person of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. However, it is accepted that some generality may be necessary in describing the prohibited conduct. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 289 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The criminal offense of driving under the influence, as defined in Kosrae State Code, Section 13.710, is not unconstitutionally vague. The term "under the influence" does give people of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to know and understand what conduct is prohibited and how to avoid violation. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 291 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A criminal statute must not be so vague and indefinite as to fail to give fair notice of what acts will be punished but the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation does not require absolute precision or perfection of criminal statutory language. When the statute complained of, while not mathematically precise, gives fair notice of the acts that will be punished, payment for expenses other than expenses incurred in the course of official public relations, entertainment activities or constituent services necessary to advance the national government's purposes and goals, the prosecution will not be dismissed on the ground that the statute was unconstitutionally vague. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 130 (Chk. 2006).

Kosrae State Code § 13.313 is unconstitutionally vague because it fails to provide a specific standard of criminal conduct and therefore does not give adequate notice of what type of speech is being regulated since a statute must be drawn so as to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that the contemplated conduct is forbidden and Kosrae State Code § 13.313 does not. Kosrae v. Taulung, 14 FSM R. 578, 580-81 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Since statutory vagueness is a due process concept and since the wording of the Due Process Clauses of the Kosrae Constitution and of the FSM Constitution is identical, these two constitutional provisions may be treated as identical in meaning and in scope. The appellate court will proceed as if the statute is challenged under both. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 119 (App. 2007).

Whether a challenged statute is unconstitutionally vague is a two-part analysis. The statute must provide fair notice to members of the public, and it must also furnish police and judges with adequate enforcement standards. Fair notice means that the law gives an individual of ordinary intelligence a reasonable opportunity to understand the proscribed activity, and to conform his conduct to the law's requirements. A law permits arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement if it does not provide explicit enforcement standards, and a vague law's defect is that it allows law officers and judges to subjectively determine basic policy questions on a case-by-case basis. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 119 (App. 2007).

Cases upholding the constitutionality of statutes criminalizing driving "under the influence" reflect the fact that alcohol, its consumption, and effects have long been a part of human experience. DUI statutes enacted with the arrival of the motor vehicle take that experience into account. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 120 (App. 2007).

The Kosrae DUI statute does not violate the vagueness doctrine because it employs the phrase "under the influence." It provides both law enforcement officers and judges with the necessary enforcement standards. "Driving under the influence" is commonly understood to mean driving in a state of intoxication that lessens a person's normal ability for clarity and control. A police officer will know that he may take enforcement action where he observes an individual exhibiting this commonly understood behavior. That a police officer must exercise his judgment in evaluating this behavior does not render the statute vague. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 120 (App. 2007).

"Driving under the influence" provides a judge with a sufficient enforcement standard. Based upon the evidence that a judge hears and is entitled to consider, he may determine whether a defendant was "under the influence" such that he was driving in a state of intoxication that lessened his normal ability for clarity and control. The statute thus passes constitutional muster. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 120-21 (App. 2007).

When the accused either was or was not driving "under the influence," and it was the arresting officer's job to exercise his judgment to determine whether there was probable cause to believe the accused's ability for clarity and control had been lessened by his consumption of alcohol, or in other words, whether the accused was driving "under the influence," and when Kosrae's statute did not require the accused to offer an explanation for his conduct and any such exculpatory explanation would have been immaterial to his objective state of sobriety or lack thereof, the Kosrae DUI statute is not void for vagueness and does not violate the Due Process Clause of either the Kosrae Constitution or the FSM Constitution. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 121 (App. 2007).

A defendant's right to be informed of the nature of the accusations against him requires that a statute be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that persons of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 281 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A criminal statute must not be so vague and indefinite as to fail to give fair notice of what acts will be punished but the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation does not require absolute precision or perfection of criminal statutory language, but the statute must be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that persons of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. Although some generality may be inescapable in proscribing conduct, the standard of precision required under the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation is greater in criminal statutes than in civil statutes. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 182 (Chk. 2008).

When an information alleges violation of a statute, that statute must be drawn so as to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that the contemplated conduct was forbidden. Laws must also provide explicit standards for those who apply them. When the statute complained of, even though not mathematically precise, gives fair notice of the acts that will be punished, the prosecution will not be dismissed on the ground that the statute was unconstitutionally vague. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 182 (Chk. 2008).

There are two aspects to consider in determining whether a criminal statute is unconstitutionally vague – first, the statute must ensure fair notice to the citizenry, and second it must provide standards for enforcement by the police and judges. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 182 (Chk. 2008).

A criminal statute's use of the term "under the influence of alcohol" does not render that statute void for vagueness and does not violate the FSM Constitution's Due Process Clause. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 182-83 (Chk. 2008).

When criminal liability is explicitly imposed for the use of a firearm "in connection with or in aid of the commission of any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," the use of the term "laws of the Federated States of Micronesia" does not make the statute unconstitutionally vague. This term refers to any or all criminal laws in the Federated States of Micronesia, national, state, or local because if it were otherwise, it would not be possible for the statute to have its obviously intended purpose and effect – to discourage the use of, and to punish the use of, firearms during the commission of other crimes. The plural form of the word "laws" further compels this conclusion. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 183 (Chk. 2008).

When the defendants asked the plaintiffs' counsel to withdraw the offending motion or it would seek Rule 11 sanctions and their later Rule 11 motion was precise about what it sought sanctions for, the plaintiffs had the appropriate notice. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 377 (App. 2012).

As for the plaintiffs avoiding future sanctions, the order cannot be too vague since they are barred from filing any papers in Civil Action No. 1990-075 without first obtaining leave of court and have been since December 1995. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 18 FSM R. 366, 377 (App. 2012).

When a statute's language is plain and unambiguous, it declares its own meaning and there is no room for construction. However, a statute that either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law. A statute that is so vague and ill-defined that the acts prohibited cannot be understood by people of ordinary intelligence, cannot serve as a basis for criminal prosecution. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The standard for statutes to comply with a defendant's "right to be informed" is that a criminal statute must be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that persons of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. The constitutional clauses speak of rights to be informed of the nature of the charges and to receive due process. This is not language calculated to require absolute precision or even the best possible statement of the charge or violation. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 653 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The "definite, unambiguous, and certain" analysis is usually applied to statutory language which prohibits conduct as opposed to sentencing language. Courts are more deferential as to determining what constitutes a definite statement when sentencing guidelines are concerned. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 654-55 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The court is subject to certain limits in sentencing when the state law sets a precise minimum of no less than five years imprisonment while the maximum sentence, as set by the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions, is life in prison because the Constitutions ban capital punishment. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 655 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A statute that sets only a minimum sentence does not allow the court unbridled discretion to implement cruel and unusual punishments because the court is constrained by the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions; because the court has a traditional role of adjudication based on equity that involves the considering mitigating and aggravating factors before imposing sentence; and because all statutes are presumptively constitutional. Thus, this statute is not so unconstitutionally vague or ambiguous as to violate a defendant's due process rights to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 655-56 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When determining a statute's vagueness or ambiguity, the court must look to a statute that prescribes an offense that either forbids or requires the doing of an act. Thus, a sentencing requirement that states, "imprisonment for not less than five years, or a fine of not less than $5,000.00, or both" is not subject to a due process analysis for violating the defendant's right to know the nature and cause of the accusation against him because the statute's sentencing provision is not the part of the statute that forbids or requires the doing of an act. In order to attack a statute's vagueness, the court is restricted to looking at the statute that prescribes an offense or that forbids or requires the doing of an act. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 656 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

There is no requirement that a statutory sentencing provision's language contain absolute precision or perfection. Informing a defendant that the sentence constitutes a minimum of five years imprisonment is sufficient notice because the sentencing statute provides a clear and explicit notice of a monetary and sentencing minimum for the defendant and leaves the court the equitable power to set a cap upon the sentencing as justice demands and as restricted by the Chuuk and FSM Constitutions. Thus, the statute provides notice to the defendant that he may be sentenced to between five years and life. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 657 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Equal Protection

Under the equal protection clause of the Declaration of Rights in the FSM Constitution, indigency alone should not disadvantage an accused in our system of criminal justice. Gilmete v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 165, 169 (App. 1989).

A patient's equal protection rights were not violated when there was no showing that the patient was treated differently from any other patient on the basis of her sex, ancestry, national origin, or social status. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 106 (Pon. 1991).

Families of wrongful death victims do not constitute a suspect class for purposes of equal protection analysis. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 362 (Kos. 1992).

Among the rational bases supporting the constitutionality of a state statute capping wrongful death recovery are a desire to create foreseeable limits on government liability; to promote insurance; to encourage settlement of claims; and to ease the burden on courts and families of valuing losses incurred through the death of a family member. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 363 (Kos. 1992).

Aliens are persons protected by the due process and equal protection clauses of the Constitution. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 366 (Pon. 1992).

Congress and the President respectively have the power to regulate immigration and conduct foreign affairs while the Chief Justice may make rules governing the admission of attorneys. Therefore a rule of admission that treats aliens unequally, promulgated by the Chief Justice, implicates powers expressly delegated to other branches. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 366 (Pon. 1992).

Without a rational valid basis for the rule limiting the number of times an alien may take the bar exam it will be held unconstitutional even if it would be constitutional if the regulation were made by Congress or the President. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 367 (Pon. 1992).

The constitutional guarantees of equal protection apply if the discrimination is based on the individual's membership in one of the classes enumerated in article IV, section 4, or if the discrimination affects a "fundamental right." The law is then subject to a strict scrutiny review, under which it will be upheld only if the government can demonstrate that the classification upon which that law is based bears a close rational relationship to some compelling governmental interest. But if the law does not concern an enumerated class or a fundamental right, the question becomes whether the classification is rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 146 (Pon. 1995).

The equal protection analysis and standards that apply to a discriminatory law also apply to a neutral and non-discriminatory law when it is being applied in a discriminatory fashion. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 146 (Pon. 1995).

Because the equal protection clause is designed to guarantee that similarly situated individuals are not treated differently due to some sort of invidious discrimination a victim of a stray police bullet who cannot show any evidence of discrimination has no equal protection claim. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 547 (Chk. 1996).

The constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection extend to aliens. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 295 n.8 (Pon. 1998).

Article IV, section 4 is designed to guarantee that similarly situated individuals are not treated differently due to some sort of invidious discrimination, but where there is no admissible competent evidence of any such intentional discrimination, a court will grant summary judgment against an equal protection claim. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 336 (Pon. 1998).

Voters' due process and equal protection rights are not violated by regulation or restriction of voting by absentee ballots. Chipen v. Losap Election Comm'r, 9 FSM R. 46, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The FSM Constitution provides that equal protection under the laws may not be denied or impaired on account of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language or social status. This provision is designed to guarantee that similarly situated individuals are not treated differently due to some sort of invidious discrimination. Youp v. Pingelap, 9 FSM R. 215, 217 (Pon. 1999).

When the plaintiff has not alleged that he was battered based upon his sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language or social status, but has merely alleged that the police, in battering him violated his equal protection rights, The plaintiff's equal protection claim will be dismissed. Youp v. Pingelap, 9 FSM R. 215, 217 (Pon. 1999).

Unlawfully added education qualifications for mayor and assistant mayor improperly deprive candidates and those similarly situated of the equal protection of the law as guaranteed by the FSM Constitution. Chipen v. Election Comm'r of Losap, 10 FSM R. 15, 18 (Chk. 2001).

The equal protection provisions of the FSM Constitution are in large part derived from those in the U.S.

Constitution. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 7 (Chk. 2002).

The elements of an equal protection claim of discriminatory or selective enforcement are: other similarly situated persons who generally have not been prosecuted; the defendant was intentionally or purposefully singled out for prosecution; and the prosecution was based on an arbitrary or invidious classification. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 7 (Chk. 2002).

If a criminal defendant is to make out a selective prosecution equal protection claim, he must identify any persons similarly situated to him that the government could have prosecuted, but has failed to, and he must show that his prosecution is based on an invidious classification such as sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8 (Chk. 2002).

To overcome the presumption that a decision to prosecute a particular person is motivated solely by proper considerations, a criminal defendant has a heavy burden to establish prima facie the elements of an impermissible selective prosecution so as to shift the burden to the government to demonstrate that the prosecution was not premised on an invidious objective. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8 (Chk. 2002).

A criminal defendant who presents clear evidence that shows that his prosecution violates his right to equal protection (is impermissible discrimination) would be entitled to a dismissal. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8-9 (Chk. 2002).

When in an equal protection claim, the record contains a document in which the defendant agency expressly referred to the claimants' race, the defendants have not met their burden under the applicable standard of review for dismissal for failure to state a claim because the question is not whether the plaintiff has proven its claim, but whether under any set of facts it could do so. Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 91 (Pon. 2003).

Article IV, section 4 of the FSM Constitution guarantees that similarly situated individuals are not treated differently due to invidious discrimination. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 118 (Pon. 2003).

A Governor's proclamation that continues municipal officials in office indefinitely, violates the people's rights to substantive due process, in that they have no say in their municipal government since all of its officials are now appointed by and now hold office due to the Governor; and to equal protection of the laws, in that the municipal citizens are treated differently based on their ancestry (they and their ancestors are from Romalum) from citizens of other Chuuk municipalities in not being allowed an elected municipal government. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 295 (Chk. 2004).

When a plaintiff complained of a series of acts by various defendants that he felt were discriminatory, that is, that did not treat him in the manner to which he thought he was entitled, but he did not allege, nor did he put on any evidence, that he was discriminated against on the basis of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status and no evidence was adduced that any of the acts complained of caused the plaintiff any damages, the court therefore dismissed this cause of action. Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 65 (Chk. 2006).

Equal protection of the law means the protection of equal laws. The clause requires that those similarly situated must be similarly treated. Equal protection forbids only invidious discrimination. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 202 (Pon. 2006).

Both sections 3 and 4 of Article IV are designed to protect individuals from discrimination based on their membership in a class. A plaintiff's failure to allege intent to discriminate based on his membership in a particular class is fatal to his equal protection claim. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 202 (Pon. 2006).

The failure to allege class-based discrimination may be fatal only to strict scrutiny analysis, that is, a plaintiff who fails to allege class-based discrimination is not dismissed but receives only rational basis review, but when the plaintiff is not challenging any particular law, the case is not susceptible to rational basis review. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 202 n.1 (Pon. 2006).

In the FSM, claims of police brutality or excessive force generally implicate due process, rather than equal protection. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 202 (Pon. 2006).

A selective-prosecution claim is not a defense on the merits to the criminal charge itself, but an independent assertion that the prosecutor has brought the charge for reasons forbidden by the Constitution. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

The elements of an equal protection claim of discriminatory or selective enforcement are: other similarly situated persons who generally have not been prosecuted; the defendant was intentionally or purposefully singled out for prosecution; and the prosecution was based on an arbitrary or invidious classification. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

To make out a selective prosecution equal protection claim, an accused must identify any persons similarly situated to him that the government could have prosecuted, but has failed to, and he must show that his prosecution is based on an invidious classification of either sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendants do not claim that they were singled out for prosecution based upon their sex, race, ancestry, national origin, or language, but assert that they are being arbitrarily prosecuted based upon their "social status," and when they do not clearly state what their social status is that is the basis of the prosecution's alleged invidious classification and discrimination, it cannot be their status as high government officials (congressmen or former congressmen) because that is the same status as one (ex-president) who was not prosecuted and who the defendants claim was similarly situated so they cannot have been prosecuted based on the membership in that "classification." Furthermore, the choice to prosecute someone because of his or her status as a high government official is not an invidious classification because of the deterrent effect of such prosecutions and because of such prosecutions' effect to maintain the public confidence that public officials are not above the law. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 553 (Chk. 2007).

A person's position in government does not constitute "social status." The term "social status" refers to a person's rank or place in society. In traditional Micronesian societies, this could include a person's place or rank within his or her lineage, what caste he or she is a part of, whether and what traditional title the person might hold, or whether the person has chiefly [social] status. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 553 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendants cannot identify an invidious classification (which they assert is their "social status"), they cannot make out that element of a selective prosecution claim, especially when the court has doubts whether the purported examples of persons similarly situated are actually that. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 553 (Chk. 2007).

A person who, whether under the color of law or not, violates another's equal protection rights as guaranteed by sections 3 or 4 of Article 4 of the FSM Constitution would be civilly liable to the injured party. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 80 (Pon. 2007).

FSM Constitution Article IV, section 4 guarantees that similarly situated individuals not be treated differently due to some sort of invidious discrimination. When a plaintiff comes forward with no admissible, competent evidence to show invidious discrimination, summary judgment is then appropriate. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 80 (Pon. 2007).

For equal protection purposes, a comparison between the pay of part-time college teachers and full-time teachers is not valid when the equal protection claim rests on the difference in the pay scales for part-time and full-time teachers because the part-time and full-time teachers are not similarly situated and the FSM Constitution equal protection guarantee requires a showing that individuals subject to the alleged discrimination be similarly situated. Nor are part-time teachers an enumerated class in Article IV, section 4 and that classification does not concern a fundamental right. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 81-82 (Pon. 2007).

When no Article IV, section 4 class is at issue and no fundamental right is involved, the question is whether the classification bears a rational relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. 2007).

Paying full-time and part-time teachers at different rates per credit-hour bears a rational relationship to a legitimate governmental purpose because it allows the college flexibility with respect to its need to provide teachers on an ad hoc basis for over-enrolled classes and with its costs. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. 2007).

Even assuming that the Pohnpei Wage and Hour Law applies to a governmental organization employer and assuming that a claim under the statute was pled although the statute was not mentioned in the complaint, the claim is without merit when the court has determined that the positions of full-time and part-time teachers are different and the college may maintain different pay scales for them. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. 2007).

When the college's part-time and full-time teachers are not similarly situated for equal protection analysis, and when, to the extent that the part-time and full-time teachers can be viewed as engaging in similar activities, the college's practice of paying its full-time and part-time teachers according to different pay scales for each credit-hour taught is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose, the college is entitled to summary judgment on a part-time teacher's equal protection claim. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. 2007).

The Equal Protection Clause protects a person against discrimination based on account of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language or social status, but a person's position in government employment does not constitute "social status." The term "social status" refers to a person's rank or place in society, not to his position in government. In traditional Micronesian societies, social status could include a person's place or rank within his or her lineage, what caste he or she is part of, whether and what traditional title the person might hold, or whether the person has chiefly (social) status. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 314-15 (App. 2007).

A selective prosecution claim does not provide a basis for dismissal of the information because it is not a defense to the merits to the criminal charge itself, but an independent claim. Chuuk v. Robert, 15 FSM R. 419, 425 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The Constitution's Declaration of Rights has two equal protection guarantees. Section 3 provides that a person may not be denied the equal protection of the laws and section 4 provides that equal protection of the laws may not be denied or impaired on account of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 591 (App. 2008).

If the discrimination is based on the individual's membership in one of the Article IV, section 4 enumerated classes, or if the discrimination affects a "fundamental right," the law or regulation is subject to strict scrutiny review. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 591 (App. 2008).

"Heightened scrutiny" is a level of scrutiny below strict scrutiny but above the rational relationship test that U.S. courts use in sex discrimination cases since sex is not an enumerated class in the U.S. Constitution's equal protection clause. In the FSM, sex is an enumerated class and the higher strict scrutiny analysis is applied. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 591 n.2 (App. 2008).

Since Article IV, section 4 prohibits discrimination based on sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status, any governmental action that classifies according to sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status constitutes an inherently suspect criteria. As such, the government must prove a compelling governmental interest in the classification. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 591 (App. 2008).

When the appellant compares herself to two different male teachers with the same level of education, who were paid more than she because they were full-time teachers; when the only apparent reason for the pay difference is that they were full-time, not part-time, teachers; when no part-time teacher was paid more than the appellant was so that no male part-time teachers with the same level of education were paid more than she was and no FSM-citizen part-time teachers were paid more than she was; when the appellant does not claim that her status as a part-time teacher instead of being a full-time teacher was based on discrimination on the basis of sex or national origin, she has not made out a prima facie case of discrimination based on either sex or national origin and the trial court thus properly granted summary judgment in the College's favor on her sex and national origin discrimination claims. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 591-92 (App. 2008).

Equal protection of the law means the protection of equal laws. The clause requires that those similarly situated must be similarly treated. It seems also that application of the law must be equal. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592 (App. 2008).

Equal protection requires that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of anyone except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances; and that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592 (App. 2008).

Equal protection forbids only invidious discrimination. Where relevant differences exist between classes, different treatment by the state is permissible. However, any statute that classifies and affords different treatment is subject to the same tests as those under substantive due process: 1) Does the legislature have power to enact the statute that classifies? 2) Does the classification bear a rational relationship to the legislative goal? The classification is presumed to be valid and the burden of proving that the statute is without a rational relationship to the legislative objective is on the challenger of the classification. 3) Where fundamental rights are involved, the classification constitutes a suspect criteria. As such, the burden of proving that the classification bears a close rational relationship to some compelling governmental interests shifts to the government. Fundamental rights are presumed to be absolute until the government proves a compelling governmental interest to curtail or restrain them. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592 (App. 2008).

Employment is not listed as a fundamental right in the Declaration of Rights although a case has referred to "employment opportunity" as a "liberty interest." But when the interest in contention is employment pay not the opportunity for employment, being paid a lower rate than another involves a fundamental right if the reason for the lower pay is the employee's sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. Being paid at a lower rate for some other reason does not involve a fundamental right. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592 (App. 2008).

If the law does not concern an enumerated class or a fundamental right, the question becomes whether the classification is rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose. The rational relationship test examines whether there is a reasonable justification for permitting a law or regulation that discriminates against certain classes or groups. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592-93 (App. 2008).

A full-time teacher's added duties, the need to forgo other employment, and the long-term commitment (three years as opposed to one semester) to teaching at the College, makes a full-time teaching position a substantially different job from a part-time teaching position. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 593 (App. 2008).

Regardless of the applicability of a U.S. case, the appeal of the denial of the plaintiff's equal pay claim turns on whether full-time teaching positions and part-time teaching positions are similar positions and on whether there is a rational relationship between a full-time teacher's pay and a part-time teacher's pay. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 593-94 (App. 2008).

A full-time teacher's added duties, the need to forgo other employment, and long-term commitment (three years as opposed to one semester) to teaching at the College – are legitimate factors from which the court may conclude that full-time and part-time teachers are not similarly situated even though both are paid depending on their education and experience. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 594 (App. 2008).

The appellant's assertion that she has made out a prima facie case of sex discrimination would hold water only if part-time and full-time teachers were similarly situated, thus allowing her to compare herself to a full-time teacher. It did not because, contrary to her assertions, full-time and part-time teachers are not similarly situated; because she has not claimed that she was paid less than a similarly-situated (part-time) male teacher; and because she was, in fact, the highest paid part-time teacher. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 594 (App. 2008).

The pay difference between full-time and part-time teachers passes the rational relationship test because the full-time teacher's added duties, the need to forgo other employment, and the long-term commitment (three years as opposed to one semester) to teaching at the College are all rational and legitimate reasons for the College to pay full-time teachers at a higher rate than part-time teachers and because it is undisputed that the College had legitimate and rational reasons to employ part-time teachers, as and when needed, rather than hiring just full-time teachers. The payment of full-time teachers at the part-time rate for excess and summer classes does not change the analysis because those classes are beyond the duties that full-time teachers are obligated to perform. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 594 (App. 2008).

A plaintiff cannot show any discrimination for summer classes pay when, for summer classes, her pay was equal or higher than any other summer instructor including those classified as full-time teachers. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 594 (App. 2008).

For a part-time teacher to make out a prima facie case of sex discrimination she would have had to have shown that she was paid less than a male part-time teacher with the same level of education. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 595 (App. 2008).

When full-time teachers and part-time teachers are not similarly situated, a plaintiff does not have a factual basis for relief under the Pohnpei Wage and Hour Law when the claim is that she was paid less than male full-time teachers because she did not perform the same work as a full-time teacher. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 595 (App. 2008).

The College is an instrumentality of the national government in the same way that the FSM Development Bank is even though its employees are not considered government employees. The College was created by Congress and is subject to suit only in the manner provided for and to the extent that suits may be brought against the National Government. So, since the national government is not subject to suit under the Pohnpei Wage and Hour Law, neither is the College. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 596 (App. 2008).

The FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights has two equal protection guarantees. Section 3 provides that a person may not be denied the equal protection of the laws, and section 4 provides that equal protection of the laws may not be denied or impaired on account of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. This is a constitutional guarantee that similarly situated individuals not be treated differently due to some sort of invidious discrimination. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 496 (Pon. 2009).

When a plaintiff comes forward with no admissible, competent evidence to show invidious discrimination, then summary judgment is appropriate. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 496 (Pon. 2009).

In order to establish a prima facie claim of sex discrimination in the hiring process, a plaintiff must establish that 1) she is a member of a protected class; 2) she applied for and was qualified for a position for which her employer was seeking applicants; 3) despite her qualifications she was rejected; and 4) thereafter the position remained open and the employer continued to seek applicants with plaintiff's qualifications. If the plaintiff establishes the existence of these four elements, the burden shifts to defendant to articulate some legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for the employee's rejection. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 496 (Pon. 2009).

A plaintiff has failed to establish a prima facie case of sex discrimination in the hiring process when she was not rejected for the job, but was interviewed for the position and then hired. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 496 (Pon. 2009).

The plaintiff's claim of invidious discrimination and that the defendant violated the FSM Constitution because the plaintiff had to fill out an employment application to be hired and while she was working for the defendant another was rehired and not required to resubmit a new job application since his resignation paperwork had not been processed, is not supported by the law and will be dismissed with prejudice. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 497 (Pon. 2009).

An employment applicant was not discriminated against when the employer chose an applicant more qualified than she. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 497 (Pon. 2009).

When a complaint alleges that the plaintiff was denied equal protection of the laws, the suit will be deemed a private cause of action under 11 F.S.M.C. 701 for violation of civil rights guaranteed under the FSM Constitution even though the statute is not expressly cited in the complaint. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 577 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM Constitution at Article IV, Section 4, guarantees that similarly situated individuals not be treated differently due to some sort of invidious discrimination. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 577 (Pon. 2009).

When a plaintiff has alleged violation of her due process rights, but it is proven otherwise, the plaintiff cannot recover under the civil rights statute. When, at trial, the plaintiff did not present evidence that she was treated differently than any other person in the same class and did not present evidence that she was denied notice and an opportunity to be heard, the state is not liable to her on the claims of denial of equal protection of the laws, violation of due process, and violation of her civil rights. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 577 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff and her co-worker were not similarly situated because she had no prior legislative counsel experience and he did and when she was hired for and given lesser job responsibilities and assignments, she was thus not entitled to the same wages and benefits as the other. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 348 (App. 2011).

When the plaintiff was not equally qualified and had a lower level of responsibility than the other counsel, her lower pay did not violate the Legislature Manual's equal pay provisions since she had neither equal qualifications nor levels of responsibility. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 349 (App. 2011).

Equal protection of the law means the protection of equal laws and requires that those similarly situated must be similarly treated. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 349 (App. 2011).

When the trial court found as fact, which fact remains on appeal, that the plaintiff was not similarly situated to the Legislature's other attorneys because they had prior experience doing legal work for legislative bodies and she had none, she cannot prevail on an equal protection claim based on being hired as a temporary employee on short-term contracts although a permanent long-term position had been advertised. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 349 (App. 2011).

In order to establish a prima facie claim of sex discrimination in the hiring process, a plaintiff must establish that: 1) she is a member of a protected class; 2) she applied for and was qualified for a position for which her employer was seeking applicants; 3) despite her qualifications she was rejected; and 4) thereafter the position remained open and the employer continued to seek applicants with plaintiff's qualifications. If the plaintiff establishes the existence of these four elements, the burden shifts to the defendant to articulate some legitimate, nondiscriminatory reason for the employee's rejection. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 349 (App. 2011).

When the trial court found as fact that the defendant Legislature did meet its burden when it articulated legitimate, non-discriminatory reasons for the plaintiff's rejection – she was not similarly qualified since she did not have any prior experience as counsel to a legislative body and all the other male attorneys who were hired did, as well as a female attorney who was offered, but declined, employment, the plaintiff's equal protection contention is without merit. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 349 (App. 2011).

Equal protection analysis within the FSM has adopted a two-tiered test. The first tier is a rational basis test. Under this test a law will be upheld if it is rationally related to a state interest. Under the second tier, laws that involve a "suspect" class of persons or touch on a "fundamental interest" are subject to strict scrutiny and are struck down unless justified by a compelling state interest. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

Non-citizen does not equate to "national origin" in the Equal Protection Clause and allow non-citizens suspect class status. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

A statute establishing a hiring and promotion preference for legal residents of Pohnpei and FSM citizens, which bears a rational relationship to legitimate governmental purposes of encouraging and preserving job opportunities for legal residents, of the establishment and growth of the local work force, of combating unemployment in Pohnpei, and of training its citizens to work towards self-government, does not violate the FSM Constitution's equal protection clause. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

Since selective prosecution is a defense in a criminal case, when a civil defendant asserts that it was singled out for enforcement and was the only employer being sued for unpaid health insurance premiums, the court will read this as an equal protection claim. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 538-39 (Chk. 2011).

The Constitution's Declaration of Rights contains two equal protection guarantees. Section 3 provides that a person may not be denied the equal protection of the laws and section 4 provides that equal protection of the laws may not be denied or impaired on account of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 539 (Chk. 2011).

When no Article IV, section 4 class is at issue and no fundamental right is involved, the question is whether the classification is rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose. The rational relationship test examines whether there is a reasonable justification for permitting the discrimination. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 539 (Chk. 2011).

It is entirely rational that the Chuuk Health Care Plan first sue the largest non-complying employer before suing other non-compliant employers, especially when the others are trying to bring themselves into compliance. Someone must be first. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 539 (Chk. 2011).

The FSM Constitutional guarantees of equal protection apply if the discrimination is based on the individual's membership in one of the classes enumerated in the FSM Const. art. IV, § 4, or if the discrimination affects a "fundamental right." The law is then subject to a strict scrutiny review, under which it will be upheld only if the government can demonstrate that the classification upon which that law is based bears a close rational relationship to some compelling governmental interest. But if the law does not concern an enumerated class or a fundamental right, the question becomes whether the classification is rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 134 (Pon. 2011).

The rational basis standard will be applied to an analysis of a plaintiff's equal protection claims about the regulation of alcohol sales. A rational basis analysis requires statutes restricting alcohol to have a legitimate, reasonable purpose, to not be arbitrary, and the legislation carries out the purposes prescribed. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 134 (Pon. 2011).

A statute that restricts the sale of alcohol during the Christmas and New Year's holidays serves legitimate governmental purposes in the areas of the public health and welfare and the allowance of on-sale alcohol purchases during these holidays also support the operations of the hotels and cabarets who have a demand for such sales from its customers during the holidays. This legislation carries out the purposes for which the statute was amended by further regulating the sale of alcohol in a manner which promotes the State's legitimate governmental objectives. This statute regulating and restricting alcohol is within the scope of legislative authority, has a reasonable purpose, is not arbitrary, and carries out the purposes prescribed and is thus not unconstitutional. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 135-36 (Pon. 2011).

A complaint alleging that a public utility tortiously breached its duty to him and violated his due process civil rights when its linemen disconnected his electrical power without notice, causing food spoilage and personal hardship and inconvenience, and that when its linemen, without warning, eventually reconnected his electrical power, it tortiously caused a sudden power surge resulting in damaged equipment, does not state a claim for an equal protection civil rights cause of action. Wainit v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 20 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. 2015).

A state court litigant's right to equal protection is not violated because he can only get a judgment in the state court and cannot get a judgment in the FSM Supreme Court. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Each court system, national and state, treats all persons before it equally under the law and the difference in each court system's jurisdictional requirements is not unequal treatment under the laws. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

A money judgment against the state is not a property interest but an existing, continuing liability against the state, and a failure to timely satisfy that judgment does not constitute a taking in violation of due process or equal protection. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The Constitution provides that equal protection under the laws may not be denied or impaired on account of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language or social status. This provision guarantees that similarly situated individuals are not treated differently due to some sort of invidious discrimination. When a person does not argue or submit evidence to show that he is being discriminated upon as a member of a protected class, or that he is being treated differently from similarly situated individuals, his equal protection claim is unsupported. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 376-77 (Pon. 2017).

When the plaintiff makes no allegations that would support an equal protection claim, the defendant may be granted summary judgment on that part of the plaintiff's civil rights claim. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 158 (Chk. 2019).

The constitutional guarantees of due process and equal protection extend to aliens. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 633 n.8 (Pon. 2020).

– Excessive Fines

It is premature to challenge a statute as unconstitutional for imposing excessive fines until a fine has been imposed. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 126 (Pon. 1995).

– Ex Post Facto Laws

While every ex post facto law must necessarily be retrospective not every retrospective law is an ex post facto law. An ex post facto law is one which imposes punishment for past conduct, lawful at the time it was engaged in. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 266-67 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Legislation is not an ex post facto law where the source of the legislative concern can be thought to be the activity or status from which the individual is barred, even though it may bear harshly upon one affected, but the contrary is the case where the statute in question is evidently aimed at the person or class of persons disqualified. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 268-69 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

A provision barring those convicted of a felony, even if pardoned, from membership in the legislature is concerned with the qualifications of legislative membership, and is not just for the purpose of punishing felons and those pardoned of a felony which would violate the constitutional ban on ex post facto laws. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 269-71 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Regulations imposing civil disqualifications for past criminal conduct are not punishment barred by the constitutional ban against ex post facto laws. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 270-71 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Since retrospective application of a constitutional provision barring persons convicted of felonies, even if pardoned, from holding legislative office is not an invalid ex post facto law, retrospective application of the provision is also not invalid as a bill of attainder or a denial of due process. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 271-72 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The concept of ex post facto laws is limited to legislation which does any of the following: 1) makes criminal and punishable an act innocent when done; 2) aggravates a crime, or makes it greater than it was when committed; 3) increases the punishment for a crime and applies the increase to crimes committed before the enactment of the laws; or 4) alters the legal rules of evidence so that testimony insufficient to convict for the offense when committed would be sufficient as to that particular offense and accused person. The ban on ex post facto law applies to criminal acts only. This means retroactive noncriminal laws may be valid. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 400 (App. 1994).

The mark of an ex post facto law is the imposition of punishment for past acts. The question is whether the legislative aim was to punish that individual for past activity, or whether the restriction of the individual comes about as a relevant incident to a regulation of a present situation, such as the proper qualifications for a profession. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

Since the legislative aim of a statute making ineligible for election to Congress those persons convicted of a felony in a Trust Territory court was not to punish persons for their past conduct it is a regulation of a present situation concerned solely with the proper qualifications for members of Congress. As such it is a reasonable means for achieving a legitimate governmental purpose. It is therefore not unconstitutional as an ex post facto law. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

The statutory ineligibility of persons convicted of Trust Territory felonies is a valid exercise of Congress's constitutional power to prescribe additional qualifications for election to Congress, and is not unconstitutional as a deprivation of a liberty interest without due process of law, or as an ex post facto law, or as a bill of attainder. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

An ex post facto decision is one that imposes punishment for past conduct, lawful at the time it was engaged in. The concept of ex post facto laws is limited to the following: 1) making criminal and punishable an act innocent when done; 2) aggravating a crime, or making it greater than it was when committed; 3) increasing the punishment for a crime and applying the increase to crimes committed before the enactment of the laws; or 4) altering the legal rules of evidence so that testimony insufficient to convict for the offense when committed would be sufficient as to that particular offense and accused person. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 555 (App. 2008).

There was no ex post facto violation in the appellants' conviction for conspiring to violate Section 529 (2001) when the conduct underlying violation of Section 529 was unlawful as of 1982 under the substantively identical Section 548 which was made law then, the appellants cannot maintain that their conduct in the late 1990's underlying the Section 529 conspiracy charge was lawful when they engaged in it; when, since Section 529's punishment provisions are identical to those of Section 548, conviction under Section 529 does not aggravate the crime to make it greater than it was when committed and does not increase the punishment; and when, since the statutes are substantively identical, the same evidence would be sufficient for conviction under both. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 555 (App. 2008).

Ex post facto laws are laws passed after the occurrence of a fact or the commission of an act, which thereby changes the legal consequences of the fact or act. An ex post facto law seeks to impose punishment on individuals for past acts. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 133 (Pon. 2011).

– Foreign and Interstate Commerce

Although foreign and interstate commerce and shipping involve profound national interests, where Congress has not seen fit to assert those interests and there is no national regulation or law to enforce, the fact that a case affects interstate and foreign commerce and shipping is not sufficient to deny abstention if other strong grounds for abstention exist. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 47 (Pon. 1989).

Questions regarding the validity of the provisions of promissory notes for personal loans, executed with a national bank operating in each state of the FSM and having in part foreign ownership, are closely connected to the powers of the national legislature to regulate banking, foreign and interstate commerce, and bankruptcy, and to establish usury limits, and they have a distinctly national character. The FSM Supreme Court therefore will formulate and apply rules of national law in assessing such issues. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 218 (Pon. 1990).

Power to regulate the incorporation and operation of corporations falls within the constitutional power of the national government to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 376, 380 (Pon. 1990).

The Constitution prohibits state and local governments from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 312, 313 (Chk. 1994).

The national government has the express authority to regulate international commerce. International commerce is also a power of such an indisputably national character as to be beyond them power of a state to control because the customs and immigration borders of the country are controlled by agencies of the national government. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

Congress may legislate regulation of firearms and ammunition under the foreign and interstate commerce clause of article IX, section 2(g). FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

Because the FSM Constitution expressly delegates to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce and because the existence, availability and quality of telecommunication services in the FSM clearly impacts on interstate commerce, the FSM government is constitutionally authorized to establish the FSM Telecommunications Corporation and may similarly exempt it from taxes or assessments. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 384 (Pon. 2000).

A state "use tax" calculated on the value of items brought into the state plus the cost of shipping, handling, insurance, labor or service cost, transportation charges or any expenses whatsoever, has nothing to do with benefits provided by the state associated with the use of the item and cannot be justified as having a substantial nexus with the state. It only serves as an unauthorized burden on interstate commerce. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 386 (Pon. 2000).

Article IX, section 2(g) of the Constitution expressly delegates to Congress the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. A delegation of power to the national government under section 2 of Article IX is exclusive. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 581-82 (App. 2000).

As to interstate commerce, Article VIII, section 3 contains the negative counterpart to Article IX, section 2(g)'s positive grant of power by prohibiting state and local governments from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 582 (App. 2000).

Since the event triggering the Pohnpei use tax is the unqualified "use or consumption" in Pohnpei of nonexempt goods, the statute applies to goods brought into Pohnpei from Yap, Chuuk, and Kosrae, as well as from locations outside the FSM. It is thus clear that the statute directly regulates or restricts interstate commerce in the same way it does imports. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 582 (App. 2000).

As to goods making their way from any of the other three states into Pohnpei, the direct nexus between the simultaneous arrival of the goods and imposition of the Pohnpei use tax points to direct regulation of interstate commerce. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 582 (App. 2000).

Even assuming that the Pohnpei use tax apportionment clause could be interpreted to remedy concerns about discrimination against interstate commerce, the fact remains that the use tax is indissolubly linked to the event of importation, and no semantic calisthenics liberate the tax from this inherent defect. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 583 (App. 2000).

A state tax that is unconstitutional as an import tax, if applied to interstate commerce, is also restrictive of interstate commerce. The Constitution does not permit a state to erect tax barriers to the free movement of goods among the states. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 583 (App. 2000).

Because the national government has the exclusive power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, the Consumer Protection Act is the law of the FSM insofar as any advertising, sale, offer or distribution involves commerce between the states of the FSM or with any foreign entity. The Consumer Protection Act also is the law of the states of the FSM, insofar as it involves commerce which is intrastate and has not been repealed by the state legislatures. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 415 (Pon. 2001).

When trochus was harvested to be sold for the export market and pepper was grown and processed for the export trade, that is foreign commerce. That Pohnpei arranged its affairs so that its purchases and sales were all in state does not take it out of the stream of foreign commerce. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 15-16 (App. 2006).

The national government is expressly delegated the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. Title 32 is a valid exercise of that power and the anticompetitive practices statute in Title 32 creates a statutory tort. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

When the imported materials in a Philippine slingshot are not manufactured abroad with the intent that they be assembled into a Philippine slingshot but are manufactured abroad as other articles or as parts of other articles and are legitimately imported for other purposes but are then recycled into Philippine slingshot parts, a Philippine slingshot is manufactured locally, out of locally available materials. It does not pass through foreign or interstate commerce. That some of those materials were once imported as something else to be used for some other purpose is not enough to implicate the national government's activity or function to regulate foreign commerce. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

The Constitution grants the national government, not the state governments, the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce and taxation is regulation just as prohibition is. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2010).

A service tax on plane passengers does not have only an incidental effect on foreign commerce; its only effect is on foreign commerce. A tax on shipping cargo or freight affects only foreign commerce or interstate commerce since the airline does not fly to anywhere in Chuuk except Weno. Since state and local governments are prohibited from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce, to the extent that the tax is imposed on freight or cargo shipped from Chuuk to other FSM states, would appear to be specifically barred by the Constitution and to the extent it is imposed on cargo or freight shipped elsewhere, it would be regulation of foreign commerce – in effect, an export tax. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2010).

The Constitution expressly grants the national government, not the state governments, the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, and taxation is a form of regulation. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 531 (Chk. 2011).

The Chuuk service tax on plane passengers does not have only an incidental effect on foreign commerce. Its main effect (and its sole intended effect) is on foreign commerce. By its terms, it is to be imposed only on those passengers whose "final destination" would be "outside of the FSM." The Chuuk service tax on outgoing paying airline passengers is thus an unconstitutional regulation of foreign commerce. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 531-32 (Chk. 2011).

The tax on shipping air cargo or air freight on Continental affects only foreign commerce or interstate commerce, and since state governments are prohibited from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce, to the extent that it is imposed on freight or cargo shipped from Chuuk to other FSM states, the Chuuk service tax would be specifically barred by the Constitution, and to the extent the tax is imposed on cargo or freight shipped elsewhere, it would be regulation of foreign commerce – an export regulation and tax. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 533 (Chk. 2011).

The Constitution expressly delegates to Congress the power to regulate banking and foreign and interstate commerce. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 619 (Pon. 2013).

Congress has the power to create institutions that engage in the activity that Congress has the power to regulate. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 619 (Pon. 2013).

The Constitution's broadly-stated express grants of power to regulate banking and foreign and interstate commerce contain within them innumerable incidental or implied powers as well as certain inherent powers. These incidental and implied powers include the power to form public corporations, such as the FSM Development Bank or the FSM Telecommunications Corporation, even in the absence of the express power to do so. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 619 (Pon. 2013).

The creation of the restructured FSM Development Bank was a valid exercise of Congress's power to regulate banking and to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. Development banking is also a power of national character beyond the power of a state to control or provide and so is a national power. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 619 (Pon. 2013).

Only the national government can impose taxes on imports and no state may impose taxes that restrict interstate commerce. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 153 (Chk. 2013).

Since imported cigarettes are not taxable unless sold (or presumed sold) and may be nontaxable if not, the Chuuk cigarette tax appears to be a sales tax and not an import tax because the taxable event is their sale not their importation. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

A municipal "road service" fee is not a tax on imports since it does not vary based on the amount or value of the goods brought into the municipality and since it does it vary based on the origin of those goods. It is a flat annual fee or a tax that does not violate the Constitution's prohibition of local taxes which restrict interstate commerce because the road service fee does not restrict or hinder interstate commerce or impose an import tax, but it does restrict or hinder intrastate or inter-municipal commerce, a type of commerce the FSM Constitution does not grant the national government the power to regulate. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57-58 (Pon. 2015).

– Freedom of Expression

The right of citizens to express their views, including views critical of public officials, is fundamental to the development of a healthy political system. Therefore, courts are generally reluctant to find that expression of opinions asserted outside of the court itself, however intemperate or misguided, constitute contempt of court. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 247-48 (Pon. 1983).

If the preponderance of evidence shows that a government employee would have been terminated even in the absence of the protected free speech conduct the employee's termination should be upheld. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 8 FSM R. 23, 28 (App. 1997).

It is not a violation of a person's free speech rights to be arrested when he was attempting to interfere with the arrest of his cousin, when he was drunk at the time, and when he was disturbing the peace. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 193 (Pon. 1997).

A political candidate's freedom of expression is guaranteed, as it is to all citizens, under section 1 of the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

The freedom to communicate is the rule and restraint is the exception. Censorship, a form of prior restraint, is the most suspect punishment in a free society; ideas do not even get to the marketplace to compete for recognition and acceptance. Censorship thus runs counter to the freedom of speech and press. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 n.2 (Pon. 1999).

When a vague statute abuts upon sensitive areas of basic freedoms, it operates to inhibit the exercise of those freedoms. Uncertain meanings inevitably lead citizens to steer far wider of the unlawful zone than if the boundaries of the forbidden areas were clearly marked. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon.

To conclude that 9 F.S.M.C. 107(1) criminalizes either a candidate's conduct in submitting his campaign tape directly to a broadcast facility without previously submitting it to the national election commissioner, or to conclude that the owner and operator of the radio station faces a criminal penalty because it aired the tape would be to attribute an uncertain meaning to the statute, which might well cause candidates to steer far wider of the unlawful zone than they otherwise would, or should, in the important work of presenting their views to a public which needs to exercise its franchise in an intelligent manner. The court declines to credit such an uncertain meaning to the statute. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

Until such time as the plaintiff demonstrates the allegedly defamatory nature of the publications at issue, either by way of trial or proper motion accompanied by admissible supporting evidence, a permanent injunction cannot lawfully issue against the publication of speech that the defendants contend is true and which involves matters of public concern. O'Sullivan v. Panuelo, 10 FSM R. 257, 262 (Pon. 2001).

A public employer may not discharge either a tenured or a non-tenured employee for the reasonable exercise of constitutional rights such as freedom of speech. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

While no law may deny or impair freedom of expression, traditions are also protected under the FSM Constitution. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 390 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Kosrae Constitution provides for the fundamental right of freedom of expression, and also permits denial or impairment of that fundamental right by a statute which protects tradition. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 390 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

No law may deny or impair freedom of expression, except by a statute which protects tradition. If a statute is one which protects tradition, it may deny or impair the fundamental right of freedom of expression provided by the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions. If it is not a statute which protects tradition, then the statute may not impair the fundamental right of freedom of expression. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 390-91 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of defamation was not enacted to protect tradition, and if the offense of defamation does not protect tradition, then the fundamental right of freedom of expression as guaranteed by the Kosrae Constitution may not be impaired or denied. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the Kosrae criminal defamation statute does not protect tradition, it may not impair a defendant's fundamental right of freedom of expression. The defamation statute impairs the fundamental right of freedom of expression because it fails to provide a specific standard of criminal conduct, thereby persons would not have adequate notice of what type of speech was regulated under it. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Flyers and newspaper advertisements may be interpreted as "press" for purposes of constitutional freedom of expression. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 614 (Pon. 2003).

Commercial speech is expression related solely to the economic interests of the speaker and its audience, or speech which does no more than propose a commercial transaction. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 614 (Pon. 2003).

No guidance is found in the Journal of the Constitutional Convention as to the specific protection the FSM Constitution's framers sought to give commercial speech, but it did recognize that some forms of speech deserve less protection than others. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 614-15 (Pon. 2003).

Commercial expression serves two different functions – it serves the economic interests of the speaker, and also assists consumers and furthers the societal interest in dissemination of information. It may be constitutionally protected from unwarranted governmental restriction; however, there are common sense distinctions between commercial speech, which proposes a commercial transaction, and other varieties of speech. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 615 (Pon. 2003).

Commercial speech deserves less constitutional protection than other varieties of speech. Commercial speech's societal benefits are directly related to the informational function; thus, there can be no constitutional objection to the suppression of commercial messages that do not accurately inform the public about a lawful activity. The government should be permitted to restrict commercial forms of communication more likely to deceive the public than to inform it. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 615 (Pon. 2003).

A court approaches arguments as to the unconstitutionality of any prior restraint on the right to free speech as follows: first, the distinction is drawn between those portions of the publications that legitimately provide consumers with information and those portions which are solely related to proposing a commercial transaction. The court accords the first category constitutional protection as it approximates pure speech. As for the commercial speech contained within the publications, it would not be afforded constitutional protection unless the court found that the speech concerned a lawful activity and was not misleading. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 615 (Pon. 2003).

A court may issue a preliminary injunction when certain portions of commercial speech are misleading to consumers and merchants. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 615 (Pon. 2003).

The public interest weighs in favor of issuing a preliminary injunction when the injunction is limited in scope to protect the public from defendants' statements which are more likely to mislead than to inform the public. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 618 (Pon. 2003).

The right of citizens to express their views, including views critical of public officials, is fundamental to development of a healthy political system. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 312 (App. 2007).

When a legislature employee aired his opinion about a number of issues concerning the Speaker in a letter that was submitted directly to the Speaker, with copies to the Governor and the Pohnpei Supreme Court Chief Justice, it did not constitute an employee grievance. When the employee's assertion that he was notifying the Speaker of his intention to seek redress over his missing raise was false because an earlier letter previously notified the Speaker about the initiation of such legal proceedings; and when the employee appears to have sent the letter in pursuit of matters of a purely personal interest and the letter's overall tone was one of a personal grievance about his pay raise and his cancelled travel plans to events in Guam and Florida, which other Legislature employees had attended, the overriding factor is the context in which the statements were made: in pursuit of matters of the employee's personal importance and not as protected free speech. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 312-13 (App. 2007).

In evaluating a government employee's speech, the issue is not whether the speaker's statements were true or false, but instead whether the speech is made in the context of a public citizen making statements about issues of public importance, or as an employee making statements about matters of personal interest. Thus, courts must begin by considering whether the expressions in question were made by the speaker as a public citizen. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 313 (App. 2007).

A state employee's speech that concerns genuine public issues would be protected, but his speech that relates to items of personal importance to the employee would not necessarily be protected. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 314 (App. 2007).

Considerations of constitutional law and free speech sometimes apply to defamation cases, as when the action involves a public official, a public figure, or a matter of substantial public controversy. In such cases, beyond the other elements of defamation, the plaintiff must show that the defendant knew that the defamatory statement was false, or acted with malice or a reckless disregard for the truth. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 46 (Pon. 2011).

Although falsity is included in the FSM's definition of defamation, falsity is not a traditional element of a plaintiff's prima facie case; rather, truth is an affirmative defense. Even so, a court must distinguish between statements of fact and assertions of opinion, because opinions, false or not, libelous or not, are constitutionally protected and may not be the subject of private damage actions, provided that the facts supporting the opinions are set forth. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 46 (Pon. 2011).

Considerations of constitutional law and free speech sometimes apply in defamation cases, as when the action involves a public official, a public figure, or a matter of substantial public controversy. In such cases, beyond the other elements of defamation, the plaintiff must show that the defendant knew that the defamatory statement was false, or acted with malice or a reckless disregard for the truth. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 197 (Pon. 2012).

A state employee's speech that concerns genuine public issues is protected speech. Tither v. Marar, 18 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. 2012).

A plaintiff's termination or discharge was not unlawful when, even if he had been able to prove that his constitutionally-protected conduct had been a substantial or motivating factor in his termination and the burden had have shifted to the defendants, he still would not prevail because the defendants demonstrated that they would have taken the same action in the absence of the protected conduct because of his probationary status and his unsatisfactory and unprofessional conduct prevented him from being converted from a probationary employee to a permanent employee and he would have been terminated anyway. Tither v. Marar, 18 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. 2012).

If the preponderance of evidence shows that a government employee would have been terminated even in the absence of the protected free speech conduct, then the employee's termination should be upheld. Alexander v. Hainrick, 20 FSM R. 377, 383 (App. 2016).

Free speech rights under the Declaration of Rights protection of "freedom of expression" should cover social media communications. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 & n.2 (Chk. 2019).

"Freedom of expression" encompasses freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the freedom to communicate. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 n.2 (Chk. 2019).

– Fundamental Rights

Waiver of a fundamental right may not be presumed in ambiguous circumstances. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 234 (Pon. 1987).

In adopting the Declaration of Rights as part of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia and therefore the supreme law of the land, the people of Micronesia subscribed to various principles which place upon the judiciary the obligation, among others, to assure that arrests are based upon probable cause, that determinations of guilt are arrived at fairly, and that punishments for wrongdoing are proportionate to the crime and meet prescribed standards. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 281-82 (App. 1990).

When a trial court is asked to give special mitigative effect to customary punishment during its sentencing proceedings, the court must first consider whether these customary activities have become so imbued with official state action so that the actions of the assailants are seen as actions of the state itself; if so the punishments must be tested by the same standards that would be applied if state officials carried out these punishments directly. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 283 (App. 1990).

The Compact of Free Association's immunization provisions, which limit a plaintiff's right to sue a physician for malpractice, do not affect a fundamental right, and therefore, the provisions need not be subjected to a strict scrutiny, but instead should be tested under the less stringent rational relationship test. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 104 (Pon. 1991).

A defendant that has failed to raise and preserve the issue has waived his right to object to the admission of evidence, but when a plain error that affects the constitutional rights of the defendant has occurred the court may notice the error. Moses v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 156, 161 (App. 1991).

There is no fundamental interest in unbounded wrongful death recovery requiring strict scrutiny of a state law imposing a recovery cap. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 362 (Kos. 1992).

Since the FSM people's traditions may be protected by statute and if challenged as violative of the fundamental rights in Article IV, protection of Micronesian tradition shall be considered a compelling social purpose warranting such governmental action, Kosrae may pass a law which protects the Kosraean people's traditions. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 390 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The right to marry is a fundamental constitutional right. Prisoners retain that right, but the right is subject to substantial restrictions as a result of imprisonment. Prisons may regulate the time and place of the wedding ceremony. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A fundamental right is some principle of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked fundamental and examples of which are the freedom of association, the right to vote, the right to travel, rights associated with certain criminal proceedings, and the right to privacy. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. 2007).

Equal protection forbids only invidious discrimination. Where relevant differences exist between classes, different treatment by the state is permissible. However, any statute that classifies and affords different treatment is subject to the same tests as those under substantive due process: 1) Does the legislature have power to enact the statute that classifies? 2) Does the classification bear a rational relationship to the legislative goal? The classification is presumed to be valid and the burden of proving that the statute is without a rational relationship to the legislative objective is on the challenger of the classification. 3) Where fundamental rights are involved, the classification constitutes a suspect criteria. As such, the burden of proving that the classification bears a close rational relationship to some compelling governmental interests shifts to the government. Fundamental rights are presumed to be absolute until the government proves a compelling governmental interest to curtail or restrain them. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592 (App. 2008).

The court should be wary of requests that it identify as fundamental any rights beyond those specified in the declaration of rights. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592 (App. 2008).

Employment is not listed as a fundamental right in the Declaration of Rights although a case has referred to "employment opportunity" as a "liberty interest." But when the interest in contention is employment pay not the opportunity for employment, being paid a lower rate than another involves a fundamental right if the reason for the lower pay is the employee's sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. Being paid at a lower rate for some other reason does not involve a fundamental right. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 592 (App. 2008).

Although an employment opportunity is a liberty interest protected by due process, the right to governmental employment in Pohnpei is not a constitutionally-protected fundamental right, requiring invoking a strict scrutiny test. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 16 FSM R. 492, 497 (Pon. 2009).

Equal protection analysis within the FSM has adopted a two-tiered test. The first tier is a rational basis test. Under this test a law will be upheld if it is rationally related to a state interest. Under the second tier, laws that involve a "suspect" class of persons or touch on a "fundamental interest" are subject to strict scrutiny and are struck down unless justified by a compelling state interest. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

Employment is not listed as a fundamental right in the Declaration of Rights and the court should be wary of requests that it identify as fundamental any rights beyond those specified in the Declaration of Rights. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

The right to work for the Pohnpei state government is not a constitutionally protected right, and, although there is a right to seek employment, there is no fundamental right for employment particularly to public employment. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

– Imprisonment for Debt

The constitutional provision prohibiting imprisonment for debt does not restrict the manner in which 6 F.S.M.C. 1412 is applied, although that statute includes imprisonment as one possible sanction for violating an order in aid of judgment. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 381 (App. 2003).

The constitutional prohibition prohibiting imprisonment for debt is a restriction on the courts against the enforcement of judgments of a certain character, but does not restrict a court's power to enforce its lawful orders by imprisonment for contempt. Even when the violation of the order is for failure to make payments for the recovery of a judgment enforceable by an order in aid of judgment, if the order is one which the court could lawfully make, the imprisonment is not for failure to pay the debt, but failure to obey a lawful court order. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 382 (App. 2003).

The prohibition on imprisonment for debt is to bar imprisonment for honest failure to pay contractual debts. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 382 (App. 2003).

A debtor who knows that he is under a court order to pay an amount certain, has the ability to pay the amount, and still refuses to pay it, acts against good morals and fair dealing. Such a situation amounts to being "tainted by fraud" and is within the exceptions to the prohibition on imprisonment for debt. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 382-83 (App. 2003).

– Indefinite Land Use Agreements

Read in the light of its legislative history, article XIII, section 5 of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia was intended to cover leases, not easements, and therefore an easement that is indefinite in term does not violate this constitutional section. Melander v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 324, 330 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The FSM Constitution terminated all existing indefinite term land use agreements five years after the effective date of the Constitution. After that date, without a new lease agreement the occupier becomes a trespasser on the land. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 132 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Easements are not indefinite land use agreements prohibited by the Constitution because "indefinite land use agreement" is a term of art referring to Trust Territory leases for an indefinite term. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 423 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Land granted for "for so long as it is used for missionary purposes," is not a constitutionally prohibited indefinite land use agreement because the length of the term of the land use will continue, with all certainty, as long as a court determines that the land is still being used for missionary purposes. The term is definite, because its termination can be determined with certainty. Dobich v. Kapriel, 6 FSM R. 199, 202 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The Constitutional prohibition against indefinite land use agreements does not apply to an agreement where none of the parties are a non-citizen, a corporation not wholly owned by citizens, or a government. Dobich v. Kapriel, 6 FSM R. 199, 202 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

An easement for a road is not an indefinite land use agreement prohibited by the Constitution because it is perpetual. It is not indefinite in that it is effective into perpetuity. Nena v. Kosrae (I), 6 FSM R. 251, 254 (App. 1993).

An easement may be created for a permanent duration, or, as it is sometimes stated, in fee, which will ordinarily continue in operation and be enforceable forever. The grant of a permanent easement is for as definite a term as the grant of a fee simple estate. Both are permanent and not for a definite term. Nena v. Kosrae (II), 6 FSM R. 437, 439 (App. 1994).

A grant of a permanent or perpetual easement is definite in the same sense that a grant of a fee simple estate is definite – it is a permanent transfer of an interest in land. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 568 (App. 1994).

Where no indefinite land use agreement existed when the Constitution took effect there was no agreement that had to have been renegotiated by 1984. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 491 (App. 1996).

All indefinite land use agreements are void after July 12, 1984, as being in violation of the FSM Constitution. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

Under the original version of Article XIII, section 5 of the FSM Constitution, FSM governments were barred from obtaining an agreement for the use of land for an indefinite term and that could have made a land purchase agreement unconstitutional because of a reversionary clause returning the land to the original land owner or successor at the end of an indefinite term of airport use, but, when that provision was amended in 1991 so that only land lease agreements for an indefinite term were prohibited, and that constitutional amendment was effective before the subject land purchase agreement was executed, Article XIII, section 5 does not prohibit the Land Purchase Agreement because it is not a lease. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 226 (Chk. 2006).

When the Trust Territory leased Unupuku in 1956 and had indefinite land use rights under the lease, but did not claim to own Unupuku, but indefinite land use agreements were abolished by Article XIII, section 5 of the FSM Constitution and became void on July 12, 1984, five years after the FSM Constitution's effective date, and when the state executed a fifteen-year lease for Unupuku in 1984 and it did not claim to own Unupuku, in any suit claiming title to Unupuku, the state was not the party to sue since it did not claim title to Unupuku. Unupuku's titleholders were. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 111 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

– Interpretation

The FSM Supreme Court must remain sensitive to the unique circumstances of the Federated States of Micronesia and may not slavishly follow interpretations of similar language by United States, Trust Territory, or other tribunals in different contexts. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 69 n.11 (Kos. 1982).

Because the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia has drawn upon numerous concepts established in the Constitution of the United States, interpretations of the United States Constitution, as of 1978 when the Constitution was ratified by plebiscite, are pertinent to determining the meaning of particular provisions in the FSM Constitution. To the extent that the FSM clearly patterned upon the United States Constitution, the reasonable expectation of the framers would be that the words of the FSM Constitution would have substantially the effect those same words had been given in the United States Constitution as of the times that the convention was acting, or when the ratifying vote occurred. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 69-70 (Kos. 1982).

Decisions of the Trust Territory courts may be a useful source of guidance in determining the meaning of particular provisions within the Constitution. The framers were working against the background of legal concepts recognized and applied by the Trust Territory High Court and may have been guided by those interpretations in selecting or rejecting certain provisions. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 71 (Kos. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court may look to the law of other nations, especially other nations of the Pacific community, to determine whether approaches employed there may prove useful in determining the meaning of particular provisions within the Constitution. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 71 (Kos. 1982).

Analysis of the Constitution must start with the words of the constitutional provision. If these words are clear and permit only one possible result, the court should go no further. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 82 (Pon. 1982).

When the words of a constitutional provision are not conclusive as to its meaning, the next step in determining the intent of the framers is to review the Journal of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention to locate any discussion in the convention about the provision. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 82 (Pon. 1982).

If doubt as to the meaning of a constitutional provision still remains after careful consideration of the language and constitutional history, the court should proceed to other sources for assistance. These include interpretations of similar language in the United States Constitution, decisions of the Trust Territory High Court, generally held notions of basic justice within the international community, and consideration of the law of other nations, especially others within the Pacific community. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 83 (Pon. 1982).

In interpreting the Declaration of Rights, courts should emphasize and carefully consider United States Supreme Court interpretations of the United States Constitution. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 85 (Pon. 1982).

The provisions in the Constitution's Declaration of Rights are to a substantial degree patterned upon comparable provisions in the United States Constitution; the FSM Supreme Court should consider carefully decisions of the United States courts interpreting the United States counterparts. Tosie v. Tosie, 1 FSM R. 149, 154 (Kos. 1982).

As the provisions set forth in the Constitution's Declaration of Rights are based on counterparts in the United States Constitution, it is appropriate to review decisions of United States courts, especially those in effect when the Constitution was approved and ratified, to determine the content of the words employed therein. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 249 (Pon. 1983).

The framers of the Federated States of Micronesia Constitution drew upon the United States Constitution and it may be presumed that phrases so borrowed were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the United States Supreme Court. Jonas v. Trial Division, 1 FSM R. 322, 327 n.1 (App. 1983).

An analysis of constitutional grants of power must start with the constitutional language itself. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 342 (Pon. 1983).

The similarities of the FSM and the United States Constitutions mandate that the FSM Supreme Court, in attempting to determine its role under the FSM Constitution, will give serious consideration to United States constitutional analysis at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 345 (Pon. 1983).

If the words of the Constitution are ambiguous or doubtful, it is a court's duty to seek out the intention of the framers. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 348 (Pon. 1983).

By using the United States Constitution as a blueprint, the framers created a presumption that they were adopting such a fundamental American constitutional principle as judicial review, found to be inherent in the language and very idea of the United States Constitution. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 348 (Pon. 1983).

A legitimate method for determining the meaning of a constitution is to trace the language to its source. When the language in the FSM Constitution and the United States Constitution is similar, it is appropriate to look to interpretations by United States courts, especially those in existence at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention, as a guide to the intended meaning of the words employed in the Constitution of the FSM. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 394 (Pon. 1984).

The FSM Supreme Court may look to decisions under the United States Constitution for guidance in determining the scope of jurisdiction since the jurisdictional language of the Federated States of Micronesia Constitution is similar to that of the United States. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 414 (Pon. 1984).

United States constitutional law at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention furnishes guidance as to the intended scope of the FSM Constitution's double jeopardy clause. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 523 (App. 1984).

Where the framers of the FSM Constitution have borrowed phrases from the Constitution of the United States for guidance, it may be presumed that those phrases were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the Supreme Court of the United States. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 56-57 (App. 1985).

Interpretative efforts for a clause in the FSM Constitution which has no counterpart in the United States Constitution must begin with recognition that such a clause presumably reflects a conscious effort by the framers to select a road other than that paved by the United States Constitution. The original focus must be on the language of the clause. If the language is inconclusive the tentative conclusion may be tested against the journals of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention and the historical background against which the clause was adopted. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 57 (App. 1985).

Interpretations of the FSM Constitution which strip constitutional clauses of substance and effect run against the norms of constitutional interpretation and are greatly disfavored. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 57 (App. 1985).

Departure from the form of the United States Constitution reveals an intention by the framers of the FSM Constitution to depart from the substance as well, so far as major crimes are concerned. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 58 (App. 1985).

General principles gleaned from an entire constitution and constitutional history may not be employed to defeat the clear meaning of an individual constitutional clause. Tammow v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 53, 59 (App. 1985).

Interpretations which strip clauses of substance and effect run against the norms of interpretation and are greatly disfavored. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 94 (Kos. 1985).

Though the words used in article XI, section 6 of the FSM Constitution, including the case or dispute requirements, are based on the similar case and controversy provisions set out in article III of the United States Constitution, courts within the FSM are not to consider themselves bound by the details and minute points of decisions of United States courts attempting to ferret out the precise meaning of article III. Aisek v. Foreign Inv. Bd., 2 FSM R. 95, 98 (Pon. 1985).

Many provisions of this Constitution are derived from the United States Constitution and the framers intended that interpretation of the words adopted would be influenced by United States decisions in existence when this Constitution was adopted in October 1975 and ratified on July 12, 1978. Yet the framers also surely intended that courts here would not place undue importance on decisions of United States courts but would employ the words and concepts used in the United States Constitution to develop a jurisprudence appropriate and applicable to the circumstances of the Federated States of Micronesia. Aisek v. Foreign Inv. Bd., 2 FSM R. 95, 98 (Pon. 1985).

Constitutional interpretation must start and end with the words of the provision when the words themselves plainly and unmistakably provide the answer to the issue posed. The court may not look to constitutional history nor to United States interpretations of similar constitutional language in this circumstance. Ponape Federation of Coop. Ass'ns v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 124, 126-27 (Pon. 1985).

Courts may look to the Journals of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention for assistance in determining the meaning of constitutional language that does not provide an unmistakable answer. The Journals provide no conclusion as to whether promises of leniency by the police should be regarded as having compelled a defendant to give statements and other evidence but shows that the article IV, section 7 protection against self-incrimination was based upon the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution. Therefore courts within the Federated States of Micronesia may look to United States decisions to assist in determining the meaning of article IV, section 7. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 193-94 (Kos. 1986).

Differences in the language employed in parallel provisions of the FSM and United States Constitutions presumably reflect a conscious effort by the framers of the FSM Constitution to select a road other than that paved by the United States Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Nanpei, 2 FSM R. 217, 219 n.1 (Pon. 1986).

Because the Declaration of Rights is patterned after provisions of the United States Constitution, and United States cases were relied on to guide the constitutional convention, United States authority may be consulted to understand the meaning. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 263 (Truk 1986).

In determining whether constitutional language is amenable to only one possible interpretation, courts should consider the words in the light of history and the accepted meaning of those words prior to and at the time the Constitution was written. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage (III), 3 FSM R. 256, 258 (Pon. 1987).

Exact scope of admiralty jurisdiction is not defined in the FSM Constitution or legislative history, but United States Constitution has a similar provision, so it is reasonable to expect that words in both Constitutions have similar meaning and effect. Weilbacher v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 320, 323 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

In interpreting the Constitution, each provision should be interpreted against the background of all other provisions in the Constitution, and an effort should be made to reconcile all provisions so that none is deprived of meaning. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 378 (Pon. 1988).

Courts should interpret the national Constitution in such a manner that each provision is given effect. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 29 (App. 1989).

Because the jurisdiction provisions of the FSM Constitution are substantially similar to those of the United States but the words themselves provide no definite interpretation and no party has pointed either to constitutional history or to other matters, such as custom or tradition, calling for a particular interpretation or for departure from the accepted meaning in the United States, it is appropriate to look to United States precedents for possible guidance in determining what the framers intended in adopting the provisions that now appear in the Constitution. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 41 (Pon. 1989).

Where the language of the FSM Constitution has been borrowed from the United States Constitution, the court may look to leading United States cases for guidance in interpreting that language, especially where the meaning is not self-evident from the words themselves; in particular, United States constitutional law at the time of adoption of the FSM Constitution can have special relevance in determining the meaning of similar constitutional language here. Paul v. Celestine, 4 FSM R. 205, 208 (App. 1990).

Analysis of Constitutional issues must begin with the words of the Constitution. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 325 (App. 1990).

Consideration of the general plan of the Constitution and the institutions created thereunder may be helpful in determining the proper interpretation of specific language within the FSM Constitution. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 326 (App. 1990).

When the meaning of the words in the FSM Constitution are not self-evident and it is apparent the words have been drawn from or are patterned upon language in the Constitution of the United States or of some other jurisdiction, the Supreme Court of the FSM may look to decisions of courts in that other jurisdiction for assistance in discerning the appropriate meaning of the words in the FSM Constitution. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 371 (App. 1990).

The decisions of United States courts are not binding upon the FSM Supreme Court as to the meaning of the FSM Constitution even when the words of the FSM Constitution plainly are based upon comparable language in the United States Constitution, and the FSM Supreme Court will not accept a United States interpretation which 1) was shaped by historical factors not relevant to the FSM; 2) was widely and persuasively criticized by commentators in the United States; and 3) was not specifically recognized or even alluded to by the framers of the FSM Constitution. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 371 (App. 1990).

In interpreting the provision against cruel and unusual punishment in the FSM Constitution, the court should consider the values and realities of Micronesia, but against a background of the law concerning cruel and unusual punishment and international standards concerning human rights. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 196-97 (Pon. 1991).

Constitutional analysis always starts with the words of the Constitution. Where the wording is inconclusive and where the wording is unique to the FSM Constitution, then the court should look to the journals of the Constitutional Convention and the historical background at the time the clause was adopted for guidance. But when there is a conflict with the language of the Constitution, then the actual wording of the Constitution prevails. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 422 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The term "concurrent" in article XI, section 6(c) of the FSM Constitution has the same meaning as in section 6(b); i.e., that jurisdiction is concurrent as between the FSM Supreme Court and any other national courts that may be established by statute. It would be illogical and contrary to norms of constitutional interpretation to assume a different meaning for "concurrent" in section 6(c) than in section 6(b), since it is quite clear that the two sections are to be read together. Faw v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 33, 35 (Yap 1993).

Where the constitutional language is inconclusive or does not provide an unmistakable answer courts may look to the journal of the Constitutional Convention for assistance in determining the meaning of constitutional words. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 397 (App. 1994).

Some weight may be given as well to the early Congresses' understanding of constitutional provisions given the continuity of elected representation in the early Congresses. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 399 (App. 1994).

A litigant, in order to make arguments based on the legislative history of the constitutional provision, must first show the ambiguity in the constitutional provision. Only if the constitutional language is unclear or ambiguous can a court proceed to consult the constitutional convention journals and the historical background. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 568 (App. 1994).

Where distinctions exist between the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia and the United States Constitution or other foreign authorities, court must not hesitate to depart from foreign precedent and develop its own body of law. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 600 (Pon. 1994).

If a matter may properly be resolved on statutory grounds without reaching potential constitutional issues, then the court should do so. FSM v. George, 6 FSM R. 626, 628 (Kos. 1994).

Analysis of constitutional issues must begin with the words of the Constitution, and where the framers of the FSM Constitution drew upon the Constitution of the United States it may be presumed that phrases so borrowed were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the Supreme Court of the United States. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 45 (App. 1995).

A committee report that refers to language that is not in the Constitution and that accompanied a committee proposal that was killed by the Constitutional Convention cannot be relied upon to discover the real intent of the framers. At best it can only be used to show what was not their intent. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 47 (App. 1995).

Where the constitutional language itself, following FSM precedents on constitutional interpretation, only requires minimal diversity for the national courts to have jurisdiction, and the constitutional journals do not reveal any intent to depart from the plain meaning of the constitutional language, there are no sound reasons why twelve years of FSM jurisprudence requiring only minimal diversity should be overturned. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 48 (App. 1995).

The primary source available to courts when engaging in constitutional interpretation are the words of the constitution itself, and, if those are capable of more than one meaning, then the legislative history. Assuming that these two sources, taken together, are dispositive of the issue in question, a court may not look to any other source. Tafunsak v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 344, 347 (App. 1995).

Courts are to interpret constitutions so as to give effect to each provision, because interpretations which strip constitutional clauses of substance and effect run against the norms of constitutional interpretation and are greatly disfavored. Tafunsak v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 344, 347 & n.4 (App. 1995).

FSM courts may look for guidance to decisions of United States courts construing words of the United States Constitution which are similar to those in the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia, but FSM courts need not follow them in areas where United States constitutional law has been particularly unsettled or where the decision relies on specific and unique historical factors that do not exist here. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 459-60 (App. 1996).

When the language of the Constitution is not conclusive as to the issue presented, it is proper to refer to the constitutional convention journal for the history of the provision. If the journal does not address the point, a court may next consult cases from the United States if the phrase in the U.S. Constitution suggests that the FSM borrowed the term, and the court can infer that the framers intended that the meaning here be given the same meaning as it was given in U.S. courts. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 463-64 (App. 1996).

The FSM Constitution due process provision is derived from the United States Constitution and thus United States cases may be consulted for guidance in interpretation, emphasizing cases in effect at the times of the framing (1975) and the ratification (1978) of the FSM Constitution. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 556-57 (Chk. 1996).

A state court is competent to rule on FSM Constitution, but should avoid unnecessary adjudication of the FSM Constitution. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 8 FSM R. 23, 28 (App. 1997).

When analyzing provisions of the FSM Constitution, a court must look first to the actual words of the Constitution. Where the words are clear and permit only one possible result, the court should go no further. Only where the words of the Constitution are not clear is it necessary to consult other sources. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 362-63 (Pon. 1998).

A court should consider all provisions of the Constitution, because different sections may relate to the same subject matter, giving the specific provision questioned added meaning. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 363, 368, 386 (Pon. 1998).

If a court finds that the words of the Constitution are not clear or do not permit only one possible result, the court should next consult the Journal of the Constitutional Convention to ascertain the intent of the framers in drafting that language. If these two sources are dispositive, the court may not look to any other source. If the Constitution's language considered together with the legislative history is not dispositive, the court should look to interpretation of comparable language in other constitutions and to custom and tradition for guidance. Given the continuity of elected representation in the early FSM Congresses, some weight may be given as well to early Congresses' understanding of constitutional provisions. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 363 (Pon. 1998).

The framers intended that the constitutional language delegating governmental functions to the FSM national government be strictly and narrowly construed and not used to excessively and unduly expand the power of the central government, but they did not intend that the general grant of power be ignored, with the effect of denying to the central government the power necessary to deal with problems which are national in scope. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 369 (Pon. 1998).

The Constitution must be interpreted so as to give effect to each provision, because interpretations which strip constitutional clauses of substance and effect run against the norms of constitutional interpretation, and are greatly disfavored. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

Because of the continuity of representation in the early Congresses of the FSM, courts can give some weight to the early Congresses' understanding of Constitutional provisions. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 374 (Pon. 1998).

The FSM Constitution contains a provision by which the net revenues from offshore mineral resources are to be divided equally between the states and the national government, FSM Const. art. IX, § 6. There would be no need to specify the division of income from such resources if such revenues were taxes to be automatically divided under article IX, section 5. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386 (Pon. 1998).

Counsel's conversations with persons involved in drafting the Constitution are hearsay, especially when there is no competent evidence in the record, or in the Constitutional Convention Journal, to support counsel's assertion. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386 n.27 (Pon. 1998).

Because the Declaration of Rights is to a substantial degree patterned after provisions of the U.S. Constitution, and U.S. cases were relied on to guide the constitutional convention, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

When the court has analyzed the present meaning of the Constitution by recognized judicial standards of constitutional interpretation as long as the present language remains the court's conclusions carry full force and effect. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 73, 75 (Pon. 1999).

The FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights is based on the United States Constitution's Bill of Rights, and a court may look to United States precedent in this regard. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 146 (Pon. 1999).

Since the Due Process Clause in the Declaration of Rights of the FSM Constitution is based on the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment, the FSM Supreme Court may properly consider U.S. cases in construing due process under the FSM Constitution. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 213 (App. 1999).

When a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Primo v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 412 n.2 (App. 2000).

What is important is not how the states imagine it might have been in Trust Territory times, but what presently exists under the provisions of the Constitution, which the people of all four states ratified. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 431 (App. 2000).

Trust Territory statutes that mostly never took effect cannot be relied upon to interpret provisions of the FSM Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 432-33 (App. 2000).

A normal English language reading of the phrase "the revenues" in article IX, section 5's second sentence necessarily refers to those revenues mentioned in section 5's first sentence – national taxes. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

The Constitution delegates to the national government the power to impose only two types of taxes – that based on imports and that on income. Money collected through these forms of taxation are the revenues of which half must be paid into the treasury of the state where collected. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

A court can neither read into the Constitution nor rewrite the Constitution to contain a provision that is not there. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 436 (App. 2000).

In interpreting the Constitution, a court looks first to the language and words of the Constitution. When that language is plain and unambiguous, a court need not look any further. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 436 (App. 2000).

While our Constitution's wording is otherwise similar to that in article III, section 2, clause 1 of the U.S. Constitution, the FSM national courts have jurisdiction over "cases" and "disputes" while the U.S. federal courts have jurisdiction over "cases" and "controversies," but no significance can be attached to the difference between controversies and disputes. The FSM Constitution's case or dispute clause is thus similar to the U.S. Constitution's case or controversy clause. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

In the usual case, a court will not decide a question on a constitutional ground if it may be resolved on a statutory or other basis. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 579 (App. 2000).

When the tax exemption issue is implicitly a constitutional one because the statute, to the extent viewed as seeking to impose a state tax upon the national government, goes to the constitutional relationship between the state and national governments and when as between the exemption issue and the interstate commerce restriction issue, which is explicitly constitutional in character, the determination of one makes the other moot, and when if only the tax exemption issue were addressed it could resolve the dispute between the parties but would leave in place an injunction precluding all collection of the tax as unconstitutional, the court must decide the constitutional tax and commerce question in order to accord the appellant a meaningful remedy. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 579 (App. 2000).

When analyzing provisions of the FSM Constitution, a court must look first to the actual words of the Constitution. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 62 (Pon. 2001).

When a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 265 (Chk. 2001).

Because the FSM Declaration of Rights was modeled after the U.S. Bill of Rights, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting similar Declaration of Rights provisions, such as the right to confrontation. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 n.1 (Chk. 2002).

In resolving a constitutional question, first the court must look at plain meaning of words of the Constitution. If a particular provision is not clear, the court should attempt to ascertain the drafters' intent by looking at Constitutional Convention and the reasons expressed for including a particular provision in the Constitution. Finally, if there are constitutional provisions similar to provisions in other countries' constitutions, the court may look to other countries' case law for guidance, but is not bound. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 630 (Pon. 2002).

Where the framers of the FSM Constitution borrowed phrases from the United States Constitution for guidance, it may be presumed that those phrases were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the United States Supreme Court. Where the FSM Constitution's language has been borrowed from the United States Constitution, the court may look to leading United States cases for guidance in interpreting that language, especially where the meaning is not self-evident from the words themselves. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 26, 30 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The court must begin with the presumption that acts of Congress are constitutional. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

In interpreting a constitutional provision, a court must initially analyze the constitution's actual words. If those words are clear and permit only one possible result, then the court should go no further. But if a constitutional provision is not clear and does not permit only one possible result, a court should next consult the constitutional convention journal to ascertain the framers' intent in drafting the language. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 380-81 (App. 2003).

Since the words "involuntary servitude" are subject to various definitions, the constitutional provision is not clear and does not permit only one possible result. A court may consult the constitutional convention journal to ascertain the framers' intent in drafting this language. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 385 (App. 2003).

When the language in the FSM Constitution and the United States Constitution is similar, it is appropriate to look to interpretations by United States courts, especially those in existence at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention, as a guide to the intended meaning of the words employed in the Constitution. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 385 (App. 2003).

The search and seizure provision of the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights is similar to and drawn from a provision in the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights, and when a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 434 (Chk. 2003).

The similarities of the FSM and the U.S. Constitutions mandate that the FSM Supreme Court will give particular consideration to U.S. constitutional analysis at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention and the Constitution's adoption. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 434 (Chk. 2003).

Two old (1937 and 1924) cases that do not reflect U.S. constitutional analysis and practice at the time the FSM Constitution was drafted and adopted in the last half of the 1970's cannot be a basis for an FSM constitutional analysis of provisions adopted from and similar to a provision in the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights when those cases differ significantly from the constitutional analysis current in the 1970's. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

Statutes are presumed constitutional until challenged, and the burden is on the challenger to clearly demonstrate that a statute is unconstitutional. Parkinson v. Island Dev. Co., 11 FSM R. 451, 453 (Yap 2003).

Unnecessary constitutional adjudication is to be avoided. Parkinson v. Island Dev. Co., 11 FSM R. 451, 453 (Yap 2003).

When analyzing provisions of the FSM Constitution, a court must look first to the Constitution's actual words. When the words are clear and permit only one possible result, the court should go no further. After reviewing the Constitution's words, if the court finds that the words are not clear or do not permit only one possible result, the court should next consult is the Journal of the Constitutional Convention to ascertain the framers' intent in drafting that language. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 613 (Pon. 2003).

When there are no decisions by FSM courts which discuss which standard applies to conducting an investigatory stop of a vehicle, the court may look to the law of the United States for guidance. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

In the absence of Micronesian precedent, the FSM Supreme Court can and should consider the reasoning from the courts of other common law jurisdictions. When the FSM Constitution's language has been borrowed from the U.S. Constitution, the court may look to leading U.S. cases for guidance in interpreting that language, especially where the meaning is not self-evident from the words themselves; in particular, U.S. constitutional law at the time of adoption of the FSM Constitution can have special relevance in determining the meaning of similar constitutional language here. But in evaluating the reasoning of other courts, the court emphasizes that it must always independently consider the suitability of that reasoning for the FSM. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 325 (App. 2004).

In construing a provision of the Declaration of Rights, our courts should carefully evaluate the way that the United States Supreme Court has interpreted the United States Constitution because a phrase appearing in our Constitution that was borrowed from the United States Constitution may be presumed to have a similar interpretive meaning. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 327-28 (App. 2004).

It is appropriate to look to U.S. constitutional law and its courts' interpretations, especially those interpretations existing at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention, as a guide to the intended meaning and scope of the FSM Constitution's words (such as the speedy trial right) since the provisions in the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights are traceable to the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 409 (Chk. 2004).

When an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning, and where the FSM Constitution's framers borrowed phrases from the U.S. Constitution, it may be presumed that those phrases were intended to have the same meaning given them by the U.S. Supreme Court. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 409 (Chk. 2004).

The nation's laws are presumed to be constitutional. A fundamental principle of statutory interpretation is that where a statute can be read in two ways, one raising constitutional issues and the other interpreting the language as affecting matters clearly within Congress's constitutional reach, the latter interpretation should prevail so that the constitutional issue is avoided. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 572-73 (App. 2004).

Courts should, where possible, avoid selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt that statute's constitutionality. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 573 (App. 2004).

The final test in determining whether a statute is repealed by implication by a new constitutional provision is: Has the legislature, under the new constitutional provision, the present right to enact statutes substantially like the statutes in question? Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 574 (App. 2004).

In the important process of construing the nation's formative document, we must first pay heed to the language of the Constitution itself. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 586 (App. 2004).

When the Constitution's words themselves are not determinative of a question, the court may look to the Micronesian Constitutional Convention journal to locate any discussion about the provision in question. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 586 (App. 2004).

It is plain from the framers' discussions at the time of the Constitution's creation that in order to insure the judiciary's independence, there should be only one removal process for justices, and that that process should be the one specified in the Constitution. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 586 (App. 2004).

The court cannot amend the Constitution by reading into it language that does not appear in it. To do so would be to amend the Constitution by judicial fiat, a course of action not only plainly inimical to Article XIV, Section 1 of the Constitution, but one upon which the court is constitutionally forbidden from embarking. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 149-50 (App. 2005).

When our nation's highest court, the FSM Supreme Court appellate division, interprets a constitutional provision in a case before it, that interpretation is to be given full effect in all cases still open on direct review, and as to all events, regardless of when they occurred. Once it announces a new rule of law, the integrity of judicial review requires application of the new rule to all similar cases pending on review. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the funds garnished came from tax revenues already credited to the State of Chuuk and held by the FSM pending disbursement, and these are funds credited to the states in accordance with Title 54, Section 805, and are automatically paid into the state government treasury by statute and are simply held by the FSM national government, the state's argument that this money was not withdrawn from the national treasury "by law," is therefore incorrect. Chuuk v. Davis, 13 FSM R. 178, 184-85 (App. 2005).

The similarities of the FSM and the U.S. Constitutions mandate that the court give particular consideration to U.S. constitutional analysis at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention and of the Constitution's adoption. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 444-45 (Chk. 2005).

When there are no reported decisions by FSM courts which discuss whether a person, who has been stopped for suspected driving under the influence, must be provided his or her Miranda rights prior to the administration of field sobriety tests, the court may look to United States law for guidance. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Once a plaintiff's claim fails on its statutory grounds then the court should have considered either the plaintiff's common law ground or its constitutional grounds. On the general principle that constitutional adjudication should be avoided unless necessary, the trial court should first consider any non-constitutional grounds that might resolve the issue. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 25-26 (App. 2006).

The protection in article IV, section 5 of the FSM Constitution against unreasonable search and seizure is based upon and drawn from the comparable provision in the U.S. Constitution's fourth amendment. The addition of the phrase "invasion of privacy" to the FSM version was not intended to expand the search and seizure protections in the FSM any further. It was intended to more adequately express its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

When a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

When an FSM or Kosrae constitutional protection is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 (App. 2006).

U.S. authority may be consulted to understand the meaning of a Declaration of Rights provision patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision since the provisions in the Constitution's Declaration of Rights are traceable to the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights. Where the Constitution's framers drew upon the U.S. Constitution, it may be presumed that phrases so borrowed were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the U.S. Supreme Court. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

When the language in an FSM rule or law is nearly identical to a United States counterpart, the court may look to the courts of the United States for guidance in interpreting the rule or law and may look to court decisions from the United States to assist in the interpretation of the double jeopardy clause set forth in the Declaration of Rights in the FSM Constitution, as that clause was drawn from the Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

When no reported FSM case has dealt with alleged discrimination in an academic setting, the court may consider cases from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 76, 81 (Pon. 2007).

When the appellate court has not had previous occasion to consider the constitutionality of a DUI statute, the court may consider cases from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Phillip v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 116, 119 (App. 2007).

In determining the double jeopardy clause's scope and meaning the court first looks to the language of the Constitution itself. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 354 (Pon. 2007).

Where the FSM Constitution's language has been borrowed from the United States Constitution, the court may look to leading United States cases for guidance in interpreting that language, especially where the meaning is not self-evident from the words themselves. The Double Jeopardy Clause, like most provisions of the Declaration of Rights, was drawn from the United States Constitution's Bill of Rights. Thus, United States constitutional law at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention furnishes guidance as to the intended scope of the FSM Constitution's Double Jeopardy Clause. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 354 (Pon. 2007).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when the language in the FSM Constitution and the U.S. Constitution is similar or identical, it is appropriate to look to United States constitutional law and its courts's interpretations, especially those interpretations existing at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention, as a guide to the intended scope of the FSM Constitution's words. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 n.1 (Chk. 2008).

The FSM Constitution is based in great part on the U.S. Constitution, but there are significant differences between the two, and where such differences exist, they presumably represent a conscious effort by the framers to select a road other than that paved by the United States Constitution. In re Neron, 16 FSM R. 472, 474 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM Constitution's separation-of-powers structure is derived from that in the U.S. Constitution. The similarities of the FSM and the U.S. Constitutions mandate that the FSM Supreme Court will give particular consideration to U.S. constitutional analysis, especially at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention and of the Constitution's adoption. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 n.1 (Pon. 2009).

When an FSM or Kosrae constitutional protection, such as the FSM or Kosrae double jeopardy protection, is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Kosrae v. Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 1, 4 n.2 (App. 2010).

Although it may look to U.S. constitutional decisions for guidance, the FSM Supreme Court may not simply accept the U.S. court interpretations, but must instead independently consider whether U.S. court rulings are appropriate for application within the FSM. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 423 (Pon. 2011).

Because the FSM Supreme Court has previously looked to the principles underlying the U.S. Constitution's Fourth Amendment when analyzing the requirements necessary to establish consent sufficient to justify a warrantless search in the FSM, the court may engage in that analysis again. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 423 (Pon. 2011).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' cases, when an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning since it may be presumed that the borrowed phrases were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the U.S. Supreme Court. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 n.2 (Chk. 2012).

In resolving a Constitutional question, the Chuuk State Supreme Court must first look at plain meaning of the Constitution's words. If the Constitution is not clear as to a particular provision, the court should attempt to ascertain the drafters' intent by looking at Constitutional Convention and the reasons expressed for including a particular provision in the Constitution. Finally, if there are provisions in the FSM Constitution similar to provisions in other countries' constitutions, the court may look to case law of other countries for guidance, but is not bound. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When it is an issue of first impression, U.S. court decisions may be used for guidance. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The FSM Supreme Court's subject-matter jurisdiction cannot be determined by reference to the Constitution's detailed command to the Public Auditor about the breadth and depth of the tasks that the Public Auditor must undertake. The exclusive jurisdiction that the FSM Supreme Court exercises when the national government is a party cannot be avoided, and was never meant to be avoided, by the mere device of naming a branch, or a department, or an agency, or a statutory authority of the national government as a party instead of naming the national government itself as a party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 614 (Pon. 2013).

While the court must first look to FSM sources of law to rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when a FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision and when there is no FSM case law on point, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 n.1 (Chk. 2014).

A constitutional provision that requires things to be done without prescribing the result that will follow if those things are not done is directory in character. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 25 (App. 2015).

Article XII, Section 3(b)'s specific language merely signifies those entities which come within the penumbra of duties/responsibilities incumbent upon the Office of the Public Auditor. By the use of the phrase "every branch . . . of the national government," it is readily apparent the framers were listing a series of entities that would come within the ambit of the Office of the Public Auditor's duties and responsibilities. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 514 (App. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court's exclusive jurisdiction over cases in which the national government is a party is not paralleled in the United States, and such differences presumably reflect a conscious effort by the framers to select a road other than that paved by the United States Constitution. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 (App. 2016).

A constitutional provision cannot be unconstitutional under the constitution it is a part of. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Since unnecessary constitutional adjudication is to be avoided, if a matter may properly be resolved on a statutory basis without reaching potential constitutional issues, then the court should do so. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 559 (Pon. 2016).

The general principle is that constitutional adjudication should be avoided unless necessary, so the trial court should first consider any non-constitutional grounds that might resolve the issue. Chuuk v. Weno Municipality, 20 FSM R. 582, 584 (Chk. 2016).

If a matter may properly be resolved without reaching potential constitutional issues, then the court should do so, since unnecessary constitutional adjudication is to be avoided. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 93 (App. 2016).

When the language of the FSM Constitution has been borrowed from the U.S. Constitution, the court may look to leading U.S. cases for guidance in interpreting that language, especially where the meaning is not self-evident from the words themselves; in particular, U.S. constitutional law at the time of adoption of the FSM Constitution can have special relevance in determining the meaning of similar constitutional language here. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 365 n.10 (App. 2017).

The FSM Constitution's due process clause is derived from the U.S. Constitution and thus U.S. cases may be consulted for guidance in interpretation, emphasizing those cases in effect at the times of the FSM Constitution's framing (1975) and the ratification (1978). Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 n.1 (App. 2018).

Constitutional adjudication should be avoided unless necessary. The trial court should first consider any non-constitutional grounds that might resolve the issue. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 328 (Pon. 2019).

The court will not address the plaintiff's claims that the defendants directly violated three FSM Constitution provisions when the only necessary Constitutional inquiry is whether the national government exercised its power appropriately when it enacted a particular statute because, when the court concluded that that statute was lawfully enacted, the plaintiff's claim that the defendants violated a national statute was sufficient to resolve the parties' dispute. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 328-29 (Pon. 2019).

In rendering a decision, the court must first consult and apply FSM legal sources. In resolving a Constitutional question, first the court must look at the plain meaning of the Constitution's words. If the Constitution is not clear as to a particular provision, the court should ascertain the drafters' intent by examining the Constitutional Convention's records and the reasons expressed for including that particular Constitutional provision. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 331 (Pon. 2019).

A constitutional provision that requires things to be done without prescribing the result that will follow if those things are not done is directory in character. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480 (Pon. 2020).

– Interpretation – Whether Self-Executing

Jurisdictional grants of power to the national courts in Article XI, § 6 appear to be self-executing, calling for no action by Congress. Since most U.S. Constitution jurisdictional provisions are not self-executing, determinations of U.S. courts' jurisdiction are typically based on statutory construction rather than constitutional interpretation, as in the FSM. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 n.5 (App. 2016).

In light of the self-executing grants of jurisdiction embodied within the FSM Constitution, the United States decisions, which address the underlying congressional intent, provide little guidance, in terms of analysis of the Article XI, Section 6(b) "arising under" language, against the backdrop of a constitutional provision. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 (App. 2016).

Article III, sections 1 and 2 of the FSM Constitution are self-executing and do not contemplate, or imply the need for, court action to confirm citizenship where no challenge exists. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 475 (Chk. 2018).

A constitutional provision is self-executing when no legislation is required to bring it into effect and when there is no indication that legislation is contemplated in order to render it operative. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 475 (Chk. 2018).

Constitutional provisions are self-executing if they supply a sufficient rule for their implementation, or when there is a manifest intention that they should go into immediate effect, and no ancillary legislation is necessary to the enjoyment of a right given, or the enforcement of a duty imposed. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 475 (Chk. 2018).

While a self-executing provision does not require any legislation to render it operative, minor details may be left for the legislature without impairing the constitutional provision's self-executing nature. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 475 (Chk. 2018).

That a right granted, or duty imposed, by a constitutional provision may be better or further protected by supplementary legislation does not of itself prevent that provision from being self-executing. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 475-76 (Chk. 2018).

A constitutional provision's self-executing character does not necessarily preclude legislation for the better protection of the right secured or legislation in furtherance of the provision's purposes, or of its enforcement. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 476 (Chk. 2018).

Constitutional provisions are not self-executing if they merely indicate a line of policy or principle, without supplying the means by which such policy or principles are to be carried into effect, or if the language of the constitution is directed to the legislature, or if it appears from the language used and the circumstances of its adoption that subsequent legislation was contemplated to carry it into effect. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 476 (Chk. 2018).

Whether a constitutional provision is self-executing is ultimately a question of the intention of the constitution's framers, and, in order to determine the intent, the general rule is that courts will consider the language used, the objects to be accomplished by the provision, and the surrounding circumstances. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 476 (Chk. 2018).

Constitutional provisions are presumed to be self-executing and are construed as such, rather than as requiring further legislation, unless the contrary clearly appears. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21

A constitutional provision is self-executing insofar as it is susceptible of execution without supplemental legislation. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 476 (Chk. 2018).

Where a constitution asserts a certain right, or lays down a certain principle of law or procedure, it speaks for the entire people as their supreme law, and is full authority for all that is done in pursuance of its provision. In short, if complete in itself, it executes itself. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 476 (Chk. 2018).

Supplemental legislation, and any lack of regulations promulgated thereunder, cannot supplant the FSM Constitution's clear mandate. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 476 (Chk. 2018).

Article III, section 3 of the FSM Constitution is self-executing in that it can be given effect without the aid of legislation and there is nothing to indicate that legislation is intended to make it operative. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 21 FSM R. 468, 476-77 (Chk. 2018).

Not all constitutional provisions are self-executing. A constitutional provision is self-executing when no legislation is required to bring it into effect and when there is no indication that legislation is contemplated in order to render it operative. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480 (Pon. 2020).

– Involuntary Servitude

Slavery and involuntary servitude are prohibited except to punish crime. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 384 (App. 2003).

While the Constitution's prohibition of slavery and involuntary servitude may have had its source in the Trust Territory Bill of Rights and the U.S. Constitution, it has particular meaning within the FSM's historical context of forced labor by former foreign administering authorities. Some still-living citizens of this nation have experienced firsthand the evils of slavery and involuntary servitude, and the constitutional provision was meant to ban those types of atrocities forever. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 384 (App. 2003).

Since the words "involuntary servitude" are subject to various definitions, the constitutional provision is not clear and does not permit only one possible result. A court may consult the constitutional convention journal to ascertain the framers' intent in drafting this language. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 385 (App. 2003).

The determination of what constitutes 'involuntary servitude' or what is regarded as "badges of slavery" is to be made in the context of well established Micronesian customs. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 385 (App. 2003).

Absent a violation of a criminal statute, the court cannot compel a person to labor for the liquidation of a debt to another with the threat of punishment for failure to perform. Involuntary servitude thus has been held to encompass peonage, where a person is bound to the service of a particular employer until an obligation to that person is satisfied. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 385 (App. 2003).

When a person claiming involuntary servitude is simply expected to seek and accept employment, if available, and is free to choose the type of employment and employer, and is also free to resign that employment if conditions are unsatisfactory or to accept other employment, none of the aspects of "involuntary servitude" are present. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 385 (App. 2003).

While the trial court does not violate the Constitution's involuntary servitude provision when it orders a judgment-debtor to seek immediate employment, when the judgment-debtor has presented evidence that he is unable to work, the trial court must make specific findings with regard to his fitness for work before it orders him to seek immediate employment. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 386 (App. 2003).

"Practices similar to slavery" include forced marriage, and a victim's repeated sexual exploitation by the same person is something akin to a "forced marriage" without the status of being a spouse. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. 2017).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 612, "exploitation" includes slavery and practices similar to slavery, and practices similar to slavery include debt bondage, serfdom, and forced marriage. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 331, 333 (Chk. 2017).

Since, under the constitutional provision barring slavery, Congress clearly has the authority to legislate in the area of human trafficking, the FSM Supreme Court has subject matter jurisdiction over a criminal case whose charges are all under the Trafficking in Persons Act and allege exploitation. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 331, 333 (Chk. 2017).

– Judicial Guidance Clause

The FSM Supreme Court must remain sensitive to the unique circumstances of the Federated States of Micronesia and may not slavishly follow interpretations of similar language by United States, Trust Territory, or other tribunals in different contexts. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 69 n.11 (Kos. 1982).

The FSM Constitution is the supreme law and the decisions of the FSM Supreme Court must be consistent with it. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 176-77 (Truk 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court can and should consider decisions and reasoning of courts in the United States and other jurisdictions, including the Trust Territory courts, in arriving at its own decisions. It is not, however, bound by those decisions and must not fall into the error of adopting the reasoning of those decisions without independently considering suitability of that reasoning for the Federated States of Micronesia. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 212-13 (App. 1982).

1 F.S.M.C. 203, with its sweeping mandate that the Restatements and other common law rules as applied in the United States be the "rules of decision," would lure the courts in a direction other than that illuminated by the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Provisions, FSM Const. art. XI, § 11, which identifies as the guiding star, not the Restatement or decisions of United States courts concerning common law, but the fundamental principle that decisions must be "consistent" with the "Constitution, Micronesian custom and tradition, and the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia." Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 14 (Pon. 1985).

Under the FSM Constitution's Judicial Guidance Provision, FSM Const. art. XI, § 11, FSM Supreme Court decisions are to be consistent with the "social and geographical configuration of Micronesia." Ray v. Electrical Contracting Corp., 2 FSM R. 21, 26 (App. 1985).

The Constitution's judicial guidance clause cautions against simply adopting previous interpretations of other jurisdictions without careful analysis of its application to the circumstances of the Federated States of Micronesia. Luda v. Maeda Road Constr. Co., 2 FSM R. 107, 112 (Pon. 1985).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for this court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. Review of decisions of courts of the United States, and any other jurisdictions, must proceed however against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 142 (Pon. 1985).

A message of the judicial guidance clause is that a court, when interpreting a contract, may not simply assume that reasonably intelligent Micronesians will perceive the same meaning as would reasonably intelligent Americans. Courts may not blind themselves to the pertinent aspects of Micronesian society, such as less facility in the English language, less exposure to business concepts, and paucity of legal resources, which might cause a reasonably intelligent Micronesian to perceive a meaning differently than would a person from some other nation. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 149 (Pon. 1985).

The judicial guidance clause, FSM Const. art. XI, § 11, is intended to insure, among other things, that this court will not simply accept decisions of the Trust Territory High Court without independent analysis. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 478 (Pon. 1988).

The judicial guidance clause prohibits a sentencing court from giving special effect to customary beatings administered to the defendant, unless the court finds that such recognition would be consistent with the protections guaranteed to individuals by the Declaration of Rights. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 284 (App. 1990).

The judicial guidance clause implies a requirement that courts consult the values of the people in finding principles of law for this new nation, and the fact that all state legislatures in the Federated States of Micronesia, and the Congress, have enacted Judiciary Acts adopting the Code of Judicial Conduct as the standard for judicial officials and authorizing departures from those standards only to impose tighter standards, suggests that courts should rely heavily on those standards in locating minimal due process protections against biased decision-making in judicial proceedings within the Federated States of Micronesia. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 38-39 (App. 1991).

The judicial guidance clause, article XI, section 11 of the Constitution, requires that in searching for legal principles to serve the Federated States of Micronesia, courts must first look to sources of law and circumstances here within the Federated States of Micronesia rather than begin with a review of cases decided by other courts. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 38 (App. 1991).

State and national legislation may be useful as a means of ascertaining Micronesian values in rendering decisions pursuant to the judicial guidance clause, particularly when more than one legislative body in the FSM has independently adopted similar law. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 361 (Kos. 1992).

Article XI, section 11 of the FSM Constitution mandates that the court look first to Micronesian sources of law – which includes the FSM Code and rules of the court – in reaching decisions. Alfons v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 402, 404-05 (App. 1992).

Extradition is founded upon treaties between sovereign nations involving mutual agreements and commitments. There is no counterpart in Micronesia custom and tradition that is applicable. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 23, 25 (App. 1993).

Determining the relevancy of custom in carrying out the mandate of article XI, section 11 of the FSM Constitution must proceed on a case-by-case basis. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 132 (App. 1993).

Where entitlement to customary relief has been proven and the means to execute such a remedy are within the trial court's authority and discretion, the trial court should as a matter of equity and constitutional duty grant the relief. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1993).

FSM courts must consider customary law where relevant to a decision, but it is not error for a court to consider custom and find that it is not relevant to its decision because a Certificate of Title had been issued for the land. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 50 (App. 1995).

A court must consult and apply sources of law in the FSM prior to rendering a decision, and would resort to local customary law before considering the common law of other nations. Ladore v. U Corp., 7 FSM R. 296, 299 (Pon. 1995).

The Judicial Guidance Clause requires that courts utilize the following analytic method. First, if a constitutional provision bears upon an issue, that provision will prevail over any other source of law. Second, any applicable Micronesian custom or tradition must be considered, and the court's decision must be consistent therewith. If there is no directly applicable constitutional provision, or custom or tradition, or if these sources are insufficient to resolve all issues in the case, then the court may look to the law of other nations. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 377 (Pon. 1998).

Certain issues are not of a local or traditional nature, and not amenable to determination based upon custom and tradition, such as issues related to business ventures in the FSM by non-citizens, foreign shipping agreements, and international extradition. Fishing fees derived from commercial fishing contracts, and collected primarily from foreign companies pursuant to agreements negotiated by the MMA are transactions and behaviors that are also distinctly non-customary and non-local. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 377 (Pon. 1998).

The FSM Constitution requires court decisions be consistent with Micronesian customs and traditions, and provides that the FSM Congress may enact statutes to protect the traditions of the people of the FSM. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

The Constitution admonishes that court decisions are to be consistent with the "social and geographical configuration of Micronesia," and a cause of action for loss of parental consortium is consistent with this admonition in that it acknowledges the important role played by the family in the many distinct cultures of Micronesia. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 253 (Pon. 2001).

When the court looks to common law sources in considering the nature of the legislative privilege enjoyed by members of the Pohnpei Legislature, it is mindful of Article XI, section 11 of the FSM Constitution, which requires that FSM Supreme Court decisions be consistent with the Constitution, Micronesian customs and traditions, and the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 423 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court can and should consider decisions and reasoning of United States courts and other jurisdictions in arriving at its own decisions. It is not, however, bound by those decisions and must not fall into the error of adopting reasoning of those decisions without independently considering suitability of that reasoning for the FSM. Panuelo v. Amayo, 10 FSM R. 558, 563 (App. 2002).

The judicial guidance clause requires that, in searching for legal principles to serve the FSM, courts must first look to sources of law and circumstances here within the FSM rather than begin with a review of cases decided by other courts. Panuelo v. Amayo, 10 FSM R. 558, 563 (App. 2002).

When the economic disparity between the indigent losing plaintiff and the successful defendants could not be more stark and when the plaintiff pursued his case in good faith and it was not frivolous, the defendants' motion to tax costs must be denied and no costs allowed. This result is consistent with the social configuration of Micronesia, as mandated by the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 323 (Pon. 2003).

Under FSM constitutional jurisprudence, a person has no right, with some possible narrow exception, to resist a court-issued search warrant even if that search warrant turns out to be invalid. A person's remedies for being subjected to a search with an invalid search warrant are the suppression of any evidence seized, and, in the proper case, a civil suit for damages. The self-help of resistance is not a remedy and because of the Micronesian customary preference for the peaceful resolution of disputes, this conclusion is consistent not only with the FSM Constitution, but also with the social configuration of Micronesia as is required by the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436-37 (Chk. 2003).

This court is mandated by Article XI, Section 11 of the Constitution to first consult and apply sources from within the FSM. The overall goal is to develop principles of standing which are consistent with the Constitution's language and designed to meet the needs of the nation's people and institutions. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 496-97 (Kos. 2003).

The FSM Constitution requires that court decisions be consistent with the Constitution, Micronesian customs and traditions, and the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 613 (Pon. 2003).

Because the court is required to make decisions consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration and because the FSM is a large country in terms of geographical distances, but has a small land base, a small population, and limited resources with a small government legal office and few other lawyers available, the court thus should not order the government to go outside its Department of Justice for a prosecutor unless it is absolutely necessary. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 180 (Chk. 2003).

The FSM Supreme Court is ever mindful of the constitutional admonition that court decisions shall be consistent with the FSM Constitution, Micronesian custom and traditions, and Micronesia's social and geographical configuration and that in rendering a decision, a court shall consult and apply sources of the Federated States of Micronesia, and that the Kosrae Constitution also provides that court decisions shall be consistent with that constitution, state traditions and customs, and the state's social and geographical configuration. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 325 (App. 2004).

When the project control document did not say otherwise, the community halls contemplated by the Uman Social Project project control document are the customary and traditional community hall (an wuut or uut) found in Uman (and throughout the Southern Namoneas and Chuuk Lagoon) because this is the meaning of the term community hall (wuut or uut) as understood by the defendants, who are all from the Southern Namoneas and because is this is not only the only logical conclusion to draw under the circumstances, this result is mandated by the Judicial Guidance Clause, which requires all judicial decisions to be consistent with custom and tradition. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 481 (Chk. 2004).

Since court decisions are constitutionally required to be consistent with the geographical configuration of Micronesia, which includes the relative isolation of various outer island communities, a fifteen-day delay caused by the inability of a mayor from an outer island with no air service to Chuuk Lagoon to travel to the Lagoon to sign legal papers will be considered excusable neglect. Fan Kay Man v. Fananu Mun. Gov't, 12 FSM R. 492, 495-96 (Chk. 2004).

As required by the FSM Constitution, in rendering a decision, a court must consult and apply sources of the Federated States of Micronesia, but where appropriate, the FSM Supreme Court can and should consider decisions and reasoning of United States courts and other jurisdictions in arriving at its own decisions. Because there is very little FSM law governing the enforcement of national civil rights judgments against the states, the court will look to case law of the United States for guidance, as civil rights protections in the United States and FSM are similar. Chuuk v. Davis, 13 FSM R. 178, 185-86 (App. 2005).

The court is required to make decisions consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration. While the FSM is a country of large geographical distances, it has a small land base, a small population, and limited resources. Likewise, it has a small government legal office and few other lawyers available. The court, consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration, thus should not order the government to go outside its Department of Justice for a prosecutor unless it is absolutely necessary. The disqualification of all lawyers in a government office when one of them is disqualified is a question within the trial court's discretion. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 440 (Chk. 2005).

The court must make its decisions consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration. While the FSM is a nation of large geographical distances, it has a small land base, a small population, and limited resources. It also has a small government legal office and few other lawyers available. The court, consistent with the FSM's social and geographical configuration, thus should not order the government to go outside its Department of Justice for a prosecutor unless it is absolutely necessary. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. 2006).

The Kosrae State Court recognizes the universal importance of marriage in our societies; the social and geographical configuration of Kosrae; and the importance of family relationships in our communities and of the building of new family relationships through marriages. Sigrah v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 295, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a class action has vindicated rights that benefit a large number of people; when these rights required private enforcement since the State of Yap was not in the position to vindicate the private rights of the people of Rull and Gilman; when, considering Yapese society's heavy reliance on the inner lagoon's marine resources, the rights enforced were of great societal importance; and when Yapese society's dependence on the resources of the shoreline, inner reefs, and mangrove stands is a salient feature of Yap's social and geographical configuration; the use of the private attorney general theory conforms to the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause that court decisions are to be consistent with the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 421 (Yap 2006).

U.S. courts' common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the FSM. The FSM Constitution's judicial guidance clause requires that the court's review of U.S. courts' decisions proceed against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture, but where the business activities which gave rise to the lawsuit are not of a local or traditional nature, and the work setting and the work itself are of a markedly non-local, international character, the court need not conduct an intense search for applicable customary laws and traditional rules when none have been brought to its attention by the parties and none are apparent. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 430 n.1 (Yap 2006).

Customary business practice is distinguished from customary law, that is, from the "custom and tradition" enshrined in the Constitution. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 487, 489 (Pon. 2006).

The court is bound by Article XI, Section 11, but when the respondent attorney has not pointed to any custom or tradition that either excuses his actions or provides the extraordinary circumstances necessary to prevent the court from suspending him and when he has been convicted of four felony violations of the Financial Management Act and an element of each of those crimes is that a government official act knowingly and willingly, there is conclusive evidence before the court (Disciplinary Rule 10(b) states that a final conviction is conclusive evidence of the crime) that the respondent attorney acted dishonestly and fraudulently since the legislature has decided that the actions taken by respondent attorney are bad, immoral, and unethical since they are crimes punishable by up to twenty years imprisonment. In re Fritz, 14 R. 563, 565 (Pon. 2007).

The court will give no weight to a contention that there was no contingent fee agreement in place because the fee agreement states that the clients are the Municipalities of Rull and Gilman and the plaintiff class is composed of Rull and Gilman residents when neither municipality is a corporate body or has an established municipal government and these municipalities exist as social constructs and when the court's decisions must conform to Micronesia's social configuration. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 64 n.3 (Yap 2007).

Decisions of the FSM Supreme Court must be consistent with Micronesian customs and traditions. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2009).

The FSM Supreme Court may consider decisions and reasoning of U.S. courts and other jurisdictions in arriving at its decisions. It is not, however, bound by those decisions and must not fall into the error of adopting reasoning of those decisions without independently considering the suitability of that reasoning for the FSM. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 449 n.3 (App. 2011).

The court can take judicial notice that the social configuration of the outer islands in the State of Yap differs significantly from the Yap main island (even the vernacular language is significantly different) since it is a fact not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is generally known within the trial court's territorial jurisdiction and since the court's decisions are required to be consistent with the social and geographic configuration of Micronesia. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 262, 267 (Yap 2012).

The FSM Constitution's judicial guidance clause requires that the court's review of U.S. courts' decisions proceed against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture, but when the business activities which give rise to the lawsuit are not of a local or traditional nature, and the work setting and the work itself are of a markedly non-local, international character, the court need not conduct an intense search for applicable customary laws and traditional rules when the parties have brought none to its attention and none are apparent. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 526 (Pon. 2013).

The FSM Constitution's judicial guidance clause requires that the court's review of U.S. courts' decisions proceed against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture, but when the business activities which give rise to the lawsuit are not of a local or traditional nature, and the work setting and the work itself are of a markedly non-local, international character, the court need not conduct an intense search for applicable customary laws and traditional rules when none have been brought to its attention by the parties and none are apparent. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 357 (Pon. 2014).

Since the FSM Constitution requires that court decisions be consistent with the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia; since the geographical configuration of Micronesia is such that its population is scattered amongst numerous islands, and transportation between the distant islands of the FSM can be expensive, time consuming and unreliable, and since travel to and from the United States can be especially expensive and time consuming due to the vast distances involved and one commercial airline carrier's monopoly over transportation in the FSM, the FSM's unique geographical configuration generates a public policy impetus in favor of remote testimony by Skype that is lacking in the United States. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 48-49 (Pon. 2015).

The Judicial Guidance Clause's first command is that the court's decisions be consistent with the Constitution itself. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

When deciding a question of standing, the FSM Supreme Court utilizes a case-specific analysis and as mandated by Article XI, Section 11 of the FSM Constitution, the court will first consult and apply sources from within the FSM. The overall goal is to develop principles of standing which are consistent with the Constitution's language and designed to meet the needs of our nation's people and institutions. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 640 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court is indisputably charged with the duty of considering customary law when relevant to a decision since the constitutional government works not to override custom, but to work in cooperation with the traditional system in an atmosphere of mutual respect. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

Under the FSM Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause, the FSM Supreme Court's decisions must be consistent with, inter alia, Micronesian customs and traditions. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 643 (Pon. 2016).

Although the court is mandated to first consult and apply sources from within the FSM, it is appropriate to look to United States case law for guidance on a complex standing issue, while proceeding against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian law, society, and culture. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 645 n.4 (Pon. 2016).

Although it must look first to FSM sources of law, when an FSM court has not previously construed an aspect of an FSM civil procedure rule that is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 662, 664 n.3 (Pon. 2018).

In rendering a decision, the court must first consult and apply FSM legal sources. In resolving a Constitutional question, first the court must look at the plain meaning of the Constitution's words. If the Constitution is not clear as to a particular provision, the court should ascertain the drafters' intent by examining the Constitutional Convention's records and the reasons expressed for including that particular Constitutional provision. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 331 (Pon. 2019).

– Kosrae

Article VI, section 9 of the Kosrae State Constitution provides no basis for assuming that sovereign immunity is inherent in the Kosrae State Constitution because sovereign immunity was a creation of Trust Territory common law. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 537, 541 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

In fiscal matters, the court must hear constitutional objections in order to save the state an expenditure of funds that may be unconstitutional. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 335 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The Kosrae Constitution empowers the state government to collect both tax and non-tax revenue, but that only the tax revenue must be shared with the municipality in which the funds are collected. Tafunsak v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 344, 347 (App. 1995).

Under the Kosrae Constitution tax revenue must be shared with the municipalities, and what constitutes non-tax, public money revenue need not be shared. A fee paid for use of airport facilities is non-tax public money. This follows a pattern widely recognized elsewhere of a distinction between taxes and user fees. Tafunsak v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 344, 348-49 (App. 1995).

Compensation of Kosrae State Court justices is prescribed by law. Compensation may not be increased or decreased during their terms of office, except by general law applying to all state government employees. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Governor and Lieutenant Governor receive annual salaries as prescribed by law. The salaries may not be increased or decreased for their terms of office except by general law applying to all state government employees. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 350 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Senators receive compensation as prescribed by law. No law increasing compensation may take effect until the end of the term of office for which the Senators voting thereon were elected. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 350 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The phrase, "as prescribed by law," describes how the salaries of the senators; governor and lieutenant governor; and state court justices will be set in the first instance. Any subsequent increase or decrease as to the executive or judiciary will be by statute applicable to all state government employees; with respect to senators, any subsequent increase will occur by statute which becomes effective during a future term of office. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 350 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The phrase "all State Government employees" as it appears in article VI, section 5, means those employees whose salaries are "prescribed by law." Only those employees whose salaries are set in the first place by statute are the employees to whom subsequent statutory reductions should apply. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Although the Kosrae Constitution contains no impairment of contracts clause, it is not silent in this area. The Kosrae Transition Clause provides that contracts continue unaffected. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The phrase "all State Government employees" means employees whose compensation is determined by statute, and does not include those employees who have individual contracts with Kosrae. Therefore a state law reducing state public service system employees' pay can constitutionally be applied to a Kosrae State Court justice's pay. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Kosrae Constitution provides that the state government protect the state's traditions as the public interest may require. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 165 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Since the normal sense or definition of the word "term" does not include term limits, the phrase "for the same term," in Article V, section 6 applies only to the Lieutenant Governor's four year term of office. It does not include any limitation on the number of consecutive terms of office that a person may serve as Lieutenant Governor. The term limits imposed on the Governor thus do not apply to the Lieutenant Governor. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 162, 164 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae Constitution requires court decisions to be consistent with state traditions and customs, and the state's social and geographical configuration. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 183 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The requirements that a person's driver's license be in the immediate possession of the operator, and that the operator display his license to a police officer upon demand do not violate the Kosrae Constitution. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 257 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae Constitution provides for the fundamental right of freedom of expression, and also permits denial or impairment of that fundamental right by a statute which protects tradition. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 390 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Kosrae Constitution permits certain conveyances of land to be subject to conditions. Article II, Section 3 provides that any conveyance of land from a parent or parents to a child or children, may be subject to such conditions as the parent or parents deem appropriate, provided, that such conditions are in writing at the time of conveyance and duly reflected in the certificate of title. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 546 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Article II of the Kosrae Constitution provides for the constitutional rights of the people of Kosrae and also guarantees the right to be confronted by accusers. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Kosrae – Case

A difference of opinion between parties is not in and of itself a sufficient basis on which the Kosrae State Court may assume jurisdiction over a dispute. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 670 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae State Court has original jurisdiction in all cases, except cases within the exclusive and original jurisdiction of inferior courts. "Case" means a justiciable controversy, which is another way of saying that it must be suitable for determination by a court. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10

FSM R. 668, 670 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A court will not pass on questions that are abstract, moot, academic, or hypothetical. The constitutionality of yet-to-be-enacted legislation presents a hypothetical question that is not justiciable. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 670 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Because duly enacted laws are presumed constitutional in the first instance, confirmation through a suit for declaratory relief of what is already presumed is not a fruitful exercise when there is no certainty that such a declaration would alter the parties' legal interests. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 671 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

– Kosrae – Case – Standing

Standing exists where a putative plaintiff has a sufficient stake or interest in a justiciable controversy so that he may obtain judicial resolution of that dispute. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 671 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A public official who is called upon to perform a legally required duty which he concludes is violative of the constitution has standing to ask a court to declare the statute unconstitutional. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 671 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the Legislature could very well exercise its legislative prerogative to decline to enact the proposed legislation irrespective of any declaration by the court of the constitutionality of the proposed legislation, Kosrae does not have a stake or interest that is amenable to judicial resolution. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 671 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

To have standing, a plaintiff must show that he personally has suffered some actual or threatened injury as result of the defendant's putatively illegal conduct. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 671 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

To the extent that an alleged salary loss constitutes a stake or interest that is subject to judicial resolution, it belongs to the specified officials, and not to Kosrae. Kosrae v. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature, 10 FSM R. 668, 672 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

– Kosrae – Due Process

Written notice in a letter giving a limited-term employee three days notice of the reasons for his two week suspension from work is sufficient compliance with the requirement of 61 TTC 10(15)(a), which provides that a suspended employee must receive notice of the reasons for suspension, and is also sufficient compliance with the notice requirements of due process under the Kosrae Constitution. Taulung v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 277, 279 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

To be property protected under the Kosrae State Constitution, the employment right must be supported by more than merely the employee's own personal hope. There must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Taulung v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 277, 280 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The Kosrae Executive Appeals Board is authorized to subpoena witnesses, and may do so on its own motion, over the protest of a party. For the Board to question such a witness in absence of a party to the hearing, when the party had notice but elected to walk out of the proceeding to seek a writ of prohibition, is not violative of due process. Palik v. Executive Serv. Appeals Bd., 4 FSM R. 287, 290 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

To be property protected under the Federated States of Micronesia and Kosrae State Constitutions, the employment right must be based on governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons as stated in statute, regulation, formal contract or actions of a supervisory person with authority to establish terms of employment. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 302 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Plaintiff's due process rights were not violated where the government did not use condemnation procedures specified in 67 TTC 451, but followed land registration procedures to obtain title and treated the plaintiff fairly and in the same way it treated other landowners. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 152-54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

When a panel hearing in a summary dismissal was closed to the public and the injured party and counsel were present to attend and participate in the hearing and the panel accepted and considered all testimony and evidence offered by the parties, due process was not violated. Palsis v. Kosrae State Court, 5 FSM R. 214, 217 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The wording of the Due Process Clause of the Kosrae State Constitution is identical to the wording of the Due Process Clause of the FSM Constitution. Therefore the court will treat the clauses as identical in meaning and in scope. Alik v. Kosrae Hotel Corp., 5 FSM R. 294, 297 (Kos. 1992).

The wording of the due process clause of the Kosrae Constitution is the same as that of the FSM Constitution, and are equivalent in terms of scope and meaning, and, in turn, because the FSM Declaration of Rights, which contains the due process clause, is patterned after provisions of the United States Constitution, and United States cases were relied on to guide the Constitutional Convention, United States authority may be consulted to understand the meaning of these rights. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 349 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A summary order of contempt for non-appearance violates an accused's right to due process under the Kosrae Constitution. Accordingly, on appeal the conviction will be vacated and remanded. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 426 (App. 1998).

State employees are entitled to recover the base salary that they would have received during the periods of time that they were placed on leave without pay because the state's imposition of a "lay off" and leave without pay violated the employees' right to continued employment under the Kosrae Constitution and the Kosrae State Code. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 436 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A person may not be deprived of property without due process of law. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

To be property protected under the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions, the employment right must be based on governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. A person who has been hired under an employment contract, for a specific length of time, with no provisions for renewal of the contract and no entitlement for renewal of the contract, does not have a property interest in his continued employment and is not entitled to a hearing before termination. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Due process requires that the parties be given the opportunity to comment upon evidence. Ittu v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 10 FSM R. 446, 448 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a party was not given an opportunity to comment or rebut the evidence presented by the adverse claimants at the formal Land Commission hearing, and was not given an opportunity to cross examine adverse witnesses or an opportunity to present his own testimony to rebut adverse claims, this procedural failure is a violation of the due process protection provided by the Kosrae Constitution; and the issued determination of ownership will be set aside, and held null and void and the matter remanded to the Land Commission. Ittu v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 10 FSM R. 446, 448 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the Senior Land Commissioner failed to disqualify himself after the parcel was recorded for adjudication, took part in the hearing and consideration of the parcel by appointing the two pro-tempore members of the registration team, and failed to disqualify himself from the matter until after the two Associate Land Commissioners had concurred on the findings and decision, awarding ownership of the parcel to his family, his actions violated Kosrae State Code, Section 11.602 and the due process protection provided by the Kosrae Constitution. Langu v. Heirs of Jonas, 10 FSM R. 547, 549 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The wording of the due process provisions in both the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions are identical. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 665 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The due process requirements applicable to employment that is a property interest are: to be property protected under the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions, the employment rights must be based on governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons as stated in statute, regulations, formal contract or actions of a supervisory person with authority to establish terms of employment. Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 666 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Since the Kosrae State Court has not been shy in vacating and remanding Land Commission decisions for due process violations, including involvement of commissioners who should have disqualified themselves, Kosrae's social configuration should not prevent an appellant from timely raising the issue of disqualification of persons in the Land Commission proceedings. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 285 (App. 2003).

Adjudicatory decisions affecting property rights, such as ownership, are subject to due process requirements of the state constitution. Due process demands impartiality on the part of the adjudicators, including a Land Court Presiding Justice. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Since a judge must disqualify himself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, when the presiding justice's failure to recuse himself from the proceeding resulted in a violation of the appellant's due process rights, the decision determining ownership must be vacated and the matter remanded for further proceedings. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 417 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The FSM Constitution's due process provision protects persons from governments, and those acting under them, and does not create causes of action against private parties. The Kosrae Constitution due process provision functions in the same manner. A party alleging a due process violation has the burden of showing that the defendant is a state actor and that the conduct in question was a state action. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the defendants are individuals and private parties; and not governments and the plaintiff has failed to show that the defendants are state actors and that the conduct in question was a state action, the plaintiff has failed to provide any authority in support of her cause of action based upon due process violation. Accordingly, the Kosrae Constitution due process provision does not create a cause of action against these defendants. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Employment is a property right protected by the Kosrae Constitution when there is an assurance of continued employment or when dismissal is allowed for specified reasons. An employee's personal hope of continued employment or the expiration of a contract with no provisions for renewal does not give rise to a property interest. Thus, when the Tafunsak Constitution states that the position of Treasurer is a four-year term and the plaintiff's employment was terminated before the term's end, this is sufficient to show an assurance of continued employment and gives rise to a property right protected by due process under the Kosrae Constitution. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 14 FSM R. 517, 520 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Once a property interest is found to exist, the next step is to determine if due process rights were violated. The court looks at whether the procedures used to apply the disciplinary action were fair based on the circumstances of the case; procedures must assure a rational decision making process. Municipal defendants are not required to follow the State of Kosrae's Public Service System laws and regulations and are not required to adopt their own written procedures, but they must be fair considering all the circumstances and use a rational decision making process. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 14 FSM R. 517, 520 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Where the plaintiff claims that he was not given an administrative remedy and did not have an opportunity to meet or rebut the allegations against him and when the defendants began by giving the plaintiff written notice listing specific issues and specifying their concerns about the plaintiff's failure to perform his duties and gave the plaintiff several months until late February 2004 to correct his behavior; when the plaintiff did not change his behavior to perform his job responsibilities and he spoke with the defendants about resigning from employment during this time period, thus demonstrating that he met with the defendants and had an opportunity to rebut the first letter's allegations; the Council gave him a copy of its March 2004 letter to the Mayor recommending termination of his employment; when the Mayor's letter to the plaintiff based on this recommendation again gave him an opportunity to bring forth any grievances, this procedure consistently gave the plaintiff notice of the defendants' specific reasons for concern and gave him several opportunities to meet and rebut allegations and bring forth grievances and was thus fair based on the circumstances and was based on a rational decision-making process. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 14 FSM R. 517, 520 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When reviewing the Land Commission's actions after the plaintiff filed his request in 1987 and the issuance of title in 2002, the question is whether the Land Commission or Land Court deprived the plaintiff or any other party of property in an unfair fashion and whether the procedures used ensured a fair and rational decision-making process. This is consistent with the due process requirements of the Kosrae Constitution, Article II. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The Constitutions of both Kosrae and the Federated States of Micronesia state, in identical wording, that a person may not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law and these two clauses are treated as identical in meaning and in scope and may be analyzed together. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Both the FSM and Kosrae Constitutions provide that "a person may not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The wording of each of these clauses is identical in meaning and scope. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 240 (App. 2010).

– Kosrae – Due Process – Notice and Hearing

The essential features of procedural due process, or fairness, require notice and opportunity to be heard. Ittu v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 10 FSM R. 446, 447 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a party not represented by legal counsel is not given the opportunity to present his claim in Land Court, pursuant to the requirements of GCO 2002-13, this procedural failure is a violation of the due process protection provided by the Kosrae Constitution. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Procedural due process, or fairness, requires notice and an opportunity to be heard. Fundamentally, the government may not strip its citizens of property in an unfair or arbitrary manner; the Constitution requires the government to follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision-making process. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 240 (App. 2010).

When a terminated state employee, since she was given an immediate opportunity to respond and another opportunity to respond one week later, had two opportunities to be heard after being informed of the reasons for her dismissal, and when after these two opportunities, she had two full post-termination evidentiary hearings that analyzed the Hospital's decision to terminate her employment, her procedural due process rights were not violated. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2010).

– Kosrae – Equal Protection

The protection afforded by the Kosrae Constitution equal protection provision can only be asserted when the denial of such rights are based on account of sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language or social status. The constitutional provisions providing equal protection of law apply similarly to laws and government actions. A party alleging an equal protection violation has the burden of showing that the defendant is a state actor and that the conduct in question was a state action or a law. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the plaintiff has failed to show that she was denied her rights based on account of her sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language or social status, and that the conduct in question was either based upon a law or upon a state action, she has failed to provide any authority whatsoever in support of her cause of action based upon violation of equal protection. Accordingly, the Kosrae Constitution equal protection provision does not create a cause of action against these defendants. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 569-70 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

– Kosrae – Interpretation

Article II, section 1(d) of the Kosrae State Constitution is similar to article IV, section 5 of the FSM Constitution and to the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and therefore, interpretations of these provisions may be useful for interpreting the provision in the Kosrae State Constitution. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Because the Kosrae State Constitution does not provide an exact standard for determining whether a search is "reasonable," this court will first turn to the framers' intent. In the absence of an official journal of the First Constitutional Convention, this court will then look to FSM and U.S. judicial decisions interpreting the search and seizure provision in their respective constitutions. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

If language of a provision of the Kosrae State Constitution is susceptible to more than one meaning, the court should look to the legislative history, including the constitutional convention committee notes and journals, all other provisions of the Constitution, and cases from jurisdictions with similar constitutional provisions, to clarify the definitions of the ambiguous term. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 537, 540 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The movant is burdened with a high standard of proof in establishing the unconstitutionality of either state laws or the Constitution. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 335 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

A practice which has been engaged in by a branch of government for a significant period of time is entitled to great weight in establishing the constitutionality of that practice. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 342 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The wording of the Due Process Clause of the Kosrae State Constitution is identical to the wording of the Due Process Clause of the FSM Constitution. Therefore the court will treat the clauses as identical in meaning and in scope. Alik v. Kosrae Hotel Corp., 5 FSM R. 294, 297 (Kos. 1992).

In analyzing constitutional provisions a court must initially look to the actual words of the constitution. The court should also consider all provisions of the constitution because other sections may touch on the same subject area, thus giving the questionable provision added meaning. If those words are clear and permit only one possible result, the court should go no further. Tafunsak v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 344, 347 (App. 1995).

If the language of a Kosrae constitutional provision or section is susceptible to more than one meaning, the court should look to the legislative history, including the Constitutional Committee Notes and the Journals, if available, to clarify the definition of the ambiguous term. Tafunsak v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 344,

347 (App. 1995).

The party that raises the issue has the burden of proof as to the unconstitutionality of a statute. This burden is high and heavy, and that party must negative every reasonable, conceivable basis which would support the constitutionality of the statute, because statutes are presumed to be constitutional. Tafunsak v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 344, 348 (App. 1995).

A court should avoid unnecessary constitutional adjudications. When interpreting a statute, courts should, where possible, avoid selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt the constitutionality of that statute. If construction of a statute by which a serious doubt of constitutionality may be avoided is fairly possible, a court should adopt that construction. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

If a matter may properly be resolved on a statutory basis without reaching potential constitutional issues, then the court should do so. Unnecessary constitutional adjudication is to be avoided. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 251 (App. 1999).

The framework for analysis of constitutional provisions has been clearly established by the FSM Supreme Court. The court must first look to the actual words of the Constitution. When the constitutional language is inconclusive or does not provide an unmistakable answer, the court may look to the journal of the Constitutional Convention for assistance in determining the meaning of the constitutional words. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 26, 29 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The testimony of one Constitutional Convention delegate as to the meaning of a constitutional provision would reflect his personal opinions and beliefs on the interpretation of the subject constitutional provision, and not the opinions of the entire twenty-two member Convention, and will therefore not be admitted. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 26, 30 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In analyzing constitutional provisions, a court must first look to the constitution's actual words. If those words are clear and permit only one result, the court should go no further, but if the language of a Kosrae constitutional provision or section is susceptible to more than one meaning, the court should look to the legislative history, including the Constitutional Committee notes and the journals, if available, to clarify the definition of the ambiguous term. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 162, 164 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Words in constitutions are ordinarily given their natural, normal, usual, common, popular, general and ordinary sense. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 162, 164 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the constitutional language is clear and permits only one result, the court goes no further and does not consider its legislative history. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 162, 164 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Acts of the Kosrae Legislature are presumed to be constitutional. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 256 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Courts should avoid, where possible, selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt the constitutionality of that statute. Accordingly, a defendant is burdened with a high standard of proof in establishing the unconstitutionality of a state law. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 256 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A practice which has been engaged in by a government for a significant period of time is entitled to great weight in establishing the constitutionality of that practice. Thus, when the licensing of vehicle operators and that the license be in the immediate possession of the driver has been required for at nearly forty years, this significant period of time and therefore the licensing and possession requirement is entitled to great weight in establishing the constitutionality of that practice. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 256 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Since article II, section 1(d) of the Kosrae Constitution is similar to article IV, section 5 of the FSM Constitution Declaration of Rights and the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution, interpretations of these two provisions may be useful for interpreting the Kosrae Constitution provision, and when a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 327 (App. 2004).

A practice which has been engaged in by a branch of government for a significant period of time is entitled to great weight in establishing the constitutionality of that practice. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When an FSM or Kosrae constitutional protection is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 (App. 2006).

When an FSM or Kosrae constitutional protection, such as the FSM or Kosrae double jeopardy protection, is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Kosrae v. Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 1, 4 n.2 (App. 2010).

Unnecessary constitutional adjudication is to be avoided. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 342 (App. 2014).

– Kosrae – Legislative Privilege

Historically the legislative privilege from arrest has not applied in criminal cases. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 326 (App. 2004).

The Kosrae Constitution's drafters by no means intended the legislative privilege from arrest to be absolute. In addition to the stated exception for felony and breach of the peace that was incorporated into the privilege as adopted, the drafters felt that charges may still be filed against members at a time different from when a legislator is going to or coming from a legislative session. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 326 (App. 2004).

The court declines to adopt a general rule that any Kosrae police officer who stops a motorist has a specific duty to inquire of the motorist whether he is a Kosrae legislator going to or returning from conducting official business. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 326 (App. 2004).

The scope the Kosrae Constitution's legislative privilege is coterminous with the historical understanding of the phrase, "treason, felony, and breach of the peace," and that the privilege conferred by the Kosrae Constitution does not apply to criminal cases. Since the Kosrae Constitution's privilege of freedom from arrest does not apply to criminal cases, it is thus inapplicable to a category 4 misdemeanor, which is a criminal offense. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 327 (App. 2004).

– Kosrae – Taking of Property

When a landowner voluntarily enters into a statement of intent to grant the state an easement the state has not violated the landowner's constitutional rights by "taking" his property without just compensation, and is not liable for trespass. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 425 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

– Pohnpei

The tenor of the Pohnpei Constitution is that the government is to be responsible to the people. That Constitution does not provide for sovereign immunity. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 157-59 (Pon.

1986).

A constitutional provision is self-executing when no legislation is required to bring it into effect. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

The provisions of article 7, section 4 of the Pohnpei Constitution are not self-executing because they provide general principles or policy directives without providing the means to effectuate them. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

The government has the power to undertake projects in the areas set forth in article 7 of the Pohnpei Constitution, but the provisions of article 7 are merely directory rather than mandatory. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 81-82 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

Article 4 of the Pohnpei Constitution confers fundamental rights and is mandatory and enforceable by the courts; in contrast, article 7 does not vest individuals with legal rights that they can assert in the courts. The framers of the Constitution structured these two articles in different ways because they intended them to achieve different goals. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 81-82 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

The court may, in the interest of justice, make the application of its decision prospective where the court is overruling a previous decision or declaring a statute unconstitutional and the present ruling does not prejudice those who might have relied on such ruling or on such statute. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 222 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The Pohnpei Constitution provides protection for custom and tradition, and mandates that the Pohnpei government shall respect and protect the customs and traditions of Pohnpei. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

An act of government in conflict with the Pohnpei Constitution is invalid to the extent of the conflict. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

In order to be protected by the Pohnpei Constitution, the customary law must still exist. Custom is a practice that by its common adoption and long, unvarying habit has come to have the force of law. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 642 (Pon. 2016).

– Pohnpei – Due Process

The Pohnpei State Government has discretion in hiring or firing employees, but that discretion does not carry with it the right to its arbitrary exercise. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 217 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Substantive due process relates to the constitutional guarantee that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty or property for arbitrary reasons. Such a deprivation is supportable constitutionally only if the conduct from which the deprivation flow is prescribed by reasonable legislation. The legislation shall be enacted within the scope of legislative authority and be reasonably applied for a purpose consonant with the purpose for which it was enacted. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 221 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Procedural due process relates to the requisite characteristics of proceedings tending toward a deprivation of life, liberty, or property and thus makes it necessary that a person whom it is sought to deprive of such a right must be given notice of this fact. An individual must be given an opportunity to defend himself before tribunal or office having jurisdiction of the cause, and the problem of the propriety of this deprivation, under the circumstances presented, must be resolved in a manner consistent with essential fairness, in accordance with the Pohnpeian concept of justice. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 221 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

A statute providing that any person who has been convicted of a felony and who is currently under sentence shall be terminated from public employment, constitutes an unconstitutional deprivation of procedural due process by allowing for an affected individual's termination without a hearing, and thus must be struck down. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 221-22 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The Due Process Clause of the Pohnpei State Constitution, art. IV, § 4, guarantees the right of due process articulated in the governing law. Micronesian Legal Servs. Corp. v. Ludwig, 3 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

A statute does not violate the Pohnpei constitutional safeguards of due process if the provisions of the statute are reasonably clear and give fair notice of what acts or omission are prescribed. Hadley v. Kolonia Town, 3 FSM R. 267, 269 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

Whether statutory language is so unreasonably vague as to violate the Due Process Clause of the Pohnpei State Constitution is a question of degree, and when the law in question is a municipal ordinance greater leeway should be given to the municipality in recognition of the members' lack of prior training or experience in law or statutory drafting. Hadley v. Kolonia Town, 3 FSM R. 267, 269-70 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

The right to due process under the Pohnpei Constitution, like the FSM Constitution, only protects people from actions by the government. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 636 (Pon. 2002).

Under the Pohnpei Constitution, substantive due process relates to the constitutional guarantee that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property for arbitrary reasons. Such a deprivation is supportable constitutionally only if the conduct from which the deprivation flows is prescribed by reasonable legislation. The legislation must be enacted within the scope of legislative authority and be reasonably applied for a purpose consonant with the purpose for which it is enacted. Kallop v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 130, 134 (Pon. 2011).

– Pohnpei – Equal Protection

A classification of ex-felons currently under sentence is not suspect within the suspect classifications of section 3, article 4 of the Constitution of Pohnpei. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 216 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Where the legislature has a rational basis for a statutorily non-suspect classification, the court will not inquire into the wisdom of that statute. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 218 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Section 14(1) of the State Public Service System Act of 1981 (2L-57-81) is impermissibly arbitrary and irrationally unfair in its blanket prohibition of employment of any person who has been convicted of a felony and is currently under sentence; such statutory prohibition fails to tailor its impact to those convicted felons who otherwise lack the habits of industry. Consequently, the section of the statute is violative of the Equal Rights Clause of the Pohnpei State Constitution by failing to demonstrate that the exclusion of all felons under sentence is necessary to achieve the articulated state goal. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 220 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

– Pohnpei – Fundamental Rights

Article 4 of the Pohnpei Constitution confers fundamental rights and is mandatory and enforceable by the courts; in contrast, article 7 does not vest individuals with legal rights that they can assert in the courts. The framers of the Constitution structured these two articles in different ways because they intended them to achieve different goals. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 81-82 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

The right to governmental employment in Pohnpei is not a fundamental right, constitutionally protected, requiring invoking a strict scrutiny test. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 217 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

– Pohnpei – Interpretation

When confronted with an issue of first instance, the Pohnpei Supreme Court may look beyond prior state experience for guidance, including looking towards the common law and United States precedents. People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 10 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

In interpreting the Constitution, Pohnpeian and English versions must be construed together in harmony to determine the intent of the Constitutional Convention on any subject. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 17, 22-23 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

Whether article 7 of the Pohnpei Constitution is self-executing, creating substantive rights that individuals can seek to enforce in court of law, will depend upon the intent of the framers, as disclosed within the four corners of the Constitution when the words are given their ordinary meaning, as well as upon the nature of the acts and the goals they are to accomplish. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 80-81 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

The words of the Pohnpei Constitution are words in common use and are to be understood according to their ordinary meaning. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 81 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

A constitutional provision is self-executing when no legislation is required to bring it into effect. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

The provisions of article 7, section 4 of the Pohnpei Constitution are not self-executing because they provide general principles or policy directives without providing the means to effectuate them. Panuelo v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 76, 82 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1987).

In considering an issue of constitutional interpretation of an accused's right to a speedy trial in the light of Pohnpei's experience, manner and usage, and the concept of justice of the peoples of Pohnpei, it is helpful to review the application and development of the constitutional right to a speedy trial in other parts of the world. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 435 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

Differences in procedure, history, customs and practice do not require similar construction and application of the rights to a speedy trial in Pohnpei as the clause is construed and applied in other jurisdictions. Pohnpei v. Weilbacher, 5 FSM R. 431, 449-50 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

– Pohnpei – Legislative Privilege

A member of the Pohnpei Legislature is responsible only to the Legislature for statements in the Legislature or a committee thereof. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 424 (Pon. 2001).

A Pohnpei legislator may decline to answer any questions that fall within the legitimate legislative activity of the Pohnpei legislature. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 425 (Pon. 2001).

Questions that are casually or incidentally related to legislative affairs but not a part of the legislative process itself, do not fall within the legislative privilege. Such questions, when otherwise appropriate under Rule 26(b)(1), should be answered. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 426 (Pon. 2001).

– Pohnpei – Taking of Property

Under Pohnpei state law, owners of the land adjacent to the lagoon do not have sufficient property rights in the reef and the lagoon as to entitle them to monetary compensation or other relief for damage to the reef caused by unauthorized dredging activity in the lagoon near their land. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 59-60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei state law persons simply possessing a permit in the lagoon do not have sufficient property rights in the reef and the lagoon as to entitle them to monetary compensation or other relief for damage to the reef caused by unauthorized dredging activity in the lagoon near their land unless there has been some affirmative action such as prior written approval from the appropriate authority and effecting some development in the area in question. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei state law, if a reef is damaged by persons carrying out dredging activities authorized by state officials for a public purpose, adjacent or nearby coastal landowners are not entitled to a payment of just compensation for the depreciation of the value of the reef and fishing grounds. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei state law, if a fish maii [trap] is damaged by persons carrying out dredging activities authorized by state officials for a public purpose, adjacent or nearby coastal landowners are entitled to a payment of just compensation for the damage to a fish maii which they had constructed in the lagoon, if the fish maii was constructed pursuant to the dictate of customary law as a joint enterprise of the villagers, supervised by the village chief, managed, maintained and owned in common by the villagers; or, if an individual constructed the fish maii, prior written permission from the District Administrator, now the Pohnpei Public Land Board of Trustees, was obtained. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei law, damage to reefs or soil under the high water mark resulting from dredging activities, the object of which is for public purposes, does not justify compensation to abutting land owners. If the Pohnpei Public Land Board of Trustees had granted certain rights in writing to an individual or group of individuals, and acting on that grant the grantees erected or constructed certain improvements, including fish maii (fish trap) in shallow waters, and if destroyed or value reduced as a result of state dredging activities, the owners thereof may be entitled to just compensation in accordance with the Pohnpei Constitution. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 69 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

– Professional Services Clause

The Constitution vests the national government with power to act concerning health care and may place some affirmative health care obligations on it. Manahane v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 161, 172 (Pon. 1982).

Primary responsibility, perhaps even sole responsibility, for affirmative implementation of the Professional Services Clause, FSM Const. art. XIII, § 1, must lie with Congress. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 29 (App. 1989).

The Professional Services Clause of the Constitution demands that when any part of the national government contemplates action that may be anticipated to affect the availability of education, health care or legal services, the national officials involved must consider the right of the people to such services and make a reasonable effort to take "every step reasonable and necessary" to avoid unnecessarily reducing the availability of the services. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 30 (App. 1989).

Since Congress did not give any consideration to, or make any mention of, the services enumerated in article XIII, section 1 of the FSM Constitution in enacting the Foreign Investment Act, 32 F.S.M.C. 201-232, the avoidance of potential conflict with the Constitution calls for the conclusion that Congress did not intend the Foreign Investment Act to apply to noncitizen attorneys or to any other persons who provide services of the kind described in article XIII, section 1 of the Constitution. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 30 (App. 1989).

Since the Constitution's Professional Services Clause is a promise that the national government will take every step "reasonable and necessary" to provide health care to its citizens, a court should not lightly accept a contention that 6 F.S.M.C. 702(4), which creates a $20,000 ceiling of governmental liability, shields the government against a claim that FSM government negligence prevented a person from receiving necessary health care. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 362 (Yap 1990).

When considering a foreign investment permit application the Secretary of Resources and Development must consider "the extent to which the activity will contribute to the constitutional policy of making education, health care, and legal services available to the people of the Federated States of Micronesia." 32 F.S.M.C. 210(8). Michelsen v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 249, 254 (App. 1991).

Since the denial of the application resulted in a decrease in the availability of legal services in Yap and since the Secretary did not properly weigh the extent to which the application would contribute to the constitutional policy of making legal services available to the of the Federated States of Micronesia, the denial of the foreign investment permit to practice law in Yap was unwarranted by the facts in the record and therefore unlawful. Michelsen v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 249, 256 (App. 1991).

Article XIII, section 1 is a general provision that recognizes the right of the people to education, health care, and legal services. It does not act as an exclusive duty to ensure the availability of attorney services in the FSM, and it does not prohibit a state from administering its own bar. Berman v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 231, 237 (Pon. 1995).

Although it is doubtful whether the Constitution's Professional Services Clause protects an attorney's fee from forfeiture in any or all circumstances where the law would seem to allow it, that is an issue that must await another day when there is a case or dispute before the court ripe for adjudication. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

The Office of the Public Defender was created by 2 F.S.M.C. 204(5). For at least the criminal side of the docket, this represents Congress's affirmative implementation of the Constitution's Professional Services Clause. The primary, perhaps even the sole, responsibility, for the Professional Services Clause's affirmative implementation lies with Congress. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 394 & n.1 (Chk. 2005).

The Professional Services Clause provides that the FSM national government recognizes the people's right to education, health care, and legal services and shall take every step reasonable and necessary to provide these services. The term "the people" refers only to natural persons, and does not include juridical persons such as corporations. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 394-95 (Chk. 2005).

The framers' intent in including the Professional Services Clause was to establish a national policy of providing the services when requested by individual citizens unable to provide for themselves, although these services would not necessarily be free. Thus the framers intended that these professional services were to be provided only to natural persons, not to artificial persons. Therefore neither the Office of the Public Defender's refusal to represent business entity defendants nor Public Defender Directive No. 19 barring such representation is unconstitutional. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 395 (Chk. 2005).

The Constitution's framers recognized that legislation would be needed to achieve the Professional Services Clause's policy goals. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480 (Pon. 2020).

The Professional Services Clause establishes a national policy of providing the services contained in the clause as the FSM acquires the revenue necessary to implement this policy. Inevitably, some services will be provided before others, with Congress to determine the priority. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480 (Pon. 2020).

The Professional Services Clause's intention is to declare a policy which is to be observed by the FSM government as resources become available, and its language is phrased so as to make it clear that as a matter of policy the government is to take reasonable and necessary steps to achieve the rights stated.

FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480 (Pon. 2020).

The Professional Services Clause does not require the national government to take any particular action, or refrain from doing so, at any particular time. It states a policy direction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480 (Pon. 2020).

The Professional Services Clause does not bar actions that may have an occasional adverse effect on the provision of a professional service. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480 (Pon. 2020).

If the FSM Development Bank has an affirmative obligation to give special consideration to creating or expanding FSM health care services, it seems to have met that obligation when it provided the original loan so that the borrower could get his medical practice up and running since, within its scope of action (development banking), it took a step reasonable and necessary to provide needed health care services. When the bank twice restructured that loan, its effort allowed the borrowers' clinic to continue providing health services, and had the effect of avoiding reducing health care availability. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 480-81 (Pon. 2020).

When the FSM Development Bank has a statutory right to reduce its claim to judgment and to foreclose its perfected security interest in the borrowers' medical equipment and also has the contractual right to do the same, the Constitution's Professional Services Clause does not make that contract illegal. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 (Pon. 2020).

The Professional Services Clause cannot, on one hand, encourage the FSM Development Bank to facilitate the provision of health care services by making loans that allow health care professionals to provide such services, and then, on the other hand, prohibit the bank from seeking repayment so that it will have funds to lend to others because, if the Professional Services Clause's policy is to encourage the bank to facilitate the provision of health services, it cannot discourage the bank from facilitating the provision of health services by making such loans riskier by severely restricting the bank's ability to compel repayment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 (Pon. 2020).

At a minimum, the Professional Services Clause demands that Congress and other parts of the national government, including the court, give special consideration to these services and assure that their availability is not unreasonably or unnecessarily diminished by any national government action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 (Pon. 2020).

When any part of the national government contemplates action that may be anticipated to affect the availability of education, health care, or legal services, the Constitution demands that the national officials involved must consider the people's right to such services and make a reasonable effort to take every step reasonable and necessary to avoid unnecessarily infringing upon that right or reducing the availability of those services. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 (Pon. 2020).

Since the court must make a reasonable effort to take every step reasonable and necessary to avoid unnecessarily reducing the availability of article XIII, section 1 health care services, the court will note that the FSM Development Bank is legally entitled to an order of sale for the mortgaged medical equipment and to an order enforcing the borrowers' assignments of income and exclusive possession of the medical clinic premises, but the court will not issue such orders contemporaneously with the judgment. The court will hesitate to issue such orders until all reasonable means of satisfying the judgment by other methods have been explored and exhausted, and will thus give special consideration to health care services and assure that their availability is not unreasonably or unnecessarily diminished by any action it takes. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481-82 (Pon. 2020).

– Supremacy Clause

The FSM Constitution is the supreme law and the decisions of the FSM Supreme Court must be consistent with it. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 176-77 (Truk 1982).

While the FSM Constitution is the supreme law of the land and the FSM Supreme Court may under no circumstances acquiesce in unconstitutional governmental action, states should be given a full opportunity to exercise their legitimate powers in a manner consistent with the commands of the Constitution without unnecessary intervention by national courts. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 428 (Pon. 1984).

Failure to apply a constitutional holding retroactively does not violate the supremacy clause of the Constitution, FSM Const. art. II, § 1. To the contrary, courts may choose between prospective and retroactive application in order to avert injustice or hardship. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 184-85 (App. 1986).

A state law provision attempting to place "original and exclusive jurisdiction" in the Yap State Court cannot divest a national court of responsibilities placed upon it by the national constitution, which is the "supreme law of the Federated States of Micronesia." Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 23 (App. 1991).

It is the duty of the FSM Supreme Court to review any national law, including a treaty such as the Compact of Free Association, in response to a claim that the law or treaty violates constitutional rights, and if any provision of the Compact is contrary to the constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, then that provision must be set aside as without effect. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 98 (Pon. 1991).

The supremacy clause of the FSM Constitution does not admit a result where a state constitutional provision prevents the enforcement of a national statute which gives a private cause of action for rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution, especially when it is the solemn obligation of state governments to uphold the principles of the FSM Constitution and to advance the principles of unity upon which the Constitution is founded. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 208, 213 (Chk. 1997).

The FSM Constitution is the supreme law of the FSM, and any actions taken by the government which are in conflict with the FSM Constitution are invalid to the extent of conflict. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 630-31 (Pon. 2002).

Although a state constitutional and a statutory provisions barring payment without a legislative appropriation are neither facially objectionable, what is not constitutionally permissible is to use the requirement defensively to avoid payment of a judgment based on a civil rights claim brought under the national civil rights statute. Principles of supremacy under Article II of the FSM Constitution preclude this result. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 3, 11 n.5 (Chk. 2003).

Any conflict between the Pohnpei Constitution provision that no appeal of any matter relating to the Pohnpei Constitution, Pohnpei law, customs or traditions may be made to any court except the Pohnpei Supreme Court and the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear cases under the FSM Constitution is resolved under the FSM Constitution's supremacy clause, which provides that any act of a government that conflicts with the FSM Constitution is invalid, to the extent of the conflict. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 15 FSM R. 301, 307 (App. 2007).

A state constitution cannot control or restrict the actions of the national government, whose powers and limitations are derived solely from the national constitution, which is the supreme law of the land. Thus, a state constitution's protections cannot be invoked against the national government. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 182 (Chk. 2008).

The FSM Constitution's supremacy clause does not permit a state law to prevent the enforcement of a national statute which gives a private cause of action for rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution, especially when it is the solemn obligation of state governments to uphold the principles of the FSM Constitution and to advance the principles of unity upon which the Constitution is founded. Barrett v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 229, 234-35 (App. 2009).

No national statute regulates a state's duties and functions, except to the extent that a national statute may limit the state's lawmaking ability in specific areas through the supremacy clause. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 659 (App. 2009).

While all public officials are sworn to uphold the Constitution, the Constitution places upon the courts the ultimate responsibility for interpreting the Constitution. The court is forsworn by the Supremacy Clause from enforcing national laws or treaties contrary to the Constitution itself. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 187 (Pon. 2010).

Under the FSM Constitution's Supremacy Clause, a national statute must control over a conflicting state statute. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 619 (Chk. 2011).

A Yap state statute cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of jurisdiction conferred on it by the FSM Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 94 (Yap 2011).

The FSM Supreme Court has issued writs of garnishment directed toward the assets of a state government when the underlying cause of action is based on a violation of the national civil rights statute, but it has declined to issue a writ of garnishment where the judgment debtor was a state government and the judgment was based on ordinary breach of contract. The rationale for the issued writs was the FSM Constitution's Supremacy Clause, which must control regardless of a state constitutional provision, or national law, to the contrary. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 334 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The Constitution is the supreme law of the FSM, and an act of the government in conflict with it is invalid to the extent of conflict. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 329 (Pon. 2019).

– Taking of Property

Government employment that is "property" within the meaning of the Due Process Clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the Constitution, there must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 351-52 (Pon. 1983).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of life, liberty or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner. When such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision-making process. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 354-55 (Pon. 1983).

A temporary seizure is itself a significant taking of property, depriving the owner of possession, an important attribute of property. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 1985).

Where a seizure is for forfeiture rather than evidentiary purposes, the constitutional prohibitions against taking property without due process come into play. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

When a landowner voluntarily enters into a statement of intent to grant the state an easement the state has not violated the landowner's constitutional rights by "taking" his property without just compensation, and is not liable for trespass. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 425 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The mere act of the United States' funding the FSM and Pohnpei does not subject it to liability for a taking because its involvement was insufficiently direct and substantial to warrant such liability and because one government is not liable for a taking by officials of another government for merely advocating measures that other government should take. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 167, 169-70 (Pon. 1995).

An unconstitutional taking occurs whenever a public entity substantially deprives a private party of the beneficial use of his property for a public purpose. Therefore where neither the Trust Territory nor a U.S. government agency could be considered a public entity in the FSM after the effective date of the Compact they are legally incapable of committing a taking after that date. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 167, 170 (Pon. 1995).

The government does not engage in a taking where the interests lost are not private property. Damarlane v. United States, 8 FSM R. 45, 52 (App. 1997).

A claim of taking of property without due process of law is effective only against governmental entities or officials. The constitutional guarantee of due process only protects persons from the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

A claim that some private party has taken or deprived someone of their property is, if it was personal property that was allegedly taken, a claim for conversion or for trespass to chattels, and, if it was real property that was allegedly taken by some private party, it is a claim for trespass (including actions for ejectment) or possibly for nuisance (interference with use and enjoyment of land). They are not due process or takings claims. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not deprive citizens of life, liberty or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner. A taking occurs whenever a public entity substantially deprives a private party of the beneficial use of his property for a public purpose. Ladore v. Panuel, 17 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2010).

The requirement of a public purpose for a taking means that the deprivation must have as its cause some sort of public purpose. Even if the court were to interpret "public purpose" liberally to include any government policy, no interpretation of the facts could make out a government policy or public purpose which caused the deprivation when the cause was a quotidian traffic accident which raises a question of tort, not due process. Ladore v. Panuel, 17 FSM R. 271, 275-76 (Pon. 2010).

When a tort claim – trespass – that the state occupied and continues to occupy the plaintiff's property to the exclusion of all others rises to the level of a constitutional claim and a civil rights violation, it is a taking of the plaintiff's property without just compensation. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 (Chk. 2011).

In order to prevail on a claim of deprivation of liberty or property without due process of law, a plaintiff must: 1) identify a liberty or property right which implicates the Due Process Clause; 2) identify a governmental action which amounts to a deprivation of that liberty or property right; and 3) demonstrate that the deprivation occurred without due process of law. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Although no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law is the mandate of the constitution, a party cannot be said to be deprived of his property in a judgment because at the time he is unable to collect it. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Plaintiffs are not deprived of their judgments, so long as they continue to be existing liabilities against the entity. Therefore a failure to timely fulfill a judgment does not constitute a taking in violation of the due process clause as there continues to be an existing liability against the state. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The state's failure to appropriate funds to pay a judgment debt does not constitute a taking in violation of the due process clause because the property right created by a judgment against a government entity is merely the recognition of a continuing debt of that government entity. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 529

(Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

A money judgment against the state is not property such that its non-payment constitutes a taking, but a money judgment against the state is a recognition of the state government's continuing debt or obligation. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 529-30 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

A money judgment against the state is not a property interest but an existing, continuing liability against the state, and a failure to timely satisfy that judgment does not constitute a taking in violation of due process or equal protection. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The fundamental concept of due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of life, liberty or property in an unfair or arbitrary manner. When such interests are subject to possible government taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision-making process. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 557 (Pon. 2016).

In order to prevail on a claim of deprivation of liberty or property without due process of law, a plaintiff must: 1) identify a liberty or property right which implicates the due process clause; 2) identify a governmental action which amounts to deprivation of that liberty or property right; and 3) demonstrate that the deprivation occurred without due process of law. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 557 (Pon. 2016).

When no property right can be ascribed to the alleged property at issue, the due process standard does not apply. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 557 (Pon. 2016).

Government employment that is property within the meaning of the due process clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the FSM Constitution, there must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. These assurances may come from various sources, such as statute, formal contract, or actions of a supervisory person with authority to establish terms of employment. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 558 (Pon. 2016).

When seweage backflow rises above the level of mere negligence to the level of a public nuisance, it may constitute a taking of property without just compensation. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 21 FSM R. 599, 600 (Chk. 2018).

A tort claim that the state's actions excludes all others from the plaintiff's property rises to the level of a constitutional claim and a civil rights violation because it is a taking of the plaintiff's property without just compensation. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 21 FSM R. 599, 600 (Chk. 2018).

The court will deny summary judgment when it has previously held that if sewerage backflow rises above the level of mere negligence to the level of a public nuisance, it may constitute a taking of property without just compensation and the plaintiff claims that her possessory right to the land is a usufruct property right. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 158 (Chk. 2019).

No person may be deprived of property without due process of law. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 422, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The fundamental concept of procedural due process is that the government may not be permitted to strip citizens of life, liberty, or property in an unfair, arbitrary manner, and when such important individual interests are exposed to possible governmental taking or deprivation, the Constitution requires that the government follow procedures calculated to assure a fair and rational decision making process. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2020).

– Title to Land

Citizenship may affect, among other legal interests, rights to own land, to engage in business or be employed, and even to reside within the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 6 (Pon. 1985).

The Constitution specifically bars noncitizens from acquiring title to land or waters in Micronesia and includes within the prohibition any corporation not wholly owned by citizens. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage (III), 3 FSM R. 256, 259 (Pon. 1987).

Where a person is constitutionally prohibited from inheriting land that person's valid assignment of expectancy to a person who may acquire land will operate only to assign the non-land holdings in the expectancy. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 382-83 (Pon. 1994).

The FSM Constitution mandates that a noncitizen may not acquire title to land or waters in Micronesia, but the Constitution does not prohibit a noncitizen from acquiring or holding some non-title interest in the land. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 390 (Chk. 2001).

The Constitution does not divest noncitizens of their title to land if they had acquired title to land before the Constitution's effective date. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 390 (Chk. 2001).

The Constitution does not prohibit a citizen landowner from becoming a citizen of another country and it does not strip a citizen landowner who does become a foreign citizen of title to land to which he acquired title when he was a citizen. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 390 (Chk. 2001).

A foreign citizen, is barred from acquiring legal title to land anywhere in the FSM. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 68 (Chk. 2003).

Noncitizens cannot acquire title to land, but leasing land for 99 years does not constitute acquiring title to land. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99d (Chk. 2004).

That a citizen-buyer obtains the funds used to acquire title to land from a noncitizen does not affect the citizen-buyer's title to the land. To hold otherwise would throw all land sales, and land titles derived from them, into question because there is no way to determine from the land records the funds' source. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99d-99e (Chk. 2004).

– Yap

The Yap Constitution provides that the state recognizes traditional rights and ownership of natural resources and areas within the marine space of the State within 12 miles from island baselines and Yap statutory law provides that traditionally recognized fishing rights wherever located within the State Fishery Zone and internal waters must be preserved and respected and also preserves existing private rights of action for civil damages, for damage to coral reefs, seagrass areas, and mangroves. Thus 67 TTC 2 is no longer Yap state law. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 414 (Yap 2006).

– Yap – Interpretation

A constitutional provision that a thing shall be done in such a way "as provided by law" is not self-executing and requires legislation to implement it. Gimnang v. Yap, 7 FSM R. 606, 609 (Yap S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

CONTEMPT

Failure to proceed with a contempt hearing offered by the court without prior notice cannot be deemed a loss or waiver of the hearing right itself when no clear and unmistakable warning is issued that a failure to proceed immediately with the hearing will constitute a loss or waiver of that right. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 264-65 (Pon. 1983).

The Judiciary Act of 1979 permits the court to both fine and imprison a person found to be in contempt of court, but does not permit the fine to exceed $1,000 or the term of imprisonment to go beyond six months. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 84 (App. 1989).

In a contempt trial, the trial court may consider information in addition to evidence adduced in the contempt hearing itself when the other information came to the knowledge of the trial court in previous judicial hearings related to the matter which gave rise to the contempt charge, and when the judge identified the "outside" information and gave the defendant an opportunity to object but the defendant failed to do so. Semes v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 49, 52 (App. 1991).

While the Judiciary Act says relatively little about the appropriate distinctions between civil and criminal contempt proceedings, the statute does reveal a general expectation of Congress that the legal system here shall adhere generally to the same kinds of distinctions between civil and criminal contempt proceedings that have been established in other common law systems. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 62, 65 (Pon. 1991).

Criminal contempt under the FSM Code results from intentional disregard of a court order; the fact that the defendant was not specifically informed that he would be subject to punishment for disobedience does not negate a finding of requisite intent. Alfons v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 402, 406 (App. 1992).

Whether the lower court erred by not holding the appellee in contempt of court involves a trial court's exercise of discretion and is reviewed using an abuse of discretion standard. Onopwi v. Aizawa, 6 FSM R. 537, 539 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Contempt is not a matter between opposing litigants; it is a matter between the offending person and the court, and the degree of punishment for contempt, if any, is within the sound discretion of the court. Onopwi v. Aizawa, 6 FSM R. 537, 540 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The intentional disobedience required for a conviction for contempt necessarily includes an element of voluntariness. In re Contempt of Cheida, 7 FSM R. 183, 185 (App. 1995).

The tardiness of a person who appears before the court as a witness, not as an attorney, who was presented with an unexpected legitimate and confirmed conflict between the demands of two branches of government, and who made efforts to notify the court he would be late, cannot be considered intentional disobedience of the court's summons. In re Contempt of Cheida, 7 FSM R. 183, 186 (App. 1995).

Generally, a person who seeks to satisfy the court that his failure to obey an order or decree was due entirely to his inability to render obedience, without fault on his part, must prove such inability. The FSM Supreme Court places the burden on the movant to show that the debtor has the ability to comply. Once this burden has been met and the debtor has been held in contempt, it is then the debtor's burden to show that he no longer has the ability to comply through no fault of his own despite his exercise of due diligence. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 452-53 (App. 1996).

In order to hold a debtor in contempt for failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment it is not enough that the debtor's noncompliance was found to be willful. There must also be a recital, or a finding somewhere in the record, that the debtor was able to comply. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 453 (App. 1996).

Punishment of imprisonment for contempt is automatically stayed on appeal, unless the court finds that a stay of imprisonment will cause an immediate obstruction of justice. "Obstruction of justice" means to impede those who seek justice in court or to impede those who have duties or powers to administer justice.

In re Contempt of Umwech, 8 FSM R. 20, 22 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1997).

When all parties are seeking to vindicate their positions in a court of law an immediate obstruction of justice is not present that would prevent the automatic stay of punishment of imprisonment for contempt. In re Contempt of Umwech, 8 FSM R. 20, 22 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1997).

Any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command is contempt of court, which the court has the power to punish. Johnny v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 203, 206 (App. 1997).

An officer of the court should be held to a higher standard for his contumacious behavior due to his intimate knowledge of the legal system. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1999).

The test for compliance with court orders is that one have knowledge of the order and if such knowledge exists, it is irrelevant that the person has not been served. Nameta v. Cheipot, 9 FSM R. 510, 511 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

In addition to its statutory contempt power, the FSM Supreme Court does retain inherent powers to sanction attorneys. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 85 (App. 2001).

In order for a person to be held in contempt, a court must find that he knew of the order and had the ability to comply with the order. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 102 (Kos. 2001).

Any adjudication of contempt is subject to appeal to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 466, 470 (Pon. 2001).

The appropriate means by which someone may challenge a discovery order is to subject themselves to a contempt proceeding. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 466, 470 (Pon. 2001).

The court may impose no further sanctions when a party is in contempt for its failure to abide by a court order because it knew of the order, had the ability to comply with the order, and decided not to comply, but Rule 37 sanctions have already been imposed. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 229 (Pon. 2002).

Since a finding of contempt is final and appealable, the legality of the specific sanction of imprisonment should be reviewed at the same time in the interest of judicial economy. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 380 (App. 2003).

When a defendant who was found in contempt of court for failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment later dies, the court will vacate its order sentencing him to jail. Bank of the FSM v. Rodriguez, 11 FSM R. 542, 544 (Pon. 2003).

A motion to vacate a contempt order will be denied when nothing stated changes the previous finding. Davis v. Kutta, 11 FSM R. 545, 548 (Pon. 2003).

A possible, but drastic, means by which a party may immediately challenge an interlocutory court order is to not comply with it and thus subject themselves to a contempt proceeding and then appeal the contempt finding, if there is one. Usually in such cases, if the client chooses to follow the attorney's advice it is only the party disobeying the order, not the party's attorney, who is then subjected to a contempt proceeding, often as part of the same proceeding in which the disobeyed order was given. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 349 (Chk. 2005).

When FSM cases have not addressed a precise point (about contempt), in such an instance, the court may consider authorities from other jurisdictions in considering the question before it. RRG (FSM) Ltd. v.

Maezoto, 15 FSM R. 243, 244 (Pon. 2007).

The FSM contempt statute expressly provides that one who is in violation of a court order may be put in jail until such time as he or she conforms his or her conduct the court's lawful order. Before imposing a sentence for contempt, the court must determine that the person who is potentially liable for contempt knew of the order, and had the ability to obey it. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 15 FSM R. 285, 289 (Pon. 2007).

When FSM cases have not addressed the precise point of a non-party's contempt, the court may consider authority from other common law jurisdictions. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 15 FSM R. 285, 289 (Pon. 2007).

It is plain that a non-party may be in contempt of a court order. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 15 FSM R. 285, 289 (Pon. 2007).

No motion for a show cause hearing regarding contempt shall fail in the FSM for failure formally and explicitly to assert either existence of the order or failure to comply with that order. However, inclusion of these two elements is helpful to the court. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 225 (Kos. 2010).

Traditionally, the movant has the burden to show that the debtor has the ability to comply with the court order; once this burden has been met, it is then the debtor's burden to show that he no longer has the ability to comply through no fault of his own despite due diligence. Thus, it is the moving party's burden not only to submit a proper motion for a show cause hearing, but also, at the hearing, to prove by a preponderance that the judgment debtor has the ability to pay. If the movant cannot provide evidentiary support, or certify his information and belief that such support is likely after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery, the court must deny the motion, but if the court does set a hearing and order parties to appear, and if at the hearing the moving party presents such evidence, only then will the burden shift to the debtor to show that he does not in fact have the ability to pay. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 226-27 (Kos. 2010).

Since a movant is least likely to procure agreement or acquiescence for a hostile or adversarial motion, and since there are few motions more hostile or adversarial than one for an order to show cause why the opposing party should not be held in contempt, it is clear that no agreement would ever be considered by, or forthcoming from, the opposing party in such a situation. Thus, although the movant takes the risk that the absence of the certification might result in the motion's denial, the court, in its discretion, may find that lack of formal certification was not fatal to the motion. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 228 (Kos. 2010).

A person with a judgment may initiate contempt proceedings when enforcement of a favorable judgment is required to prevent irreparable injury to the winning party's interests and is otherwise in the interests of justice. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 17 FSM R. 307, 309 (Pon. 2010).

Final judgments may be enforced by contempt proceedings provided that enforcement at such time is required to prevent irreparable injury or multiple damage to the interests of the winning party and is otherwise in the interests of justice. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 17 FSM R. 307, 310 (Pon. 2010).

The relevant subsections of Chuuk State Law No. 190-08, § 27 provide that upon appeal, punishments of imprisonment for contempt will automatically be stayed unless the court finds cause to the contrary and renders its findings in writing. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 315 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When the court has ordered counsel to submit a brief solely on the issue of whether the defendant's parcel is exempt from attachment and execution and counsel has chosen to ignore the court's order and proceeded to relitigate the issue of her ability to pay, normally, such intentional disobedience of the court's lawful order may be sanctionable under 4 F.S.M.C. 119(1)(b). FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 323 (Kos. 2011).

The inability to serve a show cause motion on a defendant means that a court cannot grant that motion without depriving the accused of due process rights. A wiser course of action, with respect to show cause motions, would be to serve the motion first, and then to file the motion and certificate of service within a reasonable time after service, an option expressly provided by the rules of civil procedure. In light of this alternative, and because circumstances may have changed since November 12, 2008, denial of the November 12, 2008 show cause motion is appropriate. Dateline Exports, Inc. v. George, 18 FSM R. 147, 149 (Kos. 2012).

When the court has enjoined the defendant from the activity that is the source of the bank's grievance against him, the court will hold the show cause motion in abeyance until such time as the bank either requests a show cause hearing or withdraws the motion. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 198 (Pon. 2012).

Courts generally have the power, in proper circumstances, to hold a party, or an attorney, or a witness summoned to appear before it in contempt of court for acts committed in the court's presence or for failure to appear when ordered to. The power to punish for contempt of court may be regarded as an essential element of judicial authority. It existed at common law. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 (Pon. 2012).

Only the court whose order was violated can punish a person for contempt – one court does not have the power to punish someone for the contempt of another court's order. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 (Pon. 2012).

If a person has been given adequate notice that he or she is ordered or required to appear before a court at a certain date and time and fails to do so, that court may, usually upon request, issue a bench warrant to compel that person to appear by authorizing the police to arrest that person and bring him or her before the court. The court does not need to first issue a second order for that person to appear and to explain his or her absence (show cause) and then if that order to appear is not obeyed, issue a third order to appear and explain the second absence, and then a fourth and so on without end. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 (Pon. 2012).

When an impeached U official was arrested on the U Impeachment Panel's bench warrant and brought within 24 hours before the only court competent to try him for the contempt charge, the U Impeachment Panel, where he was heard and then convicted of contempt, he received the process of law due him. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 (Pon. 2012).

If a person's contempt conviction was unsafe, that is, if he should have been acquitted because there was no earlier order requiring his appearance or if he was not allowed to present a defense, or if he had some valid defense that should have resulted in an acquittal on the contempt charge, his remedy would have been an immediate appeal of the contempt conviction as a final collateral order. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 282 (Pon. 2012).

While an impeachment conviction may not be appealable, a contempt conviction certainly is. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 282 n.6 (Pon. 2012).

The imposition of disciplinary sanctions is subject to due-process scrutiny. An attorney is entitled to appropriate notice and an opportunity to be heard before any sanction is imposed on her whether that sanction is imposed on her under the civil procedure rules, the criminal contempt statute, or some other court power. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 305, 313 (App. 2014).

Contempt of court, under 4 F.S.M.C. 119(1)(a) and (b) is defined as any intentional obstruction of the administration of justice by any person, including an officer of the court acting in his official capacity, or any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 105 (Chk. 2015).

The court's first duty in reviewing a contempt judgment is to determine whether the nature of the contempt proceeding was civil or criminal. That the court earlier characterized the contempt as civil or criminal is not conclusive. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 461 & n.5 (Pon. 2016).

There are four states of culpability which establish the requisite mental element: intentional, knowing, reckless, and negligent, but only the first two subjective states of mind, intent or knowledge, can be used to support a contempt finding. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

In finding contempt, the court must first determine whether the contempt was a civil contempt or criminal contempt; second it must determine whether the contempt was direct or indirect – whether it was committed in the court's presence or not; and third, it must determine, by a clear and convincing standard, that the defendant intentionally disobeyed a court order. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 467 (Pon. 2016).

An attorney who is again found in contempt in a case, may be subject to further payments to compensate the opposing party for any additional attorney's fees and costs. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 467 (Pon. 2016).

The Chuuk Judiciary Act of 1990 defines contempt as any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Contempt is not a matter between opposing litigants; it is a matter between the offending person and the court, and the degree of punishment for contempt, if any, is within the court's sound discretion. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Before imposing a sentence for contempt, a court must determine that the person who is potentially liable for contempt knew of the order, and had the ability to obey it. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 637 (Pon. 2018).

– Acts Constituting

A counsel's decision to take steps which may cause him to be late for a scheduled court hearing, coupled with his failure to advise the court and opposing counsel of the possibility that he might be late to the hearing, may, when followed by failure to appear at the scheduled time, constitute an intentional obstruction of the administration of justice within the meaning of section 119(a) of the Judiciary Act, and may be contempt of court. 4 F.S.M.C. 119(a). In re Robert, 1 FSM R. 18, 20 (Pon. 1981).

The right of citizens to express their views, including views critical of public officials, is fundamental to the development of a healthy political system. Therefore, courts are generally reluctant to find that expression of opinions asserted outside of the court itself, however intemperate or misguided, constitute contempt of court. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 247-48 (Pon. 1983).

When the accused disrupts courtroom proceedings and the judge must act immediately to restore order, a trial judge may immediately convict a defendant (the accused) through a "summary contempt" procedure, that is, without prior notice or hearing. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 260 (Pon. 1983).

Voluntary acts or omissions by a person, done with knowledge of facts sufficient to warn the person that such acts or omission could create a substantial risk of court delay, may constitute intentional obstruction of the administration of justice. In re Tarpley, 2 FSM R. 221, 224 (Pon. 1986).

When counsel receives notice of a hearing, yet intentionally departs without making adequate efforts to reschedule the hearing or to assure that someone will appear on the client's behalf, he knowingly creates a substantial risk of obstruction of justice. In re Tarpley, 2 FSM R. 221, 224-25 (Pon. 1986).

"Intentional Obstruction," as specified in 4 F.S.M.C. 119, requires that the consequences of the act are the purpose for which it was done, or that the consequences were substantially certain to follow the act. In re Tarpley (II), 3 FSM R. 145, 149 (App. 1987).

One who acts negligently but whose actions do not create a substantial risk of obstruction, may not be deemed to have acted with the necessary intention to be found in contempt. In re Tarpley (II), 3 FSM R. 145, 150 (App. 1987).

Where the record reflects that assets were removed from an insolvent's warehouse by its president following the issuance of a writ of execution banning removal of the insolvent's property and no evidence was presented which showed that the assets removed were not the insolvent's property, a reasonable trier of fact could infer that the assets belonged to the insolvent and could base the president's conviction for contempt of court upon such a finding. Semes v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 49, 51 (App. 1991).

Where the record lacked any identifiable order directing a particular counsel to appear before the court, insofar as the court's expectation was that "somebody" from the Office of the Public Defender appear, no affirmative duty to appear existed; nor did any intentional obstruction of the administration of justice occur to support the lower court's finding of contempt against counsel. In re Powell, 5 FSM R. 114, 117 (App. 1991).

A garnishee who deliberately disobeys a court order may be held in contempt of court. Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 6 FSM R. 135, 136 (Pon. 1993).

An appellate court cannot hold a party in contempt for violating a trial court's orders because his actions were not a violation of the appellate court's orders or done in the appellate court's presence. Onopwi v. Aizawa, 6 FSM R. 537, 539 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The inability of an alleged contemnor, without fault on his part to obey a court order generally absolves him from being held in contempt for violating that order, but such a defense is effective only where, after using due diligence, the person still is not able to comply with the order. The defense of inability to comply is not available where the contemnor has voluntarily created the incapacity. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 452 (App. 1996).

FSM law allows imprisonment of a debtor for "not more than six months" if he is "adjudged in contempt as a civil matter" for failure "without good cause to comply with any order in aid of judgment." 6 F.S.M.C. 1412. The inability of a judgment debtor to comply with an order in aid of judgment without fault on his part after his exercise of due diligence constitutes "good cause" within the meaning of the statute. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 452 (App. 1996).

Conduct proscribed by a court order may be punished as contempt even though authorized by an executive order because such activity is illegal, and under a government of laws, illegal conduct pays a price. Johnny v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 203, 208 (App. 1997).

In the Kosrae State Code, contempt of court is defined as intentionally obstructing court proceedings or court operations directly related to the administration of justice or intentionally disobeying or resisting the court's writ, process, order, rule, decree or command. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

In order to maintain order in the courtroom, courts have a limited power to make a finding of contempt "summarily" where the contemptuous conduct takes place during courtroom proceedings and is personally observed by the judge. This exception is typically used when the accused disrupts courtroom proceedings and the judge must act immediately to restore order. Fewer procedural safeguards are required in such contexts because the events have occurred before the judge's own eyes and because a reporter's transcript is often available, a hearing is less critical to ensuring that the defendant is treated fairly. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

A debtor who knew of an order, since he stipulated to it, and who had some ability to pay, as evidenced by the payments that he did make, cannot be found in contempt for failing to meet the payments under the stipulated order when there was insufficient evidence presented to establish any income sufficient to confer on the debtor the ability to pay under the order because having some ability to pay is different from having the ability to make the payments specified in the order. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 102 (Kos. 2001).

Any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful order is contempt of court. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 10 FSM R. 466, 475 (Pon. 2001).

When various recent financial exigencies have affected the judgment-debtor's ability to make the payments as pledged, and the judgment-debtor felt that a payment of no more than $50,000 could be made by the end of February, and that the remainder of the judgment could be paid by the end of the fiscal year, the court is satisfied that the judgment-debtor has not intentionally disobeyed the court's order. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 505, 506 (Chk. 2002).

The statutory remedy for violations of an order in aid of judgment is that if any debtor fails without good cause to comply with any order in aid of judgment, he may be adjudged in contempt as a civil matter. The inability of a judgment debtor to comply with an order in aid of judgment without fault on his part after his exercise of due diligence constitutes "good cause." Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 374 (App. 2003).

Contempt of court is any intentional obstruction of the administration of justice by any person or any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command. Atesom v. Kukkun, 11 FSM R. 400, 402 (Chk. 2003).

While the court cannot find, beyond a reasonable doubt, that an attorney intended either to obstruct the administration of justice or to disobey the court's order since he thought the order did not apply to him because he believed he was no longer counsel and he thought (at that time) that he had informed the court of that, it can conclude that the attorney's conduct falls below that expected of someone admitted to the FSM bar. Atesom v. Kukkun, 11 FSM R. 400, 402 (Chk. 2003).

When someone has no say over payment of judgments against the state beyond approving or disapproving vouchers that are submitted to the commission for payment he cannot be in contempt for failure to pay. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 539 (Chk. 2003).

A person's failure to obey a witness summons is considered contempt of court, and may subject the offending witness to arrest and imprisonment. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the defendants knew of two scheduled conference dates and were able to inform and/or seek leave of court to obtain a rescheduled conference date, but failed to take any action to do so prior to those conferences and when the defendants have intentionally and inexcusably delayed the litigation's progress, and since contempt of court is any intentional obstruction of the administration of justice by any person, or any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command, the defendants are in civil contempt. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ladore, 12 FSM R. 169, 170-71 (Pon. 2003).

Failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment and an injunction can be grounds for a contempt proceeding. Edwin v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 12 FSM R. 220, 222 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Neither the petitioner nor his counsel will be held in contempt of court when their failure to include the decedent's adopted daughter as an heir was not intentional since the petitioner did not inform counsel of the decedent's adopted child and counsel failed to ask the petitioner, who was a lay person not expected to know the law's requirements and expected to rely on his counsel, to verify all of the decedent's heirs. In re Skilling, 12 FSM R. 447, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Failure to pay a judgment in accordance with a court order may in the appropriate case constitute conduct that is sanctionable by an order of contempt under 4 F.S.M.C. 119. For such an order to issue, it must be shown that the putative contemnor had knowledge of the order and the ability to obey, and that he did not do so. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 561 (Chk. 2004).

When counsel's contentions are colorable and not made in bad faith, counsel is not subject to criminal liability merely because his or her interpretation or understanding of the law is incorrect. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 349 (Chk. 2005).

By failing to move from the land as they were ordered to do, a named party and another are in contempt of the court's permanent injunction because both knew of the injunction and had the ability to comply with it. Although the other was not a named party, he nevertheless knew of the order, and is subject to punishment for violating the order himself when he also encouraged the named party to stay on the land. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 15 FSM R. 285, 289 (Pon. 2007).

Contempt is any intentional obstruction of the administration of justice by any person, including any clerk or officer of the court acting in his official capacity; or any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command. The FSM Code provides for differences between civil and criminal contempt, at least in terms of adjudication. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 225 (Kos. 2010).

The elements for establishing contempt for failure to comply with or obey a court order are well established: in order for a person to be held in contempt, a court must find that he knew of the order and had the ability to comply with the order. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 225 (Kos. 2010).

For a party to be held in contempt, the court must find that he knew of the order and had the ability to comply. Implicit in the charge that the party knows of the order is the requirement that the order is in existence and is valid and actionable. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 17 FSM R. 307, 310 (Pon. 2010).

Contempt of court is the intentional obstruction of administration of justice, or the intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 197 (Pon. 2012).

Generally, the failure to obey a court's order is considered civil contempt, and when the refusal takes place outside of the court's presence, it is an indirect civil contempt. Because the court has no personal knowledge of the indirect contempt, the acts must be proven through the testimony of third parties or the contemnor. Thus minimal due process requirements apply to indirect contempts. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463-64 (Pon. 2016).

An attorney's absence alone does not constitute contempt, but if the attorney offers an insulting, frivolous, or clearly inadequate explanation, a direct contempt has been committed in the presence of the judge. Patently false, flippant, inconsistent, contradictory, and evasive replies support a contempt finding, as does an attorney's refusal to give any explanation for his or her absence or lateness in arriving for a trial or hearing since that is the equivalent of the lack of a valid excuse. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 n.10 (Pon. 2016).

Contemptuous behavior includes not only intentionally avoiding a hearing, but also intentionally arriving late for a hearing. Thus, failure to appear or even tardiness may be treated as an indirect civil contempt pursuant to 4 F.S.M.C. 119(2)(a), or as an indirect criminal contempt pursuant to 4 F.S.M.C. 119(2)(b), or both. But in either case, it cannot be treated summarily. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 (Pon. 2016).

A contemnor's intent must be ascertained from all the acts, words, and circumstances surrounding the occurrence. Ultimately, most bona fide representations tend to excuse, but cannot justify the act. Notably, an attorney's good faith belief that they were not obligated to appear at that time may be accepted or rejected. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

Although an act of negligence is not sufficient to support a finding of contempt, an act of willful neglect is. Thus, while a single act of negligence is usually not sufficient by itself to support a finding of contempt, a pattern of neglect can give rise to the inference of an intentional design to disobey. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 466 (Pon. 2016).

When an attorney's off-island notice was filed several weeks after a court order set the hearing date; when the off-island notice's filing indicates that the attorney knew of the conflict over a month in advance, but failed to notify the court until the last minute; and when the attorney never notified the opposing counsel, the off-island notice cannot be used to imply that the court scheduled the hearing in error since the attorney had a professional duty to not only notify the court, but also the opposing party in a timely manner in order to reschedule the hearing. While this alone is not contemptuous, it can be used as further support the inference of intent to disobey a court order when supported by a pattern or other similar acts and omissions drawn from the surrounding circumstances. Collectively, the attorney's acts and omissions form a pattern and indicate that she knew her duty, had the ability to perform it, and willfully neglected to perform it. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 466 (Pon. 2016).

When an attorney failed to appear as required and the court held a show cause hearing to determine why she failed to appear at the scheduled hearing; when, after receiving her explanation, the court found her in contempt because she knew of the hearing and had the ability to appear, at least telephonically; and when this was supported in the record, clearly and convincingly, this was an act of intentional disobedience of a court order within the meaning of 4 F.S.M.C. 119(1)(b), and a sanction will be imposed that is not punitive but which is made to compensate the opposing party for losses he incurred. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 467 (Pon. 2016).

An officer of the court should be held to a higher standard for his contumacious behavior due to his intimate knowledge of the legal system. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A drastic means by which a party may immediately challenge an interlocutory court order is to not comply with it and thus subject themselves to a contempt proceeding and then appeal the contempt finding, if there is one. Usually in such cases, if the client chooses to follow the attorney's advice, it is only the party disobeying the order, not the party's attorney, who is then subjected to a contempt proceeding, often as part of the same proceeding in which the disobeyed order was given. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court will apply the collateral bar rule to injunctions it issues. The collateral bar rule prevents defendants from defending themselves against a contempt charge on grounds that the court's injunction was unlawful or incorrect. The reason for implementing this doctrine in Chuuk is self-evident: there is a public interest in a peaceful and orderly resolution to disputes, and the orderly and peaceful resolution of disputes is completely frustrated when parties chose to disregard injunctions issued by a court while a case is pending – even if those parties allege that such injunctions are improper or unlawful. Micronesian society has customarily prized peaceful and orderly resolution of disputes.

Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434-35 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When the Governor received notice of the court order enjoining him from interfering with CPUC's business; when he did nothing to ensure compliance with the court's injunction, such as revoking the executive order creating an interim CPUC board, upon clearly gaining knowledge of the injunction's content at a later time; when the Governor affirmatively created an interim board as an intentional violation of the court's injunction since the act of writing an executive order which created a new interim board clearly shows intent to impact CPUC's management; when, even if the Governor alleged a lack of notice originally, his continued entertainment of the board upon admitting to having receiving notice of the injunction, constituted an intentional violation of the injunction; since the Governor had the ability to comply with this order by merely refraining from interfering with the CPUC's business, but instead affirmatively signed an executive order which created a new "interim CPUC Board," and upon clearly having knowledge of the injunction. Thus, he did nothing to comply with that injunction, all the elements required for finding the Governor in both criminal and civil contempt have been established. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 436 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Prior counsel is not in civil or criminal contempt when he conveyed the information from the court proceedings to his client and did not omit specifying the court's oral order; when his client knew of the order and asked his new counsel on whether it would violate the order to issue his own executive order; and when former counsel did not fail to communicate the court order to the client or avoid attempts by new counsel to contact him regarding the case's history. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 436-37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Current counsel is in contempt of court where he intentionally violated the court order when he drafted and advised the client to sign an executive order, which the client himself questioned whether he would violate the injunction and consulted counsel before signing the executive order, but counsel advised his client that he should go ahead without consulting the client's previous attorney and being aware that there was an injunction in place. Even if counsel lacked knowledge of the injunction, counsel's abstention from consulting with prior counsel constituted willful ignorance on a matter which he had an affirmative duty to know – he lacked good cause as to why he had not complied with the injunction, and his belief that the court injunction infringed on his client's rights lacks merit, since it is a defense that the court is precluded from considering under the collateral bar rule. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 437 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Attorneys are held to a higher standard of conduct as compared to other parties when issues of contempt arise. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 437 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The FSM Supreme Court has the power to punish for contempt of court based on any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 637 (Pon. 2018).

Contempt of court is any intentional obstruction of the administration of justice, including action by an officer of the court, or any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 638 (Pon. 2018).

An attorney's instruction to a garnishee to disobey a lawful writ of garnishment requiring payment to the creditor and to remit the monthly rent to her clients instead constitutes contempt of court. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 638 (Pon. 2018).

A garnishee's payment of the monthly rent to the debtor or to his attorney does not excuse his non-compliance with the writ of garnishment, because clients are held accountable for their attorney's acts or omissions. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 638-39 (Pon. 2018).

A garnishee's attorney, as an officer of the court, is obligated to advise her garnishee client to comply with the writ of garnishment, and to transmit the garnishee's monthly payments to the creditor and not to her other clients, who were not entitled to receive those funds. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 (Pon. 2018).

Any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful order is contempt of court, and a non-party may be in contempt of a court order. Thus, a garnishee who deliberately disobeys a court order may be held in contempt of court. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 (Pon. 2018).

A garnishee is in contempt of court for intentional disobedience of the writ of garnishment when he had assistance of counsel, had notice and knowledge of the writ of garnishment requiring payments to the creditor, and had the ability to comply with the writ because he gave the full amount of the monthly rent payments to other persons. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 (Pon. 2018).

When the matter concerned an order to show cause why a garnishee should not be held in contempt and evidence was obtained during the contempt hearing that the garnishee's attorney may also have been in violation of the court's writ of garnishment, the court may set an order to show cause hearing for attorney. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 640 (Pon. 2018).

– Civil

Before a trial court can hold a defendant in civil contempt of a court order it must find that the alleged contemnor knew of the court order and it must find that the alleged contemnor had the ability to comply with that order. Hadley v. Bank of Hawaii, 7 FSM R. 449, 452 (App. 1996).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is that the former is prospective, while the latter is retrospective, which is to say that a civil contempt proceeding's purpose is to bring about compliance with a court order, while the criminal contempt's purpose is to punish for past wrongful conduct. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

The court may not punish a contemnor for civil contempt where the contemnor lacks the ability, through no fault of his own, to comply with the order, or, in other words, where the contemnor lacks the ability to purge the contempt. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

When a person no longer has the ability to purge the contempt by complying with the court's orders, he is not subject to punishment for civil contempt. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

Before a trial court can hold a defendant in civil contempt of court for violating an order in aid of judgment on a debt, it must find that the alleged contemnor both knew of the court order and had the ability to comply with that order. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 373 (App. 2003).

Traditionally the burden has been on the movant to show that the debtor has the ability to comply with the court order. This has been deemed reasonable because in the FSM debtors usually appear pro se and creditors do not. Once this burden has been met, it is then the debtor's burden to show that he no longer has the ability to comply through no fault of his own despite his exercise of due diligence. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 373-74 (App. 2003).

A finding that a judgment debtor is in civil contempt will be set aside on appeal only if it is clearly erroneous. In determining whether a factual finding is clearly erroneous, an appellate court must view the evidence in the light most favorable to the appellee. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 374 (App. 2003).

Civil contempt is not punishment for the failure to pay a debt. It is a prospective remedial measure designed to encourage, or even coerce, compliance with a lawful court order when the contemnor has been found to have the ability to comply with that order. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367,

382 (App. 2003).

A person sent to jail after being adjudged in civil contempt can get out of jail anytime he or she chooses merely by complying with the court order and thereby purging himself or herself of the contempt because 6 F.S.M.C. 1412 provides that upon an adjudication of civil contempt, the contemnor shall be committed to jail until he complies with the order. The purpose of a civil contempt adjudication is to secure compliance with a lawful court order when the contemnor has the ability to do so. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 382 (App. 2003).

A finding of civil contempt necessitates a finding that the defendant failed without good cause to comply with the court order. Good cause is the inability of a judgment debtor to comply with an order in aid of judgment without fault on his part after his exercise of due diligence. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 382 (App. 2003).

When the court has found the defendants in civil contempt, it may order them imprisoned until such time as they comply with the orders issued to date and/or pay an amount necessary to compensate the court and plaintiff for the wasted time and expense involved in having held and set over pretrial conferences that the defendants never timely rescheduled nor attended; but if, in the court's opinion, imprisonment is a less suitable punishment than a ruling that by its nature will move this litigation to its conclusion, and when the defendant's only asserted defense to having defaulted on the underlying promissory note was his unemployment and inability to pay and he is now employed, the court may order the defendants to settle the case and file a stipulated judgment or the court will strike defendants' answer and enter a default judgment against the defendants, grant a motion for order in aid of judgment, the plaintiff files one, hold a hearing thereon, make findings as to the defendants' ability to pay, and if warranted, order the defendants' wages garnished for such amount as the court deems appropriate in light of those findings. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ladore, 12 FSM R. 169, 171-72 (Pon. 2003).

Civil contempt is a prospective remedial measure designed to encourage, or even coerce, compliance with a lawful court order when the contemnor has been found to have the ability to comply with that order. On the other hand, criminal contempt is retrospective and is punishment for past wrongful conduct. It is not designed to secure compliance with a court order, but instead punishes the intentional violation of a lawful court order. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 252 (App. 2006).

Civil contempt may be employed to coerce compliance with the trial court's orders compelling discovery. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 253 (App. 2006).

The court will not issue an order to show cause why a defendant should not be held in contempt for his failure to appear at the start of trial on February 5, 2001 since civil contempt is inapplicable because the civil contempt is a remedial measure to coerce compliance, and the court can not now coerce the defendant to appear on time on February 5, 2001. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 355, 361 (Pon. 2006).

One of the factors that the court must consider in making a finding of civil contempt is whether the relief requested is primarily for the benefit of the complainant. RRG (FSM) Ltd. v. Maezoto, 15 FSM R. 243, 244 (Pon. 2007).

When the relief sought is an order requiring payment of fees owed not to the movant, but to another, the relief sought is not primarily for the movant's benefit. Accordingly, the motion for an order for parties to show cause why they should not be held in contempt will be denied. RRG (FSM) Ltd. v. Maezoto, 15 FSM R. 243, 244 (Pon. 2007).

One difference between civil and criminal contempt revolves around intent. An essential element of a criminal contempt is the subjective intent to defy the court's authority. The requisite intent is specific intent, such that mere negligent failure to comply is not enough, but a finding of the requisite intent will not be negated because a defendant was not specifically informed of the consequences for disobedience. FSM

Although civil contempt does not require a finding of specific intent, it is not enough to find that noncompliance was willful, as shown by knowledge of the order; there must also be a recital, or a finding in the record, that there was an ability to comply. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 225-26 (Kos. 2010).

By statute, contempt proceedings to enforce judgments and orders in aid of judgment are meant to be civil matters. Further, by statute, orders in aid of judgment require hearings in which the court determines the judgment debtor's ability to pay. Since a judgment debtor is present at such hearings, no order in aid of judgment can logically issue without the court's determination of the debtor's ability to pay and the debtor's knowledge of the order in aid. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 226 (Kos. 2010).

In the context of failure to comply with an order in aid of judgment, there are four points in time when there may be a question of ability to pay: 1) when the order in aid was issued; 2) when the debtor misses a payment; 3) when the motion is submitted; and 4) when the hearing is held. Because the court assesses ability to pay when the order in aid is issued, the first point is irrelevant and because civil contempt is not used to punish past misconduct, ability to pay at the second point is similarly irrelevant, unless the moving party wishes to request criminal contempt proceedings, in which case the court may refer the matter to the appropriate government prosecutor. The remaining times are when the motion is submitted, and when the hearing is held. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 226 (Kos. 2010).

If a debtor cannot overcome the moving party's evidence that the debtor in fact had the ability to pay when the motion was submitted, the court will find him in contempt only if he still has the same ability to pay at the time of the hearing; and in either case the moving party may request a separate adjudication as to criminal contempt. If the debtor did not have the ability to pay when the motion was submitted, the court will not entertain any request for a separate adjudication as to criminal contempt and will find him in contempt only if he has regained the same ability to pay at the time of the hearing. If the debtor's ability to pay at the time of the hearing is diminished, the court will not find him in contempt, but may issue a modified order in aid. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 227 (Kos. 2010).

When a movant fails to plead the necessary elements of civil contempt and when the movant fails to provide evidentiary support for factual contentions and because of the motion's nature, a motion to show cause why a defendant should not be held in contempt is insufficient. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 228 (Kos. 2010).

Civil contempt is a prospective remedial measure designed to encourage, or even coerce, compliance with a lawful court order when the contemnor has been found to have the ability to comply with that order, but criminal contempt is retrospective and is punishment for past wrongful conduct. Criminal contempt is not designed to secure compliance with a court order, but instead punishes the intentional violation of a lawful court order. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 352 (App. 2011).

For a civil contempt finding, it is not enough to find that noncompliance was willful, as shown by knowledge of the order; there still must also be a recital – a finding in the record – that there was an ability to comply. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 (App. 2011).

Since a finding or "recital" that there was an ability to comply is required for civil contempt, it must also be a necessary element of the more difficult to prove criminal contempt. Thus, when nowhere in its contempt order did the trial court make a finding or a "recital" that the contemnor had the ability to comply with its deadlines for filing a pretrial statement and for marking her exhibits with the clerk, the trial court's failure to find a necessary factual element is generally enough to reverse a contempt finding whether civil or criminal. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 (App. 2011).

A person accused of committing civil contempt has a right to notice of the charges and an opportunity to present a defense and mitigation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 198 (Pon. 2012).

When the parties all agreed that since the court's last order confirming that the preliminary injunction remained in place, the defendants had been complying with the injunction and that therefore, except possibly for some damages that might have accrued, there was no need to proceed on the show cause motion because it was moot. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 41a, 41c (Pon. 2015).

The major factor in determining whether a contempt is civil or criminal is the purpose for which the power is exercised. The purpose of a civil contempt is remedial or compensatory, while the purpose of a criminal contempt is punitive. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 461 (Pon. 2016).

In contempt cases, both civil and criminal relief have aspects that can be seen as either remedial or punitive or both: when a court imposes fines and punishments on a contemnor, it is not only vindicating its legal authority but also seeking to give effect to the law's purpose of modifying the contemnor's behavior. The confusion between civil and criminal contempt arises as a result of civil contempt often having the incidental effect of vindicating the court's authority, while, conversely, criminal contempt may permit the movant to derive the incidental benefit of preventing future noncompliance. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 461 n.7 (Pon. 2016).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is that the former is prospective, while the latter is retrospective, which is to say that a civil contempt proceeding's purpose is to bring about compliance with a court order, while the criminal contempt's purpose is to punish for past wrongful conduct. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 461-62 (Pon. 2016).

The relief granted in civil contempt proceedings, is compensatory or coercive. This often takes the form of a fine in the amount of the damage sustained by the plaintiff and an award of costs and attorney's fees. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 462 (Pon. 2016).

The sanction of civil contempt serves two remedial purposes, 1) to enforce compliance with a court order, and 2) to compensate for losses caused by noncompliance. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 462 (Pon. 2016).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is somewhat elusive and has plagued the courts. Contempt proceedings, while usually called civil or criminal, are, strictly speaking, neither civil nor criminal but are instead sui generis. They partake of the characteristics of both but are procedurally different from other actions. Despite the verbiage used to designate them, they are neither wholly civil or criminal. Thus, criminal contempt is often said not to be a crime at all. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 462-63 (Pon. 2016).

Generally, civil contempt invokes the rules of civil procedure, and criminal contempt invokes the rules of criminal procedure. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 (Pon. 2016).

Even though the court chooses to sanction an attorney with a civil contempt, that does not prohibit the court from also sanctioning the attorney with a criminal contempt. The choice is not mutually exclusive and a single contumacious act may in fact necessitate both. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 n.8 (Pon. 2016).

A contempt sanction is compensatory and correctly characterized as a civil contempt action when it goes directly to the aggrieved party's benefit, not to the state's; when the attorney's fee award is not a fixed fine, but is dependent on actual injuries incurred, and demonstrated in the record; and when the show cause hearing was ordered following a motion by the plaintiff, and not prosecuted separately by the government, nor brought sua sponte by the court itself. While it is true that the attorney did not have the ability to purge for her absence, as this is an act which has already occurred, the excuse is contemporaneous with the finding. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 (Pon. 2016).

Generally, the failure to obey a court's order is considered civil contempt, and when the refusal takes place outside of the court's presence, it is an indirect civil contempt. Because the court has no personal knowledge of the indirect contempt, the acts must be proven through the testimony of third parties or the contemnor. Thus minimal due process requirements apply to indirect contempts. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463-64 (Pon. 2016).

If the court elects to pursue an attorney's absence as a civil contempt under 4 F.S.M.C. 119(2)(a), the accused has a right to notice of the charges and an opportunity to present a defense and mitigation. In a civil contempt proceeding, this due process requirement is usually met through a show cause hearing where the defendant is given the opportunity to explain or justify the failure to appear. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 (Pon. 2016).

The movant bears the burden of establishing the elements of civil contempt by clear and convincing evidence, which is a higher standard than the preponderance of the evidence standard, common in civil cases, although not as high as beyond a reasonable doubt. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 (Pon. 2016).

The clear and convincing standard will be applied to the evidence in a civil contempt case. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

The court has the power to punish any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command and may do so either criminally or civilly, but the standard is not the same. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

The civil standard of volition is "knew and had the ability to comply." Thus, the court may not punish a contemnor for civil contempt when the contemnor lacks the ability, through no fault of his own, to comply with the order. It is not enough to find that noncompliance was willful, as shown by knowledge of the order; there still must also be a recital – a finding in the record – that there was an ability to comply. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

An attorney's representation that she forgot about the hearing, will not be accepted and the attorney will be found in contempt when she filed a motion to continue the hearing only a few days before the scheduled hearing and when, in her motion for relief, she represents that she assumed the court would grant her motion to continue and if she had known that the court would not approve her motion she would have called in telephonically. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 466 (Pon. 2016).

The moving party must show that the contemnor knew and had the ability to comply. This culpable state of mind can be ascertained through the words, acts and surrounding circumstances of the case, including a previous pattern of delay and neglect. If the court so finds, a civil sanction compensating the other party for costs and attorney's fees is appropriate. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 467 (Pon. 2016).

The standard for a civil contempt case is to find by the preponderance of the evidence that the party accused of contempt had notice of, could comply with, and never-the-less intentionally disobeyed a lawful court. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is that the former is prospective, while the latter is retrospective, which is to say that a civil contempt proceeding's purpose is to bring about compliance with a court order, while the criminal contempt's purpose is to punish for past wrongful conduct. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

One factor that the court must consider in making a finding of civil contempt is whether the relief requested is primarily for the complainant's benefit. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A finding of civil contempt necessitates a finding that the defendant failed without good cause to comply with the court order. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Anyone accused of committing a civil contempt has the right to notice, a defense, and mitigation. A person found in civil contempt may be imprisoned until such time as he complies with a court order or pays an amount necessary to compensate the injured party, or both. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The civil contempt sanction serves two remedial purposes, 1) to enforce compliance with a court order, and 2) to compensate for losses caused by noncompliance. The relief granted in civil contempt proceedings, may be compensatory or coercive. It often takes the form of a fine in the amount of the damage sustained by the plaintiff and an award of costs and attorney's fees. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Even though the court chooses to sanction an attorney with a civil contempt, that does not prohibit the court from also sanctioning the attorney with a criminal contempt. The choice is not mutually exclusive and a single contumacious act may in fact necessitate both. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Civil contempt is a prospective remedial measure designed to coerce compliance with a lawful court order when the contemnor has been found to have the ability to comply with that order. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 (Pon. 2018).

A person found in civil contempt may be imprisoned until such time as he complies with the order or pays an amount necessary to compensate the injured party or both. The FSM contempt statute expressly provides that one who violates a court order may be put in jail until such time as he or she conforms his or her conduct the court's lawful order. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 (Pon. 2018).

A person found in contempt in a case may also be subject to payments to compensate the opposing party for any additional attorney's fees and costs. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 (Pon. 2018).

A contemnor may purge himself of civil contempt by paying the arrears. Upon adjudication of civil contempt, the court may order the contemnor imprisoned until such time as he complies with the orders issued to date and/or pays an amount necessary to compensate the court and plaintiff for the wasted time and expense. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 (Pon. 2018).

For a civil contempt finding, it is not enough to find that noncompliance was willful, as shown by knowledge of the order; there still must also be a recital – a finding in the record – that there was an ability to comply. In re Contempt of Fujita, 21 FSM R. 634, 639 n.3 (Pon. 2018).

During an appeal, the respondent's pending motion for reconsideration and petitioners' pending motion for an order to show cause why the respondent should not be held in contempt, continue to be within the trial court's jurisdiction. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 386 (Pon. 2019).

The court will not consider a motion to show cause why a party should be held in contempt when the movants' counsel has withdrawn it. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 387 (Pon. 2019).

– Criminal

The need to assure fairness in judicial proceedings is especially pronounced where, as in a criminal contempt proceeding, the court itself is the accuser. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 248 (Pon. 1983).

In criminal contempt proceedings, reasonable notice of a charge and an opportunity to be heard are basic in our system of jurisprudence; these rights include a right to examine witnesses against one, to offer testimony, and to be represented by counsel. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239 250 (Pon. 1983).

To insure that order is maintained in court proceedings, courts have a limited power to make a finding of contempt summarily, where the contemptuous conduct takes place during courtroom proceedings and is personally observed by the judge, and where the judge acts immediately. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 250 (Pon. 1983).

A hearing on a charge of contempt is less critical to fairness where the events occur before the judge's own eyes and a reporter's transcript is available. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 250 (Pon. 1984).

A summary punishment always, and rightly, is regarded with disfavor. When conviction and punishment is delayed it is much more difficult to argue that action without notice or hearing of any kind is necessary to preserve order and enable the court to proceed with its business. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 251 (Pon. 1983).

Once a contemner has left the courtroom, there presumably is no immediate necessity to act without a normal hearing to preserve the integrity of the court proceedings. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 251 (Pon. 1983).

Criminal contempt is normally considered a criminal case because the charge exposes the defendant to the possibility of imprisonment. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 260 (Pon. 1983).

A criminal contempt charge defendant is entitled to those procedural rights normally accorded other criminal defendants. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 260 (Pon. 1983).

When the accused disrupts courtroom proceedings and the judge must act immediately to restore order, a trial judge may immediately convict a defendant (the accused) through a "summary contempt" procedure, that is, without prior notice or hearing. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 260 (Pon. 1983).

The summary contempt power may be invoked even after some delay if it was necessary for a transcript to be prepared to substantiate the contempt charge, or when the contemner is an attorney and immediate contempt proceedings may result in a mistrial. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 261 (Pon. 1983).

When the necessity to restore order by immediate court action ends, the court's summary contempt power has expired. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 261 (Pon. 1983).

While the Judiciary Act says relatively little about the appropriate distinctions between civil and criminal contempt proceedings, the statute does reveal a general expectation of Congress that the legal system here shall adhere generally to the same kinds of distinctions between civil and criminal contempt proceedings that have been established in other common law systems. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 62, 65 (Pon. 1991).

Although judiciaries are vested with power to require or authorize initiation of criminal contempt proceedings, and may appoint private counsel to prosecute those proceedings, judiciaries typically attempt to appoint for that purpose government attorneys who are already responsible for public prosecutions. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 62, 66 (Pon. 1991).

A contempt motion brought, not to obtain leverage to force compliance with a existing court order, but instead to attempt to punish the party for a previous violation is criminal in nature. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 62, 66 (Pon. 1991).

Counsel for a party in a civil action may not be appointed to prosecute the opposing party for criminal contempt for violating an order in that action because the primary focus of the private attorney is likely to be, not on the public interest, but instead upon obtaining for his or her client the benefits of the court's order. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 62, 67 (Pon. 1991).

A prosecution for criminal contempt does not pose a double jeopardy problem when previous contempt proceedings were in the nature of civil contempt, nor does it violate the statutory prohibition against successive prosecutions for contempt. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 637 (Chk. 1996).

The doctrine of collateral estoppel or issue preclusion holds that when an issue of fact or law is actually litigated and determined by a valid and final judgment, and the determination is essential to the judgment, the determination is conclusive in a subsequent action between the parties, whether on the same or a different claim. It therefore does not apply to a criminal contempt proceeding for acts after earlier civil contempt proceedings and because the burden of proof is different in a criminal proceeding and because it is not a subsequent action between the same parties. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 637-38 (Chk. 1996).

A prosecution for criminal contempt will not be dismissed on statute of limitations grounds when the information is based in part on acts within the three month statute of limitations for contempt. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 638 (Chk. 1996).

When a defendant who testified in a civil contempt proceeding was not in custody, the civil contempt proceedings were not conducted to gather evidence for use in a subsequent criminal action and because a court is not required to warn a defendant of his right to counsel before giving testimony in a civil contempt proceeding, the defendant's testimony and voluntarily submitted pleadings in a civil contempt proceeding are admissible in a later criminal contempt proceeding. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 640 & n.2 (Chk. 1996).

The standard of review for a criminal contempt conviction, like the standard for any criminal conviction, is whether the appellate court can conclude that the trier of fact reasonably could have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence which it had a right to believe and accept as true. Johnny v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 203, 206 (App. 1997).

Section 6.1104 of the Kosrae Code expressly gives criminal contempt defendants certain due process safeguards. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

In the vast majority of criminal contempt cases, the defendant is given substantially those procedural rights normally accorded to defendants in other criminal cases. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

In order to maintain order in the courtroom, courts have a limited power to make a finding of contempt "summarily" where the contemptuous conduct takes place during courtroom proceedings and is personally observed by the judge. This exception is typically used when the accused disrupts courtroom proceedings and the judge must act immediately to restore order. Fewer procedural safeguards are required in such contexts because the events have occurred before the judge's own eyes and because a reporter's transcript is often available, a hearing is less critical to ensuring that the defendant is treated fairly. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

In situations in which attorneys or witnesses have been held in criminal contempt of court for failure to appear at court hearings, the FSM Supreme Court trial court has given notice that it was considering holding kthe defendant in criminal contempt, has taken testimony from the defendant, and has considered whether the defendant's conduct in missing the hearing was intentional. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424-25 (App. 1998).

Summary contempt proceedings are viewed with disfavor. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 425 (App. 1998).

Contempt of court is not a matter between opposing litigants, it is a matter between the offending person and the court. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 426 (App. 1998).

Criminal contempt requires a specific intent to consciously disregard an order of the court, and willfulness does not exist where a defendant pursues in good faith a plausible though mistaken alternative. Mere negligent failure to comply with an order of the court is not enough. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 426 (App. 1998).

There must be an identifiable, specific order in the record creating an affirmative duty to appear in order for an alleged contemnor to be guilty of contempt for non-appearance. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 426 (App. 1998).

A summary order of contempt for non-appearance violates an accused's right to due process under the Kosrae Constitution. Accordingly, on appeal the conviction will be vacated and remanded. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 411, 418 (App. 1998).

A criminal contempt proceeding is maintained to vindicate the authority of the court or to punish otherwise for conduct offensive to the public in violation of a court order. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1999).

As a criminal contempt remedy is designed for individual deterrence, to punish for intentional disobedience of the court's orders, a defendant's status as a first time offender is not a mitigating factor in his sentencing. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 188 (App. 1999).

In the usual criminal contempt proceeding, the defendant is charged with criminal contempt by a government attorney. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 189 & n.3 (App. 1999).

Criminal contempt proceedings arising out of civil litigation are between the public and the defendant, and are not a part of the original cause. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 189 (App. 1999).

Criminal contempt proceedings are instituted to protect the public interest of maintaining respect for the judicial system, and are not merely a stronger form of civil contempt sanctions against a defendant. Cheida v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 183, 189 (App. 1999).

An attorney is entitled to appropriate notice and an opportunity to be heard before any sanction is imposed on him, whether that sanction is imposed on him under the civil procedure rules, the criminal contempt statute, or some other court power. In re Sanction of Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 79, 84 (App. 2001).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is that the former is prospective, while the latter is retrospective, which is to say that a civil contempt proceeding's purpose is to bring about compliance with a court order, while the criminal contempt's purpose is to punish for past wrongful conduct. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

A request that someone be punished for his failure to pay a judgment during the period when he did have the ability to comply with the court's orders, is, since the contention relies on past conduct, a request that the court find him in criminal contempt. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

Criminal contempt is not a specified remedy in 6 F.S.M.C. 1412, but is an available remedy under the general FSM contempt statute, 4 F.S.M.C. 119, under which the court may punish any intentional disobedience to a lawful court order. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

An essential element of a criminal contempt is the subjective intent to defy the court's authority. Davis

v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

A finance director's actions in attempting to achieve payment of a judgment indicates that he lacks the subjective intent necessary for criminal contempt and a court therefore cannot hold him in contempt. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

A criminal contemnor's intent must be ascertained from all the acts, words, and circumstances surrounding the occurrence. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 125, 127 (Chk. 2001).

Criminal contempt (available under 4 F.S.M.C. 119) is retrospective and is punishment for past wrongful conduct. It is not designed to secure compliance with a court order, but instead punishes the intentional violation of a lawful court order. Except for summary cases when the contempt is before a judge and is needed to maintain courtroom decorum, criminal contempt cases are normally prosecuted by the government, and not by an opposing party. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 382 n.23 (App. 2003).

An attorney is not liable for criminal contempt for advising his client in good faith to assert his or her privilege against self-incrimination. For an attorney in the Federated States of Micronesia to be liable for criminal contempt for advising a client to assert his or her right to self-incrimination, the attorney must have given that advice in bad faith. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 349 (Chk. 2005).

Punishment, through criminal contempt, cannot be employed where Rule 37 sanctions may be. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 253 (App. 2006).

When the trial court had abandoned any further attempts at coercion and imposed Rule 37(b)(2) and 37(b)(2)(A) sanctions and, although it is uncertain whether the contempt sanction was actually ever imposed because the trial court let the Rule 37 sanctions "stand" as the contempt sanctions, if the contempt sanctions were, in fact, imposed, they were not civil in nature and must be reversed, and if none were imposed, then, in light of the Rule 37(b)(2) sanctions, the contempt finding must be vacated because no further purpose can be served by their imposition. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 253 (App. 2006).

Rule 37(b)(2) sanctions are not inherently criminal in nature and criminal due process protections do not have to be followed before they can be imposed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 253 (App. 2006).

When an attorney's inappropriate, intemperate, and ill-conceived remarks about the court were neither included in the contempt charge nor mentioned in the information against him and when bad faith was not pled, reliance on the attorney's unmentioned improper remarks to allege his bad faith when that element was not pled in the criminal information is a belated rationalization. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 2006).

Any request in 2005 for an order to show cause why a defendant should not be held in criminal contempt for failure to appear at the start of the February 5, 2001 trial as required by the witness subpoena served on him, comes much too late since anyone charged with criminal contempt must be charged within three months of the contempt. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 355, 361 (Pon. 2006).

Except for summary cases when the contempt is before a judge and is needed to maintain courtroom decorum, criminal contempt cases are normally prosecuted by the government, and not by an opposing party. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 225 (Kos. 2010).

One difference between civil and criminal contempt revolves around intent. An essential element of a criminal contempt is the subjective intent to defy the court's authority. The requisite intent is specific intent, such that mere negligent failure to comply is not enough, but a finding of the requisite intent will not be negated because a defendant was not specifically informed of the consequences for disobedience. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 225 (Kos. 2010).

If a debtor cannot overcome the moving party's evidence that the debtor in fact had the ability to pay when the motion was submitted, the court will find him in contempt only if he still has the same ability to pay at the time of the hearing; and in either case the moving party may request a separate adjudication as to criminal contempt. If the debtor did not have the ability to pay when the motion was submitted, the court will not entertain any request for a separate adjudication as to criminal contempt and will find him in contempt only if he has regained the same ability to pay at the time of the hearing. If the debtor's ability to pay at the time of the hearing is diminished, the court will not find him in contempt, but may issue a modified order in aid. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 17 FSM R. 217, 227 (Kos. 2010).

Since the defendant is entitled to those procedural rights normally accorded other criminal defendants, defendants in the vast majority of criminal contempt cases are given substantially those procedural rights normally accorded to defendants in other criminal cases. Criminal contempt convictions are not a special category of crime deserving of or requiring alternative considerations other than those specified under Chk. S.L. No. 190-08, § 27, Chk. Crim. R. 42, and case law. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 315-16 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A trial court show cause order and hearing were all part of a criminal contempt proceeding when the proceeding's purpose was not to coerce a party's compliance with its order to file a pretrial statement and to mark her exhibits with the clerk since she had already done that in time for trial and the trial had been held on time. Instead, its sole purpose was to punish her for past wrongful conduct – her alleged failure to file a pretrial statement and to mark her exhibits by the dates ordered. Thus, even though it was not labeled as such and was silent on whether the trial court considered it civil or criminal, the trial court order was a criminal contempt finding of guilt and the $200 "sanction" was a criminal sentence – a fine. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 352 (App. 2011).

Since a notice of appeal filed after the announcement of a decision, sentence or order but before entry of the judgment must be treated as filed after such entry and on the day thereof, when a party in a civil case was held in criminal contempt of court, but the contempt finding was entered on the civil docket and not on the criminal docket, the ten-day period for criminal appeals has not begun to run since no entry has yet been made on the criminal docket, making a notice of appeal filed 37 days after the contempt finding timely under Appellate Rule 4(b). Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 353 (App. 2011).

A Criminal Rule 33 motion for a new trial is not timely when it is made over seven days after the guilty finding and it thus cannot toll the time for a criminal appeal or nullify any notice of appeal filed before the motion was decided, which a timely-filed Rule 33 motion would do since if a timely motion for a new trial on any ground other than newly discovered evidence has been made, an appeal from a judgment of conviction may be taken within 10 days after the entry of an order denying the motion, but not before. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 353-54 & n.8 (App. 2011).

The standard of review for a criminal contempt conviction, as for any criminal conviction, is whether the appellate court can conclude that the trier of fact reasonably could have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence which it had a right to believe and accept as true. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 (App. 2011).

An element of criminal contempt is the subjective intent to defy the court's authority, and the requisite intent is specific intent. There is thus more to prove to show criminal contempt. There is also a higher burden of proof, beyond a reasonable doubt than the civil contempt burden of clear and convincing evidence of the predicate misconduct. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 (App. 2011).

Since a finding or "recital" that there was an ability to comply is required for civil contempt, it must also be a necessary element of the more difficult to prove criminal contempt. Thus, when nowhere in its contempt order did the trial court make a finding or a "recital" that the contemnor had the ability to comply with its deadlines for filing a pretrial statement and for marking her exhibits with the clerk, the trial court's failure to find a necessary factual element is generally enough to reverse a contempt finding whether civil or criminal. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 (App. 2011).

A criminal contempt conviction would have to be vacated when neither the trial court's contempt finding nor its sentencing were done in open court because a criminal defendant's constitutional right to a public trial requires that the finding of guilt or innocence be made in open court and that, if there is a guilty finding, then the sentence must also be imposed in open court. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

Since the criminal contempt statute provides that no punishment of a fine of more than $100 or imprisonment can be imposed unless the accused is given a right to notice of the charges, to a speedy public trial, to confront the witnesses against him, to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and to have the assistance of counsel, this statute was violated when a $200 fine was imposed without a public trial and the party having the opportunity to be represented by a public defender. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

Notice that the convicted person has a right to appeal must be given orally when a criminal contempt sentence is imposed. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

In a criminal contempt proceeding, an order to show cause (the notice) why someone should not be held in contempt must describe the contempt charged as criminal contempt as required by Criminal Procedure Rule 42(b), which requires that the notice shall state the essential facts constituting the criminal contempt charged, describing it as such. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 354 n.10 (App. 2011).

The imposition of disciplinary sanctions is subject to due-process scrutiny. An attorney is entitled to appropriate notice and an opportunity to be heard before any sanction is imposed on her whether that sanction is imposed on her under the civil procedure rules, the criminal contempt statute, or some other court power. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 305, 313 (App. 2014).

Section 119, in Title 4, undisputedly by its terms provides for criminal as well as civil contempt. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 110 (Pon. 2015).

That the criminal offense of contempt of court statute is in Title 4, instead of Title 11, is meaningless and no inference that it is not a crime can be drawn from it. This is because the classification of the titles, chapters, subchapters, and sections of the FSM Code, and the headings thereto, are made for the purpose of convenient reference and orderly arrangement, and no implication, inference, or presumption of a legislative construction can be drawn therefrom. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 110 (Pon. 2015).

In the usual criminal contempt proceeding, the defendant is charged with criminal contempt by a government attorney. The FSM Department of Justice is the office that files an information accusing a defendant of criminal contempt of a national court. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 110 (Pon. 2015).

The court rejects the notion that contempt of court is not a criminal offense and that the FSM Department of Justice cannot criminally prosecute alleged contemnors. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 110 (Pon. 2015).

Even when the court is reluctant to refer the dispute for prosecution on contempt and social security tax evasion charges, Social Security itself may direct the matter to the FSM Department of Justice's attention for investigation and further action, including possible prosecution. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 128, 130 (Pon. 2015).

The major factor in determining whether a contempt is civil or criminal is the purpose for which the power is exercised. The purpose of a civil contempt is remedial or compensatory, while the purpose of a criminal contempt is punitive. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 461 (Pon. 2016).

In contempt cases, both civil and criminal relief have aspects that can be seen as either remedial or punitive or both: when a court imposes fines and punishments on a contemnor, it is not only vindicating its legal authority but also seeking to give effect to the law's purpose of modifying the contemnor's behavior. The confusion between civil and criminal contempt arises as a result of civil contempt often having the incidental effect of vindicating the court's authority, while, conversely, criminal contempt may permit the movant to derive the incidental benefit of preventing future noncompliance. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 461 n.7 (Pon. 2016).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is that the former is prospective, while the latter is retrospective, which is to say that a civil contempt proceeding's purpose is to bring about compliance with a court order, while the criminal contempt's purpose is to punish for past wrongful conduct. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 461-62 (Pon. 2016).

Criminal contempt is retrospective and is punishment for past wrongful conduct. It is not designed to secure compliance with a court order, but instead punishes the intentional violation of a lawful court order. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 462 (Pon. 2016).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is somewhat elusive and has plagued the courts. Contempt proceedings, while usually called civil or criminal, are, strictly speaking, neither civil nor criminal but are instead sui generis. They partake of the characteristics of both but are procedurally different from other actions. Despite the verbiage used to designate them, they are neither wholly civil or criminal. Thus, criminal contempt is often said not to be a crime at all. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 462-63 (Pon. 2016).

Generally, civil contempt invokes the rules of civil procedure, and criminal contempt invokes the rules of criminal procedure. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 (Pon. 2016).

Even though the court chooses to sanction an attorney with a civil contempt, that does not prohibit the court from also sanctioning the attorney with a criminal contempt. The choice is not mutually exclusive and a single contumacious act may in fact necessitate both. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 n.8 (Pon. 2016).

The standard of review for a criminal contempt conviction under 4 F.S.M.C. 119(1)(b), like the standard for any criminal conviction, is whether the appellate court can conclude that the trier of fact reasonably could have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 n.11 (Pon. 2016).

The court has the power to punish any intentional disobedience or resistance to the court's lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command and may do so either criminally or civilly, but the standard is not the same. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

The element that escalates contempt to criminal status is the level of willfulness associated with the conduct. Criminal intent is a specific intent to consciously disregard an order of the court. Criminal intent is defined by 11 F.S.M.C. 104(4) as acting with the conscious purpose to engage in the conduct specified. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

Civil intent can be demonstrated by general intent, or by knowledge defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(5) as being aware of the nature of the conduct or omission which brings the conduct or omission within the provision of the code. This standard is expressly distinguished from mere negligence, a negligent act is one born of inattention or carelessness – the opposite of an intended act. An act, not willfully intending the result, creating a substantial risk of the unlawful result, is not an act done purposefully or intentionally. In

An attorney's representation that she forgot about the hearing, will not be accepted and the attorney will be found in contempt when she filed a motion to continue the hearing only a few days before the scheduled hearing and when, in her motion for relief, she represents that she assumed the court would grant her motion to continue and if she had known that the court would not approve her motion she would have called in telephonically. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 466 (Pon. 2016).

In order to find criminal contempt, the trier of fact must find beyond a reasonable doubt that the party accused of contempt had notice and intentionally disobeyed a lawful court order. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The distinction between civil and criminal contempt is that the former is prospective, while the latter is retrospective, which is to say that a civil contempt proceeding's purpose is to bring about compliance with a court order, while the criminal contempt's purpose is to punish for past wrongful conduct. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Criminal contempt under the FSM Code results from intentional disregard of a court order. The intentional disobedience required for a conviction for contempt necessarily includes an element of voluntariness. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Even though the court chooses to sanction an attorney with a civil contempt, that does not prohibit the court from also sanctioning the attorney with a criminal contempt. The choice is not mutually exclusive and a single contumacious act may in fact necessitate both. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Prosecution for criminal contempt does not pose a double jeopardy problem when previous contempt proceedings were in the nature of civil contempt, nor does it violate the statutory prohibition against successive prosecutions for contempt. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Any person accused of criminal contempt has the right to notice of the charges and an opportunity to present a defense and mitigation; to a speedy public trial, to confront the witnesses against him, to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, to have the assistance of counsel, and to be released on bail pending adjudication of the charges. He has the right to be charged within three months of the contempt and a right not to be charged twice for the same contempt. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

No one can be held in criminal contempt by the Pohnpei Supreme Court when the time is long past since the Pohnpei statute requires that a criminal contempt be charged within three months of the contempt. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 11 (Pon. 2018).

– Direct

In order to maintain order in the courtroom, courts have a limited power to make a finding of contempt "summarily" where the contemptuous conduct takes place during courtroom proceedings and is personally observed by the judge. This exception is typically used when the accused disrupts courtroom proceedings and the judge must act immediately to restore order. Fewer procedural safeguards are required in such contexts because the events have occurred before the judge's own eyes and because a reporter's transcript is often available, a hearing is less critical to ensuring that the defendant is treated fairly. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

The Kosrae Code and Rules of Criminal Procedure provide that a court may summarily punish a contempt committed in its presence if the justice directly saw or heard the conduct constituting the contempt and so certifies. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 424 (App. 1998).

Under Kosrae state law, summary contempt is only appropriate when the contempt is committed in the court's presence, and when the presiding justice directly saw or heard the conduct constituting the contempt. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 425 (App. 1998).

The court's second duty in reviewing a contempt action is to determine if the contempt was direct or indirect. Each class of contempt has two subcategories, direct and indirect. Thus there are four possible classifications of contempt: direct-criminal, indirect-criminal, direct-civil, and indirect-civil. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 (Pon. 2016).

A direct contempt is used by the court to protect itself against gross violations of decorum. All of the essential elements of the misconduct are under the eye of the court. Direct contempt includes words, acts, or omissions that present an imminent threat to the administration of justice; it must immediately imperil the judge in the performance of his judicial duty. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 (Pon. 2016).

An attorney's absence alone does not constitute contempt, but if the attorney offers an insulting, frivolous, or clearly inadequate explanation, a direct contempt has been committed in the presence of the judge. Patently false, flippant, inconsistent, contradictory, and evasive replies support a contempt finding, as does an attorney's refusal to give any explanation for his or her absence or lateness in arriving for a trial or hearing since that is the equivalent of the lack of a valid excuse. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 n.10 (Pon. 2016).

– Indirect

Under Kosrae law, summary contempt is not appropriate for someone's failure to appear on time. Since the alleged contempt is an indirect contempt – a contempt not in the presence of the judge – the court should schedule a show cause hearing to enable the accused to present his own defense. In re Contempt of Skilling, 8 FSM R. 419, 425 (App. 1998).

The court's second duty in reviewing a contempt action is to determine if the contempt was direct or indirect. Each class of contempt has two subcategories, direct and indirect. Thus there are four possible classifications of contempt: direct-criminal, indirect-criminal, direct-civil, and indirect-civil. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463 (Pon. 2016).

Generally, the failure to obey a court's order is considered civil contempt, and when the refusal takes place outside of the court's presence, it is an indirect civil contempt. Because the court has no personal knowledge of the indirect contempt, the acts must be proven through the testimony of third parties or the contemnor. Thus minimal due process requirements apply to indirect contempts. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 463-64 (Pon. 2016).

Contemptuous behavior includes not only intentionally avoiding a hearing, but also intentionally arriving late for a hearing. Thus, failure to appear or even tardiness may be treated as an indirect civil contempt pursuant to 4 F.S.M.C. 119(2)(a), or as an indirect criminal contempt pursuant to 4 F.S.M.C. 119(2)(b), or both. But in either case, it cannot be treated summarily. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 (Pon. 2016).

If the court elects to pursue an attorney's absence as a civil contempt under 4 F.S.M.C. 119(2)(a), the accused has a right to notice of the charges and an opportunity to present a defense and mitigation. In a civil contempt proceeding, this due process requirement is usually met through a show cause hearing where the defendant is given the opportunity to explain or justify the failure to appear. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 464 (Pon. 2016).

CONTRACTS

A seaman's contract claim against the owner of the vessel upon which he served would be regarded as falling within the FSM Supreme Court's exclusive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 68-71 (Kos. 1982).

The Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law confirms that it is the nature of the services performed and the person performing the services, rather than the stated identity of the contracting party, which determines the tax treatment for the compensation under the contract. It is of no import that the "contractor" was identified as a corporation rather than as an individual when the contract makes clear that the primary services to be rendered were those of an individual and the corporation was merely a name under which the individual conducted business. Heston v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 61, 64 (Pon. 1985).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for this court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. Review of decisions of courts of the United States, and any other jurisdictions, must proceed however against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 142 (Pon. 1985).

A message of the judicial guidance clause is that a court, when interpreting a contract, may not simply assume that reasonably intelligent Micronesians will perceive the same meaning as would reasonably intelligent Americans. Courts may not blind themselves to the pertinent aspects of Micronesian society, such as less facility in the English language, less exposure to business concepts, and paucity of legal resources, which might cause a reasonably intelligent Micronesian to perceive a meaning differently than would a person from some other nation. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 149 (Pon. 1985).

A telephone conversation between parties, in which the defendant related his desire to hire plaintiff's rental vehicle, coupled with plaintiff driving the vehicle from his place of business to defendant's place of employment, and defendant, after signing the rental agreement and returning the plaintiff to his business office, driving the vehicle away, satisfied the elements of a binding agreement. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 36 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 90-91 (Pon. 1987).

In determining whether the terms of a contract should be enforced, the court will consider the parties' justified expectations, any forfeiture that would result if enforcement were denied, and any special public interest in the enforcement of the particular term. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 197-98 (Pon. 1987).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has often decided matters of tort law without stating explicitly that state rather than national law controls, there has been acknowledgment that state law controls in the resolution of contract and tort issues. When the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, decides a matter of state law, its goal should be to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 360 n.22 (Pon. 1988).

Since general contract law falls within powers of the state, state law will be used to resolve contract disputes. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage Co., 4 FSM R. 3, 9 (Pon. 1989).

A statement that one party to a contract has a rental obligation to a nonparty does not constitute a promise to the other party to the contract that the specific rental will be paid to that nonparty. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage Co., 4 FSM R. 3, 11-12 (Pon. 1989).

It is especially important for the court to scrutinize carefully and strictly construe contractual provisions which relate to the payment of attorney's fees. Bank of the FSM v. Bartolome, 4 FSM R. 182, 185 (Pon.

1990).

Where an agreement between two parties is so vague and uncertain that the court cannot determine who is the breaching party, or cannot fashion a remedy to enforce the agreement, there is no contract. Jim v. Alik, 4 FSM R. 198, 200 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received by a party to the party who gave them where the court can find no contract. Jim v. Alik, 4 FSM R. 198, 201 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Generally, in cases requiring the interpretation or construction of contracts, the national courts would be called on to apply state law. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 218 (Pon. 1990).

Where attorney's fees claimed pursuant to a contractual provision are excessive or otherwise unreasonable, it is within the equitable and discretionary power of the court to reduce or even deny the award, despite the contractual provision. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 220 (Pon. 1990).

Where time of delivery was not of the essence of the contract and the contract was flexible in the agreed arrangements for delivery, a delivery of a bad container should not be seen as a failure of a condition to further obligations under the contract. Panuelo v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Guam, 5 FSM R. 123, 127 (Pon. 1991).

Prior representation of another party to contractual negotiations is not in and off itself sufficient to create a conflict of interest which would invalidate the negotiated contract unless it can be shown such representation was directly adverse to the other client or materially limited the interests of the present client. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 135 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Lease agreement executed by the Chuuk state government is void insofar as it purports to "incur public indebtedness" without legislative authority by way of an appropriation or statute. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 135-36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where the plaintiffs were performing their contractual obligations, neither the defendant's wishes to accommodate a municipality's environmental concerns nor the defendant's reliance upon a subsequently passed state law making the subject matter of the contract illegal but which exempts existing contracts, will prevent the defendant from being held liable for termination of the contract. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 124-25 (Pon. 1993).

Where a part of a contract provided that the state give a landowner leftover construction materials a trial court is fully warranted to believe that, by giving the landowner the opportunity to take whatever leftover materials he wanted, the state gave him the materials. Kinere v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 307, 309 (App. 1993).

Problems regarding the timing of performance, or the existence of vague terms will not necessarily interfere with the enforceability of a contract. Iriarte v. Micronesian Developers, Inc., 6 FSM R. 332, 335 (Pon. 1994).

Where a stipulated preliminary injunction is void because of the judge's disqualification and because of the stipulated dismissal of the court case in which it was issued, factual questions must be resolved before deciding whether it is enforceable as an independent contract. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 391-92 (Pon. 1994).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies where there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or another reason and requires a party to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 392 (Pon. 1994).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of the constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia, but review of decisions of courts of the United States or other jurisdictions, must proceed against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture. Black Micro Corp. v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 311, 314 (Pon. 1995).

A state as a party to a contract has the same rights as any party to a contract and may exercise all the rights that the parties have agreed upon in the contract itself. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 342 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Since freedom of will is essential to the validity of a contract, an agreement obtained by duress, coercion, or intimidation is invalid. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 588 (App. 1996).

Where the existence of a contract is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. The standard of review for findings of fact is whether the trial court's findings are clearly erroneous. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 620 (App. 1996).

State law controls in the resolution of contract and tort issues. When the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, decides a matter of state law, its goal should be to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. When no existing case law is found the FSM Supreme Court must decide issues of tort law by applying the law as it believes the state court would. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 294-95 (Pon. 1998).

Principles of contract are inapplicable to employment cases when the proper issue is whether plaintiff has shown a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Truk State Public Service System Act. Hauk v. Terravecchia, 8 FSM R. 394, 396 (Chk. 1998).

An officer's authority to contract for a corporation may be actual or apparent, and may result from the officer's conduct and the acquiescence thereto by the directors. The corporation may be estopped to deny the officer's authority by having accepted the benefit of the contract. Generally, an officer's authority to act for his corporation with reference to contracts is a question of fact to be determined by the trier of fact. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the parties did not reach a full understanding of what would be provided in exchange for the right to build an access road across the plaintiffs' land, but the defendant did agree to compensate the plaintiffs in some way, and when the defendant represented to the plaintiffs that the access road, once constructed, would be usable by the plaintiffs' vehicle, the defendant is liable to make the road passable by car or truck. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 539-40 (Pon. 1998).

An open account is not self-proving. An account must be supported by an evidentiary foundation to demonstrate the accuracy of the account. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 15 (Yap 1999).

Problems regarding the timing of performance will not necessarily interfere with the enforceability of a contract. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 64 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An open account is an account based upon running or concurrent dealing between the parties which has not been closed, settled, or stated, and which is kept unclosed with the expectation of further transactions. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 78 (Kos. 1999).

In an action brought to recover the balance due upon a mutual and open account, or upon a cause of action on which partial payments have been made, the cause of action shall be considered to have accrued at the time of the last item proved in the account. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R.

75, 78 (Kos. 1999).

The statute of limitations for an action to collect the balance due on an open account is six years from the accrual date of the cause of action. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 78 (Kos. 1999).

When a plaintiff's interest and attorney's fee claim rests on a paragraph on the bottom left portion of each invoice and none of the invoices bears the defendant's signature, an issue of fact exists as to whether this pre-judgment interest and fee clause ever formed a material part of the open account agreement between the parties. Summary judgment is therefore denied on the issue. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 79 (Kos. 1999).

When the existence of a contract is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Lessors are entitled to the unpaid rent from time lessees stopped paying rent until the time lessors terminated the lease, pursuant to the lease's terms, for lessees' failure to pay rent. Ueda v. Stephen, 9 FSM R. 195, 196 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

In determining whether the terms of a contract should be enforced, the court will consider the parties' justified expectations, any forfeiture that would result if enforcement were denied, and any special public interest in the enforcement of the particular term. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When matters outside the pleadings are presented to and not excluded by the court, the motion will be treated as one for summary judgment and disposed of as provided in Rule 56. Such consideration of extra-pleading material causes the "conversion" of the motion to dismiss to one for summary judgment, but parties have been allowed to go beyond the question of the complaint's formal sufficiency and introduce affidavits and other matters in conjunction with the Rule 12(b)(6) motion to ascertain whether there is any merit, to the claim, when the extra-pleading material offered by the plaintiffs, as respondents to the motion, tends merely to buttress the complaint's allegations. If the court finds that the complaint's allegations are sufficient to state a cause of action, it will not consider the extra-pleading material, and will treat the motion as titled, i.e., as a motion to dismiss, and not one for summary judgment, and denies the motion to dismiss. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 9 FSM R. 530a, 530b-30c (Pon. 2000).

A plaintiff's claim for payment arises at the time that the payment became due because a cause of action arises when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete: the true test in determining when a claim arose is based upon when the plaintiff first could have maintained the action. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 556-57 (Pon. 2000).

When under the parties' contract, the defendant was to pay plaintiff within one year from the time that the defendant accepted the plaintiff's Master Plan and the Master Plan was accepted on October 3, 1994, the plaintiff's claim against defendant arose one year later on October 4, 1995. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 557 (Pon. 2000).

As a general proposition, an express contract and an implied contract for the same thing cannot exist at the same time. Where an express contract is in force, the law does not recognize an implied one. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

As a matter of law, the presence of an express written contract, which clearly sets forth the obligations of the parties, precludes a party from bringing a claim under quantum meruit. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

An agreement and promissory note that does not set out the exact amount of payments needed to make a debt current, would not make performance of that agreement impossible when the party assuming the payments could easily have calculated the amount of the payments he would have to make to bring the loan current. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 2001).

When the existence of a contract is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Where no contract exists, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under equitable doctrines. The doctrine of promissory estoppel allows enforcement of promises that induce reliance. The doctrine of promissory estoppel, also referred to as detrimental reliance, is summarized as: A promise which the promisor should reasonably expect to induce action on the part of the promisee, and which does induce such action, is binding if justice requires enforcement of the promise. The remedy for breach may be limited as justice requires. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, a person's reliance upon a promise may create rights and duties. The finding of detrimental reliance does not depend upon finding any agreement or consideration. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Where no contract existed, a court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies where there is an unenforceable contract. It requires a party to either return what has been received or pay the other party for it. The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A breach of contract and warranty claim that all defendants had warranted that the construction project would be a reasonably safe workplace will be dismissed when the contract does not contain such a warranty, and no other evidence supports the allegation that such an express warranty was made. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2001).

A parol agreement inconsistent with a written agreement made contemporaneously therewith is void and unenforceable, unless it was omitted from the written contract by fraud, accident, or mistake. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 10 FSM R. 479, 480 (Pon. 2001).

Neither the FSM nor Kosrae have yet adopted a Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) to govern sales of goods, although the UCC has been adopted in virtually every U.S. jurisdiction as state law. Edwin v. True Value Store, 10 FSM R. 481, 485 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the attorney-client contract is at an end without liability for breach on either side, the attorney remains entitled to compensation according to the contract terms for the services performed to date. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 10 FSM R. 493, 497 (Chk. 2002).

Contract provisions for the payment of attorney's fees will be enforced only to the extent that the fees demanded are reasonable. In debt collection cases, the amount awarded for attorney's fees should not exceed 15 percent of the outstanding principal and interest. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 526 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When there was no legal requirement for the lessor to offer insurance to the lessee in a car rental agreement, the lessor's failure to offer insurance to the lessee in a rental agreement does not serve as a defense to the damages assessed against the lessee for an accident. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 527 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An attorney's fee must be reasonable, and the court must make such a finding. Therefore, contract provisions for the payment of attorney's fees will be enforced only to the extent that the fees demanded are reasonable. In debt collection cases, the amount awarded for attorney's fees should not exceed 15 percent of the outstanding principal and interest. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 531, 532-33 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction and has concurrent original jurisdiction to try all civil cases. As such, it may exercise, subject to the principle of forum non conveniens, jurisdiction over contract cases generally, regardless of where the contract was formed, unless exclusive jurisdiction for that particular contract resides in some other court. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 537 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

That a contract was formed in another jurisdiction does not deprive a court of jurisdiction over a dispute over or enforcement of that contract. It may, however, involve a choice of law problem – contract questions may need to be resolved by resort to the substantive law of the jurisdiction in which the contract was formed, but not necessarily by resort to that jurisdiction's courts. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 537-38 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Neither Rule 68, nor any principle of contract law, requires an acceptance to be on a different piece of paper from the offer of judgment in order for it to be valid. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 599 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When a settlement contract for landfill of Muraka was formed between the parties that was not dependent on the case's active status, the contract is still enforceable because the case's status (pending or dismissed) was not part of the agreement. Therefore, the defendant is still liable to the plaintiff because the case's dismissal did not affect the parties' contract or the court's order when the court's order was based upon the parties' agreement and not upon any trial on damages. James v. Lelu Town, 11 FSM R. 337, 339-40 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When a construction contract did not require the plaintiff contractor to perform or pay for any landfilling equipment or landfill materials or to be responsible for payment to any sub-contractor for landfilling equipment or landfill materials and when there was no written Contract Change Order, executed by the parties, as required by General Condition # 1 of the construction contract regarding payment for landfilling equipment or landfill materials, the plaintiff contractor, pursuant of the construction contract's terms, is not responsible for payment of the landfilling equipment costs or the landfill material costs. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 553 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

An experienced, certified trial counselor admitted to practice law in Kosrae is held to a higher standard regarding knowledge of contract requirements. He should have known that a valid, enforceable contract requires the material term of the cost. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 554 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The creation of laws relating to contracts is not identified in the Constitution as falling within the national government's powers. Rather, it is generally presumed to be a power of the state. Accordingly, state law determines the statute of limitations in a contract case. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

Pohnpei state law specifies limitation periods of two and twenty years for certain delineated causes of action and provides that all other actions – including contracts – must be commenced within six years after the cause of action accrues. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

Given that a cause of action accrues when a suit can be successfully maintained thereon, it is indisputable that if the construction was in fact defective, a suit could have been maintained from the date that construction was completed. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

Under the Pohnpei statute of limitations, if anyone who is liable to any action fraudulently conceals the cause of action from the knowledge of the person entitled to bring it, the action may be commenced at any time within the times limited within the statute after the person who is entitled to bring the same shall discover or shall have had reasonable opportunity to discover that he has such cause of action, and not afterwards. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

If a plaintiff fraudulently conceals allegedly defective construction methods, the six-year limitations period does not begin to run until the date on which the defendant discovered or had a reasonable opportunity to discover the alleged defect. It is not appropriate for the court, at the juncture of a motion to dismiss, to rule on an essentially factual matter. The trial's purpose will be to determine whether the construction methods that are alleged were, in fact, utilized; whether those methods were improper; and if they were, at what point the defendant knew or should have known of them. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77-78 (Pon. 2003).

A promissory note and a security agreement are enforceable contractual agreements between the parties. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

When the argument that the defendants should not be bound in their personal capacities but that only a corporation should be bound by the agreement, contradicts the promissory note's plain meaning, as it is worded, and when the individuals, in their depositions, acknowledged that they read and signed the agreement, they should not be permitted to claim that they did not understand the clear terms. And when at the same time the individuals clearly intended to encumber their personal property and assets, not merely those of the corporation, based upon the promissory note's plain, unambiguous language, the plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment as to the affirmative defense of lack of capacity. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 148 (Pon. 2003).

An MOU that contains promises between two parties for the performance of mutual obligations is a legally binding, enforceable contract. Esau v. Malem Mun. Gov't, 12 FSM R. 433, 435 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the parties entered into an oral agreement, which was later reduced to writing, whereby the plaintiff leased his property to the defendant for a monthly rent and for repairs to be completed by defendant, it is an enforceable contract. Lonno v. Talley, 12 FSM R. 484, 486 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Repeated, intentional instances of failure of a state to pay a judgment does not constitute a separate, constitutional claim for deprivation of property without due process where the original underlying claim is not constitutional in character, but is based on common law contract and when there is no constitutional claim that supports the judgment itself, nor a national statute applicable that implicates a "clear and substantial" national interest. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 561-62 (Chk. 2004).

When the plaintiffs allege two separate claims for the same damages in this suit and one sounds in contract and alleges a breach of a purchase agreement since part of the plaintiffs' agreed share of the purchase price was not paid to them and the other claim sounds in tort and alleges that the defendant was negligent in wrongfully releasing the remaining balance to someone else without taking such precautionary measures that a reasonably prudent person would be expected to take as a holder of funds that plaintiffs were entitled to, the court will analyze the contract claim first and finding a breach of the purchase agreement, need not address the plaintiffs' negligence tort claims. Edgar v. Truk Trading Corp., 13 FSM R. 112, 117 (Chk. 2005).

When the existence of a contract is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 143 (App. 2005).

The Pohnpei Development Leasehold Act says that every development lease must contain a covenant stating that the lessor shall have the rights of future benefit to the improvements placed on the land by or on behalf of the lessee and that, upon the lease's termination, existing improvements thereon shall become the property of the lessor thereof or his successor in interest without further cost or condition to be met by the lessor, the property's title holder or any successor in interest to said property. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 225 n.1 (Pon. 2005).

The term "charter party" is used in maritime law to designate the specialized form of contract for the hire of an entire ship, specified by name. "Charter party" is used synonymously with "charter." Three principal types are recognized: 1) under a time charter, the charterer engages for a fixed period of time a vessel, which remains manned and navigated by the vessel owner, to carry cargo wherever the charter instructs; 2) under a voyage charter, the charterer engages the vessel to carry goods only for a single voyage; and 3) under a demise, or bareboat charter, the charterer takes complete control of the vessel, mans it with his own crew, and is treated by law as its legal owner. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 408 (Yap 2005).

A stipulated judgment is not a judicial determination or holding. Stipulated judgments, while they are judicial acts, also have the attributes of voluntarily-undertaken contracts. A stipulated judgment (also called a consent decree) although enforceable like any other judicial decree, is not a judicial determination of any litigated right. It may be defined as a contract of the parties acknowledged in open court and ordered to be recorded by a court of competent jurisdiction. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 467-68 (Chk. 2005).

A stipulated judgment is not a judicial determination, but is a contract between the parties entering into the stipulation. A consent decree or stipulated judgment does not constitute a resolution of parties' rights but is a mere recordation of their private agreement. Once a consent decree has been entered it is generally considered to be binding on the parties and it cannot be amended or varied without each party's consent. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 468 (Chk. 2005).

When it is necessary to construe a stipulated judgment or consent decree, courts resort to ordinary principles of contract interpretation. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 468 (Chk. 2005).

To say that a plaintiff's only remedy was to sue a defendant it had contracted with on a contract theory misses the point that it was the other defendant that was unjustly enriched, and to accept that the plaintiff's only remedy would be against long defunct enterprise defendant would confer upon the plaintiff an illusory remedy, and would confound its efforts to call to account the other defendant which actually received the money the plaintiff paid to the first defendant. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 516 (App. 2005).

When the existence of a contract is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 85 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a lot was leased for the purpose of supporting air transportation and a fence's construction supported that purpose and the Lease Agreement permitted removal of soil and rock as allowed by Articles 6 through 19 of a 1984 Lease (incorporated by reference in the 1999 lease agreement), but the plaintiff neglected to submit that into evidence although by 1999 Lease Agreement's terms, Articles 6 through 19 were to be attached to it, the plaintiff has not proven that the security fence's construction, needed for airport purposes, was barred by the 1999 Lease Agreement without further compensation. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 226 (Chk. 2006).

In deciding contract cases, the Chuuk State Supreme Court has generally followed common law contract principles except when a Chuuk statute or constitutional provision is applicable. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 530 (Chk. 2007).

When the plaintiff claims ownership of the parcels based on a contract with him as grantee to exchange land for building materials and money, but the evidence supports only that the plaintiff was to receive ownership of a portion of the land, not to the full parcels, and when the defendants' witness agreed that the plaintiff bought a portion of land that formerly belonged to them and had an agreement to extend the boundary of that land to a specific location, the plaintiff failed to prove that he had an enforceable contract to transfer ownership of both parcels to him. The evidence only shows he received the portion of the land and had an agreement to extend the boundary of that portion. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When there is no enforceable contract, a court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under doctrines such as unjust enrichment or detrimental reliance. The doctrine of unjust enrichment is based on the idea that one person should not be unjustly enriched at the expense of another. It usually applies when a party has partly performed under a contract that is later void for mistake, fraud, illegality, impossibility, or some other reason, or where there is an implied contract. Generally, the person must either return what has been received under the contract or pay for it. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the court concludes that there was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, it will not address the plaintiff's alternative claims under unjust enrichment and promissory estoppel. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 273 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the court concludes that there was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, it will do not address the plaintiff's alternative claims under unjust enrichment and promissory estoppel. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 326 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Where liability was conceded when the defendants listed as an undisputed fact in their pretrial briefs that they each had an "open/mutual account" with the plaintiff, but the extent of those liabilities were not conceded, trials on damages only, that is, only on the issue of each business ledger's accuracy, must be held. Albert v. George, 15 FSM R. 574, 581 (App. 2008).

Although fee suits appear from a distance to be basically suits to recover on a breach of contract or, in some instances, to recover for the reasonable value of personal services, on closer inspection, the law is clear that lawyers suing clients are not treated as are merchants suing former trading partners. The procedural landscape is much narrower and more tightly regulated. The burden is on the lawyer to present detailed evidence of services actually rendered. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 147 (Chk. 2008).

There are two principal ways in which attorney-fee suits differ from other kinds of collection suits between commercial strangers. One is that the court, exercising its supervisory powers over lawyers, can reduce the amount charged, and the other is that the defenses available to clients are expanded. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 147 (Chk. 2008).

A sales contract provision that the buyer "agrees to pay all attorney's collection and court fees and an additional 33% of the principal amount and accrued interest in the event this invoice is referred to an attorney or collection agency for collection" appears, since it is included in the same sentence as "all attorney's collection and court fees," to not only constitute "double-dipping" or double recovery of attorney's fees, but it would also award attorney's fees greatly in excess of the 15% maximum usually allowed in collection cases, and will therefore not be awarded. Oceanic Lumber, Inc. v. Vincent & Bros. Constr. Co., 16 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2008).

Attorney's fees and costs are not recoverable when the plaintiff has not prevailed on any of his other claims since recovery of fees and costs is dependent upon the plaintiff successfully prevailing on some other claim. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 367 (Yap 2009).

Subject to proof at trial, a breach of an implied covenant of good faith claim may sound, at least in part, in contract rather than in tort. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 2009).

When the first question is whether there is a valid contract, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of that claim by a preponderance of evidence. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 645 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When Shigeto's contracted with Piisemwar municipality for the purchase of motors and the state was not a party to that contract and when Shigeto's Store has not raised any other basis for liability other than set-off between the contracts it had with Ruo and Piisemwar municipalities, judgment will enter for Shigeto's Store and against only Piisemwar municipality. Ruo Municipality v. Shigeto's Store, 17 FSM R. 195, 197-98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

U.S. common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for contract issues unresolved by statutes, FSM court decisions, or FSM custom and tradition. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 570 n.1 (Pon. 2011).

A subcontractor is one who is awarded a portion of an existing contract by a contractor. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 571 (Pon. 2011).

An independent contractor is one who is entrusted to undertake a specific project but who is left free to do the assigned work and to choose the method for accomplishing it. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 571 (Pon. 2011).

The two terms – subcontractor and independent contractor – are not mutually exclusive. A subcontractor may or may not have an agency relationship with the contractor and that relationship does not control whether or not a subcontract has been struck. A party might be both an independent contractor and a subcontractor. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 571 (Pon. 2011).

A subcontractor's status, when compared to that of an employee, is ordinarily that of an independent contractor. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 571 (Pon. 2011).

Subcontracting is merely "farming out" to others all or part of work contracted to be performed by the original contractor. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 572 (Pon. 2011).

When an Hawaii-based architect undertook to perform part of the contractor's existing contract but his initial designs were never used and his later conceptual design work was not actually used since the final designs were prepared by an employee of the contractor and not by an independent contractor or other subcontractor, this transaction might better be described as an unsuccessful attempt to subcontract part of the contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 573 (Pon. 2011).

Common law decisions from U.S. sources are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes or decisions of constitutional courts within the FSM. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 526 (Pon. 2013).

A plaintiff has a good chance of success on the merits when its contract with the State provided for "the first right to negotiate," and "mandatory and binding arbitration," since these clauses would be meaningless if they were not enforceable after the contract's expiration date. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 563, 567 (Pon. 2013).

When the salvage contract between the salvor and the vessel owner did not require that an invoice be presented in order that the salvor be paid, but the contract between the salvor and the insurer, the party that everyone expected would make the actual payment, did require that an invoice be presented, payment was due after an invoice was presented. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2013).

A bona fide purchaser for value is someone who buys something for value without notice of another's claim to the property and without actual or constructive notice of any defects in or infirmities, claims, or equities against the seller's title; one who has in good faith paid valuable consideration for property without notice of prior adverse claims. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 21-22 (Chk. 2013).

As a general rule, in the absence of an agreement or stipulation to the contrary, a debt is payable at the place where the creditor resides, or at his place of business, if he has one, or wherever else he may be found; and ordinarily it is the duty of the debtor to seek the creditor for the purpose of making payment, provided the creditor is within the state of his residence when the payment is due. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 145 (App. 2013).

Where the obligor on a promissory note is to make his payments does not relate to a matter of vital importance or go to the contract's essence since the note provides a number of options for place of payment, and since the obligor was not deprived of the benefits he expected to receive under the contract – his use of the bank's money (the loan) for a specified period of time. He knew he had an obligation to pay the bank and he knew (or should have known) where to pay and if he did not know it was his duty to find out where. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 145 (App. 2013).

As a matter of law, the presence of an express written contract, which clearly sets forth the parties' obligations, precludes a party from bringing a claim in equity under quantum meruit. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 172 (App. 2013).

A court will enforce a contract's unambiguous terms. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 172 (App. 2013).

When the existence of a contract is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2014).

A defendant's inability to pay does not eliminate the defendant's liability to pay. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

The duty of good faith and fair dealing is implied in the performance and enforcement of all contracts. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 362 (Pon. 2014).

The court will consider United States decisions as an appropriate source of guidance in considering unresolved questions arising in the area of contracts, and, under 1 F.S.M.C. 203, the Restatements may be used when applying common law rules in the absence of written law. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 476 (Pon. 2014).

A party is ordinarily entitled to rely on the notarized signature on an agreement when it sues on that agreement, but if the party knows before filing suit that the defendant claims not to have signed the agreement or to know anything about the agreement, the plaintiff cannot base his suit on the presumption arising from the notarized signature. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 19 FSM R. 579, 581 (Pon. 2014).

A contract is a promise or set of promises for breach of which the law gives a remedy, or the performance of which the law in some way recognizes as a duty. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 17 (Pon. 2016).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be an enforceable contract, there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration, and definite terms. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 17 (Pon. 2016).

Generally, an oral agreement is as enforceable as a written one. Reducing an agreement to writing, however, can assist the parties in assuring that all the necessary terms have been agreed to and are definite, or later assist a court in ascertaining what those terms were. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v.

Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 n.3 (Pon. 2016).

A loan application is not a contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 169 (Pon. 2017).

Contracting parties are presumed to act for themselves. Therefore an intent to benefit a third person must be clearly expressed in the contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 175 (Pon. 2017).

A contract is a promise or set of promises for breach of which the law gives a remedy, or the performance of which the law in some way recognizes as a duty. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 190 (Pon. 2017).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration and definite terms. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 191 (Pon. 2017).

A contract is a promise or set of promises for breach of which the law gives a remedy, or the performance of which the law in some way recognizes as a duty. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 296 (Pon. 2019).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 296 (Pon. 2019).

The obligation of contracts is generally limited to the parties making them. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 296 (Pon. 2019).

– Accord and Satisfaction

For there to be an accord and satisfaction, there must be an offer in full satisfaction of a debt accompanied by acts and declarations that amount to a condition that if the offer is accepted, it is in full satisfaction of the obligation. The condition must be such that the party to whom the offer is made is bound to understand that if it accepts the offer in full satisfaction, it does so subject to the condition imposed. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n (I), 7 FSM R. 387, 389 (Pon. 1996).

An affirmative defense of accord and satisfaction negotiations being underway fails when no accord and satisfaction has been agreed to, in other words, when the negotiations were not successful. FSM Dev. Bank v. Chuuk Fresh Tuna, Inc., 16 FSM R. 335, 338 (Chk. 2009).

The necessary elements to establish accord and satisfaction are 1) a claim about whose amount there exists a good faith dispute between the parties; 2) an agreement between the parties that the payment is in full satisfaction of the (contested) obligation and 3) acceptance of the payment by creditor. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 276 (Pon. 2014).

Accord and satisfaction between the parties bars any further attempt to enforce claims on the obligations that had been satisfied. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 277 (Pon. 2014).

For there to be an accord and satisfaction, there must be an offer in full satisfaction of a debt, accompanied by acts and declarations that amount to a condition that if the offer is accepted, it is in full satisfaction of the obligation. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 409 (Pon. 2016).

Although release and accord and satisfaction are both defenses that are available against an action on a judgment, when they were mentioned as affirmative defenses in a defendant's answer, but were neither raised nor mentioned in her opposition to the plaintiff's summary judgment motion, these defenses are deemed waived or abandoned. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 376 (Pon. 2019).

– Account Stated

As a general rule a creditor may rely on its running account, produced in the normal course of it business, to establish a prima facie case, but in the face of contrary credible evidence, it is insufficient to sustain the creditor's burden of proof and each item, or each item not given credit for, must be proven. But the rule does not apply when to support its running account, the plaintiff introduced copies of the accounts sent to the defendant, its internal records of the account, the record of the calls that the defendant said made sense made during the first seven-month period, the testimony of its Yap accountant and of the chief of its division of collections, and when the defendant's own testimony contradicted the record she had prepared in advance of trial showing the calls she admitted making. Worswick v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 460, 464 (App. 2000).

An account stated is a species of contract action, in which the plaintiff must prove that the defendant agreed to pay a specific amount to the plaintiff. It is an agreement, based on prior transactions between the parties, that all terms of the account are true and that the balance struck is due and owing from one party to the other. An account stated is an agreement, expressed or implied, that an examination of the account between the parties has occurred, a statement of that account has been asserted, and accepted as correct. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 146-47 (Chk. 2008).

The existence of an account stated need not be express and frequently is implied from the circumstances. For example, where a creditor renders a statement and the debtor fails to object in a reasonable time, the open account may be superseded by an account stated. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 147 n.1 (Chk. 2008).

An attorney seeking to recover unpaid attorney fees on the theory of account stated must prove the reasonable value of the services rendered if the fee agreement was entered into during the course of the attorney-client relationship. This is because when the account stated is for legal services, there is a presumption of undue influence when entered between an attorney and client during their fiduciary relationship. The attorney has the burden of showing that the transaction was fair and regular and entered voluntarily by the client with full knowledge of the facts. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 147 (Chk. 2008).

By Pohnpei statute, in an action brought to recover the balance due upon a mutual and open account, or upon a cause of action upon which partial payments have been made, the cause of action is considered to have accrued at the time of the last item proved in the account. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 70 n.3 (Pon. 2013).

An account stated is a species of contract action, in which the plaintiff must prove that the defendant agreed to pay a specific amount to the plaintiff. It is an agreement, based on prior transactions between the parties, that all terms of the account are true and that the balance struck is due and owing from one party to the other. An account stated is an agreement, expressed or implied, that an examination of the account between the parties has occurred, a statement of that account has been asserted, and accepted as correct. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 190 (Pon. 2017).

When there was no evidence produced by the plaintiff, other than the defendant's check to the plaintiff that was clearly for the defendant's loan to the plaintiff and not a partial payment to the plaintiff for the destruction of the plaintiff's vehicles, the plaintiff's claim for account stated is unsupported. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 190 (Pon. 2017).

– Assignment and Delegation

Liabilities arising from a contract are not assignable without the consent of the creditor, and the mere assumption of the debt by a third party is not sufficient to establish a novation of the original contract unless there is a clear assent by the creditor to the substitution of a new obligor. Black Micro Corp. v. Santos, 7

FSM R. 311, 314-15 (Pon. 1995).

When a person is liable for a business's debts because he is the sole proprietor of a business, the sale of the business to another who has agreed to assume the business's liabilities will not relieve him of liability if the creditor has not agreed to the assignment. Black Micro Corp. v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 311, 315 (Pon. 1995).

A party to a contract cannot relieve himself of the obligations which a contract imposed upon him merely by assigning the contract to a third person. Unless the obligee agrees otherwise, neither delegation of performance nor a contract to assume the duty made with the obligor by the person delegated discharges any duty or liability of the delegating obligor. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 74 (Pon. 2001).

Liabilities arising from a contract are not assignable without the consent of the creditor, and a third party's mere assumption of the debt is not sufficient to establish a novation of the original contract unless there is a clear assent by the creditor to the substitution of a new obligor. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 74 (Pon. 2001).

When a person is liable for a business' debts because he is the sole proprietor of a business, the sale of the business to another who has agreed to assume the business' liabilities will not relieve him of liability if the creditor has not agreed to the assignment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 74 (Pon. 2001).

When a bank agreed to allow another to take on the obligations under a promissory note, but did not agree to allow the borrowers to be free from liability on that note once they had assigned their rights, and when the language of the assignment agreement and promissory note indicates that the parties (assignors and assignee) intended that the assignors would remain liable on the promissory note, the assignors remain liable, and if the assignors are in default on the note, the bank is entitled to summary judgment against the assignors based on their breach of the duty to pay as required. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 74 (Pon. 2001).

While the fact that as part of an assignment another agreed to assume all of a debtor's liabilities under a stipulated judgment may provide the debtor with recourse against the other, it does not affect the debtor's obligation to the creditor under the judgment and payment order. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Benjamin, 10 FSM R. 100, 103 (Kos. 2001).

– Breach

A breach of contract which is material justifies a halt in performance under the contract by the injured party. Whether a breach is material is a question of fact depending on several factors, particularly where the breach deprives the injured party of the benefits of the contract. Panuelo v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Guam, 5 FSM R. 123, 128 (Pon. 1991).

A breach of contract which is material justifies a halt in performance under the contract by the injured party. Whether a breach is material is a question of fact depending on several factors, particularly when the breach deprives the injured party of the benefits of the contract. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 65 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the defendant's estimate of the construction materials' cost was a material term in the parties' agreement and the plaintiff paid the defendant the total amount due for materials, the plaintiff's refusal to provide more funds for materials does not constitute a breach of the contract because the plaintiff did not have any obligation to pay defendant any additional sums for construction materials. Therefore the defendant breached his promise to provide all necessary construction materials for the sum the plaintiff paid him. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 65 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A defendant who has completed substantial performance in constructing the plaintiff's house is entitled to payment for the second of three installments for labor and the plaintiff's failure to pay is a breach of her promise to pay the defendant the agreed amount for labor costs. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 65 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When both parties have fulfilled their obligations under the contract, there is no breach of the contract by either party. Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Breach of contract claims against Pohnpei state have a two year statute of limitations. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 557 (Pon. 2000).

When estoppel serves as the basis for a plaintiff to file a breach of contract claim and that contract claim has been time barred, the plaintiff's estoppel claim is also barred. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 559 (Pon. 2000).

When the undisputed facts show that a party clearly entered into a legally binding agreement whereby he agreed and promised to make payments to the bank in exchange for purchasing a taxi service and when he breached it by failing to make the required payments, the court will grant summary judgment to the taxi service seller. The fact that the taxi service was losing money does not excuse the buyer from his responsibility. Nor does the fact that it might have been a bad investment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 78 (Pon. 2001).

At trial, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his breach of contract claim by a preponderance of the evidence. If he fails to do so, it is appropriate for the trial court to enter judgment against him. Tulensru v. Wakuk, 10 FSM R. 128, 132 (App. 2001).

As a general proposition, a governmental entity's breach of a contract, without more, does not constitute a due process violation. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the plaintiff paid the defendant $475 as consideration for the purchase of a washing machine and the defendant promised to sell a new, working washing machine to the plaintiff, who was not able to inspect the washing machine's working condition at the store because the washer was packaged in its original cardboard container, and when the plaintiff discovered that the washing machine did not work properly only after it was installed, the defendant breached the contract by failing to provide to the plaintiff a new, working washing machine because a new washing machine is expected to work properly to wash clothes. Edwin v. True Value Store, 10 FSM R. 481, 484-85 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for). When one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

When a plaintiff has a judgment based on a common law contract, and there is no FSM statute that affects ordinary contracts in a way that shows a substantial national interest in such matters, the law of contracts is generally one in which state law controls. A governmental entity's breach of a contract, without more, does not constitute a due process violation. Barrett v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 558, 561 (Chk. 2004).

When one party fails to perform his promise, there is a breach of contract. A breach of contract which is material justifies a halt in performance under the contract by the injured party. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 15 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there was a binding purchase agreement between a land buyer and a clan land seller and the plaintiffs were intended beneficiaries of that contract and when that contract could only be modified by a consensus decision by the seller's clan members evidenced by the agreement of five or more of the six designated clan members but the purported modification did not contain five genuine signatures of the designated committee representatives, there was a breach of the purchase agreement entitling plaintiffs to damages. Edgar v. Truk Trading Corp., 13 FSM R. 112, 117-18 (Chk. 2005).

When one party fails to perform his promise, there is a breach of contract. Thus, when the plaintiff performed his promise to pay the defendant the amount of $10,000, but the defendant failed to perform her promise to transfer her right, title and interest in two parcels to the plaintiff, the defendant breached the contract with the plaintiff by her failure to perform. The defendant is liable to the plaintiff for breach of contract and the plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment on the issue of defendant's liability for breach of contract. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 400 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Since, upon the execution of a valid and legal substituted agreement the original agreement merges into and is extinguished, and since failure to perform the substituted agreement will not revive the old agreement, a 1999 lease agreement that was extinguished by a 2001 land purchase agreement will not be revived by the state's breach of the land purchase agreement. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 226 (Chk. 2006).

A land seller cannot claim a forfeiture and at the same time receive the purchase money. Accordingly, there can be no doubt that a vendor by receiving money when past due is precluded from availing himself of any right of forfeiture which has arisen because of the failure to pay on time. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

When an insurance agent's contract with the insurer contains language regarding the agent's duty to make certain that the premium checks were sent to the insurer, the agent is liable to the insurer for breach of contract when the agent failed to fulfill the contractual obligation to send the premium checks to the insurer's office in Kansas City. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 437-38 (Pon. 2009).

When the facts establish only two defendants had contracts with the plaintiff, the plaintiff's complaint alleging that all defendants breached a contract with the plaintiff will be dismissed with respect to all defendants except the two. Yoruw v. Ira, 16 FSM R. 464, 466 (Yap 2009).

A government's breach of a contract, without more, does not violate due process rights. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 484 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiffs suing their appellate attorney are seeking to recover damages in the amount they paid their attorney to handle their appeal and are not seeking to recover the amount of the land that was at issue in the appeal, the plaintiffs' claim is one for breach of contract and not legal malpractice. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 644 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the court is not looking at negligence in handling the case or the manner in which the brief was written as there was no brief written or submitted to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division and when the attorney did not guarantee a specific result, promise, warrant or specify an outcome in the appeals case, the case is a "do nothing" case where the promisor-attorney had promised to perform a certain activity, to represent the plaintiffs in handling of an appeal, and the failure to complete that action exposed the promisor-attorney to liability for breach of contract. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 644-45 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

If a party fails to perform, then the contract is breached and damages may be awarded. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 646 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A breach of contract which is material justifies a halt in performance under the contract by the injured party. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 646 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When an attorney had promised to handle an appeal case for the plaintiffs and when the attorney failed to file a brief in the case resulting in the appeal's dismissal, the attorney, by his failure to file a brief, breached his contract with the plaintiffs. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 646 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

To succeed on a breach of contract claim, a plaintiff must show that the defendant breached the contract and that the breach was material. The elements of a breach of contract claim are: 1) a valid contract, 2) a material breach, and 3) resulting damages. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 570 (Pon. 2011).

The material breach of a contract justifies the injured party's halt of performance under the contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 570 (Pon. 2011).

Not every departure from a contract's literal terms is sufficient to be deemed a material breach of a contract requirement, thereby allowing the non-breaching party to cease its performance and seek appropriate remedy. The standard of materiality for the purposes of deciding whether a contract was breached is necessarily imprecise and flexible. A breach is material when it relates to a matter of vital importance, or goes to the essence of the contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 570 (Pon. 2011).

Whether a breach is material may be a question of fact depending on several factors, particularly when the breach deprives the injured party of the contract's benefits. In some cases, the determination of whether the breach is material is a mixed question of law and fact, but when the facts are undisputed, the determination of whether there has been a material non-compliance with a contract's terms is necessarily reduced to a question of law. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 570 (Pon. 2011).

At the summary judgment stage, the nonmovant plaintiff must show that it has admissible evidence of damages that were proximately caused by the contract breach. It does not need to prove the exact amount of damages or the extent of the damages. But it must show that it has admissible evidence that can. The time to do that is now, or never. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 572 (Pon. 2011).

Causation is an essential element of damages in a breach of contract action; and, as in tort, a plaintiff must prove that a defendant's breach directly and proximately caused his or her damages. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 573 (Pon. 2011).

Even if a contract breach causes no loss or if the amount of loss is not proved with sufficient certainty, the injured party can recover as nominal damages a small sum, commonly six cents or a dollar, fixed without regard to the amount of loss. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 573 (Pon. 2011).

When a subcontracting prohibition was deemed an important public policy and when, to avoid the risk of proving actual damages or being awarded nominal damages, the FSM could have included in the contract a liquidated damages provision for a breach of that prohibition but did not, the contractor's breach of the subcontracting ban could, even if there were no direct monetary damages, entitle the FSM to terminate the contract and to nominal damages and could stand as a possible defense to a breach-of-contract counterclaim. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 573 (Pon. 2011).

A claim that a design contractor used the wrong coordinate system for a road survey work seems more like, or as much a professional malpractice claim as a breach of contract claim. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 577 n.9 (Pon. 2011).

Ordinarily in a design contract or in a construction contract, it is expected that from time to time the contractor may be asked to re-do work that has not met the contract's specifications, that is, to cure any defects, especially when a contract paragraph provides that the FSM is not obligated to pay until an assigned task has been satisfactorily completed, that is, the FSM was expected to tell the contractor to do the work over until the FSM was satisfied. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 578 n.10 (Pon. 2011).

It is difficult to see how the actions of a non-party, albeit a contract beneficiary, can be construed as a material breach of the contract by one of the two contracting parties. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 578 (Pon. 2011).

Being put in a politically awkward situation does not constitute a breach of contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 578 (Pon. 2011).

When a contract provision unequivocally authorizes a party's involvement in Asian Development Bank development projects since the ADB is a foreign donor organization and when there is no contractual provision requiring the party to contact foreign donor organizations only through the FSM diplomatic channels or requiring any particular procedure at all, the party's direct contact with the ADB may have caused puzzlement and delay by the ADB and become politically awkward for the FSM, but it was not a breach of the contract between the party and the FSM. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 579 (Pon. 2011).

When the parties' contract creates the deadlines, the tardy submission of reports, except in the most egregious cases, may be less professional malpractice than a contract breach, although even then the breach might not be material. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 582 n.16 (Pon. 2011).

When the court has nothing before it from which it can determine whether any delayed payment was made within a reasonable time, it must deny summary judgment on the claim that the contract was breached by untimely payments. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 588 (Pon. 2011).

When the court has granted the movant summary judgment on only some of the seven grounds that the nonmovant asserted were grounds for termination of the contract for cause but that the movant asserted were pretextual, the court must deny the movant summary judgment on its counterclaim that the termination was a breach of contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 590 (Pon. 2011).

As a general proposition, a governmental entity's breach of a contract, without more, does not constitute a civil rights or due process violation. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 (Chk. 2011).

When the contract clearly contemplates that the insurer's Pohnpei agents might, even in the absence of an administrative agreement, receive premium payments other than the first policy payment and when the agents' contractual obligation is clearly spelled out that the agents must immediately remit to the insurer, all money received or collected on its behalf, and that such money will be considered as the insurer's funds held in trust by the agents, the agents obviously breached this contract provision by cashing the insurer's premium checks on Pohnpei instead of immediately remitting to the insurer's home office those checks that they had received on its behalf. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 354 (App. 2012).

When a breach of contract cause of action arose on Pohnpei, Pohnpei's statute of limitations should be used. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 354 (App. 2012).

When the petitioners' breach-of-contract liability is based solely on the breach of their contractual obligation to immediately remit to the appellee all money received or collected on its behalf and when it is undisputed that they did not immediately remit to the appellee all money received on its behalf, the petitioners would still be liable to the appellee on its breach-of-contract cause of action and the judgment would remain unaltered. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 406, 408 (App. 2012).

To succeed on a breach of contract claim, a plaintiff must show: 1) an express, valid contract; 2) a material breach of that contract; and 3) resulting damages. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

The standard of materiality for the purposes of deciding whether a contract was breached is necessarily imprecise and flexible. A breach is material when it relates to a matter of vital importance, or goes to the contract's essence. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2013).

The salvor's failure to obtain an oil/water separator and to use it to process the slops was a material breach of the salvage contract when the acquisition of an oil/water separator and its use to separate the oil from the slops and return it to the vessel was a matter of vital importance the went to the salvage contract's essence; when an essential element of any modern salvage contract is the protection of the marine environment; and when the largest component of the contract price was for processing the slops. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2013).

When the only component of a salvage contract that the salvor did not satisfactorily complete was the slops processing, the salvor's material breach of failing to obtain and use an oil/water separator does not excuse performance – payment – for the rest of the salvage contract components. Nor does it excuse performance (payment) for the work that the salvor was asked to do, and which it agreed to do, that was outside the salvage contract's scope of work, but it does excuse payment for the storage of the slops since that storage would have been unnecessary if the salvor had obtained and used an oil/water separator. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2013).

Only a breach which is material, justifies a halt in performance by the injured party. A material breach is a question of fact which relies on several factors, but most particularly on whether the breach deprives the injured party of the contract's benefits. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 71 (Pon. 2013).

Since the making payments at the Pohnpei branch bank office was not a material part of loan agreement and since the bank provided a means so that loan payments and other services might still be made locally, the bank did not deprive the borrower of any benefit under the promissory note and, since the borrower provided no evidence showing that he did not know where or how to continue to make the required loan payments, he did not show that the bank's conduct rendered his performance under the contract difficult or impossible. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 71-72 (Pon. 2013).

A bank did not breach a material provision of the contract when the bank notified the borrower of the bank branch's closure and the borrower knew of alternative agents and locations of making payments due on the loan. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 72 (Pon. 2013).

Issues of whether an act was a material breach of a contract can be a mixed question of law and fact. An appellate court will review questions of law de novo and will review a trial court's factual determinations under a clearly erroneous standard. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 143 (App. 2013).

Not every departure from a contract's literal terms can be deemed a material breach of the contract thereby allowing the non-breaching party to cease its performance and seek an appropriate remedy. The standard of materiality for the purposes of deciding whether a contract was breached is necessarily imprecise and flexible. A breach is material when it relates to a matter of vital importance or goes to the contract's essence. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 144 (App. 2013).

Whether a breach is material may be a question of fact depending on several factors, particularly when the breach deprives the injured party of the contract's benefits. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 144 (App. 2013).

When a promissory note, by its express terms, did not require the obligor to pay at the Pohnpei branch office but stated that payments were to be made "to our branch address above, or at any of our other branches" and the "branch address above" was "PO BOX 280, KOLONIA, POHNPEI FM 96941," under the note's terms, payment at any branch office will do. When it is undisputed that the bank still had an office on Pohnpei, the bank cannot have breached its contract by moving its office to another location on Pohnpei. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 144 (App. 2013).

A bank does not breach its agreement with a borrower by closing its retail branch office on Pohnpei, and if it did it was not a material breach excusing performance. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 146 (App. 2013).

The statute of limitations period for a breach of contract claim against the State of Chuuk is six years. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 294 (Chk. 2014).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for). When one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 357 (Pon. 2014).

The insurer did not breach an insurance policy's terms when it denied coverage because the dependent was not a covered family member since, although she was under 25, she had not been enrolled as a full time student in a post-secondary institution of higher learning for five calendar months or more. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 358 (Pon. 2014).

Summary judgment cannot be granted on a breach of contract claim when whether the plaintiff's termination was "reasonable" is a material issue of fact in dispute since the employment contract required the plaintiff to perform to the government's reasonable satisfaction. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 410-11 (Pon. 2014).

The defendant did not breach the contracts when it is clear that the parties' contracts required only that the defendant undertake reasonable efforts to repair the plaintiff's vehicle, but did not require the defendant to guarantee success. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 476 (Pon. 2014).

The defendant did not breach the contracts since the repairs performed by the defendant were completed within a reasonable time and since the price charged by the defendant was a reasonable price. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 476-77 (Pon. 2014).

When the $250 additional labor charge constituted the reasonable charge demanded by the defendant as compensation for work performed under valid contracts with the plaintiff, the plaintiff's claim for breach of contract must fail. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 477 (Pon. 2014).

Whether a breach of contract has occurred is generally not a question of law but is rather a factual question, but when the facts are undisputed, the determination of whether there has been a material non-compliance with a contract's terms is necessarily reduced to a question of law. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

When an owner has clearly breached a construction contract by not paying for the change orders within a reasonable time, that breach excuses the builder's breach of not completing the further change orders requested by the owner. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 181 (Pon. 2017).

For a breach of contract action, the claimant must identify the contractual obligations of each party. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 365 (App. 2017).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For a promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for), and when one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 597 (Pon. 2018).

A material breach of contract justifies the injured party's halt of performance under the contract. Whether a breach is material is a question of fact depending on several factors, particularly where the breach deprives the injured party of the contract's benefits. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 597 (Pon. 2018).

When the insurer's denial of insurance benefits was lawful, the insured does not have a breach of contract claim. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

When the FSM did not (and, because of separation of powers issues, probably could not) promise a defendant that all record of the matter would be completely expunged (presumably ordered sealed), but promised to support the defendant's expungement petition, and when the FSM did not breach that plea agreement promise, the defendant is not entitled to an expungement as specific performance (or to any other remedy) for his breach of contract claim. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2019).

A corporation is an artificial, juridical person separate from its owners and is thus a separate party. Thus, when a corporation enters into a contract under its name, and the contract is executed for the corporation "by" an individual, that individual, members of the corporate board, and employees of the corporation are not liable for any breach, absent unjust or fraudulent behavior. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 296 (Pon. 2019).

A breach of contract claim (or an alternative quantum meruit and quantum valebant claim) does not involve the deprivation of preexisting property or the deprivation of statutorily vested property rights, and most certainly does not involve physical injury or deprivation of liberty. Sonden v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 465, 467 (Pon. 2020).

Pohnpei's nonpayment on a contract claim did not deprive the plaintiff of preexisting property or of statutorily vested property rights because his right to payment has not yet been determined and certainly was not protected and had not vested, and not only does the plaintiff not have a protected right, but he also does not allege that Pohnpei government officials had acted to deprive him of the right, and that these officials acted pursuant to governmental policy or custom, or were responsible for final policy making. Sonden v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 465, 467 (Pon. 2020).

Previous court decisions have uniformly held that a governmental entity's breach of contract, without more, does not constitute a due process or a civil rights violation. Sonden v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 465, 467 (Pon. 2020).

– Breach – Waiver

When, six months after the deadline for the state to either pay the plaintiff the balance of the purchase price or to deed the land back to the plaintiff, the state, having done neither, tendered to the plaintiff, and she accepted, a further payment of $24,787.50, by accepting this payment, the plaintiff is estopped from asserting that the land be deeded back to her because she has waived the breach and thus her right to enforce the land purchase agreement's "deed back" clause. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

The general rule is that when the contracting party, with knowledge of the breach of the other party, receives money in the performance of the contract, he will be held to have waived the breach. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

If the land vendor receives a partial payment of an amount past due, he is precluded from immediately asserting a forfeiture of the contract for default in payment, and a land seller, who long after all purchase payments have become due accepts a payment, that seller has waived his right to declare a forfeiture as of the time of payment. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

When a fuel retailer seeks to be reimbursed for the value of gasoline from a leaky tank and to have its supplier perform or to bear the cost for all the environmental remediation work required by the Yap EPA before his service station can reopen and when these are claims that, under the supply contract's terms, the retailer waived by his admitted failure to perform the duties – to inspect the tanks daily for water accumulation, to record the volume of fuel in each tank, to keep a daily log of fuel inventory, and to reconcile daily the measured inventory with the meter readings – contractually required of him, the supplier is entitled to summary judgment on the claims for environmental remediation and for lost product. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 366 (Yap 2009).

Although the written contract required the plaintiffs to give the defendant a non-refundable retainer fee of $5,000, the defendant waived this requirement when he only required $500, altering the contract. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 647 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the contract itself permitted waivers of the subcontracting prohibition only by the FSM's "prior written consent" and then only within the FSM's discretion and "only in exceptional cases," the prohibition was of vital importance to the contract and went to the contract's essence so that a breach of this prohibition is likely a material breach. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 572 (Pon. 2011).

When the FSM could have terminated GMP by written notice to GMP if, after notice and a hearing, the contracting officer found that GMP or its agent or representative had offered or given gratuities to any FSM officer or employee, but when the FSM never invoked this contractual procedure or gave notice or held a hearing, the FSM has waived any claim that it can use this alleged breach of contract to lawfully terminate the contract. Since the FSM failed to follow the contractual administrative procedure for termination when a gratuity allegation is made, GMP is entitled to summary judgment on the FSM's breach of contract claim based on allegations that GMP offered gratuities. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 574-75 (Pon. 2011).

Where, under a construction contract, work is accepted with knowledge that it has not been done according to the contract, or under such circumstances that knowledge of its imperfect performance may be imputed, the acceptance will generally be deemed a waiver of the defective performance. But this rule does not apply to latent defects. The rule is not any different under a construction design contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 577 (Pon. 2011).

Since the FSM did not have to accept the 35% design and could have withheld payment and insisted that GMP first conduct soil tests on the actual sites but did not, it cannot contend that, by its actions, it did not intend to waive the soil testing requirements that one time and for the Utwe and Lelu school projects when the FSM waived in writing the pre-35% design soil testing requirements for just those projects. It thus cannot claim damages for breach because the pre-design soil tests were not done. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 577 (Pon. 2011).

Although the argument that acceptance of the 100% design and payment for it is waiver of any claims that the wastewater plant design was defective and that any alleged "defects" were not latent but were obvious and patent and known beforehand could prevail on a breach of contract claim, when this is a professional malpractice tort claim, the question is not whether the contractor breached the contract's terms but whether it violated its duty of reasonable care towards its client. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 581 (Pon. 2011).

A subordinate and separable part of the contract may be waived or modified by the parties without a cancellation of the whole contract. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2014).

Strict and full performance of a contract by one party may be waived by the other party. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2014).

Waiver must be made intentionally and with knowledge of the circumstances, and can be made expressly or may be implied from the acts of the parties. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2014).

Waiver is sometimes proved by a party's express declaration or by his undisputed acts or language so inconsistent with a purpose to stand on the contract provisions as to leave no opportunity for a reasonable inference to the contrary, in which case the waiver is established as a matter of law; but more often it is sought to be proved by various species of acts and conduct permitting different inferences and not directly, unmistakably or unequivocally establishing it, in which case it is a question for the finder of fact. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2014).

A party that has waived enforcement of a certain provision may renew the obligation by giving the other party notice of its intention to subsequently enforce the provision. Since a waiver is not based on consideration, it can be recalled at any time, subject to estoppel limitations. A plaintiff would be estopped from reinstating a contract provision if the defendants could show detrimental reliance on the waiver. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendants did not present any evidence of detrimental reliance on the plaintiffs' waiver, the court must conclude that the plaintiffs had the right to reinstate the provisions of section 3 of the lease upon notice to the defendants, and when such notice was provided to the defendants in the form of a letter, the defendants, on receipt of that letter, were obligated to comply with the requirements of section 3 of the lease within a reasonable time. As the defendants have failed to comply with those provisions, they have breached that contract and the plaintiffs are entitled to relief from the court. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2014).

Since a waiver is not based on consideration, it can be recalled at any time, subject to estoppel limitations. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 281 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendants must show detrimental reliance on the plaintiffs' waiver of exclusive possession of a town lot in order to establish the affirmative defense of equitable estoppel, the defendants' argument that burying a family member on the property in 2002 constituted detrimental reliance must fail because burying the family member on the property did not change the defendants' position to their detriment, and they fail to demonstrate that they buried him in reliance on the waiver from the plaintiffs. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 281 (Pon. 2014).

Injury, detriment, or prejudice to the party claiming the estoppel is one of the essential elements of an equitable estoppel. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 281 (Pon. 2014).

The defendants' decision to have additional children did not constitute detrimental reliance on the plaintiffs' waiver when no evidence was presented at trial that would allow the court to conclude that the defendants' family planning decisions were influenced in the slightest degree by reliance on the plaintiffs' waiver. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 278, 282 (Pon. 2014).

– Conditions

A "conditional sale" is one in which the vendee receives possession of and the right to use the goods sold, but transfer of the title depends upon the performance of a condition or the occurrence of a contingency, which is usually full payment of the purchase price. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 37 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The FSM Supreme Court will not recognize conditions to a contract where they are not created by its express terms or by clear or necessary implication, and where no reasonable construction of the agreement when considered in light of circumstances surrounding its execution points to any intention of the parties to create conditions. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage Co., 4 FSM R. 3, 10-11 (Pon. 1989).

In a contract for installment shipments of goods where the parties' agreement was not in writing and there was no oral agreement or other manifestation of intent that the buyer's obligation to accept shipments was to be conditioned upon each prior shipment having arrived in timely fashion and in good condition, a nonoccurrence of the event or act is a breach of promise which gives rise to a claim for damages, rather than a failure of a condition to performance, which frees the other party from any further duty to perform the promised acts. Panuelo v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Guam, 5 FSM R. 123, 127 (Pon. 1991).

Where time of delivery was not of the essence of the contract and the contract was flexible in the agreed arrangements for delivery, a delivery of a bad container should not be seen as a failure of a condition to further obligations under the contract. Panuelo v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Guam, 5 FSM R. 123, 127 (Pon. 1991).

Requisite clarity to establish a reference in a contract as a condition precedent may be created through plain and unambiguous language or necessary implication manifested by the contract itself. Kihara v. Nanpei, 5 FSM R. 342, 344 (Pon. 1992).

Conditions to contractual obligations are not favored in the law because they tend to have the effect of creating forfeitures. Kihara v. Nanpei, 5 FSM R. 342, 344 (Pon. 1992).

Where the parties to a proposed contract have agreed that the contract is not to be effective or binding until certain conditions are performed or occur, no binding contract will arise until the conditions specified have occurred or been performed. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 388 (Pon. 1994).

Although conditions to contractual obligations are not favored in the law because they tend to have the effect of creating forfeitures, parties may create a condition to a contract through plain and unambiguous language, through necessary implication manifested by the contract itself, or in some other way that makes their intent to create a condition clear. In the absence of some such showing, courts find promises, not conditions to further performances. Adams v. Etscheit, 6 FSM R. 580, 582-83 (App. 1994).

Conditions precedent to a contract are not favored and the courts will not construe stipulations to be such unless required to do so by plain, unambiguous language or by necessary implication. Adams v. Etscheit, 6 FSM R. 580, 583 (App. 1994).

Because conditions precedent are disfavored at law and require plain and unambiguous language to establish, when differing inferences create an issue of fact, summary judgment that a condition precedent exists is inappropriate. Adams v. Etscheit, 6 FSM R. 580, 584 (App. 1994).

A contention that a contract provision is ambiguous defeats a contention that it creates a condition precedent. Conditions precedent to contractual obligations are not favored in the law and courts will not construe terms to be such unless required to do so by plain and unambiguous language or by necessary implication. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 324 (App. 1995).

When faced with an allegation that an ambiguous contract provision creates a condition, courts prefer either an interpretation that imposes on a party a duty to see that an event occurs, rather than one that makes the other party's duty conditional on the occurrence of the event, or an interpretation that will reduce an obligee's risk of forfeiture if the event does not occur. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 324 (App. 1995).

Contractual terms that provide that payment is due "when" or "not until" a stated event occurs are generally not considered to be conditions, but merely a means of measuring time, and if the stated event does not occur then the payment is nevertheless due after a reasonable time. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 324 (App. 1995).

The existence of quitclaim deeds is evidence that the parties had fulfilled their respective agreed conditions precedent to the transfer of land. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 588-89 (App. 1996).

The time for completion of a house is not a material term of the parties' agreement when nothing in the parties' oral agreement indicated that the "time was of the essence" for completion of the house within two months and when the plaintiff pointed out no particular day of completion as being crucial. Therefore, late completion of the house should not be seen as a failure of a condition to further obligations under the contract. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 64 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The filing of the appeal over land was not a breach of the defendant's condition and was not a breach of a customary settlement when the appeal was filed before the customary settlement and condition were made; and when the appeal was not decided in the defendant's favor, the defendant's condition regarding his promised grant of a portion of land was satisfied and the customary settlement and the defendant's promise were therefore enforceable. Robert v. Semuda, 11 FSM R. 165, 168 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Although conditions to contractual obligations are not favored in the law because they tend to have the effect of creating forfeitures, parties may create a condition to a contract through plain and unambiguous language, through necessary implication manifested by the contract itself, or in some other way that makes their intent to create a condition clear. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 555 (Chk. 2005).

Forfeitures are abhorrent to the law, and are construed strictly. Because the law abhors a forfeiture, the language effecting defeasance in a deed must clearly spell that fact out. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

When the land purchase agreement's forfeiture clause clearly states that title was to be returned to the seller if she was not paid in full by November 30, 2002, but that clause does not state that both the title and possession of the land were to be returned to the original land owner in the event of non-payment, the court cannot order the state to give possession of the lot to the original land owner, because contracts involving a forfeiture cannot be extended beyond the strict and literal meaning of the words used. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

A land seller cannot claim a forfeiture and at the same time receive the purchase money. Accordingly, there can be no doubt that a vendor by receiving money when past due is precluded from availing himself of any right of forfeiture which has arisen because of the failure to pay on time. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

If the land vendor receives a partial payment of an amount past due, he is precluded from immediately asserting a forfeiture of the contract for default in payment, and a land seller, who long after all purchase payments have become due accepts a payment, that seller has waived his right to declare a forfeiture as of the time of payment. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

When the plaintiff is not entitled to the state's forfeiture of the lot, she is entitled to damages. Her damages for the state's breach of the land purchase agreement are the unpaid balance of the purchase price, and if this is not paid within a reasonable time, her right to claim forfeiture of title, which was suspended by her acceptance of a late partial payment, may be revived. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

Contractual terms that provide that payment is due upon the occurrence of a stated event are generally not considered to be conditions indicating a forfeiture or a breach of contract but are merely a means of measuring time, and, if time is not of the essence of the contract, then the payment is due after a reasonable time, and what constitutes a reasonable time depends on the attendant circumstances in each case and is often based on factual determinations. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 587-88 (Pon. 2011).

Contractual terms that provide that payment is due upon the occurrence of a stated event are generally not considered to be conditions indicating a forfeiture or a material breach of contract but are merely a means of measuring time, and, if time is not of the essence of the contract, then the payment is due after a reasonable time, and what constitutes a reasonable time depends on the attendant circumstances in each case and is often based on factual determinations. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2013).

When the parties to a proposed contract have agreed that the contract is not to be effective or binding until certain conditions are performed or occur, no binding contract will arise until the conditions specified have occurred or been performed. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 224 (Pon. 2015).

– Consideration

No obligation may arise from an agreement that lacks consideration, since consideration is required for a valid contract to exist. Therefore, the termination of a contract that lacks consideration does not violate the prohibition against impairment of the obligations of contracts. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 341 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The contract law pre-existing duty rule is that a promise to perform an act which is already required supplies no consideration for the return promise or performance. On that basis, a contract may fail for lack of consideration. But a contract provision cannot be examined in isolation to determine the sufficiency of consideration as a whole. Therefore the rule does not apply where there is sufficient other consideration flowing between the parties to support an agreement and all of its provisions. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 175 (Pon. 1997).

When there was nothing of value exchanged for a promise to allow a parcel of land to be used to build a house, there was no consideration for the promise. Since consideration for a promise is required for a promise to be enforceable as a contract, when there was no consideration given in exchange for the promise, the parties did not have an enforceable contract. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Under the doctrine of promissory estoppel, a person's reliance upon a promise may create rights and duties. The finding of detrimental reliance does not depend upon finding any agreement or consideration. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A pre-existing debt establishes sufficient consideration to support the formation of a contract. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

Courts do not generally inquire into the sufficiency of consideration offered pursuant to a promissory note – parties to an agreement are free to attach value to whatever is exchanged. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 148 (Pon. 2003).

When the plaintiff had a legal right to initiate a lawsuit against a corporate defendant for its unpaid debts at the time that the promissory note was executed in 1994, but instead of initiating a lawsuit, it agreed to certain terms of payment, and required individuals to personally guarantee that payment would be made, each of the parties gained something in the execution of the promissory note and security agreement. There was thus consideration exchanged by the parties when they entered into these agreements. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 149 (Pon. 2003).

Like other contracts, contracts of guaranty must be supported by consideration, and a guaranty will not be enforced unless the promise is supported by consideration. However, if the promise of the guarantor is shown to have been given as part of a transaction or arrangement which created the guaranteed debt or obligation, the promise is supported by the same consideration which supports the principal transaction.

FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

When a guaranty was given as a part of the same transaction by which the debt to the bank was created, no independent consideration was necessary. The guaranty was supported by the same consideration that supported the transaction between the debtor and the bank. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

To be enforceable, a guaranty, like other contracts, must be supported by consideration. However, if a guaranty is made as part of a transaction or arrangement which created the guaranteed debt or obligation, it is not essential to a recovery on the promise of guaranty that the promise shall have been supported by a consideration other than that of the principal debt. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 14 FSM R. 390, 397 (App. 2006).

Courts generally do not inquire into the sufficiency of consideration. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 22 n.4 (Chk. 2013).

Good and valuable consideration is an element in proving that a buyer was a bona fide purchaser for value. Good and valuable consideration is not the equivalent of fair market value; nor is it the equivalent of book value. Good and valuable consideration is often much lower than either of these values. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 222, 226 (Chk. 2013).

If a guaranty is made as part of a transaction or arrangement which created the guaranteed debt or obligation, it is not essential to a recovery on the promise of guaranty that the promise was supported by a consideration other than that of the principal debt. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

When security, such as a guaranty, is given as part of the same transaction that created the debt to the bank, no further or independent consideration is needed. The loan itself is sufficient consideration. This principle holds true when a mortgage is the security given for a loan to a third party. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

The consideration for a mortgage may consist of a loan to a third person. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

It is not essential to a mortgage's validity that the mortgagor should have received the consideration. It is sufficient that the mortgagee parted with consideration. The consideration need not go directly from the mortgagee to the mortgagor. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

– Damages

When a car rental agreement provides that the lessee shall pay to the lessor all costs and expenses incurred as a result of loss or damage to the rented vehicle regardless of fault, then the lessor has a duty to accept the damaged vehicle and simply charge the repair costs to the lessee. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 36 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The measure of damages is the difference between the agreed price buyer was to have paid and the general market price at which seller could sell to another buyer. Panuelo v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Guam, 5 FSM R. 123, 128 (Pon. 1991).

The equitable remedy of specific performance is one where the court orders a breaching party to do that which he has agreed to do, thereby rendering the non-breaching party the exact benefit which he expected. The remedy is available when money damages are inadequate compensation for the plaintiff – when damages cannot be computed or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 126 (Pon. 1993).

Where a plaintiff makes damage claims in tort as well damage claims based on contract, contract clauses limiting the contract damages do not apply. McGillivray v. Bank of the FSM (I), 6 FSM R. 404, 409 (Pon. 1994).

The trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in a contract case. In a breach of contract case the non-breaching party is entitled to damages that will put the party in the position he or she would have been in if not for the breach. The plaintiff may be compensated for the injuries flowing from the breach either by awarding compensation for lost profits, or by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the contract. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (III), 6 FSM R. 502, 505 (Pon. 1994).

The plaintiff has the burden of proving the damages, but once a prima facie showing of damages has been made it is the defendant's burden to prove that the injuries did not result from his omission. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (III), 6 FSM R. 502, 505 (Pon. 1994).

The right to recover expenditures made in reliance on the contract has limitations. If the plaintiff would have suffered the same losses even if the defendant had performed under the contract, then the plaintiff cannot recover them, since recovery would put the plaintiff in a better position than he would have been in had the defendant performed. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (III), 6 FSM R. 502, 505 (Pon. 1994).

In order to be recoverable, contract damages must be a proximate consequence of the defendant's breach. A proximate consequence is one that flows from the act complained of, unbroken by any independent cause. Thus, where the loss would have occurred even if the defendant had not breached the contract reliance damages are not recoverable. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (III), 6 FSM R. 502, 506 (Pon. 1994).

The measure of damages for the breach of an agreement to procure insurance is the amount of loss that would have been subject to indemnification by the insurer had the insurance been properly obtained. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 250 (Chk. 1995).

If a plaintiff cannot be compensated for the value it expected from a breached contract, it might then be compensated for its reliance expenditures and placed in as good a position as it would have been if it had not entered into the contract. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 623 (App. 1996).

Generally, interest is usually included as an element of damages as a matter of right when a debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it. The complaining party has been deprived of funds to which he was entitled by virtue of the contract, the defaulting party knew the exact amount and terms of the debt, and the goal of compensation requires that the complainant be compensated for the loss of use of those funds. This compensation is made in the form of interest. In the absence of statute, an award of prejudgment interest is in the discretion of the court. Coca-Cola Beverage Co. (Micronesia) v. Edmond, 8 FSM R. 388, 392-93 (Kos. 1998).

Pre-judgment interest at the statutory, judgment rate of 9% is appropriate when the defendant wrote the insufficient funds checks to plaintiff because the defendant knew precisely the amount to which he was obligating himself, and the effective date of that commitment. Coca-Cola Beverage Co. (Micronesia) v. Edmond, 8 FSM R. 388, 393 (Kos. 1998).

The trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in a contract case. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 65 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the plaintiff has paid the defendant in full the entire sum due for construction materials and when because of the defendant's breach the plaintiff has hired a second contractor to finish her house and was required to buy certain materials necessary to complete her house, the plaintiff has suffered damages in the amount of the materials purchased by the second contractor. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 65 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A defendant who has completed substantial performance in constructing the plaintiff's house is entitled to payment for the second of three installments for labor and the plaintiff's failure to pay is a breach of her promise to pay the defendant the agreed amount for labor costs. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 65 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the defendant has breached its contract with the plaintiff, the plaintiff, who has completed the contract, is entitled to recover the difference between the contract amount and the amount the defendant has already paid. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Prejudgment interest is also recoverable in cases where the plaintiff is entitled to recover a liquidated sum of money. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the amount awarded for prejudgment interest is more than the amount designated as usurious, it is excessive and must be reduced. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When there is no statutory rate for prejudgment interest and when there is no contract provision or limitation for the award of prejudgment interest, the court may use its discretion to determine the prejudgment interest rate and may accept as reasonable the statutory 9% post-judgment interest rate. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 237 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Once a claimant's entitlement to damages is established, the amount of damages is an issue of fact for the finder of fact. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 250 (App. 1999).

The trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in contract and quasi-contract cases involving equitable doctrines, such as promissory estoppel and restitution. The plaintiff may be compensated for the injuries by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the promise. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Claimed expenditures for food and beverages will not be awarded when the purchase and consumption of these items was not dependent upon the defendant's promise, and labor costs will not be allowed as damages when there was no evidence presented at trial that the plaintiff paid any person a specific sum for labor. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Generally, pre-judgment interest is only included as an element of damages as a matter of right when a debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when he is to pay it. This occurs when a party has been deprived of funds to which he was entitled by virtue of the contract, and the defaulting party knew the exact amount and terms of the debt. In those types of cases, the goal of compensation requires that the complaining party be compensated for the loss of use of those funds. This compensation is made in the form of interest. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The court has wide discretion in the determination of the damages in a contract case. Edwin v. True Value Store, 10 FSM R. 481, 485 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the court finds the remedies provided by the UCC, Article 2, for sales of goods to be persuasive, and appropriate to provide substantial justice in a case, the court may adopt and apply its remedy principles to that case. Edwin v. True Value Store, 10 FSM R. 481, 485 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A buyer has the right to revoke his acceptance of a unit where the unit is non-conforming and the unit's value is substantially impaired. The revocation must occur within a reasonable time. Revocation of acceptance by the buyer requires the buyer to return the non-conforming goods to the seller, and substantial justice requires that the goods be returned in the same substantial condition as when accepted by the buyer. Edwin v. True Value Store, 10 FSM R. 481, 485 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The buyer's measure of damages for breach in regard to accepted goods is the difference at the time and place of acceptance between the value of the goods accepted and the value they would have had if they had been as warranted. Edwin v. True Value Store, 10 FSM R. 481, 485 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a car rental agreement provides that the lessee shall pay to the lessor all costs and expenses incurred as a result of loss or damage to the rental vehicle, then the lessor has a duty to accept the damaged vehicle and simply charge the repair costs to the lessee. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the police accident report and testimony at the trial shows that the left front fender was not damaged in the accident, repair costs for the left front fender cannot be charged to the defendant. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Generally, lost profits may be recovered in breach of contract cases, provided that certain evidentiary requirements are satisfied. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 526 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The terms "lost profits" and "revenues" are not interchangeable as they have entirely different meanings. "Revenues" are the gross receipts of the business. The term "profits" means the gross proceeds of a business transaction less the costs of the transaction. In other words, profits equal the revenues minus the costs. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 526 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Lost profits may be presumed to a natural result of a breach of contract, but a plaintiff's claim for lost profits must be clearly established. First, the plaintiff must show that there would have been a profit. The plaintiff must also prove costs of the business because it is impossible to prove profits without first proving costs. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 526 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

If the plaintiff fails to produce satisfactory evidence of costs, then the plaintiff's claim to lost profits must fail, because the trier of fact has no basis to compute profits. Jackson v. George, 10 FSM R. 523, 526 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the plaintiff breached a construction contract by not paying the defendant for the change order amount of $1,369 and when the defendant breached the contract by not paying a third party $1,000 for the design plan as agreed, the plaintiff is liable to the defendant for $1,369 for the change order and the defendant is liable to plaintiff for $1,000 for the design fee. In the final calculation, the plaintiff is liable to the defendant for $369 and the plaintiff is also liable to pay the third party directly for the $1,000 design fee. Mongkeya v. RV Constr., 11 FSM R. 234, 235-36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a terminated employee was contractually entitled to sixty days notice of termination and he would have received $3,575 in gross salary during that period and when this sum must be reduced by the $2,000 the employee diverted, the employee is entitled to $1,575 damages from his employer arising from its breach of his employment contract. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Generally, damages for breach by either party to a contract may be liquidated in the agreement, but only in an amount that is reasonable in light of the anticipated or actual loss caused by the breach and of the difficulties of proof of loss. A term fixing unreasonably large liquidated damages may be unenforceable on grounds of public policy as a penalty. Island Homes Constr. Corp. v. Falcam, 11 FSM R. 414, 416 (Pon. 2003).

When in discovery responses the amount of the plaintiffs' damages was stated as slightly more than the amount actually proven at trial, the invoices offered and received into evidence at trial establish by a preponderance of the evidence the amount of plaintiffs' damages. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc.,

12 FSM R. 234, 241-42 (Pon. 2003).

An assignment agreement that sets forth the full amount of the open accounts due, does not preclude further liability for any goods and services purchased after the date of the assignment agreement. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 242 (Pon. 2003).

The court's pretrial order did not prevent the bank from adequately defending on the question of damages when all witnesses specified in the bank's pretrial statement whose testimony summaries indicated that they had testimony to offer relevant to the question of damages were permitted to testify. Further, when the bank did not object before trial to the court's limitation of its damages witnesses, it waived any objection in this regard. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 242 (Pon. 2003).

Since the only prejudgment interest recognized so far in breach of contract cases is where the contract itself specifically provides for such a remedy, the part of a foreign judgment containing such prejudgment interest may thus be unenforceable in the FSM as against public policy. Northern Marianas Housing Corp. v. Finik, 12 FSM R. 441, 447 (Chk. 2004).

Since a plaintiff is entitled to recover the difference between the contract amount and the amount that the defendant has already paid, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the $100 per month difference between the contract monthly rental amount of $250 and the monthly $150 payment made and the plaintiff is also entitled to recover the amount necessary to complete the repairs to the ceiling and the floor that the defendant had agreed to do. Lonno v. Talley, 12 FSM R. 484, 486 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in a contract case. In a breach of contract case, the non-breaching party is entitled to damages that will put the party in the position he would have been in if not for the breach. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 15 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the defendant's obligation under the contract was to pay the plaintiff the amount of $2,400 in return for the damaged vehicle and the damages were mitigated by the plaintiff's sale of the vehicle for $800, the damages are reduced by $800 to $1,600, and judgment will be entered in the plaintiff's favor and against the defendant in the amount of $1,600. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 15 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there is no authorization for compound interest in the settlement agreement and when it is apparent that the parties, in settling their prior lawsuit, intended to apply the legal or judgment rate of interest to any unpaid settlement balances, the plaintiff's damages must therefore be calculated on a simple interest basis. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 68, 71 (Chk. 2004).

When there has been a breach of a purchase agreement entitling the plaintiffs to damages, the plaintiffs are entitled to what they expected to receive if the purchase agreement had not been breached. Edgar v. Truk Trading Corp., 13 FSM R. 112, 118 (Chk. 2005).

In a breach of contract case, the non-breaching party is entitled to damages that will put the party in the position he would have been in if not for the breach. Once a party's entitlement to damages is established, the amount of damages is an issue of fact for the finder of fact. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 402 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the contract provision for repatriation costs is not an entitlement to be paid the amount it would cost to return to the point of hire, but an obligation for the employer to pay the actual repatriation costs to the point of hire or to some other chosen less costlier place, the plaintiff will be awarded as damages the cost of shipping his household goods to Saipan, and the travel costs for him and his family from Chuuk to Saipan instead of what it would have cost to send them to Florida. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 555 (Chk. 2005).

The court may take judicial notice that the airport departure fee from Chuuk is $15 per person and that this is included in the contractual repatriation travel costs. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 555 (Chk. 2005).

On an award for unpaid salary, the defendant employer shall deduct the applicable wage and salary taxes before remitting the balance of this sum to the plaintiff employee and pay those deductions to the proper authorities. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 556 (Chk. 2005).

When the plaintiff is not entitled to the state's forfeiture of the lot, she is entitled to damages. Her damages for the state's breach of the land purchase agreement are the unpaid balance of the purchase price, and if this is not paid within a reasonable time, her right to claim forfeiture of title, which was suspended by her acceptance of a late partial payment, may be revived. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

Fifteen percent is the usual maximum allowed for attorney's fees in a collection case under FSM Supreme Court caselaw. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 244 n.4 (App. 2006).

When the trial court awarded attorney's fees against a defendant based on 15% of the judgment against him and a co-defendant was jointly and severally liable for only part of that judgment, if the co-defendant were liable for attorney's fees, its liability would be limited to 15% of the part of the judgment it was liable for. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 256 n.8 (App. 2006).

Attorney's fees are awarded to the prevailing party only if authorized by contract or by statute. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 256 (App. 2006).

When the personnel manual provides for an employee's involuntary dismissal two weeks after the director has recommended it, and when the employee was not afforded the two weeks of pay that he should have received had the procedure been followed, in this regard, the contract has been breached and the plaintiff is due his expectation damages under the contract, the amount he would have been paid for those two weeks. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 435 (Yap 2006).

The court has the discretion to award pre-judgment interest, but it is not a matter of right unless the debtor knows precisely what he is to pay and when payment is due. The purpose of awarding interest is to compensate the complaining party for losing use of the funds. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 275 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the parties have a written agreement stating that interest would be added to the unpaid balance, an award of pre-judgment interest has been upheld. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 275 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the parties have a written agreement stating that interest would be added to the unpaid balance, an award of pre-judgment interest will be upheld. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 328 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the defendant agreed to make regular payments but there was no written agreement to pay interest on the defendant's open account; when the ledger page showing payments contains a 25-cent charge at the time of each payment but this does not correspond to an interest calculation; and when there is no evidence to show interest was discussed or agreed to by the defendant, the plaintiff is not entitled to pre-judgment interest. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 328 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Damages for an insurer's claim for breach of fiduciary duty are the same as those for its contract claim, since the breach of fiduciary duty claim is also based on the breach of the agency contracts that the insurer had with its agents. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 446 (Pon. 2009).

In a contract case, the trial court has a wide discretion in determining the amount of damages since the non-breaching party is entitled to damages that will put the party in the position he would have been if not for the breach. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 646 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When an attorney failed to perform his duties as the plaintiffs' appellate lawyer, he breached the contract because he did not complete what he stated he would do which was to provide legal representation, the "handling of an appeal," since he never filed a brief and because of this, the FSM appeal case was dismissed. The attorney thus breached his contract. The services promised were not performed and because no brief was filed, the attorney cannot bill the plaintiffs for hours he worked on the brief as there was no brief filed or evidence of work. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 646 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When an attorney cannot provide any proof of his hours of work, he cannot prove his fees and his client should not have been charged for these and since the court cannot find evidence to prove the attorney's breach of contract counterclaim based on a preponderance of the evidence, his counterclaim for attorney's fees will be dismissed. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 646 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the plaintiffs had a contract with the defendant attorney and their appeal case was dismissed without the plaintiffs getting their day on court due to the attorney's failure to file required materials with the appellate court, the plaintiffs are entitled to a refund of the $500 retainer that they paid the attorney in the case and to the $10 filing fee because $510 is the amount to put the non-breaching party, the plaintiffs, in a position they would have been in but for the attorney's breach. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 646-47 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

While it may be true that funds which are not timely obligated are returned to the General Fund, when Ruo municipality paid the funds before they lapsed but did not receive the goods owed for that obligation, the damage is to the municipality, not the state, and the damages to the municipality can be paid into the municipality's separate account. Ruo Municipality v. Shigeto's Store, 17 FSM R. 195, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Even if a contract breach causes no loss or if the amount of loss is not proved with sufficient certainty, the injured party can recover as nominal damages a small sum, commonly six cents or a dollar, fixed without regard to the amount of loss. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 573 (Pon. 2011).

The function of a liquidated damages provision is for the parties to agree in advance to a damages amount that will be assessed in the event of a certain contract breach where, for both parties, it may ease the calculation of risks and reduce the cost of proof; where it might be the only compensation possible to the injured party for a loss that cannot be proven with sufficient certainty; and where it would save litigation time and expense. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 573 n.5 (Pon. 2011).

The economic waste principle of contract law states that although a party has the right to insist on performance in strict compliance with the contract's specifications and can require a contractor to correct non-conforming work, the party should not be permitted to direct the replacement of work in situations where the cost of correction is economically wasteful and the work is otherwise adequate for its intended purpose. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 576 n.7 (Pon. 2011).

When GMP used the wrong coordinate system for the Chuuk road survey work, it was a breach of the contract and when there was expert testimony that the survey could have been corrected by converting it to the proper coordinate system with the right computer software and some fieldwork, the court cannot presume that this would have been successful or that it could have been accomplished at no direct cost to the FSM, and GMP will thus be denied summary judgment on this claim and the FSM granted summary judgment that the contract was breached but not for its claim because whether the breach was material is a factual dispute – whether the measure of damages should be the cost of the new survey or what the cost would have been to convert the GMP survey to the Truk-Neoch Coordinate System or whether any damages, other than nominal, are due at all. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 577-78 (Pon.

An injured party may be compensated for the injuries flowing from a contract breach either by awarding compensation for lost profits (expectancy damages), or by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the contract (reliance damages). That is, if an injured party cannot be compensated for the value it had expected to receive from a breached contract, it might then be compensated for its reliance expenditures and placed in as good a position as it would have been if it had not entered into the contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 592 (Pon. 2011).

Damages are contractual in nature when they arose either from the various lease agreements between the plaintiff and the state or from the settlement agreement between them even though the settlement agreement included a claim for a state court partial (and thus probably not final and enforceable) judgment for some of the unpaid periods of the leases because this court used the parties' memorandum of understanding for its determination of damages. Thus the damages judgment in this case was not based on a state court "judgment" but on the parties' contractual stipulation about the amount the state owed the plaintiff as of March 9, 2006. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 & n.1 (Chk. 2011).

When the contract term that prorates compensation based on proportions of time applies to the plaintiff's breach of contract claim and absent complete figures for individual hours worked on each phase of the revenue subject to apportionment and absent an independent basis for determining the relative values of the actual hours worked by both the plaintiff and another, a comparison of the amount of rework the other had to perform is an equitable basis upon which to determine the appropriate proportions of hours the plaintiff and the other worked and therefore the amount due the plaintiff. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 43-44 (Pon. 2011).

When the plaintiffs did not present any evidence at trial of damages sustained as a result of the defendants' breach, the court will not award monetary damages against the defendants. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

When, in general, the witnesses' emotional attachment to the lot is irrelevant to the plaintiff's actual damages from the Board's violation of its civil right to due process, and when, without knowing what the witnesses' testimony will be, it is unknown whether testimony about the lot's necessary background history will unavoidably include some mention of emotional attachment, the court cannot make a blanket ruling barring all mention of a witness's emotional attachment to the lot. During trial, the defendant may object to any irrelevant questions and move to strike any irrelevant matter in a witness's answer to a relevant question. That should be sufficient protection. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377-78 (Pon. 2014).

A plaintiff has the burden to persuade the court, with competent evidence, as to the amount of his damages. Parties have the responsibility to put forward the evidence to support their case. This is not the court's responsibility. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 117 (Kos. 2015).

A plaintiff must introduce his evidence during his case-in-chief so the defendants will have an opportunity to address it, or to stipulate to it, or to challenge it and to cross-examine witnesses about it, and where, if the defendants feel the need, they can introduce evidence to counter it when it their turn comes. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 117 (Kos. 2015).

A court cannot award damages when there was no evidence at trial that would make those amounts sufficiently certain for a court to award those damages and when the plaintiff's post-trial affidavit outlining damages cannot be considered evidence properly introduced at trial or properly before the court. Helgenberger v. Chung, 21 FSM R. 404, 406 (Pon. 2017).

A trial court has wide discretion in determining damages in contract and quasi-contract cases involving equitable doctrines. The goal is to try to put the injured party in as good a position as he would have been were it not for the breach of contract. Helgenberger v. Chung, 21 FSM R. 404, 407 (Pon. 2017).

Actual damages are intended to redress the concrete loss that the plaintiff has suffered by reason of the defendant's wrongful conduct. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 534 (App. 2018).

A monetary award is envisioned to compensate for actual losses which can be readily proved and the commensurate amount is to be based on the proven harm, loss or injury suffered by the plaintiff. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 534-35 (App. 2018).

When a money award for actual damages should suffice and the amount is capable of being ascertained, specific performance is, by implication, an unsuitable remedy. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 536 (App. 2018).

A bank expects to be paid the amount the bank would be owed (and paid) if all installment payments were made precisely on time and in full. The bank, of course, expects to be paid more (and the note provides for it) if any of the installment payments were late or short. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 606 (Pon. 2020).

– Damages – Consequential

Consequential damages can only be awarded if the loss was such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 256 (App. 2006).

When a contract provides that in no event shall one party be liable for prospective profits or special, indirect, or consequential damages of the other and that that provision will survive any contract termination however arising, the parties have agreed that, regardless of the cause, one party would never be liable to the other for any claim for lost profits or other consequential damages. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 365-66 (Yap 2009).

Consequential damages can only be awarded if the loss was such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

In the absence of a contractual or statutory right of renewal, consequential damages for the failure to renew cannot have been in the contemplation of both parties. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

It cannot be said that consequential damages were contemplated for the termination of a lease five months early when the leased land had remained undeveloped for a long while and when it is difficult to see what development could have taken place in those five months that would have earned the plaintiff a profit during those five months, that is, whether there would be any consequential damages because the plaintiff was deprived of the use of an undeveloped lot for the last five months of its lease. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

Consequential damages are losses that do not flow directly and immediately from an injurious act but that result indirectly from the act. Helgenberger v. Chung, 21 FSM R. 404, 406 n.1 (Pon. 2017).

Consequential damages can only be awarded if the loss was such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. Helgenberger v. Chung, 21 FSM R. 404, 407 (Pon. 2017).

When there is no evidence that both sides contemplated that if the defendants did not repair the plaintiff's vehicle, the defendants would then be liable for all the plaintiff's transportation expenses, the plaintiff cannot be awarded those consequential damages. Helgenberger v. Chung, 21 FSM R. 404, 407 (Pon. 2017).

– Damages – Mitigation of

A court will not compensate an injured party for a loss that he could have avoided by making efforts appropriate, in the eyes of the court, to the circumstances. Panuelo v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Guam, 5 FSM R. 123, 129 (Pon. 1991).

In a breach of contract case, the injured party is expected to take appropriate actions to mitigate, or lessen, his damages. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 15 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the defendant failed to buy, as agreed, for the plaintiff's damaged car, the plaintiff was expected to, and did, mitigate his damages by selling the car to someone else. The car's sale price was its fair market value at the time of the sale and the value of the plaintiff's mitigation. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 15 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

In a breach of contract case, the injured party is expected to take appropriate actions to mitigate, or lessen, his damages. A court will not compensate an injured party for a loss that he could have avoided by making efforts appropriate, in the eyes of the court, to the circumstances. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 556 (Chk. 2005).

A court will not compensate an injured party for a loss that he could have avoided by making efforts appropriate, in the eyes of the court, to the circumstances. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 365 (Yap 2009).

When a buyer converted the remaining gasoline and diesel to his own personal use, he, in effect, sold himself the gasoline and diesel and thus mitigated his damages. When more stored kerosene remains available for the buyer to sell or convert to his own personal use, the seller is entitled to summary judgment that it will not be liable for the fuel the buyer converted to his own personal use or for the fuel he still retains since that would be a double recovery. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 365 (Yap 2009).

That a plaintiff has a duty to mitigate his damages is clear. He must take reasonable steps to minimize those damages. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

One sound reason for the mitigation principle is that it makes commercial sense to discourage a plaintiff from sitting back and letting damages get larger instead of stemming further losses. But an innocent party cannot be expected to take steps to mitigate damages before it was aware of the breach. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 361 (App. 2012).

Any inaction before the date the plaintiff became aware of the breach cannot be a failure to mitigate damages because the plaintiff did not know it had any to mitigate. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 361 (App. 2012).

Choosing to remain idle in Pohnpei for nearly three years while forgoing suitable work in the Philippines, is manifestly unreasonable under the circumstances. A court will not compensate an injured party for a loss that he could have avoided by making efforts appropriate in the eyes of the court to the circumstances. The rationale behind this rule is to encourage the injured party to make reasonable efforts to avoid loss. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 275-76 (Pon. 2014).

Even when the plaintiffs failed to make reasonable efforts to secure alternative employment, the burden of proof falls on the former employer to show that the former employees could have found alternative employment in their chosen field. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 276 (Pon. 2014).

When the former employer has demonstrated that suitable alternative employment was available and that the former employees failed to make reasonable efforts to secure alternative employment, the court must conclude that plaintiffs could not recover for breach of contract due to their failure to mitigate damages. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 276 (Pon. 2014).

Since the defendants pled the plaintiff's failure to mitigate damages as an affirmative defense, if the plaintiff had put on evidence of his damages, the burden would have shifted to the defendants to prove that the plaintiff failed to mitigate his damages or to prove to what extent he did mitigate his damages. But since the plaintiff put on no evidence about the amount of his damages, the burden of proof about damages never shifted to the defendants. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 111, 116 (Kos. 2015).

– Damages – Punitive

Punitive damages are not a contract remedy, since only compensatory damages are allowed for breach. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2001).

Generally, punitive damages are not a contract remedy, because only compensatory damages are usually allowed for breach of contract. Kelly v. Lee, 11 FSM R. 116, 117 (Chk. 2002).

Punitive damages will be denied when the plaintiffs' complaint makes no allegations that the defendants' actions were willful, wanton, or malicious or alleges facts that could constitute willfulness, wantonness, or malice, and when the cause of action is contract. Punitive damages are not a contract remedy since only compensatory damages are allowed for breach. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 313 (Chk. 2005).

A plaintiff may not as a matter of law recover punitive damages from the State of Chuuk. This principle has been modified somewhat by the enactment section 6 of the Chuuk State Sovereign Immunity Act of 2000, but that Act did not become law until January 25, 2001, and it does not apply to damage claims before that time. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 314 (Chk. 2005).

Generally, punitive damages are not a contract remedy, because only compensatory damages are usually allowed for breach of contract. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 401 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Generally, punitive damages are not a contract remedy, because only compensatory damages are allowed for breach of contract. Nor can punitive damages be awarded under non-contract (i.e., tort) causes of action unless the defendant's actions were alleged and proven to be willful, wanton, and malicious or with deliberate violence. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 532 (Chk. 2007).

Punitive damages are derivative, in the sense that they derive from and depend on a separate and independent cause of action. They may be awarded when the acts complained of are wanton, reckless, malicious, and oppressive, but punitive damages are not awardable for breach of contract, since only compensatory damages are allowed in contract cases. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 441 (Pon. 2009).

– Definite Terms

Where no contract existed for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Jim v. Alik, 4 FSM R. 198, 200 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

In order for an agreement to be binding an agreement must be definite and certain as to its terms and requirements, and it must identify the subject matter and spell out the essential commitments and agreements with respect thereto. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 388 (Pon. 1994).

The court will not enforce a written settlement agreement as a verbal contract against a defendant who has not signed it when because of conflicting affidavits the court finds that the settlement terms were not sufficiently definite to constitute an enforceable contract and when there are questions as to whether the settlement was freely and fairly negotiated by the parties thereto. Bank of Hawaii v. Helgenberger, 9 FSM R. 260, 262 (Pon. 1999).

In order to be binding, an agreement must be definite and certain as to its terms and requirements; it must identify the subject matter and spell out the essential commitment and agreements with respect thereto. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 562 (Pon. 2003).

Where no contract existed for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 554 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the parties have failed to make an enforceable contract due to the lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to grant a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received to the party who gave those benefits. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 11 FSM R. 644, 648 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Issues regarding the timing of performance will not necessarily interfere with the enforceability of a contract. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 14 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When an agreement does not specify when the payment was to be made by the defendant to the plaintiff, it suggests that the parties did not regard any specific point in time as essential. Accordingly, the court will adopt a "reasonable time" as the time for performance of the contract. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 14-15 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Restitution is the proper remedy when no enforceable contract exists. It requires the benefitted party to return what was received or to pay the other party for it. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 143 (App. 2005).

In order for an agreement to be binding, an agreement must be definite and certain as to its terms and requirements, and it must identify the subject matter and spell out each party's essential commitments. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 85 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the parties' discussion did not reach an agreement on the cement mixer's sale price and the cement mixer's sale price is a required definite term of the contract, as it would spell out the defendant's essential commitment to pay the plaintiff a certain amount, the agreement is unenforceable and not binding because the parties did not agree to a sales price. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 85 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution and where no contract exists for lack of an agreed sale price, restitution is applicable. The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies when there is an unenforceable contract. It is based on the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 85 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Whether contractual terms are sufficiently certain to support contract formation is a field of inquiry rounded in the common law of contracts. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 475 (Pon. 2014).

The terms of a contract are sufficiently certain if they provide a basis for determining the existence of a breach and for giving an appropriate remedy. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 476 (Pon. 2014).

Absent a negotiated time of performance, when the contract calls for a single performance such as the rendering of a service or the delivery of goods, the time for performance is a "reasonable time." Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 476 (Pon. 2014).

When the parties intend to conclude a contract for the sale of goods and the price is not settled, the price is a reasonable price at the time of delivery if nothing is said as to price. Similar principles apply to contracts for the rendition of service where, if the parties manifest an intent to be bound, the price is a reasonable price at the time for doing the work. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 476 (Pon. 2014).

Because the defendant contacted the plaintiff before starting each additional repair so that the plaintiff's agreement to pay for the work could be secured and the plaintiff then agreed to each additional repair, knowing and intending to compensate the defendant for the work and the defendant then proceeded to undertake reasonable efforts to perform the repair, there was a series of valid contracts since the parties' behavior manifested their intent to be bound by such a contract, and for each contract, the parties agreed to perform within a reasonable time, and the price was set as a reasonable price at the time for doing the work. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 476 (Pon. 2014).

For an agreement to be binding, it must spell out the essential commitments and agreements with respect thereto. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

An agreement may lack definite terms when there is no indication as to a schedule of payment that would detail the amount to be paid and a duration or timeline for which payments are to be made. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

When no valid contract exists between the parties because of a lack of definite terms, a party may recover for the benefit conferred upon another pursuant to other legal remedies under the law of contracts. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to fashion a remedy under the restitution doctrine. The unjust enrichment doctrine also applies when there is an unenforceable contract. It is based upon the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

– Executory

When the sale of a barge was conditional upon inspection and was canceled after the inspection occurred, the agreement, prior to cancellation, remained an executory contract. Kosrae v. Worswick, 10 FSM R. 288, 291 (Kos. 2001).

When it is contemplated that something be done to complete the sale, such as weighing, selecting, delivery, or some other act, the contract is "executory," and title does not pass until the specific goods are ascertained and appropriated in the mode agreed on. Kosrae v. Worswick, 10 FSM R. 288, 291 (Kos. 2001).

An assignment executed between a bank and a borrower that provides that, in the event of a default, the bank is the sole and exclusive party entitled to possession of the subject property/premises and to operate the subject business and to receive all income therefrom is a right to possession and operation that, although a security interest, is not a security interest that can be, or was, perfected under Title 33, chapter 10, because it involves real property – the factory building – and the incorporeal right to operate the business from that building. On its face, this is an executory contract for which there was an offer, acceptance, definite terms, and consideration. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

– Formation

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for). When one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 123 (Pon. 1993).

A valid and enforceable contract was formed when the state offered to permit plaintiffs to dredge if they would repair the causeway, the plaintiffs accepted the offer by starting repairs, and the material dredged formed the consideration and the terms were sufficiently definite as to the time length of contract because it was limited by the expiration of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers dredging permit. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 620-21 (App. 1996).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for). When one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 64 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for). Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An enforceable contract requires an offer, an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration. Bank of Hawaii v. Helgenberger, 9 FSM R. 260, 262 (Pon. 1999).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise. For an agreement to be binding it must be definite and certain as to its terms and requirements, and it must identify the subject matter and spell out the essential commitments and agreements with respect thereto. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An agreement to waive a contractual provision is itself a contract, and the same offer and acceptance are required. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 10 FSM R. 400, 407 (Pon. 2001).

When the defendant never accepted the plaintiff's offer to waive arbitration, no binding agreement to waive arbitration was ever entered into by the parties. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 10 FSM R. 400, 407 (Pon. 2001).

When the parties settled rather than go to trial on damages a contract was formed between the parties – the defendant offered specific performance to fill land and in exchange, the plaintiff accepted the offer and agreed to not go to trial on the issue of damages. There was thus an offer and acceptance, consideration, and mutual assent by both parties. James v. Lelu Town, 11 FSM R. 337, 339 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations which the law will enforce in some way. For a promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 554 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When in the parties' verbal promises, a critical definite terms was missing: the cost for the landfilling equipment and landfill materials were unknown, the parties did not form an enforceable contract with respect to the obligation to pay for the landfilling equipment and the landfill materials. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 554 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration and definite terms. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 11 FSM R. 644, 647 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the parties did not agree upon the amount, location, scope, timing or deadline to complete the land filling and were aware of the missing elements as they agreed to meet again to work out the details, but the parties did not meet again to finalize the details, one of the four elements necessary for an enforceable contract, definite terms, remained missing from the parties' understanding. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 11 FSM R. 644, 647-48 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for). When one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration and definite terms. George v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 12, 14 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the plaintiff had accepted the defendant's condition that the jeep could not be returned to its original condition and continued to request that defendant work on the jeep, the plaintiff had accepted the defendant's condition regarding workmanship on the jeep and the defendant's inability to return the jeep to its original condition and the plaintiff is thus not entitled to recover his claim for additional work completed later by another. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration, and definite terms. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 143 (App. 2005).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration, and definite terms. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 143 (App. 2005).

When a review of the record confirms that the parties did not discuss and there was no agreement about the amount, location, scope, timing or deadline to complete the fill and that the agreement was never reduced to writing (although no Kosrae law would require that it be reduced to writing), the record supports the trial court's finding that the parties failed to agree on definite terms and that therefore no contract was formed. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 143 & n.1 (App. 2005).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration, and definite terms, and for the agreement to be binding it must be definite and certain as to its terms and requirements, and it must identify the subject matter and spell out the essential commitments and agreements with respect thereto. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 399 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the plaintiff promised to pay the defendant the amount of $10,000 and the defendant promised to sell to the plaintiff certain parcels and convey all her rights therein and certified that she was the "legal title holder" of the subject parcels through certificates of title and as the legal basis for her promise to transfer her ownership rights in the two parcels, the subject matter, the essential commitments and the agreement were all definite and certain as to its terms and requirements. And since the "Quitclaim Deed" is evidence of the parties' agreement for the sale and transfer of title to the subject parcels, the Quitclaim Deed is an enforceable contract. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 399-400 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

An enforceable contract requires an offer, an acceptance, consideration and definite terms. For the agreement to be binding, it must spell out the essential commitments and agreements with respect thereto. Heirs of Nena v. Sigrah, 14 FSM R. 283, 285 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration, and definite terms. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 530 (Chk. 2007).

No contract was created when the plaintiff's offer was not communicated to the defendant, thus no offer was ever made to the defendant, and there never was an acceptance of an offer by the defendant. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 530 (Chk. 2007).

A principal is bound by, and liable for his agent's acts if done with or within the actual or apparent authority from the principal and within the scope of the agent's employment, but when agreeing to pay rent for a cement mixer was not within the scope of the agent's "employment" as the principal's agent, no contract was formed between the principal and the plaintiffs through agency. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 530-31 (Chk. 2007).

The elements of an enforceable contract are an offer and acceptance, definite terms, and consideration between the parties. If a party fails to perform, then the contract is breached and damages may be awarded. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the plaintiff exchanged goods with the defendant in exchange for the defendant agreeing to make payments on the account, the defendant indicated her acceptance of this exchange by making payments. These actions created an enforceable contract. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 273 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the plaintiff exchanged goods with the defendant in exchange for the defendant agreeing to make payments on the account and the defendant indicated her acceptance of this exchange by making payments, their actions created an enforceable contract. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 326 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An insurance contract, like all contracts, requires an offer and acceptance to be effective, and, like any contract, an insurance contract is formed when an unrevoked offer by one person is accepted by another, thus satisfying the two prerequisites of mutual assent. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 257 (Kos. 2009).

An application for insurance standing alone does not constitute a contract upon which judgment can be recovered. It is merely an offer or request for insurance which may either be accepted or rejected by the insurer. An insurer is at liberty to choose its own risks and is not bound to accept an insurance application for insurance. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 258 (Kos. 2009).

An insurance contract may be established when one of the parties to the contract proposes to be insured and the other party agrees to insure, and the subject, the amount, and the rate of insurance are ascertained or understood and the premium is paid if demanded. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R.

253, 258 (Kos. 2009).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration, and definite terms. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 645 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the contract is for an attorney to provide legal assistance for the plaintiffs' appeal case and when the terms are that the attorney will represent the plaintiffs and the plaintiffs will pay the attorney a $100 per hour, there is a promise between the two parties with an offer of performing legal services and the acceptance on the plaintiffs' behalf and there was mutual assent when the parties reached a meeting of the minds with the attorney making the offer and the plaintiffs accepting the offer. The consideration present for the promise was that the attorney offered his legal services to the plaintiffs in exchange for the plaintiffs' money. There was a bargained-for exchange between the parties and what was bargained for was considered of legal value. The contract terms were definite and therefore there was a valid written contract between the parties for the performance of legal services for a fee. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 645 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the previously agreed percentages for completed work should be sufficient for a court to determine a contract price for any work done during the contract's last three years; when there is no indication that these same percentages were not intended for use throughout the contract's remaining three years and the overall grant award from the U.S. had a set figure; and when, if the parties thought that the payment terms for the contract's last three years were uncertain, the contract could be amended at any time with or without additional consideration, the court cannot conclude that there was no contract beyond the first two years because no prices had been set for the last three years or that there was no consideration for the last three years. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 589 (Pon. 2011).

Duress takes two forms: physical and economic. Physical duress negates assent ab initio; economic duress makes a formed contract voidable. A contract is voidable for economic duress if: 1) a party's manifestation of assent is induced by an improper threat by the other party that leaves the victim no reasonable alternative; or 2) a party's manifestation of assent is induced by one who is not a party to the transaction, unless the other party to the transaction in good faith and without reason to know of the duress either gives value or relies materially on the transaction. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 41-42 (Pon. 2011).

When no evidence suggests that the defendant was responsible for any physical duress against the plaintiff; when the evidence shows that the plaintiff was desperate to get the work, but suggests that the situation is one largely of his own creation, or at least not the defendant's creation; when the plaintiff has not shown that the defendant made any threat, proper or improper, or did any act that left the plaintiff with no reasonable alternative, none of this evidence gives rise to the sort of improper threat and absence of reasonable alternatives upon which the court can find economic duress. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 42 (Pon. 2011).

A contract was formed by a salvor's June 16, 2007 e-mail offer and the insurer's June 19, 2007 letter acceptance with offer of additional term of an invoice, with the salvor's acceptance of the additional term by performance. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2013).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration and definite terms. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2014).

A lease agreement entered into by the parties was a valid contract because the promise to pay rent in exchange for exclusive use of the property constituted an offer, acceptance, and consideration and the agreement's terms were definite and enforceable. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2014).

When the existence of a contract is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 276 (Pon. 2014).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise (that which the performance is exchanged for). When one party fails to perform their promise, there is a breach of contract. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 357 (Pon. 2014).

An insurance contract was formed when there was an invitation made by the insurer to provide life and cancer insurance coverage to the plaintiff and the plaintiff offered to enroll under the policy and the insurer accepted the offer by issuing life and cancer insurance policies and accepting premiums that the plaintiff paid through bi-weekly allotments. The parties' reasonable expectations were that the plaintiff would make timely payments on the policy, and that the insurer would provide coverage subject to the policy's terms. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 357 (Pon. 2014).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations, which the law will enforce in some way. For the promise to be enforceable, there must be an offer and an acceptance, definite terms, and consideration for the promise. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 410 (Pon. 2014).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration and definite terms. When a contract's existence is at issue, the trier of fact determines whether the contract did in fact exist. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 475 (Pon. 2014).

A series of verbal agreements entered into by the parties may constitute a series of valid contracts. The terms of the agreements were the parties' intentions at the time they entered into the contracts. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 475 (Pon. 2014).

Agreements that lack price and duration terms may be found to be sufficiently certain to form a valid contract. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 475 (Pon. 2014).

Personnel handbook provisions can be enforceable as an employment contract if they meet the requirements for the formation of a unilateral contract, which are: the offer must be definite in form and must be communicated to the offeree. An employer's general statements of policy are no more than that and do not meet the contractual requirements for an offer. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

When a personnel policies manual is detailed and the court finds that it was intended to set the terms of employment; when a review of the employee handbook makes it clear that the employer intended its employees to be bound by the manual's terms and that it intended to bind itself to these terms, the personnel policies manual was meant to be an offer for a unilateral employment contract and an employee has accepted the offer through his continued employment. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

The general rule is that a party who signs an instrument manifests assent to it and may not later complain about not reading or not understanding it. FSM Petroleum Corp. v. Etomara, 21 FSM R. 123, 127 (Chk. 2017).

Generally, one having the capacity to understand a written document who reads it, or one who, without reading it or having it read to him, signs it, is bound by his signature. Otherwise, no one could rely on a signed document if the other party could avoid the transaction by not reading or not understanding the document. FSM Petroleum Corp. v. Etomara, 21 FSM R. 123, 127 (Chk. 2017).

A signatory to a contract has a duty to read it, or have it read to him, or a duty to understand what he is signing. The duty to read even involves a person who is blind, illiterate, or unfamiliar with the language in which the contract is written and who has signed the document without having anyone read it aloud or explaining it. FSM Petroleum Corp. v. Etomara, 21 FSM R. 123, 127 (Chk. 2017).

Except possibly in the case of an emergency, a party must employ self-protection by procuring someone to read aloud, explain, or translate the contract before he signs it. FSM Petroleum Corp. v. Etomara, 21 FSM R. 123, 127 n.2 (Chk. 2017).

The "duty to read" a contract before signing it applies especially when the lease was the result of long negotiations during which the signer was represented by capable counsel, fluent in his native language, who he could ask for an explanation. FSM Petroleum Corp. v. Etomara, 21 FSM R. 123, 127 (Chk. 2017).

A loan application is an invitation by the applicant for the bank to make an offer to lend the applicant money. The bank may then decline to make an offer (deny the application) or it may make an offer (propose to lend money on certain terms), which the loan applicant may then accept (forming a contract) or reject. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 169 (Pon. 2017).

A person, who did not sign the loan application but who accepted the bank's loan offer when he agreed to the offer by signing the promissory note and the mortgage, is a party to the promissory note and the mortgage contracts. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 169 (Pon. 2017).

The court can give no effect to a claim that a former employee did not read the contract or understand that it contained an at-will employment provision before he signed it. The general rule is that a party who signs an instrument manifests assent to it and may not later complain about not reading or not understanding it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 176 (Pon. 2017).

Generally, one having the capacity to understand a written document who reads it, or, without reading it or having it read to him, signs it, is bound by his signature. Otherwise, no one could rely on a signed document if the other party could avoid the transaction by not reading or not understanding the document. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 176 (Pon. 2017).

A signatory to a contract has a duty to read, or have it read to him, or a duty to understand what he is signing. This "duty to read" even involves a person who is blind, illiterate or unfamiliar with the language in which the contract is written and who has signed a document without having anyone read it aloud or explaining it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 176 n.7 (Pon. 2017).

A contract is a promise between two parties for the future performance of mutual obligations. For the promise to be enforceable there must be an offer, acceptance, consideration, and definite terms. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 365 (App. 2017).

Since the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau is a non-governmental organization with duly enacted articles of incorporation and bylaws, whose funding is provided for under the Compact of Free Association, the Pohnpei state government had a ministerial duty to certify the plaintiff's employment contract after the Board's approval, because the discretion of whether to hire the plaintiff was with the PVB Board. "Ministerial" means of or relating to an act that involves obedience to instructions or laws instead of discretion, judgment, or skill. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 500 & n.4 (Pon. 2018).

– Forum Selection Clause

A motion to dismiss because the forum selection clause in the agreement selects a different court to hear the dispute is properly seen as a motion to dismiss for improper forum. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 125 (Pon. 1999).

Parties may by contract designate a forum in which any litigation is to take place. Forum selection clauses are presumed valid, and enforcement will be ordered absent a strong showing that it should be set aside, and unless it clearly would be unreasonable and unjust, or that the clause is invalid for such reasons as fraud or overreaching. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 125 (Pon. 1999).

A forum selection clause may be subject to judicial scrutiny for fundamental fairness. In determining fundamental fairness, courts should consider such factors as: 1) whether the forum was selected by one party as a bad faith tactic to discourage pursuit of legitimate claims by the other; 2) whether consent to the forum selection clause was obtained by fraud or overreaching; or 3) whether the contesting party had no notice of the forum provision. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 126 (Pon. 1999).

A forum selection clause is not unfair and rendered unenforceable because the court selected is a neutral forum with no relation to the parties or their dispute. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 126 & n.1 (Pon. 1999).

A forum selection clause unaffected by fraud, undue influence, or overweening bargaining power should be given full effect. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 126 (Pon. 1999).

When parties engaged in an international business transaction unambiguously select a forum in a third country, they are to be credited with knowledge of the jurisdictional requirements of the chosen court. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 126 (Pon. 1999).

Once a forum selection clause is determined to be binding, its scope and effect should be determined under a contract law analysis. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 127 (Pon. 1999).

When the forum selection clause language uses "exclusive jurisdiction" in conjunction with the mandatory language, "hereby irrevocably consent," it establishes an intent to have any dispute resolved only by the other forum and it leaves no room for dispute over the clause's meaning in this respect. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 127 (Pon. 1999).

When contracts between the parties provide that any legal proceedings instituted by either party must be filed and heard in the FSM Supreme Court with no other court having jurisdiction and that should the FSM Supreme Court not accept jurisdiction must the parties' dispute be resolved by arbitration, the FSM Supreme Court, not having declined jurisdiction, will not dismiss or stay the case pending arbitration because arbitration is mandated in a dispute arising from the agreements only when the FSM Supreme Court has declined jurisdiction. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Helgenberger, 9 FSM R. 295, 296 (Pon. 1999).

Parties can designate by contract a forum in which any litigation is to take place, and such forum selection clauses are presumed valid and will be enforced unless there is a strong showing that it would be unreasonable or unjust or fraud or overreaching is involved. The clause must unambiguously name another forum. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 605, 607-08 (Chk. 2000).

When a forum selection clause names a court that no longer exists, but another court is in all respects its successor, it is expected that the case is meant to proceed in that court absent some valid reason it should not. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 605, 608 (Chk. 2000).

Parties can designate by contract a forum in which any litigation is to take place, and such forum selection clauses are presumed valid and will be enforced unless there is a strong showing that it would be unreasonable or unjust, or fraud or overreaching is involved. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2001).

A forum selection clause must unambiguously name a forum. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2001).

When a court by the name Truk State Court no longer exists, and had not existed for several years at the time the mortgage with a forum selection clause naming the Truk State Court was executed and the Chuuk State Supreme Court was, and is, in all respects the Truk State Court's successor, a court must conclude that when they executed the mortgage the parties understood the phrase "Truk State Court" to mean the Chuuk State Supreme Court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2001).

When the mortgagors have not expressly waived their right to require the FSM Development Bank to abide by the forum selection it made when it drafted the mortgage they signed and absent some other valid reason, the foreclosure must proceed in the Chuuk State Supreme Court, even though the FSM Supreme Court will determine the amount, if any, of the mortgagors' indebtedness on the promissory note. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5-6 (Chk. 2001).

Forum selection clauses are presumed valid and will be enforced unless there is a strong showing that it would be unreasonable or unjust, or fraud or overreaching is involved. The clause must unambiguously name another forum. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 109 (Chk. 2001).

Because a court by the name Truk State Court had not existed for several years at the time the mortgage was executed and because the Chuuk State Supreme Court was, and is, in all respects its successor, the parties, when they executed the mortgage, understood the phrase "Truk State Court" to mean the Chuuk State Supreme Court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 109 (Chk. 2001).

There are two types of forum selection clauses – permissive and mandatory. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 109 (Chk. 2001).

A mandatory forum selection clause requires that all litigation between the parties be conducted in the named forum and nowhere else. To be mandatory, a clause must contain language that clearly designates a forum as the exclusive one. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 109 (Chk. 2001).

Forum selection clauses which give a court jurisdiction without clearly making that jurisdiction exclusive are permissive rather than mandatory. A permissive forum selection clause merely allows a chosen forum to exercise personal jurisdiction over the parties but does not bar litigation in another forum and will not alter the presumption in favor of the plaintiff's choice of forum. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

A forum selection clause cannot be interpreted so as to make it meaningless. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

Because only two courts can exercise jurisdiction over land in Chuuk, the only meaningful reason for the inclusion of a forum selection clause in a mortgage would be to make one court's jurisdiction exclusive. Such a forum selection clause can therefore only be interpreted as mandatory; otherwise it would be meaningless. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

When a forum selection clause in a mortgage was not the result of an arm's length transaction, but the bank dictated all the mortgage's terms, which it prepared in a pre-printed form with blanks in which to insert the borrowers' names and addresses, the amount borrowed and at what interest rate, the number and amount of monthly installment payments and their starting date, and the property mortgaged, it would be inequitable to allow the bank to now interpret the forum selection clause so as to make it meaningless. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110-11 (Chk. 2001).

Ambiguity in a forum selection clause may be construed against its drafter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 111 (Chk. 2001).

A forum selection clause is an agreement that disputes relating to the parties' contract will be heard by a designated court and unambiguously names a forum. A threshold question is whether contractual language at issue is a forum selection clause. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 561 (Pon.

The FSM Supreme Court does not look kindly upon contractual provisions that can only be understood by individuals who possess an advanced degree in insurance law. Clear, understandable, precise language is a condition to a finding that an insured must bear the cost of litigating in a remote forum. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 562 n.3 (Pon. 2003).

A properly drafted forum selection clause's purpose is to eliminate uncertainty as to where disputes between the parties will be litigated. Such clauses can further eliminate uncertainty by specifying the law that will be applied. When a clause accomplishes neither purpose, and when it would be fundamentally unfair to conclude that the contract provision's ambiguous language constitutes an agreement that claims may be litigated only in a certain place, it does not constitute a forum selection clause. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 562 (Pon. 2003).

To the extent that a purported forum selection clause could be interpreted to require suit in a foreign country, it must be struck down as void as against public policy unless it is a freely negotiated, arms-length agreement between parties with relatively equal bargaining power. An insurance contract that seeks to oust the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction will not be upheld when the insured is an FSM citizen and resident, the insurance policy is obtained in the FSM from an FSM-based agent, the premiums are paid in the FSM to cover vehicles operating in the FSM, and the incident giving rise to a claim occurred in the FSM. The clause is against public policy because it impedes the administration of justice relating to insurance claims, and would undermine the public's confidence in business dealings if upheld. To require such lawsuits to be filed in a foreign country would not only be onerous, but would essentially render insurance companies immune from suit. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 562-63 (Pon. 2003).

A forum selection clause will be stricken from a contract when it is unenforceably vague and ambiguous, and void as against public policy. The court will not make this decision lightly, as judicial restraint requires the exercise of extreme caution in striking down a portion of any contract that is entered into freely. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 563 (Pon. 2003).

Parties may by contract designate a forum in which any litigation is to take place, and forum selection clauses are presumed valid, and enforcement will be ordered absent a strong showing that it should be set aside, and unless it clearly would be unreasonable and unjust, or that the clause is invalid for such reasons as fraud or overreaching. Lee v. Han, 13 FSM R. 571, 578 (Chk. 2005).

A forum selection clause would usually be given full effect, although a forum selection clause may be subject to judicial scrutiny for fundamental fairness. In determining fundamental fairness, courts consider such factors as: 1) whether the forum was selected by one party as a bad faith tactic to discourage pursuit of legitimate claims by the other; 2) whether consent to the forum selection clause was obtained by fraud or overreaching; or 3) whether the contesting party had no notice of the forum provision. Lee v. Han, 13 FSM R. 571, 579 (Chk. 2005).

When the plaintiff has actively pursued litigation in a Korean court, both before and during the time the litigation was pending here, and the defendant actively defended that action, it would be unreasonable and unjust to require the Korean defendants to litigate this case twice, with the second time in a forum where, although it (Chuuk) was convenient when it was chosen and all the parties had business interests here, is no longer convenient, reasonable, or just. Under the circumstances, the plaintiff has waived enforcement of the forum selection clause. Limited to this case's particular facts and circumstances, the forum selection clause will not bar dismissal of this case without prejudice under the forum non conveniens doctrine. Lee v. Han, 13 FSM R. 571, 579 (Chk. 2005).

The court will enforce a forum selection clause when the bank drafted the real estate mortgage and the bank chose to include the forum selection clause as one of the terms it insisted upon in the preprinted mortgage form it used to execute the mortgage; when a mortgagor not only does not expressly waive the bank's forum selection but he affirmatively insists upon the forum selection clause's enforcement; and when no other valid reason is apparent or has been asserted by the bank that would allow the clause's waiver. The bank may thus assert its real estate mortgage foreclosure remedy in the Yap State Court, the forum it chose, and the mortgagor may raise his defenses to the mortgage's validity there and the FSM Supreme Court will adjudicate the bank's action on the promissory note and on the chattel mortgage. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 94 (Yap 2011).

A motion to dismiss because of a contract's forum selection clause is properly made under Rule 12(b)(3) – improper venue – and (usually) also Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, and the common law doctrine of forum non conveniens. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 195 (Pon. 2019).

A motion to dismiss because an agreement's forum selection clause names a different court to hear the dispute is a motion to dismiss for improper forum – improper venue. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 195 (Pon. 2019).

Parties may designate by contract a forum in which any litigation is to take place, and such forum selection clauses are presumed valid and will be enforced absent a strong showing that it would be unreasonable or unjust, or fraud or overreaching is involved. But a forum selection clause will be stricken when it is unenforceably vague and ambiguous or void as against public policy. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 196 (Pon. 2019).

There are two types of forum-selection clauses – mandatory and permissive. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 196 (Pon. 2019).

A mandatory forum selection clause requires that all litigation between the parties be conducted in the named forum and nowhere else – it must contain language that clearly designates a forum as the exclusive one. Mandatory forum selection clauses contain clear language that litigation will proceed exclusively in the designated forum. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 196 (Pon. 2019).

A permissive forum selection clause merely allows a chosen forum to exercise personal jurisdiction over the parties but does not bar litigation in another forum and will not alter the presumption in favor of the plaintiff's choice of forum. Forum selection clauses which give a court jurisdiction without clearly making that jurisdiction exclusive are permissive rather than mandatory. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 196 (Pon. 2019).

The forum selection clause must unambiguously name a forum. If it does not, then it is permissive, not mandatory. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 196 (Pon. 2019).

Mandatory forum selection clauses contain clear language showing that jurisdiction is appropriate only in the designated forum. In contrast, permissive forum selection clauses authorize jurisdiction in a designated forum but do not prohibit litigation elsewhere. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 196 (Pon. 2019).

A forum selection clause which states that "[t]he jurisdiction for . . . this contract shall be the Commonwealth of Australia" and that "all parties agree to submit to the jurisdiction of the Australian courts," does not unambiguously name a forum since it does not name any forum at all, or specify any venue, and does not prohibit any litigation elsewhere. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 197 (Pon. 2019).

The law is clear: when venue is specified in a forum selection clause with mandatory or obligatory language, the clause will be enforced; when only jurisdiction is specified the clause will generally not be enforced unless there is some further language indicating the parties' intent to make venue exclusive. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 197 (Pon. 2019).

A forum selection clause is permissive when the clause refers only to jurisdiction and does so in non-exclusive terms (e.g., there is no use of the terms "exclusive," "sole," or "only"). Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 197 (Pon. 2019).

When the parties agreed "to submit to the jurisdiction of the Australian courts," but did not make that submission exclusive or choose a venue, and, although "shall" is a mandatory term, the term "jurisdiction for . . . this contract shall be the Commonwealth of Australia," cannot mandate anything more than that (if suit was brought there) Australia has jurisdiction and the plaintiff could not object to litigating there, but it does not mean that the same subject matter cannot be litigated in any other court. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 197-98 (Pon. 2019).

A forum selection clause is clearly permissive when it does not unambiguously name a forum, or contain any clear, unequivocal mandatory language naming a forum (or even naming any forum at all) and making that venue exclusive, but mandates only that Australian courts could have jurisdiction if suit were filed there. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 198 (Pon. 2019).

Any ambiguity in a forum selection clause must be construed against its drafter. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 198 (Pon. 2019).

Even when a dismissal is not proper under a forum selection clause, a court may still dismiss a case under the forum non conveniens doctrine. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 198 (Pon. 2019).

A permissive forum selection clause may be enforced when a dismissal under the forum non conveniens doctrine is also appropriate. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 198 n.6 (Pon. 2019).

– Guaranty

When the allegations are sufficient to allege an independent, primary, and unconditional promise among the plaintiffs and the defendant bank that the bank would act to bring another's account with the plaintiffs current, and that it would make future disbursements directly to the plaintiffs, it is not a contract of guaranty. If the obligation sought to be enforced is a primary or unconditional promise so that the promisor is primarily liable regardless of the failure of some other party to perform his contractual duty, the conclusion is that the obligation is not a contract of guaranty. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 9 FSM R. 530a, 530c (Pon. 2000).

A guaranty is an enforceable undertaking or promise on the part of one person which is collateral to a primary or principal obligation on the part of another, and which binds the obligor to performance in the event of nonperformance by such other, the latter being bound to perform primarily. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 9 FSM R. 530a, 530c-30d (Pon. 2000).

When the leading object of a party promising to pay the debt of another is to promote his own interests, and not to become surety or guarantor, and the promise is made on sufficient consideration, it will be valid, although not in writing. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 9 FSM R. 530a, 530d (Pon. 2000).

When the plaintiff had a legal right to initiate a lawsuit against a corporate defendant for its unpaid debts at the time that the promissory note was executed in 1994, but instead of initiating a lawsuit, it agreed to certain terms of payment, and required individuals to personally guarantee that payment would be made, each of the parties gained something in the execution of the promissory note and security agreement. There was thus consideration exchanged by the parties when they entered into these agreements. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 149 (Pon. 2003).

In a broad sense a guarantor or surety is one who promises to answer for the debt or default of another. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2004).

Like other contracts, contracts of guaranty must be supported by consideration, and a guaranty will not be enforced unless the promise is supported by consideration. However, if the promise of the guarantor is shown to have been given as part of a transaction or arrangement which created the guaranteed debt or obligation, the promise is supported by the same consideration which supports the principal transaction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

When a guaranty was given as a part of the same transaction by which the debt to the bank was created, no independent consideration was necessary. The guaranty was supported by the same consideration that supported the transaction between the debtor and the bank. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

The main distinction between a contract of surety and one of guaranty has been expressed by stating that a surety is primarily and jointly liable with the principal debtor, while a guarantor's liability is collateral and secondary and is fixed only by the inability of the principal debtor to discharge the primary obligation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

The trial court did not err in finding a meeting of minds and no mutual mistake and that the mistake was in reducing the terms to writing when the facts suggest that the lender understood AHPW to liable on the loan and the parties stipulated that AHPW should have signed the promissory note and that the defendants intended to guarantee the loan. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 14 FSM R. 390, 396 (App. 2006).

The trial court did not err when it reformed the loan documentation to reflect the parties' stipulated intent that AHPW be the obligor on the promissory note and that the appellants be guarantors of that obligation. As such, appellants were not guaranteeing their own obligation, they were guaranteeing AHPW's obligation on the promissory note. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 14 FSM R. 390, 397 (App. 2006).

To be enforceable, a guaranty, like other contracts, must be supported by consideration. However, if a guaranty is made as part of a transaction or arrangement which created the guaranteed debt or obligation, it is not essential to a recovery on the promise of guaranty that the promise shall have been supported by a consideration other than that of the principal debt. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 14 FSM R. 390, 397 (App. 2006).

When a corporate resolution agreed to guarantee another corporation's loan and that guaranty included any and all of the borrower's indebtedness to the lender and was used in the most comprehensive sense and means and included any and all of the borrower's liabilities then existing or thereafter incurred or created, the guaranty was sufficiently broad to include any restructuring of the loan even if the restructuring was considered a debt thereafter incurred or created, and thus, no later corporate resolution was needed for the guaranty to cover the restructuring. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 281, 287 (Chk. 2009).

A guaranty is an enforceable undertaking or promise on the part of one person which is collateral to a primary or principal obligation on the part of another. A guaranty binds the guarantor to performance in the event of nonperformance by such other, the latter being bound to perform primarily. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 289 (Pon. 2016).

When the primary performer, the borrower, stopped making loan repayments to the bank and defaulted, the guarantors were then bound to perform on the loan repayments once the borrower had ceased to. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 289 (Pon. 2016).

The false notarization of a guaranty does not affect the guaranty's substantive provisions as it relates to the signer when the signer admits that he did sign the guaranty. This is because the purpose of notarization is to verify the identity and signature of the person who signed the document. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 292 & n.8 (Pon. 2016).

If a guaranty is made as part of a transaction or arrangement which created the guaranteed debt or obligation, it is not essential to a recovery on the promise of guaranty that the promise was supported by a consideration other than that of the principal debt. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

When security, such as a guaranty, is given as part of the same transaction that created the debt to the bank, no further or independent consideration is needed. The loan itself is sufficient consideration. This principle holds true when a mortgage is the security given for a loan to a third party. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

There is substantial authority for the proposition that partial payments by a principal debtor do not toll the statute of limitations as to the note's guarantors. The rationale behind this general rule is that a guarantor's consent to the debtor's future conduct may not be presumed merely on the basis of the original guarantee. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

The general rule is that a payment by the principal before the action is time-barred, operates as a renewal as to the principal, and to a surety, but not to a guarantor. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

A payment by the principal debtor will not operate to toll the statute of limitations as to a guarantor of the debt, even though it might do so as to a surety. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

When the trial court correctly decided that the statute of limitations was tolled by the debtor's partial payments, but did not separately determine whether those partial payments also tolled the statute of limitations with respect to the guarantor mortgagors, the appellate court will vacate the trial court judgment against the mortgagors and remand the matter for the trial court to conduct further proceedings to make that determination since that determination may need factual findings about whether the mortgagors were aware that the debtor was making partial payments and whether they acquiesced to the acknowledgment of the debt, and the trial court is the place to address those factual issues. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

– Illegality

The court may not simply assume that an illegal contract is unenforceable, but must make its own determination as to whether public policy factors militating against enforcement so outweigh the interests in favor that enforcement must be refused. Falcam v. FSM Postal Serv., 3 FSM R. 112, 121 (Pon. 1987).

A contract ostensibly entered into by government officials on behalf of the government but in violation of applicable law is illegal. Ponape Transfer & Storage v. Federated Shipping Co., 3 FSM R. 174, 178 (Pon. 1987).

As a general rule, an illegal contract is unenforceable. Even when performance occurs and a benefit is conferred, no recovery in either expectation damages or quantum meruit may be had. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 125 (Pon. 1993).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies where there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or another reason and requires a party to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 392 (Pon. 1994).

A party to an illegal agreement will not be permitted to avail himself of its illegality until he restores to the other party all that has been received from such a party on the illegal agreement, and so long as he continues to enjoy the benefits of the agreement, he will not be allowed to set up its nullity. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 325 (App. 1995).

Contract provisions that exceed allowable interest rates, and are reached in violation of conflict of interest laws or the procedures prescribed by law, all concern possible violations of the law and may render the contract void as against public policy. Any contract that violates the law when made is not enforceable in the courts with respect to the illegality. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 340 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The prohibition against the impairment of contracts is not absolute. The contract must be valid and enforceable when made. A contract which is illegal when made is unenforceable because no obligation arises from an illegal contract, thus there is no obligation that may be impaired. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 341 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A claim of illegality cannot be raised by a party to nullify a contract until it restores to the other party all that it has received under the contract. Richmond Wholesale Meat Co. v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n (I), 7 FSM R. 387, 389 (Pon. 1996).

Even though there is offer and acceptance and consideration exists, there is no contract when the agent signing the proposal was without authority to bind the principal, and the signing violated statutes, which rendered it illegal. Hauk v. Terravecchia, 8 FSM R. 394, 396 (Chk. 1998).

Whether a trial court correctly used the balancing of factors in weighing enforceability of part of an illegal employment contract, or whether the hiring, being in violation of public policy is unenforceable, is a matter of law, which is reviewed de novo. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1999).

The general rule that illegal agreements are void is not without exceptions and restitution ought to be awarded in some situations. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1999).

Because Congress has not explicitly made employment contracts which violate 11 F.S.M.C. 1305 unenforceable, the FSM Supreme Court may properly decide whether a contravention of public policy is grave enough to warrant unenforceabillty. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1999).

The standard of review of whether the balancing factors for weighing enforceability of part of an illegal employment contract were weighed properly is whether the trial court abused its discretion. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1999).

When there is no national precedent on the issue of the enforcement of an employment contract term which was violative of public policy, and there is no custom or tradition governing the matter, the FSM Supreme Court may look to the common law of the United States. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1999).

Although there was a public interest in denying enforcement because the hiring violated public policy, this is outweighed by the special public interest of the government's failure to provide any hearing or opportunity to be heard concerning its failure to pay the employee or take any steps to terminate the contract, thus constituting a violation of due process rights; the employee's justified expectations of being paid; and the substantial forfeiture would result if enforcement were to be denied. Therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion in its weighing of the factors on the issue of enforceability. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1999).

A contract entered into by government officials on behalf of the government, but in violation of applicable law, is illegal. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 233 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A contract which is illegal when it is made is not enforceable because there is no obligation that arises from the illegal contract. There is thus no obligation that has been impaired. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 233 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

As a general rule, an illegal contract is unenforceable. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 233 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When there was no promise or expectation of the plaintiff's continued employment by the municipal government after the contract's expiration; when the plaintiff makes no salary claim for unpaid work because, despite the fact that the second contract failed to receive the town council's support as required by the municipal charter and was therefore illegal, the plaintiff was paid for all work performed under the second written contract; public policy weighs in favor of enforcing the provisions of the municipal charter and weighs against enforcement of a contract made in violation of those charter provisions. Plaintiff's breach of contract claim thus fails. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 234 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A defendant would be estopped from raising an illegality of contract as a defense to a negligence claim when as the other party to the allegedly illegal contract he had the benefit of it. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

A contract entered into by government officials on behalf of the government but in violation of applicable law is illegal, and as a general rule an illegal contract is unenforceable, even when a benefit has been conferred on the party against whom enforcement is sought. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 80, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In order for a lease to be a valid obligation of state funds, it is necessary that the funds be not only already appropriated and available, but appropriated to the specific purpose of funding the lease payments. It is not enough that there are some funds in some account which could be used to pay the lease, having not been used as originally appropriated. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Restrictive Measures Act, clearly and unambiguously, prohibits execution of housing leases for the benefit of state personnel following its effective date with the only possible exception for the benefit of expatriate professional employees. A lease for a Chuuk citizen does not fit the exception. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the contract at issue is in violation of two separate Chuuk state statutes, it is illegal, void, and unenforceable, and the plaintiff's breach of contract claim cannot be upheld. Judgment for the defendant on that claim is mandated. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A contract that is entered into ultra vires is void and illegal. As a general rule, an illegal contract is unenforceable. Even when performance occurs and a benefit has been conferred, no recovery in either expectation damages or quantum meruit may be had. Nagata v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 265, 271 (Pon. 2002).

A party to an illegal agreement will not be permitted to avail himself of its illegality until he restores to the other party all that has been received from such a party on the illegal agreement, and so long as he continues to enjoy the benefits of the agreement, he will not be allowed to set up its nullity. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 148 (Pon. 2003).

Generally, to avoid liability under an illegal contract, the party seeking to avoid liability must return the benefit received under the illegal contract. Thus, in the case of an illegal loan, a borrower seeking to avoid liability would have to return the loan principal. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 599 n.13 (Pon. 2009).

A bank depositor's complaint against a bank fails to state a claim on which it can obtain relief and will be dismissed when the bank honored, in conformance with 54 F.S.M.C. 153, a Division of Customs and Tax Administration Notice of Levy and Execution that was regular on its face since that is not an unauthorized withdrawal from the depositor's account or the result of the bank's negligence of any kind and since it cannot be a breach of any contract between the depositor and the bank because the bank cannot contract to violate FSM law or statutes. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

The 38 U.S.C. § 5301 ban on assigning U.S. military retirement benefits does not constitute a meritorious defense because 38 U.S.C. § 5301 is a United States statute that is applicable wherever the United States is sovereign, but which has no effect in the separate and distinct sovereignty of the Federated States of Micronesia. Since there is no similar FSM statute in effect, the defendant's assignment is not an illegal contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 595 (Kos. 2020).

To avoid liability under an illegal contract, the party seeking to avoid liability must return the benefit received under the illegal contract; thus, in the case of an illegal loan, a borrower seeking to avoid liability would have to return the loan principal. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 595 n.3 (Kos. 2020).

– Implied Contracts

When passengers purchase passage in an ocean-going vessel for transportation, there is an implied maritime contract for passage even in the absence of written document. Weilbacher v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 320, 323 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Where prior course of dealing and surrounding circumstances make it apparent that the parties' intention was that pay for unused vacation time would be an implied term of the contract, the former employee is entitled to the pay for unused vacation time minus the applicable taxes. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Wade, 5 FSM R. 354, 356 (Pon. 1992).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment has been expanded to cover cases where there is an implied contract, but a benefit officiously thrust upon one is not considered an unjust enrichment and restitution is denied in such cases. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 392 (Pon. 1994).

When a defendant, after canceling her long distance phone telephone service, continues to make long distance calls because the plaintiff is slow in terminating the service, the defendant, having made those calls, is precluded from arguing that she should not pay for them. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Worswick, 9 FSM R. 6, 17 (Yap 1999).

As a general proposition, an express contract and an implied contract for the same thing cannot exist at the same time. Where an express contract is in force, the law does not recognize an implied one. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

The settled rule that the statute of limitations begins to run upon the accrual of a cause of action applies in actions on implied and quasi contracts. When compensation for services is to be made on a certain date, the statute of limitations on an implied or quasi contract begins to run at that time. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 559 (Pon. 2000).

Quantum meruit is an equitable doctrine, based on the concept that no one who benefits by the labor and materials of another should be unjustly enriched thereby; under those circumstances, the law implies a promise to pay a reasonable amount for the labor and materials furnished, even absent a specific contract therefor. The doctrine of unjust enrichment has been recognized in the FSM. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 232 (Pon. 2002).

A motion to amend a complaint to add an unjust enrichment claim will be denied when it is based upon a defendant's failure to abide by the alleged agreements' terms because these are express agreements, and unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 232 (Pon. 2002).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment only applies where there is no enforceable contract; the doctrine of restitution may not be applied where there is a contract; and the doctrines of implied contract and quantum meruit do not apply where there is an enforceable written contract. Esau v. Malem Mun. Gov't, 12 FSM R. 433, 436 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment operates in the absence of an enforceable contract. The principle requires that the party receiving something of value either pay for it or return it, and is based on the notion that one individual should not be allowed to enrich himself at another's expense. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 515 (App. 2005).

Contracts are express agreements, and unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 515 (App. 2005).

To say that a plaintiff's only remedy was to sue a defendant it had contracted with on a contract theory misses the point that it was the other defendant that was unjustly enriched, and to accept that the plaintiff's only remedy would be against long defunct enterprise defendant would confer upon the plaintiff an illusory remedy, and would confound its efforts to call to account the other defendant which actually received the money the plaintiff paid to the first defendant. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 516 (App. 2005).

If a defendant had had capabilities and resources equal to the transaction it undertook – then when it did not perform its contract, the plaintiff may well have had an adequate remedy in suing it on its contract to supply outboard motors, but when it was never a viable business entity, but a shell enterprise the purpose of which was to funnel the money to the other defendant, under all the case's facts and circumstances, the plaintiff should be permitted to "follow the money." Precluding the plaintiff from doing so would result in the other defendant's unjust enrichment at the plaintiff's expense. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 516 (App. 2005).

Unjust enrichment relates to the doctrine of implied contracts, which is to say that the court will, in the absence of a legally enforceable contract, imply a contract in law in the absence of a contract in fact in order to avoid unjust enrichment. Neither the concept of unjust enrichment or the closely associated idea of an implied contract apply where there is an enforceable written contract, since an express contract and implied contract for the same thing cannot govern a legal relationship at the same time. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 651-52 (Pon. 2008).

Although an express contract and implied contract for the same thing cannot govern a legal relationship at the same time, this principle is subject to two exceptions. The first exception is that a party can recover when the implied-in-law contract, also known as a quasi contract, relates to matters outside the express contract or to issues arising after the express contract. The second exception is that a party may prevail in the appropriate case on a quasi-contract when a party has no rights under an enforceable contract. Examples of the second exception are where a contract has failed or was rescinded. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 652 (Pon. 2008).

An exception to the principle that an express contract and implied contract for the same thing cannot govern a legal relationship at the same time is when the implied-in-law contract relates to matters outside the express contract. It will apply when the broker's advancing the premiums fell outside the parties' binding contracts that the broker would obtain insurance coverage for the Chuuk-operated vessels and that Chuuk would pay for that coverage since the documents do not address whether the broker could, or would, advance the premiums and the broker advanced the premiums after the agreements were reached, and after Chuuk had failed to remit the premiums that it was obligated to pay under the contract. Actouka

Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 652 (Pon. 2008).

A marine insurance broker who advances fleet insurance premiums may obtain reimbursement from the insured on whose behalf it advanced those premiums under an implied-in-law contractual right to reimbursement of the premiums it advanced on another's behalf when the implied-in-law contractual right is integrally related both to the contract whereby the broker was to procure insurance and to the insurance contracts that resulted from that agreement. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 652 (Pon. 2008).

When, although Chuuk did not pay the premiums, they were paid by the broker on Chuuk's behalf and the policies were in full force and effect for the vessels operated by Chuuk, Chuuk is responsible for these premiums because the broker established by a preponderance of the evidence at trial that the broker and Chuuk had entered into an agreement whereby the broker would procure insurance for the Chuuk-operated vessels and that Chuuk would pay for that insurance. This express contract serves as the basis for an implied-in-law contract that Chuuk is liable for reimbursement to the broker. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 653 (Pon. 2008).

The existence of an account stated need not be express and frequently is implied from the circumstances. For example, where a creditor renders a statement and the debtor fails to object in a reasonable time, the open account may be superseded by an account stated. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 147 n.1 (Chk. 2008).

6 F.S.M.C. 702(3) waives the FSM's sovereign immunity only for claims, whether liquidated or unliquidated, upon an express or implied contract with the FSM. But, although the equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment operates in the absence of an enforceable contract when a party has received something of value and neither paid for it or returned it, unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. Thus, depending upon the facts of a case, 6 F.S.M.C. 702(3) does not bar an unjust enrichment claim since it does waive the FSM's sovereign immunity for implied (as well as express) contract claims. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 2009).

The equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment, a theory applicable to implied contracts, operates in the absence of an enforceable contract and this principle requires that the party receiving something of value either pay for it or return it, and is based on the notion that one party should not be allowed to enrich himself at another's expense. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 119 (App. 2011).

A trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in contract and quasi-contract cases involving equitable doctrines, such as promissory estoppel and restitution and the plaintiff may be compensated for the injuries by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the promise. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

When the equities involved include that the plaintiff falsely informed Chuuk that the marine insurance policy was not in effect when, in fact, it was in effect because the net premium had been paid to the insurer, promissory estoppel may instead be a better measure of the damages than implied contract or unjust enrichment. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

When the plaintiff was a new hire and had not completed her probationary period and when the employer included in its employee handbook a clear and unambiguous disclaimer that the handbook is not to be construed as a contract, the disclaimer is effective and the employee handbook does not create an implied employment contract and the plaintiff was an at-will employee who could have been terminated at any time within the introductory period with or without cause. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 483-84 (Pon. 2012).

If there was a valid contact, a court cannot use an implied contract and an unjust enrichment analysis because the doctrines of unjust enrichment and implied contract do not apply when there is a valid, enforceable written contract. The unjust enrichment doctrine applies only when there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or other reason and is based on the idea one person should not be permitted to unjustly enrich himself at another's expense. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

Unjust enrichment is an equitable doctrine that relates to the doctrine of implied contracts in that the court will, in the absence of a legally enforceable contract, imply a contract in law in the absence of a contract in fact in order to avoid unjust enrichment. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

When the trial court concluded that Kosrae was liable because there was an implied contract and because Kosrae was unjustly enriched, it must necessarily have also concluded that there was no valid enforceable contract since if there were an express contract, the implied contract and unjust enrichment doctrines would not apply. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

The implied contract doctrine is a method by which a contract is derived from the parties' intentions and actions when there is no enforceable contract. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 515 (App. 2013).

Either the circumstances are such that a contract is implied in law or the circumstances are such that a contract cannot be implied in law and there is no contract at all. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 515 (App. 2013).

Unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. The unjust enrichment doctrine covers cases where there is an implied contract. But if a benefit is officiously thrust upon another, it is not considered an unjust enrichment and restitution is denied in such cases. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 515 (App. 2013).

When the appellees did not officiously thrust their services as vice-principals on Kosrae but had applied for the vice-principal position; thought they had been hired for the position (and did not know their contracts were invalid); and then performed the duties required by that position and as they were instructed by their superiors, Kosrae was unjustly enriched and therefore should compensate the appellees. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 515 (App. 2013).

Since it is an established rule in this jurisdiction that an express contract and an implied contract cannot govern a legal relationship at the same time and since the lease is an express contract that governs the legal relationship between the parties and has a provision which grants the plaintiffs sole physical possession of the property and a separate provision that speaks to the issue of utilities payments, the court may not recognize the existence of an implied in fact contract that would govern these same issues. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 250-51 (Pon. 2014).

Unjust enrichment relates to the doctrine of implied contracts, which is to say that in order to avoid unjust enrichment the court will, in the absence of a legally enforceable contract, imply a contract in law in the absence of a contract in fact. Neither the concept of unjust enrichment or the closely associated idea of an implied contract apply when there is an enforceable written contract, since an express contract and implied contract for the same thing cannot govern a legal relationship at the same time. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment does not apply when there is a legally binding agreement in the form of life and cancer insurance policies that the parties agreed to and executed. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

An action based on a judgment is an action based on contract. The judgment becomes a debt which the judgment debtor is obligated to pay and the law implies a contract on his part to pay it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 372 (Pon. 2019).

– Indemnification

Where it is shown that the party seeking indemnification drafted the contract language, had greater bargaining power than the other party, had greater control over the work activities, or had considerably larger stake and expectation of profits from the endeavor, the courts become increasingly insistent upon ever more precise language in the indemnity clause as a condition to a finding that a non-negligent indemnitor is required by the clause to bear the burden of the indemnitee's negligence. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 146 (Pon. 1985).

Where there was no clear statement in a contractual indemnification clause that the indemnitee was to be protected against its own negligence, a reasonably intelligent FSM citizen aware of the general circumstances of the parties would not have perceived the English words used would require that the non-negligent party who had no control over, and relatively little economic stake in the work, must indemnify the major contractor against negligence of that major contractor. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 149 (Pon. 1985).

In indemnification provisions, in particular, the court requires pristine clarity in the language of the clause. Bank of the FSM v. Bartolome, 4 FSM R. 182, 185 (Pon. 1990).

Because agreements in promissory notes for the payment of attorney's fees are essentially indemnity clauses, they will be given effect only to the extent that expenses and losses are actually incurred, as demonstrated by detailed supporting documentation showing the date, the work done, and the amount of time spent on each service for which a claim for compensation is made. Bank of Hawaii v. Jack, 4 FSM R. 216, 219 (Pon. 1990).

A contract between a foreign fishing agreement party and the owner of vessels permitted under that agreement that the vessels' owner will be responsible for criminal and civil charges for fishing violations merely provides the foreign fishing agreement party with a contractual right of indemnity against the vessels' owner and does not bar the government's imposition of penalties for fishing agreement violations on the foreign fishing agreement party. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 89 (Pon. 1997).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has recognized claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, and required precise clarity in the indemnification clause language, it is not prepared to create a common law indemnity claim. Joy Enterprises, Inc. v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 8 FSM R. 306, 311 (Pon. 1998).

When an agreement's indemnification provisions regarding the transfer of liability for causes of action and other claims are clear, the transferee is liable to indemnify the transferor for damages awarded for the transferor's negligence. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 453 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In the case of indemnity the defendant is liable for the whole damage springing from contract, while in contribution the defendant is chargeable only with a ratable proportion founded not on contract but upon equitable factors measured by equality of burden. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 505 (Pon. 1998).

Although the court has previously recognized claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, in the absence of a contractual provision it will not create a common law indemnity claim, therefore, in the absence of any contractual provisions between the parties, there is no basis for a claim of indemnity by a defendant against a plaintiff, the court will dismiss the defendant's counterclaim for indemnity. Primo v. Semes, 11 FSM R. 324, 329 (Pon. 2003).

Indemnification arises out of an express or implied contract by which a party held liable shifts the entire loss to another in order to prevent an unjust or unsatisfactory result. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 445, 449 (Pon. 2003).

The court will recognize claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, but, in the absence of a contractual provision, it will not create a common law indemnity claim. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 347 (Pon. 2004).

A hold-harmless agreement is a contract in which one party agrees to indemnify the other. "Indemnify" means to reimburse another for a loss suffered because of a third party's act or default; or to promise to reimburse another for such a loss; or to give another security against such a loss. Thus in a hold-harmless agreement, one of the two parties assumes any liability to third parties. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 364 (Yap 2009).

Logically indemnification cannot be applied to cases involving claims for losses that do not arise from liability to a third party. Where a party does not seek to be held harmless from a third party claim, but rather from the other party's own claim for damage to the other party's property and business, a contract's hold-harmless or indemnification provision does not apply. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 364-65 (Yap 2009).

Courts require crystal clarity in a contract's indemnification language before holding that a non-negligent indemnitor must bear the burden of the indemnitee's negligence. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 365 (Yap 2009).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has recognized claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, and required precise clarity in the indemnification clause language, it is not prepared to create a common law indemnity claim. Thus, even assuming the court had found any defendant liable, when no contractual provision for indemnification between the plaintiff and any of the defendants was presented to the court, the plaintiff's claim for indemnity fails. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 458 (Pon. 2009).

When the 2009 Chuuk-FSM Joint Law Enforcement Agreement contains a clause whereby the FSM national government and the State of Chuuk "agree that at the end of each fiscal year the terms of this agreement shall continue in effect until such time it is terminated or renewed by the parties" and when neither party has given the required thirty days notice to terminate the 2009 Joint Law Enforcement Agreement, the agreement remains in effect. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 663 (Chk. 2009).

A joint law enforcement agreement clause that states – "Any renewal shall be subject to the availability of funds." – applies only to a renewal, not to a continuation of the current agreement. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 663 (Chk. 2009).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has recognized indemnity claims based on the parties' contractual provisions and has required precise clarity in the indemnification clause language, it has not been prepared to create a common law indemnity claim. Thus, when, even assuming the court were to find a defendant liable, there is no contractual provision for the plaintiff's indemnification by a defendant, a plaintiff's indemnity claim fails. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

When a lease's only indemnification provision is one by which the lessee is required, under certain circumstances, to indemnify the lessor, the lessee's indemnification cross-claim against the lessor accordingly fails and is dismissed. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

A hold-harmless agreement is a contract in which one party agrees to indemnify the other party, that is, to reimburse the other party for a loss suffered because of a third party's act or default; or to promise to reimburse the other party for such a loss; or to give another security against such a loss. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 353 (App. 2012).

The words "indemnify" and "hold harmless" are typically interpreted to apply to third-party claims. Logically, a contract's hold-harmless or indemnification provision cannot apply when the party invoking it does not seek to be held harmless from a third-party claim but rather asserts its own claim against the other party for damage to its property or business. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 353 (App. 2012).

In a hold-harmless agreement, one of the two contracting parties assumes any liability to third parties. The hold-harmless provision thus allocates between the contracting parties the risk of liability to third parties. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 353 (App. 2012).

When a contracting party seeks damages, not for liability to a third-party, but for its own claim against the other contracting party for losses to its business by their failure to remit its funds to its home office, the contract's hold-harmless provision cannot be used as a basis for liability since it is a dispute between the contracting parties. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 353 (App. 2012).

– Installment Contracts

In a contract for installment shipments of goods where the parties' agreement was not in writing and there was no oral agreement or other manifestation of intent that the buyer's obligation to accept shipments was to be conditioned upon each prior shipment having arrived in timely fashion and in good condition, a nonoccurrence of the event or act is a breach of promise which gives rise to a claim for damages, rather than a failure of a condition to performance, which frees the other party from any further duty to perform the promised acts. Panuelo v. Pepsi Cola Bottling Co. of Guam, 5 FSM R. 123, 127 (Pon. 1991).

In an installment contract setting, the statute of limitations begins to run from the time that each installment is due. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 342 (Kos. 2003).

An installment contract is one in which the agreed performance of at least one of the parties is to be rendered, not as a whole at one time and place, but piecemeal at different times or different places. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 70 (Pon. 2013).

A cause of action accrues and the statute of limitations begins to run, when a suit may be successfully maintained thereon. When a note is payable in installments, each installment is a distinct cause of action and the statute of limitations begins to run against each installment from the time it becomes due, that is, from the time when an action might be brought to recover it. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 70 (Pon. 2013).

The applicable statute of limitation period for an installment contract is six years. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 70 (Pon. 2013).

– Interpretation

When a purported state employment contract erroneously and consistently recites that it is between the employee and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and contains other statements demonstrating that the contract words were not taken seriously and did not comport with reality, the document is unpersuasive evidence of the relationships among the employee, the state, and the national government. Manahane v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 161, 165-67 (Pon. 1982).

Where there is ambiguity within a contractual clause and there are various reasonable and practical alternative constructions available, it is necessary to employ rules of interpretation. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 147 (Pon. 1985).

The purpose of the common law rules of interpretation is to assist in reaching an objective interpretation, determining the meaning which reasonably intelligent people, knowing the circumstances, would place upon the words. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 148 (Pon. 1985).

Where two clauses within an agreement are inconsistent, the court should attempt to interpret the agreement so that each provision has meaning, but the paramount rule is that the deed must be construed so as to give effect to the intention of the parties as collected from the whole instrument. Melander v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 324, 327 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Where there are various reasonable and practical alternative constructions of a contractual provision available, rules of interpretation dictate that any ambiguities in a contract should be construed more strictly against the party who wrote it. Bank of the FSM v. Bartolome, 4 FSM R. 182, 185 (Pon. 1990).

Contracts are not interpreted on the basis of subjective uncommunicated views, or secret hopes of one of the parties, but on an objective basis, according to the reasonable expectations or understanding of parties based upon circumstances known to the parties and their words and actions, at the time the agreement was entered into. Kihara v. Nanpei, 5 FSM R. 342, 345 (Pon. 1992).

Where prior course of dealing and surrounding circumstances make it apparent that the parties' intention was that pay for unused vacation time would be an implied term the former employee is entitled to the pay for unused vacation time minus the applicable taxes. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Wade, 5 FSM R. 354, 356 (Pon. 1992).

The controlling factor in the interpretation of contracts is the intention of the parties at the time of the entering into of the contract. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Wade, 5 FSM R. 354, 356 (Pon. 1992).

When the language of a contract is ambiguous or uncertain a court may look beyond the words of the contract to the surrounding circumstances and the parties' intent without changing the writing. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Wade, 5 FSM R. 354, 356 (Pon. 1992).

Where the express language of the contract does not unambiguously require the employer to pay a terminated employee the equivalent of the cost of shipping household goods back to point of hire when no goods are actually shipped and where there are no surrounding circumstances or prior course of dealing indicating that this was the parties' intent the court will find that it was not the parties' intent and thus not a term of the contract that terminated employees be paid shipping costs for household goods not shipped. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Wade, 5 FSM R. 354, 357 (Pon. 1992).

Contracts frequently do not specify the time of performance and courts routinely decide what a reasonable time for performance is in those cases where no time has been specified. Iriarte v. Micronesian Developers, Inc., 6 FSM R. 332, 335 (Pon. 1994).

The presumption that a written contract that is complete on its face embodies the final and entire agreement between the parties may be rebutted by evidence presented at trial. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 384 (Pon. 1994).

An instrument that is not a promissory note because it fails to contain words of negotiability may still be enforceable as a contract between the parties. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 323 (App. 1995).

Interpretations of terms in contracts are matters of law to be determined by the court. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 323 (App. 1995).

When the language of a contract is ambiguous or uncertain a court may look beyond the words of the contract to the surrounding circumstances to determine the parties' intent without changing the writing, and the court should attempt to determine meaning of words used rather than what signatory later says he intended. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 324 (App. 1995).

When faced with an allegation that an ambiguous contract provision creates a condition, courts prefer either an interpretation that imposes on a party a duty to see that an event occurs, rather than one that makes the other party's duty conditional on the occurrence of the event, or an interpretation that will reduce an obligee's risk of forfeiture if the event does not occur. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 324 (App. 1995).

Unless it is clear from the agreement or the surrounding circumstances that the obligee has assumed the risk of forfeiture, courts prefer an interpretation that reduces that risk. Nanpei v. Kihara, 7 FSM R. 319, 324 (App. 1995).

Interpretations of contract terms are matters of law to be determined by the court, and are reviewed on appeal de novo. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 621 (App. 1996).

Contracts are not interpreted on the basis of subjective uncommunicated views, or secret hopes of one of the parties, but on an objective basis. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 86 (Pon. 1997).

The determining factor as to the rights of a third-party beneficiary is the intention of the parties who actually made the contract. The question whether a contract was intended for the benefit of a third person is generally regarded as one of construction of the contract. The parties' intention in this respect is determined by the terms of the contract as a whole, construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made and with the apparent purpose that the parties are trying to accomplish. Mailo v. Penta Ocean Inc., 8 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 1997).

The time for completion of a house is not a material term of the parties' agreement when nothing in the parties' oral agreement indicated that the "time was of the essence" for completion of the house within two months and when the plaintiff pointed out no particular day of completion as being crucial. Therefore, late completion of the house should not be seen as a failure of a condition to further obligations under the contract. O'Byrne v. George, 9 FSM R. 62, 64 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The controlling factor in the interpretation of contracts is the intention of the parties at the time of the entering into the contract. Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Contracts are not interpreted on the basis of subjective uncommunicated views, or secret hopes of one of the parties, but on an objective basis. Contracts are interpreted according to the reasonable expectations or understanding of parties based upon circumstances known to the parties and their words and actions, at the time the agreement was entered into. Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the parties made their verbal agreement promising that the plaintiff would provide fill materials from his quarry for various of the defendant's municipal projects and that the defendant would provide the plaintiff with two loads of fill material for each day of hauling, they formed a contract because these promises contained an offer, acceptance and consideration and the terms of the agreement were definite and enforceable. The parties' essential commitments and agreement were identified and definite. Therefore the agreement is binding. Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Once a forum selection clause is determined to be binding, its scope and effect should be determined under a contract law analysis. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 127 (Pon. 1999).

When the forum selection clause language uses "exclusive jurisdiction" in conjunction with the mandatory language, "hereby irrevocably consent," it establishes an intent to have any dispute resolved only by the other forum and it leaves no room for dispute over the clause's meaning in this respect. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 127 (Pon. 1999).

Contractual interpretation is a question of law to be reviewed de novo on appeal. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 1999).

When a lease provides that the lessees have the right to build such structures as they see fit with the buildings to become the lessor's property upon the lease termination and the lessees built two houses, they built such structures as they saw fit, and in doing so defined the nature of those structures. Once built, those structures became the lessor's property, although not until the lease's termination. At that time, the lessor was entitled to find himself the owner of dwellings, not a bar. He was within his rights to prevent the houses from being renovated for use in that manner. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 195 (App. 1999).

It is a well established principle of contract construction that clauses which are knowingly incorporated into a contract should not be treated as meaningless. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

Ambiguity in a contract provision is generally construed against the drafter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 111 (Chk. 2001).

In interpreting a contract, words are to be given their plain and ordinary meaning. Dai Wang Sheng v. Japan Far Seas Purse Seine Fishing Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 112, 115 (Kos. 2001).

A contract provision that states that a fishing association will "take necessary steps to facilitate prompt and adequate settlement of any claim for loss or damage" against its member vessels cannot be read to mean that the association assumed liability for those claims because to "facilitate" a settlement of a claim or loss, without more, does not mean to assume liability for the claim or loss. Dai Wang Sheng v. Japan Far Seas Purse Seine Fishing Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 112, 115 (Kos. 2001).

When contractual provisions differ significantly from similar ones in another contract they therefore must be interpreted differently, and a party's liability must be based on the language in the agreement it signed, not on the language in the agreement that another signed. FSM v. National Offshore Tuna Fisheries Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 169, 173 (Chk. 2001).

Interpretations of contract terms are matters of law to be determined by the court. FSM v. National Offshore Tuna Fisheries Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 169, 173 (Chk. 2001).

When a fishing agreement requires that the signatory organizations must only take "necessary steps to ensure" that their members comply with the laws, regulations, and their permits and the government has made no allegation and introduced no evidence that the signatory has failed to take any of these "necessary steps," the government cannot seek to impose some sort of strict liability on the signatory for the actions of its members' employees because the fishing agreement's terms, without more, do not create liability for the signatory organizations for each and every violation of FSM fishery law or the foreign fishing agreement that their members commit. The government is therefore not entitled to summary judgment because, as a matter of law, the foreign fishing agreement's contractual terms do not impose vicarious liability on the signatory. FSM v. National Offshore Tuna Fisheries Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 169, 173-74 (Chk. 2001).

Construction of a contract for an attorney's compensation is governed by the same rules that apply to contracts generally and interpretation of contract terms are matters of law to be determined by the court. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 10 FSM R. 493, 496 (Chk. 2002).

Contracts are not interpreted on the basis of one of the parties' subjective uncommunicated views or secret hopes. Instead, courts interpret and enforce agreements on an objective basis, according to the parties' reasonable expectations based upon the circumstances known to the parties and their words and actions, at the time the agreement was entered into. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 502, 504-05 (Pon. 2002).

The fact that a party's understanding of an agreement is at variance with its express terms does not raise an issue of fact precluding summary judgment. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 502, 505 (Pon. 2002).

Ambiguities in a contract must be construed against the drafter. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 241 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In interpreting a contract, the words thereof are to be given their plain and ordinary meaning. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 241 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a contract provision for written notice of termination was inserted in the contract to assure that the employee had actual notice of the adverse action and when there is no dispute that the employee received actual notice of his termination, the employer's failure to provide written notice is not actionable breach of contract. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When an employment contract has no provision for immediate termination under any circumstances, even where it is undisputed that the employer's property was misappropriated by an employee under contract, the court, construing the contract against the drafter, must conclude that the employer was required to provide the employee with sixty days written notice of his termination, which must run from the date of actual notice of impending termination. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When interpreting a contract, the FSM judiciary may not simply assume that reasonably intelligent Micronesians will perceive the same meaning as would reasonably intelligent Americans. The court may not blind itself to the pertinent aspects of Micronesian society, such as less facility in the English language, less exposure to business concepts, and paucity of legal resources, which might cause a reasonably intelligent Micronesian to perceive a meaning differently than would a person from some other nation. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 11 FSM R. 559, 563 n.4 (Pon. 2003).

Contracts are not interpreted on the basis of subjective, uncommunicated views or secret hopes of one of the parties. Instead, courts interpret and enforce agreements on an objective basis, according to the parties' reasonable expectations or understanding based upon the circumstances known to the parties and their words and actions, at the time the agreement was entered into. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

Only when there is ambiguity within a contract and there are various reasonable and practical alternative constructions available is it necessary to employ rules of interpretation. Otherwise, a party may not seek to introduce evidence that shows that the clear and unambiguous terms of a written agreement are other than as shown on the face of the agreement. Such a prohibition preserves the security and credibility of those who contract with the good faith belief that what they sign is what they agree to. Goyo Corp. v. Christian, 12 FSM R. 140, 146 (Pon. 2003).

The word "shall" renders the indicated procedures mandatory. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 239 (Pon. 2003).

Contracts frequently do not specify the time of performance and courts routinely decide what is a "reasonable time" for performance in those cases. Therefore, if the timing of a party's performance under a contract is in dispute, it is the court's duty to determine what is a "reasonable time" for performance. Esau v. Malem Mun. Gov't, 12 FSM R. 433, 435 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A default judgment's determination of damages may require the court to interpret a contract's terms. Interpretations of contract terms are matters of law to be determined by the court. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 554 (Chk. 2005).

When the contract addendum language is plain and unambiguous that the extra $3,000 per year pay was contingent upon the employer actually obtaining OMIP funding, not upon the plaintiff's trying his best or taking all possible steps to obtain that funding, the plaintiff's base annual pay was $55,000, not $58,000, and $55,000 should be read into the contract in place of $58,000. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 555 (Chk. 2005).

Interpretation of contract provisions is a matter of law to be determined by the court. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 364 (Yap 2009).

A contract must be read as a whole in the light of the circumstances under which it was made and with the apparent purpose that the parties are trying to accomplish. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 365 (Yap 2009).

A court may not simply assume that reasonably intelligent Micronesians will perceive the same meaning as would reasonably intelligent Americans because the court will not blind itself to the pertinent aspects of Micronesian society, such as less facility in the English language, less exposure to business concepts, and paucity of legal resources, which might cause a reasonably intelligent Micronesian to perceive meaning differently than would a person from some other nation. Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 365 n.2 (Yap 2009).

Disclaimers of the warranties of merchantability and fitness for a particular purpose for certain equipment, translated into plain English, mean that the equipment is not warrantied or guaranteed to be in the condition to be used for the purpose it is being supplied, that is, the equipment is supplied "as is." Yoruw v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 16 FSM R. 360, 367 (Yap 2009).

Since U.S. common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of FSM constitutional courts, or custom and tradition within the FSM, the Kosrae State Court will look to U. S. common law decisions for guidance on contract issues against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 644 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A contract's prohibition of subcontracting includes independent contractors as well as those subcontractors over whom the contractor would exercise strict supervision and close control. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 571 (Pon. 2011).

Contracts are not interpreted and enforced on the basis of one party's subjective, uncommunicated views or secret hopes but on an objective basis based upon the parties' words and actions and the circumstances known to them when the contract was made. A court should try to determine the meaning of the contract's words rather than rely on what a signatory later says was intended. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 571 n.3 (Pon. 2011).

For the final expression of the parties' intent, the court relies primarily on the terms as expressed in the contract's words although when the contract language is ambiguous, it can look beyond the contract's words to the surrounding circumstances to determine the parties' intent without changing the writing. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 572 n.4 (Pon. 2011).

When waiver of the subcontracting prohibition can only be granted by the FSM's "prior written consent," the FSM's contracting officer's failure to object to subcontracting is not a waiver under the contract, nor can it be deemed an acceptance of subcontracting as in compliance with the contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 572 (Pon. 2011).

When a contract provision unequivocally authorizes a party's involvement in Asian Development Bank development projects since the ADB is a foreign donor organization and when there is no contractual provision requiring the party to contact foreign donor organizations only through the FSM diplomatic channels or requiring any particular procedure at all, the party's direct contact with the ADB may have caused puzzlement and delay by the ADB and become politically awkward for the FSM, but it was not a breach of the contract between the party and the FSM. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 579

When, in a contract, the nearest antecedent to the term "on a monthly basis" is "submission of duplicate invoices and progress reports," the phrase "on a monthly basis" qualifies when duplicate invoices and progress reports are due, not when payments are due because the grammatical construction of contracts generally requires that a qualifying or modifying phrase be construed as referring to its nearest antecedent. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 587 (Pon. 2011).

Contractual terms that provide that payment is due upon the occurrence of a stated event are generally not considered to be conditions indicating a forfeiture or a breach of contract but are merely a means of measuring time, and, if time is not of the essence of the contract, then the payment is due after a reasonable time, and what constitutes a reasonable time depends on the attendant circumstances in each case and is often based on factual determinations. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 587-88 (Pon. 2011).

Interpretations of contract terms are matters of law to be determined by the court. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 588 (Pon. 2011).

When the previously agreed percentages for completed work should be sufficient for a court to determine a contract price for any work done during the contract's last three years; when there is no indication that these same percentages were not intended for use throughout the contract's remaining three years and the overall grant award from the U.S. had a set figure; and when, if the parties thought that the payment terms for the contract's last three years were uncertain, the contract could be amended at any time with or without additional consideration, the court cannot conclude that there was no contract beyond the first two years because no prices had been set for the last three years or that there was no consideration for the last three years. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 589 (Pon. 2011).

Since interpretation of contract provisions is a matter of law to be determined by the court, an appellate court will review de novo the interpretation of contract provisions. Helgenberger v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 139, 143 (App. 2013).

Interpretation of contract provisions is a matter of law to be determined by the court, and an appellate court reviews issues of law de novo. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 169 (App. 2013).

Appellate courts interpret contract language de novo. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 171 (App. 2013).

When the contract language is clear and the record is clear, the appellate court may, on an alternate ground, affirm the trial court's decision denying an employee's claims for wages and overtime claims when the state administrative decision found as fact that he worked only on the projects for which he was paid a commission and when that decision was necessarily before the trial court when it was asked to grant partial summary judgment. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 171 (App. 2013).

When, under the employment contract, compensation is to be figured on the "net total amount for the specific job" not on the net total amount for only a part of the contract job, the employee's commission compensation must be figured on a contract job by contract job basis, not on a task-by-task basis within the contract job. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 172 (App. 2013).

A court will enforce a contract as written. Contracts are not interpreted and enforced on the basis of one party's subjective views or secret hopes but on an objective basis based upon the meaning of the contract's words rather than on what a signatory later says. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 172 (App. 2013).

When the contract's words mean that the employee's compensation must be based on a prorated share of the time spent on the project, the trial court did not err by concluding that the employee's compensation was based on the proportion of the time spent since that is what the contract required. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 172 (App. 2013).

A contract must be interpreted on an objective basis, based upon the parties' intent at the time of contracting. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 249-50 (Pon. 2014).

The controlling factor in interpretation of contracts is the parties' intention at the time of entering into the contract. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 274 (Pon. 2014).

When a contract's language is ambiguous or uncertain, a court may look beyond the words of the contract to the surrounding circumstances and the parties' intent without changing the writing. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 274 (Pon. 2014).

Contracts are not interpreted on the basis of subjective uncommunicated views or secret hopes of one of the parties, but on an objective basis according to the parties' reasonable expectations or understanding based upon circumstances known to the parties and their words and actions when the agreement was entered into. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 274 (Pon. 2014).

When, given the plaintiffs' work experience, the objective intent of the parties must have been for the plaintiffs to perform work on a barge, the only two possibilities of the parties' intent that are in any way supported by the contract's context are for the contract term "project" to refer either to the barge's conduction voyage or to its conduction voyage and subsequent dredging activity. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 274 (Pon. 2014).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts, or custom and tradition within the FSM. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 275 (Pon. 2014).

The court's precedents establish the validity of the principle of contra proferentem – any ambiguity in a contract is to be construed against the drafter – in this jurisdiction. But the rule that language is interpreted against the party who chose it has no direct application to cases where the language is prescribed by law. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 275 (Pon. 2014).

When one party chooses a contract term he is likely to provide more carefully for the protection of his own interests than for those of the other party. However, when the government mandates the specific contract language, neither party can directly impact the language through superior bargaining power and so the rule of contra proferentem does not apply. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 275 (Pon. 2014).

A rationale for the rule of contra proferentem is that the party against whom it operates had the possibility of drafting the language so as to avoid the dispute. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 275 (Pon. 2014).

When the employer could not have drafted the contract's duration clause differently because the language was mandated by a government agency, the policy rationale behind the doctrine of contra proferentem is inapplicable and the court will not use it to interpret the term "project" in the contract's duration clause. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 275 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendant arranged accommodation for its crew at a hotel and the crew members signed a check-in form that specified the check-out date as January 15, 2011, and since the January, 15 2011 check-out date not an ambiguous term, the meaning of the term is a question of law. The court will interpret the term according to its plain meaning that as a matter of law the contract ran through January 15, 2011. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 277 (Pon. 2014).

When a court is presented with a valid contract that lacks a duration clause, it must construct one into the contract using the guideline of reasonableness. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 277 (Pon. 2014).

When, under the circumstances, a reasonable duration term would be that the parties intended the crew to remain until the defendant provided the hotel with notice that accommodations were no longer required and when two of the crew members departed before January 27, 2011, and the hotel duly checked them out of the hotel and closed their account, this course of performance aids the court in determining that the parties intended the contract's duration to be that the crew members remain until the hotel was notified that accommodations were no longer required. Pacific Skylite Hotel v. Penta Ocean, 19 FSM R. 265, 277 (Pon. 2014).

Contracts frequently do not specify the time of performance and courts routinely decide what a reasonable time for performance is when no time has been specified. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

When repayment of the airport renovation loan was due a reasonable time after the $500,104.65 partial payment and when, without identifying the exact date that would constitute a reasonable time after the partial payment that the repayment should be complete, the court is confident that, based on the attendant circumstances, that time frame would be within the six-year period before suit was filed on January 24, 2012. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

What constitutes a reasonable time depends on the attendant circumstances in each case and is often based on factual determinations. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

Contracts are not interpreted on the basis of subjective, uncommunicated views or secret hopes of one of the parties. Instead, courts interpret and enforce agreements on an objective basis, according to the parties' reasonable expectations or understanding based upon the circumstances known to the parties and their words and actions, at the time the agreement was entered into. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 357 (Pon. 2014).

Whether the term "costs" in a verbal contract between a client and his attorney included attorney's fees is a question of contract interpretation that must be resolved by the court as a matter of law. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 523 (Pon. 2014).

Since a sophisticated lawyer negotiating against her own client should have reduced the agreement to writing and specified that "costs" included attorney's fees, the court will not reward the attorney's flawed conduct by imposing her interpretation of the term "costs" on her client more than 20 years after they entered into the representation agreement. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 524 (Pon. 2014).

Whether a breach of contract has occurred is generally not a question of law but is rather a factual question, but when the facts are undisputed, the determination of whether there has been a material non-compliance with a contract's terms is necessarily reduced to a question of law. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

When only the construction of a contract is at issue, the legal effect and interpretation of the contract is a question of law, and summary judgment is proper. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 565 (Kos. 2014).

A written instrument, such as a contract, must be read as a whole and in the light of the circumstances under which it was made. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 565 (Kos. 2014).

When the Personnel Manual, read as a whole, authorizes the payment of the full amount (if it is 600 hours or less) of accrued annual leave to a former employee only when that employee has resigned with two weeks' written notice, the result must be that an employee's right to accrued annual leave pay is contingent upon certain events and if those events do not occur, the right never becomes a vested property interest. When it is undisputed that those events (written resignation with two weeks' notice) never occurred, the former employee, as a matter of law, did not have a vested property interest in his accrued annual leave. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 566 (Kos. 2014).

A court should endeavor to determine the meaning of a contractor's words, rather than rely on what a signatory later says was intended. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 223-24 (Pon. 2015).

The interpretation of terms within contracts constitutes a matter of law to be determined by the court. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 408 (Pon. 2016).

An insurance contract in the FSM that made reference to "the benefits provided under the Workers' Compensation of the CNMI," only intended to merely utilize 4 N. Mar. I. Code § 9310 to ascribe a dollar amount to the benefits to which an injured employee would be entitled, as opposed to adopting the entire CMNI Workers' Compensation Program. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 408 (Pon. 2016).

In interpreting a contract, the words thereof, are to be given their plain and ordinary meaning. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 408 (Pon. 2016).

Clauses that are knowingly incorporated into a contract should not be treated as meaningless. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 408 (Pon. 2016).

Any ambiguities in a contract provision should be construed more strictly against the party who wrote it. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20 FSM R. 404, 408 (Pon. 2016).

Questions of contract interpretation are matters of law to be determined by the court. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 418 (App. 2016).

When a letter signed by both parties clearly states that the partial payments were a "repayment plan for the outstanding balance of the loan," it cannot be interpreted in any way other than as an acknowledgment of the whole debt and that the agreed $100 payments were partial payments on the whole debt. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 418 (App. 2016).

Interpretation of contract provisions is a matter of law to be determined by the court. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 489 (Chk. 2016).

Since the Chuuk State Supreme Court has generally, except when a Chuuk statute or constitutional provision is applicable, followed common law contract principles in deciding contract cases, the court will apply common law contract rules. Common law decisions of the United States are thus an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts, or custom and tradition within the FSM. FSM Petroleum Corp. v. Etomara, 21 FSM R. 123, 127 n.1 (Chk. 2017).

If a loan is in default and the promissory note contains an acceleration clause, the lender may choose to accelerate payment of the entire amount due and payable under the note. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 172 (Pon. 2017).

When a promissory note contains a clause under which the bank, in the event of a default, is entitled to reasonable attorney's fees, expenses and costs of collection, the borrowers thus agreed to the imposition of reasonable attorney's fees and costs of collection if they defaulted on their payment obligation to the bank. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 173 (Pon. 2017).

– Mistake and Misunderstanding

Where fraud or mistake are involved, the court can reform or cancel a deed, but relief will be denied in either situation if the misunderstanding of the aggrieved party was caused by his unexplained failure to read the necessary documents. Melander v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 324, 329 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies where there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or another reason and requires a party to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 392 (Pon. 1994).

The parol evidence rule generally prohibits the introduction of any extrinsic evidence, whether oral or written, to vary, alter or add to the terms of an integrated written instrument, but parol evidence is generally held admissible to alter the terms of a written contract when it is shown that by reason of mutual mistake the parties' true intention is not expressed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 10 FSM R. 479, 480 (Pon. 2001).

In the case of mutual mistake the adversely affected party may rescind or avoid the contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

A mutual mistake occurs when both parties are under substantially the same erroneous belief as to the facts. In a mutual mistake case, the party adversely affected must show that: 1) the mistake goes to a basic assumption on which the contract was made; 2) the mistake has a material effect on the agreed exchange of performances; and 3) the mistake is not one of which he bears the risk. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

When the mistake did not go to a basic assumption upon which the contract (loan) was made; when the mistake had no effect on the agreed exchange of performances – the loan terms offered by the bank and accepted and agreed to by the borrower were not a result of the "mistake"; and when both parties were not under substantially the same erroneous belief as to the facts that were the basis of the agreement, there was no mutual erroneous belief about the facts which were the basis for the loan and its terms and it is not a case of mutual mistake. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

Contracts are not reformed for mistake, writings are. The distinction is crucial. Courts have been tenacious in refusing to remake a bargain entered into because of mistake. They will, however, rewrite a writing which does not express the bargain. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

The classic case for reformation is a scrivener's or typist's error. Reformation is available in the case of the omission of a term agreed on, the inclusion of a term not agreed on, or the incorrect reduction of a term to writing. At the simplest level it is the mechanism for the correction of typographical and other similar inadvertent errors in reducing an agreement to writing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

The variance between the original agreement and the writing may take any one of an infinity of conceivable forms. Often, the mistake is as to the legal effect of the writing; the parties' agreement called for a particular legal result. The writing, if enforced, produces a different result. Reformation is available. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

Where, because of mistake, a writing fails to accurately state the parties' agreement, reformation is the exclusive remedy. If the writing is inaccurate because of fraud, the alternative remedies of reformation and rescission are available. But when no allegation of fraud has been made, rescission is not an available remedy. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

– Modification

The parol evidence rule does not bar evidence of subsequent modification of the contract. FSM Dev.

Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

The court will find that the parties' verbal agreement was not modified later by any of the parties' later actions when the plaintiff has failed to sustain his burden of proof with respect to those later actions. Tulensru v. Utwe, 9 FSM R. 95, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When both plaintiff and defendant were aware of the project's changed specifications; when defendant was present at the project site on the first day of construction and on several days throughout the project term; when defendant had ample notice and knowledge that the project specifications had been changed; and when defendant did not, at any time, notify, stop or interfere with plaintiff's work and completion of the project, it would be unfair to enforce the contract term that required a writing signed by both parties to amend the agreement's terms and conditions. The parol evidence rule does not bar evidence of subsequent modification of a contract. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When a contract was later modified verbally by the parties to require a monthly rental payment of $150 for the first year of the agreement, in addition to the agreed upon repairs to be completed by the defendant, this verbal modification of the lease agreement is enforceable. Lonno v. Talley, 12 FSM R. 484, 486 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there was a binding purchase agreement between a land buyer and a clan land seller and the plaintiffs were intended beneficiaries of that contract and when that contract could only be modified by a consensus decision by the seller's clan members evidenced by the agreement of five or more of the six designated clan members but the purported modification did not contain five genuine signatures of the designated committee representatives, there was a breach of the purchase agreement entitling plaintiffs to damages. Edgar v. Truk Trading Corp., 13 FSM R. 112, 117-18 (Chk. 2005).

Although the written contract required the plaintiffs to give the defendant a non-refundable retainer fee of $5,000, the defendant waived this requirement when he only required $500, altering the contract. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 647 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Whether a contract has been modified by the parties thereto is ordinarily a question of fact for the finder of fact. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2014).

Since modification is a common law doctrine in the field of contracts, the court will consider United States decisions as an appropriate source of guidance in analyzing unresolved questions arising in the area of contracts. Under longstanding principles of common law, a contract may be modified with both parties' assent, provided that there is consideration for the new agreement or it is made under circumstances making consideration unnecessary. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2014).

A subordinate and separable part of the contract may be waived or modified by the parties without a cancellation of the whole contract. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2014).

When it is clear that the parties did not reach a meeting of the minds necessary to modify the contract, the absence of mutual assent makes the doctrine of modification inapplicable. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2014).

The Pohnpei statute of frauds provision bars the enforcement of oral contracts that could not be performed within one year from the making thereof. It does not bar modifying a contract more than one year after the contract's original formation or make that modification unenforceable. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178 (Pon. 2017).

A borrower cannot make a bank liable for payment for further construction work (in effect, requiring the bank to make a further loan to the borrower) without the bank's consent. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 181 (Pon. 2017).

– Necessity of Writing

Under a statute of frauds writings are not required to make a contract, but to provide evidence that a contract has been made. A writing meets the statute of frauds if it contains the names of the parties, terms and conditions of the contract, a reasonable description of the subject of the contract and is signed by the party to be charged. It need not state the particulars of the contract so long as its substance or essential terms are stated, and it need not be a single document, but may be pieced together from separate writings. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 620 (App. 1996).

When the leading object of a party promising to pay the debt of another is to promote his own interests, and not to become surety or guarantor, and the promise is made on sufficient consideration, it will be valid, although not in writing. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 9 FSM R. 530a, 530d (Pon. 2000).

There is no statute of frauds – a law requiring that certain agreements or contracts to be in writing before they are enforceable in court – in Chuuk. Customarily, any agreement, even that selling land, might be oral. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 389 (Chk. 2001).

There is no statute of frauds in Chuuk, that is, no legal requirement that there be a writing for there to be an enforceable contract. Under Chuukese customary law, no writing is needed to effect any contractual transaction, including the transfer of an interest in land. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

There is no statute of frauds – a law requiring that certain agreements or contracts to be in writing before they are enforceable in court – in Chuuk. Customarily, any agreement, even that selling land, might be oral, but in some situations, a customary oral transfer must be registered to be enforceable. The reason is not that the Torrens land registration system must supplant custom and tradition. Rather, the reason is one of evidence because certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership as stated therein against the world. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 472 (App. 2011).

Chuuk does not have a statute of frauds. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 384 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

There is no statute of frauds in the FSM Code. The relevant statutes do not require salvage contracts, or maritime contracts of any kind, to be in writing in order to be enforceable. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2013).

It is generally true that salvage contracts may be oral. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2013).

The Pohnpei statute of frauds covers a contract to charge any person upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or misdoing of another. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 9 n.3 (Pon. 2013).

Under a statute of frauds, writings are not required to make a contract, but to provide evidence that a contract has been made. A writing meets the statute of frauds if it contains the parties' names, terms and conditions of the contract, a reasonable description of the subject of the contract and is signed by the party to be charged. The writing need not state the contract's particulars so long as its substance or essential terms are stated, and it need not be a single document, but may be pieced together from separate writings. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2013).

Generally, an oral agreement is as enforceable as a written one. Reducing an agreement to writing, however, can assist the parties in assuring that all the necessary terms have been agreed to and are definite, or later assist a court in ascertaining what those terms were. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 n.3 (Pon. 2016).

The Pohnpei statute of frauds provides that no action may be brought and maintained on any agreement that is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof unless the promise, contract, or agreement, upon which the action is brought or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and is signed by the party to be charged therewith or by some person legally authorized to sign for that party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 177 (Pon. 2017).

An alleged oral contract for a fifty-year term, which by its terms could not be performed within one year, is not actionable under the Pohnpei statute of frauds. This is true even if the oral contract could have been terminated within one year for cause. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 177 (Pon. 2017).

The Pohnpei statute of frauds provision bars the enforcement of oral contracts that could not be performed within one year from the making thereof. It does not bar modifying a contract more than one year after the contract's original formation or make that modification unenforceable. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178 (Pon. 2017).

There is no statute of frauds – a law requiring that certain agreements or contracts to be in writing before they are enforceable in court – in Chuuk. Customarily, any agreement, even that selling land, might be oral. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

– Novation

The general rule is that parties to a contract may rescind it by making a new contract that is inconsistent with the original contract. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 37 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Liabilities arising from a contract are not assignable without the consent of the creditor, and the mere assumption of the debt by a third party is not sufficient to establish a novation of the original contract unless there is a clear assent by the creditor to the substitution of a new obligor. Black Micro Corp. v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 311, 314-15 (Pon. 1995).

Liabilities arising from a contract are not assignable without the consent of the creditor, and a third party's mere assumption of the debt is not sufficient to establish a novation of the original contract unless there is a clear assent by the creditor to the substitution of a new obligor. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 74 (Pon. 2001).

The term "novation" is used almost exclusively in contract law and denotes the parties' substitution of a new agreement for an old one that involves either a new obligation between the same parties, or a new debtor, or a new creditor. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 315 (Chk. 2001).

Even assuming that the seller historically did not charge interest on its account with the buyer, nothing precludes the parties to a commercial transaction from coming to a new agreement regarding installment payments on the outstanding indebtedness that also included an interest component calculated over the prior 26 months period, so long as the interest rate charged did not contravene FSM public policy as set out in 34 F.S.M.C. 204. Jayko Int'l, Inc. v. VCS Constr. & Supplies, 10 FSM R. 502, 504 (Pon. 2002).

Parties to a contract may agree to replace an existing contract with a new and different contract before the original contract's term has expired. The general rule is that parties to a contract may rescind it by making a new contract that is inconsistent with the original contract. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 226 (Chk. 2006).

Since, upon the execution of a valid and legal substituted agreement the original agreement merges into and is extinguished, and since failure to perform the substituted agreement will not revive the old agreement, a 1999 lease agreement that was extinguished by a 2001 land purchase agreement will not be revived by the state's breach of the land purchase agreement. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 226 (Chk. 2006).

Parties to a contract may agree to replace an existing contract with a new and different contract before the original contract's term has expired. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 17 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. 2011).

The general rule is that parties to a contract may rescind it by making a new contract that is inconsistent with the original contract. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 17 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. 2011).

The parties' stipulated judgment in a state court action for breach of an easement agreement constituted a new contract – a new easement agreement – between the parties because it was a contract or agreement that was inconsistent with the original contract or agreement, especially when the amount stipulated to, $50,000, greatly exceeded the value of the undelivered 40 cubic yards of sand and 40 cubic yards of aggregates that constituted the breach. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 17 FSM R. 609, 611-12 (Chk. 2011).

When borrowers signed a November 17, 2014 promissory note that superseded and replaced an earlier April 20, 2012 promissory note after they requested that the original loan be restructured and the monthly payments lowered, the bank offered to do so under the terms in its response, and, by signing the bank's commitment letter and the November 17, 2014 amended and restated promissory note, the borrowers accepted that offer and agreed to those "restructured" terms and agreed and acknowledged that their remaining indebtedness to the bank was $17,831.33. Since the $17,831.33 credit the bank extended to the borrowers through the November 17, 2014 amended and restated promissory note paid off and retired the original April 20, 2012 promissory note and its debt, the borrowers' lament that the borrowers never received the $17,831.33 in cash is misguided. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 607 (Pon. 2020).

– Option Contract

An option contract is a unilateral contract where an offer is made and the offeree is invited to accept by rendering a performance instead of promising something in return. Once the offeree either tenders or begins the invited performance, the option contract is created. The offer then becomes irrevocable. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (I), 6 FSM R. 48, 53 (Pon. 1993).

The offeror may vary the common law rule by express provision in the contract; thus, he remains in control of his offer. Absent express provisions to the contrary, an option contract is binding on the offeror who must keep the offer open for a specified time period. The offeree is free to accept or reject within that period. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (I), 6 FSM R. 48, 53 (Pon. 1993).

– Parol Evidence

A party may not seek to introduce evidence that shows that the clear and unambiguous terms of a written agreement are other than as shown on the face of the agreement. Such a prohibition preserves the security and credibility of those who contract with good faith belief that what they sign is what they agree to. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (I), 6 FSM R. 48, 55 (Pon. 1993).

The parol evidence rule bars evidence of a contemporaneous or prior oral agreement that contradicts or alters the terms of the written agreement. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 250 (Chk. 1995).

Parol evidence of a collateral agreement that does not alter or contradict the written agreement is not barred by the parol evidence rule if the collateral agreement is one that in the circumstances might naturally be omitted from the writing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 250 (Chk. 1995).

The parol evidence rule does not bar evidence of subsequent modification of the contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

When there is a single and final memorial of the understanding of the parties embodied in a written agreement, for evidentiary purposes all prior and contemporaneous negotiations are treated as having been superseded by that written memorial under the parol evidence rule. Fu Zhou Fuyan Pelagic Fishery Co. v. Wang Shun Ren, 7 FSM R. 601, 604-05 (Pon. 1996).

When both plaintiff and defendant were aware of the project's changed specifications; when defendant was present at the project site on the first day of construction and on several days throughout the project term; when defendant had ample notice and knowledge that the project specifications had been changed; and when defendant did not, at any time, notify, stop or interfere with plaintiff's work and completion of the project, it would be unfair to enforce the contract term that required a writing signed by both parties to amend the agreement's terms and conditions. The parol evidence rule does not bar evidence of subsequent modification of a contract. Malem v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 233, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The parol evidence rule generally prohibits the introduction of any extrinsic evidence, whether oral or written, to vary, alter or add to the terms of an integrated written instrument, but parol evidence is generally held admissible to alter the terms of a written contract when it is shown that by reason of mutual mistake the parties' true intention is not expressed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 10 FSM R. 479, 480 (Pon. 2001).

A parol agreement inconsistent with a written agreement made contemporaneously therewith is void and unenforceable, unless it was omitted from the written contract by fraud, accident, or mistake. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 10 FSM R. 479, 480 (Pon. 2001).

The parol evidence rule bars evidence of a contemporaneous or prior oral agreement that contradicts or alters the terms of the written agreement, but parol evidence of a collateral agreement that does not alter or contradict the written agreement is not barred by the parol evidence rule if the collateral agreement is one that in the circumstances might naturally be omitted from the writing. Western Sales Trading Co. (Phils) v. B & J Corp., 14 FSM R. 423, 425 (Chk. 2006).

Since interest on unpaid amounts is not a collateral agreement that in the circumstances might naturally be omitted from the writing but is a term that would naturally be expected to be part of an agreement about payment for goods provided on an open account or on credit because it alters the written agreement between the parties, therefore evidence of a contract term that 1½% interest per month was due on unpaid amounts is inadmissible under the parol evidence rule. Western Sales Trading Co. (Phils) v. B & J Corp., 14 FSM R. 423, 425 (Chk. 2006).

The parol evidence rule bars evidence of a contemporaneous or prior oral agreement that contradicts or alters the terms of the written agreement. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 176 (Pon. 2017).

Parol evidence of a collateral agreement that does not alter or contradict the written agreement is not barred by the parol evidence rule if the collateral agreement is one that in the circumstances might naturally be omitted from the writing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 176 (Pon. 2017).

Since an employment contract's duration, including termination, are not matters collateral to the employment contract, evidence of a prior oral contract with terms that contradict or alter the terms of the written employment contract that the employee signed, is barred. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 176 (Pon. 2017).

– Ratification

If a board of directors, upon learning of an officer's unauthorized transaction, does not promptly attempt to rescind or revoke the action previously taken by the officer, the corporation is bound on the transaction on a theory of ratification. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A corporation's directors may ratify any unauthorized act or contract. A corporation's ratification need not be manifested by any vote or formal resolution of the board of directors. An implied ratification can arise if the corporate principal, with full knowledge and recognition of the material facts, exhibits conduct demonstrating an adoption and recognition of the contract as binding, such as acting in the contract's furtherance. It is well established that if a corporation, with knowledge of its officer's unauthorized contract and the material facts concerning it, receives and retains the benefits resulting from the transaction, it thereby ratifies the transaction. A corporation may not accept a transaction's benefit and at the same time attempt to escape its consequences on the ground that the transaction was not authorized. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 452-53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the board of directors did not act promptly to rescind or revoke the agreement made by its general manager; when all its subsequent actions have been consistent with the agreement's terms; when it had knowledge of the unauthorized contract and of the material facts concerning it; when it received, retained, and continues to receive and retain the benefits resulting from the transaction; it is clear that the board of directors has ratified the agreement. The corporation may not accept the agreement's benefits and at the same time escape its liabilities. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 453 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Even if a corporate official did not have the authority to execute a lease, his execution of the lease was ratified by the corporation's long acceptance of the lease's benefits. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 158 (Chk. 2002).

A clan or lineage in some respects functions as a corporation – it is, or can be, composed of many members, but is considered a single legal entity, capable of owning land, suing and being sued, and performing other acts, and which must necessarily act through its representatives. In this respect a corporation and a clan or lineage are analogous. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

Generally, any ratification of an unauthorized agreement must be in its entirety because an entity cannot accept the benefits of an unauthorized act, but reject its burdens. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

When a lineage as a whole has accepted all of the benefits of a lease – all of the payments that the lessee was required to make – up to the present and even beyond, it cannot now reject the burden of the lessee exercising its options to renew. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

It is possible for an agreement not authorized by all lineage members to be ratified by the later conduct of those who did not authorize it. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Lineage members' consent or acquiesce to the sale of lineage land can be shown by affirmative assent, or an acquiescence, or by ratification of the act. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Ratification is the approval of an otherwise unauthorized act or transaction. An implied ratification may take place if one, with full knowledge and understanding of the material facts, exhibits conduct that shows a recognition and adoption of the unauthorized act or transactions. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 443 (Pon. 2009).

The insurer ratified, or approved, the check cashing activities of its agents to the extent that they distributed the money obtained from the checks to policy holders for legitimate insurance purposes, and that the insurer gave credit to its agents for these distributions shows this conclusively. But the insurer never ratified the agents' conversion of the funds that were not accounted for, or were not used for insurance purposes since the insurer's efforts to figure out what had happened, to stop it from happening, to arrive at an accounting for the missing money, and to restore order to its Pohnpei operation, manifest its disapproval of the practice of cashing premium checks initiated and continued by its agents. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 444 (Pon. 2009).

Generally, any ratification of an unauthorized agreement must be in its entirety because an entity cannot accept the benefits of an unauthorized act, but reject its burdens. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

When an insurer, by its acts, ratified only the unauthorized agreements between its agents and its eligible policy-holders – the distribution of cash advances to eligible policy-holders, it "recovered" those funds from its policy-holders and since the insurer is not entitled to a double recovery, it cannot hold others liable for those sums and must give them credit for those sums. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

Once the insurer ratified its agents' unauthorized agreements with its eligible policy-holders, it was barred from recovering any of that money from others because that would be a double recovery since the insurer had already "recovered" those funds from its policy-holders. Plaintiffs are not permitted a double recovery. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

An insurer did not ratify its agents' check-cashing agreements with a business by giving the business credit for its agents' cash advances to its eligible policy-holders. It merely recognized that it was not entitled to double recovery. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

When the insurer did not ratify any of its agents' check-cashing agreements but ratified only each of its agents' unauthorized agreements with its eligible policy-holders, no unauthorized agreement was partially ratified. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 361 (App. 2012).

– Reformation

Reformation of an insurance contract may be sought under a theory of mutual mistake or mistake or fraud of the insurance agent. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

Reformation is an equitable doctrine that allows a court to conform a contract (even an insurance contract) to the true agreement between the parties rather than the agreement as written. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

Contracts are not reformed for mistake, writings are. The distinction is crucial. Courts have been tenacious in refusing to remake a bargain entered into because of mistake. They will, however, rewrite a writing which does not express the bargain. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

The classic case for reformation is a scrivener's or typist's error. Reformation is available in the case of the omission of a term agreed on, the inclusion of a term not agreed on, or the incorrect reduction of a term to writing. At the simplest level it is the mechanism for the correction of typographical and other similar inadvertent errors in reducing an agreement to writing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

The variance between the original agreement and the writing may take any one of an infinity of conceivable forms. Often, the mistake is as to the legal effect of the writing; the parties' agreement called for a particular legal result. The writing, if enforced, produces a different result. Reformation is available. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

Where, because of mistake, a writing fails to accurately state the parties' agreement, reformation is the exclusive remedy. If the writing is inaccurate because of fraud, the alternative remedies of reformation and rescission are available. But when no allegation of fraud has been made, rescission is not an available remedy. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

Reformation will not be granted if its effect would be to curtail the rights of a bona fide purchaser for value or others who have relied upon the writing. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

When a loan agreement and promissory note that were the writings memorialized an agreement are reformed to accurately reflect the parties' agreement, the court is not creating an obligation where none currently exists by reforming the writings. The court is merely reforming the writings to reflect an obligation that already exists. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2004).

The trial court did not err in finding a meeting of minds and no mutual mistake and that the mistake was in reducing the terms to writing when the facts suggest that the lender understood AHPW to liable on the loan and the parties stipulated that AHPW should have signed the promissory note and that the defendants intended to guarantee the loan. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 14 FSM R. 390, 396 (App. 2006).

Reformation is available where there is an incorrect reduction of a term to a writing. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 14 FSM R. 390, 397 (App. 2006).

The trial court did not err when it reformed the loan documentation to reflect the parties' stipulated intent that AHPW be the obligor on the promissory note and that the appellants be guarantors of that obligation. As such, appellants were not guaranteeing their own obligation, they were guaranteeing AHPW's obligation on the promissory note. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 14 FSM R. 390, 397 (App. 2006).

When, even though the employment contract was printed with a Pohnpei state government letterhead, the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau's actual function and operation shows that it is independent of the Pohnpei state government; when the PVB's funding is provided for under the Compact of Free Association, but is deposited with the Pohnpei Department of Treasury and Administration for custodial purposes and disbursement; and when the PVB's actual decision-making lies with its Board, the PVB is an entity that operates independent of the state government, and its Board is responsible for its General Manager's hiring, thus making the state's non-renewal of the plaintiff's contract unlawful. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

Although the contract in question is a personal services contract which names the State of Pohnpei as the contracting party, because the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau operates and is controlled by its Board, and not by the state government, the agreement is between the plaintiff and the PVB, through its Board of Directors. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

– Rescission

The general rule is that parties to a contract may rescind it by making a new contract that is inconsistent with the original contract. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 37 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Rescission of an insurance contract would, if granted, absolve an insured from liability for the premium and could even entitle him to return of the premium paid. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 470 (Pon. 2004).

Where, because of mistake, a writing fails to accurately state the parties' agreement, reformation is the exclusive remedy. If the writing is inaccurate because of fraud, the alternative remedies of reformation and rescission are available. But when no allegation of fraud has been made, rescission is not an available remedy. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2004).

An insurer seeking rescission of an insurance contract based on a misrepresentation in an insurance application must tender the premiums back to the insured. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

An insurer seeking to rescind a life insurance policy upon a ground which rendered it voidable from the beginning must return or tender the premium paid thereunder because rescission of an insurance contract would, if granted, absolve an insured from liability for the premium and entitle him to return of the premium paid since the general rule is that a contract must be rescinded in whole and cannot be rescinded in part. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

If an insurer seeks to avoid liability for the policy death benefit because of the insured's misrepresentation in the application process, it must tender the premiums to the beneficiaries. If it does not, it cannot prevail on the defense that the insured's misrepresentation made the policy voidable. This is because, after an insured's death, if a tender of the premium in avoidance of the life insurance policy for misrepresentation is not made to the beneficiaries in a timely manner or within a reasonable time, the defense of fraud or misrepresentation is deemed waived, and if the beneficiaries refuse the tender, it should then be paid into court before the insurer seeks a decision on the merits of its defense of fraud or misrepresentation. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 260 (Kos. 2009).

The court will not hesitate to deny rescission and order enforcement of the contract when the party seeking rescission has not made a timely tender of the premiums (or benefit) it received under the contract. Sigrah v. Micro Life Plus, 16 FSM R. 253, 261 (Kos. 2009).

Lawyers are accustomed to seeing the word "restitution" in connection with the "rescission" or cancellation of a contract because when a contract is rescinded, each party is entitled to be restored what he gave the other, or in other words, is entitled to restitution. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Rescission will normally be accompanied by restitution on both sides. It is the general rule that rescission will be granted only on the condition that the party asking it restore to the other party, substantially, the consideration received. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When parties bind themselves by their lawful contracts, courts are usually unable to alter these agreements even if they later seem unfair to one of the parties. Generally, a contract's terms determine when commissions are computed and paid. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 385 (App. 2017).

– Specific Performance

The equitable remedy of specific performance is one where the court orders a breaching party to do that which he has agreed to do, thereby rendering the non-breaching party the exact benefit which he expected. The remedy is available when money damages are inadequate compensation for the plaintiff – when damages cannot be computed or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 126 (Pon. 1993).

The definiteness of the contract terms and the ease or difficulty of enforcement or supervision must be considered before awarding specific performance damages. Pohnpei v. Ponape Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 613, 623 (App. 1996).

When the parties have agreed in the court's presence to specific performance on the issue of damages, trial is not necessary on that issue. James v. Lelu Town, 10 FSM R. 648, 650 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Specific performance is itself not a cause of action, but is rather a possible remedy for breach of contract under certain circumstances. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 472 n.7 (Chk. 2005).

Specific performance is a contract remedy that is available only when the usual measures of damages, expectancy, restitution, or reliance money damages, are inadequate compensation or cannot be computed or when a substitute cannot be purchased. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 606 (Pon. 2009).

If a party prevails upon its contract counterclaim and if none of the contract money damage remedies are applicable, specific performance is a possible remedy, even if the party has not prayed for it since, except for default judgments, every final judgment must grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Since specific performance, even when an unlikely remedy, is dependent upon the success of a breach of contract counterclaim and could be awarded even if it were dismissed, the dismissal of what is essentially a part of the prayer for relief will be denied. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 606 (Pon. 2009).

A common remedy for the breach of a land contract is specific performance – the transfer of the land to be acquired – since land is considered unique. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Specific performance is a contract remedy that is available only when the usual measures of damages – expectancy, or reliance, or restitution money damages – are inadequate compensation or cannot be computed or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The court cannot order the specific performance that the plaintiff would receive his "expectancy" – the land that he was to have received in exchange when the defendants do not have the land to exchange. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Specific performance is a contract remedy that is available only when the usual measures of damages, expectancy, restitution, or reliance money damages, are inadequate compensation or cannot be computed or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 563, 567 (Pon. 2013).

Any court order enforcing the specific performance of a contract right to exclusive possession of a factory must await a final judgment on the merits. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court generally encourages parties to voluntarily agree to resolve their disputes through alternative means such as arbitration and will specifically enforce the parties contract to arbitrate. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 653, 657 (Pon. 2013).

There are no FSM statutes governing arbitration, therefore only common law arbitration exists here. Nevertheless, when a contract clearly shows the parties' intent to submit disputes to arbitration, the court will allow and encourage the parties to freely contract to resolve their disputes in other forums, with the confidence that the court will enforce such agreements. The court will hold the parties to their agreement and specifically enforce the arbitration provisions in the contract. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 653, 657-58 (Pon. 2013).

In the absence of a statute requiring it, the specific enforcement of the arbitration clause does not mandate that litigation be dismissed before the arbitration can proceed. Generally, judicial proceedings will instead be stayed pending the arbitration. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 653, 658 (Pon. 2013).

In the absence of a statute requiring dismissal and in the interests of judicial economy and of lessening the parties' financial burden, the best way to specifically enforce the arbitration clause's intent is not to dismiss the case in the hope that a foreign arbitration will proceed smoothly and not require further judicial enforcement. The best way to specifically enforce the arbitration clause is to stay the judicial proceedings and maintain the status quo while the parties go through arbitration. A preliminary injunction will therefore remain in effect and the case will remain open while the arbitration proceeds. Once an arbitration decision is rendered, the court can then enforce that decision as a judgment or final order of this court and take such further steps as may be necessary and appropriate to conclude this litigation. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 653, 658 (Pon. 2013).

An agreement to arbitrate future contractual disputes is specifically enforceable, even if one party attempts to revoke the agreement. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 653, 658 (Pon. 2013).

The equitable remedy of specific performance is where the court orders a breaching party to do that which he has agreed to do, thereby rendering the non-breaching party the exact benefit which he expected. The remedy is available when money damages are inadequate compensation for the plaintiff, or when damages cannot be computed. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 251-52 (Pon. 2014).

When, if specific performance were ordered, the court would order that the plaintiff be allowed to resume possession of a lot for five more months, but when, because that lot was undeveloped and did not generate any revenue, five months of resumed occupation by the plaintiff would not affect the plaintiff's income and thus specific performance of the last five months of the lease would seem pointless, a money award for actual damages should suffice. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 378 (Pon. 2014).

The equitable remedy of specific performance is one where the court orders a breaching party to do that which he has agreed to do, thereby rendering the non-breaching party the exact benefit which he expected. The remedy is available when money damages are inadequate compensation for the plaintiff, when damages cannot be computed, or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 69 (Pon. 2015).

Specific performance is available only when the usual contract measures of damages, expectancy, restitution, or reliance money damages, are inadequate compensation or cannot be computed or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 69 (Pon. 2015).

By ordering the promisor to render the promised performance, the court attempts to produce, as nearly as is practicable, the same effect as if the contract had been performed, but a court will not order a performance that has become impossible, unreasonably burdensome, or unlawful, nor will it issue an order that can be frustrated by the defendant through exercise of a power of termination or otherwise. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 69 (Pon. 2015).

Because specific performance is a remedy in equity under contract law, an applicant's claim for specific performance is unenforceable when no valid agreement exists between the applicant and the government since, for the court to order the Secretary to hire the applicant based on an invalid contract, through specific performance, would be unlawful and a violation of public policy. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 69 (Pon. 2015).

Specific performance is a contract remedy that is available only when the usual measure of damages, expectancy, restitution, or reliance money damages are inadequate compensation, or cannot be computed, or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 535 (App. 2018).

When a money award for actual damages should suffice and the amount is capable of being ascertained, specific performance is, by implication, an unsuitable remedy. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 536 (App. 2018).

Specific performance, however, should only be granted where no adequate remedy at law exists. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 536 (App. 2018).

– Surety

In a broad sense a guarantor or surety is one who promises to answer for the debt or default of another. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 10 (Pon. 2004).

The main distinction between a contract of surety and one of guaranty has been expressed by stating that a surety is primarily and jointly liable with the principal debtor, while a guarantor's liability is collateral and secondary and is fixed only by the inability of the principal debtor to discharge the primary obligation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 13 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2004).

When the defendants attempted to obtain an $8.1 million standby letter of credit through the Bank of the FSM, Colonia, Yap, but were unable to because that bank was institutionally unable to handle such a letter of credit for a sum larger than $2.5 million; when the possibility that the other bank in the FSM, the Bank of Guam, might be able to issue such a letter of credit was not explored; and the defendants submitted a surety bond from the Travelers Casualty and Surety Company of Hartford, Connecticut; and when the court issued its order, it was under the impression that a standby letter of credit could be issued through the Bank of the FSM, Yap, and if it had had any hint that such was not possible, the order would have specified a letter of credit through any bank in the FSM and only if that was unavailable would an alternative bond have been considered; the court will approve the Travelers surety bond that the defendants have already obtained and stay execution on the judgment pending appeal and further court order. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 533, 534-35 (Yap 2007).

The general rule is that a payment by the principal before the action is time-barred, operates as a renewal as to the principal, and to a surety, but not to a guarantor. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

A payment by the principal debtor will not operate to toll the statute of limitations as to a guarantor of the debt, even though it might do so as to a surety. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

A surety contract is a contract between the court and a third party, the surety, under which the surety ensures that the criminal defendant will appear before the court for all court proceedings and complies with all other terms listed – in exchange for the court granting the defendant freedom from incarceration until the court's final judgment. The contract ends, at latest, when the defendant is sentenced – although it may end earlier. Chuuk v. Dawe, 22 FSM R. 415, 416 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When the State has not made any allegations that the criminal defendant violated his conditions of release before he was sentenced, but merely alleged that the defendant failed to abide by the conditions of his suspended sentence, the surety is not obligated for a breach of the surety contract because the surety contract expired when the defendant was sentenced and the surety had no duty to ensure that the defendant fulfilled the conditions of his suspended sentence. Chuuk v. Dawe, 22 FSM R. 415, 416 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Third-Party Beneficiary

A third person may, in his own right and name, enforce a promise made for his benefit even though he is a stranger both to the contract and to the consideration. This concept, originally an exception to the rule that no claim can be sued upon contractually unless it is a contract between the parties to the suit, has become so general and far-reaching in its consequences as to have ceased to be an exception, but is recognized as an affirmative rule, generally known as the third-party beneficiary doctrine. Mailo v. Penta Ocean Inc., 8 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 1997).

The determining factor as to the rights of a third-party beneficiary is the intention of the parties who actually made the contract. The question whether a contract was intended for the benefit of a third person is generally regarded as one of construction of the contract. The parties' intention in this respect is determined by the terms of the contract as a whole, construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made and with the apparent purpose that the parties are trying to accomplish. Mailo v. Penta Ocean Inc., 8 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 1997).

When the third-party beneficiary is so described as to be ascertainable, it is not necessary that he be named in the contract in order to enforce the contract. Mailo v. Penta Ocean Inc., 8 FSM R. 139, 141-42 (Chk. 1997).

Where a contract is made especially for the benefit of a third person he may enforce it directly against the promisor. Mailo v. Penta Ocean Inc., 8 FSM R. 139, 142 (Chk. 1997).

An intended third party beneficiary may enforce a settlement agreement not to seek further compensation from the third party even though not all the compensation agreed to has been paid when the settlement agreement clearly contemplated that the compensation might be tardy and provided a remedy for such an occurrence. Mailo v. Penta Ocean Inc., 8 FSM R. 139, 142 (Chk. 1997).

A third party beneficiary can only recover if he is an intended beneficiary of the contract; he may not recover if he is only an incidental beneficiary of that contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 2001).

The determining factor as to a third party beneficiary's rights is the intention of the parties who actually made the contract. The question whether a contract was intended for a third person's benefit is generally regarded as one of construction of the contract. The parties' intention in this respect is determined by the contract's terms as a whole, construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made and with the apparent purpose that the parties are trying to accomplish. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 2001).

When a contract's parties did not enter into that agreement primarily to benefit another, they were seeking to benefit themselves, and when their purpose was not to give the bank the benefit of their bargain, the bank is not the agreement's intended beneficiary and has no right to enforce that agreement. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 2001).

A third party beneficiary can only recover if he is an intended beneficiary of a contract. The determining factor as to a third party beneficiary's rights is the intention of the parties who actually made the contract. The question whether a contract was intended for the benefit of a third person is generally regarded as one of construction of the contract. The parties' intention in this respect is determined by the contract's terms as a whole, construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made and with the apparent purpose that the parties are trying to accomplish. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 633 (Pon. 2002).

There must be a valid agreement between two parties to enable a third person, for whose benefit the promise is made, to sue upon it. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 633 (Pon. 2002).

A third person can, in his own name and claiming his own right, enforce a promise made to benefit him regardless of the fact that he is a stranger to the contract and the consideration. The determining factor in a third party beneficiary claim is the parties' intent, which is a question of the construction of the contract as determined by the contract's terms as a whole. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 228 (Pon. 2002).

A third person may enforce a contract for his own benefit when he is a stranger to the contract if the contract shows the parties intended to benefit the third person. The question of the parties' intent is generally one of construction of the contract, and this intention is determined by the contract terms as a whole, construed in light of the circumstances of the contract's making and the parties' purpose. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 239 (Pon. 2003).

When a third-party beneficiary can be ascertained from the contract, he need not be named therein. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 239 (Pon. 2003).

A claimant may enforce a loan contract and require payment by the lender if he can prove that he was a third-party beneficiary of the loan contract. He must, however, sustain the essential elements of a third party beneficiary claim. There must be a legally enforceable contract, and the parties must have intended that the third party be benefited by the contract's performance. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 239 (Pon. 2003).

When the lender bank was in charge of the disbursement of the loan proceeds and when the contract language provided that no loan proceeds would be disbursed until the bank had received evidence that all labor and materials have been paid for, the bank assumed the duty under the agreement not to disburse loan proceeds until it had received verification that the suppliers had been paid. When, if the bank had met its commitment in this regard, it would have been impossible for the project to be completed without the suppliers being fully paid, the suppliers were as a matter of law intended third-party beneficiaries of the loan agreement. In such a case, the third-party may enforce the contract against the promisor. The bank's promise not to disburse loan proceeds until it had received confirmation that the suppliers had been paid, is enforceable against the bank. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 239-40 (Pon. 2003).

When, if the bank had met its obligation under the loan agreement the suppliers would have been fully paid upon completion of the project, the bank is liable to the suppliers. But since the bank, not the borrowers, made the promise not to disburse the loan proceeds until proof of payment to the suppliers, it follows that the suppliers may enforce the promise against the bank but not the borrowers because, at most, the borrowers may have had an unspecified duty to participate in the verification process, which is insufficient to render them liable to the suppliers as intended third-party beneficiaries. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 240 (Pon. 2003).

The absence of any express duty in a construction contract to insure the payment of the suppliers means that as a matter of law the parties to the construction agreement did not intend the suppliers to be third-party beneficiaries. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 241 (Pon. 2003).

When a party is precluded from contesting its liability on an oral agreement as a result of its willful, bad faith discovery misconduct and when the plaintiffs' damages are also fully awardable under the plaintiffs' third-party beneficiary claim quite apart from any liability under the agreement, the party's contention that it is not liable under the agreement is wholly lacking in merit. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 234, 241 (Pon. 2003).

A third party beneficiary can only recover if he or she is an intended beneficiary of a contract. When a contract is made especially for the benefit of a third person, he or she may enforce it directly against the promisor. The determining factor in a third party beneficiary claim is the parties' intent, which is a question of the construction of the contract as determined by the contract's terms as a whole. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 547 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a quitclaim deed conveys all of the seller's rights, title and interest in a parcel to a buyer, his children and all his future heirs; when there is no reference made to the plaintiffs or to reservation of any rights for the plaintiffs; and when the quitclaim deed clearly indicates the parties' intent: the sale of all rights, title and interest in the parcel for $3000; the quitclaim deed was not made especially for the benefit of third persons. As the plaintiffs were not the intended beneficiaries on the contract, and do not satisfy the requirements of third party beneficiaries, they cannot recover on the breach of contract claim. Benjamin v.

Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 547 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A contract's intended third-party beneficiary can recover attorney's fees under a contract providing for attorney's fees if it has to sue to enforce its third-party beneficiary rights and prevails. Similarly, a prevailing party can recover attorney's fees from an intended third-party beneficiary litigant if that beneficiary could have recovered attorney's fees from that party under the contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 256 (App. 2006).

A corporation has no valid cross-claim against a co-party and its cross-claims will be dismissed when it was not a party to the lease upon which the cross-claims are based and was not named as an intended third-party beneficiary in the lease. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

The usual reason for determining whether a non-contracting party is an intended third-party beneficiary to a contract is when that beneficiary is seeking to enforce some favorable contract provision or to collect damages for the contract's breach. This is because a third-party beneficiary can enforce a contract if it is an intended beneficiary of the contract, but it cannot if it is only an incidental beneficiary. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 591 & n.23 (Pon. 2011).

When none of the four states, the entities that would normally assert third-party beneficiary status, are parties to the action; when the contract itself is plain and unambiguous; and when all of the issues in the declaratory judgment request are also before the court in the parties' direct actions, the court sees no need for a declaratory judgment on whether the four states are third-party beneficiaries of the contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 591 (Pon. 2011).

The FSM cannot raise a sovereign immunity defense when it has statutorily waived its sovereign immunity for damages arising out of the improper administration of FSM statutory laws and when a sound basis for the FSM's waiver of sovereign immunity may be the waiver for claims, whether liquidated or unliquidated, upon an express or implied contract with the FSM because the Memorandum of Understanding between Chuuk and the FSM provides that the FSM handles, processes, and pays the Chuuk Special Education Program payroll. Since that express contract obligates the FSM to make all properly obligated withholdings from the employees' pay, the Chuuk Health Care Plan is, by statute, an intended third-party beneficiary of the contract between the FSM and Chuuk so that the Plan's claim is therefore a claim based on Chuuk's contract with the FSM. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 497 (Chk. 2013).

There is no hidden third-party beneficiary contract between an insurer and its insured for the benefit of a salvor when there is a contract between the salvor and the insurer in plain view. No discovery is needed to determine its existence and terms. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2013).

There must be a valid agreement between two parties to enable a third person, for whose benefit the promise is made, to sue upon it. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

A third party beneficiary can only recover if he or she is an intended beneficiary of a contract. When a contract is made especially for the benefit of a third person, he or she may enforce it directly against the promisor. The determining factor in a third party beneficiary claim is the parties' intent, which is a question of the construction of the contract as determined by the contract's terms as a whole. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

When it is unclear what testimony or evidence forms the basis for the plaintiff's third-party beneficiary cause of action, she will not prevail on the claim. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

To intervene to prosecute a third-party beneficiary claim when the movant lacks privity of contract and there is no existing statutory provision that the movant might be able to avail itself, the movant must make a showing that it has actually suffered a loss or injury, which would be capable of being redressed through its proposed intervention, and which is separate from the rights and claims asserted by the existing parties. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 214, 218 (Pon. 2015).

A third party beneficiary can recover if he or she is an intended beneficiary of a contract, but cannot enforce a contract or recover if he or she is only an incidental beneficiary and not an intended beneficiary of the contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 175 (Pon. 2017).

The determining factor in a third party beneficiary claim is the parties' intent, which is a question of the contract's construction as determined by the contract's terms as a whole. A person is an incidental beneficiary if the benefits accruing to him or her are merely incidental to the contract's performance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 175 (Pon. 2017).

Contracting parties are presumed to act for themselves. Therefore an intent to benefit a third person must be clearly expressed in the contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 175 (Pon. 2017).

Employment contracts generally do not make the employee's family members or dependants intended third-party beneficiaries. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 175 (Pon. 2017).

When any benefits accruing to an employee's family members due to the employee's performance of his employment contract were merely incidental to that contract, the family members do not have a third-party beneficiary cause of action for breach of contract, even if the employee were to prove that his employer breached the contract. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 175 (Pon. 2017).

– Unconscionable

The traditional test for unconscionability is: a contract is unconscionable if it is such as no man in his senses and not under delusion would make on the one hand, and as no honest or fair man would accept, on the other. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 180 (Pon. 2017).

It is generally held that the unconscionability test involves the question of whether the provision amounts to the taking of an unfair advantage by one party over the other. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 180 (Pon. 2017).

To be unconscionable, the contract term must be so one-sided as to be oppressive. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 180 (Pon. 2017).

The determination of unconscionability is a question of law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 180 (Pon. 2017).

– Undue Influence

A forum selection clause unaffected by fraud, undue influence, or overweening bargaining power should be given full effect. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 126 (Pon. 1999).

An attorney seeking to recover unpaid attorney fees on the theory of account stated must prove the reasonable value of the services rendered if the fee agreement was entered into during the course of the attorney-client relationship. This is because when the account stated is for legal services, there is a presumption of undue influence when entered between an attorney and client during their fiduciary relationship. The attorney has the burden of showing that the transaction was fair and regular and entered voluntarily by the client with full knowledge of the facts. Saimon v. Wainit, 16 FSM R. 143, 147 (Chk. 2008).

There are two broad classes of undue influence cases, and a third category involving attorneys. In the first, one party uses a dominant psychological position in an unfair manner to induce the subservient party to consent to an agreement to which the other party would not have otherwise consented. In the second class, one uses a position of trust and confidence, rather than dominance, to unfairly persuade the other into a transaction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 180 (Pon. 2017).

The key to undue influence contract cases is perhaps not the means, but the results. The foremost indicator of undue influence is an unnatural transaction resulting in the enrichment of one of the parties at the expense of the other. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 180 (Pon. 2017).

When there is nothing unnatural, oppressive, or grossly one-sided in the construction contract between the owner and the builder, it was not an unnatural transaction enriching one party at the other's expense through undue influence, since the owner received a well-built house and the builder adequate compensation for its construction work. The contract did not result in the builder's enrichment at the owner's expense because the owner got value for money – he got a well-built house. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 180 (Pon. 2017).

– Unilateral Contract

An option contract is a unilateral contract where an offer is made and the offeree is invited to accept by rendering a performance instead of promising something in return. Once the offeree either tenders or begins the invited performance, the option contract is created. The offer then becomes irrevocable. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (I), 6 FSM R. 48, 53 (Pon. 1993).

Provisions in a personnel handbook may be enforceable as an employment contract if they meet the requirements for the formation of a unilateral contract. The offer must be definite in form and must be communicated to the offeree. Whether a proposal is meant to be an offer for a unilateral contract is determined by the outward manifestations of the parties, not by their subjective intentions. An employer's general statements of policy are no more than that and do not meet the contractual requirements for an offer. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 431 (Yap 2006).

It does not matter whether a personnel handbook was received at the time the employee was hired or at some later time because the distribution of the manual may act as an offer of a unilateral contract even if there was no unilateral contract offered at the time of hiring. This is because the consideration for the contract was supplied when the employee continued to work, after receipt of the manual, when he had no obligation to do so. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 431 n.2 (Yap 2006).

When a personnel policies manual is detailed and the court finds that it was intended to set the terms of employment; when a review of the employee handbook makes it clear that the employer intended its employees to be bound by the manual's terms and that it intended to bind itself to these terms, the personnel policies manual was meant to be an offer for a unilateral employment contract and an employee has accepted the offer through his continued employment. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 431-32 (Yap 2006).

When an employee is presented with an employee handbook, instructed to read and understand it, told to sign-off on it, and when the employee does so, the employee handbook will constitute a unilateral contract between the parties. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 525 (Pon. 2013).

Personnel handbook provisions can be enforceable as an employment contract if they meet the requirements for the formation of a unilateral contract, which are: the offer must be definite in form and must be communicated to the offeree. An employer's general statements of policy are no more than that and do not meet the contractual requirements for an offer. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

When a personnel policies manual is detailed and the court finds that it was intended to set the terms of employment; when a review of the employee handbook makes it clear that the employer intended its employees to be bound by the manual's terms and that it intended to bind itself to these terms, the personnel policies manual was meant to be an offer for a unilateral employment contract and an employee has accepted the offer through his continued employment. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 564 (Kos. 2014).

When an employee is presented with an employee handbook, instructed to read the handbook, told to sign off on the handbook, and when the employee does so, the employee handbook will constitute a unilateral contract between the parties. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 266 (Pon. 2015).

COSTS

The determination of costs to be awarded to the prevailing party in litigation is a matter generally within the discretion of the trial court. Ray v. Electrical Contracting Corp., 2 FSM R. 21, 25 (App. 1985).

Procedural statute 6 F.S.M.C. 1018, providing that the court may tax any additional costs incurred in litigation against the losing party other than fees of counsel, applies only to Trust Territory courts and not to courts of the Federated States of Micronesia, and therefore does not preclude the FSM Supreme Court from awarding attorney's fees as costs. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (II), 2 FSM R. 200, 205 (Pon. 1986).

The government does not pay twice when it violates someone's civil rights and then is forced to pay attorney's fees. It pays only once – as a violator of civil rights. Its role as a provider of public services is distinct from its role as a defendant in a civil case. Thus an award of costs and reasonable attorney's fees should be made to a publicly funded legal services organization whose client prevailed in a civil rights action. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 319, 321 (Pon. 1992).

Taxation of costs is not an additional award for the prevailing party. It is a reimbursement to the prevailing party of actual expenses (costs) incurred. A motion for taxation of costs must be denied if it fails to adequately verify appellee's actual costs. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 569-70 (App. 1994).

Attorney's fees awarded as an element of costs are not to be confused with the award of attorney's fees recoverable as a part of damages pursuant to either statute or contract. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 223 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

Attorney's fees are not a part of recoverable costs under the common law. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 223 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When the election law lacks a statutory definition of costs either specifically including or excluding attorney's fees, the court can only conclude that the Legislature did not intend to use the term "costs" in other than its usual and familiar sense, which does not include attorney's fees. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 223 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

If an appellee prevails on appeal it will be entitled to recover its trial court and appellate costs, and the court may add the trial court costs to the amount of the appeal bond required for a stay. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 296, 298 (Pon. 2001).

The trial court may require an appellant to file a bond to cover costs on appeal. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 296, 298 (Pon. 2001).

Costs are not synonymous with a party's expenses. Only certain types of expenses are cognizable as costs. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 385 (Pon. 2001).

Appellate Form 2's absence from the FSM Appellate Rules will not be a ground for denying an in forma pauperis motion when the affidavit shows the appellant's inability to pay fees and costs or to give security therefor in the detail required by Rule 24(a) and shows that he is indigent and without any income or property. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 515, 517-18 (Pon. 2002).

If the court appealed from grants the motion to proceed in forma pauperis, the party may proceed without further application to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division and without prepayment of fees and costs in either court or giving security therefor, except when the Public Defender Office or Micronesian Legal Services Corporation represents an indigent party the transcript fee is reduced to $1.25 per page, to be paid by the public agency, and not by the party personally. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 515, 519 (Pon. 2002).

It is a matter to be resolved between the court reporters and the judicial branch whether the judiciary pays the costs for in forma pauperis litigants' transcripts. An in forma pauperis litigant is not required to prepay transcript costs, although if the in forma pauperis litigant is represented by the Public Defender or Micronesian Legal Services Corporation then that agency must prepay $1.25 per page. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 515, 519 (Pon. 2002).

An in forma pauperis appellant is not required to tender payment in order to receive the transcript he has ordered. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 515, 519 (Pon. 2002).

While costs cannot be awarded against the FSM, allottees are chargeable with costs of action when the allottees have interests sufficiently distinct from the FSM to confer on them standing in their own right. The rule prohibiting the trial court from charging the FSM with costs of this action does not prohibit the trial court from charging allottees with costs. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 57 (App. 2003).

The general proposition is that sanctions as such do not bear interest, but the Rule 37 sanctions scheme presumes that when sanctions are imposed they will be promptly paid, generally well before the case has proceeded to judgment. Once final judgment has been entered in a matter, any unpaid Rule 37 sanctions previously imposed should be considered costs. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 475 (Pon. 2006).

If the awarded sanctions are unpaid at judgment and payable to the prevailing party they should be included as taxable costs. If the sanctions are unpaid at judgment and payable to the non-prevailing party, they ought to be deducted from the money judgment due the prevailing party. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 475 (Pon. 2006).

All money judgments bear nine percent interest. As part of the judgment, taxable costs bear that same interest imposed by statute and attorney's fee sanctions are a form of "costs" which will bear interest after judgment has been entered. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 475 (Pon. 2006).

Since, if costs are allowed without express mention in the judgment, the date of the judgment starts the accrual of interest on the costs due, therefore earlier awarded Rule 37 attorney fee sanctions would bear interest from the date the judgment was entered because failing to allow attorneys' fees awards to bear interest would give parties against whom such awards have been entered an artificial and undesirable incentive to appeal or otherwise delay payment. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 476 (Pon. 2006).

Affirmed Rule 37 sanctions are considered costs that should be included in the money judgment and bear nine percent interest from the date judgment is entered until paid. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 476 (Pon. 2006).

Taxation of costs is not an additional award for the prevailing party, but is a reimbursement to the prevailing party of actual expenses (costs) incurred. But costs are not synonymous with a party's expenses since only certain types of expenses are cognizable as costs. This is true even when the litigants have successfully recovered under a private attorney general theory. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V

Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

When the appellants successfully sought to reverse trial division rulings in one appellee's favor and since the other named appellees were nominal parties unaffected by the appeal, all costs awarded the appellants will be taxable against that one appellee. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 240, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Class action counsel in common fund cases are entitled to reimbursement for expenses adequately documented and reasonably and appropriately incurred in the prosecution of the class action. The litigation expenses that may be allowed in such cases are thus more extensive than the costs routinely taxed and awarded to prevailing parties under Rule 54(d). People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 17 FSM R. 198, 206 (Yap 2010).

Costs are not synonymous with a party's litigation expenses since only certain types of expenses are cognizable as Rule 54(d) costs. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 17 FSM R. 198, 206 n.3 (Yap 2010).

A costs award is not an additional award to the prevailing party but is a reimbursement to the prevailing party of certain actual expenses (costs) incurred. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 374 (App. 2011).

When no "common nucleus of facts" exists between the trespass claims and the civil rights claims, the trial court did not err in assigning liability for trespass only to McVey and Do It Best and liability for the civil rights violation only to the Pohnpei Board of Trustees; thus the trial court's conclusions of law apportioning costs were not in error. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 440-41 (App. 2011).

The point of awarding costs is to award the prevailing party as a part of the final judgment, aside from reasonable attorney's fees, which may be awarded only by statute. It is a reimbursement to the prevailing party of actual expenses (costs) incurred. An award of fees and costs thus involves the party, not the particular firm. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 441 (App. 2011).

The point of a costs award is not to make an attorney or his law firm whole, but to make the prevailing party whole. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 441 (App. 2011).

If an appellee has not actually received a copy of the appellant's opening brief, he may ask the appellate clerk to make a copy for him with the copying cost to be, after the appeal has been decided, taxed by the court on the non-prevailing party. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 85, 87 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2011).

If the appellees wish the appellants to provide a bond necessary to ensure payment of costs on appeal, they must first apply to the court appealed from. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 18 FSM R. 207, 210 (App. 2012).

Costs incurred in the preparation and transmission of the record and the costs of the reporter's transcript must be taxed in the court appealed from as costs of the appeal in favor of the party entitled to costs. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

Costs are not synonymous with a party's expenses since only certain types of expenses are cognizable as costs. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

When the appellant was only partially successful in his appeals, the court will order that the costs of the appeals be borne by the parties with the exception that, since the reporter's transcripts were particularly helpful, the appellant will be awarded the cost of the reporter's transcripts of the trial court's order-in-aid-of-judgment hearings. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 221 (App. 2013).

A motion to try the plaintiff's remaining claim in a Pohnpei venue will, in the court's discretion, be denied when the venue statute required that he originally file his complaint in Chuuk because Chuuk was the state in which all the defendants could be found and the statute favors convenience for the defendants over convenience for the plaintiff. But because transporting the Pohnpei witnesses to Chuuk would work a distinct hardship on the plaintiff, the court will allow him three months to depose all the needed Pohnpei witnesses in order to preserve their testimony for trial and if he prevails at trial, the expenses of these depositions shall be taxed as costs payable by the defendants. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2013).

6 F.S.M.C. 1017 does not grant the court power to award attorney's fees. It only refers to court fees and the like. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 398 (App. 2014).

Costs are not synonymous with a party's expenses since only certain types of expenses are cognizable as costs. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

– Allowed

The FSM Supreme Court's trial division is not precluded from allowing reasonable travel expenses of an attorney for a prevailing party as costs under 6 F.S.M.C. 1018 where there is a showing that no attorney is available on the island where the litigation is taking place. Ray v. Electrical Contracting Corp., 2 FSM R. 21, 26 (App. 1985).

Where plaintiff's complaint is written in English and the defendant requests a written translation into a local Micronesian language, and where it appears that this is the only language the defendant can speak or read, the trial judge may order that the court provide a written translation and that the expense of providing the translation shall be taxed as a cost to the party not prevailing in the action. Rawepi v. Billimon, 2 FSM R. 240, 241 (Truk 1986).

The provision that the cost of printing or otherwise producing necessary copies of briefs, appendices or copies of the record shall be taxable in the Supreme Court appellate division at rates not higher than those generally charged for such work in the area where the clerk's office is located, does not set the amount to be awarded; it sets a cap or upper limit on the actual costs incurred that can be reimbursed. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 569-70 (App. 1994).

A prevailing party will be allowed costs for depositions and copying costs which represent payments to others for that service, but not the cost of copying within the law office. Long distance telephone and facsimile expenses incurred in communication between the lawyer who appeared and the client and other lawyers, claims for postage and courier expenses, and expenses not adequately explained are disallowed. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 468, 470 (Pon. 1996).

It is the appellant's duty to prepare and file the appendix. But when the appellant has failed to prepare and file the appendix and the appellee instead does so, and the appellee prevails, the cost of producing copies of the appendix may be taxed in the appellee's favor. Santos v. Bank of Hawaii, 9 FSM R. 306, 308 n.2 (App. 2000).

Appellate Rule 39(c) permits the recovery of costs for producing necessary copies of briefs by word processor or photocopier, but not the costs for producing the original. The maximum amount allowable for word processed copies of briefs is limited to the amount allowed for photocopy services. Santos v. Bank of Hawaii, 9 FSM R. 306, 308 (App. 2000).

Costs for printing and copying are expenses that traditionally have been included within costs that are awarded to prevailing parties. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 224 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When, service was done by servers employed at various times by plaintiffs' counsel, but who were duly appointed process servers and charged separate fees for the service, they were acting as private process servers. Fees charged by private process servers may be recoverable as costs. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 385 (Pon. 2001).

Deposition costs will be allowed when the transcription was done and the deposition was admitted into evidence at trial even though the documentation for the deposition charge was a check made payable to an attorney in the Philippines, and noted as such on the check stub. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 385-86 (Pon. 2001).

Service costs are always allowable to the prevailing party. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 498, 501 (Chk. 2002).

Transcript and copying expenses are allowable costs when they represent payments to others for that service. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 498, 501 (Chk. 2002).

An attorney's reasonable travel expenses are allowable as costs when there is a showing that no attorney is available on the island where the litigation is taking place, especially when the attorneys' travel expenses were reasonable and the actual expenses pro-rated proportionally with other clients on whose behalf they also traveled. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 498, 501 (Chk. 2002).

If, for a telephone hearing, a party's counsel initiated the call and bore that expense as a telephone charge then that party, if the prevailing party, would be entitled to tax those telephone charges as a cost, but when it is impossible to tell from the submitted expense billings, which, if any, those telephone charges were, no charges will be allowed. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 498, 501 (Chk. 2002).

Costs that have been awarded in the FSM include service costs, transcript and copying costs when they represent payment to others for services, and reasonable travel expenses when there is a showing of no attorney available on the island where the litigation is taking place. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 13 FSM R. 36, 42 (Pon. 2004).

When an appellant fails to provide a necessary appendix and that appendix is provided by an appellee and the appellee prevails, the cost of producing the appendix may be taxed in the appellee's favor. Chuuk v. Davis, 13 FSM R. 178, 183 (App. 2005).

A prevailing party is entitled to costs taxable by FSM Civ. R. 54(d), such as expenses for service of process and service of subpoenas. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 228 (Chk. 2006).

A prevailing party will be allowed costs for depositions. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 354 (Chk. 2006).

Fees charged by private process servers may be recoverable as costs, because service costs are always allowable to the prevailing party. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 354 (Chk. 2006).

An attorney's reasonable travel expenses are allowable as costs when there is a showing that no attorney is available on the island where the litigation is taking place, especially when the attorneys' travel expenses were reasonable and the actual expenses pro-rated proportionally with other clients on whose behalf they also traveled. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 354 (Chk. 2006).

Any expenses actually incurred in copying needed documents in the record will ultimately be taxed as costs to be borne by the non-prevailing party(ies) once the court has rendered its appellate opinion. Enengeitaw Clan v. Shirai, 14 FSM R. 621, 625 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When it is shown that no attorney is available on the island where the litigation is taking place, the trial court may award as costs a prevailing party's reasonable travel expenses for its attorney. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

Deposition costs will be allowed when the transcribed deposition was admitted into evidence at trial. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

The expense of a trial transcript is taxable when that transcript is necessarily obtained for use in a trial, particularly when the trial was long and the issues were complex. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

Generally, although absent a statute or contract expert witness fees and research expenses are not taxable costs, successful litigants may be awarded their out-of-pocket expenses for an expert witness when the expert witness was an indispensable part of the trial and was crucial to the ultimate resolution of the issues and the costs were appropriate and not excessive. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 75 (Yap 2007).

Costs for printing and copying the brief, appendix, and reply brief are expenses that traditionally have been included within costs that are awarded to prevailing parties. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 240, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

An attorney's reasonable travel expenses are allowable as costs when there is a showing that no attorney is available on the island where the litigation is taking place, especially when the attorneys' travel expenses were reasonable and the actual expenses pro-rated proportionally with other clients on whose behalf they also traveled. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 240, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the prevailing parties' counsel's travel expenses were necessarily incurred for services which were actually and necessarily performed, his travel expenses will be awarded as costs because the court may allow and tax any additional items of actual disbursement, other than fees of counsel, which it deems just and finds to have been necessarily incurred for services which were actually and necessarily performed for the prevailing party. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 240, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Reasonable travel costs are allowable when there is a showing that no counsel is available on the island where the litigation took place, but photocopying expenditures are generally disallowed, especially here where it cannot be determined what portion of those expense were incurred in bringing this action, and state court appellate filing fees are also disallowed since they are another court's filing fees and recoverable in that court. Ruben v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 605, 609 (Chk. 2008).

Service costs are awarded as a matter of course to the prevailing party. Oceanic Lumber, Inc. v. Vincent & Bros. Constr. Co., 16 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2008).

Costs may be allowed for copying costs which represent payments to others for that service, but not the cost of copying within the law office. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 467, 471 (Chk. 2009).

Service of process expenses are always allowable as costs to the prevailing party. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 467, 471 (Chk. 2009).

Plaintiffs awarded $500 damages are, as the prevailing party, also entitled to reimbursement of the court's $10 filing fee. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 647 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Service costs are always allowable to the prevailing party. A prevailing party is entitled to costs taxable by FSM Civil Rule 54(d), such as expenses for service of process and service of subpoenas and service of process costs may be apportioned among the defendants. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 148, 151 (Pon. 2010).

The $200 for service of a writ of attachment and levy; the $100 for Yapese translation of the class notices; and the $238.75 for the required publication of legal notice are expenses that were adequately documented and reasonably and appropriately incurred in the prosecution of a class action and are expenses which would have been taxable as Rule 54(d) costs if such costs had been taxed separately. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 17 FSM R. 198, 206 (Yap 2010).

Photocopying costs may be allowed if they represent payments to others for that service. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 17 FSM R. 198, 206 n.4 (Yap 2010).

Expenses to travel to the case's venue have usually been allowed as costs when there has been a showing that there were no local attorneys or law firm available. This is a sound principle which should also be followed in awarding class action expenses. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 17 FSM R. 198, 206-07 (Yap 2010).

Costs for service of process and service of subpoenas are routinely allowable to the prevailing party under Civil Rule 54(d). Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 374 (App. 2011).

Service of process expenses are an exception in that they can always be awarded as costs. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 441 (App. 2011).

When it is shown that no attorney is available on the island where the litigation is taking place, the trial court may award a prevailing party its attorney's reasonable travel expenses. Kaminanga v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 216, 221 (Chk. 2012).

The court is particularly inclined to view travel costs as reasonable when the attorney's overall travel expenses were reasonable and the actual expenses were pro-rated proportionally with other clients on whose behalf the attorney also traveled. The court is not inclined to grant any travel costs that are not prorated. Kaminanga v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 216, 221 n.4 (Chk. 2012).

Service of process costs will be allowed when the plaintiff's attorney's fee request states that his attorney reviewed the affidavits of service of the complaint on five named persons and on two national government offices and this corresponds to the $140 ($20 $\times$ 7 services of process) sought for service of the summons and complaint. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 402, 406 (Pon. 2012).

When no explanation is made of why trial subpoenas were served twice but when it is apparent from the file that the duplicate service was necessitated by a change in the trial date after the first service was made, the full request for service of trial subpoenas will be allowed. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 402, 406 (Pon. 2012).

Appellate costs are awarded to the prevailing party under FSM Appellate Procedure Rule 39. Rule 39 costs are only those costs incurred because of the appeal, not costs incurred in the trial division proceedings. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 218 (App. 2013).

Service costs and others that are generally allowed to a prevailing party should be taxed if proven. Certain other expenses, such as phone calls, postage, and in-house copying, are generally not allowed. The determination of costs awarded to the prevailing party is a matter generally within the trial court's discretion. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

The cost of printing or otherwise producing necessary copies of briefs, appendixes or copies of records is taxable in the Supreme Court appellate division by stating them in an itemized and verified bill of costs which the party must file with the appellate clerk, with proof of service, within 14 days after the entry of the appellate judgment. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 220 (App. 2013).

When the appellant was only partially successful in his appeals, the court will order that the costs of the appeals be borne by the parties with the exception that, since the reporter's transcripts were particularly helpful, the appellant will be awarded the cost of the reporter's transcripts of the trial court order-in-aid-of-judgment hearings. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 221 (App. 2013).

The clerk will tax costs of $91 in expenses for reproducing and serving the prevailing appellant's briefs when that amount was verified and appears reasonable. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 393, 395 (App. 2014).

Since notice by advertisement in newspapers is required for in rem actions against vessels, those expenses will be allowed as costs when adequately documented. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

Costs for service of process and service of subpoenas are routinely allowed to the prevailing party under Civil Rule 54(d). Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

When adequately documented and both reasonable and necessary, a corporation search fee will be allowed as a cost since it is important that the correct parties be named as defendants. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

Translation expenses are generally allowed as costs. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

A prevailing party will usually be allowed costs for depositions unless they are shown to be unnecessary. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

Generally, expert witness fees and research expenses are not taxable costs, but successful litigants may be awarded their out-of-pocket expenses for an expert witness when the expert witness was an indispensable part of the trial and was crucial to the ultimate resolution of the issues and the costs were appropriate and not excessive, but when an expert's research and testimony went to support claims that the court rejected, that expert's research expenses for those claims are disallowed. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

When the experts' research and reports were necessary and indispensable for the plaintiff to establish and the court to grant a default judgment and the fees were appropriate and not excessive, they will be allowed as taxable costs. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79-80 (Pon. 2015).

Since injured parties in admiralty and maritime tort cases are typically awarded prejudgment interest, when the plaintiff pled a claim for prejudgment interest, the 9% statutory interest will start on the damages award on the day the vessel ran aground. The 9% statutory interest will start on the costs award on the day the amended judgment is entered. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 80 (Pon. 2015).

– Disallowed

Expenses such as faxing and telephoning to and from counsel, and travel, incurred because the defendant selected off-island counsel, fall outside the kind of expenses traditionally payable by the losing party and will be disallowed as costs, except where there is a showing of the unavailability of local counsel. Salik v. U Corp., 4 FSM R. 48, 49 (Pon. 1989).

As a general rule, attorney's fees will be awarded as an element of costs only if it is shown that such fees were traceable to unreasonable or vexatious actions of the opposing party, but where the basic litigation flows from a reasonable difference of interpretation of a lease, the court is disinclined to attempt to sort out or isolate particular aspects of one claim or another of the parties and to earmark attorney's fees awards for those specific aspects. Salik v. U Corp., 4 FSM R. 48, 49-50 (Pon. 1989).

The court commits no error, when a question of sufficiency of witness fees is not brought promptly to the attention of the court, to consider the matter as an allowance of costs. In re Island Hardware, Inc., 5 FSM R. 170, 175 (App. 1991).

Where there are elements of victory and loss for both parties there is not a prevailing party to which costs could be allowed. In re Island Hardware, Inc., 5 FSM R. 170, 175 (App. 1991).

Taxation of costs is not an additional award for the prevailing party. It is a reimbursement to the prevailing party of actual expenses (costs) incurred. A motion for taxation of costs must be denied if it fails to adequately verify appellee's actual costs. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 569-70 (App. 1994).

A prevailing party will be allowed costs for depositions and copying costs which represent payments to others for that service, but not the cost of copying within the law office. Long distance telephone and facsimile expenses incurred in communication between the lawyer who appeared and the client and other lawyers, claims for postage and courier expenses, and expenses not adequately explained are disallowed. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 468, 470 (Pon. 1996).

A prevailing party will be allowed costs for depositions and copying costs which represent payments to others for that service, but not the cost of copying within the law office. Long distance telephone and facsimile expenses incurred in communication between the lawyer who appeared and the client and other lawyers, claims for postage and courier expenses, and expenses not adequately explained are disallowed. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 468, 470 (Pon. 1996).

Costs that are an avoidable consequence of the prevailing party's actions will be disallowed. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 110 & n.1 (Chk. 1999).

Expenditures for photocopying, toll phone calls between lawyers, postage and courier services are disallowed. The extra expense of first class air travel is also disallowed. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 111 (Chk. 1999).

Attorney's fees are not recoverable as costs under Appellate Rule 39. Santos v. Bank of Hawaii, 9 FSM R. 306, 307 (App. 2000).

On appeals, copying costs are disallowed to the extent that they exceed those generally charged for such work in the area where the clerk's office is located, in this case – Pohnpei, where the FSM appellate clerk's office is located. Santos v. Bank of Hawaii, 9 FSM R. 306, 308 (App. 2000).

Expenses for postage and courier services are disallowed. They are not a part of the usual costs recoverable under Appellate Rule 39. Santos v. Bank of Hawaii, 9 FSM R. 306, 308 (App. 2000).

Costs are customarily awarded the prevailing party. However, costs for service on those defendants who were prevailing parties are not allowed to the plaintiff. Nor are costs for service in and filing fee for the case originally filed in state court allowed as costs are to be awarded only for the costs in this case to the prevailing party in this case. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 123, 125 (Chk. 2001).

Costs for an election defendant's airfare will be denied when it is for an uncertain amount and no evidence of this expense been provided to the court and when it is an expense he would have incurred anyway, because he would have had to return shortly from Honolulu to take his seat in the Legislature, and because it is an expense he would not have incurred if he had not voluntarily left Chuuk for Honolulu. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 223 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

Counsel's travel expenses to and from Pohnpei for litigation on Pohnpei may not be awarded as costs when counsel maintains a Pohnpei office and is thus local counsel. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 386 (Pon. 2001).

If, for a telephone hearing, a party's counsel initiated the call and bore that expense as a telephone charge then that party, if the prevailing party, would be entitled to tax those telephone charges as a cost, but when it is impossible to tell from the submitted expense billings, which, if any, those telephone charges were, no charges will be allowed. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 498, 501 (Chk. 2002).

The most common basis for denying costs to prevailing defendants is the indigency of the losing plaintiff, coupled with good faith of the indigent and the non-frivolous nature of the case. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 323 (Pon. 2003).

When no substantive law or contractual provision would permit the plaintiff to recover the type of costs he seeks, those costs will not be included in the judgment. Walter v. Damai, 12 FSM R. 648, 650 (Pon. 2004).

When insufficient information has been provided concerning the costs set out in an affidavit to enable the court to make an award of costs, none of these costs will be awarded. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 13 FSM R. 36, 42 (Pon. 2004).

When an affidavit sets out costs totaling $1,605.15, but no description is provided for the individual amounts beyond the notation "direct expense," the court can make no determination whether these expenses constitute awardable costs and none will be awarded. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 13 FSM R. 36, 43 (Pon. 2004).

Fax and long distance telephone charges are not recoverable as costs. Copying costs may be recoverable if the copies are not made in-house, and the costs represent payment to others. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Jonas, 13 FSM R. 171, 173 (Kos. 2005).

While a prevailing plaintiff is entitled to the costs of suit as of course, a prevailing plaintiff is not automatically entitled to an attorney's fees award because the court is generally without authority to award attorney's fees in the absence of a specific statute or contractual provision allowing recovery of such fees. Western Sales Trading Co. v. Billy, 13 FSM R. 273, 277 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

When a successful litigant has made no showing that the $120 in copying costs he seeks were expenses incurred for copying done outside of counsel's office, this item of costs will be denied. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 524, 527 (Pon. 2005).

Attorney's fees are not part of recoverable costs under the common law. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 86 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Expenses such as faxing and telephoning to and from counsel, and travel, incurred because the defendant selected off-island counsel, fall outside the kind of expenses traditionally payable by the losing party and will be disallowed as costs, except where there is a showing of the unavailability of local counsel. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 354 (Chk. 2006).

Fax and long distance telephone charges are not recoverable as costs, but copying costs may be recoverable if the copies are not made in-house, and the costs represent payment to others. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 354 (Chk. 2006).

POL and transportation costs for the plaintiffs in their efforts to meet with the defendant to come to a resolution of this matter is a type of cost that is not normally recoverable. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 532 (Chk. 2007).

Prevailing plaintiffs cannot be awarded $1,000 for bringing the law suit since this type of cost is not normally awarded and no evidence of what was included in the $1,000 was provided. Hartman v. Krum,

14 FSM R. 526, 532 (Chk. 2007).

Compensation for time and expenses in a state court can only be sought (if at all possible) in that state court. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 71 (Yap 2007).

A $49.28 "court filing fee" will be disallowed when it is unexplained and since another court's filing fee will not be awarded as a cost. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

The $25 cost for a certificate of good standing will be disallowed as a cost even though it was a necessary expenditure in order to apply to appear pro hac vice because it is considered part of overhead. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

Expenditures for photocopying, toll phone calls, faxing, postage, and courier services are disallowed as costs. Internet expenses fall in the same category and are therefore also disallowed. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

Westlaw electronic research charges are properly reflected as a part of a law firm's overhead, and as such, are included in the attorney's fees as opposed to ordinary costs and will be disallowed as costs. Law library research charges also fall into this category and will also be disallowed. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74 (Yap 2007).

Expenses not adequately explained are disallowed as costs, as are expenses that are either overhead items or are for personal use. "Working meals" are not allowed as costs since if that is what they were, the attorney was compensated for the time spent working. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 74-75 & n.8 (Yap 2007).

Generally, although absent a statute or contract expert witness fees and research expenses are not taxable costs, successful litigants may be awarded their out-of-pocket expenses for an expert witness when the expert witness was an indispensable part of the trial and was crucial to the ultimate resolution of the issues and the costs were appropriate and not excessive. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 75 (Yap 2007).

When an expert witness's research or testimony was not crucial to the resolution of any issue, but was helpful only to estimate the market cost for protein needed to replace the fish not harvested and the expert's work on this point relied on another expert witness's factual research for which that other expert billed $1,265.70, the court may find that $1,500 would be a fair and reasonable cost for the value of the expert's work that was indispensable to the resolution of the value of the lost fish harvest issue. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 75 (Yap 2007).

Attorneys' fees are not costs. Lewis v. Rudolph, 16 FSM R. 278, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Westlaw electronic research charges are properly reflected as a part of a law firm's overhead, and as such, are included in the attorney's fees as opposed to ordinary costs and will be disallowed as costs. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 467, 471 (Chk. 2009).

Expenditures for toll phone calls, postage, and courier services are disallowed as costs. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 467, 471 (Chk. 2009).

Costs may be allowed for copying costs which represent payments to others for that service, but not the cost of copying within the law office. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 467, 471 (Chk. 2009).

A "business privilege tax" that is part of the cost of being in business on Guam and is either part of a law firm's overhead, which cannot be taxed as a cost, or an increase in or part of the attorney's hourly rate and thus already considered under the reasonable attorney fee award. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 467, 471 (Chk. 2009).

Even if a law firm client has agreed to compensate the law firm for its gross receipts tax liability on income received from the client, the court will not award it because what the client has agreed to pay is not relevant to the court's determination of a reasonable fee. The court makes its reasonableness determination without reference to any prior fee agreement between the attorney and client since the entitlement to a reasonable attorneys' fees award is the client's, not his attorney's, and the amount the client actually pays his attorney is irrelevant. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 467, 471 (Chk. 2009).

Photocopying charges are generally disallowed as costs unless those charges represent payments to others for that service and are not for the cost of copying within the law office. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 148, 151 (Pon. 2010).

Extra charges for the attorney's gross revenue taxes on costs are disallowed. Gross revenue taxes are the attorney's responsibility and not the responsibility of the attorney's client or of an adverse party to whom the fee may be shifted. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 148, 152 (Pon. 2010).

The $80.50 listed as purchases of beer, bottled water, and the like from a Yap hotel mini-bar; the $2.95 for DVD rental; $34 listed as "no receipts (investigator's beer)" are disallowed since they are not expenses reasonably and appropriately incurred in the prosecution of the class action. The $16.95 listed as breakfast and lunch "no receipts" is disallowed since it is not adequately documented. The $111.91 for groceries purchased in a Guam supermarket is unexplained and therefore disallowed. The $408.80 in charges for internet access from a Yap hotel, even if used for occasional legal research or case-related e-mail, are excessive and therefore disallowed. The $620.50 claim for "expenses in the form of legal research subscription charges, and long distance phone charges" is undocumented and therefore disallowed and "legal research subscription," although since it is undocumented the court cannot be certain, appears that it may properly be part of overhead and not case specific. Also undocumented, and therefore disallowed, is $521.25 in photocopying and postage fees for filing and service. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/C Jumbo Rock Carrier III, 17 FSM R. 198, 206 (Yap 2010).

The court has long followed the principle that when awarding costs, costs may be allowed for copying expenses which represent payments to others for that service, but not the cost of copying within the law office. So when there is no indication that a copying charge is for payment to others for copying services, that charge will be disallowed. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 245, 246 (Chk. 2010).

An attorney's travel expenses to Chuuk will be denied as costs when the attorney's law firm maintains a law office on Chuuk even though the attorney did not reside on Chuuk and only made occasional trips to Chuuk from Pohnpei. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 245, 246-47 (Chk. 2010).

Photocopying costs are disallowed unless it can be shown that the photocopying was done outside of the law firm. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 441 (App. 2011).

A "gross revenue tax" surcharge will be disallowed as costs. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 441 (App. 2011).

While a prevailing plaintiff is entitled to the costs of suit as of course, a prevailing party is not automatically entitled to an attorney's fees award because the court is generally without authority to award attorney's fees in the absence of a specific statute or contractual provision allowing recovery of such fees since attorneys' fees are not costs under Rule 54(d) or the common law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 190, 192 (Yap 2012).

When a review of the record shows that a transcript of a hearing was not necessary for the determination of the appeal, its cost would be disallowed even if the appellant had prevailed on appeal. Kaminanga v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 216, 222 (Chk. 2012).

Costs are always available to the party who ultimately prevails, but attorney's fees are not available for pro se litigants even if they prevail. Berman v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 111, 117 (App. 2013).

When nothing in the record indicates that the prevailing party ever timely filed his verified bills of costs with the appropriate court clerks and when it is now too late to file them, he has waived his right to the appellate costs by his failure to timely file verified bills of cost. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

Service costs and others that are generally allowed to a prevailing party should be taxed if proven. Certain other expenses, such as phone calls, postage, and in-house copying, are generally not allowed. The determination of costs awarded to the prevailing party is a matter generally within the trial court's discretion. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

Unexplained costs are disallowed. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 219 (App. 2013).

A request for attorney's fees sought as costs must be denied because attorney's fees are not recoverable as costs under Appellate Rule 39. Attorney's fees are traditionally not considered part of costs. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 393, 395 (App. 2014).

6 F.S.M.C. 1017 does not grant the court power to award attorney's fees. It only refers to court fees and the like. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 393, 395 (App. 2014).

While, as a general rule, attorney's fees can be awarded as an element of costs only if it is shown that such fees were traceable to the opposing party's unreasonable or vexatious actions, even if attorney's fees could be awarded for vexatious actions during an appeal, an issue not decided, fees would not be awarded when, although much of the appellees' motion to dismiss was a petty attempt to avoid a ruling on the merits, the motion as a whole was not thoroughly unreasonable. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 393, 395 (App. 2014).

A request for attorney's fees sought as costs must be denied since attorney's fees are not recoverable as costs under Appellate Rule 39. Attorney's fees are traditionally not considered part of costs. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 398 (App. 2014).

Although, as a general rule, attorney's fees can be awarded as an element of costs only if it is shown that such fees were traceable to the opposing party's unreasonable or vexatious actions, but, even if attorney's fees could be awarded under Appellate Rule 39, they would not be when no such vexatious actions were shown during the course of the appeal. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 398 (App. 2014).

When there was no appellee in the case, there is no one to tax costs against. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 398 (App. 2014).

While the Micronesian Legal Services Corporation Kosrae office was the party whose complaint led to the now reversed attorney sanction, the sanction was imposed by the Kosrae State Court, but, unlike sanction where the sanction is monetary and paid to an opposing party, there was no opposing party on the appeal because, although the Micronesian Legal Services Corporation Kosrae office did file a brief on the appeal, the court viewed the brief as more of an amicus curiae brief appearing because it was the complainant whose complaint led to the now reversed attorney disciplinary sanctions in the case below. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 398 (App. 2014).

When there is no appellee against whom the prevailing appellants may tax costs, the appellants' bill of costs must be denied in its entirety. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 398 (App. 2014).

The expense of service of the briefs will be disallowed. Postage is considered overhead and generally not allowed as a cost so that expenses for postage and delivery services are disallowed. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 451, 453 (App. 2014).

Generally, expert witness fees and research expenses are not taxable costs, but successful litigants may be awarded their out-of-pocket expenses for an expert witness when the expert witness was an indispensable part of the trial and was crucial to the ultimate resolution of the issues and the costs were appropriate and not excessive, but when an expert's research and testimony went to support claims that the court rejected, that expert's research expenses for those claims are disallowed. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

When an expert's fee was for an affidavit prepared in support of only a rejected damages claim, it will be disallowed. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 80 (Pon. 2015).

The court cannot award, disguised as costs, what are damages for an unsuccessful salvage contract cause of action that was neither pled nor tried. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 80 (Pon. 2015).

Government expenses as a result of a ship grounding are not a cost of litigation and when they were neither plead as a cause of action nor prayed for as relief, these expenses are not recoverable either as costs or as damages in a default judgment since a default judgment cannot be different in kind from or exceed in amount that prayed for in the demand for judgment. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 80 (Pon. 2015).

When a motion for costs and attorney's fees contains no supporting grounds for this request in the motion's text, the motion will be denied without prejudice to any claim for costs taxable under Appellate Rule 39(a). Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 20 FSM R. 629, 631 (App. 2016).

– Procedure

When a judgment is affirmed on appeal, costs are usually taxable against the appellant if the appellee timely files its bill of costs with the appellate division. A bill of costs for trial transcripts must be filed in trial court appealed from. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 568-69 (App. 1994).

The filing of a petition for rehearing does not automatically extend the time for filing a bill of costs or for opposing a timely filed bill of costs, to a period beyond the ruling on the petition for rehearing. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 569 n.5 (App. 1994).

A trial court has jurisdiction to issue an order assessing costs, even though it was issued after the notice of appeal was filed. Damarlane v. United States, 8 FSM R. 14, 17 (App. 1997).

Appellees intending to ask for Rule 38 costs and damages because the appeal is frivolous must, although the rule does not require a motion filed separately from the brief, give the appellant more notice than first raising the issue at the end of appellees' oral argument. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 546-47 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Any post-judgment charges for attorney's fees and costs – any attorney's fees and costs beyond those awarded in the judgments themselves – must first be determined as reasonable and awarded by the court before the judgment-creditors are entitled to these amounts. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 534 (Chk. 2003).

Rule 54(d) permits costs to be allowed against the non-prevailing party. Accordingly, a prevailing plaintiff may request costs to be awarded by filing an affidavit. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 86 (Kos. S.

Ct. Tr. 2006).

When unpaid Rule 37 sanctions are not specifically named and included as costs in either the judgment or the later order that fixed and entered the costs and fees that were to be added to the judgment, they should be included in the original judgment by implication, if not specifically, since the court was unaware that the sanctions fixed seven months earlier had not been paid. It would be better practice for the plaintiffs to ask that the amount of unpaid sanctions be specifically included in the court's judgment. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 14 FSM R. 473, 475-76 (Pon. 2006).

Transcript costs are not taxable by the appellate division, but (along with any fees for the appellants' filing of the notices of appeal) are taxable in the trial division. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 240, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Upon a post-judgment application, costs are routinely awarded to the prevailing party. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 34 (App. 2010).

Since between a supporting affidavit and the returns of service filed by the process servers, it should be apparent on the record that the claims for service costs represented payments to others for service, and since this has been sufficient when cost awards for service have been sought, an attorney's affidavit plus a return of service in the record showing that someone other than the attorney's office performed the service will suffice although the better practice would be to also file receipts with the costs request rather than relying on the trial court to consult the record to see who performed the service. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 374 (App. 2011).

Costs are generally taxed against, not for, an unsuccessful appellant unless otherwise ordered, and appellate costs are ordinarily taxed in the appellate division except that transcript fees and the costs of the reporter's transcript, if necessary for the determination of the appeal are taxable in the trial division by the prevailing appellate litigant. Kaminanga v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 216, 221 (Chk. 2012).

A service cost request has always been sufficient when the request included the attorney's affidavit plus a return of service in the record showing that someone other than the attorney's office performed the service even though the better practice would have been to also file receipts with the request rather than relying on the trial court to consult the record to see who performed the service. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 402, 406 (Pon. 2012).

The cost of printing or otherwise producing necessary copies of briefs, appendixes or copies of records is taxable in the Supreme Court appellate division by stating them in an itemized and verified bill of costs which the party must file with the appellate clerk, with proof of service, within 14 days after the entry of the appellate judgment. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 220 (App. 2013).

Costs for a reporter's transcripts are taxed in the court appealed from in the case that was appealed. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 221 (App. 2013).

A party who desires costs to be taxed in an appeal case shall state them in an itemized and verified bill of costs which he shall file with the clerk, with proof of service, within 14 days after the entry of judgment. The appellate clerk will act on the bill of costs, at least when no opposition has been filed; when there is opposition, the matter is usually referred to the court or a judge thereof. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 393, 394-95 (App. 2014).

The appellate panel's presiding justice may consider a bill of costs. A single justice's action may be reviewed by the court. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 393, 395 (App. 2014).

Even though no opposition was filed to an appellate bill of costs, it still must be considered by a judge when it asks for attorney's fees since attorney's fees can only be determined by a judge, not a clerk. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 393, 395 (App. 2014).

When a party desires that appellate costs be taxed, the party must state them in an itemized and verified bill of costs which must be filed with the clerk, with proof of service, within 14 days after the entry of judgment. The appellate clerk will act on the bill of costs, at least when no opposition has been filed, but when there is opposition, the matter is usually referred to the court or a judge thereof. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 397-98 (App. 2014).

The appellate panel's presiding justice may consider an opposed bill of costs, but the single justice's action may be reviewed by the court. In re Sanction of Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 396, 398 (App. 2014).

A prevailing party who desires costs to be taxed must state them in an itemized and verified bill of costs which must be filed with the clerk, with proof of service, within 14 days after the entry of the appellate judgment. The appellate clerk will act on the bill of costs, at least where no opposition has been filed; when there is opposition, the matter is usually referred to the court or a judge thereof. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 451, 452 (App. 2014).

An appellate panel's presiding justice may consider an opposed bill of costs, but the single justice's action may be reviewed by the court. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 451, 452-53 (App. 2014).

– When Taxable

Where there is dismissal of an action, even though the dismissal is voluntary and without prejudice, the defendant is the prevailing party within the meaning of Rule 54(d) which provides for awards of costs to the prevailing party. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 3 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 1988).

FSM Civil Rule 68, allowing for taxation of costs against a plaintiff who declines the defendant's offer of judgment and who then obtains a judgment less favorable than the amount of the offer, does not apply when the litigation is dismissed. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 3 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 1988).

Where a plaintiff seeks dismissal of her own complaint without prejudice under Rule 41(a)(2), it is generally thought that the court should at least require the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs of the litigation as a condition to such dismissal and these costs may include travel expenses of plaintiff's attorney. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 3 FSM R. 411, 415 (Pon. 1988).

Where the court set aside a default judgment upon the payment by defendant to plaintiff of air fare to attend the trial, no modification will be granted to require the defendant to pay the costs of the plaintiff's counsel to go to plaintiff's residence to take his deposition which is being noticed by the plaintiff, especially where there is no showing that plaintiff could not attend the trial, nor will the court decide before trial whether such deposition could be used at trial. Morris v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 454, 456-57 (Truk 1988).

When a plaintiff's motion is denied on the merits, the defendant may recover costs under FSM Civil Rule 54(d) if properly verified. Berman v. Kolonia Town, 6 FSM R. 242, 244 (Pon. 1993).

When a judgment is affirmed on appeal, costs are usually taxable against the appellant if the appellee timely files its bill of costs with the appellate division. A bill of costs for trial transcripts must be filed in trial court appealed from. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 568-69 (App. 1994).

Costs may be allowed to a party prevailing against an indigent or in forma pauperis plaintiff who raised irrelevant matters and engaged in vexatious procedures or whose actions were frivolous or malicious. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 468, 469-70 (Pon. 1996).

Although it is especially important to avoid any approach calculated to favor the wealthy and deprive poor persons of access to the courts, that principle should not operate to penalize the indigents' opponent whose costs are increased because of frivolous claims and proceedings which are prolonged by repetition of contentions already ruled upon. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 468, 470 (Pon. 1996).

Unless the court directs otherwise, costs are allowed as of course to the prevailing party. A prevailing party is the one in whose favor the decision is ultimately rendered when the matter is finally set at rest, and does not depend upon the degree of success at different stages of the suit. Damarlane v. United States, 8 FSM R. 45, 54 (App. 1997).

When the trial court decides the matter on the merits, based on the evidence, in favor of the defendants and the plaintiffs are not granted a permanent injunction, the defendants are prevailing parties who are appropriately awarded costs. Damarlane v. United States, 8 FSM R. 45, 54 (App. 1997).

Civil rights attorney fee awards and awards of costs may be entered against multiple defendants in the same proportions as those in the original judgment. Davis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 218, 224 (Chk. 1997).

In any civil rights action the court may award costs and reasonable attorney's fees to the prevailing party. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 113 (Chk. 1999).

A prevailing party in an appeal is routinely entitled to its costs and when an appeal is dismissed, costs are to be taxed against appellant unless the parties otherwise agree or court orders otherwise. Santos v. Bank of Hawaii, 9 FSM R. 306, 307 (App. 2000).

If, on appeal the Chuuk State Supreme Court confirms the election, judgment shall be rendered against the contestants, for costs, in favor of the defendant. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 222 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

Costs are generally allowed as of course to the prevailing party. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 362 (Chk. 2001).

While costs are allowed as of course to a prevailing party, costs against the FSM, its officers, and agencies are imposed only when authorized by statute. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 498, 501, 502 (Chk. 2002).

Being allowed to proceed in forma pauperis only relieves an appellant from prepayment of fees and costs, not from ultimate liability for those costs. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 515, 519 (Pon. 2002).

If the appellate court determines that an appeal is frivolous, it may award just damages and single or double costs to the appellee. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 546 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Generally, unless the court directs otherwise, prevailing parties are entitled to costs. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 321 (Pon. 2003).

Determination of costs awarded to prevailing parties is generally a matter within the trial court's discretion, and a trial court has jurisdiction to issue an order assessing costs, even after a notice of appeal has been filed. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 321 (Pon. 2003).

Rule 54(d) presumes that costs will be allowed to the prevailing party. But this presumption may be overcome. The burden is on the unsuccessful party to show circumstances sufficient to overcome the presumption in favor of allowing costs to the prevailing party. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 321 (Pon. 2003).

Although a trial court has discretion when awarding costs, the discretion is narrowly confined because of the strong presumption created by Rule 54(d) that the prevailing party will recover costs. Generally, only the prevailing party's misconduct worthy of a penalty or the losing party's inability to pay will suffice to justify denying costs. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 321-22 (Pon. 2003).

The presumption that the prevailing party will recover costs has been overcome and costs denied where there is a wide disparity between the parties' economic resources, particularly when the non-prevailing party is indigent. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 322 (Pon. 2003).

When the economic disparity between the indigent losing plaintiff and the successful defendants could not be more stark and when the plaintiff pursued his case in good faith and it was not frivolous, the defendants' motion to tax costs must be denied and no costs allowed. This result is consistent with the social configuration of Micronesia, as mandated by the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 323 (Pon. 2003).

The principle of not imposing costs on losing indigents may appear to penalize solvency and to encourage other lawsuits against successful businesses because there is no risk of incurring costs if the action fails. However, this principle only applies when the action is pursued in good faith. Costs may be taxed when an indigent plaintiff's case is frivolous or malicious or when he has raised irrelevant matters and engaged in vexatious procedures. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 323 (Pon. 2003).

The most common basis for denying costs to prevailing defendants is the indigency of the losing plaintiff, coupled with good faith of the indigent and the non-frivolous nature of the case. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 11 FSM R. 319, 323 (Pon. 2003).

When the election commission never properly certified anyone as the winning candidate, an appellate trial's result cannot confirm a candidate's election, but rather determines which of two contestants should have been declared elected. Therefore no judgment for costs will be awarded in anyone's favor. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477-78 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

If the Supreme Court appellate division determines that an appeal is frivolous, it may award just damages and single or double costs, including attorney's fees, to the appellee. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 12 FSM R. 456, 462 (App. 2004).

Rule 68 provides that if a defendant makes an offer of judgment, and the judgment ultimately obtained is not more favorable than the offer, then the offeree must pay the costs accrued after the offer. It does not apply when the offers of judgment are for the amount claimed in the original complaint and the case is tried and judgment entered for the higher amount claimed in the amended complaint. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 644, 647 (Pon. 2004).

An award of costs depends upon a finding of reasonableness by the court. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Jonas, 13 FSM R. 171, 173 (Kos. 2005).

Rule 54(d) presumes that costs will be allowed to the prevailing party, unless the court directs otherwise. Accordingly, a prevailing plaintiff may file and serve his requests for costs to be taxed against the defendant, who shall respond to the request within 10 days of the request's service. The court shall thereafter rule on the request for allowance of costs. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 402 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Costs are awarded as a matter of course to the prevailing party as a part of the final judgment. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 470 (Chk. 2005).

When a case is dismissed at the close of the plaintiff's case-in-chief, the defendants, as prevailing parties, are entitled to their costs of action. Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 66 (Chk. 2006).

Costs are awarded to prevailing parties as a matter of course. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 53, 73 (Yap 2007).

Prevailing parties are entitled to their costs on appeal. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 240, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Generally, costs cannot be awarded for or against the state government. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 240, 242 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the defendant state court judge's actions upon which the plaintiffs base this suit were judicial in nature and the state court is a court of general jurisdiction, which would have had the jurisdiction to consider a motion for relief of judgment if one had been filed, the judge did not act in complete absence of jurisdiction. But when he did clearly act grossly in excess of his jurisdiction and when the plaintiffs obtained permanent prospective relief against him in this case, they are entitled to their expenses including attorney's fees and costs under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) for bringing this action and are thus entitled to judgment as a matter of law on their civil rights claim for attorney's fees and costs. The costs and fees allowed will be for work in this case and not that for work in the related state court cases. Ruben v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 605, 608-09 (Chk. 2008).

Upon a post-judgment application, costs are routinely awarded to the prevailing party. George v. Albert, 17 FSM R. 25, 34 (App. 2010).

The civil rights statute provides that in an action brought under it, the court may award costs and reasonable attorney's fees to the prevailing party. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 402, 404 (Pon. 2012).

A successful process server's pay should not be dependent on a law firm's later litigation success. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 402, 405 n.1 (Pon. 2012).

Costs are always available to the party who ultimately prevails, but attorney's fees are not available for pro se litigants even if they prevail. Berman v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 111, 117 (App. 2013).

Appellate costs are awarded to the prevailing party under FSM Appellate Procedure Rule 39. Rule 39 costs are only those costs incurred because of the appeal, not costs incurred in the trial division proceedings. George v. Sigrah, 19 FSM R. 210, 218 (App. 2013).

Plaintiffs, as the prevailing party, will be awarded their reasonable costs. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

When the appellants prevailed by having the permanent injunction – a final decision – against them vacated and they are now in a position where either they or the other side may ultimately obtain a final judgment in their favor on remand, they are thus prevailing parties for the purpose of the appeal and costs will be taxed in their favor. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 451, 453 (App. 2014).

When the defendant is the prevailing party, it shall be awarded its reasonable costs. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendants are the prevailing party, they shall be awarded their reasonable costs. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 532 (Pon. 2014).

The general rule is that the prevailing party is entitled to costs per Rule 54(d), but Rule 54(d) also provides that "costs against the State of Chuuk, its officers, and agencies shall be imposed only to the extent permitted by law." Shigeto Corp. v. Land Comm'n, 19 FSM R. 542, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

When no written documentation was submitted to show that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover its costs if the plaintiff prevailed against the state agency in a civil suit and when no statute authorizes a plaintiff to recover costs on a breach of contract claim against the State of Chuuk, the court will deny the plaintiff's motion for costs. Shigeto Corp. v. Land Comm'n, 19 FSM R. 542, 543-44 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

Since an embassy is immune from suit, a case against it will be dismissed. Since the court cannot exercise jurisdiction over it, the embassy, as a prevailing party, is also entitled to its costs. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 (Pon. 2018).

Rule 68 provides that the defendant may serve an offer to allow judgment to be taken against the defendant for the money with costs then accrued. If within 10 days after the offer's service, the plaintiff serves written notice that the offer is accepted, either party may then file the offer and notice of acceptance together with proof of service thereof. If the plaintiff rejects this offer, and the judgment finally obtained by plaintiff is not more favorable than the offer, the plaintiff must pay the costs incurred after the offer was made. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 436 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When the defendant made a Rule 68 offer of judgment for $1,000 and when, after trial, the plaintiff was awarded nothing, the plaintiff is liable for the defendant's costs after the offer date. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 436 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Actions alleging due process violations involving land are not exempt from Rule 68 offer of judgment sanctions. Nor are proclamations of indigence. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 436-37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Rule 68 exists to encourage compromise when a case lacks merit. When a plaintiff fails to see the lack of merit within his case, Rule 68 sanctions such failure by awarding costs to the party that made the settlement offer. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 437 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

COURTS

Secretarial Order 3039, section 2 cleared the way for the assumption of jurisdiction by FSM courts by delegating the judicial functions of the government of the Trust Territory Pacific Islands to the Federated States of Micronesia. Thus, the High Court's previous exclusive jurisdiction under 6 TTC 251 was effectively delegated to the Federated States of Micronesia, insofar as the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia authorizes such jurisdiction. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 57-58 (Kos. 1992).

The language of Secretarial Order 3039, section 5(a) contemplates continued Trust Territory High Court activity pursuant to the "present procedural and jurisdictional provisions of Trust Territory law" only until new functioning courts are established by the constitutional governments, and recognizes that the jurisdictional provisions of Trust Territory law will necessarily be revised when those courts have been established. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 59 (Kos. 1982).

Interpretation of Secretarial Order 3039 as acquiescing in FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction over suits against the Trust Territory does not conflict with any residual United States obligation to oversee activities of the FSM courts pending termination of the Trusteeship Agreement nor does this interpretation imperil any interest the United States government may have in protecting the Trust Territory government against unfair or overreaching actions by courts of the new constitutional governments. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 64 (Kos. 1982).

Trust Territory High Court appellate division jurisdiction by writ of certiorari over appeals from the courts of last resort of the respective jurisdictions of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands, and Palau eliminates any possible risk which might otherwise be posed to the United States or its interests or responsibilities here by the full exercise of constitutional jurisdiction by the courts of the constitutional government. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 64-65 (Kos. 1982).

Until the state courts are established, the Trust Territory High Court retains that portion of its exclusive jurisdiction formerly held under 6 TTC 251 which does not fall within the constitutional jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 68 (Kos. 1982).

State courts, rather than national courts, should normally resolve probate and inheritance issues especially where interests in land are at issue. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 97 (Pon. 1982).

The Federated States of Micronesia Supreme Court is specifically given jurisdiction over disputes between citizens of a state and foreign citizens. FSM Const. art. XI, § 6(b). This jurisdiction is based upon the citizenship of the parties, not the subject matter of their dispute. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 101 (Pon. 1982).

The Constitution places diversity jurisdiction in the Supreme Court, despite the fact that the issues involve matters within state or local, rather than national, legislative powers. FSM Const. art. XI, § 6(b). In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 102 (Pon. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court is empowered to exercise authority in probate matters where there is an independent basis for jurisdiction under the Constitution. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 104 (Pon. 1982).

There is no statutory limitation on the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction; the Judiciary Act of 1979 plainly contemplates that the FSM Supreme Court will exercise all the jurisdiction available to it under the Constitution. 4 F.S.M.C. 201-08. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 106 (Pon. 1982).

It would be contrary to the desire of the framers of the Constitution that local officials retain control over local matters if the FSM Supreme Court were to relinquish jurisdiction over issues involving local and state powers to the Trust Territory High Court, which is the least local tribunal now existing in the Trust Territory. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 110 (Pon. 1982).

The Constitution contemplates that decisions affecting the people of the Federated States of Micronesia will be decided by courts appointed by the constitutional governments of the Federated States of Micronesia. This in turn requires an expansive reading of the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdictional mandate while we await establishment of functioning state courts. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 111 (Pon. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court has inherent constitutional power to issue all writs; this includes the traditional common law writ of mandamus. 4 F.S.M.C. 117. Nix v. Ehmes, 1 FSM R. 114, 118 (Pon. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court is not bound by decisions of United States courts; however, careful consideration should be given to United States decisions regarding court policies as the FSM national courts are modeled on those of the United States. Nix v. Ehmes, 1 FSM R. 114, 119 (Pon. 1982).

Any power the Trust Territory High Court, the District Courts and the Community Courts may have to exercise judicial powers within the Federated States of Micronesia is to be exercised not as that of autonomous foreign states but as integral parts of the domestic governments. Those courts continue to exercise trial court functions in Ponape only on an interim basis, until the State of Ponape establishes its own courts, either under its present state charter or under any constitution which Ponape may adopt. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 244 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction to consider writs of habeas corpus is undiminished by the fact that the courts whose actions are under consideration, the Trust Territory High Court and a Community Court, were not contemplated by the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 244, 246 (Pon. 1983).

The exercise of governmental powers by the Trust Territory High Court, the District Courts and the Community Courts must be carried out in a manner consistent with constitutional self-government and are subject to the safeguards erected by the Constitution for citizens of the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 245 (Pon.1983).

Preservation of a fair decision-making process, and even the maintenance of a democratic system of government, requires that courts and individual judges be protected against unnecessary external pressures. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 246 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Supreme Court should not intrude unnecessarily in the efforts of the Trust Territory High Court to vindicate itself and other judges through court proceedings within the Trust Territory system. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 254 (Pon. 1983).

The Trust Territory High Court is an anomalous entity operating on an interim basis adjacent to a constitutional framework and consisting of judges appointed by officials of the United States Department of Interior. These and other considerations point toward the propriety and necessity of vigilance by the FSM Supreme Court to uphold the constitutional rights of FSM citizens. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 267 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Supreme Court is entitled and required to assure that the Trust Territory High Court, exercising governmental powers within the Federated States of Micronesia, does not violate the constitutional rights of its citizens. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 268 (Pon. 1983).

The Trust Territory High Court must promote constitutional self-government to satisfy the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement to which it is subject. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 268 (Pon. 1983).

Transfer of a case not in active trial in the Trust Territory High Court is mandatory unless the legal rights of a party are impaired by the transfer. U.S. Dep't Int. Sec'l Order 3039, § 5(a) (1979). Actouka v. Etpison, 1 FSM R. 275, 277 (Pon. 1983).

The Trust Territory High Court should leave final interpretation of the Constitution and public laws of the Federated States of Micronesia to the Supreme Court. Jonas v. Trial Division, 1 FSM R. 322, 327 & n.1 (App. 1983).

As a general proposition, a court system resolves disputes by considering and deciding between competing claims of two or more opposing parties. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 4 (Pon. 1985).

It is thought that the judicial power to declare the law will more likely be exercised in enlightened fashion if it is employed only where the court is exposed to the differing points of view of adversaries. Thus judicial decision-making power is typically exercised by a court which has heard competing contentions of adversaries having sufficient interests in the outcome to thoroughly consider, research and argue the points at issue. Even then, a court's declarations of law should be limited to rulings necessary to resolve the dispute before it. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 4 (Pon. 1985).

By its terms, 1 F.S.M.C. 203 pointing to the Restatements as a guide for determining and applying the common law applies only to "courts of the Trust Territory." Since only courts established by the Trust Territory administration existed when the section was issued, it plainly was intended only for those courts at that time. In absence of any persuasive considerations to the contrary, it is logical to conclude that 1 F.S.M.C. 203 applies only to courts of the Trust Territory, not to courts of the Federated States of Micronesia or the various states. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 14 (Pon. 1985).

Since the Trust Territory High Court and District Courts were still active at the time of codification, provisions in the FSM Code referring only to them quite likely were intended only to regulate those courts. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 14 (Pon. 1985).

Statutes governing procedures or decision-making approaches for Trust Territory courts might not apply to constitutional courts. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (II), 2 FSM R. 200, 204 (Pon. 1986).

According to Secretarial Order No. 3039, § 5(a), all cases against the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and the High Commissioner that were filed in the FSM at the time the Truk State Court was certified will continue to remain within the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court. Those cases filed after certification are not within the jurisdiction of the High Court. Suda v. Trust Territory, 3 FSM R. 12, 14 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Courts have an affirmative obligation to avoid erroneous rulings and may not be bound by incorrect legal premises upon which even all parties rely. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 419 (Pon. 1988).

The FSM Constitution provides no authority for any court to act within the Federated States of Micronesia, other than the FSM Supreme Court, inferior courts to be established by statute, and state or local courts. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 105 (App. 1989).

The transitional actions of the FSM Congress, intended to adopt as law of the Federated States of Micronesia those portions of Secretarial Order 3039 relating to judicial functions within the FSM and permitting the Trust Territory courts to continue functioning within the FSM pending establishment of constitutional courts, were a necessary and proper exercise of Congress' power under the Constitution to provide for a smooth and orderly transition. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 105 (App. 1989).

The provisions of the FSM Constitution spelling out jurisdiction and vesting the entire judicial power of the national government in the FSM Supreme Court are self-executing, and the judicial power of the FSM Supreme Court is not dependent upon congressional action. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 105-06 (App. 1989).

To the extent that Secretarial Order 3039 can be read as permitting the Trust Territory High Court to continue, after the FSM Supreme Court had begun functioning, to control cases assigned by the FSM Constitution to the FSM Supreme Court, that exercise by Congress of the transitional power under the Constitution could run counter to other specific provisions of the Constitution, especially the judiciary article, and to fundamental principles of the separation of powers; any extension by the Trust Territory High Court of the powers assigned to it under Secretarial Order 3039 would violate those same constitutional provisions and principles. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 106 (App. 1989).

Actions of the Trust Territory High Court taken after the establishment of functioning constitutional courts in the Federated States of Micronesia, and without a good faith determination after a full and fair hearing as to whether the "active trial" exception permitted retention of the cases, were null and void, even though the parties failed to object, because the High Court was without jurisdiction to act and its conduct constituted usurpation of power. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 122 (App. 1989).

Courts have inherent power, and an obligation, to monitor the conduct of counsel and to enforce compliance with procedural rules. Leeruw v. Yap, 4 FSM R. 145, 150 (Yap 1989).

The appellate division of the Supreme Court of the FSM may accept direct filing of a case and an expedited briefing schedule may be established where there is limited time available and prompt resolution of the issues in the case is decidedly in the national interest. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 324 (App. 1990).

When the remanding appellate court has not mandated a hearing on remand, it is within the sound discretion of the trial court to decide whether or not to convene a post-remand hearing. FSM v. Hartman (I), 5 FSM R. 350, 351 (Pon. 1992).

Any judicial act, that has been done pursuant to a statute that does not confer the power to do that act, is void on its face. A judgment that is void on its face may be set aside by the court on its own motion. In re Jae Joong Hwang, 6 FSM R. 331, 331-32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court is a unified court system with two constitutionally mandated divisions – the trial division and the appellate division. All justices are members of both divisions, but a justice does not serve in the appellate division until he has been designated by the Chief Justice to be the presiding justice on a specific case. The trial division is the state's court of general jurisdiction. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 497 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

All justices in the trial division have concurrent jurisdiction, but once a case has been assigned to a particular justice, that justice has exclusive jurisdiction over the parties and issues of the case until the case is terminated in the trial division. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Even when a national court places itself in the shoes of the state court and interprets state law, the state court is always the final arbiter of the meaning of a state law. State court interpretations of state law which contradict prior rulings of the national courts are controlling. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 601 (Pon. 1994).

A court has an interest in insuring that its orders are heeded, and this interest exists apart from any interest the parties may have in the litigation. A court may take whatever reasonable steps are appropriate to insure compliance with its orders. It need not rely on the parties themselves to prescribe the way in which its orders will be carried out, or its judgments executed. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 312, 318 (Chk. 1998).

One of our courts' express functions is to apply and interpret the duly enacted and promulgated laws and regulations which lie at the heart of a dispute. Our court system exists to speak to the very issues to which Pohnpeian custom and tradition are silent. In this way, the two systems complement each other. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

A court has inherent powers to compel submission to its lawful mandates. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 9 FSM R. 150, 152 & n.1 (Pon. 1999).

Cases pending in a municipal court may be transferred to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division upon the request of any party and by order of the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division. There is no authority for a municipal judge to transfer a case, sua sponte, to the Chuuk State Supreme Court without the request of any party. Phillip v. Phillip, 9 FSM R. 226, 228 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Rules of court properly promulgated, and not exceeding the limitation of the court's rulemaking power, have the force of law. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 371 (Kos. 2000).

Chuuk state courts have the power to issue all writs for equitable and legal relief, except the power of attachment, execution and garnishment of public property. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 497 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Title 6, chapter 10, subchapter 1 of the FSM Code is replete with references to officials who either do not exist now or who no longer carry out the functions with which they are identified in the statute, and when confronted with such language in a section thereof, the FSM Supreme Court has generally ruled that the section applies only to the Trust Territory High Court. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. 2000).

The witness fees in 6 F.S.M.C. 1011 apply only to the Trust Territory High Court. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. 2000).

Only two courts have jurisdiction over the territory of Chuuk – the Chuuk State Supreme Court and the FSM Supreme Court. A mortgage foreclosure on land in Chuuk therefore could not be in any court other than those two. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction, not a court whose jurisdiction is limited and confined. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division has no appellate or supervisory jurisdiction over either division of the Pohnpei Supreme Court, and no appeal lies from the Pohnpei Supreme Court to the FSM Supreme Court trial division. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

In our federal system of government, state courts are not inferior tribunals to the FSM Supreme Court trial division. The national and state court systems are separate systems created by and serving different sovereigns. Neither system is superior to the other. Rather the systems are parallel. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division is not a superior tribunal to the Pohnpei Supreme Court, although in certain circumstances the FSM Supreme Court appellate division is such a superior tribunal. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

Only one Chuuk State Supreme Court justice may hear or decide an appeal in the appellate division. The other members of the appellate panel must be temporary justices appointed for the limited purpose of hearing the appeal. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 150 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The constitutional language does not require that a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice sit on an appellate panel when none is available, only that no more than one can sit under any circumstance. But if there are Chuuk State Supreme Court justices who are not disqualified, one must preside over the panel in order for it to be properly constituted. If needed, a justice, who is not disqualified, has a professional and constitutional obligation to serve. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction, which has subject matter jurisdiction over a landlord/tenant dispute. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 242 (App. 2001).

Under the Chuuk Constitution, article VII, § 3(c), the Chuuk State Supreme Court has only appellate or review jurisdiction over the Land Commission, and thus a motion for review de novo of matters not raised before the Land Commission must be denied. Enengeitaw Clan v. Shirai, 10 FSM R. 309, 311 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Where a remedy exists, the FSM Supreme Court has general power under the Judiciary Act of 1979 to effect that remedy. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 433, 435 (Pon. 2001).

It is the Chuuk State Supreme Court's duty to enforce the constitution and laws of the state and the state's 40 municipalities and to see that the constitutions of the several municipalities are protected against unwarranted interference by any state official, regardless of motivation. In re Oneisomw Election, 11 FSM R. 89, 93 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae State Court has jurisdiction to issue writs and other process. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 260 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae State Court is given rule making authority that operates only in the limited sphere of the court's inherent authority to determine an orderly process for the disposition of cases that come before it for adjudication. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 262 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk Chief Justice must promulgate rules of evidence and rules governing the administration of all state courts, the regulation of the judicial profession, and practice and procedure in civil and criminal matters. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 257 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When acting in his rule making capacity, the Chief Justice acts in a legislative capacity. Rules of court, properly promulgated, and not exceeding the limitation of the rule-making authority, have the force of law. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Acts in excess of a court's jurisdiction are void. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 399 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The State of Kosrae's judicial power is vested in the State Court and such inferior courts as may be created by law. The Kosrae Land Court was established as an inferior court within the Kosrae State Court system. The State Court has jurisdiction to review all decisions of inferior courts. The Kosrae Constitution does not specify which division of the State Court is required to review decisions of inferior courts. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The term "appellate court" is defined as the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. Kosrae State Court decisions may be appealed to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Since the Kosrae Constitution provides that appeals from the State Court trial division may be made to the State Court appellate division, as shall be prescribed by law, enabling legislation is required to implement appeals from the trial division to the State Court appellate division, and when no such legislation has been passed by the Legislature and signed into law, no constitutional or statutory authority exists to authorize appeals from trial division to the State Court appellate division. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The Kosrae State Court has jurisdiction to review all decisions of inferior courts. Neither the Kosrae Constitution nor state law requires that Land Court decisions be appealed to the State Court appellate division. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The State Court has the power to make rules and orders, and do all acts, not inconsistent with law or rule, required for the due administration of justice. It is specifically authorized to govern appeal procedures for appeals from the Land Court and procedures for Land Court appeals to the State Court are established in the Kosrae Rules of Appellate Procedure. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The Kosrae State Court trial division has jurisdiction to review all decisions of inferior courts, including decisions entered by the Kosrae Land Court. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A later general court order supersedes an earlier one. Goya v. Ramp, 13 FSM R. 100, 105 n.2 (App. 2005).

Any case over which the trial division has jurisdiction may be heard by any of the justices as assigned by the Chief Justice. Once a case has been assigned to a particular justice, that justice has jurisdictional priority over the parties and issues of the case to the exclusion of all other trial division justices. This exclusive jurisdiction continues until the case is terminated in the trial division. While the case is pending, the priority extends to any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

When the parties are identical in two civil actions and the plaintiffs sought the same relief in both civil actions – that the contents of certain ballot boxes not be counted and tabulated because of election irregularities and when the only difference in the later civil action was that the plaintiffs were contesting only two of the five boxes they contested in the first civil action and that the irregularities alleged in the later case were discovered during and in the course of the litigation of the first civil action (that is, during the counting and tabulating ordered by the judge in the first civil action), such irregularities would be expected to be brought immediately before the judge on the case in which they were discovered. When they were not, but were instead filed as a separate case, once the trial judge on the first case became available, the case should have been left to him to act upon. Therefore the second trial judge's presiding over the second civil action was in excess of his jurisdiction since the first trial division justice had jurisdictional priority over the parties and the issues in that case to the exclusion of all other trial division justices. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

The appellate court cannot fault a judge for acting on a temporary restraining order application when it was filed since the assigned special trial justice was unavailable in the outer islands and the request for a temporary restraining order needed prompt action, but once the special trial justice again became available, the case should have been left to the special trial justice to act upon. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

Under the doctrine of stare decisis, once a point of law has been established by a court, that point of law will be followed by all courts of lower rank in subsequent cases where the same legal issue is raised. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When our nation's highest court, the FSM Supreme Court appellate division, interprets a constitutional provision in a case before it, that interpretation is to be given full effect in all cases still open on direct review, and as to all events, regardless of when they occurred. Once it announces a new rule of law, the integrity of judicial review requires application of the new rule to all similar cases pending on review. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

New constitutional rules affecting procedures in criminal cases apply only to those cases which are pending on direct review or which are not yet final when the new rules are announced. Thus a new constitutional rule announced in a January, 2004 decision will apply to a May 2003 case still pending at that time. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When, contrary to the requirements of GCO 2002-13, the presiding justice questioned the claimants instead of the land assessor and the same series of questions were not asked of each unrepresented claimant, which is required by GCO 2002-13 in order to provide an equal opportunity to each claimant to present his or her claim and the reasons therefor, the non-compliance jeopardizes the fairness of the proceeding by providing one claimant better opportunity, through specified questions, to present his or her claim. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Courts have inherent power and obligation to monitor the conduct of parties and to enforce compliance with procedural rules. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Anyone is entitled to attend the Kosrae Land Court hearings on a parcel, whether or not they were provided personal notice for the hearing. All hearings at the Land Court are open to the public, as a basic cornerstone of the constitutional protections provided by our democratic government. Thus, even if persons had not been provided personal notice of the hearing on the parcel, and had received only public notice provided through posting or broadcast, they were still entitled to attend the hearing, and, if they were claimants they were permitted to present testimony at the hearing. Kun v. Heirs of Abraham, 13 FSM R. 558, 561 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Violation of the statutory deadline to issue a Land Court decision does not affect the decision's validity. Its late issuance only serves as grounds for the issuing justice's removal or other discipline. Kun v. Heirs of Abraham, 13 FSM R. 558, 561 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Enforcement of a Chuuk municipal court judgment is properly sought from that court or from the Chuuk State Supreme Court, which has supervisory powers over the municipal courts, not from the FSM

Supreme Court. Puchonong v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 67, 69 (Chk. 2006).

The Kosrae Land Court should ensure the distribution to one or more heirs of the General Court Orders that one (or more) persons represent a group of heirs if they are not represented by legal counsel, and that govern the questioning of claimants not represented by legal counsel, so that they may receive notice and comply with the requirements before the hearing date. Heirs of Weilbacher v. Heirs of Luke, 14 FSM R. 99, 101 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Because the Kosrae State Court only has the authority to hear appeals from Land Court and it cannot act until the Land Court has adjudicated the matter and an appeal has been filed, a case concerning a claim of title to land filed in the Kosrae State Court will be dismissed without prejudice to allow the plaintiffs to file their claim in the Land Court, whose jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title of land and any interests therein. Alanso v. Pridgen, 14 FSM R. 479, 480 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Land Court took over the Land Commission's responsibilities and is required by statute to give effect to determinations issued by the Land Commission. It does not have the discretion to ignore a Land Commission determination because it is handwritten or because it has not yet been served on the parties. The Land Court's duty is to take over, or "succeed" to the Land Commission's responsibilities, not re-hear matters previously decided by it. Heirs of Tara v. Heirs of Kurr, 14 FSM R. 521, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When creating the Land Court, the Kosrae Legislature provided for the transition of cases from the Land Commission to the Land Court and the Land Court succeeded to all Land Commission responsibilities, registers, properties and assets and Land Commission land determinations and registrations are equivalent to Land Court title determinations and registrations. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 14 FSM R. 556, 558 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Since The Land Court took over the Land Commission's responsibilities and is required by statute to give effect to Land Commission determinations, it does not have the discretion to ignore a Land Commission determination even when the Commissioners signed an adjudication to indicate their decision rather than issue a separate document. The Land Court does not have the discretion to ignore a Land Commission determination because it has not yet been served on the parties. The Land Court's duty is to take over, or "succeed" the Land Commission's responsibilities, not re-hear matters previously decided by them. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 14 FSM R. 556, 559 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

That the Land Commission determination was not timely served on the parties since it was signed in 1990 and not served until the Land Court took action to complete the matter in January 2006, is not a ground to set aside the determination or to ignore the record made by the Land Commission because Kosrae Code § 11.616 requires that the Land Court treat the Land Commission's determinations as equivalent to its own determinations and there is no language setting a time restriction on this requirement. Despite the extended delay in service, the Land Court correctly gave force and effect to the Land Commission's determination. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 14 FSM R. 556, 559 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division has jurisdiction to review the actions of any state administrative agency, board, or Commission, as may be provided by law and the appellate division has jurisdiction to review all decisions of the trial division, of inferior state courts, and of the municipal courts. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The Kosrae Land Court is statutorily created as an inferior court within the State Court. It was created for specific purposes – title investigation, title determination, and the registration of interests in lands within Kosrae and to provide one system of filing all recorded interests in land. Thus, it is a court granted specific, limited jurisdiction. It is not a court of general jurisdiction. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Since the Land Court's jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title to land and any interests therein, that would necessarily include whether kewosr was a tradition affecting land tenure when the alleged transfer took place and whether a kewosr did in fact occur. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 375 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. The rule, however, is not absolute, but is a principle of sound judicial administration that the first-filed suit should have priority absent special circumstances. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 16 FSM R. 382, 384 (Chk. 2009).

The court with jurisdiction over the first-filed case may exercise its discretion to stay proceedings, under the power inherent in every court to control the disposition of the causes on its docket with economy of time and effort for itself, for counsel, and for litigants. The first-filed rule is neither absolute nor mechanically applied but advances the inherently fair concept that the party that commenced the first suit generally ought to be the party to obtain its choice of venue. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 16 FSM R. 382, 384 (Chk. 2009).

When this suit and a later-filed suit were both filed in the FSM Supreme Court trial division but in different venues, the first in Chuuk and the second in Pohnpei; when the defendants are all present in Chuuk but have adopted a position analogous to an interpleader in that they are subject to competing claims for the same property and will comply with any court determination about its ownership; when the central issue to be resolved before any final judicial order is whether a bill of sale is enforceable or should be rescinded or reformed; and when this central issue is directly joined in the Pohnpei suit where the stock transfer and the events surrounding it took place, where the transferor and transferee both reside, and where the evidence and witnesses are present, this, at least to resolve this crucial central issue, would (based on judicial economy and economy of time and effort for counsel and for the litigants) favor a Pohnpei venue if it can be resolved there without undue delay. Since, even though complete relief for all the parties in this case cannot be granted in the Pohnpei suit, the Pohnpei suit should expeditiously resolve this suit's central issue without imposing hardship on the parties and leave this court to dispose of the peripheral issues, adjudication of this first-filed action will be stayed pending the resolution of the later-filed FSM Supreme Court suit in Pohnpei. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 16 FSM R. 382, 385-86 (Chk. 2009).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if one is filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. The rule, although not absolute, is a principle of sound judicial administration under which the first-filed suit should have priority absent special circumstances. This salutary principle avoids unseemly conflicts that might arise between courts if they could, at the same time, make inconsistent or contradictory decisions relating to the same dispute and it protects litigants from the expense and harassment of multiple litigation. Setik v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 277, 280 (Chk. 2010).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division has no authority to tell the Chuuk State Supreme Court whether and how it should enforce its own ruling when the case in which the ruling was made is not currently before the FSM Supreme Court. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 300 (App. 2010).

The general rule is that the first-filed lawsuit has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if one is filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. This rule, although not absolute, is a principle of sound judicial administration under which the first-filed suit should have priority absent special circumstances. This salutary principle avoids unseemly conflicts that might arise between courts if they could, at the same time, make inconsistent or contradictory decisions relating to the same dispute and it protects litigants from the expense and harassment of multiple litigation. Setik v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 304, 306 (Chk. 2010).

When there is a prior Chuuk State Supreme Court case that deals with the ownership issue and in which the alleged trespasser may soon be joined, and when the state court, unlike Chuuk Land Commission, has the power to issue monetary awards, the later-filed FSM Supreme Court trespass case will be dismissed without prejudice. Setik v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 304, 307 (Chk. 2010).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has the authority to issue a writ of mandamus in a proper case. The Chuuk Judiciary Act gives all state courts the power to issue all writs for equitable and legal relief. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The Chuuk State Judiciary Act gives each Chuuk court the power to issue all writs for equitable an legal relief; except the power of attachment, execution and garnishment of public property. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 334 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The Kosrae State Court has original jurisdiction in all cases except those within the exclusive and original jurisdiction of inferior courts and it has jurisdiction to review all decisions of inferior courts. Since no inferior court is assigned original jurisdiction over state employee grievances, the Kosrae State Court has jurisdiction over state employees' claims for pay once they have exhausted their administrative remedies. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 513 (App. 2013).

The Kosrae State Court Chief Justice is not acting in excess of his jurisdiction by appointing himself to sit as a temporary judge on a Land Court case when all the Land Court judges are disqualified when the Land Court is an inferior court within a unified state court system and since there is no constitutional impediment to a Kosrae statute authorizing a Kosrae State Court justice to sit as a temporary justice in another (inferior) court within the unified Kosrae state court system. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 194-95 (App. 2013).

One FSM Supreme Court trial division justice does not have subject matter jurisdiction to set aside orders entered in another separate trial division case, nor does he hold subject matter jurisdiction to grant injunctive relief against another trial division justice. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 253, 257 (Pon. 2014).

Since the Kosrae Constitution provides that appeals from the State Court trial division may be made to the State Court appellate division, as shall be prescribed by law, enabling legislation is required to implement appeals from the trial division to the State Court appellate division, and when no such legislation has become law, no constitutional or statutory authority exists to authorize appeals from the Kosrae State Court trial division to the non-existent Kosrae State Court appellate division. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 301 (App. 2014).

By statute, the Kosrae State Court can, if appropriate, order a rehearing in the Land Court for only a part of a case. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 303 (App. 2014).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court trial division does not have appellate jurisdiction over Pohnpei municipal or local courts, and therefore the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division lacks jurisdiction over a petition for a writ of mandamus directed to a municipal court. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 401, 402 (App. 2014).

The Chuuk Land Commission is not a court as that word is used in the Chuuk Constitution. It is an administrative agency that functions as a quasi-judicial tribunal. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 612, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The Chuuk Legislature, by statute, has determined that a land case in a declared land registration area must first go through the Land Commission procedure before it can become a land case in the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 612, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The constitutional grant of original court jurisdiction does not prevent the Legislature from prescribing by statute that certain land cases must first go to an administrative agency, the Chuuk Land Commission, before the trial court can exercise its original jurisdiction over them. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 612, 613

(Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that would also have jurisdiction, but when the court has already ordered that the two cases be consolidated, the issue has become moot. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 142 (Pon. 2015).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. Carius v. Johnson, 20 FSM R. 143, 146 (Pon. 2015).

While limited, the Kosrae Land Court's subject-matter jurisdiction is broad enough to encompass factual determinations of fraud and misrepresentation to the extent that they affect the validity of titles or conveyances of land. Indeed, that is the Land Court's very purpose. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 73 (App. 2016).

When the Kosrae Land Court itself is implicated in the allegations of fraud, that court is not competent to adjudicate the subject matter. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 74 (App. 2016).

A court has no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than it does to usurp that which is not given. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 74 (App. 2016).

The Kosrae State Court has the power to issue all writs and other process, and may entertain a petition for a writ of mandamus. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 93 (App. 2016).

"Forum-shopping" is the practice of choosing the most favorable jurisdiction or court in which a claim might be heard. Forum shopping thus presupposes that more than one court could have jurisdiction over the "claim" being "forum-shopped." FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 299 (Chk. 2017).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because, while the Chief Justice has the power to promulgate procedural rules, those rules may be amended by statute, and because the Chief Justice does not have the power to amend a statute, a Congressionally enacted procedural rule is valid. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 517 (App. 2018).

In order to be "controlling law," the precedent must be a binding precedent. A binding precedent is a precedent that a court must follow. For example, a lower court is bound by an applicable holding of a higher court in the same jurisdiction. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 560-61 (App. 2018).

While trial division decisions are precedents, they are not binding precedents since they are only trial court decisions. They are thus not "controlling law." Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 561 (App. 2018).

The Kosrae Land Court's statutory jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title of land and any interest therein. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 578 (App. 2018).

Although the Kosrae Legislature did not vest exclusive jurisdiction in the Kosrae Land Court, it did create the Land Court as the court with original jurisdiction over land matters, and reserved appellate jurisdiction in the Kosrae State Court. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

When the proper place for a suit to have started was the Kosrae Land Court, but it was filed on the Kosrae State Court, the Kosrae State Court should have dismissed the Kosrae Land Court and the Kosrae state government as parties and, since it is the superior court in a unified court system, transferred the case from its docket to the Land Court's docket. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

It is a well established principle of law that a court's jurisdiction does not extend beyond the boundaries of the state of its creation. This is because the authority of every tribunal is necessarily restricted by the territorial limits of the state in which it is established, and any attempt to exercise authority beyond those limits would be deemed in every other forum an illegitimate assumption of power. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

In the interest of judicial economy, efficiency, and past precedent, the FSM Supreme Court can, in appropriate cases, request that parties submit a draft order for its consideration. The court may or may not, at its discretion, adopt the contents, or parts of the contents, of the draft order, in order to formulate a decision with a legal basis, based on legal reasoning. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 642 (Pon. 2018).

An order is not void simply because it was prepared by a litigant and signed by the court rather than drafted by the court itself. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 642 (Pon. 2018).

Fraud upon the court is the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or fabrication of evidence by counsel, which must be supported by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

When the Pohnpei state probate case was the first filed lawsuit and that case can afford a complete resolution of the issues between the parties; when the later-filed FSM Supreme Court case could, at best, afford only a partial resolution and certainly lacks jurisdiction to enforce a state court interlocutory order; and when the Pohnpei Supreme Court is perfectly competent to enforce its own orders and judgments and to take any further needed steps in the probate case pending before it, it is appropriate that that forum resolve the issues. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 13 (Pon. 2018).

A court may abuse its judicial discretion by an unexplained, lengthy delay or by the failure to exercise its discretion within a reasonable time because the failure to exercise discretion is an abuse of the discretion. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 67 (Pon. 2018).

A court may take judicial notice of its own files in related cases. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 117 (App. 2018).

Upon the filing of a registration area with the court, courts cannot entertain any action with regard to interests in land within that registration area without a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable before it is likely that the land commission can determine the matter. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Judges

Preservation of a fair decision-making process, and even the maintenance of a democratic system of government, requires that courts and individual judges be protected against unnecessary external pressures. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 247 (Pon. 1983).

Judges on the FSM Supreme Court are bound by the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct incorporated into law by 4 F.S.M.C. 122. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 444 (App. 1984).

The Judiciary Act of 1979, in Title 4 of the FSM Code, and the Judiciary Article, article XI of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia govern the structure and powers of the FSM Supreme Court, and make no provision for appointment of special judges to sit with a justice of the FSM Supreme Court trial division. 5 F.S.M.C. 514 has no application to proceedings before the FSM Supreme Court. In re Raitoun, 1 FSM R. 561, 564-65 (App. 1984).

Where an appellate court has held that a trial judge is under a clear and non-discretionary duty to step aside from presiding over a case and the petitioner has a constitutional right to obtain compliance with that duty, all documents issued after the date of the appellate decision are null and void and shall be expunged from the record and the judge shall be enjoined from taking any further action as a judge in the case. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 111, 113 (App. 1991).

The Chief Justice may appoint an acting chief justice if he is unable to perform his duties. "Unable to perform his duties" refers to a physical or mental disability of some duration, not to the legal inability to act on one particular case. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 326, 331 (App. 1992).

In order for a Congressional statute to give the court valid authority in those areas which the Constitution grants the Chief Justice rule-making powers the Chief Justice does not first have to promulgate a rule before Congress may legislate on the same subject. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 297 (App. 1993).

Pursuant to the Chuuk Judiciary Act judges in Chuuk are required to adhere to the standards of the Code of Judicial Conduct of the American Bar Association which require judges to resign from judicial office upon becoming a candidate for a non-judicial office. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 108 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Pursuant to the Chuuk Judiciary Act judges in Chuuk have a clear ministerial, non-discretionary duty to resign from judicial office upon becoming a candidate for a non-judicial office. A writ of mandamus is the specific remedy to compel the performance of such a legally required ministerial act. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Judges, faithful to their oath of office, should approach every aspect of each case with a neutral and objective disposition and understand their duty to render decisions upon a proper record and to disregard earlier judicial contacts with a case or party. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 9 (App. 1997).

Compensation of Kosrae State Court justices is prescribed by law. Compensation may not be increased or decreased during their terms of office, except by general law applying to all state government employees. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The phrase "all State Government employees" means employees whose compensation is determined by statute, and does not include those employees who have individual contracts with Kosrae. Therefore a state law reducing state public service system employees' pay can constitutionally be applied to a Kosrae State Court justice's pay. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Trial judges are expected to suggest the desirability of possible settlement. That is a normal part of their job. Bualuay v. Rano, 11 FSM R. 139, 148 (App. 2002).

The prohibition against compelling a judge's testimony is reflected in a long-standing principle that a court speaks only through its orders. This ban on judges testifying has limits. Those limits are that a judge must be acting as a judge, and that it is information regarding his or her role as a judge that is sought. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 430 (Chk. 2003).

No one is eligible to serve as the Chuuk Chief Justice or as an associate justice unless at least 35 years of age, was a born Chuukese, has been a resident of the State of Chuuk for at least 25 years, is an FSM citizen, and has never been convicted of a felony. Other qualifications may be prescribed by statute. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 256 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chief Justice of the Chuuk State Supreme Court is the administrative head of the state judicial system, and he may appoint and prescribe duties of other officers and employees of the state judicial system. He is also obligated to promulgate rules governing the administration of all state courts, the regulation of the judicial profession, and practice and procedure in civil matters. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When acting in his rule making capacity, the Chief Justice acts in a legislative capacity. Rules of court, properly promulgated, and not exceeding the limitation of the rule-making authority, have the force of law. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The ABA Code of Judicial Conduct (1984 ed.) is the judicial ethics provision in effect in Kosrae today. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 285-86 (App. 2003).

The Constitution provides that a Supreme Court justice may be removed from office for treason, bribery, or conduct involving corruption in office by a ⅔ vote of the members of Congress. When a justice of the Supreme Court is removed, the decision must be reviewed by a special tribunal composed of one state court judge from each state appointed by the state chief executive. The Constitution draws no distinction between permanent justices or specially assigned justices for purposes of removal. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 586 (App. 2004).

No Chuuk state justice may hear or decide an appeal of a matter heard by the justice in the trial division, but the issuance of a stay is a procedural matter that does not require the justice issuing it to hear or decide the appeal. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 389 (Chk. 2005).

A judge's failure to rule, that is, his failure to exercise his discretion is itself an abuse of the judge's discretion because a court may abuse its discretion by an unexplained, lengthy delay or by failure to exercise its discretion within a reasonable time. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 390 n.2 (Chk. 2005).

When an oral motion to disqualify one of the panel members was made, the other two members constitute the deciding majority in an appellate case and can decide a motion to disqualify the third member. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 141, 143-44 & n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

A writ of prohibition directed to a Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division justice is not a matter that the justice is barred from hearing when it was not heard by such justice in the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division, and in an FSM Supreme Court case, the justice was careful not to decide anything on the merits. Not having expressed an opinion on the merits or done more than issue a preliminary injunction, a justice is not precluded from sitting on a panel considering a petition for writ of prohibition. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 141, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

If the Chief Justice is removed or disqualified, then the most senior associate justice who has not been removed or disqualified from the case will appoint the temporary justices, but if all Chuuk State Supreme Court justices are disqualified and there is no associate justice that could appoint a panel in the Chief Justice's stead and there is no provision for the Chief Justice to appoint a temporary justice to make the appointments, then the rule of necessity, in this limited circumstance, allows the Chief Justice to make the panel appointments. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 146, 148 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

When the trial judge's original appointment as chief justice established his qualifications for the office and the trial judge physically possessed the office of chief justice on February 28, 2006 and on that day discharged the duties of the office and when the trial judge's color of authority stems from his original appointment as chief justice, the dispute relates not to the fact of the trial judge's appointment to the bench but rather concerns the exact length of the trial judge's appointment as chief justice. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 129 (App. 2007).

When the only relevant evidence in the record on appeal supports the conclusion that the judge's appointment extended through the day of February 28, 2006, as he was clearly acting under the color of authority vested with him by his original appointment as chief justice and not as an unknown usurper attempting to wrestle authority from its appropriate guardian, and when an additional source for the trial judge's color of authority is derived from the fact that he presided over the trial in this matter and twice scheduled the sentencing hearing to take place before February 28, 2006, all acts which he undertook without protest from any party, this is the type of situation contemplated by the de facto principle as a safeguard against the unnecessary interruption of public governance. Thus, even if it were true that the trial judge's tenure with the court officially ended before February 28, 2006, the sentencing order of February 28, 2006 would remain valid as the act of a judge de facto. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 129 (App. 2007).

A party may seek the addition of supplemental findings to a judgment within ten days of the judgment being entered. Such action should only be taken by the judge who presided over the proceedings and who entered the judgment and while the facts underlying the proceedings are fresh within the presiding judge's mind. A motion for amended judgment or supplemental findings under Rule 52(b), nearly two decades after entry of judgment and with a new presiding judge, is untimely and inappropriate. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 539 (Pon. 2008).

If by reason of the disability of the judge before whom an action was been tried, the judge is unable to perform the court's duties after findings of fact and conclusions of law are filed, then any other judge regularly sitting in or assigned to the court in which the action was tried may perform those duties unless the other judge is satisfied that such other judge cannot perform those duties because such other judge did not preside at the trial or for any other reason the other judge may in his or her discretion grant a new trial. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 539 (Pon. 2008).

When interpreting FSM Civil Rule 63 and applying it to a matter, it is appropriate to consider the treatment of similar rules of procedure as they are found in American jurisdictions. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 539 (Pon. 2008).

A successor judge may not make findings of fact and conclusions of law and enter judgment solely upon the record developed by his predecessor except upon agreement of the parties, and a second judge is prohibited from making factual determinations as to a first judge's intent when he interprets an order issued by the first judge. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 539 (Pon. 2008).

Kosrae state judges are subject to the 2000 version of the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct as the basis for judicial ethics and disqualification because the State Code adopted by reference and applied to Kosrae judges the 1984 edition of the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct but allowed the Kosrae Chief Justice, by rule, to make the judicial conduct requirements stricter or to establish other standards consistent with the Code of Judicial Conduct, which was done through Kosrae General Court Order 2003-02 adopting the 2000 version of the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503 & n.1 (App. 2011).

If the Kosrae Chief Justice sits on a case in the Land Court and his decision is later appealed to the Kosrae State Court, the Chief Justice must then have no involvement in the case in the Kosrae State Court and the Kosrae State Court appeal would necessarily be handled by another justice. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 195 (App. 2013).

The only procedure available to seek restraint of or injunctive relief against an FSM Supreme Court Trial Division justice is to be found in Rule 21 of the FSM Rules of Appellate Procedure. It is established in this jurisdiction that a writ of prohibition must be directed to a court or tribunal inferior in rank to the one issuing the writ. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 253, 257 (Pon. 2014).

The structure of the FSM Court system dictates that as a practical matter a writ against a trial division court may only be issued by the appellate division. Therefore, a writ of mandamus or prohibition, even if characterized as an "injunction" or "setting aside an order" may not be issued by one trial division justice against another FSM Supreme Court trial division justice. Appellate Rule 21 writs of prohibition are the sole procedure available for seeking restraint of a trial court judge's actions in a pending case. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 253, 257-58 (Pon. 2014).

FSM Supreme Court justices, even temporary justices, should be guided by permissible considerations rather than by one party's unsupported supposition that other justices would have ruled differently on a question of first impression. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 52 (Pon. 2015).

While it is appropriate for a Chief Justice to engage with all the relevant stake-holders in the process of promulgating a general court order, the decision making process is quite different for a justice called upon to render an evidentiary ruling in a criminal case. Even when a party raises a question of first impression, a judge presiding over a criminal case has a responsibility to apply the law to the case's facts, and it would be an abuse of judicial discretion to delay an evidentiary ruling in order to solicit advice from non-parties suggesting what the law should be. This judicial power is curtailed by the process of appellate review. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 53 (Pon. 2015).

A signature affixed by a judge by rubber stamp is valid because a signature is a person's name or mark written by that person or at the person's direction, or any name, mark, or writing used with the intent of authenticating a document – also termed a legal signature. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 157, 159 (Kos. 2015).

In the absence of any provision in the FSM Code, Rules of Civil Procedure, or General Court Order, mandating a handwritten signature on an order issued by a justice, an argument that a judge's signature is deficient because it appears to be "rubber-stamped," is devoid of merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 228 (Chk. 2015).

Kosrae State Court judges are constitutionally required to retire upon attaining the age of sixty-five years. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 20 FSM R. 629, 631 & n.2 (App. 2016).

In the absence of any provision in the FSM Code, Civil Procedure Rules, or General Court Order, mandating a handwritten signature on an order issued by a justice, arguments that a judge's signature is deficient because it is "rubber-stamped," are devoid of merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 21 FSM R. 148, 149 (Pon. 2017).

A judge's rubber-stamped signatures are marks used to authenticate the judge's written orders, and are thus valid, original signatures. Contentions that they are fake, or invalid, or not legal signatures, are without merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 21 FSM R. 148, 150 (Pon. 2017).

All Chuukese judges are required to adhere to the American Bar Association's Code of Judicial Conduct. Selifis v. Robert, 21 FSM R. 344, 346 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2017).

The Chief Justice is required by statute to give notice to the President and the Congress upon the appointment of any temporary Justice. While the concurrent issuance of a separate order of assignment, filed in the relevant case, is undoubtedly the better practice, no law or rule requires it. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 517 (App. 2018).

Often a litigant will not know which judge has been assigned the case until that judge either issues his or her first written order or appears on the bench at the case's first hearing. That is when, if there are grounds for the motion, a litigant would usually move to disqualify the judge. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 517 (App. 2018).

A ministerial act is an act performed without the independent exercise of discretion or judgment. Ministerial means of or relating to an act that involves obedience to instructions or laws instead of discretion, judgment, or skill. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 521 (App. 2018).

Litigants are not entitled to a judge of their own choosing; they are only entitled to an unbiased judge. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 550 (App. 2018).

Often a litigant will not know which judge will be assigned a case until that judge either issues his or her first written order or appears on the bench for the case's first hearing. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

Kosrae state judges are bound by the 2000 version of the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct, which forms the basis for judicial ethics and disqualification. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 219 (App. 2019).

– Judges – Judges De Facto

If someone constitutionally ineligible for appointment, is appointed a judge then his status is that of a de facto judge. A de facto judge is one who exercises the duties of the judicial office under the color of an appointment thereto. Where there is an office to be filled, and one, acting under color of authority, fills the office and discharges its duties, his actions are those of an officer de facto, and binding on the public. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 298-99 (App. 1993).

Since the acts of a de facto judge are valid against all except the sovereign and generally not subject to collateral attack, the proper method to question a de facto judge's authority is through a quo warranto proceeding brought by the sovereign. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 299 (App. 1993).

The view that the de facto doctrine, where applicable, should operate to prevent challenges to the authority of special judges, acting under color of right, by private litigants, in the proceedings before them is better suited for the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 299 (App. 1993).

The acts of a judge de facto are generally valid and not subject to collateral attack. Alafanso v. Suda, 10 FSM R. 553, 556 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court prefers to adopt the majority rule in the United States that a temporary judge cannot be a judge de facto, because a temporary judge merely serves for a particular case, whereas a judge de facto makes claim to a judicial office under color of authority. This majority rule, in defining a judge de facto, requires that a judge de facto have all of the qualifications to hold the office which he claims under color of authority, a requirement which cannot, as a matter of definition, apply to temporary judges, who have no claim to the office of judge de jure, but rather occupy it on a temporary basis, case by case. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 260 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A judge de facto occupies the position under "color of authority," which has been defined in this context as follows: "A de facto officer is one who is in possession of an office, and discharging its duties, under color of authority. By color of authority is meant authority derived from an election or appointment, however irregular or informal, so that the incumbent be not a mere volunteer. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 260 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Even if a special trial justice were not a lawfully appointed judicial officer, that is, a judge de jure, he was a de facto judicial officer since a de facto judge is one who exercises the duties of the judicial office under the color of an appointment thereto. A judge de facto's acts are generally valid and not subject to collateral attack. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 114 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A judge de facto must have all the qualifications to hold the office which he claims under color of authority. A de facto officer is one who is in possession of an office, and discharging its duties, under color of authority. By color of authority is meant authority derived from an election or appointment, however irregular or informal, so that the incumbent be not a mere volunteer. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 129 (App. 2007).

When the only relevant evidence in the record on appeal supports the conclusion that the judge's appointment extended through the day of February 28, 2006, as he was clearly acting under the color of authority vested with him by his original appointment as chief justice and not as an unknown usurper attempting to wrestle authority from its appropriate guardian, and when an additional source for the trial judge's color of authority is derived from the fact that he presided over the trial in this matter and twice scheduled the sentencing hearing to take place before February 28, 2006, all acts which he undertook without protest from any party, this is the type of situation contemplated by the de facto principle as a safeguard against the unnecessary interruption of public governance. Thus, even if it were true that the trial judge's tenure with the court officially ended before February 28, 2006, the sentencing order of February 28, 2006 would remain valid as the act of a judge de facto. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 129 (App. 2007).

– Judges – Temporary Judges

The Chief Justice has the constitutional authority to make rules for the appointment of special judges, and Congress has the constitutional authority to amend them. Congress has provided the Chief Justice with the statutory authority to appoint temporary justices. Where Congress has acted pursuant to its constitutional authority to provide statutory authority to the court, the court need not have exercised its concurrent rule-making authority. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 326, 331 (App. 1992).

The constitutional language does not require that a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice sit on an appellate panel when none is available, only that no more than one can sit under any circumstance. But if there are Chuuk State Supreme Court justices who are not disqualified, one must preside over the panel in order for it to be properly constituted. If needed, a justice, who is not disqualified, has a professional and constitutional obligation to serve. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

Temporary Chuuk State Supreme Court justices, appointed for the limited purpose of hearing the appeal, may be a justice of the FSM Supreme Court, a judge of a court of another FSM state, or a qualified attorney in the State of Chuuk. FSM citizenship is not a constitutional requirement to be a temporary Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate justice and the Legislature cannot add it by statute. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When a special trial division justice was appointed by the Chief Justice pursuant to the procedure contained in two 1994 general court orders, the special trial division justice appeared to be a properly installed judicial officer, and even if the special trial division justice were not a lawfully appointed judicial officer, that is, a judge de jure, he was a de facto judicial officer. Alafanso v. Suda, 10 FSM R. 553, 556 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Where the Chuuk Constitution specifically authorizes the appointment of qualified attorneys in Chuuk as temporary appellate justices on a per case basis and the Constitution's framers therefore must have contemplated that counsel in one appeal may well be a temporary justice on a different appeal, the presence of qualified attorneys on an appellate panel is not a ground to grant a rehearing. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 454, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

An appellate panel's composition of three temporary justices is proper in the sudden absence of the presiding Chuuk State Supreme Court justice when the other Chuuk State Supreme Court justices were disqualified and the matter could not wait for the original presiding justice's recovery from illness because the court was required by statute to decide on the contested election prior to April 15, 2003 and therefore a third temporary justice had to be appointed immediately. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R.

470, 473 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

By general court order, when the other justices are disqualified or have been recused or there is a special need to have a special justice from outside the court to hear a case to avoid the appearance of impropriety, the Chuuk Chief Justice may appoint special justices (who meet the same requirements for the appointment of an appellate division temporary justice) and assign cases to him. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 256 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court prefers to adopt the majority rule in the United States that a temporary judge cannot be a judge de facto, because a temporary judge merely serves for a particular case, whereas a judge de facto makes claim to a judicial office under color of authority. This majority rule, in defining a judge de facto, requires that a judge de facto have all of the qualifications to hold the office which he claims under color of authority, a requirement which cannot, as a matter of definition, apply to temporary judges, who have no claim to the office of judge de jure, but rather occupy it on a temporary basis, case by case. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 260 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court adopts the U.S. majority rule that an special trial justice appointed pursuant to Chuuk GCO 2-94 is a temporary judge, a judge pro hac vice de jure, and that if the promulgation of GCO 2-94 is unconstitutional, then all acts of the special trial justice in the cases to which he has been assigned, are void and a nullity. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Chuuk GCO 2-94 authorizing the appointment of special trial justices is a constitutional exercise of the Chief Justice's rule-making authority since there are no express constitutional limitations on that authority other than that permitting the Legislature to amend rules promulgated by the Chief Justice. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 263 & n.10 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

In order to qualify as a temporary justice on a Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division panel, the temporary justice must be either 1) a justice of the FSM Supreme Court, 2) a judge of a court of another FSM state, or 3) a qualified attorney in the State of Chuuk. Judges of other courts and qualified attorneys, are sufficiently competent in the law to sit as members of a Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate panel, regardless of their nationality or citizenship. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 264 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Chuuk Constitution provides no guidance, positively or negatively, regarding whether special trial justices are permissible, and if so, what their minimum qualifications must be. Absent any words of limitation in the constitution, the Chief Justice has and should maintain vigorously all the inherent and implied powers necessary to permit the judiciary to function properly and effectively as a separate department in the scheme of government. These inherent and implied powers include the power to adopt general court orders for the appointment of special trial justices and to establish minimum qualifications for those special justices which equal the qualifications for temporary appellate justices under the constitution. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

In appointing a special trial justice, the Chuuk Chief Justice is not appointing a temporary associate justice. A special trial justice, does not make any claim to the office of associate justice. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Litigants in a case presided over by a specially assigned justice are entitled to a justice who is no less independent than a permanent justice. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 586 (App. 2004).

If a specially assigned justice may be removed for any reason at Congress's discretion after serving 90 days of service in a case, then the justice is not independent. His rulings are subject to the legislative branch's supervision. The Constitution's framers intended to prevent this result by providing that a justice may only be removed for cause under the procedures set out in Article IX, Section 7. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 587 (App. 2004).

Congress may not remove at its discretion a justice temporarily assigned to a case any time after that justice has served 90 days because any such resolution and the statute upon which it is based, 4 F.S.M.C. 104(2) violate Article IX, Section 7 of the Constitution. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 587 (App. 2004).

A trial justice specially assigned to a case by the Chief Justice has no authority to assign that (or any case) to the Chief Justice even if he were not disqualified. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 640 (Chk. 2004).

The Chuuk Constitution does not include a provision allowing the Legislature to add further qualifications to those required for temporary appellate justices. FSM citizenship is not a constitutional requirement to be a temporary Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate justice. The Legislature thus cannot add it by statute. When the Constitution sets forth the requirements for office and does not authorize the Legislature to add further requirements, it is barred from doing so. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 141, 144, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The Legislature cannot add qualifications for appellate division justices to those found in the Chuuk Constitution, article VII, section 5(b). Thus the statutory requirements that a temporary appellate justice be either a graduate of an accredited law school in that jurisdiction or have at least twenty years experience practicing law, is contrary to the Chuuk Constitution and cannot be enforced. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 141, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

When all Chuuk State Supreme Court justices have been disqualified from presiding, an appellate panel will have to be constituted without a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice and with a temporarily-appointed justice to preside. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

There is no authority that would require the justice making the appointment of temporary Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division justices to make the appointments of temporary appellate justices in the order of seniority. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

It is proper for temporary justices, otherwise meeting the requirements of Chuuk Constitution Article VII, section 5(b), to constitute the full appellate panel and to preside over Chuuk State Supreme Court appeals if Chuuk State Supreme Court justices are disqualified or not readily available. Mori v. Haruo, 16 FSM R. 556, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

4 F.S.M.C. 124(2) by its own terms serves to disqualify a temporary justice only when the Congress taken an affirmative act of adopting a resolution after the justice has served at least three months, but 4 F.S.M.C. 124(2) cannot serve as a basis for disqualification of a temporary justice because the appellate division has ruled it to be in conflict with the FSM Constitution. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 51 (Pon. 2015).

Because the basis for the Urusemal v. Capelle court decision was its concern for safeguarding the independence of judicial decision making as envisioned in the FSM Constitution, the decision's reasoning is equally valid regardless of whether a temporary justice had previously sat on the FSM Supreme Court or is currently a judge of another court. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 51-52 (Pon. 2015).

FSM Supreme Court justices, even temporary justices, should be guided by permissible considerations rather than by one party's unsupported supposition that other justices would have ruled differently on a question of first impression. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 52 (Pon. 2015).

Since the Chief Justice is statutorily required to give notice to the President and the Congress upon the appointment of any temporary justice, the absence of an "order of assignment" is not improper when a missive from the Acting Chief Justice was duly dispatched to Congress, apprizing that body of his designation of a judge to preside over the matter because Congress has provided the Chief Justice with the statutory authority to appoint temporary justices and Congress acted under its Constitutional authority to provide this statutory authority to the judiciary, the court need not exercise its concurrent rule-making authority; and because there is no pertinent rule which mandates issuance of a separate "order of assignment." FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 227-28 (Chk. 2015).

Since the Chief Justice by rule may give special assignments to retired Supreme Court justices and judges of state and other courts; since judicial rules may be amended by statute; and since a statute already exists setting out the procedure for giving special assignments to retired Supreme Court justices and judges of state and other courts, the Chief Justice must follow that procedure. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 517 (App. 2018).

Since the Chief Justice by rule may give special assignments to retired Supreme Court justices and judges of state and other courts; since judicial rules may be amended by statute; and since a statute already exists setting out a procedure for giving special assignments to retired Supreme Court justices and judges of state and other courts, the Chief Justice must follow that procedure. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 550 (App. 2018).

The Chief Justice is required by statute to give notice to the President and the Congress upon the appointment of any temporary justice. While the concurrent issuance of a separate order of assignment, filed in the relevant case, may undoubtedly be the better practice, no law or rule requires it when the Chief Justice has appointed a temporary justice. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 550-51 (App. 2018).

– Judicial Immunity

The FSM Supreme Court is immune from an award of damages, pursuant to 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), arising from the performance by the Chief Justice of his constitutionally granted rule-making powers. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

The Chief Justice, in making rules, is performing a legislative function and is immune from an action for damages. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

The grant of immunity to the Chief Justice while performing his rule-making authority is to protect the independence of one exercising a constitutionally granted legislative power. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

A judge is generally granted absolute civil immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 391 (Pon. 1992).

A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two instances. A judge is not immune for actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity, and a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the absence of all jurisdiction. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 391 (Pon. 1992).

An act performed by a judge does not have to be an adjudicatory act in order for it to be a judicial act. Judges and justices of the courts of the Federated States of Micronesia are protected by the cloak of judicial absolute immunity for judicial functions performed unless they are in complete absence of jurisdiction. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 392-93 (Pon. 1992).

Judges and justices of the FSM are protected by the cloak of absolute immunity for judicial functions performed, unless the functions were performed in the complete absence of jurisdiction. Issuance of a search warrant is within the jurisdiction of FSM courts. Therefore it is a judicial act to which immunity attaches. Liwi v. Finn, 5 FSM R. 398, 400-01 (Pon. 1992).

A chief justice's actions in reviewing an attorney's application for admission is a judicial function that is entitled to absolute immunity from suit for damages. Berman v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 231, 240 (Pon. 1995).

A judge is generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two events: First, a judge is not immune from non-judicial actions, i.e. actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity. Second, a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 112 (Chk. 1999).

The factors determining whether an act by a judge is a judicial one relate to the nature of act itself, i.e., whether it is a function normally performed by a judge, and to the expectations of the parties, i.e., whether they dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity. The second question in deciding whether immunity exists is whether the judge acted in complete absence of all jurisdiction. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 112 (Chk. 1999).

Judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly. A judge is absolutely immune from liability for his judicial acts even if his exercise of authority is flawed by the commission of grave procedural errors. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 112 (Chk. 1999).

Judicial immunity does not apply against the imposition of prospective injunctive relief. The right to attorney's fees applies when prospective relief is granted against a judge pursuant to the civil rights statute. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 113 (Chk. 1999).

Judicial immunity protects from liability for punitive damages. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 113 (Chk. 1999).

A judge is generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. Few doctrines were more solidly established at common law than the immunity of judges for damages for acts committed within their judicial jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 121 (Pon. 2001).

Judges lose their judicial immunity only for non-judicial actions (actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity), or for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 121 (Pon. 2001).

Two factors, both relating to the nature of act itself, determine whether an act by a judge is a judicial one: whether it is a function normally performed by a judge, and whether the parties dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity. The second question in deciding whether immunity exists is whether the judge acted in complete absence of all jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 121 (Pon. 2001).

Issuance of appellate opinions is a function normally performed by judges, and the timing of a decision is normally, if not always, a judicial decision. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 121 (Pon. 2001).

In order to determine whether a judge is liable for damages for his actions, the court asks whether the judge was performing judicial acts and whether his court had jurisdiction. When the answer to both questions is yes, the judge was not acting in complete absence of all jurisdiction, even when he had clearly acted in excess of his jurisdiction, and the judge was therefore immune from any suit for compensatory or punitive damages for his actions, but that does not end the inquiry. When the plaintiff had obtained permanent prospective injunctive relief against the judge under the civil rights act, it was entitled to the attorney's fees and costs incurred in obtaining that relief in that case, but not for any expenses incurred in the state court case in which the judge had exceeded his jurisdiction even though the FSM Supreme Court had to enjoin him from conducting any further proceedings in it. Ruben v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 605, 608 (Chk. 2008).

When the defendant state court judge's actions upon which the plaintiffs base this suit were judicial in nature and the state court is a court of general jurisdiction, which would have had the jurisdiction to consider a motion for relief of judgment if one had been filed, the judge did not act in complete absence of jurisdiction. But when he did clearly act grossly in excess of his jurisdiction and when the plaintiffs obtained permanent prospective relief against him in this case, they are entitled to their expenses including attorney's fees and costs under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) for bringing this action and are thus entitled to judgment as a matter of law on their civil rights claim for attorney's fees and costs. The costs and fees allowed will be for work in this case and not that for work in the related state court cases. Ruben v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 605, 608-09 (Chk. 2008).

A judge is generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two events: First, a judge is not immune from non-judicial actions, i.e. actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity. Second, a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

Few doctrines were more solidly established at common law than the immunity of judges for damages for acts committed within their judicial jurisdiction. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

When analyzing whether a judge was performing judicial acts, the factors determining whether an act by a judge is a "judicial" one relate to the nature of act itself (whether it is a function normally performed by a judge) and to the expectations of the parties (whether they dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity). Issuing eviction orders, denying motions, and the like are all acts or functions normally performed by a judge. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

When the Pohnpei Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction and when it is undisputed that the Pohnpei Supreme Court has jurisdiction over cases that the plaintiff filed there since she filed those cases there for the very reason that that court had jurisdiction, the plaintiff cannot allege that a Pohnpei justice acted in complete absence of jurisdiction when he issued orders in her cases even though she clearly alleges that he acted in excess of his jurisdiction. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

Judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly, and a judge is absolutely immune from liability for his judicial acts even if his exercise of authority is flawed by the commission of grave procedural errors. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

Since a judge is absolutely immune from liability for his judicial acts even if those acts were done maliciously or corruptly or in excess of his jurisdiction or if his exercise of authority was flawed by the commission of grave procedural errors, he is thus immune from a plaintiff's compensatory damages claims. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 233 (Pon. 2012).

Judicial immunity does not prevent a judge from being subject to prospective injunctive relief when the judge has acted, not in complete absence of jurisdiction, but in excess of jurisdiction. Judicial immunity does not apply against the imposition of prospective injunctive relief because no common law precedent ever granted such immunity. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 233 (Pon. 2012).

When a Pohnpei Supreme Court judge is immune from suit and thus from the imposition of compensatory damages, the compensatory damages claims against him must be dismissed. But when the plaintiff's factual allegations against the judge, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, are claims that the judge acted in excess of his jurisdiction and violated the plaintiff's civil rights in doing so, the court will not dismiss her claims against the judge for injunctive relief and for 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) reasonable attorney's fees and costs incurred in obtaining that relief, since she alleges sufficient facts which, if proven that the judge acted in excess of his jurisdiction, state a claim for which the FSM Supreme Court can grant her some relief. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 233-34 (Pon. 2012).

Judges are generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. Few common law doctrines were more solidly established than a judge's immunity for damages for acts committed within his judicial jurisdiction. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two events: first, a judge is not immune from non-judicial actions, i.e. actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity; and second, a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. The first question is whether the acts were judicial. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

The factors determining whether an act by a judge is a "judicial" one and therefore one for which the judge is immune from civil liability relate to the nature of act itself, i.e., whether it is a function normally performed by a judge, and to the expectations of the parties, i.e., whether they dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity. The issuance of a bench warrant; the contempt finding; and, under U's constitutional setup, the impeachment trial, the conviction, the denial of the substitution of counsel, and the defendant's removal from office were all judicial acts, taken in a judicial capacity. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

The second question in deciding whether judicial immunity exists is whether the judge acted in complete absence of all jurisdiction because judges cannot be held civilly liable for their judicial acts, even when those acts were in excess of their jurisdiction, or are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly, and judges are also absolutely immune from civil liability when they committed grave procedural errors in their exercise of authority. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

A Pohnpei Supreme Court justice is generally immune from suit and from the imposition of money damages. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 67 (Pon. 2018).

Judges are generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 67 (Pon. 2018).

A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two events: 1) a judge is not immune from non-judicial actions, – actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity, and 2) a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 67-68 (Pon. 2018).

A Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division single justice's failure to rule on a motion for a stay of sentence is an act of a judicial nature and the grant or denial of a stay is an act wholly within the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division's jurisdiction. Thus, if the plaintiff were suing the single justice who failed to rule on his motion to stay, that justice would be immune from this suit for money damages, regardless of whether those damages were compensatory, nominal, or punitive. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 68 (Pon. 2018).

A plaintiff, no matter how worthy, cannot avoid the cloak of judicial immunity by suing the court where the judge sits instead of suing the immune judge. Higgins v. Pohnpei Supreme Court App. Div., 22 FSM R. 63, 68 (Pon. 2018).

The FSM Supreme Court would look upon a true negligence suit against the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure with great disfavor because, when a defendant is found negligent, the remedy is money damages, and because the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure is a court, and, as a court, it is immune from a suit for money damages for its judicial acts. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 119 n.12 (App. 2018).

– Records

A court's inherent supervisory power over its own records includes the discretion to seal those records if it determines that the public's right to access is outweighed by legitimate competing needs for privacy and confidentiality. In re Property of Doe, 6 FSM R. 606, 607 (Pon. 1994).

A court will use a three step process designed to protect the public's interest in access to the its files to determine whether the records should be sealed: 1) the court will give the public adequate notice that the judicial records in question may be sealed; 2) the court will give all interested persons an opportunity to object; and 3) if, after considering all objections, the court decides that the records should be sealed, it will seal those records and state on the record the reasons supporting its decision. In re Property of Doe, 6 FSM R. 606, 607 (Pon. 1994).

When the court has posted public notices throughout the state and no member of the public, nor any interested party, objected, and the court has found good cause shown, the records in a case may be sealed. In re Property of Doe, 6 FSM R. 606, 607 (Pon. 1994).

Just as the courts in the judiciary confirm their role in society by adjudicating claims in civil matters, so to must the land commission. When a court fails to provide an adequate record of its proceedings, the role of the judiciary fails. Because claims over land are of no lesser importance than claims in civil matters, the requirement of a full and complete record applies to the land commission. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 493 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

It is the Kosrae State Court's statutory duty to certify Certificates of Live Birth and when the court has information that items on the certificate are incorrect, it will refuse to certify the certificate. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 244 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The subject himself cannot provide the factual basis for the date of his birth, as his knowledge of this information is based upon hearsay only. A person does not have personal knowledge of his date of birth. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 245 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Notarization of a document does not establish truth to the statements made in the document: notarization only verifies the identity and signature of the person who signed the document. Consequently, notarization of a document by a court employee does not represent any court endorsement or certification of the statements made in the document. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 245 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Certificate of Live Birth is a document with critical legal importance. It forms the foundation upon which other important legal documents are issued. Therefore, the Certificate of Live Birth must be issued in accordance with a procedure, based upon credible factual information supporting the person's date of birth and other information entered on the certificate. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 301, 302-03 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In order to protect the validity and reliability of birth certificates issued by the Kosrae state hospital, the hospital is ordered to issue a Certificate of Live Birth when the necessary information is properly authenticated and verified. The subject person of the certificate may not provide the only information that is relied upon by the hospital. The hospital shall review existing hospital records, other government records and other reliable records to establish the accuracy of information entered into each Certificate of Live Birth. Certificates which do not contain accurate information shall not be certified by the Kosrae State Court. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 301, 303 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In Kosrae small claims, a docket card is kept showing the pleadings, actions of the court, payments, or other reports and this docket card ordinarily constitutes the entire record. The plaintiff may state the nature and amount of the claim to the clerk who notes this on the docket card and the plaintiff signs this which, under the Small Claims Rules, constitutes the complaint. No other written pleading is required unless the court orders otherwise. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Simon, 16 FSM R. 636, 641 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

– Recusal

No judge should sit in a case in which he is personally involved. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 262 (Pon. 1983).

Canon 3C of the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct applies in the FSM by virtue of 4 F.S.M.C. 122. There is no hint that Canon 3C as incorporated by the Judiciary Act of 1979, and 4 F.S.M.C. 124, were intended by Congress to have different meanings here. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 471 n.2 (Kos. 1984).

One guide to the kinds of facts which could lead a disinterested reasonable observer to harbor doubts about a judge's impartiality is 4 F.S.M.C. 124(2). FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 475 (Kos. 1984).

4 F.S.M.C. 124(2) prescribes a subjective test under which a judge must disqualify himself if he subjectively concludes that he falls within the statutory provisions. Section 124(1), on the other hand provides an objective standard designed to guard against the appearance of impartiality. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 476 (Kos. 1984).

The bar against "public comment" by a judge regarding a case in trial, contained in 4 F.S.M.C. 122 and Canon 3A(6) of the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct, is not violated by a trial court judge's encouraging a representative of the national official newspaper to publish his opinion on a motion for recusal, and such encouragement does not demonstrate partiality requiring recusal. Skilling v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 209, 215 (App. 1986).

The trial judge is justified in denying a motion for recusal on the basis of failure of the moving party to file an affidavit explaining the factual basis for the motion. Skilling v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 209, 216-17 (App. 1986).

The trial court judge's act of encouraging publication of his opinion on a motion for recusal in a national official newspaper, taken together with 1) the fining of defense counsel for tardiness, 2) the length of the sentence imposed, 3) the judge's comments about community support for defendant, explaining how that factor was taken into account in sentencing, and 4) the accelerated pace of sentencing proceedings, which was not contemporaneously objected to by defense counsel, do not indicate an abuse of discretion by the judge in denying the motion for recusal. Skilling v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 209, 217 (App. 1986).

The normal situation in which recusal may be required is when a judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship or dealings with a party or the judge's own personal or financial interests, might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could preside over and decide a particular case impartially. In re Main, 4 FSM R. 255, 260 (App. 1990).

If a judge has participated as an advocate in related litigation touching upon the same parties, and in the course of that previous activity has taken a position concerning the issue now before him as a judge, the appearance of justice, as guaranteed by Due Process Clause, requires recusal. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 43 (App. 1991).

To prevent the "probability of unfairness," a former trial counselor or attorney must refrain from presiding as a trial judge over litigation involving his former client, and many of the same issues, and the same interests and the same land, with which the trial judge has been intimately involved as a trial counselor or attorney. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 45 (App. 1991).

Even when sufficient allegations have not been made, a judge may disqualify himself if he believes sufficient grounds exist. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 266, 271 (Pon. 1992).

In order to overturn the trial judge's denial of a motion to recuse, the appellant must show an abuse of discretion by the trial judge. The appellate court will not merely substitute its judgment for that of the trial judge. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 326, 330 (App. 1992).

Even if neither party alleges or moves for disqualification a judge may disqualify himself if he believes sufficient grounds exist. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 385, 387 (Pon. 1992).

Before a judge disqualifies himself from a case he should also consider whether his disqualification will cause considerable delay, require substantial expense and effort, and cause undue disruption in the advancement of the matter. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 385, 387 (Pon. 1992).

Pursuant to Kosrae statute, judges of the Kosrae State Court are subject to the standards of the Code of Judicial Conduct approved by the American Bar Association. A trial judge who owns one or two shares in the plaintiff credit union must follow these standards in deciding whether to recuse himself. Waguk v. Kosrae Island Credit Union, 6 FSM R. 14, 16-17 (App. 1993).

A justice who was a member of a body that negotiated the Compact and related agreements and who was the one member that signed the Compact and Extradition Agreement is not disqualified from presiding over an extradition proceeding by the circumstance of that participation on the ground that his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 97-98 (App. 1993).

In order for a justice to be recused for an interest in the subject matter in controversy not only must the justice have an interest, but also it must be such that the interest could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (I), 6 FSM R. 318, 321 (Pon. 1994).

A litigant's unsupported allegations that the trial judge may have subconscious misgivings is speculation and is insufficient to support the judge's disqualification. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (I), 6 FSM R. 318, 322 (Pon. 1994).

In order for a writ of prohibition to issue to require a judge to recuse himself it must be an abuse of discretion for the judge not to recuse himself. Where it is not apparent what interest of the judge could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding or that the judge is biased or prejudiced the writ will not issue. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 1995).

Normally a judge will not be disqualified when after the case has been submitted for decision a party files an unrelated lawsuit against the judge. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 52, 55 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

A judge shall disqualify himself where he has served in governmental employment and in such capacity participated as counsel, adviser, or material witness concerning the proceeding or expressed an opinion concerning the merits of the particular case in controversy. Fu Zhou Fuyan Pelagic Fishery Co. v. Wang Shun Ren, 7 FSM R. 601, 604 (Pon. 1996).

A judge whose governmental employment ended before the facts arose that gave rise to the case in front of him is not disqualified from the case because he did not act as an adviser to or was a material witness to the agreement at issue. Fu Zhou Fuyan Pelagic Fishery Co. v. Wang Shun Ren, 7 FSM R. 601, 604 (Pon. 1996).

The standard to be applied in reviewing a request for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is whether a disinterested reasonable observer who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. A motion for disqualification must be supported by an affidavit which clearly sets forth the factual basis for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist. Fu Zhou Fuyan Pelagic Fishery Co. v. Wang Shun Ren, 7 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 1996).

The power of a justice to recuse himself must be exercised conscientiously, and should not be employed merely to accommodate or placate nervous litigants or counsel. A party's speculation about the justice's unconscious frame of mind is insufficient to create a basis for disqualification. Fu Zhou Fuyan Pelagic Fishery Co. v. Wang Shun Ren, 7 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 1996).

A due process challenge to a criminal contempt charge on the ground of the court's or its personnel's actions may be resolved by the judge's recusal and reassignment of the case to a judge whose impartiality has not been questioned. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 638-39 (Chk. 1996).

Because a judge has a ministerial, non-discretionary duty to state on the record his reasons for denying a motion to disqualify himself a writ of prohibition may issue to prevent him from proceeding further on a case until he has done so. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Trial Division, 7 FSM R. 642, 643 (App. 1996).

A judge whose governmental employment ended before the events occurred that gave rise to the criminal case in front of him is not disqualified from the case because he did not act as an adviser to or was a material witness to the agreement at issue. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 644, 649-51 (Pon. 1996).

A trial judge's discretion is limited by the disqualification statute, 4 F.S.M.C. 124, which prescribes under what circumstances he "shall disqualify himself." Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1997).

A judge who sat on an appellate panel that reversed a criminal conviction on the ground of ineffective assistance of counsel is not necessarily disqualified from presiding over the retrial or a later appeal. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

Merely because the trial judge was once the sole official whose responsibility it was to sign a fishing agreement that contained similar and identical terms to a later agreement at issue in a case now before him is insufficient ground to disqualify him from trying this case. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 7 (App. 1997).

The general rule is that the disqualifying factors must be from an extrajudicial source. The normal situation in which recusal may be required is when a judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship or dealings with a party, or the judge's own personal or financial interests, might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could preside over and decide a particular case impartially. Even so, the judge may be disqualified from presiding further after a reversal if actual bias or prejudice or an appearance of partiality exists. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 7 (App. 1997).

A judge is not required to recuse himself from a retrial of convictions reversed because of ineffective assistance of counsel where one of his factual findings from the first trial relied upon an independent ground as well as arguably inadmissible evidence when the appellate court never ruled that the finding was clearly erroneous. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 8 (App. 1997).

A trial judge's view which the appellate court cannot be said to have been determined to be erroneous or based on evidence that must be rejected will not require his recusal from the retrial. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 9 (App. 1997).

When disqualification is not required in order to insure retrial before an impartial judge the fact that reassignment would entail minor waste and inconvenience would not change the result. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 9 (App. 1997).

A judge who represented a party in an earlier action involving the identical claim is required to recuse himself from the case. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 8 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 1998).

It is a due process violation for a former trial counselor or attorney to preside as a trial judge over litigation involving the same issues and interests he had been intimately involved with as a trial counselor or attorney, particularly where he had represented one of the litigants. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 8 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 1998).

A party has a due process right to a hearing before an unbiased judge and a judge without an interest in the case's outcome. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 8 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 1998).

When all Chuuk State Supreme Court justices have been disqualified from presiding, an appellate panel will have to be constituted without a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice and with a temporarily-appointed justice to preside. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

A justice's power to recuse himself must be exercised concientiously, and should not be used merely to accommodate nervous litigants or counsel. Kosrae State Code, § 6.1202 establishes the standards of conduct for Kosrae state justices, which includes the Code of Judicial Conduct of the American Bar Association. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 657 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Even if a judge has commented on certain issues of law when he was a government employee, the judge is not disqualified, so long as he has not prejudged the particular case before him. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 657 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The power of a justice to recuse himself must be exercised conscientiously, and should not be used merely to accommodate nervous litigants or counsel. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 133, 136 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A justice is not required to recuse himself due to his former position as governor at the time that the plaintiff was moved into the teacher position in question. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 184-85 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a motion is included with an alternative motion to recuse the judge it is proper to consider the motion to recuse first even though the motion to recuse is termed an "alternative" because, except for purely procedural or housekeeping matters, once a motion to recuse has been filed, it must be ruled on and reasons given before the judge may proceed further. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 429 (Chk. 2003).

Generally, neither counsel nor a party may seek recusal of a judge by announcing that they intend to call the judge as a witness. The general rule is that since a court speaks only through its journal, a judge cannot testify about the meaning or intent of his decision in a case or explain aspects of the decision further. Nor can a judge be called to testify as to secret or unexplained reasons which led him to decide a case in a certain manner. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 429 (Chk. 2003).

Attempts to disqualify judges by indicating that the judge will be called as a witness are not favored and are rarely granted. Such an easy method of disqualifying a judge should not be encouraged or allowed. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 430 (Chk. 2003).

The prohibition against compelling a judge's testimony is reflected in a long-standing principle that a court speaks only through its orders. This ban on judges testifying has limits. Those limits are that a judge must be acting as a judge, and that it is information regarding his or her role as a judge that is sought. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 430 (Chk. 2003).

When it is the judge's actions as a judge issuing a search warrant that a party would have the judge testify about, the judge is not a potential witness concerning his issuance of a search warrant, and thus this cannot be a ground to grant the recusal motion. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 430 (Chk. 2003).

A Kosrae State Court judge's failure to disqualify himself, even though he was not asked to, does not constitute plain error requiring the appellate court to vacate and remand the matter to the Kosrae State Court when the case was not the same controversy as the case in which the judge had earlier acted as counsel because that case involved different land and different parties and its only apparent connection with this case was a will, but that will is inapplicable in this case and the prior case was dismissed on res judicata grounds without ever reaching any issues concerning the will. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 286 (App. 2003).

Unsolicited letters from the public, expressing their views or requests on matters pending before the court, without anything more, cannot form the basis for disqualification of the justice to whom the letter was addressed. Unsupported allegations that the presiding judge may be influenced by an unsolicited letter is speculation and is insufficient to support the judge's disqualification. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 55, 59 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the trial judge is an unnamed member of a plaintiff class in another case, represented by the same counsel as the plaintiff in this case and defendant's counsel had notice of that more than one year before making a motion to recuse under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), and since a basis for a motion brought under section 124(1) is subject to waiver under section 4 F.S.M.C. 124(5), the basis for the judge's recusal was waived. Amayo v. MJ Co., 13 FSM R. 242, 248-49 (Pon. 2005).

Kosrae Land Court justices are required to adhere to the provisions of the Code of Judicial Conduct of the American Bar Association, which specifies that a justice is required to disqualify himself in all proceedings in which the justice's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Isaac v. Saimon, 14 FSM R. 33, 35 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

That the judge has other criminal cases pending which he has not completed, and has granted continuances in other cases are meritless grounds to recuse the judge from sentencing the defendant on his final day as a judge when those matters are unrelated to this case and trial had been completed and the only action left is the imposition of sentence. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 126-27 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

For the purpose of a recusal motion, a temporary justice is considered an FSM justice to whom 4 F.S.M.C. 124 applies. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 303, 304 n.1 (App. 2006).

For the purpose of a recusal motion, a temporary justice is considered an FSM justice to which 4 F.S.M.C. 124 applies. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 305, 308 n.3 (App. 2006).

Kosrae state judges are subject to the 2000 version of the American Bar Association Code of Judicial Conduct as the basis for judicial ethics and disqualification because the State Code adopted by reference and applied to Kosrae judges the 1984 edition of the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct but allowed the Kosrae Chief Justice, by rule, to make the judicial conduct requirements stricter or to establish other standards consistent with the Code of Judicial Conduct, which was done through Kosrae General Court Order 2003-02 adopting the 2000 version of the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503 & n.1 (App. 2011).

If a presiding Land Court judge fails to recuse himself when he is required to, it is a due process violation and the matter must be remanded to the Kosrae Land Court with instructions and guidance for re-hearing the matter. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503-04 (App. 2011).

If the Kosrae Chief Justice sits on a case in the Land Court and his decision is later appealed to the Kosrae State Court, the Chief Justice must then have no involvement in the case in the Kosrae State Court and the Kosrae State Court appeal would necessarily be handled by another justice. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 195 (App. 2013).

The general rule is that the disqualifying factors must be from an extrajudicial source, and the normal situation in which a judge's disqualification may be required is when a judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship or dealings with a party, or the judge's own personal or financial interests, might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could preside over and decide a particular case impartially. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 195 (App. 2013).

A motion to disqualify a judge based on the judge's health is not a motion based on any of the grounds for disqualification listed in 4 F.S.M.C. 124, the FSM disqualification statute. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 157, 159 (Kos. 2015).

All motions to disqualify a judge under 4 F.S.M.C. 124 must be filed before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown for filing it at a later time. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 157, 159 (Kos. 2015).

When a judge's health issues and physical limitations have been widely known or apparent for some time, including to the movant's counsel, a motion to disqualify a judge made only after an adverse final judgment has been rendered must be denied. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 157, 159-60 (Kos. 2015).

A reasonable disinterested observer would require more evidence than that the judge and staff stayed at the same hotel as a defendant and his counsel and speculation concerning the defendant's activities. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. 2015).

The mere fact that a presiding justice happens to be a "Palau Justice," ruling on a matter in the FSM, is inconsequential, and an unsupported allegation that the jurist may not be privy to supposed peculiar nuances of FSM law, constitutes rank speculation and is insufficient to support the justice's disqualification. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 229 (Chk. 2015).

When the movants have not shown a factual basis for an appearance of impropriety, in terms of the judge overseeing two separate cases involving the same party or shown a lack of competency to rule on FSM matters and as a result, the motion to disqualify the judge will be denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 229 (Chk. 2015).

Disqualification of a Supreme Court trial division justice is governed by 4 F.S.M.C. 124, which in § 124(1) requires disqualification if the justice's impartiality could reasonably be questioned, and in § 124(2) requires a justice's disqualification if the justice concludes that he falls within the statutory provisions, and in § 124(2)(a) requires disqualification when the justice has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party or his counsel, or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 248 (App. 2015).

In order for the Supreme Court to issue an extraordinary writ of prohibition overruling a trial judge's denial of a motion to disqualify, the trial judge's ruling must be an abuse of discretion. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 248, 250 (App. 2015).

When a party moves to disqualify a trial judge, the party is attacking that judge's perceived bias or conflict of interest. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 249 (App. 2015).

A petitioner seeking a writ of prohibition to disqualify a trial judge must show an abuse of discretion, as the appellate court will not merely substitute its judgment for that of the trial judge. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

A petition for a writ of prohibition to disqualify a trial judge will be denied when it neither meets the burden of showing the that the judge harbors bias or prejudice nor shows that any disqualifying knowledge was derived from an extrajudicial source since the mere fact that the judge made an adverse evidentiary ruling and declared a mistrial does not mean the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 251 (App. 2015).

A defendant whose trial ended in a mistrial is entitled to a new trial, but not a new judge. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 251 (App. 2015).

The applicable recusal statute requires that a Supreme Court justice disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

The standard for disqualification in a proceeding is whether a disinterested reasonable person, knowing all the circumstances, would harbor doubts about a judge's impartiality. There is a presumption that judicial officers are unbiased and the burden of proof rests with the party asserting an unconstitutional bias to demonstrate otherwise. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

A typical situation where recusal may be required is when a sitting judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship, or dealings with a party or the judge's own personal or financial interests might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could impartially preside over and decide a particular case. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

In an issue of first impression, U.S. court decisions about judicial disqualification can be used for guidance. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 607 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

A writ of prohibition clearly should not be granted based on a judge's adverse ruling that did not even remain adverse when the justice changed her mind and on factors that arose as part of the give and take during a contentious oral hearing on a controversial topic. Peterson v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 657, 659 (App. 2016).

Under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a Supreme Court justice must disqualify himself in any proceeding where his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. The standard for disqualification is whether a disinterested reasonable person, knowing all the circumstances, would harbor doubts about a judge's impartiality. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 45 (App. 2016).

Accepting a loan from a lending institution in its regular course of business on the same terms available to the general public, is fully consistent with a judge's obligation to conduct personal activities so as to minimize the risk of conflicts that would result in frequent disqualifications. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 49 (App. 2016).

When a consumer loan was issued to the judge well before he was appointed to the appellate panel; when the bank does not aver any special circumstances necessitating the judge's disqualification since the loan was issued on standard terms available to the general public and were negotiated before his designation to the panel; and when the loan is current and not in default or delinquent nor at risk thereof, and is not currently being negotiated for extension, restructuring, or refinancing, the bank has not overcome the presumption that a judicial official is unbiased. Without more, a judge's consumer loan and the mere relationship between the bank and the judge as creditor-debtor, is insufficient to require the judge's disqualification. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 50 (App. 2016).

The Chuuk State Judiciary Act prohibits justices from presiding over matters when there is a general concern that his or her impartiality might reasonably be questioned, and it also sets forth more specific disqualifying circumstances including where the justice has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or his counsel, or personal knowledge of dispute evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Selifis v. Robert, 21 FSM R. 344, 346 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2017).

Often a litigant will not know which judge has been assigned the case until that judge either issues his or her first written order or appears on the bench at the case's first hearing. That is when, if there are grounds for the motion, a litigant would usually move to disqualify the judge. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 517 (App. 2018).

Although 4 F.S.M.C. 124 and the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct as made applicable to the FSM Supreme Court by 4 F.S.M.C. 122 define the circumstances that mandate the disqualification of FSM Supreme Court justices, those provisions neither prescribe nor prohibit any particular remedy for a violation of that duty. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 521 (App. 2018).

A conclusion that a violation of the recusal statute occurred does not end the inquiry. As in other areas of the law, there is surely room for harmless error, and there need not be a draconian remedy for every violation. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 521 (App. 2018).

A disqualified judge may perform purely ministerial tasks. An act is ministerial when the law requires that a duty be performed and leaves nothing to the exercise of discretion or judgment. Discretionary acts are those in which one has the right to determine between two or more courses of action. Simply put, an act which one must perform is ministerial, while an act which one may perform is discretionary. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 521 (App. 2018).

A disqualified judge is not prevented from making orders that are purely formal in character and may also issue housekeeping orders. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 521 (App. 2018).

When an order transferring title was in the nature of a ministerial or a housekeeping act because the justice did not have the discretion not to issue it since its prompt issuance once the successful qualified bidder had paid in full was mandated by an earlier order in aid of judgment that an order issue to transfer title so that the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure could then perform its duties; and when, if another judge had been presented with the motion, the resulting order would not differ, the disqualified justice's order will not be vacated. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 521-22 (App. 2018).

A disqualified judge may perform purely ministerial tasks. An act is ministerial when the law requires that a duty be performed and leaves nothing to the exercise of discretion or judgment. Discretionary acts are those in which one has the right to determine between two or more courses of action. Simply put, an act which one must perform is ministerial, while an act which one may perform is discretionary. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 559 (App. 2018).

A disqualified judge is not thereby prevented from making orders that are purely formal in character, including issuing housekeeping orders. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 559 (App. 2018).

When a judge has sat in violation of an express statutory standard for disqualification, the usual remedy is that the disqualified judge's rulings are, on appeal, to be vacated. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 560 (App. 2018).

A party's delay cannot, by itself, create a ground for that party to move for judicial disqualification. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 111 n.3 (App. 2018).

The appellate court will disregard a contention that the appellants believe that the same FSM Supreme Court law clerk, who worked on their other trial court cases, worked on this case in the trial court when they do not explain how this would entitle them to any relief and when they do not point to any reason that disqualified this particular law clerk from assisting the FSM Supreme Court trial judge in this case. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 118 (App. 2018).

A motion to disqualify the judge should be addressed first. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R.

175, 180 (Pon. 2019).

A statement that something is "likely" is speculation. Allegations, that are purely speculative, are insufficient to support a judge's disqualification. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 320 n.1 (Chk. 2019).

Law clerks are generally bound by the same ethical rules as the judges they serve. The clerk is forbidden to do all that is prohibited to the judge. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 363 (Pon. 2019).

– Recusal – Bias or Partiality

Determination of a judge's bias, prejudice or partiality should be made on the basis of conduct or information which is extrajudicial in nature. FSM v. Jonas (II), 1 FSM R. 306, 317-18 (Pon. 1983).

The fact that answers given by the victim-witness in response to questions posed by the judge happened to strengthen the government's case did not, by itself, indicate that the judge was impermissibly helping the prosecution, or that he was biased against the defendant. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 446 (App. 1984).

Due process demands impartiality on the part of adjudicators. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 362 (Pon. 1983).

There is a presumption that a judicial or quasi-judicial official is unbiased. The burden is placed on the party asserting the unconstitutional bias. The presumption of neutrality can be rebutted by a showing of conflict of interest or some other specific reason for disqualification. When disqualification occurs, it is usually because the adjudicator has a pecuniary interest in the outcome or has been the target of personal abuse or criticism from the party before him. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 362-63 (Pon. 1983).

A judge has a duty to disqualify himself from presiding in a proceeding in which he entertains a bias or prejudice against a party. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 444 (App. 1984).

Questioning a judge's impartiality, under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), brings into issue possible favoritism, bias or some other interest of the judge for or against a party. This affords no basis, however, for disqualifying a judge because of his general attitudes, beliefs, or philosophy, even where it is apparent that those do not augur well for a particular litigant. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 472-73 (Kos. 1984).

In order that a judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned there must be facts or reasons which furnish a rational basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. Reasonableness is to be considered from the perspective of a disinterested reasonable person. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 475 (Kos. 1984).

The test for determining if a judge's impartiality in a proceeding might reasonably be questioned is whether a disinterested reasonable person, knowing all the circumstances, would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 475 (Kos. 1984).

4 F.S.M.C. 124(2) prescribes a subjective test under which a judge must disqualify himself if he subjectively concludes that he falls within the statutory provisions. Section 124(1), on the other hand provides an objective standard designed to guard against the appearance of impartiality. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 476 (Kos. 1984).

4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) was designed to cover contingencies not foreseen by the draftsmen who set out specific grounds for disqualification in section 124(2). Despite its "catch all" nature, however, it remains necessary to show a factual basis, not just wide-ranging speculation or conclusions, for questioning a judge's impartiality. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 476-77 (Kos. 1984).

Courts normally adhere to the rule that any alleged judicial bias and prejudice, to be disqualifying, must stem from an extrajudicial source. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 483 (Kos. 1984).

Where a trial justice is asked to recuse himself rather than continue to sit on remaining counts after receiving testimony concerning stricken counts, the issue presented is whether there exists either actual bias, or prejudice, or appearance of partiality. Jonas v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 238, 239 (App. 1986).

To apply a standard of judicial ethics established by statute in 1982 to prevent a judge in 1989 from presiding over a case because his conduct prior to 1982 suggests that he now may be biased against the party seeking recusal would be inappropriate, in the nature of an ex post facto violation, and would be contrary to "the policy favoring prospective application of court decisions [which] also applies to statutes." Adams v. Etscheit, 4 FSM R. 237, 240 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Recusal of a trial judge from presiding over a criminal trial, because he has presided over a failed effort to end the case through a guilty plea, is not automatic, since bias, to be disqualifying, generally must stem from an extrajudicial source. In re Main, 4 FSM R. 255, 260 (App. 1990).

In determining whether a judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, the test is whether a disinterested reasonable person who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. A reasonable disinterested observer would require more evidence than that one of the parties was seen at hotel where the judge had checked in. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 266, 270 (Pon. 1992).

In order for a judge's personal bias or prejudice to be disqualifying it must stem from an extrajudicial source or conduct, not from information learned or events occurring during the course of a trial. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 385, 387 (Pon. 1992).

Even where the circumstance does not give rise to a reasonable person questioning the justice's impartiality, if there is evidence of actual partiality disqualification would follow. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 98 (App. 1993).

Where trial justice resides in housing rented by the national government and assigned to the trial justice as a statutory part of his compensation and the party before the court only seeks a monetary award for the alleged loss of the land upon which the trial justice resides the trial justice has no interest which might be substantially affected by any of the relief requested. It is therefore not an abuse of the trial justice's discretion to deny a motion to recuse for interest or bias. Nahnken of Nett v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 339, 340 (App. 1994).

For the questioning of a judge's impartiality to be reasonable it must be grounded upon facts or reasons which furnish a rational basis for doubting the judge's impartiality, and such reasonableness is not to be considered from the perspective of the litigant or of the judge, but of the disinterested reasonable observer. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 52, 54 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

A judge's impartiality cannot reasonably be questioned when the judge had been chairman of an agency while it concluded an agreement with a party to a case now before him where only a later agreement is at issue and he had no part in negotiating the first agreement. Fu Zhou Fuyan Pelagic Fishery Co. v. Wang Shun Ren, 7 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 1996).

Statements and rulings made by a judge in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). There is a presumption that judicial officials are unbiased, and the burden of proof is on the party asserting an unconstitutional bias to demonstrate otherwise. A party requesting recusal on retrial must establish that actual bias or prejudice exists that comes from an extrajudicial source. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 644, 649 (Pon. 1996).

Because a judicial official is presumed to be unbiased, a judge will not be required to recuse himself where the party seeking his recusal relies on presumptions and has not established a sufficient factual basis. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 6 (App. 1997).

A charge of appearance of partiality must first have a factual basis. Recusal is then appropriate only if a disinterested reasonable person who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. The facts must provide what an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. The trial judge has a range of discretion in making this determination. But a trial judge is not to use the standard of mere suspicion. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 6-7 (App. 1997).

There may be times when each of the grounds raised are insufficient to reasonably question the trial judge's impartiality, but the combination of all would cause a reasonable, disinterested person to harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 10 (App. 1997).

A justice whose extrajudicial statements exhibit a bias towards a party's counsel must disqualify himself under Pohnpei statute, and failure to do so is a denial of due process. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 8 FSM R. 23, 27-28 (App. 1997).

The type of partiality at which 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is aimed is extrajudicial bias, or bias resulting from information received by the judge outside of the judicial proceeding or proceedings in which the judge has participated. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 96 (App. 2001).

It is not unusual for the same judge to hear interrelated matters involving one or more parties in common, and the fact that the same judge hears different cases involving the same party or parties and related issues does not automatically result in an appearance of partiality under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 & n.5 (App. 2001).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 98 (App. 2001).

Claims that a trial justice has shown disfavor toward intervenors' counsel, or bias in rulings in the instant case or other cases can be dismissed as failing to provide valid grounds for disqualification. Kristoph v. Emin, 10 FSM R. 650, 654 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A party is entitled to an unbiased judge, not to a judge of their choosing. A party is not permitted to use a motion to disqualify a judge as a means of forum shopping. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 657 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Code of Judicial Conduct requires that a judge disqualify himself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 658 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias, a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 658-59 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A party is entitled to an unbiased judge, not to a judge of their choosing. A party is not permitted to use a motion to disqualify a judge as a means of judge shopping. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 133, 135-36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Code of Judicial Conduct requires that a judge disqualify himself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality must reasonably be questioned. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 133, 136 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Even when a judge has had prior opinions regarding a legal issue, this alone does not disqualify a judge, and even if a judge has commented on certain issues of law when he was a government employee, the judge is not disqualified so long as he has not prejudged the particular case before him. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 133, 137 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias, a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 133, 137 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The applicable recusal statute requires that a Supreme Court justice disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 430 (Chk. 2003).

Ex parte applications are allowed (and are usual) for warrant applications or motions to file under seal. No inference of a judge's partiality may be drawn from them. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 431 (Chk. 2003).

The type of partiality at which 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is aimed is extrajudicial, that is, resulting from information received by the judge outside of the judicial proceeding or proceedings in which the judge has participated. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 431 (Chk. 2003).

When the communications in question were not extrajudicial, the court's impartiality cannot be reasonably questioned because the government made ex parte applications it is allowed to make under the applicable law. This therefore cannot be a ground for recusal. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 431-32 (Chk. 2003).

A charge of appearance of partiality must first have a factual basis and recusal is then appropriate only if a disinterested reasonable person who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. The facts must provide what an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. While the trial judge has a range of discretion in making this determination, he cannot use a standard of mere suspicion. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 432 (Chk. 2003).

When a party has not shown a factual basis to reasonably question the judge's impartiality, but only raised a mere suspicion, and when he has not shown a factual basis for a claim of bias or prejudice; and when he cannot call the current judge as a witness to testify about his judicial acts; and when even the combination of these would not cause a reasonable, disinterested person to harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality, the court can find no basis upon which to grant the motion to recuse. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 432 (Chk. 2003).

The fact that the same judge hears different cases involving the same party or parties or related issues does not automatically result in an appearance of partiality under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 432 (Chk. 2003).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 432 (Chk. 2003).

The standard to be applied when a judge's recusal is sought on the ground a judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned is whether a disinterested reasonable observer who knows all the circumstances would question the judge's impartiality. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 181, 183 (Pon. 2003).

Litigants are not entitled to a judge of their own choosing; they are only entitled to an unbiased judge. FSM v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 637, 640 (Chk. 2004).

A charge of appearance of partiality must first have a factual basis. The standard to be applied is whether an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. The standard of "mere suspicion" is inadequate to support disqualification. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 55, 59 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The applicable statute requires that a Supreme Court justice must disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 293, 294 (Chk. 2005).

Disqualification of a Land Court Justice is required when the justice's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. One specific basis for disqualification is where the justice has a personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, or has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Adjudicatory decisions affecting property rights, such as ownership, are subject to due process requirements of the state constitution. Due process demands impartiality on the part of the adjudicators, including a Land Court Presiding Justice. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The test for determining if a judge's impartiality in a proceeding might by reasonably be questioned is whether a disinterested reasonable person, knowing all the circumstances, would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. There may be a time when each of the actions is insufficient to reasonably question the judge's impartiality, but the combination of all would cause a reasonable disinterested person to harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 417 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Since a judge must disqualify himself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, when the presiding justice's failure to recuse himself from the proceeding resulted in a violation of the appellant's due process rights, the decision determining ownership must be vacated and the matter remanded for further proceedings. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 417 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The test for determining whether a justice's impartiality in a proceeding might reasonably be questioned is whether a reasonable disinterested person, who knows all the circumstances, would have doubts about the justice's impartiality, and the general rule is that the disqualifying factors must be from an extrajudicial source. Isaac v. Saimon, 14 FSM R. 33, 35 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a justice excluded counsel from a chambers conference in a Pohnpei Supreme Court case where counsel was trying to appear to represent a different client, her exclusion from that conference is inadequate to, and cannot, show personal bias by that justice toward counsel since, typically, only the judge and court personnel, the parties, and their counsel are permitted to attend a chambers conference and that counsel was not admitted to practice before the Pohnpei Supreme Court and her motion to appear pro hac vice in that case had not been granted. A petition for writ of prohibition will therefore be denied. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 303, 304-05 (App. 2006).

An "incident" involving a justice's exclusion of counsel from a chambers conference in a Pohnpei Supreme Court case where counsel was trying to appear to represent a different client is inadequate to, and cannot, show personal bias toward counsel by that justice because typically, only the judge and court personnel, the parties, and their counsel are permitted to attend a chambers conference and since counsel is not admitted to practice before the Pohnpei Supreme Court and her motion to appear pro hac vice in that case had not been granted, her exclusion from that chambers conference is not a ground to disqualify the justice. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 305, 308 (App. 2006).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. The type of partiality at which 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is aimed is extrajudicial bias, or bias resulting from information received by the judge outside of the judicial proceeding or proceedings in which the judge has participated. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 14 FSM R. 582, 584 (App. 2007).

A justice whose extrajudicial statements exhibit a bias towards a party's counsel must disqualify himself. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 14 FSM R. 582, 584 (App. 2007).

While a trial judge has a range of discretion in making his determination about whether he will disqualify himself, he cannot use a standard of mere suspicion. A charge of appearance of partiality must first have a factual basis. Disqualification is then appropriate only if a disinterested reasonable person who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. The facts must provide what an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 14 FSM R. 582, 584-85 (App. 2007).

A party requesting disqualification must establish that actual bias or prejudice exists that comes from an extrajudicial source. A litigant's unsupported allegations that the trial judge may have subconscious misgivings is purely speculation, and is insufficient to support the judge's disqualification. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 14 FSM R. 582, 585 (App. 2007).

When there is simply no evidence – beyond mere speculation – that a justice might harbor some element of partiality towards the appellant or his counsel, as such, and without any evidence beyond mere speculation as to my purported partiality, the justice must deny the appellant's request under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) to disqualify himself from participating in the matter, but recusal may be granted on other grounds. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 14 FSM R. 582, 585 (App. 2007).

A Supreme Court Justice must disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 340, 341 (Pon. 2007).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 341 (Pon. 2007).

The type of partiality at which 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is aimed is extrajudicial bias, or bias resulting from information received by the judge outside of the judicial proceeding or proceedings in which the judge has participated. A justice whose extrajudicial statements exhibit a bias towards a party's counsel must disqualify himself. On the other hand, while a trial judge has a range of discretion in making his determination about whether he will disqualify himself, he cannot use a standard of mere suspicion. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 341 (Pon. 2007).

A charge of appearance of partiality must first have a factual basis. Disqualification is then appropriate only if a disinterested reasonable person who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. The facts must provide what an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 341 (Pon. 2007).

A party requesting disqualification must establish that actual bias or prejudice exists that comes from an extrajudicial source. A litigant's unsupported allegations that the trial judge may have subconscious misgivings is purely speculation, and is insufficient to support the judge's disqualification. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 341 (Pon. 2007).

A determination of a judge's bias should be made on the basis of conduct or information which is extrajudicial in nature. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 52 (Pon. 2015).

Since it is in the very nature of our system of justice that judges must rule in favor of one party and against another, a judge does not engage in extrajudicial behavior merely by ruling in favor of one party and against another. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 52 (Pon. 2015).

The thesis that an adverse ruling from the bench can constitute extrajudicial behavior that warrants disqualification must be rejected. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 52 (Pon. 2015).

Courts adhere to the rule that any alleged judicial bias and prejudice, to be disqualifying, must stem from an extrajudicial source, and that a judge's adverse rulings in a case do not create grounds for disqualification from that case. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. 2015).

The fact that the same judge hears different cases involving the same party or parties or related issues, does not automatically result in an appearance of partiality under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 229 (Chk. 2015).

Information that a judge learned or events that occurred during the course of a judicial proceeding cannot disqualify the judge on the grounds that the events or information now cause him to be biased or prejudiced or create an appearance of impropriety. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

In determining whether a judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, the test is whether a disinterested reasonable person who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 20 FSM R. 492, 495 (Pon. 2016).

The normal situation in which recusal may be required is when a judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship, or dealings with a party or the judge's own personal or financial interests, might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could preside over and decide a particular case impartially. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 20 FSM R. 492, 495 (Pon. 2016).

A justice with an outstanding bank loan can also decide for himself whether to recuse himself if the issue of impartiality arises. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 608 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

Factors disqualifying a justice for bias or prejudice generally must be established as coming from an extrajudicial source. Peterson v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 657, 659 (App. 2016).

Judicial officers are presumed to be unbiased and the burden of proof rests with the party asserting an unconstitutional bias to demonstrate otherwise. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 45 (App. 2016).

When unusual circumstances exist, questions about impartiality may arise. For example, if a judge were presently appealing to the bank for a loan or an extension for or restructuring of a loan, or if the loan is currently in default and is presently or soon will be litigated, there would exist a real question about the appearance of impropriety. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 49 (App. 2016).

The mere fact of a relationship between a judge and a financial institution as borrower/lender or mortgagor/mortgagee does not give rise to an inference that the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Something more than an ordinary financial transaction between the judge and financial institution must be present for disqualification to be necessary as when the financial relationship affords the judge services and benefits not generally available to the public. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 49 (App. 2016).

Merely because a justice presided over a different case, involving the same parties or related issues, does not, ipso facto, reflect an appearance of partiality, which would necessitate recusal. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 314 (App. 2017).

In order to objectively determine whether a judge may be impartial, the effective test requires the court to determine whether a disinterested reasonable person, knowing all the circumstances, would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. Selifis v. Robert, 21 FSM R. 344, 346 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2017).

When, given the loose familial ties between counsel and the justice, it is hard to find a sufficient familial or political connection between the justice and appellee's counsel that would warrant a disinterested, reasonable individual to doubt the justice's impartiality. Selifis v. Robert, 21 FSM R. 344, 347 (Chk. S. Ct.

App. 2017).

When the Attorney General's affidavit did not provide any basis for the belief that the justice and his family did not like his promotion to Chuuk State Supreme Court Associate Justice; when neither the motion nor its accompanying affidavit consider that being a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice has the effect of prohibiting the justice from having anything to do with the Attorney General outside of the courtroom for fear of the appearance of impropriety; when nothing in the arguments or affidavit shows that any specific transgressions occurred between the two; and when, based on the arguments, the justice would be wholly prohibited from presiding over any matter in which Chuuk was a party for the remainder of the Attorney General's tenure (a dangerous precedent to set on so little evidence), there was not a sufficient showing of personal bias between the justice and the Attorney General that would warrant a disinterested, reasonable individual to doubt the justice's impartiality. Selifis v. Robert, 21 FSM R. 344, 347-48 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2017).

When the trial court justice should have known that her uncle had a substantial interest that might be affected by future rulings; and when she should also have realized that by then her impartiality might reasonably be questioned, she should have recused herself and not ruled on a motion to reconsider, and when she did not, that order will be vacated. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 522 (App. 2018).

Litigants are not entitled to a judge of their own choosing; they are only entitled to an unbiased judge. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 550 (App. 2018).

When the justice would, or should, have first known – had actual knowledge – that a person in close relationship to her, her uncle, could be substantially affected by further substantive proceedings involving the property, there was now a conflict. Only then did her disqualification become an issue. It was also when her impartiality might first reasonably be questioned. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 559 (App. 2018).

A disqualified justice should recuse herself rather than rule on a Rule 11 motion because it is neither a housekeeping nor a ministerial matter, and because her impartiality might reasonably be questioned even though the Rule 11 motion could not substantially affect her uncle's interest. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 560 (App. 2018).

Merely because a justice presided over a different case, involving the same parties or related issues, does not, by itself, create an appearance of partiality that would necessitate the justice's recusal under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 111 (App. 2018).

A judge must disqualify himself from a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. The disqualifying factors must be from an extrajudicial source. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

A charge of appearance of partiality must first have a factual basis. The standard to be applied is whether an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

Generally, an affidavit is required to provide a factual basis for questioning a judge's impartiality, but other admissible evidence may be used to support a motion to recuse. When the presiding justice's own statements about his own knowledge of facts relating to the incident and the defendant's alleged conduct, were made on the record in the courtroom hearings, these statements may be used to question a justice's impartiality and be a basis for disqualification. Under such facts, the affidavit requirement is satisfied by other admissible evidence: the record of the hearings. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

It is not unusual for the same judge to hear interrelated matters involving one or more parties in common, and the fact that the same judge hears different cases involving the same party or parties, and related issues does not automatically result in an appearance of partiality. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

A judge's disqualification is required when the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, and one specific basis for disqualification is when the justice has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218-19 (App. 2019).

A judge should disqualify himself or herself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. A judge's disqualification is required when the judge or the judge's spouse, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, is a party to the proceeding. An uncle is within the third degree relationship. Relatives within the third degree of relationship are great-grandparent, grandparent, parent, uncle, aunt, brother, sister, child, grandchild, great-grandchild, nephew, or niece. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 219 & n.2 (App. 2019).

A Supreme Court justice must disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 320 (Chk. 2019).

The type of partiality at which 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is aimed is extrajudicial bias, or bias resulting from information received by the judge outside of the judicial proceeding or proceedings in which the judge has participated. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 320 (Chk. 2019).

A movant has not shown that a judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned when it has not shown that a disinterested reasonable person, who knows all the circumstances, would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. A judge then is unable to disqualify himself under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 320 (Chk. 2019).

Absent a showing that the judge is disqualified under 4 F.S.M.C. 124, a judge is obligated to hear the cases assigned to that judge. This is because a judge must exercise the power to recuse himself conscientiously and cannot use it to avoid difficult or controversial cases or to merely accommodate nervous litigants or counsel. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 321 (Chk. 2019).

When it is not the judge's duty to disqualify himself from a case to which he has been assigned, it is the judge's duty to serve. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 321 (Chk. 2019).

When the movant has not shown that the judge is disqualified from hearing the case, and the judge is not aware of other grounds that would disqualify him, the judge is obligated to hear the case, and must deny the disqualification motion. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 321 (Chk. 2019).

The type of partiality at which 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is aimed is extrajudicial bias, or bias resulting from information received by the judge outside of the judicial proceeding or proceedings in which the judge has participated. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 363-64 (Pon. 2019).

– Recusal – Close Relationship

Canon 3E(1) of the Code of Judicial Conduct, as adopted by Kosrae State Code, section 6.201, requires that a justice be disqualified in certain cases, including those cases where the judge is within the third degree relationship to one of the parties. The term "third degree relationship" is defined in the Code of Judicial Conduct and does not include cousin. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 92 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Disqualification under the Code of Judicial Conduct based upon the justice's family relationship to a party is not mandatory when the party is a cousin because the third degree relationship does not include cousin. So when there are no specific allegations of the justice's partiality and the justice has no personal interest in the outcome, a motion to recuse in a matter involving a cousin may be denied. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 92 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A justice is required to disqualify himself in a proceeding in which a person within the third degree of relationship to the justice is to the justice's knowledge likely to be a material witness in the proceeding. Shrew v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 533, 535 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the justice's brother has been named as a witness for trial the justice, pursuant to Canon 3.E(l)(d)(iv), is now disqualified from the proceeding. Shrew v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 533, 535 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A Chuuk State Supreme Court trial justice must be disqualified when the justice's impartiality might reasonably be questioned where he or his spouse, or a person within a close relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such person is a party to the proceeding. Kristoph v. Emin, 10 FSM R. 650, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The ABA Code of Judicial Conduct provides that a judge shall disqualify himself or herself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, including when the judge or the judge's spouse, or a person related to either within the third degree of relationship, or the spouse of such a person is a party to the proceeding. Kristoph v. Emin, 10 FSM R. 650, 652-53 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In order to obtain a justice's disqualification based upon Chk. S.L. No. 190-08, section 22(2)(d)(i), the moving party must establish by admissible evidence that the alleged relationship is within the third degree of relationship. It is not sufficient for disqualification that a party show that a justice is related to a party or a party's spouse solely by virtue of their membership in the same clan. Kristoph v. Emin, 10 FSM R. 650, 653 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When counsel's affidavit in support of a recusal motion fails to demonstrate in any way how he has personal knowledge of the relationships contained in his affidavit, rather than knowledge based upon statements made to him by others, his affidavit is deficient, and must be disregarded. Kristoph v. Emin, 10 FSM R. 650, 654 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When it is impossible to determine from an affidavit whether the degree of relationship is within the third degree of consanguinity, a motion to disqualify will be denied because failure to establish the degree of relationship by admissible evidence is fatal to a motion to disqualify. Kristoph v. Emin, 10 FSM R. 650, 654 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A justice is required to disqualify himself in a proceeding in which a person within the third degree of relationship to the justice is, to the justice's knowledge, likely to be a material witness in the proceeding, but when the justice's brother was never a witness in the case, was not named as a witness by either party, and did not testify at the trial, he was not a person likely to be a material witness in the proceeding and the justice's disqualification was not required on this basis. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 183 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Code of Judicial Conduct requires a judge's disqualification when the judge or judge's spouse, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such a person is a party to the proceeding, or an officer, director or trustee of a party. But the phrase "director of a party" in the Code of Judicial Conduct is limited to corporations and business entities, and does not include directors in state government. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 183-84 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A Supreme Court justice must disqualify himself when a person within a close relationship to him is a director of a party and also in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 181, 182-83 (Pon. 2003).

The recusal statute provides that a justice shall disqualify himself if a closely related person is a director of a party, not has been or was at some point in the past. Therefore when the judge's brother's board membership and the judge's assignment to the case was never concurrent, there was not a time when 4 F.S.M.C. 124(2)(e)(i) was applicable, especially when the judge was not aware that his brother had been a member of party's board until so notified by the party's advice to the court. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 181, 183 (Pon. 2003).

When it has now been just over three and a half years since the judge's brother was last a party's board member, and more than six and a half years since he first became one, and when the judge was not aware that his brother had been a board member until so advised by the party, the judge's thinking in the course of the case could not have been influenced by a fact of which he was not aware, and the court cannot conclude that a disinterested reasonable observer who knows all of these circumstances would question the judge's impartiality. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 181, 183 (Pon. 2003).

Under Mortlockese custom, a person would be considered related to his relative's stepson, but the added generation that results from his relative being another's step-grandmother – as opposed to his step-mother – cuts off the relationship under Mortlockese custom so that in actual fact a person is not considered related to the other. In such circumstances, a judge would not need to disqualify himself since he lacks a relationship to the other. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 339 n.1 (Pon. 2007).

When the judge disqualified himself in another case because of his mistaken belief at the time that his relative was a party's step-mother; when, although the plaintiff in a second matter moved to disqualify the judge from presiding over that matter, he did not disqualify himself and would not have disqualified himself if he had ruled on the motion, but ultimately reassigned that case for administrative reasons; and when the judge had no relationship of any type with the parties in either case and thus there was no reasonable basis for anyone to question his impartiality in presiding over the case at bar, in which counsel in the other two cases is plaintiff; and when there is no evidence, beyond mere speculation, that the judge might harbor some element of impartiality towards the plaintiff, the judge will deny a request that he disqualify himself. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 341-42 (Pon. 2007).

A Chuuk State Supreme Court trial justice must be disqualified when the justice's impartiality might reasonably be questioned including when he or his spouse, or a person within a close relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such person, is a party to the proceeding. A close relationship means a person within the third degree of relationship. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

In order to obtain a justice's disqualification based upon Chk. S.L. No. 190-08, section 22(2)(d)(i), the moving party must establish by admissible evidence that the alleged relationship is within the third degree of relationship. It is not sufficient for disqualification that a party show that a justice is related to a party or a party's spouse solely by virtue of their membership in the same clan. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A judge is disqualified to sit on a lawsuit when a party's counsel is the judge's sister-in-law. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 603, 606 (App. 2014).

The Code of Judicial Conduct requires that a justice be disqualified when the judge is within the third degree relationship to one of the parties. The term third degree relationship as defined in the Code does not include cousin. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 20 FSM R. 492, 495 (Pon. 2016).

There are various degrees of familial relationships and not every family relationship requires disqualification. The FSM Judiciary Act of 1979 requires disqualification of a justice on the basis of "close relationship," not just any relationship, to a person involved in litigation. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 20 FSM R. 492, 495 (Pon. 2016).

When the familial relationship relied upon by the movant is too remote to cause any conflict of interest, the motion to recuse will be denied. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 20 FSM R. 492, 496 (Pon. 2016).

When counsel is the judge's wife's sister, it creates a non-waivable conflict of interest requiring the judge's recusal. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 546, 549 (Pon. 2016).

Recusal is not required when counsel was the judge's former Pohnpei Supreme Court law clerk but the judge has had no relationship with him since his law clerk employment ended several years ago and has never worked on this particular matter with him because there is no actual or potential conflict of interest, notwithstanding that the State also waived any potential conflict. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 546, 549 (Pon. 2016).

All FSM Supreme Court justices, including temporary justices while they sit, are subject to the FSM Judiciary Act, under which, an FSM Supreme Court justice must disqualify herself where she or her spouse, or a person within a close relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such a person, is known by the justice to have an interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 520 (App. 2018).

The Judiciary Act requires Supreme Court justices to adhere to the standards of the Code of Judicial Conduct of the American Bar Association, and that Code defines close relationship as someone within the third degree of relationship. An uncle is within the third degree of relationship. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 520-21 (App. 2018).

When the trial court justice should have known that her uncle had a substantial interest that might be affected by future rulings; and when she should also have realized that by then her impartiality might reasonably be questioned, she should have recused herself and not ruled on a motion to reconsider, and when she did not, that order will be vacated. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 522 (App. 2018).

All FSM Supreme Court justices, including temporary justices while they sit, are subject to the FSM Judiciary Act, and, under that Act, an FSM Supreme Court justice must disqualify herself where she or her spouse, or a person within a close relationship to either of them, or the spouse of such a person is known by the justice to have an interest that could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 558-59 (App. 2018).

The Judiciary Act requires Supreme Court justices to adhere to the standards of the Code of Judicial Conduct of the American Bar Association, and that Code defines close relationship as someone within the third degree of relationship. An uncle is within the third degree. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 559 (App. 2018).

When the justice's uncle became the winning bidder of a court-ordered sale, a potential conflict emerged, although if virtually anyone else had been the winning bidder, no conflict would have arisen. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 559 (App. 2018).

When the justice would, or should, have first known – had actual knowledge – that a person in close relationship to her, her uncle, could be substantially affected by further substantive proceedings involving the property, there was now a conflict. Only then did her disqualification become an issue. It was also when her impartiality might first reasonably be questioned. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 559 (App. 2018).

Disqualifying circumstances do not have retroactive effect when they could not have affected the justice's orders beforehand because until her uncle became the winning bidder, the justice would not have known that her uncle had an interest that the litigation could substantially affect. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 559 (App. 2018).

A disqualified justice should recuse herself rather than rule on a Rule 11 motion because it is neither a housekeeping nor a ministerial matter, and because her impartiality might reasonably be questioned even though the Rule 11 motion could not substantially affect her uncle's interest. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 560 (App. 2018).

Sufficient cause for a party to seek the presiding judge's disqualification after he has made his decision is shown when the presiding judge disclosed his uncle-nephew relationship with the parties while rendering his decision and further discussed a different, related case wherein he indicated that, because a party in that case lost, it was rightful that he also lose this case. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 217 (App. 2019).

The movants have met the standard for showing a factual basis for the judge's disqualification when they have provided an affidavit from a disinterested observer who has pointed to the close familial ties and friendship that the judge has with the case's parties. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

A judge should disqualify himself or herself in a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. A judge's disqualification is required when the judge or the judge's spouse, or a person within the third degree of relationship to either of them, is a party to the proceeding. An uncle is within the third degree relationship. Relatives within the third degree of relationship are great-grandparent, grandparent, parent, uncle, aunt, brother, sister, child, grandchild, great-grandchild, nephew, or niece. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 219 & n.2 (App. 2019).

– Recusal – Extrajudicial Knowledge

A judge who, at the beginning of a trial, is so influenced by other information that he knows he will not be capable of basing his decision solely on the properly admitted evidence in the case is under an ethical obligation to disqualify himself or herself from the litigation. FSM v. Jonas (II), 1 FSM R. 306, 320 n.1 (Pon. 1983).

The normal situation in which recusal may be required is when a judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship or dealings with a party or the judge's own personal or financial interests, might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could preside over and decide a particular case impartially. In re Main, 4 FSM R. 255, 260 (App. 1990).

The term "disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding" does not apply to disputed legal issues in the case. Even where a judge may have had prior opinions regarding a legal issue, this alone does not disqualify a judge. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 657 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A judge's participation in a constitutional convention does not require his recusal for having personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning a provision adopted in that convention because any knowledge gained during the convention is not a disputed evidentiary fact. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 659 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the justice does not have personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding; when he has not prejudged any legal issues in this case; and when a disinterested reasonable observer, knowing all the facts and circumstances, would not have doubts regarding his impartiality in this case based upon his participation as a Constitutional Convention delegate nearly twenty years ago, the justice's disqualification is not required under the Code of Judicial Conduct. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 10 FSM R. 654, 659 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Code of Judicial Conduct requires a justice to disqualify himself in a proceeding where the judge has personal bias or knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. The term "disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding" has been interpreted to mean facts involved in the actions or conduct of persons in a case. The term does not apply to the legal issues presented in the case. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 133, 136 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a justice does not have personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning a case involving the interpretation of constitutional provisions because any knowledge gained during a constitutional convention is not personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the case, and when the justice has not prejudged any legal issues in the case, a disinterested reasonable observer, knowing all the facts and circumstances, would not have doubts regarding the justice's impartiality in the case, based upon his participation as a constitutional convention delegate. The justice's disqualification is therefore not required. Jackson v. Kosrae State Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 133, 137 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

There is no need to remand a matter for a new trial judge to consider the summary judgment motions when the knowledge that the defendants lived on part of the land was in the record and did not stem from an extrajudicial source; when there was no extrajudicial conduct because the trial judge received information from the former special master when both counsel were present; when trial counsel as well as the judge engaged in appeals to divine aid at the motion hearing; and when the judge encouraged settlement. Bualuay v. Rano, 11 FSM R. 139, 148-49 (App. 2002).

Generally, an affidavit is required to provide a factual basis for questioning a judge's impartiality, but other admissible evidence may also by used to support a motion to recuse. When statements made by the presiding justice himself, regarding his own extrajudicial knowledge of facts relating to the subject incident and the defendant's alleged conduct, were made on the record in the courtroom at hearings, these statements can be used for questioning the justice's impartiality and a basis for recusal. Under these specific facts and in this case, the requirement for an affidavit is satisfied by other admissible evidence: the record of the hearings. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Disqualification of a the justice is required when the justice has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. The term "disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding" has been interpreted to mean facts involved in the actions or conduct of persons in a case. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Since at trial, the defendant may defend the malicious mischief charge through disputing the elements of the offense, including the alleged damage to the glass at the school, and since the presiding justice's hearing glass being broken on the subject night at the school may be considered circumstantial evidence of defendant's conduct, the presiding justice's hearing glass being broken on the subject night at the school may be facts involved in the defendant's actions or conduct in this case and therefore disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Accordingly, the trial justice recused himself. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272-73 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Disqualifying factors must be from an extrajudicial source. When the only example a party gives of the court's supposed "extrajudicial knowledge" is the court's statement of its intention when it issued the search warrant that lead to the events in the case, it is a novel interpretation of the word "extrajudicial." Knowledge gained through the application for and issuance of a search warrant, by its nature, cannot be deemed extrajudicial knowledge. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 293, 294-95 (Chk. 2005).

A judge's disqualification must be made on the basis of conduct which is extrajudicial in nature that is, on some basis other than what the judge learned from his participation in the case. Information learned, or events occurring during the course of a judicial proceeding cannot be used to recuse a judge on the grounds that the events or this information has now caused him to be biased or prejudiced or that it creates an appearance of impropriety. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 293, 295 (Chk. 2005).

A justice, who at the beginning of a trial, is so influenced by other information that he knows he will not be capable of basing his decision solely on the properly admitted evidence is under an ethical obligation to disqualify himself from the proceedings. Edmond v. Alik, 13 FSM R. 413, 416-17 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The normal situation in which recusal may be required is when a justice's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship or dealing with a party might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the justice could preside over and decide a particular case impartially. Isaac v. Saimon, 14 FSM R. 33, 35-36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A justice must disqualify himself where he has served in governmental employment and in such capacity expressed an opinion concerning the merits of the particular case in controversy. The presiding Land Court justice's former position as Land Commissioner and his attendant statutory duties to review, approve and affirm adjudications for determination of ownership of land, including boundary determinations, serve as grounds for disqualification, based upon extrajudicial knowledge. When the presiding justice served in governmental employment as a Kosrae State Land Commissioner and affirmed the land registration team adjudication and determination of the parcel's boundaries, the presiding justice (as a Land Commissioner) did express an opinion concerning the merits of the parties' boundary claims. Isaac v. Saimon, 14 FSM R. 33, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Disqualification is required where the justice has "personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding." The term "disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding" has been interpreted to mean facts involved in the actions or conduct of persons in a case. Kosrae v. Nena, 14 FSM R. 70, 71 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the justice did not hear or observe any of the defendant's alleged actions, either concerning the charged offenses, or relating to the alleged crash into the electric pole causing an island-wide power outage; when he did not mention the defendant's identity or name; and when he did not make any statement which suggested bias or prejudice against the defendant, but did reference the island-wide power outage, which the justice and all persons with electrical service on the island suffered and which is unrelated to the offenses that the defendant has been charged with, the exposure to an power outage, without more, cannot form the basis for the justice's disqualification and the justice's disqualification is not required. Kosrae v. Nena, 14 FSM R. 70, 72 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A justice is barred from sitting on a case where he has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts, but knowledge that does not stem from an extrajudicial source is not disqualifying. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 141, 145-46 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The 2000 ABA Code of Judicial Conduct, Canon 3.E requires a judge's disqualification in a proceeding where the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, and one specific basis for disqualification is when the justice has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503 (App. 2011).

The general rule is that the disqualifying factors must be from an extrajudicial source, and the normal situation in which a judge's disqualification may be required is when a judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship or dealings with a party, or the judge's own personal or financial interests, might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could preside over and decide a particular case impartially. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 195 (App. 2013).

The general rule is that the jurist's knowledge of disqualifying facts must have originated from an extrajudicial source. A disqualification must be made on the basis of conduct which is extrajudicial in nature, that is, on some basis other than what the judge learned from his participation in the case. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

It has long been regarded as normal and proper for a judge to sit in the same case upon its remand. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

A typical situation where recusal may be required is when a sitting judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship, or dealings with a party or the judge's own personal or financial interests might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could impartially preside over and decide a particular case. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 45 (App. 2016).

Disqualification is required when the judge has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. The term "disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding" means facts involved in the actions or conduct of the persons in a case. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218, 219 (App. 2019).

A judge's disqualification is required when the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, and one specific basis for disqualification is when the justice has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218-19 (App. 2019).

A Supreme Court justice must disqualify himself when he has personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceeding. Personal knowledge is knowledge gained through firsthand observation or experience, as distinguished from a belief based on what someone else said. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 319-20 (Chk. 2019).

A judge has no personal knowledge – no firsthand observation or experience – when he was not present when any of them occurred, and when it is not clear that any of the case's operative facts will be disputed evidentiary facts. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 320 (Chk. 2019).

The general rule is that the jurist's knowledge of disqualifying facts must have originated from an extrajudicial source. Extrajudicial means outside court, outside the functioning of the court system. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 320 (Chk. 2019).

When a judge has no personal knowledge, or any extrajudicial knowledge, of the case's operative facts or of any disputed evidentiary facts, he is unable to use 4 F.S.M.C. 124(2)(a) to disqualify himself from the case. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 320 (Chk. 2019).

A judge's disqualifying ground must come from an extrajudicial source or conduct. The general rule is that the judge's knowledge of disqualifying facts must have originated from an extrajudicial source. Extrajudicial means outside court; outside the functioning of the court system. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 363 (Pon. 2019).

– Recusal – Financial Interest

There are certain circumstances or relationships which, as a per se matter of due process, require almost automatic disqualification, and, if a judge has a direct, personal, substantial, pecuniary interest in the outcome of the case, recusal is constitutionally mandated. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 35, 43 (App. 1991).

Where the trial justice resides in housing provided for him by the national government by statute and is not an intended third-party beneficiary to the government's lease of the land and the action is only for money damages concerning the land the trial justice has no financial or other interest in the matter that may serve to disqualify the justice. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (I), 6 FSM R. 318, 322 (Pon. 1994).

Since debt securities do not give rise to a financial interest in the debtor which issued the securities, a judge who is indebted to a bank in a routine loan transaction is not thereby disqualified from cases in which a bank is a party. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 607 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

Debt interests are not considered to give rise to a financial interest in the debtor that issued the security because the debt obligation does not convey ownership interest in the issuer. Therefore, disqualification is not required solely because a party in a matter before the judge is a corporation or governmental entity that has issued a debt security owned by the judge. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 607 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

Common sense compels the conclusion that a debt obligation to a bank is not a disqualifying interest since a routine debt like a mortgage, fully secured by real property of an appraised value in excess of the debt, cannot be affected by the outcome of litigation involving the bank that is a mortgagee because a loss for the bank, even if ruinous, would not extinguish or reduce the obligation of the mortgagor to repay, or undermine the value of the property securing the loan, or, similarly, a bank victory, regardless of how substantial, affords not possible benefit to the mortgagor. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 607 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

When the presiding judge has a personal bank loan and he is not in default, there is no reason to think that his decision in the case will in any way influence his loan with the bank, either way he decides, since his loan is no different than other loans given to people that are not judges. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 608 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

A justice with an outstanding bank loan can also decide for himself whether to recuse himself if the issue of impartiality arises. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 608 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

A typical situation where recusal may be required is when a sitting judge's extrajudicial knowledge, relationship, or dealings with a party or the judge's own personal or financial interests might be such as to cause a reasonable person to question whether the judge could impartially preside over and decide a particular case. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 45 (App. 2016).

Unless unusual circumstances exist, a judge is not obligated to disqualify himself or herself because the judge has a loan from a financial institution that is a litigant before the judge. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 45 (App. 2016).

Since 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is based on the United States model and its statutory language is verbatim thereto, the court should consider United States legal authority under 28 U.S.C. § 455 for guidance in determining 4 F.S.M.C. 124's meaning concerning recusal as a result of a financial relationship with a lending institution. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 46 (App. 2016).

If it is acceptable for a judge to accept an ordinary loan from a financial institution, the same should not serve as grounds for disqualification. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 46 (App. 2016).

Accepting a loan from a lending institution in its regular course of business on the same terms available to the general public, is fully consistent with a judge's obligation to conduct personal activities so as to minimize the risk of conflicts that would result in frequent disqualifications. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 49 (App. 2016).

When unusual circumstances exist, questions about impartiality may arise. For example, if a judge were presently appealing to the bank for a loan or an extension for or restructuring of a loan, or if the loan is currently in default and is presently or soon will be litigated, there would exist a real question about the appearance of impropriety. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 49 (App. 2016).

The mere fact of a relationship between a judge and a financial institution as borrower/lender or mortgagor/mortgagee does not give rise to an inference that the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Something more than an ordinary financial transaction between the judge and financial institution must be present for disqualification to be necessary as when the financial relationship affords the judge services and benefits not generally available to the public. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 49 (App. 2016).

When a consumer loan was issued to the judge well before he was appointed to the appellate panel; when the bank does not aver any special circumstances necessitating the judge's disqualification since the loan was issued on standard terms available to the general public and were negotiated before his designation to the panel; and when the loan is current and not in default or delinquent nor at risk thereof, and is not currently being negotiated for extension, restructuring, or refinancing, the bank has not overcome the presumption that a judicial official is unbiased. Without more, a judge's consumer loan and the mere relationship between the bank and the judge as creditor-debtor, is insufficient to require the judge's disqualification. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 50 (App. 2016).

– Recusal – Judge's Duty

A judge has a duty to disqualify himself from presiding in a proceeding in which he entertains a bias or prejudice against a party. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 444 (App. 1984).

A justice's power to recuse himself must be exercised conscientiously and not be used to avoid difficult or controversial cases nor merely to accommodate nervous litigants or counsel. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 471 (Kos. 1984).

Where an appellate court has held that a trial judge is under a clear and non-discretionary duty to step aside from presiding over a case and the petitioner has a constitutional right to obtain compliance with that duty, all documents issued after the date of the appellate decision are null and void and shall be expunged from the record and the judge shall be enjoined from taking any further action as a judge in the case. Etscheit v. Santos, 5 FSM R. 111, 113 (App. 1991).

A justice's obligation to recuse himself is not dependent on the existence of a party's motion to disqualify him. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

In the usual case, a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice's temporary unavailability would not be grounds to consider him disqualified and unable to perform his professional and constitutional duty to preside on an appellate panel. But he is disqualified when the court is required by statute to decide the case by a certain date in the near future and the court would be unable to meet its statutory obligation if it had to await the justice's return. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 98 (App. 2001).

It is a judge's duty not to disqualify himself unless he believes that there are proper and reasonable grounds therefor. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 182 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

It is a judge's duty not to disqualify himself unless he believes that there are proper and reasonable grounds therefor. The grounds for disqualification of a Kosrae state justice are provided in the Model Code of Judicial Conduct. Kosrae v. Nena, 14 FSM R. 70, 71 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the justice sentencing the defendant has resigned from the court and it is the justice's final day of service as a justice, a motion for recusal from sentencing on that ground is meritless. It is within the judge's authority and is his duty to conduct the sentencing hearing especially since the sentencing hearing was delayed at the defendant's request to address the issue of admission of defendant's prior criminal record. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 126 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The duty to recuse may arise even in the absence of a motion to disqualify. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 185 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

In the absence of a showing of any actual partiality or extrajudicial bias under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a judge properly meets his obligation to hear the case. Berman v. Rosario, 15 FSM R. 337, 341 (Pon. 2007).

If a presiding Land Court judge fails to recuse himself when he is required to, it is a due process violation and the matter must be remanded to the Kosrae Land Court with instructions and guidance for re-hearing the matter. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503-04 (App. 2011).

In the absence of a showing of any partiality or extrajudicial bias under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1), a judge is obligated to hear cases assigned to that judge. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

Absent a depiction of partiality or extrajudicial bias, a judge is obligated to hear the cases assigned to him or her. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 314 (App. 2017).

Except when the judge is disqualified under 4 F.S.M.C. 122 or 124, a judge is obligated to hear the cases assigned to that judge. This is because a judge must exercise the power to recuse conscientiously and cannot use it to avoid difficult or controversial cases or to merely accommodate nervous litigants or counsel. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 364 (Pon. 2019).

When it is not the judge's duty to disqualify himself from a case to which he has been assigned, it is the judge's duty to serve. A judge cannot "voluntarily recuse" himself except when that recusal is required. Then it would be the judge's duty to do so. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 364 (Pon. 2019).

– Recusal – Judicial Statements or Rulings

The fact that answers given by the victim-witness in response to questions posed by the judge happened to strengthen the government's case did not, by itself, indicate that the judge was impermissibly helping the prosecution, or that he was biased against the defendant. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 446 (App. 1984).

4 F.S.M.C. 124 furnishes no grounds for disqualifying a judge on the basis of statements or rulings made by him in his judicial capacity which reflect reasoned views derived from documents submitted, arguments heard, or testimony received in the course of judicial proceedings in the same case. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 473 (Kos. 1984).

A judge's adverse rulings in a case do not create grounds for disqualification from that case. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 484 (Kos. 1984).

A motion for disqualification ordinarily may not be predicated on the judge's rulings in the case or in related cases, nor on a demonstrated tendency to rule in a particular way, nor on a particular judicial leaning or attitude derived from his experience on the bench. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 52, 54 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Statements and rulings made by a judge in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). There is a presumption that judicial officials are unbiased, and the burden of proof is on the party asserting an unconstitutional bias to demonstrate otherwise. A party requesting recusal on retrial must establish that actual bias or prejudice exists that comes from an extrajudicial source. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 644, 649 (Pon. 1996).

Claims that a trial justice has shown disfavor toward intervenors' counsel, or bias in rulings in the instant case or other cases can be dismissed as failing to provide valid grounds for disqualification. Kristoph v. Emin, 10 FSM R. 650, 654 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Adverse rulings by a judge in a case do not create grounds for disqualification in that case. To be disqualifying, any alleged judicial bias and prejudice must be based upon an extrajudicial source. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 182 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the court did not sua sponte raise the issue of the search warrant's validity and only proceeded to that question after defense counsel had insisted on entering that area and the government had orally waived its right to oppose the motion in writing and when there was no proper challenge to, and the court has made no ruling on, the arrest warrant's validity, the court will not grant a recusal motion because the court's oral or written rulings on a search warrant's validity or its issuance of an arrest warrant cannot be basis upon which its impartiality may be reasonably questioned and recusal granted. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 430-31 (Chk. 2003).

A judge's statements and rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) (appearance of partiality) and even a judge's adverse rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 431 (Chk. 2003).

A judge must disqualify himself from a proceeding in which the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned, and in specific instances. The disqualifying factors must be from an extrajudicial source. Statements and rulings made by a judge in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification. Adverse rulings in a case are not grounds for disqualification of the presiding justice. The slow progress of the case is not based upon an extrajudicial source and therefore is not a basis for disqualification. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 55, 59 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A judge's statements and rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). Even a judge's adverse rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 293, 295 (Chk. 2005).

A judge's adverse rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for recusal. Nor may a recusal be based on the judge's rulings in a related case. Thus, whether a refiled case is considered the same case as the earlier (dismissed) case or a related case, the court's prior rulings are not a ground for recusal. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 293, 295 (Chk. 2005).

Courts adhere to the rule that any alleged judicial bias and prejudice, to be disqualifying, must stem from an extrajudicial source, and that a judge's adverse rulings in a case do not create grounds for disqualification from that case. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. 2015).

Rulings made by a judge in the course of prior proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

Adverse rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

Under controlling FSM case law, the disqualifying factors must stem from an extrajudicial source. Unfavorable or adverse rulings in a case, are not an extrajudicial source and are not a ground to reasonably question the judge's impartiality in that case. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 565, 569-70 (Pon. 2016).

When none of the rulings about which the movants complain were based on or were the result of any extrajudicial source, knowledge, or factor, they cannot be a ground for disqualification. Litigation (and thus impartial judging) by its very nature, invites judicial rulings unfavorable to one party, or another, or both since it is in the very nature of our system of justice that judges must rule in favor of one party and against another. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 565, 570 (Pon. 2016).

A judge's unfavorable rulings are not grounds for disqualification even if those rulings are believed to be erroneous, since the appellate division may later correct a judge's erroneous ruling. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 565, 570 (Pon. 2016).

Generally, a judge's adverse rulings in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds to disqualify a judge. Peterson v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 657, 659 (App. 2016).

A judge's legal rulings, even if adverse, made in the course of judicial proceedings, whether in the same case, or a related case, (or even an unrelated case) do not disqualify that judge. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 111 (App. 2018).

An appellate panel's legal rulings in the two earlier appeals, even though unfavorable, do not, and cannot, disqualify the panel members from sitting on a later, related appeal. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 111 (App. 2018).

Since court rulings, by their nature, are almost always unfavorable to one or more parties, for a judge to be disqualified for no reason other than the judge had once made an unfavorable ruling against a party, would quickly lead to all judges being disqualified from most court cases. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 111 n.2 (App. 2018).

Speculation that the result might be more favorable with a different judge is not a basis to disqualify a judge. Nor does a party's displeasure with a judge's decisions in one or more cases form a basis to disqualify a judge. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 180 (Pon. 2019).

A motion for disqualification ordinarily may not be predicated on the judge's rulings in the instant case or in related cases, nor on a demonstrated tendency to rule any particular way, nor on a particular judicial leaning or attitude derived from the judge's experience on the bench. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 180 (Pon. 2019).

A judge's statements and rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification. Adverse rulings in a case are not grounds for the presiding judge's disqualification. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

Judicial rulings, even if adverse, made in the course of other judicial proceedings are not grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1). Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 364 (Pon. 2019).

When judicial rulings could not be a basis to disqualify either of the justices who presided over a case from presiding over a different case, their rulings cannot be a basis to disqualify a former law clerk for his service under them. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 364 (Pon. 2019).

A judge's adverse rulings made in the course of judicial proceedings do not provide grounds for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) which provides for a justice's disqualification when the justice's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 608, 610 (Kos. 2020).

– Recusal – Procedure

Due process does not require that a second judge decide motions for recusal where the trial judge accepts as true all of the factual allegations in the affidavit of the party seeking recusal, and must rule only on matters of law in making the decision to recuse or not recuse himself. Skilling v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 209, 213 (App. 1986).

The procedure for recusal provided in the FSM Code, whereby a party may file a motion for recusal with an affidavit, and the judge must rule on the motion, stating his reasons for granting or denying the motion, before any further proceeding is taken, allows the moving party due process. Skilling v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 209, 214 (App. 1986).

A party's motion to have a trial justice recuse himself is insufficient if not supported by affidavit as required by 4 F.S.M.C. 124(c). Jonas v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 238, 239 (App. 1986).

The fact that the Pohnpei Judiciary Act, 2L-160-82, §§ 30(1), (2), requires a judge to rule on a motion for recusal reveals that disqualification is not mandated but instead is at the discretion of the judge. Adams v. Etscheit, 4 FSM R. 226, 230-31 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Disqualification of a judge under the Pohnpei Judiciary Act, 2L-160-82, minimally requires: 1) a written motion for disqualification filed before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown otherwise; 2) a good faith affidavit showing factual grounds; and 3) grounds which originated after January 20, 1984 when the Act became effective, whereupon impartiality is to be assessed on the basis of whether a disinterested reasonable Pohnpeian who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubt about the judge's impartiality. Adams v. Etscheit, 4 FSM R. 226, 231-32 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

A motion requesting a trial court to reconsider its earlier ruling denying a motion for recusal may be denied where a party making the motion has been aware of the document upon which the motion is based for almost 10 years; where counsel who prepared the motion had done so without previously appearing before the trial judge to "assess the temper of that judge;" where the trial judge had studied the entire case "quite extensively" before the motion had been filed; and where there are "strong indications" that counsel is "judge-shopping," so that counsel's conduct "represents an example of a very serious and contemptuous misconduct" toward the court. Adams v. Etscheit, 4 FSM R. 237, 238-40 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Mere argument by counsel, be it oral or set forth in a brief, is not the basis on which motions to disqualify are determined. Motions for recusal must be supported by affidavit stating the grounds for recusal. It is the movant's burden to go beyond wide-ranging speculation or conclusions and show a factual basis for recusal. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 266, 268 (Pon. 1992).

The court is required by statute to rule on a motion to disqualify the sitting justice before proceeding further on the matter. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (I), 6 FSM R. 318, 320 n.1 (Pon. 1994).

In order to overturn the trial judge's denial of a motion to recuse an appellant must show an abuse of the trial judge's discretion. The same standard of review applies to a petition for a writ of prohibition ordering a judge to recuse himself. Nahnken of Nett v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 339, 340 (App. 1994).

A person who is not a party cannot move for the disqualification of the trial judge because persons who are not parties of record to a suit have no standing which will enable them to take part in or control the proceedings. Shiro v. Pios, 6 FSM R. 541, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The proper method to obtain a writ of prohibition to disqualify a member of an appellate panel is to move for disqualification before that member, and, if the recusal motion is denied, to file a petition for a writ of prohibition as a separate matter to be considered by an appellate panel constituted pursuant to Appellate Rule 21(a). Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 1995).

In considering motions for recusal a court must carefully analyze the grounds in terms of the disqualification statute, and it need not lightly grant such motions simply to accommodate or placate litigants or their counsel, lest the judge be violating his judicial oath to administer justice. Damarlane v.

United States, 7 FSM R. 52, 54 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under the Pohnpei statute a party moving for disqualification of a judge must do so before the trial or hearings unless good cause is shown for filing it at a later time. Upon receipt of such a motion, the judge shall rule on it before proceeding further in the matter, stating his reasons for granting or denying it on the record. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 52, 55 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

The Chuuk Judiciary Act requires that a motion for a justice's disqualification be supported by affidavits to establish a factual basis for the motion, and that there be a hearing at which the movant must prove his allegations. In re Disqualification of Justice, 7 FSM R. 278, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Allegations that are the basis for a motion for a justice's disqualification must be proven by admissible and competent evidence. Inadmissible affidavits are not enough. In re Disqualification of Justice, 7 FSM R. 278, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The standard to be applied in reviewing a request for disqualification under 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is whether a disinterested reasonable observer who knows all the circumstances would harbor doubts about the judge's impartiality. A motion for disqualification must be supported by an affidavit which clearly sets forth the factual basis for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist. Fu Zhou Fuyan Pelagic Fishery Co. v. Wang Shun Ren, 7 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 1996).

Because a judge has a ministerial, non-discretionary duty to state on the record his reasons for denying a motion to disqualify himself a writ of prohibition may issue to prevent him from proceeding further on a case until he has done so. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Trial Division, 7 FSM R. 642, 643 (App. 1996).

A motion to recuse is untimely when it is brought over five weeks after the deadline for pretrial motions and when the movant had known for months which judge would be presiding over the trial. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 644, 647-48, 649 (Pon. 1996).

A denial of a motion to recuse may be reviewed by means of a petition for a writ of prohibition or mandamus. The standard of review is whether the trial judge abused his discretion in denying the motion to recuse. The petitioner must show that the trial judge clearly and indisputably abused his discretion when he denied the motion to disqualify. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1997).

By statute, a motion to recuse should be brought before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown for filing it at a later time. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

When the issue of recusal was brought to the trial judge's attention well before the date he set for pretrial motions, a judge's obligation to recuse himself is not dependent on bringing a motion, and the motion was timely by the terms of the statute because it was brought before trial even though brought after the date set for pretrial motions the motion to recuse cannot be denied as untimely. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

4 F.S.M.C. 124(6) provides that a party may move to disqualify a Supreme Court justice, and requires that such a motion be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for belief that grounds for disqualification exist. Any disqualification motion must be filed before the trial or hearing, unless good cause is shown. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 95-96 (App. 2001).

A party in cases involving related issues is not entitled as a matter of right to a different judge for each case. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

Recusals are not required to be in writing. While the better practice would be that recusals be in writing, and the Legislature could require that practice if it so chose, there is currently no such statutory or constitutional requirement. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

A motion to recuse may be considered untimely when it is brought many weeks after the deadline for pretrial motions and where the movant has known for months which justice would be presiding over the trial. Shrew v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 533, 535 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A motion to recuse should be brought before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown filing it at a later time. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 182 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An application for a trial judge's disqualification must be filed at the earliest opportunity. This rule will be strictly applied against a party who, having knowledge of the facts constituting a disqualification, does not seek to disqualify the judge until an unfavorable ruling has been made. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 184 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The trial court may deny a motion for new trial when the motion's basis is the judge's failure to recuse himself and the party making the motion was, since the beginning of the case, aware of the information upon which the motion is based. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 184 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A motion for disqualification of a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice must be supported by affidavits establishing a factual basis for the motion, and there must be a hearing where the moving party has the burden of proving the basis for the motion. Allegations that provide the basis for a motion to recuse must be proven by admissible and competent evidence. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 259 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A motion to disqualify a judge that is not supported by an affidavit which explains the factual basis for the motion is insufficient and will be denied. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 55, 59 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

An application for a trial judge's disqualification must be filed at the earliest opportunity. A motion to recuse should be brought before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown for filing it at a later time. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 271-72 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

It is necessary to show a factual basis – not just speculation or conclusions, for questioning a judge's impartiality. A factual basis must be provided by affidavit or other admissible evidence. Counsel's arguments are not evidence and therefore cannot form a "factual basis" for questioning a judge's impartiality. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Mere argument by counsel, verbal or written, is not the basis on which motions to recuse are determined. It is the movant's burden to go beyond speculation or conclusion and show a factual basis for recusal. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Generally, an affidavit is required to provide a factual basis for questioning a judge's impartiality, but other admissible evidence may also by used to support a motion to recuse. When statements made by the presiding justice himself, regarding his own extrajudicial knowledge of facts relating to the subject incident and the defendant's alleged conduct, were made on the record in the courtroom at hearings, these statements can be used for questioning the justice's impartiality and a basis for recusal. Under these specific facts and in this case, the requirement for an affidavit is satisfied by other admissible evidence: the record of the hearings. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The court must decide a recusal motion before it can consider and rule on substantive motions, although the court can probably entertain and decide merely procedural matters before ruling on the recusal motion. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 293, 294 (Chk. 2005).

By state law, a motion to disqualify a justice must be referred to another justice for ruling. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 388 (Chk. 2005).

If the Acting Chief Justice knows that a particular associate justice is disqualified there is no reason for him to take the pointless step of referring the matter to that associate justice for that justice to say so. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 146, 148 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

Upon receipt of a disqualification motion, the Chuuk State Supreme Court justice must refer the motion to another justice, to hear the motion and rule upon it. There is no room for discretion. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 184 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

When a party files a motion to remove a trial justice from presiding over a case, irrespective of nomenclature, the party is attacking that justice's perceived bias or conflict of interest. For purposes of the referral procedure set forth in section 22(5) of the Chuuk Judiciary Act, a motion to recuse and one to disqualify are one and the same. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 185 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

A Chuuk State Supreme Court justice exceeds his jurisdiction when he refuses to refer a recusal motion to another trial division justice. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 185 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

When a petition addressed to an appellate justice asking that he disqualify himself has been denied by that justice, the party may file a petition for a writ of prohibition to prevent that justice from continuing to sit on the appeal. When the other two panel justices are of the opinion that the writ of prohibition clearly should not be granted, they will deny the petition. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 303, 304 (App. 2006).

The FSM disqualification statute requires that a motion to disqualify a justice be filed before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown for filing it later. When good cause was not shown for filing a disqualification motion four months after the hearing for which the movant seeks a justice's disqualification, it will be denied as untimely. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 303, 304 (App. 2006).

When a party has filed a writ of prohibition directed to disqualify one appellate justice, the remaining members of the appellate panel may deny that petition if it clearly should not be granted. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 305, 308 n.2 (App. 2006).

Since the FSM disqualification statute requires that a motion to disqualify a justice be filed before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown for filing it at a later time, when good cause was not shown for filing a disqualification motion four months after the hearing for which the movant now seeks a justice's disqualification, it will be denied as untimely. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 305, 308 (App. 2006).

By failing to refer motions to recuse and to disqualify the presiding justice to another justice, as required by the State Judiciary Act, the trial justice violated the movants' rights to due process of law. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 108 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A motion for a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice's disqualification must be supported by affidavit(s) establishing a factual basis for the motion. Mere argument by counsel, be it oral or set forth in a brief, is not the basis on which motions to disqualify are determined. It is the movant's burden to go beyond wide-ranging speculation or conclusions and show a factual basis for recusal by admissible competent evidence. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 412 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A trial judge is justified in denying a motion for recusal on the basis of the moving party's failure to file an affidavit explaining the factual basis for the motion. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 412 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An application for a trial judge's disqualification must be filed at the earliest opportunity. This rule will be strictly applied against a party who, having knowledge of the facts constituting a disqualification, does not seek to disqualify the judge until an unfavorable ruling has been made. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 412 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A motion to recuse may be considered untimely when it is brought many weeks after the deadline for pretrial motions and when the movant has known for months which justice would be presiding over the trial. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 412 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

By Chuuk statute, a disqualification motion filed after trial has begun must be denied unless there is a showing of good cause for filing it at a later time. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 412 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A motion to recuse is deficient and will be denied when it was filed without an accompanying affidavit as required by law because without an affidavit establishing the degree of relationship between the justice and the parties, the court has no basis to grant the motion, and when there has been no attempt to comply with the statutory requirement that good cause be shown for filing the motion after trial has already begun. Nakamura v. Sharivy, 15 FSM R. 409, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the trial judge has a Rule 60(b) motion before him, which is within his jurisdiction to consider and deny even though the case is on appeal, and also a motion to recuse, and when, upon receipt of a recusal motion, a justice must rule on it before proceeding any further in the matter, the trial judge is required to rule on the recusal motion before proceeding on to the Rule 60(b) motion. The trial judge therefore had the jurisdiction to, and a duty to, rule on the recusal motion. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 589 (App. 2008).

When, while the judgment was on appeal, the appellant's recusal motion was filed at the same time as her Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment and the recusal motion had to be decided before any action could be taken on the Rule 60(b) motion, and when the appellant did not file a separate notice of appeal from the post-judgment order denying recusal, the appellate court accordingly lacks jurisdiction to review the recusal issue. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 589 (App. 2008).

An appellate court may first address the ground that the trial judge ought to have recused himself because if the appellant were to prevail on it, the case would be remanded for a new trial and no other issue would need to be addressed. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 367 (App. 2011).

An application to disqualify a trial judge ought to be filed at the earliest opportunity. This principle should be applied against a party who, having knowledge of the facts constituting a disqualification, does not seek to disqualify the judge until after an unfavorable ruling has been made. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 367 (App. 2011).

To permit a party to disqualify a judge after learning how the judge intended to rule on a matter would permit forum-shopping of the worst kind. It would also be inequitable, because it would afford the moving party an additional opportunity to achieve a favorable result while denying a similar opportunity to its adversary. For these reasons, it is generally agreed that a party who has a reasonable basis for moving to disqualify a judge should not be permitted to delay filing a disqualification motion in hope of first obtaining a favorable ruling, and then complain only if the result is unfavorable to his cause. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 367 (App. 2011).

The appellate court will not consider a recusal issue when, by her own account, the appellant knew of the factual basis for a recusal motion long before trial but she delayed raising the issue in the case until she filed her appellate brief. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 367-68 (App. 2011).

Following the judge's disclosure on the record of any basis for disqualification other than personal bias or prejudice concerning a party, the judge may ask the parties and their lawyers to consider, out of the judge's presence, whether to waive disqualification, and, if the parties and lawyers, without participation by the judge, all agree that the judge should not be disqualified, and the judge is then willing to participate, the judge may participate in the proceeding. The agreement must be incorporated in the record of the proceeding. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 504 (App. 2011).

When the Land Court judge asked the parties and counsel to consider whether to waive his disqualification but there was no recess taken after the judge informed the parties's counsel of his possible disqualification and when it may be inferred that the Land Court judge participated in the waiver process and actively solicited a waiver and that an agreement by all parties and their counsel (assuming that there was one) on waiver was not, as required, made out of the judge's presence and without his participation, the Land Court judge's disqualification was not properly remitted and his decision will be vacated and the matter remanded. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 504-05 (App. 2011).

A motion for disqualification of a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice must be supported by affidavit(s) establishing a factual basis for the motion. Mere argument by counsel, be it oral or set forth in a brief, is not the basis on which motions to disqualify are determined. It is the movant's burden to go beyond wide-ranging speculation or conclusions and show a factual basis for recusal by admissible, competent evidence. In re Title to Two Parcels, 19 FSM R. 482, 485 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

A trial judge is justified in denying a motion for recusal on the basis of the moving party's failure to file an affidavit explaining the factual basis for the motion. In re Title to Two Parcels, 19 FSM R. 482, 485 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

An application for a trial judge's disqualification must be filed at the earliest opportunity. This rule will be strictly applied against a party who, having knowledge of the facts constituting a disqualification, does not seek to disqualify the judge until an unfavorable ruling has been made. In re Title to Two Parcels, 19 FSM R. 482, 485 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

A motion to recuse may be considered untimely when it is brought many weeks after the deadline for pretrial motions and when the movant has known for months which justice would be presiding over the trial. In re Title to Two Parcels, 19 FSM R. 482, 485 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

By Chuuk statute, a disqualification motion filed after trial has begun must be denied unless there is good cause for filing it at a later time. In re Title to Two Parcels, 19 FSM R. 482, 485 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

A disqualification motion is deficient and untimely when it is unclear what involvement, if any, the trial judge had in the instant matter; when it was only after a judgment had been rendered in another's favor, and after the denial of two motions to set aside the judgment, that the movant sought to disqualify the trial judge; when the movant has failed to establish "good cause" for filing the disqualification motion almost seven months after the judgment was rendered; and when, in support of its disqualification motion, the movant merely stated that it "did not have knowledge of the facts constituting a disqualification until about seven months, or this month, June 2014," since this statement, without anything further, is insufficient to meet the good cause standard. In re Title to Two Parcels, 19 FSM R. 482, 485-86 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

Generally, any application to disqualify a trial judge must be filed at the earliest opportunity, and this principle is applied against a party who, having knowledge of the facts constituting a disqualification, does not seek to disqualify the judge until after an unfavorable ruling has been made. Just as a litigant may not sit idly by during the course of litigation and then seek to present additional defenses in the event of an adverse outcome, a litigant may not sit idly by and seek to disqualify a judge only after an adverse final judgment has been rendered. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 157, 159-60 (Kos. 2015).

A motion for a justice's disqualification must be supported by affidavit(s) establishing a factual basis for the motion. Mere argument by counsel, be it oral or set forth in a brief, is not the basis on which motions to disqualify are determined. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 228 (Chk. 2015).

A motion to disqualify a judge that is not supported by an affidavit explaining the factual basis for the motion, is insufficient and will be denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 228 (Chk. 2015).

For the purpose of a recusal motion, a temporary justice is considered an FSM justice, to whom 4 F.S.M.C. 124 applies. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 228 (Chk. 2015).

A petition for a writ of prohibition to disqualify a trial court judge is procedurally deficient when it includes a lone exhibit which reflects the trial judge's order; when there is no affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist; when it lacks a memorandum of points and authorities; and when it includes a motion to stay that does not properly belong before the appellate division since it should have been filed in the trial court. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 249 (App. 2015).

A petitioner for a writ of prohibition must allege facts that show an appearance of partiality. Without a supporting affidavit, the purported facts underpinning the allegation are absent, and only the petitioner's subjective assertions remain, and when the petitioner's unsupported allegations that the judge is not impartial are purely speculative, they are insufficient to support his disqualification. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

When there are too many procedural deficiencies to overlook because the application for a writ of prohibition's certificate of service shows service only on the respondent judge at her office; because the real parties in interest were not served and were not named as real parties in interest in the application or in the case caption; because the petition does not contain a copy of the respondent judge's order denying her recusal, if there was a written order, or a transcript of the denial on the record if the denial was made orally; and because, although the relevant judicial disqualification statute requires that an application to disqualify a justice be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist, no affidavit accompanied the petition although an "affidavit attached hereto" is mentioned in the application, the petition for a writ of prohibition will be denied without prejudice to any future application in which all of the procedural deficiencies have been cured. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 563, 564 (App. 2016).

A court must decide a disqualification motion and give its reasons for its decision before it can rule on any other matter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 20 FSM R. 565, 569 (Pon. 2016).

A Chuuk State Supreme Court justice exceeds his jurisdiction when he refuses to refer a recusal motion to another trial division justice. For purposes of the referral procedure set forth in section 22(5) of the Chuuk Judiciary Act, a motion to recuse and one to disqualify are one and the same. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

The standard for disqualification in a proceeding is whether a disinterested reasonable person, knowing all the circumstances, would harbor doubts about a judge's impartiality. There is a presumption that judicial officers are unbiased and the burden of proof rests with the party asserting an unconstitutional bias to demonstrate otherwise. In re Estate of Setik, 20 FSM R. 604, 606 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2016).

The relevant judicial disqualification statute requires that an application to disqualify a justice, be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist. Miju Mulsan Co. v. Carl-Worswick, 20 FSM R. 660, 662 (App. 2016).

It is a well recognized rule that an application for a trial judge's disqualification must be filed at the earliest opportunity. This rule is strictly applied against a party, who had knowledge of the facts that establish a disqualification, but did not ask for the judge's disqualification until an unfavorable ruling was made in the matter. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 217 (App. 2019).

A motion to recuse should be brought before the trial or hearing unless good cause is shown for filing at a later time. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 217 (App. 2019).

Sufficient cause for a party to seek the presiding judge's disqualification after he has made his decision is shown when the presiding judge disclosed his uncle-nephew relationship with the parties while rendering his decision and further discussed a different, related case wherein he indicated that, because a party in that case lost, it was rightful that he also lose this case. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 217 (App. 2019).

A party's motion to disqualify a judge must be supported by an affidavit. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

Generally, an affidavit is required to provide a factual basis for questioning a judge's impartiality, but other admissible evidence may be used to support a motion to recuse. When the presiding justice's own statements about his own knowledge of facts relating to the incident and the defendant's alleged conduct, were made on the record in the courtroom hearings, these statements may be used to question a justice's impartiality and be a basis for disqualification. Under such facts, the affidavit requirement is satisfied by other admissible evidence: the record of the hearings. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

The movants have met the standard for showing a factual basis for the judge's disqualification when they have provided an affidavit from a disinterested observer who has pointed to the close familial ties and friendship that the judge has with the case's parties. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 218 (App. 2019).

The statute requires that a disqualification motion be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist. A disqualification motion may be denied solely on the ground that the movant failed to accompany it with an affidavit setting forth the motion's factual basis. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 317, 319 (Chk. 2019).

The relevant statute requires that a disqualification motion shall be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist. A disqualification motion may be denied solely because the movant failed to accompany it with an affidavit setting forth the motion's factual basis. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 363 n.15 (Pon. 2019).

When there is an actual disqualification motion, the court would have to address it first. A contemporaneous denial should suffice when the denial and a substantive order are included in the same document and issued simultaneously. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 363 n.15 (Pon. 2019).

The FSM Supreme Court has no mechanism whereby a motion to disqualify a justice may be referred to or assigned to another trial division justice for decision. The justice to whom the motion is addressed is expected to, and must, rule on the motion. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 608, 610 (Kos. 2020).

– Recusal – Rule of Necessity

Practical and policy considerations relating to judicial administration in the FSM could be viewed as justifying invocation of the Rule of Necessity whereby judges are obliged to hear and decide cases from which they might otherwise recuse themselves if no other judge is available to hear the case. FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 469-70 (Kos. 1984).

The Rule of Necessity has been held in the United States to prevail over the disqualification provisions of 28 U.S.C. § 455 and Canon 3C of the ABA Code of Judicial Conduct, both of which are nearly identical to the language of 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) and (2). FSM v. Skilling, 1 FSM R. 464, 470-71 (Kos. 1984).

Given the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia the Rule of Necessity may oblige judges to hear and decide cases from which they would otherwise recuse themselves. Factors to be considered include delay, expense, and impact on other cases. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (I), 6 FSM R. 318, 323-24 (Pon. 1994).

Because parties have a right to trial before a justice duly appointed by the President under Article XI of the Constitution the Rule of Necessity may be invoked to prevent recusal of a judge when no other judge is qualified to hear the case. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 7 FSM R. 644, 648 (Pon. 1996).

The only time the Rule of Necessity may apply to allow a judge not to recuse himself is if no other judge is available to hear the case. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

The "rule of necessity" cannot be applied to force an otherwise disqualified justice to serve because as long as it is possible to appoint a temporary judge who is not disqualified, the rule of necessity has no application and cannot be resorted to. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

If the Chief Justice is a member of a Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate panel, or is so removed or disqualified, then the most senior associate justice who has not been removed or disqualified from the case shall appoint the temporary justices, but if all Chuuk State Supreme Court justices are disqualified and there is no associate justice that could appoint a panel in the Chief Justice's stead and there is no provision for the Chief Justice to appoint a temporary justice to make the appointments, then the rule of necessity, in this limited circumstance, allows the Chief Justice to make the panel appointments. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The "rule of necessity" cannot be applied to force an otherwise disqualified justice to serve because as long as it is possible to appoint a temporary judge who is not disqualified, the rule of necessity has no application and cannot be resorted to. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 146, 148 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The only time the "rule of necessity" may be applied to allow a judge not to recuse himself is if no other judge is available to hear the case. The "rule of necessity" cannot be applied to permit an otherwise disqualified justice to serve as long as it is possible to appoint a temporary judge who is not disqualified. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 603, 606 (App. 2014).

It is established law that the rule of necessity cannot be applied to permit an otherwise disqualified justice to serve as long as it is possible to appoint a temporary judge who is not disqualified. The "rule of necessity" may be applied to allow a judge not to recuse himself only if no other judge is available to hear the case. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 220 (App. 2019).

The rule of necessity does not apply when the other Kosrae State Court justice has not ruled whether he is disqualified and because, if all of the regularly-appointed Kosrae State Court justices are disqualified, the Kosrae State Code provides for the appointment of a temporary justice. Heirs of Sigrah v. George, 22 FSM R. 211, 220 (App. 2019).

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE

It is doubtful that Congress would have the power to require that all criminal prosecutions be in the name of the Federated States of Micronesia. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 31 (Pon. 1981).

Familial relationships are an important segment, perhaps the most important component, of the custom and tradition referred to generally in the Constitution FSM Const. art. V, art. XI, § 11, and more specifically in the National Criminal Code. 11 F.S.M.C. 108, 1003. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 40 (Truk 1981).

Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code is not inconsistent with nor violative of the FSM Constitution; therefore 11 Trust Territory Code continued in effect after the effective date of the Constitution and until the National Criminal Code's effective date. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 127, 130 (Truk 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court is required by the National Criminal Code to recognize generally accepted customs and to determine the applicability and effect of customary law in a criminal case; it is not authorized to develop new customary law. 11 F.S.M.C. 108. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 140, 146-47 (Pon. 1982).

Section 102(2) of the National Criminal Code preserved all the substantive rights of defendants applicable in a guilt determination proceeding as of the time of the crime's commission. 11 F.S.M.C. 102(2). In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 191-92 (App. 1982).

Change of forum for Title 11 Trust Territory Code cases from the Trust Territory High Court to the FSM Supreme Court is a procedural matter with no effect on the defendants' substantive rights. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 193 (App. 1982).

The court must first look to sources of law and circumstances here to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of cases decided by other courts. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 214 (App. 1982).

In the FSM, criminal cases are tried before the judge as fact finder. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 441 (App. 1984).

Although the Model Penal Code was the primary source for the National Criminal Code it was modified to suit the particular needs of the area. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 511 (App. 1984).

When more than one offense or wrongful intent is charged in a single count, the trial court may require the government to select among the charges if failure to do so might result in prejudice to the defendant. However, this is a matter within the trial court's discretion. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 517 (App. 1984).

The FSM Supreme Court Rules of Criminal Procedure were designed to avoid technicalities and gamesmanship in criminal pleading. They are to be construed to secure simplicity in procedure. Convictions should not be reversed, nor the information thrown out, because of minor, technical objections which do not prejudice the accused. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 518 (App. 1984).

A trial court may in its discretion permit a case involving separate charges based upon the same act to proceed to trial. The court, however, should render a decision and enter a conviction only on the more major of the crimes proven beyond a reasonable doubt. After appeal, if any, has been completed, and the greater charge is reversed on appeal, the trial court may then find it necessary to enter a judgment on the lesser charge. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 529 (App. 1984).

Rule 7 of the FSM Rules of Criminal Procedure is based upon Rule 7 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure employed by the United States federal courts. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 541 (App. 1984).

Unchartered and unincorporated municipalities in Truk State have authority to enact curfew ordinances as long as they do not conflict with Truk State laws. David v. Fanapanges Municipality, 3 FSM R. 495, 497 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

The function of the criminal law is to declare what conduct a society considers to be unacceptable and worthy of sanctions at the instigation of government on the society's behalf; the criminal law is thus the principal vehicle for the expression of the people's standards of right and wrong. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 91 (App. 1989).

Under the equal protection clause of the Declaration of Rights in the FSM Constitution, indigency alone should not disadvantage an accused in our system of criminal justice. Gilmete v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 165, 169 (App. 1989).

In adopting the Declaration of Rights as part of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia and therefore the supreme law of the land, the people of Micronesia subscribed to various principles which place upon the judiciary the obligation, among others, to assure that arrests are based upon probable cause, that determinations of guilt are arrived at fairly, and that punishments for wrongdoing are proportionate to the crime and meet prescribed standards. Tammed v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 266, 281-82 (App. 1990).

The Chapman rule, which holds that a constitutional error can be found harmless only when it is harmless beyond a reasonable doubt, is suitable for the FSM. Jonah v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 308, 314 (App. 1992).

Criminal statutes in effect on the effective date of the State of Chuuk Constitution (Oct. 1, 1989) that are consistent with the Constitution continue in effect. Chuuk v. Arnish, 6 FSM R. 611, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

The law treats a company, although not an actual, living person, as a person for purposes of liability, and may hold it criminally liable. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 212 (Pon. 1995).

The unambiguous words of a statute which imposes criminal penalties cannot be altered by judicial construction to punish someone not otherwise within its reach, no matter how much he deserves punishment. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

A general section in a statute cannot expand the class of principals to whom the more specific sections are directed. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

A statute not cited in the information and not mentioned by the prosecution until closing argument cannot be the basis of criminal liability. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

A sole proprietorship cannot be charged as a principal if there are no acts or omissions committed by its owner, but it can be found culpable as an accessory if it is specifically charged with vicarious liability for the acts of another. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 441 (Kos. 1996).

Proceedings concerning the arrest or release of a vessel should take place in the civil action in which it is a defendant, not in a related criminal case. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 474 n.4, 475 n.5 (App. 1996).

The criminal conviction of two defendants who never appeared for trial is plain error, and their trial court convictions must be vacated. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. FSM, 7 FSM R. 471, 477 (App. 1996).

A judgment that is reversed and remanded stands as if no trial has yet been held. A party whose convictions have been reversed stands in the position of an accused who has not yet been tried. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

In an appeal of a criminal conviction, before the appellate court can conclude that a trial court error was harmless, the court must conclude that it was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 99 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

When the Yap Legislature has not demonstrated a positive intent to authorize conviction for two crimes, one of which requires proof of an additional fact, on the same facts, the trial court should render a decision and enter a conviction only on the more major of the crimes proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore a conviction for aggravated assault should be vacated when for the same act there is a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, which requires proof of an additional fact. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 101 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

Congress has the express power to define national crimes, and until the Constitution was amended in 1991, Congress also had the express power to define major crimes. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 153 (Yap 1997).

Because a corporate principal may be held criminally liable for its agent's conduct when the agent acts within the scope of its authority for the principal's benefit, a foreign fishing agreement party may be held criminally liable for the conduct of its authorized vessel. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 176 (Pon. 1997).

An authorized vessel's master's knowledge is attributable to its foreign fishing agreement party because knowledge held by an agent or employee of a corporation may be attributed to its principal. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 180 (Pon. 1997).

In reviewing a criminal conviction against an insufficiency of the evidence challenge, the appellate court must ask whether the trier of fact could reasonably have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence it had a right to believe and accept as true. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 401 (App. 1998).

The criminal law is not to be used to settle conflicting claims to property. Property disputes in Micronesia strain the social fabric of the communities in which they occur. The filing of a criminal action injects an element of criminality into a matter which is, at its core, civil, and increases that strain. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 406 (App. 1998).

The legislative history of Title 54 indicates that it was created as a system primarily aimed at recovering revenue rather than punishing wrongdoers with lengthy prison sentences and that the fines and criminal penalties adopted in it were thought to be commensurate with the specified wrongdoing. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 547 (Pon. 1998).

The National Criminal Code was primarily drawn from the Model Penal Code modified to suit the particular needs of the area. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 548 (Pon. 1998).

There is no clearly expressed Congressional intent for the criminal code to be used to prosecute tax crimes. Since the FSM had existing laws with comprehensive civil and criminal penalties applicable to tax crimes at the time the criminal code was adopted, the implication is that the criminal code was not intended for the purpose of prosecuting such crimes. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 549 (Pon. 1998).

A customary forgiveness ceremony resolving disputes among families or clans may not prevent the court system from determining the individual guilt of the defendant and considering whether societal notions of justice and the need to uphold law and order require fining, imprisonment or other restriction of the defendant's freedom. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 579 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When, in a three-year old criminal appeal, notice was served requiring appellant's opening brief to be filed and served by a certain date and the notice further stated that failure to do so would be grounds for dismissal of the appeal, no brief was ever filed and a motion bordering on frivolous was filed for more time, the motion may be denied and the case is remanded to the trial division for additional proceedings, including sentencing, as is provided for by law. Reselap v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 584, 586-87 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The purpose of an information, summons or warrant is to inform the defendant of what he is called upon to defend. Chuuk v. Defang, 9 FSM R. 43, 45 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court is authorized by law to do all acts as may be necessary for due administration of justice, including the issuance of a bench warrant. Chuuk v. Defang, 9 FSM R. 43, 45 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The purpose of a preliminary examination is two-fold. The court must determine whether there is probable cause to believe that a criminal offense has been committed and that the arrested person committed it. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

No probable cause to believe that a criminal offense has been committed exists when the defendants' alleged conduct as set out in the information has not been made criminal under any statute, rule, or regulation to which the court's attention has been directed. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

When the FSM moves for a stay of a civil case to preserve the defendants' rights in a related criminal case and the defendants oppose the motion and claim that they would suffer substantial prejudice from a delayed prosecution of the civil action and when the FSM had the prosecutorial discretion to file both the civil and criminal cases simultaneously, although there is nothing in the statute requiring that, the motion to stay will be denied and, in the absence of good cause, the civil case will go forward. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Fishery Co., 9 FSM R. 351, 353 (Kos. 2000).

The statute that provides for joint law enforcement agreements between the national government and the states reflects a public policy in favor of cooperative law enforcement undertakings. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Fishery Co., 9 FSM R. 421, 423 (Kos. 2000).

The standard to be applied in reviewing a criminal conviction against an insufficiency of the evidence challenge is whether the appellate court can conclude that the trier of fact could reasonably have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence which it had a right to believe and accept as true. The appellate court must review the evidence in the light most favorable to the trial court's factual determination. A trial court's factual findings challenged for insufficiency are reviewed on a clearly erroneous standard, while the appellate court may disagree with and overrule the trial court's conclusions of law. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 449 (App. 2000).

FSM Appellate Procedure Rule 9(c) sets forth the criteria for release pending an appeal from a criminal conviction. The burden of establishing the requisite criteria rests with the defendant. FSM v. Akapito, 10 FSM R. 255, 256 (Chk. 2001).

The legislative privilege doctrine has both substantive and evidentiary aspects. In substance, the doctrine renders legislators immune from civil and criminal liability based on either speech or debate in the course of proceedings in the legislature. From an evidentiary standpoint, a legislator may claim the privilege in declining to answer any questions outside the legislature itself where those questions concern how a legislator voted, acted, or decided on matters within the sphere of legitimate legislative activity. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 425 (Pon. 2001).

Although the court must first look to sources of law and circumstances in the FSM to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of cases decided by other courts, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 11 n.2 (Chk. 2002).

The Pohnpei state criminal statutes were intended to provide for criminal penalties for those who commit certain acts which are prohibited by the Act. The Pohnpei Crimes Act is not intended to create a basis for private parties to sue other parties, but to enable the Pohnpei state government to be able to punish those persons who violate provisions of the Act. Statutes which do not by their terms provide citizens with a cause of action for money damages cannot be the basis for private damages claims.

Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 17, 25 (Pon. 2002).

In a criminal appeal, the appropriate standard of review for sufficiency of the evidence questions is whether, reviewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the trial court's determinations of fact, there is sufficient evidence to convince a reasonable trier of fact of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Yow v. Yap, 11 FSM R. 63, 65 (Yap S. Ct. App. 2002).

The word "demand" means "ask as by right." When a police officer did request and ask as by right for the defendant's driver's license, even though the officer did not use the word "demand," the officer's request to the defendant for his driver's license satisfies the statute's "demand" requirement. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 263, 264 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

It is fundamental that no person may be deprived of liberty without due process of law. Due process of law, in the case of citizens accused of a crime, includes the right to be promptly brought before a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice, or other judicial officer, and to be informed of the charges being brought against him. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 278 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The right of a person arrested for the commission of a crime to due process of law, including the right to be promptly brought before a Chuuk State Supreme Court justice or other judicial officer for initial appearance within 24 hours of his arrest, is a fundamental right afforded to all Chuuk citizens. Only under the most extraordinary circumstances, and then only with a specific, clear, and unambiguous statement, may a Governor's declaration of emergency suspend this due process right or other civil rights of Chuuk citizens. In re Paul, 11 FSM R. 273, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When there are no reported decisions in the FSM interpreting a Chuuk Criminal Rule, the Chuuk State Supreme Court may look for guidance to cases addressing the issue from the U.S. Federal Circuits. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 306 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Logic dictates that certain events in the course of a criminal investigation and prosecution will involve ex parte communications with a judge. For example, giving advance notice of an impending search could defeat the purposes of the search where property permitted to be seized was located on the about-to-be searched premises. Similarly, giving a defendant notice of the filing of a criminal complaint or information prior to arrest could facilitate a defendant's avoidance of arrest were a defendant disinclined to cooperate with law enforcement. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 2003).

One subparagraph of a criminal rule should not be read so as to render another subparagraph unsusceptible to a meaning readily derived from the words employed at best, and indecipherable at worst. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 511, 513 (Pon. 2003).

Prosecutions for offenses committed before the effective date of the new national criminal code are governed by the prior law, which is continued as if the new code were not in force. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 108 (Chk. 2003).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of cases decided by other courts, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM procedural rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 109 n.1 (Chk. 2003).

By deliberately using a different term in 11 F.S.M.C. 105(3)(b) from the one defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(11), the drafters can only have intended that the meaning be different, and, by not defining it, that the term's meaning should be the common, ordinary English language meaning of the term because words and phrases as used in the code must be read with their context and be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 110 (Chk. 2003).

When the statute's drafters deliberately chose the term "public officer" in an exception to the criminal statute of limitations instead of using the term "public servant," as they did in so many other criminal code sections, the statute's object and the drafters' intent was to apply this exception to all public officers, not just to those the criminal code defined as "public servants." This is the statute's plain and unambiguous meaning. If the drafters had intended to restrict the exception to just those persons that had been defined as "public servants," they could easily have inserted that term instead. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

As jeopardy does not attach in a criminal case until the first witness is sworn in to testify at trial, the trial court will therefore not stay pretrial proceedings while the defendant seeks appellate review because rulings on pretrial motions not yet filed may dispose of the case entirely in the defendant's favor. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2003).

The only stay of a pending criminal case while appellate review is sought that the trial court could consider granting would be a stay of trial. For a stay to be granted, the appeal must be meritorious – a substantial likelihood that the applicant will prevail. A stay is normally granted only where the court is persuaded as to the probability of the movant's ultimate success. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2003).

In order for a defendant to be granted a stay of a criminal proceeding while he seeks interlocutory appellate review, he must show that his appeal or his petition is meritorious and has a substantial likelihood of success on the merits. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. 2003).

A person commits an offense if he willfully, whether or not acting under color of law, deprives another of, or injures, oppresses, threatens, or intimidates another in the free exercise or enjoyment of, or because of his having so exercised any right, privilege, or immunity secured to him by the FSM Constitution or laws. Section 701(3) provides for civil liability, including attorney's fees, against any person engaging in the proscribed conduct. "Person" includes state governments. Wortel v. Bickett, 12 FSM R. 223, 225 (Kos. 2003).

A court cannot infer criminal conduct when the FSM statute at issue is not tailored to prohibit general threats, but only those that expressly are for the purpose of influencing a decision of a public officer. When there are no applicable criminal prohibitions in the Code of the Federated States of Micronesia, it is Congress, not the court, that must act to more specifically prohibit such threatening statements or conduct. In re FSM Nat'l Police Case No. NP 10-04-03, 12 FSM R. 248, 251 (Pon. 2003).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal principles in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of cases decided by other courts, the court may also look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting a rule when the FSM rule is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 381 n.3 (Chk. 2004).

The Constitution permits the Chief Justice to promulgate rules, including criminal procedure rules, which Congress may amend by statute. Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute, and when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. The Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 383 (Chk. 2004).

The statute, 12 F.S.M.C. 204, and the rule, FSM Crim. R. 4(a), applying to criminal complaints cannot be followed when no complaint was ever filed and when the government earlier filed a criminal information. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 383-84 (Chk. 2004).

A complaint is made upon oath before a judicial officer or a clerk of the court. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 384 (Chk. 2004).

Unlike the appellate rules, neither the civil nor criminal procedure rules provide for an amicus curiae's appearance, although the court has in the past invited amicus curiae briefs in civil cases. FSM v. Sipos, 12 FSM R. 385, 387 (Chk. 2004).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of cases decided by other courts, when the court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. rule, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 409 n.3 (Chk. 2004).

The national criminal code signed into law on January 25, 2001, does not apply to acts committed before its effective date, and prosecutions for offenses committed before the effective date are governed by the prior law, which is continued in effect for that purpose. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 501 (Pon. 2004).

The Financial Management Regulations apply to the expenditure, obligation, and disbursement of funds. These Regulations were promulgated by the Secretary of Finance pursuant to statutory authority and have the force and effect of law. Under the statutes and regulations, funds cannot be used for any purpose other than for which they were allotted, and the Project Control Document is a legally binding document which sets forth the purposes for which the allotted funds must be used. FSM v. Fritz, 12 FSM R. 602, 604 (Chk. 2004).

A former Secretary of Finance's testimony as to his current understanding of the legal effect and the meaning of certain regulations can only be given little or no weight since it does not qualify as satisfactory "legislative history." The regulations speak for themselves. FSM v. Fritz, 12 FSM R. 602, 604 (Chk. 2004).

As a general principle, a court must impose the least severe sanction that will accomplish the desired result of prompt and full compliance with applicable criminal procedure. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 48, 50 (Chk. 2004).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. rule, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 85, 87 n.1 (Chk. 2004).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Fritz, 13 FSM R. 88, 90 (Chk. 2004).

When our nation's highest court, the FSM Supreme Court appellate division, interprets a constitutional provision in a case before it, that interpretation is to be given full effect in all cases still open on direct review, and as to all events, regardless of when they occurred. Once it announces a new rule of law, the integrity of judicial review requires application of the new rule to all similar cases pending on review. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

New constitutional rules affecting procedures in criminal cases apply only to those cases which are pending on direct review or which are not yet final when the new rules are announced. Thus a new constitutional rule announced in a January, 2004 decision will apply to a May 2003 case still pending at that time. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Criminal Rule 26.2 creates no right to production of statements of witnesses until the witness has testified on direct examination, but if the prosecution insists upon literal compliance with Rule 26.2(a) the practical result is that a recess must be taken at the conclusion of the direct examination of every witness, and the court would very likely abuse its discretion if it refused to grant a recess. The usual practice in the FSM under Rule 26.2 has been that the prosecution voluntarily provides defense counsel access to witness statements in advance of their testimony and the court finds this a salutary and commendable practice. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 267-68 (Chk. 2005).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' decisions, when the court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 267 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

When no reported FSM case has construed Criminal Rule 26.2(a), the court may use U.S. sources construing the identical U.S. Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 26.2(a) and its predecessor statute, 18 U.S.C. § 3500(a) (the Jencks Act), as tools in construing FSM Criminal Rule 26.2(a). FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 267 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

Neither state law nor court rules require a criminal defendant to dispute any evidence relating to the allegations prior to trial. The defendant is permitted to dispute evidence presented by the state at trial, through cross-examination or by producing independent evidence. Kosrae v. Langu, 13 FSM R. 269, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, the court may look to U.S. sources for some help in interpreting the rule when FSM cases do not provide a full answer. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

It is in the public's interest that the judicial process should both appear fair and be fair in fact. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 344, 350 (Chk. 2005).

A corporation, or unincorporated association, or other organization is a "person" under the criminal code. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 392, 394 (Chk. 2005).

Under the January 25, 2001 national criminal code, prosecutions for offenses committed before that effective date are governed by the prior law, which is continued as if the new act were not in force. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 536 (Chk. 2005).

The court must first look to FSM circumstances and sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, but when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM criminal rule that is similar or identical to a U.S. rule, the court may use U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the FSM rule. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 536 n.2 (Chk. 2005).

When none of the objections to admission of evidence are of the type that should be addressed in a pretrial motion to suppress, which is generally reserved for evidence allegedly obtained illegally, the motion to suppress should be denied and the issue of whether any of the evidence is admissible is a question that should, and will, come up in an orderly fashion during trial and be ruled upon if offered and objected to. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 2006).

Since the article IV, section 7 protection against self-incrimination was based upon the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution, FSM courts may look to United States decisions to assist in determining the meaning of article IV, section 7 because when an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Constitution provision, United States authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 150, 151 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, when an FSM court has not previously construed FSM Criminal Procedure Rule 14 which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 175 n.2 (Chk. 2006).

As a general principle, a court must impose the least severe sanction that will accomplish the desired result of prompt and full compliance with applicable criminal procedure. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 171, 176 (Chk. 2006).

When an FSM (or Kosrae) criminal rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. rule has not previously been construed, a court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 233 n.2 (App. 2006).

On December 15, 2000, the national criminal code enacted in 1982 (as amended) applied to criminal offenses. On January 25, 2001, a new national criminal code came into effect. It provided that prosecutions for offenses committed before the effective date of the new national criminal code are governed by the prior law, which is continued as if this act were not in force. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 312 (Chk. 2006).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' cases, when an FSM appellate rule is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart and has not been previously construed, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 325 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, an FSM court may consult U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting a criminal procedure rule, which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, when it has not previously construed that FSM rule. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

Although FSM courts must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when a court has not previously construed a criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 382 n.1 (App. 2006).

Since Kosrae's Rules 11(e)(1) and 52(b) are derivative of their United States counterparts, the court therefore, may examine United States case law interpreting those rules. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 387 (App. 2006).

When any person who possesses or uses any firearm is guilty of a felony and the use of the firearm was the discharge of a handgun on a public road in a village at night, it is violent felony. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 433 (Yap 2006).

Court-promulgated rules are interpreted using the principles of statutory construction. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2006).

Criminal Rule 46(c) does not apply to a person who has been sentenced to imprisonment and has filed a notice of appeal. Criminal Rule 38(a)(2) and Appellate Rule 9 specifically apply to such situations. Criminal Rule 46 applies generally to release on bail while Criminal Rule 38(a)(2) (and by reference Appellate Rule 9) applies specifically to release pending appeal after a sentence of imprisonment has been imposed. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2006).

A specific provision in the rules will control rather than a general rule to the extent that they conflict.

FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2006).

If two rules conflict, the more recent expression of the sovereign's will (that is, the most recently enacted statute or rule) prevails over the earlier to the extent of the conflict. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 463, 468 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

The court must look first to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' cases, but when the court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 n.2 (Chk. 2007).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 167 n.3 (App. 2007).

When FSM courts have not yet addressed an issue, the court may look to decisions from jurisdictions outside the FSM for authority, as well as secondary authorities, all the while keeping in mind the suitability for the FSM of any given principle. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 489 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when the language in the FSM Constitution and the U.S. Constitution is similar or identical, it is appropriate to look to United States constitutional law and its courts's interpretations, especially those interpretations existing at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention, as a guide to the intended scope of the FSM Constitution's words. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 n.1 (Chk. 2008).

Kosrae Criminal Procedure Rule 5, as amended by GCO 2004-3, requires that a defendant have an initial appearance after arrest within a reasonable time. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 603 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law for legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' decisions, when the court has not previously construed Criminal Procedure Rule 11's applicability to probation revocation or Rule 32.1's scope and those rules are similar or identical to a U.S. rule, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting those rules. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 7-8 n.1 (Chk. 2008).

When the court has not previously construed Criminal Procedure Rule 12(a), which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 28 n.1 (Chk. 2008).

A person accused of committing a national crime can rely only on his rights under the national constitution to protect himself from the actions of the national government and its agents. When the state is prosecuting national crimes in the national court, it is acting as the national government's agent pursuant to a joint law enforcement agreement, and the court will therefore only consider whether the accused's rights were violated under the FSM Constitution's due process and equal protection clauses. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 182 (Chk. 2008).

To the extent that the issues that the applicants for a writ of habeas corpus seek to raise in a moot application are significant and relevant to other issues to be raised and considered in a criminal case, they should be raised for consideration in that case in the proper manner or in a civil suit for damages. In re Mefy, 16 FSM R. 401, 403-04 (Chk. 2009).

When the 2009 Chuuk-FSM Joint Law Enforcement Agreement contains a clause whereby the FSM national government and the State of Chuuk "agree that at the end of each fiscal year the terms of this agreement shall continue in effect until such time it is terminated or renewed by the parties" and when neither party has given the required thirty days notice to terminate the 2009 Joint Law Enforcement Agreement, the agreement remains in effect. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 663 (Chk. 2009).

A joint law enforcement agreement clause that states – "Any renewal shall be subject to the availability of funds." – applies only to a renewal, not to a continuation of the current agreement. FSM v. Sias, 16 FSM R. 661, 663 (Chk. 2009).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law for purposes of establishing legal requirements in criminal cases, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM evidence rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. sources on the United States Federal Rules of Evidence for guidance. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 19 (App. 2010).

Subsection 46(c) provides for release pending sentence and for release pending appeal. It states that a person who has been convicted of an offense and is either awaiting sentence or has filed an appeal will be treated in accordance with the provisions of Rule 46(a)(1) through (6), which provide for conditions of pre-trial release and address the nature of information supporting orders issued under the rule. Criminal Rule 46(c) does not apply to a person who has been sentenced to imprisonment and has filed a notice of appeal; it applies to the release of a defendant who has been found guilty – "convicted" – but not yet sentenced. Rule 46 applies generally to release on bail. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 316 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The court should not have to instruct attorneys that the court rules mean what they say. An attorney practicing before the court is expected to know the rules and abide by them. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 316 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Chuuk Appellate Rule 9(b) makes no provision for reconsideration of a decision on a motion to stay made by the court appealed from in the first instance and specifically provides for the appellate division's review of such a determination. Were the trial court to consider a defendant's second motion as one made pursuant to Chuuk Criminal Rule 38(a)(2), it would do so in contravention of the Appellate Rules of Procedure. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 317 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When a defendant has been convicted of a crime and that conviction still stands; when his sentence for the conviction, though stayed pending appeal, also remains intact; and when his release pending appeal is subject to conditions, to view him as a "free man with all his rights intact," as he now weathers the consequences of being a convicted criminal, is to take flight into fantasy. The stay of his sentence does not also serve to exonerate him. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 317 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

If the court were authorized to rule on a defendant's motion to release his passport while his conviction is on appeal, it would be hard pressed to see how he is less likely to flee the jurisdiction now than when the conditions of his release were first imposed since the weight of the evidence adduced at trial has demonstrated his guilt beyond reasonable doubt and since now he faces re-instatement of a six-month term of imprisonment. Chuuk v. Billimon, 17 FSM R. 313, 318 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A document or a filing is what it is regardless of what it has been labeled since form must not be elevated over substance because absent compelling reasons to the contrary, form must ever subserve substance. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 352 n.5 (App. 2011).

For criminal matters, the court clerk must keep a book known as the "criminal docket" in which, among other things, must be entered each order or judgment of the court. Berman v. Pohnpei Legislature, 17 FSM R. 339, 353 n.7 (App. 2011).

An attorney practicing before the court is expected to know the rules and abide by them. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Although to establish legal requirements in criminal cases, the court must first consult FSM sources of law rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, the court may consult U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting an FSM criminal procedure rule when it has not previously construed the rule and the rule is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, such as when court has not previously considered some aspects of an information's sufficiency under Criminal Rule 7(c). FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 394 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

When establishing legal requirements in criminal cases, the court must look first to FSM sources of law rather than start with a review of other courts' cases, but then the court can and should consider decisions and reasoning of courts in the United States and other jurisdictions in arriving at its own decisions. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 396-97 n.3 (Chk. 2011).

An attorney practicing before the court is expected to know the rules and abide by them. Chuuk v. William, 17 FSM R. 495, 496 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court may consider unpublished cases when provided with copies certified by the clerk of court and when such copies are contemporaneously provided to opposing counsel. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 511 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule which is identical or similar to a U.S. rule, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

The court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' cases, but when an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM criminal procedure rule drawn from a similar U.S. rule, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in construing the rule. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than start with a review of other courts' cases, when an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning since it may be presumed that the borrowed phrases were intended to have the same meaning given to them by the U.S. Supreme Court. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 n.2 (Chk. 2012).

Criminal law and the law of torts (more than any other form of civil law) are related branches of the law; yet in a sense they are two quite different matters. Criminal law's aim is to protect the public against harm, by punishing harmful results of conduct or at least situations (not yet resulting in actual harm) which are likely to result in harm if allowed to proceed further. Tort law's function is to compensate someone who is injured for the harm he or she has suffered. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 446 (Chk. 2014).

Frequently a defendant's conduct makes him both civilly and criminally liable. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 446 (Chk. 2014).

When the defendant has not indicated what specific pieces of evidence he seeks to exclude and the prosecution does not appear to have informed the defendant what specific evidence it will seek to introduce at trial, the court is not in a position to rule on the evidence's admissibility and will deny the defendant's current motion in limine and will rule on the admissibility of any particular evidence that the defendant objects to if and when that issue comes properly before the court. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 447 (Chk. 2014).

Criminal cases are in personam proceedings, and brought against a person rather than property. Only civil actions may be brought in rem, or "against a thing." FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 619 n.1 (Pon. 2014).

Title 24 imposes criminal liability on any person who commits an act prohibited by that title. A person is defined as any natural person or business enterprise or similar entity. It does not include a vessel in rem. By statute, a person specifically includes a corporation, partnership, cooperative, association, or government entity. Although not an actual, living person, the law treats a company as a person for the purposes of liability. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 619 n.1 (Pon. 2014).

When a vessel has been arrested in rem in a parallel civil proceeding but is not restrained in the criminal matter, the government's request that the vessel be seized as evidence in the criminal case, and not for forfeiture, is an unnecessary restriction to establish that the vessel was as an instrumentality used in a crime. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 620 (Pon. 2014).

In deciding whether to stay a civil proceeding parallel to a criminal case, the decision maker should consider 1) the plaintiff's interest in proceeding expeditiously with the litigation or any particular aspect of it, and the potential prejudice to plaintiffs of a delay, 2) the burden which any particular aspect of the proceedings may impose on defendants; 3) the court's convenience in the management of its cases, and the efficient use of judicial resources; 4) the interests of persons not parties to the civil litigation; and 5) the public's interest in the pending civil and criminal litigation. Notably, the judicial economy factor in not duplicating the efforts in both the civil and criminal case is frequently used to justify a stay. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 627 (Pon. 2014).

When a civil matter and a criminal matter are inextricably interwoven, when the parties are the same; when both cases are based on the same alleged conduct; when both are alleged violations of the same FSM fisheries law; when the only distinction is that the civil action seeks civil penalties while the criminal action seeks criminal penalties; and when the defendants admitted to trying to use civil depositions to acquire discovery information, but that what they really seek is the fishery observer's report and not only is this report not privileged in the criminal matter but also must be disclosed under Criminal Rule 16, there is no reason why this particular discovery material should be stayed or withheld in the civil proceeding. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 628 (Pon. 2014).

When civil depositions would trigger a variety of procedural prejudices; when the defendants cannot use the more lenient rules of civil procedure to depose the witnesses before the criminal case; when the depositions raise significant conflicts with the defendants' own constitutional right against self-incrimination; and when the depositions will likely not be needed following the criminal hearing and thus potentially a duplicative waste of judicial resources, there is good cause to stay the depositions until after the criminal probable cause hearing, but a full stay is not warranted. Due to the vessel's significant value and business losses that are occurring in the civil matter, the substantial prejudice to the defendants outweighs granting a complete stay in the civil action until the criminal case's conclusion. In the interest of justice and judicial economy, the court will exercise procedural flexibility to stay only those matters, such as depositions, that would cause conflicts with the criminal proceeding. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 628 (Pon. 2014).

Public policy supports justly resolving criminal cases while allocating resources efficiently within the criminal justice system. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 47 (Pon. 2015).

While it is appropriate for a Chief Justice to engage with all the relevant stake-holders in the process of promulgating a general court order, the decision making process is quite different for a justice called upon to render an evidentiary ruling in a criminal case. Even when a party raises a question of first impression, a judge presiding over a criminal case has a responsibility to apply the law to the case's facts, and it would be an abuse of judicial discretion to delay an evidentiary ruling in order to solicit advice from non-parties suggesting what the law should be. This judicial power is curtailed by the process of appellate review.

FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 49, 53 (Pon. 2015).

In matters of first impression, the court may look to case law of other jurisdictions, particularly the United States, for comparison and guidance. FSM v. Bisalen, 20 FSM R. 471, 473 (Pon. 2016).

A person may be convicted and sentenced under the laws of the FSM if he or she commits, or attempts to commit a crime, in whole or in part within the FSM. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 298 (Chk. 2017).

When a statute's language is plain and unambiguous, it declares its own meaning and there is no room for construction. However, a statute that either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law. A statute that is so vague and ill-defined that the acts prohibited cannot be understood by people of ordinary intelligence, cannot serve as a basis for criminal prosecution. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Criminal Rule 2 which requires that the Rules be construed to provide fairness in administration and the elimination of unjustified expense and delay in criminal proceedings. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Public policy supports justly resolving criminal cases while allocating resources efficiently within the criminal justice system. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 22 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Within common law jurisdictions, courts have always had an inherit power to administer their proceedings as well as the order of proof in the interest of efficiency and justice. Derived from the court's common law power to administer its proceedings, is the implied power to decide whether to allow a party to re-open its case in chief after closing, even though, as a general rule, parties are expected to produce all evidence available to them at the time scheduled for hearing. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130c (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Chuuk courts have referred to certain practices and decisions in other common law jurisdictions, mostly notably the U.S., as persuasive authority when a doctrine was applicable and supported by good policy to incorporate into FSM jurisprudence based on the realities present within the jurisdiction, and the vast number of decisions in common law jurisdictions provide a mechanism, under common law, for the court to use its discretion so as to consider allowing a state to reopen its case in chief after having closed that case. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130c-0d (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

As a general rule, the state is expected to produce all evidence available to it at the time of trial. This rule exists for the purposes of judicial economy, an efficient disposition of cases, and to not delay the defendant's rights to a speedy trial. Some instances merit exception to this general rule. Chuuk v. Nowell, 22 FSM R. 130a, 130d (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When a Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule conflicts with a Chuuk statute, the statute's language prevails because the Chuuk Constitution vests the Chief Justice with the authority to promulgate Criminal Procedure Rules, which the legislature may amend by statute, but the Chief Justice has no authority to amend a statute enacted by the legislature. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When a Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule conflicts with a Chuuk statute, the statute's language prevails because the Chuuk Constitution vests the Chief Justice with the authority to promulgate Procedure Rules, which the legislature may amend by statute, but the Chief Justice has no authority to amend a statute enacted by the legislature. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases, but, when the court has not construed aspects of an FSM criminal procedure rule that is similar to a U.S. rule, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 n.4 (Yap 2020).

Under the law of the case doctrine, unless corrected by an appellate tribunal, a legal decision made at one stage of a civil or criminal case constitutes the law of the case throughout the pendency of the litigation. Strictly speaking, the doctrine is not implicated for interlocutory orders because they remain open to trial court reconsideration, and do not constitute the law of the case. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 521-22 (App. 2020).

Lawmakers have wide latitude to declare an offense and to exclude elements of knowledge and diligence from its definition. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 525 (App. 2020).

That one section follows another in the FSM Criminal Code is not particularly relevant because the classification of the titles, chapters, subchapters, and sections in the code, and the headings thereto, are made for the purpose of convenient reference and orderly arrangement, and no implication, inference, or presumption of a legislative construction can be drawn therefrom. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 535-36 & n.5 (Yap 2020).

– Accessory

The offense of accessory requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of a person who, knowing that an offense has been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the offender in order to hinder or prevent his apprehension, trial, or punishment. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 528 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the defendants, through their actions, did comfort and assist a relative in order to prevent his apprehension or arrest by a police lieutenant and they knew that that their relative had committed a criminal offense and that the police lieutenant was attempting to arrest him for that offense and the defendants admitted that they were trying to get him away so that he could be delivered to other relatives, the state has proved beyond a reasonable doubt all elements of the criminal offense of accessory. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 528 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Kosrae State Code section 13.201, the three elements needed for a conviction of accessory under Section 13.201 are: 1) that the accused knew that an offense had been committed; 2) that the accused knew of another's commission of an offense; and 3) that the accused's assistance must have been given to another personally for the purpose of hindering or preventing his apprehension. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 81 (App. 2006).

Since a statutory provision's plain meaning must be given effect whenever possible and courts should not broaden statutes beyond the meaning of the law as written, when there is no requirement in Section 13.201's express language that the accused be absent at the time the offense was committed, absence is thus not an essential element of the offense of accessory. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 82 (App. 2006).

Common sense dictates that a charge for "liability for the crimes of another" must state which "crimes of the other" the State intends to charge the defendant with. Stated differently, "liability for the crimes of another" is a charge that is always dependent on an independent charge towards another person – it thus may not stand as an independent charge without reference to another's criminal misconduct, coupled with the law allegedly violated. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Aggravated Assault

The requisite intent for aggravated assault cannot be found simply by determining that the defendant purposely engaged in conduct which caused serious bodily injury. The crime of aggravated assault assumes at the very least disregard by the defendant for the well-being of the victim, and more typically, requires desire on the part of the defendant to injure the victim seriously. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 519-20 (App. 1984).

Causal connection between an act done purposely and serious bodily injury to another is not sufficient to establish the crime of aggravated assault, even when the act is coupled with an intention to cause bodily injury. Serious bodily injury, not just an injury, must have been intended in order to commit aggravated assault. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 520 (App. 1984).

In context of a claim of aggravated assault which calls for "causing serious bodily injury intentionally," the words, "engaged in the conduct," in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(4) mean engaging in the conduct of causing serious bodily injury. Section 104(4) means engaging in the conduct of causing serious bodily injury or to cause a result, which is itself serious bodily injury. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 520 (App. 1984).

A person is guilty of acting recklessly with extreme indifference to the value of human life under the aggravated assault statute, 11 F.S.M.C. 916, if he voluntarily creates conditions or acts in such manner that a reasonable person would deem likely to result in serious injury to another. Machuo v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 40, 43 (App. 1993).

A defendant who holds a knife in his hands, engages in a fight while extremely drunk and knowing that at least one other person is in the immediate vicinity, and who strikes another with the knife causing serious physical harm is guilty of aggravated assault. Machuo v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 40, 44 (App. 1993).

When the Yap Legislature has not demonstrated a positive intent to authorize conviction for two crimes, one of which requires proof of an additional fact, on the same facts, the trial court should render a decision and enter a conviction only on the more major of the crimes proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore a conviction for aggravated assault should be vacated when for the same act there is a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, which requires proof of an additional fact. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 101 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

Kosrae statute provides that aggravated assault is assaulting, striking, beating, or wounding another with a dangerous weapon, with an intent to kill, rape, rob, inflict grievous bodily harm or to commit any other felony. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 513 (App. 1998).

A dangerous weapon is any object that, as used or attempted to be used, can endanger life or inflict great bodily harm. Shoes worn on the feet are dangerous weapons when used to kick a victim. Stationary objects can also be dangerous or deadly weapons. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 513 (App. 1998).

The offense of aggravated assault is included in the resulting homicide. Accordingly, an aggravated assault conviction cannot be used to support a felony-murder conviction. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 515 (App. 1998).

Aggravated assault in Yap is when a person attempts to cause serious bodily injury to another or causes serious bodily injury intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly under circumstances showing extreme indifference to the value of human life. Yow v. Yap, 11 FSM R. 63, 65 (Yap S. Ct. App. 2002).

Yap's aggravated assault statute requires a showing of serious bodily injury, and serious bodily injury, not just any injury, must have been intended. Serious bodily injury is bodily injury which creates a substantial risk of death or which causes serious, or permanent disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of any bodily member or organ. The injury must be coupled with the specific intent to inflict that injury. Yow v. Yap, 11 FSM R. 63, 66 (Yap S. Ct. App. 2002).

Anyone who knowingly causes serious bodily injury has committed aggravated assault, but when a person has acted intentionally to beat someone any difference between these two mental states does not add materially to the discussion. Yow v. Yap, 11 FSM R. 63, 66 (Yap S. Ct. App. 2002).

A person commits aggravated assault under the extreme indifference recklessness state of mind when he voluntarily creates conditions or engages in behavior that a reasonable person would consider likely to result in serious injury to another. "Likely" means of such nature or so circumstanced as to render something probable. Yow v. Yap, 11 FSM R. 63, 68 (Yap S. Ct. App. 2002).

The offense of aggravated assault requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of assaulting, striking, beating, or wounding another with a dangerous weapon, with an intent to kill, rape, rob, inflict grievous bodily harm, or to commit any other felony. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 566 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the defendant pushed the victim's face into the pillow but there was no evidence presented that the pillow was used to assault, strike, beat or wound the victim, the pillow was not used as a dangerous weapon within the elements of the offense of aggravated assault and the state thus has not proven beyond a reasonable doubt the criminal offense of aggravated assault. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 566 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Kosrae state law, aggravated assault is classified as a category one felony, which carries a maximum sentence of imprisonment of ten years. Kosrae v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 187, 189 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The court will decline to draw a formal, arbitrary line about whether parts of the body can be dangerous weapons, or, about which parts of the body can be dangerous weapons. The analysis must be a functional one, looking at the capacity and manner of use and not the nature of whatever is used. Any object, article, substance, instrument, thing, item, or entity can become a dangerous weapon when it is used in a manner that may be anticipated to produce death or great bodily harm. Accordingly, teeth, depending on the manner in which they are used, may be a "dangerous weapon" under Kosrae State Code §13.303. This is primarily a question of fact and will depend on the presentation of evidence at trial. Kosrae v. Likiaksa, 14 FSM R. 618, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A dangerous weapon is any object that, as used or attempted to be used, can endanger life or inflict great bodily harm. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

– Aiding and Abetting

11 F.S.M.C. 301 is one of a set of sections in Chapter 3 of the National Criminal Code specifying general principles of responsibility which apply implicitly to all substantive offenses but do not themselves enunciate substantive offenses. These are not subject to "violation" and are therefore not reached by Rule 7 of the FSM Rules of Criminal Procedure. These general principles are deemed applicable to all crimes, and mere failure to restate them in an Information is not a failure to inform or a violation of due process. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 542 (App. 1984).

In criminal proceedings where several persons are charged with the murder of the same victim, the plain implication is that while one person's act may have been the direct cause of the death of the victim, the government surely will be contending that all others have participated or aided or assisted the killing in some way. It is inherent in a prosecution against multiple defendants for a single murder that defendants will be confronted with charges that they either actually killed the victim or assisted one or more persons who did so. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 544 (App. 1984).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 301(2) defendants are held responsible for the natural consequences of joining and encouraging others in unlawful use of dangerous weapons and brutal beatings of others. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 548 (App. 1984).

In a criminal prosecution under 11 F.S.M.C. 301, where defendant's overt actions indicated their intention to aid those involved in attacks, and when it was reasonably foreseeable by them that somebody might be fatally injured as a probable consequences of the beatings that they aided and abetted, they may be held legally responsible for the death resulting from the assaults even if the defendants did not actually intend that the victims be killed or seriously injured. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 548 (App. 1984).

One who suggests to his drinking companions that they obtain additional liquor by taking a bottle from construction laborers in the area, and who then leads his companions in an effort to attack one of the workers, solicits more possibilities than just the taking of a bottle, and is guilty of aiding and abetting the robbery of a watch and money from another construction worker carried out by his companions while the original instigator is still pursuing the first laborer. FSM v. Hadley, 3 FSM R. 281, 284 (Pon. 1987).

It is reasonably foreseeable that a robbery of watch and money from a Korean construction worker may be a probable consequence of a common plan to take a bottle from "some Koreans," and the person who suggests the plan and initiates efforts to attack one of the construction workers may be held guilty of aiding and abetting the robbery of watch and money carried out by his companions against another Korean worker, immediately after the defendant initiated the first attack. FSM v. Hadley, 3 FSM R. 281, 284 (Pon. 1987).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 301, defendants who are charged with being aided and abetted by others are not entitled to an allegation specifying the acts constituting the aiding and abetting. Hartman v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 224, 232 (App. 1991).

When there are verdicts that are inconsistent to such an extent that an essential element cannot be proven beyond a reasonable doubt a resulting conviction is reversible error. Thus when someone is convicted of a charge for which an essential element is being aided and abetted by another and that other is acquitted of being an aider and abettor the conviction is reversible error for failure of proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the essential element of being aided and abetted. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 300-01 (App. 1993).

A person can be criminally liable for the conduct of another if having a legal duty to prevent the commission of an offense, he fails to make proper effort to do so. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 212 (Pon. 1995).

The acts of agents, illegal or otherwise, are the acts of the principal itself provided that those acts are in the ordinary course of the agent's business relationship with its principal because under accepted principles of agency law a principal is responsible for the criminal acts of its agents provided that those acts where committed in furtherance of the agents' business relationship with the principal. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 212-13 (Pon. 1995).

When a law punishes criminal conduct only by a consignee and the government prosecutes agents of the consignee, it must proceed under the principles of vicarious criminal liability governed by 11 F.S.M.C. 301. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

A person who allegedly aided and abetted another to commit an offense must be specifically charged with aiding and abetting in the information. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

A sole proprietorship cannot be charged as a principal if there are no acts or omissions committed by its owner, but it can be found culpable as an accessory if it is specifically charged with vicarious liability for the acts of another. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 441 (Kos. 1996).

A person is criminally liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 301(1)(d) if he, whether or not being present during the commission of the crime, intentionally aids, abets, advises, solicits, counsels, encourages, commands, threatens, menaces or coerces another to commit a crime, or conspires with or otherwise procures another to commit a crime. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. 2006).

The terms "aid" and "abet" are frequently used interchangeably, although they are not synonymous. To "aid" is to assist or help another. To "abet" means, in its legal sense, to encourage, advise, or instigate the commission of a crime. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. 2006).

Mere presence at the scene of a crime is not enough to hold someone criminally liable under an aiding or abetting theory. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. 2006).

In order to convict any defendant of either aiding or abetting another, the government will have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that that defendant did something to, or was prepared to do something to, assist or help the other or to encourage, advise, or instigate the other in the commission of an offense charged. The government will have to do this for each count for each defendant or that defendant will be acquitted on that count. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. 2006).

Although the prior criminal code provided that no person could be convicted of aiding and abetting unless the information specifically alleged that the defendant aided and abetted and the information provided specific acts constituting the means of aiding and abetting so as to afford the defendant adequate notice to prepare his defense, that provision was eliminated when the current criminal code was enacted. It is thus no longer necessary for the information to recite each specific act each alleged aider and abetter allegedly committed. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 333 (Chk. 2006).

Since there is no language in the aid or abet statute, 11 F.S.M.C. 301(1)(d), or in the firearms possession or use statutes, 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) and (7), that limits the application of one statute to the other, a defendant may be charged with aiding or abetting firearms possession or use. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 333 (Chk. 2006).

A bargained-for dismissal as part of a plea agreement is not tantamount to an acquittal and the dismissal of charges pursuant to a plea agreement is clearly not a finding of the same order as an acquittal and should not have the same implications. Therefore, an accused's bargained-for dismissal of an illegal possession of ammunition charge against him does not warrant the dismissal of the aiding and abetting illegal possession of ammunition charges against other defendants. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 462 (Chk. 2007).

In order to convict defendants of the aiding and abetting illegal possession of ammunition, the prosecution must first prove that another illegally possessed ammunition. But the dismissal of the illegal possession of ammunition charge against that other as the result of his bargained-for plea agreement in the other's case does not preclude the prosecution from proving, in this case, that the other illegally possessed ammunition, and then proving that the defendants aided and abetted him. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 462 (Chk. 2007).

The government is not required to specifically allege what acts constituted each of the defendants' alleged aiding and abetting, but the government is required, as a practical matter, to reasonably inform the defendants of what acts or omissions may result in their criminal liability. Chuuk v. Rotenis, 16 FSM R. 398, 400 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

An information charging certain defendants with liability for another's crimes of assault with a dangerous weapon, aggravated assault, manslaughter, and murder will be dismissed when the only conduct clearly asserted against the defendants is that they participated in the transporting and disposal of the body after the killing To support the charges of liability for another's crimes, intent to participate in or ability to prevent the commission of those offenses must be shown, and, at a minimum, there must be some reasonable inference that the defendants had knowledge of or were present when the victim was struck. Liability for crimes of another cannot be based merely on conduct occurring after the crimes were already committed. But participation in the transporting and disposal of the body after the killing, if proven, results in criminal liability under other provisions of the Criminal Code. Chuuk v. Rotenis, 16 FSM R. 398, 400 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Although, at one time, the FSM criminal code provided that no one could be convicted of aiding and abetting unless the information specifically alleged that the accused had aided and abetted and the information provided specific acts constituting the means of aiding and abetting, that provision was eliminated when the 2001 criminal code was enacted, making it no longer necessary for the information to recite the specific acts each alleged aider and abetter allegedly committed. But the FSM Supreme Court appellate division has held that it is a fatal variance between pleading and proof when an accused charged with aiding and abetting was not given proper notice of the conduct or acts underlying the violation since that could not give the accused sufficient notice for him to prepare his defense. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 531 (Chk. 2009).

When, in the information and supporting affidavit or in the material before the court during the pretrial motion hearing, no notice was given the defendants of any act or conduct by either of them that was alleged to constitute aiding and abetting, the aiding and abetting counts against them will be dismissed. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 532 (Chk. 2009).

When notice was given a defendant, and even relied upon by him in his motion, of his alleged conduct to aid and abet, the prosecution will be given time to either amend the information to include that conduct or to dismiss the aiding and abetting counts against him. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 532 (Chk. 2009).

As a general rule, a person has no legal duty to protect another from the criminal acts of third parties or to control the conduct of another. For criminal liability to be based upon a failure to act it must first be found that there is a duty to act – a legal duty and not simply a moral duty. Some criminal statutes themselves impose the legal duty to act. With other crimes the duty must be found outside the definition of the crime itself – perhaps in another statute, or in the common law, or in a contract. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 396-97 (Chk. 2011).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 301(d), a person can be held liable as a principal if he "intentionally aids, abets, advises, solicits, counsels, encourages, commands, threatens, menaces or coerces another to commit a crime, or conspires with or otherwise procures another to commit a crime." FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 397 (Chk. 2011).

Although the terms are frequently used interchangeably, to "aid" is to assist or help another, and to "abet" means, in its legal sense, to encourage, advise, or instigate the commission of a crime. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 397 (Chk. 2011).

The prosecution may pursue aiding and abetting charges against an accused when he is charged with being present and in the possession of a shotgun while another possessed a handgun and the accused encouraged the other to shoot certain persons. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 (Chk. 2011).

Like aiding and abetting, soliciting and conspiring are all bases for criminal liability for the acts of another found in 11 F.S.M.C. 301(1)(d). FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 n.5 (Chk. 2011).

Even though the crimes being aided and abetted took place on Guam, the FSM Supreme Court, under 11 F.S.M.C. 103(2)(a), has jurisdiction to convict and punish a defendant on the aiding and abetting charges when the aiding and abetting took place in Chuuk. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 445 (Chk. 2014).

In order to prove the aiding and abetting charges, the FSM must not only prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did something to, or was prepared to do something to, assist or help the other or to encourage, advise, or instigate the other in the commission of a crime, but it must also first prove that another committed the underlying crime. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 447 (Chk. 2014).

In order to prove the aiding and abetting charges, the prosecution must prove, and therefore must introduce evidence of other crimes not charged in the information (the crimes the defendant is accused of aiding and abetting the commission of), and thus must also introduce evidence about the other person(s) whose commission of those crimes he aided and abetted even when those underlying crimes did not occur in the FSM but happened in a foreign country. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 447 (Chk. 2014).

– Arrest and Custody

No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded by the common law than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, free from all restraints or interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 86 (Pon. 1983).

The law generally requires that a prisoner test the legality of his detention in a court of law rather than attempt to enforce his own claim to freedom. FSM v. Doone, 1 FSM R. 365, 368 (Pon. 1983).

Where a municipal police officer intending to make an arrest for unlawful drinking, informs the accused that he is going to "take him to a place" because he was drinking and where there are indications that the accused understands that the officer is seeking to effect an arrest, there is sufficient compliance with the requirement of 12 F.S.M.C. 214 that arresting officers "make every reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest." Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 569 (App. 1984).

A police officer is entitled under 12 F.S.M.C. 215 to respond to physical resistance or attacks against him as he attempts to make an arrest and he may use whatever force is reasonably necessary to defend himself or others from harm. However, the police officer may not use more force than he reasonably believes to be necessary, either to effect arrest or to defend himself. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 570 (App. 1984).

When no Micronesian legislative body has addressed the rules concerning arrests and when no party suggests that the matter is influenced by customary law, the principles stated in the Restatements of Torts about the use of deadly force may be considered in determining, for purposes of a criminal case, the scope of a police officer's right to use force while making an arrest. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 570 n.2 (App. 1984).

Society's interest in the life of its members, even though they be felons or reasonably suspected of felony, is so great that the use of force involving serious danger to them is privileged only as a last resort when it reasonably appears that there is no other alternative except abandoning his attempts to make the arrest. In determining whether the use of such force is privileged, the actor has not the same latitude of discretion which is permitted to him in determining whether it is necessary to use force which is intended or likely to cause less serious consequences. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 571 (App. 1984).

Deadly force by a police officer attempting to effect an arrest, may be justified by evidence indicating the defendant reasonably believes that there is no alternative method of effecting the arrest and that deadly force is necessary as a last resort. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 571-72 (App. 1984).

Reasonableness of a police officer's conduct in using deadly force while making an arrest must be assessed on the basis of the information the police officer had when he acted. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 571-72 (App. 1984).

It is quite reasonable for a police officer, who uses a deadly weapon in deadly fashion against a person armed with a knife, to obtain a weapon that will afford him a means of protecting himself against the knife and intimidating the person to be arrested. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 573 (App. 1984).

When a police officer arms himself with a weapon to arrest a man armed with a knife, and then uses the weapon in a deadly fashion without first giving the person an opportunity to submit and without determining whether the person intends to use the knife to prevent arrest, this use of force cannot be viewed as a last resort necessary to the arrest not as reasonably necessary to protect the police officer from serious bodily injury. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 573 (App. 1984).

While a police officer may use force to effect an arrest and to protect himself and other citizens, he may not use force simply to punish people he dislikes or those he decides have done wrong. The principal functions of the police officer are to preserve peace and order and to apprehend lawbreakers so that they may be tried by the courts and handled justly. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 574-75 (App. 1984).

Punishment is no part of the police officer's assignment. A policeman who chooses to mete out punishment violates his office and does so at his own peril. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 575 (App. 1984).

It is not unreasonable for a trial court to conclude that a police officer, claiming to effect an arrest, who hits a person four times with a mangrove coconut husker and kills him was trying to kill him. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 576 (App. 1984).

A constitutional search may be conducted without a warrant if the search is incidental to a lawful arrest. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 32 (App. 1985).

Suspicion of guilt can justify the extreme action of an arrest only when based upon reasonable grounds known to the arresting officer at the time of arrest so strong that a cautious man would "believe," that is, consider it more likely than not that the accused is guilty of the offense. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 33 (App. 1985).

A police officer making an arrest has a limited right to conduct a search incident to that arrest. This right to search is for the limited purposes of preventing the arrested person from reaching concealed weapons to injure the officer or others, and from destroying evidence. Although the right to search is of limited scope, it plainly authorizes a reasonable search of the person being arrested. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 34 (App. 1985).

Police may question persons who, while they are in police custody, fall under suspicion for another crime, without regard to the fact that other persons in a similar category would be released without questioning. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 199 (Kos. 1986).

A police vehicle being used to transport an arrested person from the police station to the jail is a custodial facility within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 505(3), and a person who, having been informed that he is under arrest, flees from such a vehicle and the custody of a police officer authorized to detain or arrest persons on behalf of the Federated States of Micronesia, is guilty of an escape under 11 F.S.M.C. 501(1). Doone v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 103, 106 (App. 1985).

A municipality which employs untrained persons as police officers, then fails to train them and authorizes their use of excessive force and summary punishment, will be held responsible for their unlawful acts, including abuse of a prisoner arrested without being advised of the charges or given an opportunity for bail, whose handcuffs were repeatedly tightened during his 14 hour detention in such a way that he was injured and unable to work for one month. Moses v. Municipality of Polle, 2 FSM R. 270, 271 (Truk 1986).

A municipality which employs untrained persons as police officers, fails to train them and authorizes their use of excessive force and summary punishment, will be held responsible for their actions in stripping a prisoner, handcuffing his leg to a table and his arms behind his back, then kicking and abusing him. Alaphen v. Municipality of Moen, 2 FSM R. 279, 280 (Truk 1986).

Under FSM law, courts will rarely be required to look to the Constitution to determine the scope of any right a person in custody may have to be advised of rights before questioning because national statute establishes the rights of persons accused of national crimes. 12 F.S.M.C. §§ 218, 220. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 230 (Pon. 1987).

One should be considered "arrested," for the purposes of the right to be advised of his rights to remain silent when one's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the detained persons may be, or may have been, involved in commission of a crime. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 232 (Pon. 1987).

In making an otherwise lawful arrest, a police officer may use whatever force is reasonably necessary to effect the arrest, and no more; he must avoid using unnecessary violence. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

A person's constitutional right to due process of law, and his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment is violated when an officer instead of protecting the person from attack, threw him to the ground, and beat the person in the jail. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The use of force by police officers is not privileged or justified when the arrestee was so drunk and unstable to resist or defend himself and when the police officer used force because he was enraged at being insulted by the arrestee. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Constitutional provisions applicable to a prisoner may vary depending on his status. A pre-trial detainee has a stronger right to liberty, which right is protected by the Due Process Clause, FSM Const. art. IV, § 3. A convicted prisoner's claims upon liberty have been diminished through due process so that person must rely primarily on article IV, section 8 which protects him from cruel and unusual punishment. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 190 (Pon. 1991).

In a case where a convicted prisoner, who is also a pre-trial detainee, asserts civil rights claims arising out of ill-treatment after arrest, denial of access to family is a due process claim, and physical abuse involves due process as well as cruel and unusual punishment claims. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 190 (Pon. 1991).

A person arrested by the police must be brought before a justice of the state court without unnecessary delay, not to exceed twenty-four hours. Chuuk v. Arnish, 6 FSM R. 611, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

An arrest is illegal if, at or before the time of arrest, the police make no reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. FSM v. George, 6 FSM R. 626, 628 (Kos. 1994).

Police officers' authority to issue citations in lieu of complaints or information is provided by law. In any case in which a policeman may lawfully arrest a person without a warrant, he may instead, subject to such limitations as his superiors may impose, issue and serve a citation upon the person, if he deems that the public interest does not require an arrest. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 602 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

If a defendant fails to appear in response to a summons, a warrant shall issue. Chuuk v. Defang, 9 FSM R. 43, 45 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A warrant must be signed by a judicial officer, contain the defendant's name, describe the offense, and command that the defendant be arrested and brought before a judicial officer. Chuuk v. Defang, 9 FSM R. 43, 45 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Police must bring an arrested person before a state court justice without unnecessary delay, not to exceed 24 hours. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 10 n.1 (Chk. 2001).

A person is considered arrested for the purpose of the right to be advised of his constitutional rights, when his freedom is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer who is exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the person may have been involved in the commission of a crime. Kosrae v. Erwin, 11 FSM R. 192, 193 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Where a person's freedom was substantially restricted by a police officer when he was placed into a police car and where that person was under the police officer's suspicion that he was involved in the crimes committed earlier that evening, he was considered arrested for the purpose of the right to be advised of his constitutional rights to remain silent and to have legal counsel. And when the police officers failed to advise him of his constitutional rights at the time he was placed in the police car and considered arrested, all his statements made to the police after his arrest and placement into the police car and before he was advised of his constitutional rights, are inadmissible against him. Kosrae v. Erwin, 11 FSM R. 192, 193-94 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Kosrae state legislators are, in all cases except felony or breach of peace, privileged from arrest during their attendance at sessions or committee meetings of the Legislature, and in going to and returning from the same. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 253 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When an arrest occurs will depend on the facts of each case. A person should be considered "arrested" when one's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer exercising official authority, based upon the officer's suspicion that the detained persons may be or may have been involved in commission of a crime. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 253 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The validity of an arrest is judged by an objective standard, instead of accepting the police officer's personal motives. Factors which may be considered include a police officer's display of a weapon, threatening presence of several officers, or a police officer's use of language indicating compliance is required. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 253 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Arrest means placing any person under any form of detention by legal authority. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 253 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Where a person's freedom of movement was not substantially restricted or controlled when he was stopped at a roadblock and was issued a citation and where there was no display of weapon by the police officer and there was no threatening presence or language by the police officers who conducted the roadblock, based upon an objective standard, the person was not arrested when he was stopped at a roadblock and issued a citation. Evidence obtained under these circumstances at a roadblock was not obtained in violation of a Senator's immunity from arrest. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 253 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A person who is stopped for a routine traffic offense is not in custody for purposes of Miranda warnings. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae Constitution, Article II, Section 1(e) provides that the defendant in a criminal case has a right to be informed of the nature of the accusation against him, and Kosrae State Code, Section 17.1102 further requires that at or before making an arrest, a person makes a reasonable attempt to inform the arrested person of the cause and authority of the arrest. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 217, 219 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

An arrest is illegal if, at or before the time of arrest, the police make no reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 217, 219 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When an arrest was executed in violation of law, the remedy is to suppress the defendant's statement to the police. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 217, 219 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When a defendant understood through the statements made by the officer that he was being arrested for the incident which took place on the previous day, the defendant was given adequate information regarding the cause and authority for his arrest, and therefore there was no statutory or constitutional violation of the defendant's right to be informed of the reason for his arrest. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 217, 219 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Even assuming that there was an illegal arrest, a defendant is still not entitled to dismissal of the information. The remedy for an illegal arrest, for failure to provide cause and authority of the arrest, is suppression of any statements made by the defendant. When he did not make any statements to the police, there are no statements to suppress. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 217, 219-20 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Under Kosrae statute, following commission of an offense a police officer who has reasonable grounds to believe that a particular person has committed the offense may arrest the person. This establishes the standard for the arrest of a person, but it does not establish the standard for the police to conduct an investigatory stop of a vehicle. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there are no decisions by FSM courts which discuss which standard applies to conducting an investigatory stop of a vehicle, the court may look to the law of the United States for guidance. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Reasonable suspicion is required for police officers to make an investigatory stop of a vehicle. "Reasonable suspicion" is a particularized and objective basis for suspecting that a person is engaged in a criminal activity. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Generally, an anonymous tip is not sufficient justification for a stop by the police. Police need sufficient reasonable articulated suspicion. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A police officer may, as a general rule, consider any evidence in determining whether reasonable suspicion or probable cause exists. The information may be provided by an informer. Police should consider the underlying circumstances from which the informer drew his conclusion. Some of the underlying circumstances must show that the informant was reliable. However, evidence to establish reasonable suspicion or probable cause may be entirely based upon hearsay. The general rule is that virtually any evidence may be considered. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When an officer has made a warrantless arrest by relying upon a tip from an informant, the reviewing court will evaluate the tip based upon the totality of the circumstances, including the informant's truthfulness and reliability, and the basis of his or her knowledge. Deficiency in one prong may be compensated for by a strong showing of the other. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Once the police have reasonable suspicion that the Defendant has committed a criminal offense, they may conduct an investigatory stop, which is a temporary stop to confirm or dispel the suspicion which initially induced the investigatory stop. Investigatory stops are based upon less than probable cause and are temporary in nature. The information gained at the investigatory stop is then used to confirm or dispel the initial suspicion, and then either arrest or release the defendant. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A criminal prosecution for driving under the influence will not be dismissed when the police officers had sufficient reasonable suspicion to conduct an investigatory stop of the defendant because the reasonable suspicion was supplied by an informant, whose identity, credibility, reputation and reliability were known. When at the investigatory stop, the police observed signs of the defendant's alcohol impairment, these signs provided grounds for the police to administer the field sobriety tests to the defendant, and when the defendant failed two field sobriety tests, it gave the police reasonable grounds and probable cause for defendant's commission of driving under the influence and probable cause to arrest the defendant. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A roadblock stop where all oncoming traffic was stopped is not an arrest. Just as indubitably, such a stop is a "seizure" within the meaning of the proscription against unreasonable search and seizures.

Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 328 (App. 2004).

A defendant was not "in custody" prior to the administration of the field sobriety tests when he was instructed to perform the tests by the police officer, and was told by the police officer that if he failed two out of three tests, he may be arrested and taken to jail since he was not told that he would be taken to jail regardless of his performance of the tests. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A person is "in custody" when a person's freedom is substantially restricted by a police officer. For example, where a person's freedom is substantially restricted by a police officer by being placed into a police car, based upon a police officer's suspicion that the person was involved in the crimes committed earlier that evening, that person is considered arrested for the purpose of the right to be advised of his constitutional rights to remain silent and to have legal counsel. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A person who is stopped for a routine traffic offense is not in custody, for the purpose of requiring Miranda warnings, and persons who are stopped at a roadblock, where a person's freedom of movement is not substantially restricted or controlled, are not considered to be in custody and not considered to be arrested. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a defendant was followed by the Kosrae State Police, stopped at a traffic stop, questioned briefly and asked to perform field sobriety tests; when the traffic stop was conducted on a public road, where passersby could witness the interaction of the police officers and the defendant and was conducted by only two police officers, which created a non-threatening situation; when the officers did not tell the defendant that he would be going to jail; and when there was no needless delay in the administration of the field sobriety tests, the defendant, when he was asked to perform the field sobriety tests, was not considered arrested and was not in custody for the purposes of Miranda rights, and the state was not required to provide the defendant his Miranda rights prior to administration of the tests. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 449, 453 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

That the plaintiff was not informed at or before the time of his arrest why he was being arrested constituted a violation. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 491 (Pon. 2005).

Any person making an arrest must, at or before the time of arrest, make every reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. The onus is on the arresting officer to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 496 (Pon. 2005).

When a criminal offense has been committed, and a policeman has reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested has committed it, such policeman may arrest the person without a warrant, but there may be one exception to this rule, however, and that is when a routine felony arrest takes place inside the suspect's home and there are no exigent circumstances (an emergency or a dangerous situation) to overcome the warrant requirement. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 496 n.4 (Pon. 2005).

The state and its department of public safety are subject to civil liability for denying an arrestee the opportunity to contact either family members or an attorney. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 498 (Pon. 2005).

Even if the 24-hour deadline to bring a defendant before a court or release him were interpreted to mean within a reasonable time, holding a person in jail for 63½ hours without an appearance before a judicial officer will subject the state and its department of public safety to civil liability. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 498 (Pon. 2005).

A defendant's statutory right to be brought before the court within the 24 hours period goes to the heart of the procedural due process guaranteed to FSM citizens. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 499 (Pon. 2005).

Any person may perform a "citizen's arrest." Unlike an arrest by a law enforcement officer, a "citizen's arrest" cannot be based upon either a reasonable ground to believe or probable cause to believe a crime has been committed. A "citizen's arrest" is valid only if the one arrested was actually in the act of committing a criminal offense. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 n.2 (Chk. 2006).

If an arrested person refuses to submit or attempts to escape, the arresting person may use the force necessary to compel submission. In effecting an arrest, a police officer may not employ more force than he reasonably believes to be necessary. The reasonableness of a police officer's conduct while making an arrest must be assessed on the basis of information that the officer had when he acted. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 82 (App. 2006).

Following commission of an offense, a police officer who has reasonable grounds to believe that a particular person has committed the offense may arrest the person. Kosrae v. Jonithan, 14 FSM R. 94, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When police officers viewed the defendant struggling and fighting and also heard the defendant swearing and yelling offensive words, based upon that conduct alone, the officers had reasonable grounds to believe that the defendant had committed one or more criminal offenses, including drunken and disorderly conduct, and disturbing the peace. The police officers' determination of reasonable grounds and probable cause is based upon their training and understanding of conduct which forms the basis of criminal offenses. Following an arrest of an accused, related or different criminal offenses may be charged in the information, based upon further investigation and research conducted by the state. Kosrae v. Jonithan, 14 FSM R. 94, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A claim of failure to inform an arrestee of his rights and denying him legal counsel and access to the courts is a statutory claim, not a constitutional one. An arrested person's rights are codified at 12 F.S.M.C. 218, which provides that, at the time of arrest, a police officer must inform the arrestee of her rights, including the right to counsel, prior to any questioning and that the officer must either release the arrestee or bring her before a judicial officer within twenty-four hours of the arrest. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 204 (Pon. 2006).

In any case of arrest it is unlawful to fail either to release or charge an arrested person with a criminal offense within a reasonable time, which must under no circumstances exceed 24 hours. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

The remedy for an unlawful detention over 24 hours is not the dismissal of the information against the defendant or the suppression of all evidence and statements obtained from him. The only remedy in a criminal prosecution (as opposed to a civil suit) is suppression of any evidence obtained as a result of the illegal detention. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

Evidence obtained in violation of 12 F.S.M.C. 218 is rendered inadmissible by 12 F.S.M.C. 220. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

Evidence and statements lawfully obtained from a defendant before he had been illegally detained over 24 hours will be admissible. The defendant is entitled to the suppression of any evidence or statements obtained from him after the first 24 hours of his detention. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 320 (Chk. 2006).

Although the plaintiffs contend that they were not drunk but merely had hangovers and that they could not be arrested for being hungover, the police, based on what they personally could see, hear, and smell, had probable cause to believe that the plaintiffs were under the influence of alcohol in public and had probable cause to arrest the plaintiffs. Whether the plaintiffs were actually intoxicated or just hungover is irrelevant since the police had probable cause to believe they were intoxicated. Thus, the plaintiffs' arrest and transportation to the state jail on Weno did not violate their civil rights. Walter v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 336, 339-40 (Chk. 2006).

The government must make a probable cause showing at a hearing before pretrial restraints on the defendant's liberty can be granted. This is because a fair and reliable determination of probable cause is a condition for any significant pretrial restraint of liberty, and this determination must be made by a judicial officer either before or promptly after arrest. Affidavits can be used, if properly introduced, as evidence at that hearing to make the probable cause showing. The finding of probable cause may be based on hearsay evidence. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 264-65 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When a defendant fails to address the particular circumstances of his warrantless arrest or the bearing on the probable cause showing, if any, of the witness testimony contained in the police report referred to in the affidavit supporting the criminal information, the court can discern no legal basis for dismissing the case and even assuming the defendant's arrest was illegal, he is not entitled to dismissal of the information. The remedy for an illegal arrest is suppression of any statements made by the defendant. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 265 & n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

One should be considered "arrested" within the meaning of 12 F.S.M.C. 218 when one's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the detained person may be, or may have been, involved in commission of a crime. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 352 (Pon. 2007).

When the police officers only viewed the accused as a potential witness in the matter of another person, not as a suspect; when the officers dropped him back off at the funeral where they originally met him instead of taking him to the police station and the officers never substantially restricted or controlled the accused's freedom of movement; when the accused agreed to take the officers to fetch the handgun at Palikir, and willingly went with them in the vehicle; and when there is simply no evidence that the officers threatened, demanded, or compelled the accused in any manner, the accused was not under arrest during the car ride to and from Palikir. Accordingly, the officers were not required to inform the accused of his rights under 12 F.S.M.C. 218. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2007).

It is unlawful for the government to fail either to release or charge an arrested person with a criminal offense within a reasonable time, which must under no circumstances exceed 24 hours. Thus, evidence, such as an accused's statement, obtained as a result of the defendant being detained for more than 24 hours without being charged or released must be excluded. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

Evidence and statements lawfully obtained from a defendant before he had been illegally detained over 24 hours will be admissible, but the defendant is entitled to the suppression of any evidence or statements obtained from him after his first 24 hours of detention. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

In accordance with the Chuuk Constitution provision against unreasonable searches, seizures, and invasions of privacy, no warrant may be issued but upon probable cause, supported by affidavit, specifically describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized. An individual suspected of a crime must be released from detention unless the government can establish probable cause to hold that individual. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 97 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A person is considered "arrested," for the purposes of the right to be advised of his right to remain silent when the person's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the detained person may be, or may have been, involved in commission of a crime. FSM v. Sippa, 16 FSM R. 247, 249 (Chk. 2009).

Warrantless arrests are, under certain situations, lawful and authorized by statute. Arrest by police without a warrant is authorized when a criminal offense has been committed, and a policeman has reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested has committed it, or a policeman, even when it is not certain that a criminal offense has been committed, may detain for examination persons who may be found under such circumstances as justify a reasonable suspicion that they have committed or intend to commit a felony. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2009).

The remedy for a defendant's unlawful detention over 24 hours is not the suppression of evidence lawfully obtained before the 24 hours passed. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2009).

Once the police have reasonable suspicion that a suspect has committed a criminal offense, they may conduct an investigatory stop. An investigatory stop is a temporary stop of a car and its passengers that is used to confirm or dispel the suspicion that caused the investigatory stop. These stops are based on less than probable cause. Information gathered at the stop can be used to arrest or release the suspects. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 573-74 (Pon. 2009).

The police have a right to conduct a routine traffic stop, and when they, in order to investigate and confirm or refute their suspicions, stopped a car in which there was a passenger who they suspected had abandoned his Honda after driving it off the road while intoxicated, they did not conduct any unlawful search or seizure. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

Typically, before an arrest can be made, a warrant must be issued for that arrest. A warrant requires a showing of probable cause, and probable cause exists when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive such that a cautious person would believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

Pohnpei state law authorizes policemen to make an arrest without a warrant when 1) a breach of the peace or other criminal offense has been committed, and the offender is shall endeavoring to escape, he may be arrested by virtue of an oral order of any official authorized to issue a warrant, or without such order if no such official be present; 2) anyone is in the act of committing a criminal offense; 3) a criminal offense has been committed, and a policeman has reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested has committed it; and 4) even in cases where it is not certain that a criminal offense has been committed, arrest and detain for examination persons who may be found under such circumstances as justify a reasonable suspicion that they have committed or intend to commit a felony. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

A person arrested for obstructing justice because she refused to give the police officers access to her car and interfered with their peaceful attempts to talk with her husband, whom she locked inside the car, is arrested for an offense committed in the police officers' presence, and, that being the case, a warrant did not need to be issued prior to the arrest. Since the officers correctly determined that they had probable cause to arrest without a warrant because her conduct fell within the Pohnpei state law definition of obstruction of justice, they did not conduct an unlawful or false arrest of her. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

Although an arrestee sustained some bruising to her wrists, the bruising was not the result of any arresting officer's conduct since when the arrestee was handcuffed, the cuffs were loose enough that they could slide up and down her wrists and there was enough space between the metal of the cuff and her skin to fit a regular-sized ballpoint pen, but during the travel from the arrest site to the police station, she struggled with the handcuffs, resulting in their tightening further around her wrists. Since the tightening of the handcuffs was not the result of an officer's conduct, but of the arrestee's own movements, the police did not use any unreasonable force in arresting and handcuffing her. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

Upon arrest, the person arrested must be informed of his or her rights, including the right to remain silent and the right to counsel. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

Under Pohnpei state law, any person arrested must be advised that a) the individual has a right to remain silent; b) the police will, if the individual so requests, endeavor to call counsel to the place of detention and allow the individual to confer with counsel there before he is questioned further, and allow him to have counsel present while he is questioned by the police if he so desires; and c) the services of a public defender are available for these purposes without charge. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575-76 (Pon. 2009).

An arrest is illegal if, at or before the time of arrest, the police make no reasonable effort to advise the person arrested the cause and authority for the arrest. Any person making the arrest must make every reasonable effort to advise the suspect why she is being arrested. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 576 (Pon. 2009).

When the police advised a person that she was being arrested for obstructing a police investigation at or before the time the handcuffs were placed on her wrists and also advised her that she was arrested for pushing a police sergeant, they did not unlawfully refuse to inform her of the reasons for her arrest and detention. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 576 (Pon. 2009).

It is unlawful for the police to keep an arrestee in custody for over 24 hours without bringing him before a judicial officer for a bail hearing unless the location of the nearest court makes such appearance impossible. An arrestee must be either released or charged with a criminal offense within a reasonable time, which under no circumstances shall exceed 24 hours. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 73 (Chk. 2010).

When an accused has expressed a wish to meet with counsel before further questioning or to have counsel present during questioning, questioning must cease at once, and any attempt by police to ignore or override the accused's wish, or to dissuade him from exercising his right, violates 12 F.S.M.C. 218, and evidence obtained as a result of that violation is not admissible against an accused. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 73-74 (Chk. 2010).

Although evidence and statements lawfully obtained from an accused before he has been detained over 24 hours will be admissible, the accused is entitled to the suppression of any evidence or statements obtained from him after the first 24 hours of his detention. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74 (Chk. 2010).

Once an accused has established a relationship between unlawful police activity and the evidence sought to be suppressed, the burden is on the prosecution to show that the evidence is still admissible. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74 (Chk. 2010).

Statements and evidence obtained from an accused during the first 24 hours after his arrest are not inadmissible merely because the accused ended up being detained for over 24 hours. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 74 (Chk. 2010).

FSM law requires that any person making an arrest shall, at or before the time of arrest, make every reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 2010).

It would not have been reasonable for a police officer to have made an effort to advise a vehicle's occupants as to the cause and authority of the arrest before or during the arrests when the officer had every reason to believe that the two rifles in the vehicle were loaded and that one or more of the vehicle's occupants might be disposed to use those weapons. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 2010).

The statute does not, nor will the court, require an arresting officer, at or before the time of a person's arrest, to advise that person of the cause and authority for the arrest when to do so would endanger or imperil the arresting officer's life or safety or that of the general public. This is because the evident purpose of giving notice of the authority and cause for the arrest is to establish a procedure likely to result in a peaceable arrest. The failure to inform someone about to be arrested without a warrant of the authority and cause for the arrest does not invalidate that arrest. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 2010).

There is no set ritual or formula that must be followed to comply with the requirement that any person making an arrest shall, at or before the time of arrest, make every reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. The notice is sufficient when it is such as to inform a reasonable man of the authority and purpose of the one making the arrest, and the reason thereof. Circumstances, without express words, may afford sufficient notice. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 117 (Chk. 2010).

Arrestees are not prejudiced if they are notified of the offense(s) with which they are to be charged soon after they are taken into custody and before giving a statement. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 118 (Chk. 2010).

As a matter of good police practice, if a person is in the act of committing an offense or if it is too dangerous to make a reasonable effort to inform a person of the cause and authority of that person's arrest before or at the time of the arrest, the police should do so as soon as the person is safely in police custody. This should usually be before the arrestee is transported to a place of detention. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 114, 118 (Chk. 2010).

It is unlawful to fail to either release or charge an arrested person with a criminal offense within a reasonable time, which under no circumstances must exceed twenty-four hours. An unlawful detainment does not in itself entitle an accused to an acquittal, but no evidence obtained as a result of such violation may be used against the accused, and any person on the detainee's behalf may move the court for the detainee's immediate release upon expiration of twenty-four hours from the arrest. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 17 FSM R. 135, 136 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Resort to self-help by a detainee is inherently dangerous to the prisoner, the police, and to the public, as an attempted escape may result in circumstances where there is resort to force either by or against the detainee. Therefore, in cases of unlawful detainment, it is much preferred as a matter of public policy for counsel or other person to move the court for a detainee's immediate release. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 17 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

In criminal cases, pretrial detainees are entitled to such procedures as, the right to receive notice of the charges against them, an opportunity to respond to those charges before or during confinement, and the right to be brought before the court within 24 hours of arrest. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 215 (Pon. 2010).

Reasonable suspicion, not probable cause, is all that is required for police officers to make an investigatory stop of a vehicle. "Reasonable suspicion" is a particularized and objective basis for suspecting that a person is engaged in a criminal activity. Investigatory stops are based upon less than probable cause and are temporary in nature, and the information gained at the investigatory stop is used to confirm or dispel the initial suspicion, and then either arrest or release the person stopped. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 369-70 (App. 2011).

A traffic stop, no matter how brief, is a seizure. But this seizure is not a warrantless arrest such that probable cause is needed and the person stopped must immediately be advised of his or her rights. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 370 (App. 2011).

When the police had information from an off-duty police officer that gave them reason to suspect that a person had been involved in a car accident and that he was intoxicated, these facts equate to reasonable suspicion to stop him and investigate. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 370 (App. 2011).

Under Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 4(a), if it appears from the complaint, or from affidavit or affidavit filed with the complaint, that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the accused has committed it, a warrant for the accused's arrest shall issue to any officer authorized by law to execute it or, upon the government attorney's request, a summons instead of a warrant will issue. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 387-88 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the nature of the complaint that law enforcement received and responded to is unspecified either by hearsay or any other kind of evidence; when the accused is said to have been arrested and brought to DPS for processing as a result of police action triggered by the complaint but that arrest's details and circumstances are also unsubstantiated; and when the affidavit reads as a cursory afterthought to the arrest, incarceration, search, and ultimate seizure perpetrated by law enforcement on the accused, it could not, in and of itself, have supported a finding of probable cause prior to the arrest. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

An illegal arrest will not entitle a defendant to dismissal of the information. The remedy for an illegal arrest, for failure to provide cause and authority of the arrest, is suppression of any statements made by the defendant. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A warning is required when a custodial interrogation takes place and a suspect has been deprived of his freedom in a significant way. This differs from the situation where there was some evidence of illegal activity prior to the search, but it did not meet the probable cause standard necessary to arrest or search. In this type of situation, a search authorized by valid consent may be the only method by which evidence may be obtained. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 600 (Pon. 2011).

An eviction order is not an arrest warrant. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 230 (Pon. 2012).

A pretrial detainee has a stronger right than a convicted prisoner to liberty, and that right is protected by the Due Process Clause while a convicted prisoner's claims upon liberty have been diminished through due process so the convicted prisoner must rely primarily on the protections from cruel and unusual punishment. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 231 (Pon. 2012).

Police officers have a qualified official immunity from civil liability when they arrest someone for whom they have a facially-valid arrest warrant. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 282 (Pon. 2012).

The government must make a probable cause showing at a hearing before pretrial restraints on a defendant's liberty can be granted. This is because a fair and reliable determination of probable cause is a condition for any significant pretrial restraint of liberty, and this determination must be made by a judicial officer either before or promptly after arrest. Affidavits can be used, if properly introduced, as evidence at that hearing to make the probable cause showing. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 320 n.7 (Kos. 2012).

Probable cause is a constitutional requirement for a warrant. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 320 (Kos. 2012).

An individual suspected of a crime must be released from detention unless the government can establish "probable cause" to hold that individual. The standard for determining "probable cause" is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 324 (Kos. 2012).

Generally, no arrest can be made without first obtaining a warrant therefor except when otherwise authorized by law. A warrantless arrest may be made when a criminal offense has been committed and a policeman has a reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested has committed it. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 397 (Pon. 2012).

Under the common law rule in many jurisdictions, the police could arrest without a warrant persons who may have committed a felony but could not make a warrantless arrest for a misdemeanor unless it was committed in the arresting officer's presence. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 397 (Pon. 2012).

The FSM Constitution guarantees that the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and other possessions against unreasonable search, seizure, or invasion of privacy may not be violated. This protection prohibits the police from making a warrantless and nonconsenual entry into a suspect's home in order to make a routine felony arrest. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

Merely entering a person's property is often not enough to violate a person's right to be secure in her house. For instance, if the police do not enter the home but wait for the occupant to emerge from the house before effecting an arrest, the right is not violated. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

When police officers did not have an arrest warrant, they would have violated a person's constitutional right if, when arresting her, they had entered her dwelling house or her shower house since that was part of her home even though it was a separate structure. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

A test for whether a particular area is constitutionally protected from unreasonable searches and seizures is whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the home, the nature of the uses to which the area is put, and the steps taken by the resident to protect the area from observation by people passing by. Under this test, section five certainly protects a person's shower house area as the nature of its use is one in which there is a high expectation of privacy. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 n.5 (Pon. 2012).

When the officers told the plaintiff, while she was still in her shower house, that they were there to arrest her and once the officers told her that that was what they were there for, she was not free to leave except in their custody. In other words, the police arrested her while she was in her shower house even though they were outside. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

It is the location of the arrested person, and not the arresting agents, that determines whether an arrest occurs within a home. When the plaintiff was arrested while she was in an area protected by Section five of the Declaration of Rights (her shower house) and when the police did not have a warrant, her arrest was illegal because the police needed a warrant to arrest her where they did and they did not have one. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398-99 (Pon. 2012).

When the police clearly told a person that she was being arrested, but she was not told the complaint's details or the cause for her arrest beyond that there was a complaint against her, that was not enough to tell her the complaint's substance, and, under the Loch standard, not enough to comply with the requirement that she be told the cause and authority of her arrest. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 399-400 (Pon. 2012).

Although Pohnpei state law makes twenty-four hours under arrest without being released or being before a court competent to try the offender for the offense charged per se unreasonable, it does not automatically make times shorter than twenty-four hours reasonable. Whether a shorter time is reasonable or unreasonable depends on the facts of the case. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 n.6 (Pon. 2012).

The signing of an advice of rights form, by itself, cannot retroactively validate the earlier failure to inform an arrestee of her rights. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

Regardless of whether civil liability can be imposed for failing to inform an arrestee of her rights or for failing to inform her of the cause and authority of her arrest, civil liability will be imposed when it was illegal to arrest her without a warrant where she was arrested. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

A special relationship creating a duty of care exists when a person is in police custody, but when an officer pursues but does not have any actual contact with the person pursued, that person was never seized or in custody. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

One should be considered "arrested" when one's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the detained person may be, or may have been, involved in commission of a crime. This standard comports with the statutory definition of arrest used in 12 F.S.M.C. 218. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 449 & n.3 (Pon. 2012).

A person was not under arrest when he was told by the officers that they were informed that he might know something about a recent break-in and asked if he would be willing to go with them to the police station for questioning and he agreed but voluntarily entered the police vehicle and during the ride to the police station he sat with an officer in the back seat and was not handcuffed or otherwise restrained in any way. No arrest was made when he entered the police vehicle and was transported to the police station, as the break-in was still under investigation, as he was thought to know something about the break-in, and as the officer told him that he was not under arrest at that time, but that they wanted to know his story regarding the break-in. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 449 (Pon. 2012).

In any case of arrest, it is unlawful to fail either to release or charge an arrested person with a criminal offense within a reasonable time, which must under no circumstances exceed 24 hours. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2012).

When the government had not complied with 12 F.S.M.C. 218 by releasing or charging the defendant within 24 hours of his arrest, the statements made and evidence retrieved thereafter until he was released will be suppressed because evidence obtained as a result of a violation of 12 F.S.M.C. 218 is not admissible against an accused. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2012).

Although evidence and statements lawfully obtained from an accused before he has been detained over 24 hours will be admissible, the accused is entitled to the suppression of any evidence of statements obtained from him after the first 24 hours of his detention. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2012).

The arrest of a prisoner on work release was not unlawful when the police had an eyewitness report that he had violated his work release conditions. The eyewitness report was enough on which to base an arrest of a probationer for a release conditions violation. A later judicial proceeding would determine the report's accuracy or bias. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2013).

When the most likely reason for the arrest and later court appearance of a prisoner on work release was not to charge him with a new crime but to revoke or modify his work release conditions, the rule concerning revocation of probation, rather than the statute concerning charging a crime, is the applicable law. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2013).

Since a convicted inmate is a probationer only when he is on work release and is otherwise properly in custody, the court must conclude that a preliminary probable cause hearing within 48 hours of the inmate's arrest for violating work release conditions would be prompt within the meaning of Chuuk Criminal Rule 32.1 and that a revocation hearing within 48 hours of the arrest for violation of probation would be within a reasonable time. Chuuk therefore cannot be held civilly liable for the arrestee detention from September 8, 2010 to September 10, 2010, of a prisoner arrested for a work release violation. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM

R. 195, 199 (Chk. 2013).

Once a prisoner arrested for a work release violation has been detained in the arrestee holding area past 72 hours without being charged with work release violations under Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 32.1, his continued detention there becomes unlawful. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 200 (Chk. 2013).

Once a prisoner arrested for a work release violation has been detained in the arrestee holding area past 72 hours without being charged with work release violations under Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 32.1, his continued detention there becomes unlawful. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 200 (Chk. 2013).

When an unlawful detention was a violation of the plaintiff's right to due process, it was a civil rights violation, which under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) entitles him to reasonable attorney's fees and costs. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 200 (Chk. 2013).

When the defendant was found in the area after hours and his answers to the officer's questions were inconsistent, that and the surrounding circumstances rise to the level of reasonable suspicion, but not the higher standard of probable cause, which is needed for a lawful arrest. "Reasonable suspicion" is formed by specific, articulable facts which, together with objective and reasonable inferences, form the basis for suspecting that the particular person detained is engaged in criminal activity. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 347 & n.5 (Pon. 2014).

"Arrest" is defined as "placing any person under any form of detention by legal authority." 12 F.S.M.C. 101(3). A person is considered arrested for the purpose of the right to be advised of his constitutional rights when his freedom is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer who is exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the person may have been involved in the commission of a crime. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 347 (Pon. 2014).

One should be considered "arrested" when one's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the detained person may be, or may have been, involved in commission of a crime. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 347 (Pon. 2014).

When there was no probable cause to arrest the defendant, placing the defendant into the police car and taking him to the Pohnpei state police station in Kolonia and then questioning him on the way to the national police headquarters in Palikir without reading him his rights, violates his rights to remain silent and to the assistance of counsel. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 347-48 (Pon. 2014).

Having substantially restricted the defendant's freedom when he was placed in the police vehicle and transported first to the Pohnpei police station in Kolonia and then to the national police headquarters in Palikir, the defendant was under arrest and should have been read his rights. By not doing so, any statement made by him on questioning by the police in their vehicle on the way to the national police headquarters in Palikir and before being read his rights will be suppressed. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 348 (Pon. 2014).

A defendant must be advised of a full "panoply" of due process rights in addition to the right to remain silent and the right to counsel. These may be summarized as the right not to be denied access to counsel, family members, or other interested persons; the right to send a message, or other communications; the right to stop all questioning until such persons are present; the right to remain silent; and the right to be brought before a judge or released within a reasonable time. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 509 & n.4 (Pon. 2014).

Title 12 protects the right of a defendant to be informed, requiring that an arresting officer shall, at or before the time of the arrest, make every reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 513 (Pon. 2014).

A person should be considered arrested when one's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer, or when the suspect is otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way. Thus an arrest can occur during a "custodial interrogation," even if the suspect never formally arrested. A custodial interrogation is one that is held in a police dominated atmosphere. The custody test is an objective test, determined in the totality of the circumstances and not based on the police officer's intention nor the subjective views harbored by the person being questioned. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 514 (Pon. 2014).

In adopting the Declaration of Rights as part of the FSM Constitution and therefore the supreme law of the land, the people of Micronesia subscribed to various principles which place upon the judiciary the obligation, among others, to assure that arrests are based upon probable cause. Probable cause has been defined as a reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that a crime has been committed. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 514 (Pon. 2014).

Police questioning alone does not trigger the right to be informed. The police have the right make brief detentions, and ask questions without making an arrest. This determination is based on the totality of the circumstances, guided by common sense. Thus, when a defendant was definitively informed as to the nature of the questions at the police station, even if an arrest subsequently occurred in a custodial environment, the explanation given at that time was sufficient to meet the due process requirement under 12 F.S.M.C. 214. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 516 (Pon. 2014).

An arrest based upon probable cause does not violate the constitutional right to due process. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

An individual suspected of a crime must be released from detention unless the government can establish "probable cause" to hold that individual. The standard for determining probable cause is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

The police had probable cause to arrest a person and that arrest was lawful when they knew that he had someone else's pigs and that he would not release them to their owner. Since his arrest was lawful, the resulting overnight detention was lawful and was not false imprisonment. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

The usual remedy for a person's failure to be informed of his rights is the suppression of any evidence against him that resulted from that failure. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 97 (Pon. 2015).

In effecting an arrest, a police officer may employ no more force than he reasonably believes to be necessary. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 97 (Pon. 2015).

Police officers had probable cause to arrest a person, whose fingerprints were found at the crime scene, when he turned over the alleged stolen goods because probable cause is present when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 (Pon. 2017).

The police have a reasonable suspicion about someone's involvement in the crime when they have a particularized and objective basis, supported by specific and articulable facts, for suspecting that person of criminal activity. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 & n.5 (Pon. 2017).

Even if the police officers have probable cause to make an arrest, nothing precludes them from further investigating someone before arresting him because questioning of witnesses and suspects is a necessary tool for the effective enforcement of criminal laws, and without such investigation, those who were innocent might be falsely accused, those who were guilty might wholly escape prosecution, and many crimes would go unsolved. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 (Pon. 2017).

Once someone voluntarily led the investigating officers to and surrendered the alleged stolen items, probable cause existed to arrest him and no warrant was necessary. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 (Pon. 2017).

There is no set procedure that must be followed to comply with the requirement that any person making an arrest must, at or before the arrest, make every reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest. The notice is sufficient when it is such as to inform a reasonable man of the authority and purpose of the one making the arrest and the reason thereof. Circumstances, without express words, may afford sufficient notice. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 375 (Pon. 2017).

No violation of defendant's rights under 12 F.S.M.C. 214(1) occurred when the affidavits, oral testimony, along with the officers' years of experience, support the fact that the officers advised the defendant of his rights after his arrest and that the rights were given in the Pohnpeian language. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 375 (Pon. 2017).

The statutory and constitutional right to be advised of one's rights are owing to anyone arrested, and an arrest is the placing any person under any form of detention by legal authority. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 376 (Pon. 2017).

The statutory and constitutional rights to be advised of one's rights are owing to "one arrested," and to "any person arrested," and "arrest" is the placing any person under any form of detention by legal authority. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 402 (Kos. 2017).

One is be considered "arrested" within the meaning of 12 F.S.M.C. 218 when one's freedom of movement is substantially restricted or controlled by a police officer exercising official authority based upon the officer's suspicion that the detained person may be, or may have been, involved in commission of a crime. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 402 (Kos. 2017).

Article III of the Chuuk Constitution prohibits the court from issuing a warrant unless there is probable cause, supported by affidavit, specifically describing the person to be seized. Chuuk v. Hebwer, 22 FSM R. 542, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2020).

Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 4 only allows an arrest warrant or summons to issue when it appears from the complaint, or from affidavit or affidavit filed with the complaint, that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant has committed it, and a warrant for the defendant's arrest will issue to any officer authorized by law to execute it. It further provides that a probable cause finding may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. Chuuk v. Hebwer, 22 FSM R. 542, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2020).

– Assault and Battery

When one person, encouraged by the defendant to commit an assault, carries out the assault and then proceeds to commit robbery by the taking of turtle meat from the possession of the assaulted person, the defendant is not guilty of robbery where: 1) he did not suggest taking of the turtle meat or anything of value; 2) there is no showing that he could have foreseen the assault would be followed by the taking of something of value; and 3) the defendant left the premises before the turtle meat was taken. FSM v. Carl, 1 FSM R. 1, 2 (Pon. 1981).

A simple assault, one without a weapon or the intent to inflict serious bodily injury, is punishable only by six months' imprisonment. It is neither a major crime under the National Criminal Code, because it does not call for three years' imprisonment, nor a felony. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 24 n.* (Pon. 1981).

Under section 951 of the National Criminal Code the issue is not whether the defendant actually committed an assault or a battery, but whether he entered the house with the purpose of committing an assault. 11 F.S.M.C. 951(1). FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 25-26 (Pon. 1981).

Because Congress defined a major crime under the National Criminal Code as one calling for imprisonment of three years or more and because assaults under Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code are punishable by only six months' imprisonment, it is clear that the assault provisions of the Trust Territory Code are left intact. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 30 (Pon. 1981).

The crimes of assault, and assault and battery, undoubtedly are necessarily included within the charges of assault with a dangerous weapon and aggravated assault, because they all relate to the protection of the same interests and are so related that in the general nature of these crimes, though not necessarily invariably, proof of the lesser offense is necessarily presented as part of the showing of the commission of the greater offense. Kosrae v. Tosie, 4 FSM R. 61, 63 (Kos. 1989).

When the Yap Legislature has not demonstrated a positive intent to authorize conviction for two crimes, one of which requires proof of an additional fact, on the same facts, the trial court should render a decision and enter a conviction only on the more major of the crimes proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore a conviction for aggravated assault should be vacated when for the same act there is a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon, which requires proof of an additional fact. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 101 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

When the defendant did not strike, beat, wound or otherwise cause bodily harm to the complainant, the state has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed an assault and battery upon the complainant, and that charge must be dismissed. Kosrae v. Jonah, 10 FSM R. 270, 272 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An assault and battery in Yap is when a person unlawfully strikes, beats, wounds or otherwise does bodily harm to another. Simple assault does not require proof of specific intent. Yow v. Yap, 11 FSM R. 63, 66 (Yap S. Ct. App. 2002).

An assault against a national public servant at the national government capitol complex in Palikir, in the middle of a workday, in the National Public Auditor's Office demonstrates precisely the national government's interests that Congress sought to protect by defining a crime against a national public servant in the course of the public servant's employment as a national crime. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

Assault is defined as offering or attempting, with force or violence, to strike, beat, wound, or to do bodily harm to another. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 100 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the state has proven that the defendant also threatened the victim with a knife after the sexual assault, and told her not to tell anyone what had happened, the state has proven all the elements of the offense of assault beyond a reasonable doubt. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 100 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of assault and battery requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of striking, beating, wounding, or otherwise doing bodily harm to another. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the evidence is undisputed that the defendant held the victim down, placed his hand over her mouth, and prevented her escape from his attack upon her, and these actions resulted in bodily harm to the victim, the state has proved beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements of the criminal offense of assault and battery. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The proof of the lesser offense of assault is necessarily included as part of the showing of the greater offense of assault and battery. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 333, 335 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the defendant presented only his testimony in support of his argument that under Kosraean custom, he may strike his sister-in-law and niece-in-law and when the defendant did not take any steps to separate the women during their argument, nor take any other actions to promote peace or resolve the argument, the court will conclude that the defendant's self-serving testimony does not satisfy the evidentiary requirement of Kosrae State Code § 6.303, which requires that the court receive satisfactory evidence of tradition before it may utilize tradition in reaching a decision. The court will decline to accept the defendant's argument that, based solely upon his status as a male relative, he is entitled to commit a battery upon a female relative, and his defense of customary authority must fail. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 333, 336 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When convictions are entered upon the two greater offenses of assault and battery, one count for each victim, the lesser included charges of assault, two counts, will be dismissed. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 333, 337 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Under Pohnpei state law, both "felonious assault and battery," 61 Pon. C. § 5-133, and "assault and battery," 61 Pon. C. § 5-134, are felonies since they are punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years and two years respectively. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

If both the use-of-a-slingshot offense and assault-with-a-dangerous-weapon offense are proven with respect to the same act, the court will enter a conviction on only the greater offense of assault with a dangerous weapon. Chuuk v. Koky, 19 FSM R. 479, 481 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

An assault is a lesser included offense of assault and battery. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Since sexual assault requires intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration against the other person's will and assault and battery requires striking, beating, wounding, or otherwise doing bodily harm to another, and since subjecting another person to sexual penetration against the other person's will is one of a number of ways to otherwise do bodily harm to another, assault and battery is a lesser included offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

When A aims at B with intent to injure B but, missing B, hits and injures C, A is guilty of battery of C. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Under Chuuk state law, an individual commits assault with a dangerous weapon if the individual attempts to cause or purposely causes with a dangerous weapon bodily injury to another person. "Bodily injury" includes physical pain, illness, or any impairment of physical condition, and a "dangerous weapon" is any firearm, or other weapon, device, instrument, material, or substance, whether inanimate or animate, which, in the manner it is used or intended to be used, is capable of producing death or serious bodily injury. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Soone who unlawfully offers or attempts, with force or violence, to strike, beat, wound, or do bodily harm to another commits assault. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

An assault and battery occurs when an individual unlawfully strikes, beats, wounds or otherwise does bodily harm to another. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Where, although the defendant did not intend to injure the actual victim, there is sufficient circumstantial evidence showing that he intended to assault another with a dangerous weapon, this intent to harm the other was transferred the actual victim when the defendant's poor aim caused him to hit the four-year old daughter of his intended target. As a result, there was sufficient intent to find that that defendant purposely caused bodily injury to the victim with a dangerous weapon. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 144-45 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When the government established that the defendant took a machete and attempted to hack it at another person's neck, which would be a use of the machete in a manner capable of producing death or serious bodily injury, the government has met its burden to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed an assault with a dangerous weapon. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When, although the government did not present any direct evidence to prove its point, it presented compelling circumstantial evidence that before the victim was shot the defendant had been arguing with the witness, at which time he threatened her with non-specific bodily harm, and within seconds of his threat a dart was shot from the defendant's location toward the witness's location and hit her daughter, who she was holding in her arms, the government has met its burden to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did unlawfully use a slingshot. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When, before the victim was shot the defendant had been arguing with the witness, at which time he threatened the witness with non-specific bodily harm and within seconds of this threat, a dart was shot from the defendant's location toward the witness's location and hit her daughter, who she had been holding in her arms, and when no one else was near the defendant when the dart was shot, the government sufficiently met its burden to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he committed an assault against the victim. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 145-46 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When the government, relying on victim testimony during trial, proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant ran at the victim with a machete, attempting to hack at his neck, and that when the victim attempted to knock the machete from the defendant's hands the defendant punched him in the nose, the government sufficiently met its burden to prove that the defendant committed an assault. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 146 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When, before the victim was shot the defendant had been arguing with the witness, at which time he threatened her with non-specific bodily harm and within seconds of this threat, a dart was shot from the defendant's location toward the witness's location and hit her daughter, who she was holding in her arms, and when no one else was near the defendant when the dart was shot, the government sufficiently met its burden and proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed an assault and battery against the victim. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 146 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When the government, relying on victim testimony during trial, proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant ran at the victim with a machete, attempting to hack at his neck, and that when the victim attempted to knock the machete from the defendant's hands the defendant punched him in the nose, the government sufficiently met its burden to prove that the defendant committed an assault and battery. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 146 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

– Attempt

Because violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) is not a case of an attempt to commit a crime but a case where "attempt to board" is an element of the offense, 11 F.S.M.C. 201 (the attempt statute) does not apply to the crime of attempting to board a commercial aircraft with a firearm. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2000).

An attempt to commit a crime is a lesser included offense that merges with the greater ("target") offense if the attempt is successful. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

If the target crime is in fact committed, there can be no conviction for attempt, since the actor's prior conduct is deemed merged in the completed crime. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Since the court cannot convict a defendant for actions not constituting a crime under any circumstances, the same actions cannot be the basis for an attempt to commit the alleged underlying offense. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 399 (Kos. 2017).

An attempt consists of two elements: 1) an intent to engage in conduct that constitutes a crime; and 2) conduct constituting a substantial step towards commission of the crime. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 400 (Kos. 2017).

An attempt to commit a crime is an offense which is separate and distinct from the crime that was attempted. A person may be tried and convicted of an attempted crime whether or not he fails or succeeds in committing the attempted crime. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 400 (Kos. 2017).

An argument that the defendant never possessed the firearm is not fatal to a charge that he attempted to illegally possess a weapon. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 400-01 (Kos. 2017).

Attempt is a specific intent crime. The act constituting the attempt must be done with the intent to commit that particular crime because it is the intent to commit the crime, not the possibility of success, which determines whether the defendant's act or omission constitutes the crime of attempt. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

Since there can be no attempt to accomplish an unintended result, the defendant must act intentionally to commit the crime of attempt, as neither negligence nor recklessness includes the required specific intent. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

A defendant's contention that there was no attempt to commit the crime of possession of a firearm without a valid license because he applied for such license shortly after the firearm arrived in his postal box, may be raised at trial as evidence that he made no attempt to possess the firearm without a license, but the ultimate burden of persuasion remains with the government to prove the elements of attempt in spite of these assertions. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

Dismissal will be denied when the government has sufficiently alleged attempt in the information, because it must be given the opportunity to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the defendant's: 1) intent to commit the alleged crime; and 2) that he took action which constitutes a substantial step in a course of conduct planned to culminate in the commission of that crime. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

When both the defendant's intent and whether he committed an act sufficient to amount to an attempt are questions of fact inappropriate for determination before trial, the defendant's motion to dismiss the charge of attempt to possess a firearm without having a valid identification card will be denied. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

– Bill of Particulars

A request for a more definite statement is actually a motion for a bill of particulars. A motion for a bill of particulars may be made before the initial appearance or within ten days after the initial appearance or at such later time as the court may permit. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 131 (Chk. 2006).

A bill of particulars is not a matter of right. It rests within the trial court's sound discretion. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 401 (Chk. 2006).

While the court must first look to FSM sources of law and circumstances in the FSM to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review other courts' cases, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting FSM Criminal Procedure Rule 7(f) (bills of particulars) when the court has not previously construed that rule and it is identical or similar to the U.S. rule. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 401 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

The purpose of the bill of particulars is to inform the defendant sufficiently about the charge so he can prepare his defense and can avoid surprise. The test on passing on a motion for a bill of particulars should be whether it is necessary that the defendant have the particulars sought in order that prejudicial surprise be avoided. The sole question should be whether adequate notice of the charge has been given the defendant. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 401 (Chk. 2006).

A motion for a bill of particulars should make clear what relief the defendant is seeking, and should be worded definitely enough that if it is granted the court could enforce its order. A motion for a bill of particulars must be denied when the motion has failed to specify the particulars sought, or makes a catchall request for "particulars." FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 402 (Chk. 2006).

No bill of particulars is necessary if the government has provided the information needed in some other satisfactory form, such as when the government has adopted an "open file" discovery policy, giving the defendants the opportunity to inspect all relevant documentary and physical evidence. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 402 (Chk. 2006).

A motion for a bill of particulars will be denied when no grounds were given for the motion's tardiness, when the motion fails to specify the particulars sought, and when it appears that the government has provided the information through other means. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 402 (Chk. 2006).

If the information does not sufficiently inform the defendant of the charges against him, the defendant has the available remedy of filing for a bill of particulars pursuant to Chuuk Criminal Rule 7(e). The purpose of a bill of particulars is to inform the defendant sufficiently about the charge so he can prepare his defense and can avoid surprise. A bill of particulars is typically requested when the defendant is unable to determine from the information what the charges are against him. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Under Rule 7(f), a motion for a bill of particulars may be made before the initial appearance or within ten days after arraignment or at such later time as the court may permit. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 279 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A bill of particulars is not a matter of right. It rests within the trial court's sound discretion. The test on passing on a motion for a bill of particulars should be whether it is necessary that the defendant have the particulars sought in order that prejudicial surprise be avoided. The sole question should be whether adequate notice of the charge has been given the defendant. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 279-80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A motion for a bill of particulars should make clear what relief the defendant is seeking, and should be worded definitely enough that if it is granted the court could enforce its order. A motion for a bill of particulars must be denied when the motion has failed to specify the particulars sought, or makes a catchall request for "particulars." No bill of particulars is necessary if the government has provided the information needed in some other satisfactory form, such as when the government has adopted an "open file" discovery policy, giving the defendants the opportunity to inspect all relevant documentary and physical evidence. A motion for a bill of particulars will be denied, even if timely, when the motion fails to specify the particulars sought and when it appears that the government has provided the information through other means. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The court can find no grounds for granting a motion for a bill of particulars when the government has set forth its charges against the defendant in compliance with Rule 7(c)(1); when it has complied with the defendant's discovery requests to the extent of offering full disclosure of its case file against him; when the defendant does not specifically identify any "particulars" being sought; and when the defendant has not, in any case, set forth any grounds demonstrating that the particulars sought are necessary to avoid prejudicial surprise. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

While a defendant cannot be sentenced to consecutive sentences on a greater and lesser-included offense arising from the same act, the government does not have to identify which of its charges in its criminal information it intends to pursue prior to conviction. Rather, it is entitled to pursue, at trial, multiple claims based on the same act, and a defendant's motion for pretrial dismissal or for a bill of particulars will be denied. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631-32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The court may direct the filing of a bill of particulars. The purpose of a bill of particulars is to inform the defendant sufficiently about the charge so he can prepare his defense and can avoid surprise. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 504 (Pon. 2018).

A bill of particulars is typically requested when the defendant is unable to determine from the information what the charges against him are. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 504 (Pon. 2018).

A bill of particulars is the prosecutor's formal written statement providing details of the charges against the defendant. Its functions are to give the defendant notice of the essential facts supporting the crimes alleged in the information, and also to avoid prejudicial surprise to the defense at trial. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 504 (Pon. 2018).

A motion for a bill of particulars will be denied when the facts as alleged in four different, detailed affidavits include dates, locations, and amounts of money exchanged, and in addition to the charges as set forth in the information, give the defendant sufficient knowledge of the charges against him so that there will be no prejudicial surprise to him. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 504 (Pon. 2018).

A bill of particulars is not a matter of right. It rests within the trial court's sound discretion. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 501, 505 (Pon. 2018).

If the information does not sufficiently inform the accused of the charges against him, he may file for a bill of particulars, although a bill of particulars in not necessarily a "right," and it is preconditioned on the State having listed actionable charges within the information against the accused. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Bribery

Since the maximum penalty for bribery is five years' imprisonment, the general limitation period for bribery is thus three years. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 135 (Chk. 2006).

– Burglary

Where there is no question that the defendant entered a building, the relevant question under the FSM burglary statute is whether the defendant's entry was accompanied by the purpose to commit any felony, assault, or larceny therein. 11 F.S.M.C. 951(1). FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 23-24 (Pon. 1981).

Under section 951 of the National Criminal Code the issue is not whether the defendant actually committed an assault or a battery, but whether he entered the house with the purpose of committing an assault. 11 F.S.M.C. 951(1). FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 25-26 (Pon. 1981).

A privilege to enter one's cousin's house cannot be exercised by pounding on the walls of house at two a.m. until a hole for entry is created and shouting threats at the occupants. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 26 (Pon. 1981).

The fact that one may have a general privilege to enter property does not necessarily mean that the privilege may be exercised at all times and in every conceivable manner. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 39 (Truk 1981).

The court is willing to assume that the homeowner whose wife's brother is seeking to enter the house by force late at night in a threatening manner should as a matter of customary law go lightly and use less force than he might to expel some other intruder. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 41 (Truk 1981).

Since under Yap statutory law trespass is a lesser included offense of burglary, a trespass conviction will be vacated when there is a burglary conviction for the same act. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 101-02 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

The criminal offense of burglary is defined as entering by force, stealth or trickery, the dwelling place or building of another with the intent to commit a felony, larceny, assault, or assault and battery therein. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the state has not proven the element of entering by force, stealth or trickery, the state has not proven all elements of the offense of burglary beyond a reasonable double. The burglary charge will accordingly be dismissed. Kosrae v. Jackson, 12 FSM R. 93, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of burglary requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of entering by force, stealth or trickery, the dwelling place or building of another with the intent to commit a felony, larceny, assault, or assault and battery therein. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there was no evidence presented that the defendant touched or felt the victim in any way so as to infer his intent to commit a sexual assault or other felony upon her and there was no other evidence presented that the defendant committed any other acts to support the intent to commit a sexual assault, larceny, assault, assault and battery, or other felony, the state did not prove beyond a reasonable doubt the criminal offense of burglary and therefore, the defendant must be acquitted of that offense. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

– Civil Rights Offenses

A person commits a crime if he or she willfully, whether or not acting under the color of law, deprives another of, or injures, oppresses, threatens, or intimidates another in the free exercise or enjoyment of, or because of his or her having so exercised any right, privilege, or immunity secured to him by the FSM Constitution or laws. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 45 n.1 (App. 2007).

The maximum sentence for violating 11 F.S.M.C. 701 was raised in the 2001 criminal code from three years to ten years. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 46 n.2 (App. 2007).

The trial court's imposition of a one year sentence of imprisonment for a violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701 was not an abuse of discretion when there is nothing in the record which suggests that the sentence was anything but reasonable in light of the evidence presented to the court at the time of sentencing, and when, at the time of the defendant's conduct giving rise to his conviction, a violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701 could result in a period of incarceration of up to 3 years. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 49 (App. 2007).

The phrase "whether or not acting under color of law" in the civil rights criminal statute plainly means that Congress, by enacting the statute, made it a crime for a private person to willfully deprive another of, or injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate the other in the free exercise of his or her rights under the FSM Constitution or laws. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 445 (Chk. 2014).

"Color of law" means the appearance or semblance without the substance of legal right. "Color of law" usually implies a misuse of power made possible only because the wrongdoer is clothed with the authority of the state. In the context of civil rights statutes or criminal law "color of law" and "state action" are synonymous. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 445 (Chk. 2014).

A person "not acting under the color of law" is a private individual – not a person who is clothed with governmental authority. Tile 11, subsection 701(1) makes certain conduct by purely private persons (as well as those clothed with governmental authority) a crime. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 446 (Chk. 2014).

The FSM always has standing to enforce its own criminal laws and to prosecute violators in order to protect the public against future harm and to punish wrongdoers for past harm. Criminal prosecutions shall be conducted in the name of the Federated States of Micronesia for violations of laws enacted by the FSM Congress, and this includes the criminal law and punishing civil rights violators. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 446 (Chk. 2014).

In addition to being potentially criminally liable to and subject to punishment by the FSM for the violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701(1), a defendant could potentially also be civilly liable to the alleged victims in a suit under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Three major differences exist between the criminal case and any potential civil case – in a civil case 1) the alleged victim(s) would be the plaintiff(s); 2) the burden of proof would be lower (preponderance of the evidence as opposed to beyond a reasonable doubt); and 3) the element of willfulness would not be required to establish civil liability. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 446 (Chk. 2014).

– Conspiracy

Evidence will not be stricken when most previously introduced evidence is unquestionably related to counts still before the court; when the description of the defendants' duties before and after July 12, 1981 did not vary significantly; when the auditor's activities uncovered illegal transactions both before and after July 12, 1981; when various Mobil employees' conversations before July 12, 1981 related to the existence of a pattern of conduct and planning and carrying out illegal transactions and are relevant about whether a conspiracy existed after July 12, 1981. FSM v. Jonas (II), 1 FSM R. 306, 310-12 (Pon. 1983).

Where the prosecution of an underlying offense is not time-barred, prosecution of conspiracy to commit that offense is not time-barred even if part of the conspiracy extends back in time to a point that would be time-barred. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 107 (App. 1993).

A person commits the offense of conspiracy, if, with intent to promote or facilitate the commission of a national offense if he agrees with one or more persons that they, or one or more of them, will engage in or solicit the conduct or will cause or solicit the result specified by the definition of the offense; and he or another person with whom he conspired commits an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

The agreement in a conspiracy does not have to be explicit. A mere tacit understanding will suffice, and there need not be any written statement or even a speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

A conspiracy exists when either the agreement or the means contemplated for its achievement are unlawful. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

When it was unlawful and a national offense for any of the Uman Social Project funds to be spent on anything other than the construction of six new community halls on Uman, an agreement to do so would thus constitute the national offense of conspiracy. A single overt act committed by one of the co-conspirators before the end of the conspiracy is sufficient for there to be criminal liability for conspiracy. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

Conspiracy to commit a crime is an offense separate and distinct from the crime that is the object of the conspiracy. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

It is not necessary to prove the specific terms or the specific scope of the conspiratorial agreement or to prove that the conspiracy's substantive object was accomplished. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

The existence of, and participation in, a criminal conspiracy may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, if it affords a reasonable inference as to the ultimate facts sought to be proved. There must be evidence of some participation or interest in the commission of the offense. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

The trial court is allowed great discretion in the reception of circumstantial evidence, for a conspiracy must be proved by a number of indefinite acts, conditions, and circumstances varying with the purpose to be accomplished. When it is shown that the defendants by their acts pursued the same object, one performing one part and the other performing another part so as to complete it or with a view to its attainment, the trier of fact will be justified in concluding that they were engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object. Most conspiracy convictions are based on circumstantial evidence. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 483 (Chk. 2004).

A finding by the court that there is insufficient evidence to convict all but one of the parties alleged to have participated in a conspiracy ordinarily requires the discharge of the one remaining defendant. FSM v. Este, 12 FSM R. 476, 484 (Chk. 2004).

A person commits the offense of conspiracy, if, with intent to promote or facilitate the commission of a national offense, he agrees with one or more persons that they, or one or more of them, will engage in or solicit the conduct or will cause or solicit the result specified by the definition of the offense; and he or another person with whom he conspired commits an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 134 (Chk. 2006).

The agreement in a conspiracy does not have to be explicit. A mere tacit understanding will suffice, and there need not be any written statement or even a speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement and a conspiracy exists when either the agreement or the means contemplated for its achievement are unlawful. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 134 (Chk. 2006).

It is not necessary to prove the specific terms or the specific scope of the conspiratorial agreement or to prove that the conspiracy's substantive object was accomplished. A single overt act committed by one of the co-conspirators before the conspiracy's end is enough for there to be criminal liability for conspiracy. The existence of, and participation in, a criminal conspiracy may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, if it affords a reasonable inference as to the ultimate facts sought to be proved. There must be evidence of some participation or interest in the commission of the offense. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 134 (Chk. 2006).

Conspiracy is regarded as a continuing offense, hence, the statutory period of limitation therefor begins to run from the time of the last provable overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 134 (Chk. 2006).

Conspiracy is punishable by imprisonment for not more than one-half the maximum sentence which is provided for the most serious offense which was the object of the conspiracy if the maximum is less than life imprisonment. When the most serious offense charged as an object of the conspiracy carries a maximum of twenty years' imprisonment, the conspiracy charge thus has a maximum sentence of ten years and therefore a limitations period of three years. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 132, 134-35 (Chk. 2006).

Even if the evidence is of events that took place in periods for which prosecution may be time-barred, it is not necessarily inadmissible. Nor is hearsay necessarily inadmissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 140-41 (Chk. 2006).

A statement by a party's co-conspirator made during the course and in furtherance of the conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 139, 141 (Chk. 2006).

It is an affirmative defense that the defendant, under circumstances showing a complete and voluntary renunciation of his criminal intent, made a reasonable effort to prevent the conduct or result which is the object of the conspiracy. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 327 (Chk. 2006).

When no evidence was ever presented that a defendant made any effort, let alone a reasonable effort to prevent the conduct or result which is the object of the conspiracy, he cannot claim that the withdrawal or renunciation defense presents a substantial question since he did not present any evidence that might show that he could meet the defense's statutory requirements. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 327 (Chk. 2006).

Under the conspiracy law, the agreement to commit the crime need not be explicit and may be proven by circumstantial evidence. There is no requirement that there be even a written statement or speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement. A mere tacit understanding between the parties is sufficient to show the agreement. Moses v. FSM, 14 FSM R. 341, 346 (App. 2006).

When, although no evidence was introduced which showed an explicit agreement, given the appellant's position as the Uman Social Project project manager, the responsibilities that position entailed, the relationship he had with the Southern Namoneas Development Authority executive director, the misuse of national funds under appellant's and the director's direction and management, and by appellant himself, and the fact that no new community halls were built by appellant's and the director's project, there is sufficient evidence in the record for a reasonable trier of fact to find beyond a reasonable doubt that the appellant agreed with the director to commit theft. Moses v. FSM, 14 FSM R. 341, 346 (App. 2006).

A claim that the statute of limitations has run that is raised as an insufficiency of the evidence claim – based on a contention that there is no evidence that any overt acts to further the conspiracy were committed within the statute of limitations applicable to the appellant because the appellant explains away all acts within the three years before the information was filed as totally innocent acts or acts to commit some other underlying offense – is not a close or substantial question because an overt act in the furtherance of a conspiracy may be in itself a totally innocent act, and not a crime at all. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 463, 469 (Chk. 2006).

The agreement in a conspiracy does not have to be explicit. A mere tacit understanding will suffice, and there need not be any written statement or even a speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement and a conspiracy exists when either the agreement or the means contemplated for its achievement are unlawful. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 554-55 (Chk. 2007).

The existence of, and participation in, a criminal conspiracy may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, if it affords a reasonable inference as to the ultimate facts sought to be proved. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

The court may infer the existence of an agreement from circumstantial evidence and from the defendants' position and conduct. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

When there is sufficient evidence present from which the court may infer probable cause that an agreement existed and sufficient evidence of the requisite mens rea, there is sufficient evidence to establish probable cause that a conspiracy existed. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

For conspiracy two types of intent must be shown – the intent to agree and the intent to achieve the objective. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

Just as the intent to agree can be shown by circumstantial evidence that there was an agreement, the intent to achieve the objective can also be shown by a person's actions. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

A longer delay is tolerable for a complex conspiracy, than for an ordinary crime. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 184 (Chk. 2007).

Absent a strong showing of prejudice, co-conspirators are customarily tried together. This is not only for reasons of judicial and prosecutorial economy and, in the FSM, public defender economy, but also to give the factfinder a fuller picture of the scheme, as well as to decrease the chance of inconsistent verdicts and allow witnesses to avoid the burden of having to testify at successive trials. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 186-87 (Chk. 2007).

Since, absent a strong showing of prejudice, co-conspirators are customarily tried together, when the movant has not made a strong showing and has not identified any defense he would raise but cannot because his case is joined with another, his motion to sever will be denied. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 (Chk. 2007).

A co-conspirator's criminal liability is not predicated on the last overt act that that co-conspirator committed, or even on whether that co-conspirator committed any overt act. It is based on an overt act having been taken by any co-conspirator. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 481, 482 (Chk. 2008).

By claiming that he could not have committed any overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy after December 1999, a defendant appears to be asserting the defense of withdrawal from the conspiracy. That defense is very limited. It is an affirmative defense that the accused, under circumstances showing a complete and voluntary renunciation of his criminal intent, made a reasonable effort to prevent the conduct or result which is the object of the conspiracy. When no evidence was ever presented, and the accused never asserted, that he made any effort, let alone a reasonable effort to prevent the conduct or result which was the object of the conspiracy, he cannot claim withdrawal or renunciation as a ground for dismissal. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 481, 483 (Chk. 2008).

When co-conspirators had the opportunity to cease furthering the conspiracy by not submitting the accounts receivable for collection, as those debts were illegally incurred, but handed over those accounts to another with the understanding that the other was going to attempt collection from the government equates to an overt act done to further the goal of the conspiracy, namely the improper obligation and expenditure of national government funds. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 554 (App. 2008).

A letter can be an overt act because requesting the government to approve and pay a balance due that included charges involved in a conspiracy was an attempt to further the conspiracy, even though the co-conspirator was making the request in his official capacity as allottee. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 554 (App. 2008).

When two independent actions were both overt acts committed by a member, or members, of the conspiracy within the three years preceding the information's filing, the government filed its information within the applicable statute of limitations. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 554 (App. 2008).

The trial court used a co-defendant's pre-trial, out-of-court affidavit only against the declarant since the judge's discourses with the prosecutor stated that it was only being offered or used against the declarant and the trial court's made specific findings with regard to the affidavit that only concerned the declarant co-defendant and since the court's special findings delineated other pieces of evidence, independent of that affidavit, that supported the other defendants' participation in the conspiracy. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 556-57 (App. 2008).

The conspiracy statute does not explicitly require the underlying offense to be a crime. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 558 (App. 2008).

A person commits the offense of conspiracy, if, with intent to promote or facilitate the commission of a national offense, he agrees with one or more persons that they, or one or more of them will engage in or solicit the conduct or will cause or solicit the result specified by the offense's definition; and he or another person with whom he conspired commits an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 558 (App. 2008).

The agreement in a conspiracy does not have to be explicit. A mere tacit understanding will suffice, and there need not be any written statement or even a speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement. It is not necessary to prove the specific terms or the specific scope of the conspiratorial agreement or to prove that the conspiracy's substantive object was accomplished. The existence of, and participation in, a criminal conspiracy may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, if it affords a reasonable inference as to the ultimate facts sought to be proved. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 558 (App. 2008).

The trial court is allowed great discretion in the reception of circumstantial evidence, for a conspiracy must be proved by a number of indefinite acts, conditions, and circumstances varying with the purpose to be accomplished. When it is shown that the defendants by their acts pursued the same object, one performing one part and the other performing another part so as to complete it or with a view to its attainment, the trier of fact will be justified in concluding that they were engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object. Most conspiracy convictions are based on circumstantial evidence. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 558 (App. 2008).

While appellate panels must always show deference to the inferences and conclusions drawn by a trial judge from evidence, this deference seems even greater in the context of a conspiracy trial, in which the trial judge is likely looking for the proverbial "wink and nod" that often ties a conspiracy together. It is with such considerable deference that an appellate court reviews the evidence explicitly relied upon by the trial court in reaching its guilty verdict. Engichy v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 546, 558-59 (App. 2008).

A motion for a pretrial acquittal on conspiracy counts based on the government's failure to prove an agreement will be denied as premature because the existence of such an agreement is subject to proof at trial. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A person commits the offense of conspiracy, if, with intent to promote or facilitate the commission of a national offense, he agrees with one or more persons that they, or one or more of them, will engage in or solicit the conduct or will cause or solicit the result specified by the definition of the offense; and he or another person with whom he conspired commits an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 23 (App. 2010).

The agreement in a conspiracy does not have to be explicit. A mere tacit understanding will suffice, and there need not be any written statement or even a speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement. It is not necessary to prove the specific terms or the specific scope of the conspiratorial agreement or to prove that the conspiracy's substantive object was accomplished. The existence of, and participation in, a criminal conspiracy may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, if it affords a reasonable inference as to the ultimate facts sought to be proved. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 23 (App. 2010).

The trial court is allowed great discretion in the reception of circumstantial evidence, for a conspiracy must be proved by a number of indefinite acts, conditions, and circumstances varying with the purpose to be accomplished. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 24 (App. 2010).

When it is shown that the defendants by their acts pursued the same object, one performing one part and the other performing another part so as to complete it or with a view to its attainment, the trier of fact will be justified in concluding that they were engaged in a conspiracy to effect that object. Most conspiracy convictions are based on circumstantial evidence. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 24 (App. 2010).

While appellate panels must always show deference to the inferences and conclusions drawn by a trial judge from evidence, this deference seems even greater in the context of a conspiracy trial, in which the trial judge is likely looking for the proverbial "wink and nod" that often ties a conspiracy together. It is with such considerable deference that an appellate court reviews the evidence explicitly relied upon by the trial court in finding the defendants guilty. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 24 (App. 2010).

When the circumstantial evidence establishes that the defendants by their acts pursued the same object, one performing one part and the other performing another part so as to complete the making of obligations in advance of availability of funds, obligating funds for other than their lawful purpose, and submitting fraudulent documents, the trier of fact was justified in concluding that the defendants were engaged in a conspiracy to achieve those objectives. Cholymay v. FSM, 17 FSM R. 11, 24 (App. 2010).

An allegation that the defendants "did unlawfully conspire" to do some act is an allegation that there was an agreement since the word "conspire" means to join in secret agreement to do an unlawful or wrongful act or to use such means to accomplish a lawful end. By alleging that the defendants "conspired to" do something, the information alleges that the defendants joined in an agreement. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

If a person conspires to commit a number of offenses, he or she is guilty of only one conspiracy if the multiple offenses are the object of the same agreement or continuous conspiratorial relationship, but the prosecution may seek to charge and prosecute all alleged conspiracies, and, if it proves more than one of the conspiracy counts, a guilty finding will be entered on only one of the counts. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

A solicitation charge will merge into a conspiracy charge when the person solicited agrees to the solicitation by acting on the request. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 n.5 (Chk. 2011).

Like aiding and abetting, soliciting and conspiring are all bases for criminal liability for the acts of another found in 11 F.S.M.C. 301(1)(d). FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 n.5 (Chk. 2011).

A conspiracy count is sufficient if it alleges an agreement, and identifies the object towards which the agreement is directed and an overt act. But it is not necessary that the information state the object of the agreement with the detail required of an information charging the substantive offense, and it is not necessary in a conspiracy charge to allege with precision all the elements essential to the offense which is the object of a conspiracy; allegations clearly identifying the offense the defendants conspired to commit are sufficient. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 523 (Chk. 2011).

When, although the information could have been drawn with greater care, the accused is not misled to his prejudice because the prosecution failed to cite the statute(s) that the codefendants allegedly conspired to violate, the conspiracy count will not be dismissed. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 523 (Chk. 2011).

Since the existence of an agreement forming a conspiracy may be proven entirely by circumstantial evidence, circumstantial evidence can be sufficient to establish probable cause that such an agreement existed. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 524 (Chk. 2011).

Customarily, persons charged with conspiracy are tried together. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 524 (Chk. 2011).

A statement by a party's co-conspirator made during the course and in furtherance of a conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 525 n.3 (Chk. 2011).

A conspiracy exists when either the agreement or the means contemplated for its achievement are unlawful. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 166 (App. 2015).

The crime of conspiracy requires proof of specific intent, actual or implied, to violate law. Specific intent requires more than a mere general intent to engage in certain conduct or to do certain acts. The specific intent required for the crime of conspiracy is the intent to advance or further the unlawful object of the conspiracy. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 166 (App. 2015).

There is no such thing as liability without fault conspiracy. In order to be guilty of conspiring to commit an underlying strict liability offense, the defendant must have the specific intent to violate the underlying law. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167 (App. 2015).

When the prosecution did not prove the accused had the specific intent to operate without a Kosrae Island Resource Management Authority permit and did not prove that he agreed with anyone or intended to agree with anyone to run his sea cucumber operation without a KIRMA permit, his conspiracy conviction must be reversed and that charge be dismissed. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167 (App. 2015).

There are two essential elements a criminal information charging conspiracy must contain to satisfy due process standards – 1) an agreement with one or more persons that they, or one or more of them, will commit a crime and 2) an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy by a party to the conspiracy. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

A conspiracy agreement need not be explicit, and the ultimate commission of the underlying offense need not be proved. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

Conspiracy to commit a crime is an offense separate and distinct from the crime that is the object of the conspiracy. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

A conspiracy count is sufficient if it alleges an agreement, identifies the object towards which the agreement is directed, and an overt act. It is not necessary that the information state the object of the agreement with the detail required of an information charging the substantive offense or that it allege with precision all the elements essential to the offense which is the conspiracy's object; allegations clearly identifying the offense the defendants conspired to commit are sufficient. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

For conspiracy, the agreement does not have to be explicit. A mere tacit understanding will suffice, and there need not be any written statement or even a speaking of words which expressly communicates the agreement. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 204 (Chk. 2017).

Merely because each defendant acted individually after the implicit agreement does not mean a conspiracy was not committed because any party to the conspiracy who then commits an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy satisfies the statute's second essential element. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 205 (Chk. 2017).

Although the criminal information could have been drafted with greater care, the defendants are not misled to their prejudice based on the information's language charging them with conspiracy to commit trafficking in children when, from Counts I through VIII and the supporting affidavit, it should be clear that they are charged with conspiring to commit the offense of trafficking in children and when the conspiracy count (IX) describes the substantive underlying offense with enough specificity to sufficiently apprise the defendants of the charges which they must be prepared to defend and when it is detailed enough so that they may plead this case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same crime alleged. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 205 (Chk. 2017).

When the prosecution of an underlying offense is not time-barred, prosecution of conspiracy to commit that offense is not time-barred even if part of the conspiracy extends back in time to a point that would be time-barred. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 395, 397 (Kos. 2017).

A person commits the offense of conspiracy, if, with intent to promote or facilitate the commission of a national offense, he agrees with one or more person that they, or one or more of them, will engage in or solicit the conduct or will cause or solicit the result specified by the offense's definition; and he or another person with whom he conspired commits an overt act in pursuance of the conspiracy. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 399-400 (Kos. 2017).

A conspiracy can only exist when either the agreement or the means contemplated for its achievement are unlawful. A conspiracy to agree to do something that is not a crime cannot be criminal conspiracy. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 400 (Kos. 2017).

There cannot be a conspiracy when the achievement of the alleged conspiracy was the importation, without a valid identification card, of two firearms that are permitted to be licensed, which is not a national crime. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 400 (Kos. 2017).

A statement made by an alleged co-conspirator during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy is not hearsay and is admissible. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 84 n.2 (Chk. 2018).

– Controlled Substances

The Trust Territory Controlled Substance Act is based on the United States Uniform Controlled Substance Act, therefore United States Cases construing the law are examined because it is presumed that the law adopted from the U.S. will be given the same construction in the FSM. Kallop v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 170, 174 (App. 1989).

Because the legislative intent in defining cannabis sativa L. in 11 F.S.M.C. 1112(14) was to embrace all species of marijuana, the government need not prove a defendant guilty of dealing in cannabis sativa L., but only in marijuana. Kallop v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 170, 174 (App. 1989).

A trial court may properly infer from the quantity of marijuana possessed that the requisite intent existed to support a conviction of trafficking. Kallop v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 170, 175-76 (App. 1989).

The offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing or giving of alcoholic drink requires proof of consuming or possessing alcoholic drink without being in actual possession of a valid drinking permit. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 48 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing or giving of alcoholic drink is not inclusive of, or a lesser included offense of driving under the influence because the two offenses are committed with completely different actions and do not share even one common element. The offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing or giving of alcoholic drink does not require any involvement of a vehicle, whereas the offense of driving under the influence does not require possession of a alcoholic drink or non-possession of a valid drinking permit. Also, both offenses are classified as category one misdemeanors: neither offense is a classified as lesser than the other. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 48 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing, or giving of alcoholic drink requires proof of consuming or possessing alcoholic drink without attaining the age of twenty-one years. Kosrae v. Jonithan, 14 FSM R. 94, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The offense of drunken and disorderly conduct requires proof of being drunk and disorderly on any street, road, or other public place from the voluntary use of intoxicating liquor. Kosrae v. Jonithan, 14 FSM

R. 94, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing or giving of alcoholic drink, Kos. S.C. § 13.517(4), requires proof of consuming an alcoholic drink or possessing an open container of alcoholic drink in a public place. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 122 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When it is undisputed that a public road is a public place and that the defendant was carrying and possessing an open beer can on the public road, the court can draw the inference from the facts in evidence that the open beer can possessed by the defendant on the public road was an open beer can containing beer, which is an alcoholic drink. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 122 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Possessing an open container of alcoholic drink in a public place except when such place is closed to the general public for the purpose of conducting a private party, reception or social gathering and admission is by invitation or as otherwise provided by law can constitute the offense of unauthorized consuming, possessing or giving of alcoholic drink. The statute does not require the defendant to consume or intend to consume alcoholic drink from the open container to be guilty of the offense. Possession is sufficient. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 125 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

There was sufficient evidence apart from the field sobriety tests to sustain the conviction for driving under the influence because there were testimonies that the defendant appeared drunk and had the smell of alcohol on him, together with the fact that the defendant exhibited these characteristics when he emerged from his vehicle carrying an open can of Budweiser after going through a stop sign and colliding with another vehicle. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 127 (App. 2007).

A trier of fact is entitled to rely on properly admitted evidence and reasonable inferences drawn from that evidence. A reasonable inference is that the accused, who smelled of alcohol and had appeared to be intoxicated, would not have emerged from a vehicle immediately after an accident carrying an empty Budweiser can with him when he had this can in hand when he was on the road, which is a public place. Thus there was sufficient evidence to convict the defendant for possessing an open can of alcohol in a public place. Tulensru v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 122, 127 (App. 2007).

– Criminal Intent

A defendant is not unfairly prejudiced or incapable of preparing an intelligent defense, simply because the government insisted on each of 11 F.S.M.C. §§ 918 and 919's three adjectives, "intentionally, knowingly and recklessly," as possibly accurate descriptions of a defendant's frame of mind. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 518 (App. 1984).

The requisite intent for aggravated assault cannot be found simply by determining that the defendant purposely engaged in conduct which caused serious bodily injury. The crime of aggravated assault assumes at the very least disregard by the defendant for the well-being of the victim, and more typically, requires desire on the part of the defendant to injure the victim seriously. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 519-20 (App. 1984).

A trial court may properly infer from the quantity of marijuana possessed that the requisite intent existed to support a conviction of trafficking. Kallop v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 170, 175-76 (App. 1989).

In the Kosrae Code there are two alternative mens rea elements under which the killing of another can be second-degree murder – the killing is either done with malice aforethought, or it is done while perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate a felony other than one which would statutorily incur liability for first-degree murder. Proof of either one of the two alternative mens rea elements is sufficient for a second-degree murder conviction. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 514 (App. 1998).

A defendant's intention must be inferred from what he says and what he does. An inference is not permitted if it cannot reasonably be drawn from the facts in evidence. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there was no evidence presented that the defendant touched or felt the victim in any way so as to infer his intent to commit a sexual assault or other felony upon her and there was no other evidence presented that the defendant committed any other acts to support the intent to commit a sexual assault, larceny, assault, assault and battery, or other felony, the state did not prove beyond a reasonable doubt the criminal offense of burglary and therefore, the defendant must be acquitted of that offense. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 609 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

For conspiracy two types of intent must be shown – the intent to agree and the intent to achieve the objective. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

Just as the intent to agree can be shown by circumstantial evidence that there was an agreement, the intent to achieve the objective can also be shown by a person's actions. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 555 (Chk. 2007).

The crime of conspiracy requires proof of specific intent, actual or implied, to violate law. Specific intent requires more than a mere general intent to engage in certain conduct or to do certain acts. The specific intent required for the crime of conspiracy is the intent to advance or further the unlawful object of the conspiracy. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 166 (App. 2015).

There is no such thing as liability without fault conspiracy. In order to be guilty of conspiring to commit an underlying strict liability offense, the defendant must have the specific intent to violate the underlying law. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167 (App. 2015).

The element that escalates contempt to criminal status is the level of willfulness associated with the conduct. Criminal intent is a specific intent to consciously disregard an order of the court. Criminal intent is defined by 11 F.S.M.C. 104(4) as acting with the conscious purpose to engage in the conduct specified. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 465 (Pon. 2016).

Transferred intent is generally defined as, in the unintended-victim (or bad-aim) situation — where A aims at B but misses, hitting C — it is the view of the criminal law that A is just as guilty as if his aim had been accurate. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When A aims at B with a murderous intent to kill, but because of a bad aim he hits and kills C, A is guilty of the murder of C. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When A aims at B with intent to injure B but, missing B, hits and injures C, A is guilty of battery of C. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When the doctrine of transferred intent applies, the burden of proof still remains on the government, but the state need not prove the defendant intended to harm the actual victim, but merely the intended victim. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

The state needs only to prove intent as to one of the intended victims and does not have to prove intent specifically directed at each of the actual victims. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Before a defendant can be convicted, it must first be shown that he had the intention to cause great bodily harm to someone. Merely because he shot the wrong person makes his crime no less heinous. It is only necessary that the state of mind exist, not that it be directed at a particular person. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Where, although the defendant did not intend to injure the actual victim, there is sufficient circumstantial evidence showing that he intended to assault another with a dangerous weapon, this intent to harm the other was transferred the actual victim when the defendant's poor aim caused him to hit the four-year old daughter of his intended target. As a result, there was sufficient intent to find that that defendant purposely caused bodily injury to the victim with a dangerous weapon. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 144-45 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

Attempt is a specific intent crime. The act constituting the attempt must be done with the intent to commit that particular crime because it is the intent to commit the crime, not the possibility of success, which determines whether the defendant's act or omission constitutes the crime of attempt. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

– Cruel and Unusual Punishment

Actions of a police officer in stripping a prisoner to punish and humiliate him, then beating him and damaging his pickup truck, constituted violation of the prisoner's constitutional rights to be free from cruel and unusual punishment and his due process rights. Tolenoa v. Alokoa, 2 FSM R. 247, 250 (Kos. 1986).

Where a person has not been tried, convicted and sentenced, no question of cruel and unusual punishment arises. Paul v. Celestine, 4 FSM R. 205, 208 (App. 1990).

A person's constitutional right to due process of law, and his right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment is violated when an officer instead of protecting the person from attack, threw him to the ground, and beat the person in the jail. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 144 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Constitutional provisions applicable to a prisoner may vary depending on his status. A pre-trial detainee has a stronger right to liberty, which right is protected by the Due Process Clause, FSM Const. art. IV, § 3. A convicted prisoner's claims upon liberty have been diminished through due process so that person must rely primarily on article IV, section 8 which protects him from cruel and unusual punishment. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 190 (Pon. 1991).

In a case where a convicted prisoner, who is also a pre-trial detainee, asserts civil rights claims arising out of ill-treatment after arrest, denial of access to family is a due process claim, and physical abuse involves due process as well as cruel and unusual punishment claims. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 190 (Pon. 1991).

In interpreting the provision against cruel and unusual punishment in the FSM Constitution, the court should consider the values and realities of Micronesia, but against a background of the law concerning cruel and unusual punishment and international standards concerning human rights. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 196-97 (Pon. 1991).

Deliberate indifference to an inmate's medical needs can amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 199-200 (Pon. 1991).

Confining a prisoner in dangerously unsanitary conditions, which represent a broader government-wide policy of deliberate indifference to the dignity and well-being of prisoners, is a failure to provide civilized treatment or punishment, in violation of prisoners' protection against cruel and unusual punishment, and renders the state liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 208 (Pon. 1991).

Revocation of probation of an alcohol dependent person because he consumed alcohol or because of alcohol related offenses for which he was convicted does not constitute cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the constitution. FSM v. Phillip, 5 FSM R. 298, 300 (Kos. 1992).

The FSM Constitution prohibits cruel and unusual punishment, but when a person has not been tried, convicted and sentenced, no question of cruel and unusual punishment arises. Youp v. Pingelap, 9 FSM R. 215, 217 (Pon. 1999).

FSM cases addressing cruel and unusual punishment have consistently focused on claims made by prisoners. Youp v. Pingelap, 9 FSM R. 215, 217 (Pon. 1999).

When the plaintiff's alleged injuries occurred in connection with his arrest, and not as a result of any subsequent sentence he may have received, the plaintiff, as a matter of law, could not have been subjected to cruel and unusual punishment. His cruel and unusual punishment claim will therefore be dismissed. Youp v. Pingelap, 9 FSM R. 215, 217-18 (Pon. 1999).

When there is no constitutional provision which specifies the type of food to be provided to inmates and no statutory or regulatory provisions which specify the type of food to be provided to inmates, there is no clear ministerial duty of the Chief of Police which states the type of food to be provided to inmates. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In interpreting the provision against cruel and unusual punishment, a court considers the value and realities of Micronesia, against a background of the law concerning cruel and unusual punishment and international standards concerning human rights. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Deliberate indifference to an inmate's medical needs can amount to cruel and unusual punishment. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When it appears that the Chief of Police has attended to a prisoner's medical needs with respect to food preparation and the medical recommendation for low salt and low fat foods, there has been no refusal by the state to provide to the prisoner's medical needs. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a prisoner has not shown deliberate indifference to his medical needs by the state, there was no cruel and unusual punishment. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 531 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Corrections officers' failure to permit the use of restroom facilities while he was in jail and to provide him with food and water while he was in their custody was an inhumane condition of confinement constituting cruel and unusual punishment. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 491 (Pon. 2005).

When the only food provided the plaintiff during the approximately 63½ hours in jail was three donuts and a jar of water given to him by a prisoner and he was permitted to use the restroom only once during that time, and was obliged to urinate through the window, and to defecate into the pages of a magazine which he then discarded through the window, these inhumane conditions of confinement constitute cruel and unusual punishment, in derogation of the Declaration of Rights of the FSM Constitution. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 499 (Pon. 2005).

A detainee's claim that while in jail she was denied food and water and access to her family is not a cruel and unusual punishment claim because no question of cruel and unusual punishment arises when a person has not been tried, convicted, and sentenced. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 231 (Pon. 2012).

A pretrial detainee has a stronger right than a convicted prisoner to liberty, and that right is protected by the Due Process Clause while a convicted prisoner's claims upon liberty have been diminished through due process so the convicted prisoner must rely primarily on the protections from cruel and unusual punishment. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 231 (Pon. 2012).

When no evidence was introduced about what would constitute constitutionally acceptable jail conditions in the FSM and in Chuuk and since little evidence was introduced about the actual conditions when the plaintiff was there, there is insufficient evidence for the court to conclude that the general Chuuk jail conditions constituted cruel and unusual punishment for the convicted prisoners. Inek v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 195, 200 (Chk. 2013).

When a prisoner was kept incarcerated in state jail after he has finished his maximum jail sentence and when state officials, after the matter was brought to their attention, showed deliberate indifference to his continued incarceration, the prisoner was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the FSM Constitution. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 465-66 (Chk. 2014).

Generally, the alleged mistreatment of pre-trial arrestees is subject to a due process analysis while that of convicted prisoners is analyzed under the cruel and unusual punishment standard. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

Valuing the loss of a person's liberty interest because he was subjected to the cruel and unusual punishment of being forced to remain in jail for 161 days after his sentence had ended, is, like trying to calculate damages for pain and suffering, difficult because no fixed rules exist to aid in that determination, which lies in the court's sole discretion. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2014).

The FSM and Chuuk Constitutions both prohibit cruel and unusual punishment. Instances of cruel and unusual punishment include deliberate indifference to an inmate's medical needs; confining prisoner in dangerously unsanitary conditions; an officer instead of protecting a person from an attack, throwing him to the ground and beating the person in the jail; use of force by police officers when arrestee was so drunk and unstable to resist or defend himself; when a police officer uses force because he is enraged at being insulted by arrestee; when a municipality employs untrained persons as police officers, and fails to train them and authorizes their use of excessive force and summary punishment; corrections officers' failing to permit the use of restroom facilities or to provide food and water; and keeping an individual imprisoned for an additional 161 days after his sentence ended. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 652-53 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When a person has not been tried, convicted, and sentenced, no question of cruel and unusual punishment arises. That is why the alleged mistreatment of pre-trial arrestees is subject to a due process analysis while that of convicted prisoners is analyzed under the cruel and unusual punishment standard. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 653, 656 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A statute that sets only a minimum sentence does not allow the court unbridled discretion to implement cruel and unusual punishments because the court is constrained by the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions; because the court has a traditional role of adjudication based on equity that involves the considering mitigating and aggravating factors before imposing sentence; and because all statutes are presumptively constitutional. Thus, this statute is not so unconstitutionally vague or ambiguous as to violate a defendant's due process rights to be free from cruel and unusual punishment. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 655-56 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Chuuk courts are restricted in hearing only "live" cases, meaning the case must be one appropriate for judicial determination. A matter is appropriate for judicial determination when there is a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. Thus, when a defendant has not yet stood trial and thus may not be convicted, the question of whether a potential sentence constitutes a cruel and unusual punishment is merely hypothetical and academic and not yet appropriate for judicial determination. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 656 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The Chuuk and FSM Constitutions prohibit the infliction of cruel and unusual punishment. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Although there is a lack of a female holding cell in the Chuuk jail and no separate female showering and restroom facilities, a female prisoner is not subjected to a cruel and unusual punishment by virtue of her incarceration at the Chuuk jail with shared use of restroom facilities with male inmates – when she has a female police officer guarding her, her own separate sleeping quarters, and uses the shower at a different time from the male inmate population. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 433 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Defamation

The criminal offense of "defamation" is an offense against the person and not an offense against tradition. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 391 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The definition of the offense of "defamation" does not provide detailed warning of what type of speech is regulated whereas in other criminal offenses where speech is regulated, the specified words constituting the offense are listed. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 391 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of defamation does not provide adequate notice of what speech is regulated. A statute, properly interpreted, must give sufficient notice so that conscientious citizens may avoid inadvertent violations. The statute must also provide sufficiently definite standards to prevent arbitrary law enforcement. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 391 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Kosrae criminal offense of "defamation" does not contain specific language defining the conduct or speech which forms the offense. There are no specific words or conduct listed in the offense which forms the basis for the defamatory conduct. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The offense of defamation was not enacted to protect tradition, and if the offense of defamation does not protect tradition, then the fundamental right of freedom of expression as guaranteed by the Kosrae Constitution may not be impaired or denied. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the Kosrae criminal defamation statute does not protect tradition, it may not impair a defendant's fundamental right of freedom of expression. The defamation statute impairs the fundamental right of freedom of expression because it fails to provide a specific standard of criminal conduct, thereby persons would not have adequate notice of what type of speech was regulated under it. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The complainant's right to bring a civil suit against the defendant for the tort of defamation is not impaired by the court's dismissal of the criminal defamation charges against her. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the evidence did not show it was the defendant's statements rather than another person's statements that resulted in "public hatred, contempt, or ridicule" of the victim and when there was no evidence to show the stronger feelings or behaviors of hatred, contempt, or ridicule from others towards the victim, the insufficient evidence on these elements, alone, offers grounds to acquit the defendant of defamation. Kosrae v. Taulung, 14 FSM R. 578, 580 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Kosrae State Code § 13.313 is unconstitutionally vague because it fails to provide a specific standard of criminal conduct and therefore does not give adequate notice of what type of speech is being regulated since a statute must be drawn so as to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that the contemplated conduct is forbidden and Kosrae State Code § 13.313 does not. Kosrae v. Taulung, 14 FSM R. 578, 580-81 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Mean-spirited, accusatory words designed to harm another person, without regard to their truth or falsity are the kind of words that may result in a civil suit for the tort of defamation. However, the current criminal statute, Kosrae State Code § 13.313, may not be used to pursue a criminal prosecution for defamation because it does not clearly specify what types of speech are prohibited. Kosrae v. Taulung, 14

FSM R. 578, 581 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

– Defenses

A person, who was stunned at the time of the assault and was therefore unaware of his actions, cannot be held criminally liable for those actions. Nix v. Ehmes, 1 FSM R. 114, 125 (Pon. 1982).

As a matter of constitutional due process, a trial court presented with an alibi defense should consider evidence concerning the alibi along with all other evidence and shall not find the defendant guilty if after considering all of that evidence, the judge feels there is a reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt. Alaphonso v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 209, 223-25 (App. 1982).

When no custom is established by a preponderance of the evidence that the vile phrases used are sufficient provocation for a serious attack on the speaker, that alleged custom will not be considered in determining the criminal culpability of the person who attacks the one who has used vile phrases. FSM v. Raitoun, 1 FSM R. 589, 591-92 (Truk 1984).

Statutes which provided a defense in the form of exceptions to a general proscription do not reduce or remove the government's traditional burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt every fact necessary to constitute the offense. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 35 (App. 1985).

The government ultimately bears the burden of disproving the applicability of a statutory exception when it is properly presented as a defense. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM 27, 35 (App. 1985).

Some exceptions under 11 F.S.M.C. 1203 whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible relate to considerations separate from the essential elements of the crime and require the defendant to place them in issue. A defendant claiming exemption as a law enforcement officer or United States military person engaged in official duty, §§ 1203(1), (4), or as a designated crocodile hunter, § 1203(5), is not disputing any element of the government's basic case. Instead, these exemption claims bring into play new facts, uniquely within the knowledge of the defendant, which the government could overlook by focusing on whether the conduct prohibited by the Weapons Control Act has occurred. The defendant is in a far better position to place these exemptions in issue and it is fair to require that he do so. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 36 (App. 1985).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1203(1), (4) and (5) exemptions whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible are defenses within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 107, although they are not affirmative defenses for they are not so designated. The ultimate burden of persuasion remains with the government, but the defendant has the burden of going forward with sufficient evidence to raise these exemptions as issues. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 36 (App. 1985).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1203(2) exemption for curios, ornaments and historical pieces whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible requires findings that the firearm be in "unserviceable condition" and "incapable of being fired or discharged." Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37 (App. 1985).

If there are defenses, proof of which would not negate any essential element of the crime itself, it is constitutionally permissible to place some burden of proof for those defenses upon defendant. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 311 (App. 1988).

11 F.S.M.C. 107 does not create any presumption as to mental health or lack thereof but merely establishes the standard of proof for a defense based upon mental disease, disorder, or defect, and places the burden of persuasion for that defense upon the defendant. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 314 (App. 1988).

Defendant who fails to request consideration of a lesser offense normally may not successfully appeal from a conviction arrived at without such consideration, but where all elements for murder exist but homicide was caused under extreme mental or emotional disturbance for which there is reasonable explanation or excuse, defendant is entitled to be convicted of manslaughter rather than murder, without regard to whether request for consideration of manslaughter was made by either counsel. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 319 (App. 1988).

Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial rights shall be disregarded. FSM Crim. R. 52(a). Otto v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 218, 222 (App. 1991).

Because Congress has neither adopted the de minimis defense found in the Model Penal Code nor any provision comparable to it that defense is not available in the FSM Supreme Court. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 179 (Pon. 1997).

A motion for judgment of acquittal on the ground the state had not sustained its burden of proof by proving all of the elements of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt because the state had not proven that police officer had "demanded" a driver's license from the defendant as required by statute, will be denied when the state proves that the officer did ask as by right for the defendant's driver's license. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 263, 264 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The reasoning behind the principle barring physical resistance to an invalid search warrant is that while society has an interest in securing for its members the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, society also has an interest in the orderly settlement of disputes between citizens and their government and it has an especially strong interest in minimizing the use of violent self-help in the resolution of those disputes particularly when a proper accommodation of those interests requires that a person claiming to be aggrieved by a search conducted pursuant to an allegedly invalid warrant test that claim in a court of law and not forcibly resist the warrant's execution at the place of search. This reasoning resonates even more strongly in Micronesia, where society has customarily prized peaceful and orderly resolution of disputes much higher than in the United States. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

At the time the FSM Constitution was framed and adopted, the prevailing U.S. constitutional analysis of its constitutional search and seizure provision, which the FSM constitutional provision was modeled after, was that persons had no right to resist a search warrant even if that warrant was invalid. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

A defective search warrant is not a defense to a prosecution for resisting the defective warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

Under FSM constitutional jurisprudence, a person has no right, with some possible narrow exception, to resist a court-issued search warrant even if that search warrant turns out to be invalid. A person's remedies for being subjected to a search with an invalid search warrant are the suppression of any evidence seized, and, in the proper case, a civil suit for damages. The self-help of resistance is not a remedy and because of the Micronesian customary preference for the peaceful resolution of disputes, this conclusion is consistent not only with the FSM Constitution, but also with the social configuration of Micronesia as is required by the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436-37 (Chk. 2003).

The issue of a search warrant's validity is not a central, or even major issue in a case of resisting a search. It is not an available defense. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 437 (Chk. 2003).

Under common law, a person may resist a lawful arrest if the arresting officer uses unreasonable force. After careful consideration of public policy and the constitutional protection of individual rights, including protection against arrests involving excessive force, the Kosrae State Court recognizes and accepts the application of the defense. A police officer has a right to use force reasonably necessary to effectuate an arrest. The reasonableness of a police officer's conduct while making an arrest must be assessed on the basis of information that the police officer had when he acted. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 525, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the defendant presented only his testimony in support of his argument that under Kosraean custom, he may strike his sister-in-law and niece-in-law and when the defendant did not take any steps to separate the women during their argument, nor take any other actions to promote peace or resolve the argument, the court will conclude that the defendant's self-serving testimony does not satisfy the evidentiary requirement of Kosrae State Code § 6.303, which requires that the court receive satisfactory evidence of tradition before it may utilize tradition in reaching a decision. The court will decline to accept the defendant's argument that, based solely upon his status as a male relative, he is entitled to commit a battery upon a female relative, and his defense of customary authority must fail. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 333, 336 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The remedy for a victim of an illegal search is not the self-help of resistance. Resistance to such authority to search and seize by self-help is not recognized in courts of law. Whoever suffers the imposition of an unlawful police search has the assurance that any evidence so acquired is rendered inadmissible in a subsequent criminal trial by the exclusionary rule. And in any event damage remedies are available in the courts for violations of constitutional rights stemming from either an unlawful search or arrest. These remedies are present in the FSM. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

The reasoning behind the principle barring physical resistance to an invalid search warrant is that society has an interest in securing for its members the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Society also has an interest, however, in the orderly settlement of disputes between citizens and their government; it has an especially strong interest in minimizing the use of violent self-help in the resolution of those disputes. A proper accommodation of those interests requires that a person claiming to be aggrieved by a search conducted by a peace officer pursuant to an allegedly invalid warrant test that claim in a court of law and not forcibly resist the execution of the warrant at the place of search. This reasoning resonates even more strongly in Micronesia, where society has customarily prized peaceful and orderly resolution of disputes much higher than in the United States. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

At the time the FSM Constitution was framed and adopted, the prevailing U.S. constitutional analysis of its constitutional search and seizure provision, which the FSM constitutional provision was modeled after, was that persons had no right to resist a search warrant even if that warrant was invalid. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

In the FSM, a person has no right to resist the execution of a search warrant by police or government agents even if the search warrant is later shown to be invalid. Consequently, a defendant may not assert as a defense that he has no liability and may resist a search warrant if he believes it is, or if it is, an invalid warrant. The law does not permit this. The search warrant's validity is irrelevant to the case and the court will refuse to hear testimony concerning it. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

As a matter of law, a search warrant's invalidity is not a defense under 11 F.S.M.C. 107(1) because it is not a fact or set of facts which removes or mitigates penal liability. Even a belief that a search warrant is invalid does not remove or mitigate penal liability. If a person believes that he has a legal right to resist an invalid search warrant that is a mistake or ignorance of law, not a mistake (or ignorance) of fact, and that is not a defense under section 301A(3). FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

Only ignorance or mistake of fact is a defense under 11 F.S.M.C. 301A(3). A mistake of, or ignorance of, law is not a defense under the FSM statute. Nor is it generally a defense to penal liability. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

A criminal defendant may not use mistake or ignorance of the law as a defense. He therefore may not use as a defense a mistaken belief that he had a legal right to resist a search warrant that he thought was invalid (even if it should later be shown to be invalid). FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

Subsection 107(3) makes it a complete defense to a criminal charge that at the time of engaging in the wrongful conduct the defendant was legally incapable of committing a crime as defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 301A. Legal incapacity to commit a crime is often thought to include defenses such as insanity, mental incapacity, infancy, automatism, sometimes intoxication, and crimes where a certain status, not held by the defendant, is a necessary element of the offense. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

If a statute makes it an offense for a government employee to commit a certain act, a person who did not have the status of a government employee would be legally incapable of violating the statute. Usually this is analyzed as the inability to prove an element of the offense. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 n.8 (Chk. 2005).

Section 301A lists five instances where a person may be legally incapable of committing a crime – infancy; persons under another's legal conservatorship; persons whose conduct was the result of ignorance or mistake of fact, disproving criminal intent; persons who engaged in the wrongful conduct without being conscious; and persons whose actions were the result of life-threatening duress. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

A search warrant's invalidity, or a belief it is invalid, is not a defense to charges stemming from resistance to the search warrant's execution. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

Under FSM constitutional jurisprudence, a person has no right, with some possible narrow exception which the court has not decided whether it is a viable defense, to resist a court-issued search warrant even if that search warrant turns out to be invalid. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 448 (Chk. 2005).

When the defendant argued that the court should recognize custom regarding the relationship between him and the victim, but did not present any evidence of the relationship between victim and him, and did not present any evidence of custom, specifically evidence that due to the relationship between victim and the defendant, it would be customary for the defendant to show up drunk at a relative's home and commit a battery upon the relative, the court may not utilize tradition in reaching a decision because it has not received satisfactory evidence of the tradition. When a defendant has not provided any evidence of custom or tradition, it cannot be considered. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 14 FSM R. 27, 30-31 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Since by statute, the classification of the titles, chapters, subchapters, and sections of the FSM Code, and the headings thereto, are made for the purpose of convenient reference and orderly arrangement, and since Congress has specifically prohibited that any implication, inference, or presumption of a legislative construction be drawn therefrom, the court can give no weight or credence to and must reject any argument, implication, inference, or presumption to be draw from a subchapter's heading or from a subsection's arrangement in that subchapter. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2006).

When the government produced evidence that the defendant threatened eleven national police with the harm of loss of liberty – detention on Udot for an unspecified time – if they did not abandon their attempt to search his Udot residence and when Section 517(1)(c)'s language, by its specific terms, applies to threats to any public official, not just to judges or politicians, a motion to acquit on the ground no evidence was introduced of threatening harm to a public official with purpose to influence him or her to violate his or her known legal duty will be denied. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2006).

When the defendant's qualified immunity defense was not disclosed in his response to the government's Rule 16(b)(1)(C) discovery request and it should have been because it goes beyond a claim that the government failed to prove all elements of the offense and because it is not a claim that he acted legally based on the facts but that he is immune from criminal liability even if he did not act legally, this defense could be rejected on the ground of non-disclosure alone. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 (Chk. 2006).

Qualified immunity is not a defense to a criminal prosecution. "Qualified immunity" partially shields public officials performing discretionary functions from civil liability and damages. Public officials are not immune or exempt from criminal liability and prosecution. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 (Chk. 2006).

A law enforcement officer is one whose duty is to preserve the peace. A mayor has the duty to faithfully implement the municipality's laws and ordinances, but he does not have the power of arrest, and even if he were a law enforcement officer, he would not be immune from prosecution because a law enforcement officer may be prosecuted for an offense committed while he was arresting someone. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 (Chk. 2006).

A belief that a search warrant is invalid is not a defense to a prosecution for resisting a search warrant, even if it is an invalid search warrant. If a defendant believed the national police's search warrant was invalid or had expired, his only lawful actions or remedies were to not interfere with the search and then to move to suppress any evidence seized in the search, or to institute a civil suit for damages, or both. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55-56 (Chk. 2006).

Although the remedy of self-help or resistance to a search thought to be unlawful is barred, the court has not decided whether there are some unlawful searches, with or without warrant, the circumstances of which would be so provocative to a reasonable man that the seriousness of the offense of resistance ought to be mitigated as a result of such provocation, and when the defendant had the opportunity to put on such evidence at trial but no such showing (by a preponderance of the evidence), was made, the court did not need to decide whether such an exception could be permitted since the search warrant execution attempt was neither provocative nor was the force used unreasonable. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 59-60 (Chk. 2006).

A contention that the other driver involved in the accident should have been arrested, and not the defendant, is not a defense because the criminal case charges the defendant, and not the other driver, and it is within the state's prosecutorial discretion to choose who to charge. Kosrae v. Tulensru, 14 FSM R. 115, 122 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

As summarized in a well-known adage – ignorance of the law is no excuse. Nor is it a substantial or close question on appeal. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 325 (Chk. 2006).

A mistake of, or ignorance of, law is not a defense under the FSM statute. It is generally not a defense to penal liability. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 325 (Chk. 2006).

It is an affirmative defense that the defendant, under circumstances showing a complete and voluntary renunciation of his criminal intent, made a reasonable effort to prevent the conduct or result which is the object of the conspiracy. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 327 (Chk. 2006).

While the ultimate burden of persuasion remains with the government, a defendant, asserting an affirmative defense, has some burden of proof or of going forward with sufficient evidence to raise the defense as an issue at trial. When custom is raised, it is usually more properly considered during sentencing than at other stages of a criminal prosecution. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 534 (Chk. 2009).

A defendant's motion to dismiss on the ground of custom will be denied, but he will be free to present evidence at trial concerning his defense(s), if applicable. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 534 (Chk. 2009).

Even if a defendant was unaware that escape was unlawful, ignorance of the law is no excuse for unlawful behavior. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 215 (Pon. 2010).

Three of the four 11 F.S.M.C. 1003 statutory exemptions for firearms possession are defenses within 11 F.S.M.C. 107 for which the accused has the burden of going forward with sufficient evidence to raise these exemptions as issues although the ultimate burden of persuasion still remains with the government. The prosecution does not have to make the initial showing but ultimately bears the burden of disproving the applicability of the exception when it is properly presented. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 128 (Chk. 2011).

A pretrial motion is generally capable of determination before trial if it involves questions of law rather than fact. A defense is thus capable of determination if trial of the facts surrounding the commission of the alleged offense would be of no assistance in determining the validity of the defense. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

As a general matter, the question of whether or not a particular defense may be raised by means of a Rule 12(b) motion turns on whether or not that defense may be decided solely on issues of law. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

Most defenses, such as self-defense, insanity, and entrapment require factual determinations that make pretrial disposition inappropriate. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

A motion to dismiss is not the proper way to raise a factual defense because if the pretrial claim is substantially founded upon and intertwined with evidence concerning the alleged offense, the motion must be deferred because it falls within the province of the factfinder at trial. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2), in order to be exempt from criminal liability for possession of a firearm, the court must be persuaded beyond a reasonable doubt that the firearm is: 1) unserviceable; 2) incapable of being fired or discharged; and 3) being kept as a curio, ornament, or for its historical value. All three of these requirements must be satisfied for this exemption to apply, and if any one of them is not met, this exception does not apply. FSM v. Sonis, 18 FSM R. 620, 622 (Chk. 2013).

When there is evidence before the court from which the court can infer that the handgun was serviceable – testimony of two officers that they had tried to and did get the firearm to work and from that evidence the court could infer that the handgun was capable of being fired or discharged; and when, from the circumstances under which the firearm was found and where it was found, abandoned by the accused in a mop bucket at Chuuk International Airport (right where he told the police he left it), the court could infer that he was not keeping the handgun as a curio, or as an ornament, or for its historical value but that his possession of the handgun must have been for some other reason. FSM v. Sonis, 18 FSM R. 620, 622 (Chk. 2013).

An accused's joblessness during the time period that the government was tardy in opposing his motion to dismiss, does not constitute prejudice in the legal sense since it did not adversely affect his legal position or his defense. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 234 (Pon. 2015).

In an FSM Supreme Court criminal case, a "forum shopping" claim must be rejected because only the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a national crime – its jurisdiction over the prosecution of national crimes is exclusive. There is no alternative forum in which to prosecute a national crime. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 299 (Chk. 2017).

A defendant's contention that there was no attempt to commit the crime of possession of a firearm without a valid license because he applied for such license shortly after the firearm arrived in his postal box, may be raised at trial as evidence that he made no attempt to possess the firearm without a license, but the ultimate burden of persuasion remains with the government to prove the elements of attempt in spite of these assertions. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

– Defenses – Duress

Subsection 301A(5) is a codified version of the common law defense of duress. Duress, under the FSM statute, occurs when A causes B to believe that B would suffer immediate, life-threatening injury unless B acts as ordered by A, and B acts and a crime is committed against C. Duress is a defense similar to self-defense except that with self-defense the defendant's response is an attack on the threatening party, while the duress defense applies when the defendant saves himself by doing the threatener's bidding by harming another. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

Duress is a pertinent theory of defense when a third party, that is, a person other than the victim, is the coercer. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

Section 301A lists five instances where a person may be legally incapable of committing a crime – infancy; persons under another's legal conservatorship; persons whose conduct was the result of ignorance or mistake of fact, disproving criminal intent; persons who engaged in the wrongful conduct without being conscious; and persons whose actions were the result of life-threatening duress. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

Under the FSM statute, duress occurs when A causes B to believe that B would suffer immediate, life-threatening injury unless B acts as ordered by A, and B acts and a crime is committed against C. The duress defense is similar to self-defense except that with self-defense the defendant's response is an attack on the threatening party, while the duress defense applies when the defendant saves himself by doing the threatener's bidding by harming another. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 334 (Chk. 2006).

Asserting a duress defense at a pretrial stage in the proceedings and on the basis of the showing that another was armed and the defendants were assumed not to be armed does not entitle the movants to a dismissal at this point. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 334 (Chk. 2006).

A pretrial motion cannot use the statutorily-defined defense of duress to dismiss an information, since duress is a defense that must be determined at trial. Self-defense is similar in that it also is a factual defense that must be determined at trial. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

– Defenses – Insanity

Mental condition defense established by 11 F.S.M.C. 302(1) is an affirmative defense and therefore places squarely upon the defendant the burden to establish "the facts which negative liability" by a "preponderance of the evidence." 11 F.S.M.C. 107(1)(b). Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 312 (App. 1988).

Mental condition defense established by 11 F.S.M.C. 302(1), and other affirmative defenses, do not lift from government the burden of establishing all essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 312 (App. 1988).

Evidence that the defendant suffered from a physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect is admissible whenever it is relevant to prove that the defendant did or did not have a state of mind which is an element of the offense. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 594 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Kosrae statute, the affirmative defense of mental condition places the burden of proof upon the defendant to establish the facts which negative liability. The defendant must establish these facts by a preponderance of the evidence. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 595 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The court may appoint an expert witness to assist both the state and the defendant in evaluating a criminal defendant's mental condition. Kosrae v. Charley, 13 FSM R. 214, 215 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Under Kosrae State Code § 13.104(2)(d), when the defendant is acquitted on the ground of physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect excluding responsibility, the verdict and the judgment should so state, which means when an acquittal based on this affirmative defense is made following a trial. Kosrae v. Charley, 14 FSM R. 470, 471-72 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Because the need for the affirmative defense of insanity arises only if the state proves all elements, including intent, beyond a reasonable doubt, the affirmative defense is not capable of determination without a trial. Therefore a pretrial motion to dismiss a prosecution on the ground that the defendant is insane will be denied as premature and a final determination on the affirmative defense will be deferred until trial. Kosrae v. Charley, 14 FSM R. 470, 472 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The affirmative defense of insanity is a different issue than the defendant's current capacity to understand the proceedings and participate in trial. Kosrae v. Charley, 14 FSM R. 470, 472 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A defendant is presumed competent, but when genuine and serious concerns about his mental condition have been raised, the court will order a hearing held to determine if, due to physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect, the defendant lacks the capacity to understand the proceedings against him or to assist in his own defense. Kosrae v. Charley, 14 FSM R. 470, 472 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the medical evaluations in the file offer no assurance of safety to the defendant or to the person or property of others, the court will consider evidence of his dangerousness to himself and to the person or property of another at a hearing on fitness to proceed, and pending that hearing the defendant will remain in custody as previously ordered. Kosrae v. Charley, 14 FSM R. 470, 473 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

No person who, as a result of physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect, lacks capacity to understand the proceedings against him or to assist in his own defense can be tried, convicted, or sentenced for the commission of an offense so long as such incapacity endures. The incapacity must be demonstrated in either of two ways: 1) by a showing that the defendant lacks the capacity to understand the proceedings against him, or 2) by a showing that the defendant is unable to assist in his own defense. Chuuk v. Pwechar, 15 FSM R. 256, 258 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the medical report does not present any evidence that the defendant lacks the capacity to understand the proceedings against him as the result of physical or mental incapacity, but rather states that he does understand the proceedings against him, and when the medical report does not present any evidence that the defendant lacks the capacity to assist in his own defense, the court will deny a motion to suspend trial due to the defendant's incapacity but will not preclude the submission of additional evidence at trial of the defendant's mental and physical capacity as it relates either to the requisite intent required to prove the charges against him or to his fitness to stand trial. Chuuk v. Pwechar, 15 FSM R. 256, 258 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The mental disease, disorder or defect defense established by 11 F.S.M.C. 302 is an affirmative defense. Under 11 F.S.M.C. 302(3), the party asserting this defense has the burden of proving the existence of the physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect by clear and convincing evidence. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 216 (Pon. 2010).

The statute requires that if a defendant is acquitted on the grounds of physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect excluding responsibility, the verdict and the judgment must so state. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 216 (Pon. 2010).

When an adjudication on the merits has not yet occurred and the case is still in the pretrial stage, a defendant's motion for acquittal on insanity grounds is premature and will be denied without prejudice since the FSM Code requires that, if a defendant is acquitted on the grounds of physical or mental disorder, the verdict and judgment must so state and since the court cannot issue a verdict and judgment until after a trial on the merits, during which the prosecution must prove beyond a reasonable doubt all elements including intent. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 216 (Pon. 2010).

If, at trial, the government proves all elements of an offense, including intent, beyond a reasonable doubt, the defendant is entitled to raise the issue of his mental condition as an affirmative defense. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 216 (Pon. 2010).

Most defenses, such as self-defense, insanity, and entrapment require factual determinations that make pretrial disposition inappropriate. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

Evidence that the defendant suffered from a physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect is admissible whenever it is relevant to prove that the defendant did or did not have a state of mind which is an element of the crime. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 337 n.2 (Chk. 2019).

Once the court had adopted the medical professionals' conclusions and found that, when the defendant committed the crime, he was suffering from a mental disease, disorder, or defect – paranoid schizophrenia, even though, on occasion, that paranoid schizophrenia is circumscribed, the court could not take the approach that the defendant knew he possessed a firearm, and then found him guilty, and imposed the sentence the parties had agreed to in their plea agreement. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338 (Chk. 2019).

No person can be convicted, sentenced, or otherwise punished for any crime committed while suffering from a physical or mental disease, disorder or defect, such that the disease, disorder or defect prevented that person from knowing the nature of the criminal act or that it was wrong. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338 (Chk. 2019).

"Clear and convincing evidence" is the standard of proof required to prove the existence of a defendant's physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338 n.5 (Chk. 2019).

When the court has found that clear and convincing evidence proved the existence of the accused's mental disease, disorder, or defect when he committed the crime, the court is required by statute to enter a judgment of acquittal due to mental disease, disorder, or defect. But the court's responsibility does not end there. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338-39 (Chk. 2019).

When a defendant is acquitted on the grounds of physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect excluding responsibility, the verdict and judgment must state that. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 339 (Chk. 2019).

When the defendant is acquitted on the grounds of physical or mental disease, disorder, or defect excluding responsibility, the court will retain jurisdiction over the defendant for a period not exceeding the maximum time of imprisonment allowed for the crime. The court will, subject to the law governing civil commitment or conditional release of persons suffering from mental disease, disorder, or defect, order the defendant to be committed or released on such conditions as the court determines necessary, and the court may, at regular intervals, review the defendant's condition and behavior and continue or revise any orders as the court determines necessary. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 339 (Chk. 2019).

A judgment in the defendant's favor must reflect the physical or mental disease, defect, or disorder suffered by the defendant when the crime was committed, the defendant's condition when the judgment is entered, and the course of treatment, if any is ordered. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 339 (Chk. 2019).

A court may enter a judgment of acquittal by reason of mental disease, disorder, or defect, despite the defendant's earlier guilty plea, where the defendant was suffering from paranoid schizophrenia when he committed the crime; and if, at the time of the acquittal, the defendant is still suffering from paranoid schizophrenia, the court may include in its judgment of acquittal and its accompanying order of civil commitment, an order for a course of future treatment, and either party may, at any time, move to amend or revise this treatment order in any way deemed necessary. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 339-40 (Chk. 2019).

If the court ascertains upon competent medical or other evidence, that, when the accused committed the crime charged, he was so insane as not to know the nature and quality of his act, the court must record a finding of such fact and may make an order pursuant to section 6 F.S.M.C. 1802, which authorizes courts to commit an insane person to any hospital for the care and keeping of the insane. Custody by the Chuuk Department of Public Safety and treatment by the Chuuk State Behavioral and Wellness Clinic at the Chuuk Hospital was the closest the court could come to commitment to a hospital for the care and keeping of the insane. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 340 (Chk. 2019).

– Defenses – Intoxication

A contention that the defendant's voluntary intoxication absolves him of the legal consequences of his conduct by preventing him from forming the requisite intent to commit a crime is not a defense. The defendant, rather than the rest of the community should bear the risk of his own intoxication. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 27 (Pon. 1981).

Mere observation by a police officer of a person conducting himself in a manner generally associated with intoxication could be "reasonable grounds" for a cautious person to consider it more likely than not that the person has been consuming alcohol. This of course would depend upon the opportunity to observe actions and mannerisms usually associated with intoxication. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 33 n.3 (App. 1985).

In the absence of evidence as to how much alcohol the defendant drank and how it affected his conduct, the court need not determine whether the defendant's intoxication negated his ability to form the intent to kill. Jonah v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 308, 312 (App. 1992).

Voluntary intoxication does not excuse a defendant from awareness of the risk of causing serious bodily injury to another through recklessly dangerous behavior. Machuo v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 40, 44 (App. 1993).

– Defenses – Selective Prosecution

The elements of an equal protection claim of discriminatory or selective enforcement are: other similarly situated persons who generally have not been prosecuted; the defendant was intentionally or purposefully singled out for prosecution; and the prosecution was based on an arbitrary or invidious classification. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 7 (Chk. 2002).

If a criminal defendant is to make out a selective prosecution equal protection claim, he must identify any persons similarly situated to him that the government could have prosecuted, but has failed to, and he must show that his prosecution is based on an invidious classification such as sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8 (Chk. 2002).

A selective-prosecution claim is not a defense on the merits to the criminal charge itself, but an independent assertion that the prosecutor has brought the charge for reasons forbidden by the Constitution. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

The elements of an equal protection claim of discriminatory or selective enforcement are: other similarly situated persons who generally have not been prosecuted; the defendant was intentionally or purposefully singled out for prosecution; and the prosecution was based on an arbitrary or invidious classification. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

To make out a selective prosecution equal protection claim, an accused must identify any persons similarly situated to him that the government could have prosecuted, but has failed to, and he must show that his prosecution is based on an invidious classification of either sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

An accused must raise the selective-prosecution claim at the pretrial motion stage. Defects in the institution of a prosecution, which is what a selective (or vindictive) prosecution would be, must be raised by motion before trial. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 552 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendants do not claim that they were singled out for prosecution based upon their sex, race, ancestry, national origin, or language, but assert that they are being arbitrarily prosecuted based upon their "social status," and when they do not clearly state what their social status is that is the basis of the prosecution's alleged invidious classification and discrimination, it cannot be their status as high government officials (congressmen or former congressmen) because that is the same status as one (ex-president) who was not prosecuted and who the defendants claim was similarly situated so they cannot have been prosecuted based on the membership in that "classification." Furthermore, the choice to prosecute someone because of his or her status as a high government official is not an invidious classification because of the deterrent effect of such prosecutions and because of such prosecutions' effect to maintain the public confidence that public officials are not above the law. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 553 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendants cannot identify an invidious classification (which they assert is their "social status"), they cannot make out that element of a selective prosecution claim, especially when the court has doubts whether the purported examples of persons similarly situated are actually that. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 553 (Chk. 2007).

To establish a claim of vindictive prosecution, the defendant must make an initial showing that charges of increased severity were filed because the accused exercised a statutory, procedural or constitutional right in circumstances that gave rise to an appearance of vindictiveness. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 554 (Chk. 2007).

When the court cannot say that the charges were of increased severity and were filed because a defendant exercised a statutory, procedural or constitutional right in circumstances that gave rise to an appearance of vindictiveness since probation revocation merits were never considered and since the charges the defendant was convicted of and for which revocation of probation was sought carried a higher maximum penalty than the conspiracy charge in this case, and since the other defendant was not faced with charges of increased severity since he was not previously accused of any offense for his conduct in September, 2004, the defendants' motions to dismiss based on selective or vindictive prosecution will be denied. FSM v. Fritz, 14 FSM R. 548, 554 (Chk. 2007).

A selective prosecution claim does not provide a basis for dismissal of the information because it is not a defense to the merits to the criminal charge itself, but an independent claim. Chuuk v. Robert, 15 FSM R. 419, 425 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Since selective prosecution is a defense in a criminal case, when a civil defendant asserts that it was singled out for enforcement and was the only employer being sued for unpaid health insurance premiums, the court will read this as an equal protection claim. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 538-39 (Chk. 2011).

The elements of an equal protection claim of discriminatory or selective prosecution are: 1) other similarly situated persons who generally have not been prosecuted; 2) the defendant was intentionally or purposefully singled out for prosecution; and 3) the prosecution was based on an arbitrary or invidious classification. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167 (App. 2015).

To make out a selective prosecution equal protection claim, an accused must identify any persons similarly situated to him that the government could have prosecuted but has failed to, and he must show that his prosecution is based on an invidious classification of either sex, race, ancestry, national origin, language, or social status. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167 (App. 2015).

A selective-prosecution claim is not a defense on the merits to the criminal charge itself, but an independent assertion that the prosecutor has brought the charge for reasons forbidden by the Constitution. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167 (App. 2015).

A selective prosecution claim fails when the accused and the other persons who have not been prosecuted are not similarly situated, as when the accused, who was in charge of the operation and the moving force behind it, was prosecuted and the lower level personnel were not. Just because they were all involved in the same overall enterprise does not necessarily make them similarly situated. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 167-68 (App. 2015).

– Defenses – Self-Defense

The general rule is that a person can use no more force than is necessary to protect himself, his family, and his home and property from an intruder and to expel the intruder. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 37 (Truk 1981).

There is no automatic prohibition against use of a dangerous weapon to protect oneself and family against an intruder, even against an intruder without a weapon, so long as the weapon is not used in deadly fashion and the actual force employed is not more than would be reasonably necessary for purposes of protection. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 38 (Truk 1981).

The court is willing to assume that the homeowner whose wife's brother is seeking to enter the house by force late at night in a threatening manner should as a matter of customary law go lightly and use less force than he might to expel some other intruder. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 41 (Truk 1981).

Self-defense is not an affirmative defense. A defense is an affirmative defense only if it is so designated by the National Criminal Code or another statute. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 554 (App. 1984).

A police officer is entitled under 12 F.S.M.C. 215 to respond to physical resistance or attacks against him as he attempts to make an arrest and he may use whatever force is reasonably necessary to defend himself or others from harm. However, the police officer may not use more force than he reasonably believes to be necessary, either to effect arrest or to defend himself. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 570 (App. 1984).

A person can use no more force than is reasonably necessary to protect himself, his family, home and property from an intruder, and to expel the intruder. Tosie v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 175, 177-78 (App. 1991).

Privilege to use reasonable force in defense of family, home and property may under the circumstances extend onto the road adjacent to the home. Tosie v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 175, 177 (App. 1991).

A claim of self-defense is meritless when the only provocation is an insulting gesture and there is no imminent threat of bodily harm. Alik v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 469, 472 (App. 1994).

There are two different standards used when reviewing a claim of self-defense. When one is threatened with imminent serious bodily harm or death by another he may justifiably use deadly force if necessary to protect himself from great bodily harm or death. When one is threatened with imminent unlawful bodily harm (but not serious bodily harm or death) he may justifiably use nondeadly force if force is necessary to prevent the unlawful bodily harm. Where there is no threat of deadly force the correct standard is that the unlawful force must at least constitute imminent threat of an assault before one may defend oneself by force. The force employed must be reasonable in the light of the amount, degree and kind of force being used by the aggressor. Alik v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 469, 473 (App. 1994).

The defenses of provocation and self-defense are related. The standard for considering a claim of self-defense based upon provocation is that when one is threatened with imminent unlawful bodily harm, one may justifiably use nondeadly force if force is necessary to prevent the unlawful bodily harm. The unlawful force must at least constitute imminent threat of an assault before one may defend oneself by force. The force used must be reasonable in the light of the amount, degree and kind of force being used by the aggressor. Furthermore, a claim of self-defense is meritless when the only provocation is an insulting gesture and there is no imminent threat of bodily harm. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 13 FSM R. 333, 336 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A person commits murder if he unlawfully causes the death of another human being intentionally or knowingly, or recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life. This can be broken down into five separate elements which the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt: 1) the defendant, 2) unlawfully caused, 3) the death, 4) of another human being, 5) either intentionally or knowingly, or recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life. With respect to the second element, whether a defendant's "unlawfully caused" the victim's death, the defendant's acts in self-defense render their actions lawful or excusable. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 487 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Self-defense is not an affirmative defense and the burden of proof remains with the prosecution to prove each element of the offense when self-defense is asserted. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The general rule is that a person can use no more force than is necessary to protect himself, his family, and his home and property from an intruder and to expel the intruder. The force employed in self-defense must therefore be reasonable in the light of the amount, degree and kind of force being used by the aggressor. A claim of self-defense is meritless when there is no imminent threat of bodily harm. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

In assessing a claim of self-defense involving use of a dangerous weapon, the court must also consider the extent to which use of a dangerous weapon is justified by circumstances. There is no automatic prohibition against use of a dangerous weapon to protect oneself in self-defense, even against an aggressor without a weapon, so long as the weapon is not used in deadly fashion and the actual force employed is not more than would be reasonably necessary for purposes of protection. Such use, however, substantially increases the likelihood that the harm to an aggressor will be greater than it would have otherwise been without a dangerous weapon, which in turn increases the likelihood that the court will find the force used was unreasonably severe. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the court finds that the defendants' acts were in self-defense, but they employed unreasonable force, there is no compulsory reduction of a murder charge to manslaughter. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When a reasonable fact finder could find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants employed unreasonable force against the victim when he was no longer a threat to them, evidenced by their use of dangerous weapons against the victim when he no longer had a machete and their simultaneous beating of him when he was no longer offering resistance, the government has presented sufficient evidence that the victim's killing was unlawful. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the court finds that the defendants killed the victim while in a state of extreme mental or emotional disturbance for which there is a reasonable explanation or excuse, the court will find them guilty of, at most, manslaughter. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 489 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When, well after defendants subdued the victim and rendered him defenseless, they continued to beat him, use of force against the victim by a defendant claiming self-defense was not reasonably necessary for his self-defense because he did not face an imminent threat of serious bodily injury or death from the victim when the victim was killed. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When evidence of self-defense has been presented, the court must determine whether the circumstances surrounding the self-defense claim were sufficient to show that the defendant was provoked, with reasonable explanation or excuse, to commit the killing under a state of extreme emotional or mental distress. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the attack on one defendant provoked his brother, with reasonable explanation or excuse, to use force against the victim, and if either defendant killed the victim while in a state of extreme emotional or mental disturbance due to sufficient provocation, the murder charge against him must be reduced to manslaughter. The provocation must also have existed up until the time the victim was killed and the defendants did not have an opportunity to cool off. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A pretrial motion cannot use the statutorily-defined defense of duress to dismiss an information, since duress is a defense that must be determined at trial. Self-defense is similar in that it also is a factual defense that must be determined at trial. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

Most defenses, such as self-defense, insanity, and entrapment require factual determinations that make pretrial disposition inappropriate. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

An accused's self-defense claim is a factual defense substantially founded upon and intertwined with evidence about the alleged offenses that requires trial of the general issue of the accused's guilt or innocence and that cannot be decided solely on issues of law. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 226 (Chk. 2012).

– Depositions

The burden of showing whether exceptional circumstances exist within the meaning of FSM Criminal Rule 15 is upon the defendant. To obtain a court order for taking of a deposition, the defendant must show that the witness is unavailable to attend the trial, that the testimony of the witness would be material and that such testimony would be in the interest of justice. Wolfe v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 115, 122 (App. 1985).

There are three elements a party in a criminal case seeking to take a deposition must satisfy – 1) there must be exceptional circumstances, 2) it must be in the interest of justice, and 3) it must be the party's own prospective witness whose testimony is to be preserved for use at trial. The movant has the burden of showing whether exceptional circumstances exist. What must be shown is that the witness is unavailable to attend the trial, that the witness's testimony would be material, and that such testimony would be for the moving party's benefit or in some other way in the interest of justice. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 15 allows a party, in exceptional circumstances, to depose his own material witness to preserve testimony for trial. It is not, however, a method of pretrial discovery. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304 (Chk. 2005).

An accused has a constitutional right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. Both the Constitution and the criminal rules contemplate trial by live testimony, not by deposition. This is in part because of the desirability of having the factfinder observe the witnesses' demeanor. Exceptional circumstances are thus required for depositions in criminal cases. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304

(Chk. 2005).

A defendant may obtain a witness's statement in the government's hands either through Rule 16 discovery or through Rule 26.2(a) procedures. It is not obtainable by deposition. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304-05 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 15 only allows depositions to be taken to preserve testimony for use at trial. It does not permit a witness who is available to attend trial to be deposed beforehand. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 15 does not allow a deposition to be taken to discover evidence to be used solely to support a defendant's allegations in one of his pretrial motions on a collateral matter concerning matters that occurred within the Department of Justice after the date the offenses charged occurred. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 2005).

A criminal defendant may depose his own witness, even an adverse or hostile witness, in the interests of justice if exceptional circumstances exist. Exceptional circumstances may exist when the potential witness would be unavailable for trial. Unavailability for trial is defined by FSM Evidence Rule 804(a). FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 305 (Chk. 2005).

A witness is unavailable if he is absent from the hearing and the proponent of his statement has been unable to procure his attendance by process or other reasonable means. A foreign resident's attendance at trial cannot be secured by process since the FSM Supreme Court's subpoena power does not extend into other countries. Merely being resident in a foreign country does not necessarily mean the witness is unavailable, but when the travel expenses are burdensome or when the witness unwilling to return for trial testimony, a possibility that may be more likely when he is an adverse, or even hostile, witness, a foreign resident may be considered unavailable and a deposition warranted. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 305-06 (Chk. 2005).

When a defendant has made no showing how a witness's testimony would be beneficial to him, but, it is a short time before the witness departs the FSM, and when the defendant has made a minimal showing it may be in the interests of justice and thus managed to meet his burden to show exceptional circumstances, the witness can be deposed although technically the witness might not be unavailable until he has actually left the FSM. The deposition should be limited to trial testimony and not to be used for discovery, or for collateral matters, or for matters that could not be considered trial testimony. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 306 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 15 permits the court to authorize a deposition in a criminal case when exceptional circumstances exist. It only allows depositions to be taken to preserve testimony for use at trial. It does not permit a witness who is available to attend trial to be deposed beforehand. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

There are three elements a party in a criminal case seeking to take a deposition must satisfy 1) there must be exceptional circumstances, 2) it must be in the interest of justice, and 3) it must be the party's own prospective witness whose testimony is to be preserved for use at trial. The movant has the burden of showing whether "exceptional circumstances" exist, and what must be shown is that the witness is unavailable to attend the trial, that the witness's testimony would be material, and that such testimony would be for the moving party's benefit or in some other way in the interest of justice. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A witness is unavailable if he is absent from the hearing and the proponent of his statement has been unable to procure his attendance by process or other reasonable means. A foreign resident's attendance at trial cannot be secured by process since the FSM Supreme Court's subpoena power does not extend into other countries. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Merely being resident in a foreign country does not necessarily mean the witness is unavailable, but when the travel expenses are burdensome or when the witness is unwilling to return for trial testimony, a possibility that may be more likely when he is an adverse, or even hostile, witness, a foreign resident may be considered unavailable and a deposition warranted. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

An exceptional circumstances analysis must be conducted in order to establish whether a Rule 15 deposition is appropriate. The analysis must include whether 1) the witness is unavailable to testify at trial; 2) injustice will result because testimony material to the movant's case will be absent; and 3) countervailing factors render taking the deposition unjust to the nonmoving party. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A witness that is currently beyond the Chuuk state court's subpoena powers combined with her unwillingness to return to Chuuk is unavailable under the meaning of Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 15. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the alleged incidents occurred in a room in the presence of both defendants and the witness and the events that transpired within the room can be verified by the room's occupants and the witness's testimony is the plaintiff's crux for the case against the defendants because the plaintiff expects the witness's testimony to refute the defendants' account of the occurrences, the witness's testimony is material to the plaintiff. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

There are no countervailing factors when the defendants have not opposed the prosecution's request for a deposition and there is no evidence, on the record, indicating that any countervailing factors exist that would render the taking of the witness's deposition unjust. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Rule 15 depositions require a request by the party who is planning to call the prospective witness or a detained witness's request. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the government points out that the witness, as the alleged victim in the case, is necessarily a witness for the prosecution, and her deposition is necessary to make a case; when the government made the request under Rule 15; when there have been no objections to the depositions; when the government and the witness presented exceptional circumstances since the witness was both unable and unwilling to return to Chuuk due to her concerns regarding her safety and well being in Chuuk; and when the witness is therefore "unavailable," the necessary Rule 15 factors have been met as required and the court will grant the request for the deposition. Chuuk v. Emilio, 19 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A party in a criminal case seeking to take a deposition must satisfy three elements – 1) there must be exceptional circumstances, 2) it must be in the interest of justice, and 3) it must be the party's own prospective witness whose testimony is to be preserved for use at trial. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 448 (Chk. 2014).

To obtain a court order for taking of a deposition, the movant must show that the witness is unavailable to attend the trial, that the witness's testimony would be material, and that such testimony would be for the moving party's benefit or in some other way in the interest of justice. The movant bears the burden of showing whether exceptional circumstances exist within the meaning of FSM Criminal Rule 15. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 448 (Chk. 2014).

When the witnesses are apparently willing to testify for the prosecution but are all unavailable because they are all on Guam beyond the reach of the court's subpoena power and are all serving sentences of either incarceration or probation that prevent them from leaving Guam and one is incarcerated and serving a life sentence, this constitutes exceptional circumstances for taking a deposition. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law to establish legal requirements in criminal cases rather than begin with a review of other courts' decisions, when the court has not previously interpreted certain aspects of an FSM criminal procedure rule regarding deposition, which is drawn from and identical or similar to a U.S. rule, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 448 n.2 (Chk. 2014).

Although the alleged victims are unavailable since they are all outside the FSM and cannot be subpoenaed and are generally unwilling to travel to Chuuk to testify because of the events' notoriety and shame and because of concerns over their safety but their evidence is obviously material and it is in the interest of justice that it be preserved for trial, and while fear of testifying at trial may be a ground for finding exceptional circumstances, the court cannot rely on that point when insufficient evidence was provided to show that any particular victim-witness feared testifying at trial in Chuuk. Nevertheless, the victim-witnesses are beyond the reach of the court's subpoena power and cannot be compelled to come to Chuuk and the parties must travel to Guam to take other depositions, so exceptional circumstances exist and they be deposed as well. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 448 (Chk. 2014).

While some of the prosecution witnesses may, in fact, be both willing and able to travel to Chuuk to appear in court, the court will still permit them to be deposed in Guam along with the other prosecution witnesses because exceptional circumstances exist to justify their depositions – they could change their minds; they are beyond the reach of the court's subpoena power; and the parties must travel to Guam to take other depositions since their evidence is material and it is in the interests of justice that their testimony be preserved for trial. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 449 (Chk. 2014).

Rule 15 has elaborate provisions to make it possible for the defendant and his attorney to be present at the taking of a deposition. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 449 (Chk. 2014).

The prosecution may use Rule 15 to depose its witnesses because the FSM's Confrontation Clause does not always require a physical confrontation before the fact-finder, but the justification for using a deposition at a criminal trial as evidence against a defendant is much stronger if defendant has been present or if he or she has waived the right to be present. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 449 (Chk. 2014).

When the government conducts a Rule 15 deposition in a foreign land with a view toward introducing it at trial, the Confrontation Clause requires, at a minimum, that the government undertake diligent efforts to secure the defendant's presence. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

Whenever a deposition is taken at the instance of the government the court may direct that the that the FSM tender the defendant and his counsel with round-trip air transportation and with per diem for their anticipated stay at the deposition site and the cost of the deposition's transcript must also be paid by the government. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

A defendant's failure, absent good cause shown, to appear at the deposition of a government witness after notice and the government's tender of expenses constitutes a waiver of that right and of any objection to the taking and use of the deposition based upon that right. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

If, for whatever reason, a defendant does not wish to or is unable to attend the depositions of prosecution witnesses but does not want to waive his right of confrontation, the prosecution must arrange for his use of two telephone connections to the depositions, one to monitor the proceedings and the other a private line connected to his defense counsel so that he may confer with counsel when needed. The open line for the defendant to monitor the proceedings may be, but is not required to be, a video transmission line such as Skype. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

The scope and manner of examination and cross-examination during the Rule 15 depositions is the same as would be allowed in the trial itself. This includes the prosecution making available to the defendant or his counsel for examination and use during the deposition any statement of the witness being deposed which is in the government's possession and to which the defendant would be entitled at the trial. The deposition procedure will also include frequent pauses in the testimony so as to allow for translation for the defendant's benefit. The prosecution will be responsible for engaging and compensating a court-approved translator so that the defendant can follow the testimony and confer with his defense counsel. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

There are major differences between the rules for depositions in civil cases and Rule 15, which authorizes, in exceptional circumstances, depositions in criminal cases. In civil litigation, depositions may be taken as a matter of right at any party's instance and may be for discovery or to obtain evidence, but under Criminal Rule 15, depositions may be taken in a criminal case only upon court order and are not for discovery of information but only to preserve evidence. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 272, 274 (Pon. 2017).

Rule 15(e)'s primary purpose is to safeguard the criminally accused's confrontation rights by limiting the use of deposition testimony to narrowly defined situations of unavailability. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 272, 274 n.3 (Pon. 2017).

There are three elements a party in a criminal case seeking to take a deposition must satisfy: 1) there must be exceptional circumstances, 2) it must be in the interest of justice, and 3) it must be the party's own prospective witness whose testimony is to be preserved for use at trial. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 272, 274 (Pon. 2017).

A movant seeking to take a deposition in a criminal case has the burden of showing whether exceptional circumstances exist. What must be shown is that the witness is unavailable to attend the trial, that the witness's testimony would be material, and that such testimony would be for the moving party's benefit or in some other way in the interest of justice. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 272, 275 (Pon. 2017).

Depositions may be taken in criminal cases only by order of court, and then only in exceptional situations. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 272, 275 (Pon. 2017).

When no motion to take depositions was filed, the absence of the required evidence of exceptional circumstances – that the witnesses are unavailable, as defined under FSM Evidence Rule 804(a), to testify at trial; that these witnesses' testimony is material; and that their testimony is for the defendant's benefit or in the interest of justice, means the depositions are inadmissible for trial or any hearing. Thus, a motion for the waiver of deposition fees for the depositions that were taken will be denied. FSM v. Wolphagen, 21 FSM R. 272, 275-76 (Pon. 2017).

– Discovery

Normally the trial court fashions remedies and sanctions for a party's failure to comply with discovery requirements. The exercise of the trial court's discretion should not be disturbed by an appellate court absent a showing that the trial court's action has unfairly resulted in substantial hardship and prejudice to a party. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 558 (App. 1984).

It is normally for the trial court to fashion remedies and sanctions for failure of a party to comply with discovery requirements and the exercise of the trial court's discretion should not be disturbed by an appellate court absent a showing that the trial court's action has unfairly resulted in substantial hardship and prejudice to a party. Bernardo v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 310, 313 (App. 1990).

Where defendants have no constitutional right to the discovery sought, an untimely motion to compel discovery will be denied. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 128 (Pon. 1995).

The prosecution has an ongoing obligation to supply to defendants any and all unprivileged evidence of an exculpatory nature. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 128 n.4 (Pon. 1995).

The government has no affirmative obligation to provide the defendant with information concerning misdemeanor offenses committed by its potential witnesses. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 641 (Chk. 1996).

A subpoena duces tecum is not unreasonable and oppressive when it requires documents that were earlier produced in response to discovery and materials and documents not discoverable under Criminal Rule 16 because it is not a valid objection that documents required by the subpoenas are not discoverable under Rule 16, but any materials already furnished in discovery need not be produced pursuant to the subpoenas. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 585 (Chk. 2000).

A preliminary hearing is not a defendant's discovery tool. The preliminary hearing's purpose is to establish probable cause for detaining or requiring bail for an accused, not to create a discovery opportunity for the defendant (although some discovery may usually be a by-product of the hearing). The Criminal Procedure Rules provide other discovery methods for a defendant's use. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 623 (Chk. 2002).

The government can request discovery of a defendant in a criminal case in only three limited instances. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 9 (Chk. 2002).

The government can ask the nature of any defense which a criminal defendant intends to use at trial and the name and address of any person whom the defendant intends to call in support thereof. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 9 (Chk. 2002).

If, and only if, the defendant has already requested discovery under Rule 16(a)(1)(C) or (D), then the government can ask to inspect and copy or photograph books, papers, documents, photographs, tangible objects, or copies or portions thereof, which are within the defendant's possession, custody or control and which the defendant intends to introduce as evidence in chief at the trial, and it can also ask discovery of reports of scientific tests or experiments done which the defendant intends to introduce as evidence in chief at trial or which a witness the defendant intends to call will testify about. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 9 (Chk. 2002).

All the evidence that the government is entitled to request discovery of, is evidence that the defendant intends to introduce at trial. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 9 (Chk. 2002).

The government's right to discovery is, in part, limited due to constitutional concerns about an accused's right to protection against self-incrimination. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10 (Chk. 2002).

One reason for limiting the government's right to discovery is the many other means the government has for obtaining needed information, such as the search warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10 (Chk. 2002).

Rule 16(b) only concerns the limited amount of information that the government may, in very limited circumstances, seek by discovery. It is not concerned with what the government may seek to obtain through the use of a search warrant – search warrants are not "discovery." FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10 (Chk. 2002).

If, before or during trial, a party discovers additional evidence or material previously requested or ordered, which is subject to discovery or inspection, or discovers additional witnesses or defenses, that party must promptly notify the other party or that other party's attorney or the court of its existence. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 189 (Chk. 2002).

The rules contemplate that additional evidence and material might be discovered after the initial disclosure and prior to or even during trial that will need to be disclosed before being used at trial. The rules do not prohibit either side from finding more evidence for use at trial. Such late disclosure may be necessary for the just determination of a criminal proceeding. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 189-90 (Chk. 2002).

While it is understandable that the government may not want to include someone as a witness until it has had the chance to interview that person to see what their testimony might be, this does not override Rule 16(c)'s prompt notification requirement. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 190 (Chk. 2002).

If the government feels that disclosing material to a defendant would jeopardize other pending investigations before they were completed, it can comply with Rule 16(c)'s prompt disclosure requirement and address its legitimate concerns over a pending investigation's confidentiality by notifying the court. Such a notification would be by a written ex parte motion for a protective order to be viewed by the judge alone in camera. The movant's burden would be to make a sufficient showing that a protective order is needed. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 190 & n.1 (Chk. 2002).

When rather than seek a protective order, the government has deliberately chosen not to disclose the material to the defendant (and to the court) until it felt that its other investigation would not be jeopardized, some sanction must be imposed in such circumstances. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 190 (Chk. 2002).

When it has been brought to the court's attention that a party has failed to comply with Rule 16, the court may order that party to permit the discovery or inspection, grant a continuance, or prohibit the party from introducing evidence not disclosed, or it may enter such other order as it deems just under the circumstances. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 190 (Chk. 2002).

The preferred remedy when the government makes a late disclosure of evidence is to offer the defendant a continuance to prepare to meet the additional evidence. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 190 (Chk. 2002).

A court should impose the least severe sanction that will accomplish the desired result of prompt and full compliance with the court's discovery orders and Rule 16(c). In exercising its discretion to fashion the appropriate remedy, the court should take into account the reasons why disclosure was not made, the extent of the prejudice, if any, to the opposing party, the feasibility of rectifying that prejudice by a continuance, and any other relevant circumstances. These factors must be weighed even where there is a clear discovery order. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 190-91 (Chk. 2002).

It can be an abuse of discretion to exclude evidence, instead of granting continuance, when the late disclosure of evidence was inadvertent. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 191 (Chk. 2002).

Less drastic remedies, such as a continuance are proper instead of suppression when the government's discovery violations are not in bad faith. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 191 (Chk. 2002).

Even when the government has not acted in bad faith, and although a continuance may normally be the most desirable remedy, a court may still properly suppress late-disclosed evidence for prophylactic purposes. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 191 (Chk. 2002).

Late-disclosed evidence may be suppressed for use in the government's case-in-chief, but allowed for use in rebuttal. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 186, 191 (Chk. 2002).

There is no good reason to stay the completion of discovery in a criminal case while appellate review is sought when the defendant has already made his discovery request and because the amount of discovery that can be requested in a criminal case is so limited and the government cannot even request discovery unless the defendant has already done so, it is difficult to conceive of any circumstances under which staying discovery in a criminal case would be proper. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2003).

The government may file under seal an ex parte document, for the court to view in camera, explaining which discovery entries should be redacted and for what reasons. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 167, 169 (Chk. 2005).

If the government feels that disclosing certain material to the defendants would jeopardize other pending investigations before they were completed it can comply with Rule 16(c)'s prompt disclosure requirement and address its legitimate concerns over the confidentiality of pending investigation(s) by notifying the court. Such a notification can be by a written ex parte motion for a protective order to be viewed by the judge alone in camera. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 167, 169 (Chk. 2005).

Upon a sufficient showing the court may at any time order that the discovery or inspection be denied, restricted, or deferred, or make such other order as is appropriate. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 167, 169 (Chk. 2005).

When the prosecution has voluntarily undertaken to provide witness statements in advance of trial by not objecting to the defendant's discovery request for them and by the then prosecutor turning over all of the witness statements he had then, the defense should not be expected or required to make a motion at the end of each prosecution witness's direct testimony for the production of a statement it had every reason to believe it already had. The defense's failure to move for the witness's prior statement after each had testified on direct is therefore excused. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 26.2 does not restrict its command to the production of statements in the hands of, or known to, the particular prosecuting attorney assigned to the case. Its order is unqualified. It applies to any witness statement in the government's hands. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 n.2 (Chk. 2005).

Pursuant to the parties' continuing duty to disclose evidence or material previously requested or ordered, once the prosecution has volunteered to provide witness statements before trial, it should have provided the Chuukese language witness statements versions as well. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

When the prosecution has volunteered to provide prior witness statements before trial, a mistrial will be declared if the prosecution's failure to provide the Chuukese language witness statements before trial prejudiced the defendant. The failure to produce prior witness statements is analyzed under a strict harmless error standard. Since courts cannot speculate whether the statement of the witness could have been utilized effectively at trial, the harmless error doctrine must be strictly applied in these cases. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

The proper standard in negligent nondisclosure cases should call for a new trial whenever the nondisclosed evidence might reasonably have affected the factfinder's judgment on some material point, without necessarily requiring a supplementary finding that it would also have changed its verdict. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

The purpose of production of witness statements is to give defendants impeachment materials at a time when they can effectively use them. When the prosecution has failed to timely provide the statements, that objective can be fulfilled by the grant of a mistrial because when the denial of an opportunity to impeach a prosecution witness's highly damaging testimony is caused by the breach of the prosecutor's duty to produce the witness's prior statement, a new trial is necessitated. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 268 (Chk. 2005).

If a witness's prior statement surfaces during the prosecution's case-in-chief, reopening the witness's testimony in the case-in-chief and permitting further cross-examination of the prosecution witness might be an appropriate remedy. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 269 (Chk. 2005).

To the extent any witness statement contains exculpatory material, the prosecution has an ongoing obligation to supply the defendant any and all unprivileged evidence of an exculpatory nature. Such exculpatory information includes material that bears on the credibility of a significant witness in the case since a witness's prior inconsistent statement bears on his credibility. FSM v. Walter, 13 FSM R. 264, 269 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 15 allows a party, in exceptional circumstances, to depose his own material witness to preserve testimony for trial. It is not, however, a method of pretrial discovery. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304 (Chk. 2005).

A defendant may obtain a witness's statement in the government's hands either through Rule 16 discovery or through Rule 26.2(a) procedures. It is not obtainable by deposition. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 301, 304-05 (Chk. 2005).

Criminal Rule 16(b)(1)(C) provides that the defendant, on the government's request, shall state the nature of any defense which he intends to use at trial and the name and address of any person whom the defendant intends to call in support thereof. When the government has properly made such a request and the defendant has not responded and his failure to comply 16 has been brought to the court's attention, the court may order such party to permit the discovery or inspection, grant a continuance, or prohibit the party from introducing evidence not disclosed, or it may enter such other order as it deems just under the circumstances. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 443-44 (Chk. 2005).

Rule 16(a) provides that if the defendant requests disclosure of evidence from the state, then following such disclosure by the state, the defendant upon the state's request, must comply with the state's request for disclosure. Rule 16(b)(1) specifies the type of disclosures which may be requested by the state, and then be provided by the defendant. The government can ask, and the defendant must provide, the nature of any defense which a criminal defendant intends to use at trial and the name and address of any person whom he intends to call in support thereof. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 49 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

If additional evidence that has been requested, or witnesses, or defenses, which are subject to discovery, are discovered before or during trial, that party must promptly notify the other party, its counsel or the court of its existence. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 49 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Pursuant to Kosrae General Court Order 2005-2, responses to request for discovery pursuant to sections (a) and (b) of Rule 16 must be served upon the requesting party within ten days of service of the request for discovery. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 49 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When it has been brought to the court's attention that a party has failed to comply with Rule 16, the court may order that party to permit the discovery, permit a continuance, prohibit the party from introducing evidence not disclosed, or it may enter such other order as it deems just under the circumstances. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 49 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the state's reciprocal request for discovery was filed in January 2005, ten months prior to trial and GCO 2005-2, which specified the ten day response period, was adopted in July 2005 and effective immediately, but the state waited until the trial date, in October 2005, to inform the court of the defendant's non-compliance with Rule 16, the state's report was untimely and trial was held. Kosrae v. Phillip, 14 FSM R. 42, 49 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the defendant's qualified immunity defense was not disclosed in his response to the government's Rule 16(b)(1)(C) discovery request and it should have been because it goes beyond a claim that the government failed to prove all elements of the offense and because it is not a claim that he acted legally based on the facts but that he is immune from criminal liability even if he did not act legally, this defense could be rejected on the ground of non-disclosure alone. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 (Chk. 2006).

The court has always considered the government's "open file" discovery system to be a commendable and salutary practice. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 398, 402 (Chk. 2006).

While neither discovery requests nor responses under Criminal Rule 16 should be filed with the court except to the extent necessary to enable the court to perform its regulatory role under Rule 16(d), the mere filing of discovery disclosures does not result in the admission as evidence of the documents filed. In order to be admitted as evidence, the plaintiff will have to introduce each document during trial in conformance with the Rules of Evidence. Thus, the plaintiff's filing of its disclosures does not result in any prejudice to the defendant and his motion to strike the discovery filings will be denied. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 208 (Pon. 2007).

It is normally for the trial court to fashion remedies and sanctions for failure of a party to comply with discovery requirements and the exercise of the trial court's discretion should not be disturbed by an appellate court absent a showing that the trial court's action has unfairly resulted in substantial hardship and prejudice to a party. FSM v. Killion, 15 FSM R. 235, 236 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendant has not shown any substantial hardship or prejudice due to the untimely discovery disclosure because, if the defendant's motion to compel had not been responded to, he would have expected the court to order the discovery disclosure to be made by a date certain, but instead, the prosecution responded by making the appropriate disclosures, and when the court concluded that the prosecution's presentation at argument showed excusable neglect and that its prompt disclosure once its neglect had come to its attention showed good faith, the court accordingly granted the prosecution's oral motion to enlarge time for excusable neglect and denied the defendant's motion to dismiss. Nor will the disclosed evidence be excluded as sanction since its untimely disclosure was not deliberate. Therefore the alternative motion to exclude the discovery disclosures from trial will also be denied. FSM v. Killion, 15 FSM R. 235, 237 (Chk. 2007).

When e-mails between a former prosecutor, an attorney member of the prosecution for the purpose of the motion, and the FSM Department of Justice involved trial preparation, strategy, and locating and discussing relevant evidence among the 20,000 pages produced in discovery, it is all attorney work, and, as such, it constitutes internal workings of the Attorney General's Office, that is, it is attorney work product. Attorney work product, including attorney work product by prosecutors in a criminal case, is privileged and not discoverable. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 377 (Chk. 2007).

Generally, the government can be required to disclose discovery material held by government agencies other than the prosecutors. The duty to search for discoverable material particularly applies if the defendant has made an explicit request that certain files in be searched. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 377 (Chk. 2007).

The government's obligation to provide to an accused discoverable material that it would have to disclose if it were in the hands of an FSM government agency does not extend to material not in its possession, but in a foreign government's possession. Unless the material requested is currently in the FSM government's possession, the government is not required to obtain and disclose to the accused any statements made by him to the FBI, U.S. Marshals, and U.S. court personnel during any interview, custodial detention, or meeting. Thus a motion to compel production of the materials in the United States's possession will be denied, but if any such statements are in the FSM's hands, the prosecution must produce them. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 377 (Chk. 2007).

When the grounds for a motion to suppress and redact were that the government did not respond to discovery before the court-imposed deadline set in its scheduling order and the accused does not argue that the government's delays have been in bad faith, the motion will be denied because less drastic remedies, such as a continuance are proper instead of suppression since the government's discovery violations are not in bad faith. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 381, 390 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the court cannot determine from its record whether the government complied with the accused's discovery request, an appropriate motion, if the government failed to timely respond to a discovery request, would be to move to compel answers to discovery under Chuuk Criminal Rule 16(d)(2), which sets forth the remedies for a party's failure to answer discovery requests. Chuuk v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 250, 252 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Rule 12(b)(3) must be construed with Rule 12(d)(2), which provides a mechanism for a defendant to determine which evidence the prosecution intends to use at trial. Once the prosecution identifies what evidence it intends to use at trial, then suppression may be sought by pre-trial motion. Chuuk v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 250, 252 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When there is no indication that the government intends to produce at trial the evidence sought to be suppressed, and until the government specifies that it intends to produce that evidence at trial, a motion to suppress that evidence is premature. The procedures set forth in Rules 12 and 16 need, as appropriate, to be followed before the court can reasonably address such issues. Chuuk v. Karen, 16 FSM R. 250, 252 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Criminal Rule 16(b)(1)(C) provides that the defendant, on the government's request, must state the nature of any defense that he intends to use at trial and the name and address of any person whom the defendant intends to call in support thereof. If, before or during trial, a party discovers additional evidence or material previously requested or ordered, which is subject to discovery or inspection, or discovers additional witnesses or defenses, that party must promptly notify the other party or that other party's attorney or the court of its existence. Chuuk v. Rotenis, 16 FSM R. 565, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the government has properly made a Criminal Rule 16(b)(1)(C) request and the defendant has not responded and failure to comply has been brought to the court's attention, the court may order such party to permit the discovery or inspection, grant a continuance, or prohibit the party from introducing evidence not disclosed, or it may enter such other order as it deems just under the circumstances. Chuuk v. Rotenis, 16 FSM R. 565, 566-67 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When faced with a discovery violation, the court should impose the least severe sanction that will accomplish the desired result of prompt and full compliance with the court's discovery orders and Rule 16(c). In exercising its discretion to fashion an appropriate remedy, the court should take into account the reasons why disclosure was not made, the extent of the prejudice, if any, to the opposing party, the feasibility of rectifying the prejudice by a continuance, and any other relevant circumstances. These factors must be weighed even when there is a clear discovery order. Chuuk v. Rotenis, 16 FSM R. 565, 567 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the court is not convinced that defense counsels took adequate steps to ensure prompt disclosure of their witnesses and when, because a continuance has been granted, prejudice to the government in preparing for the belatedly-disclosed defense witnesses is to some degree alleviated, the government will be allowed to reopen its case-in-chief to call additional witnesses if it wishes, and, if the government intends to re-open its case-in-chief and call additional witnesses in light of defendants' late disclosures of their witnesses, it must file a notice that complies with Criminal Rule 16(a)(1)(E). Chuuk v. Rotenis, 16 FSM R. 565, 567 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The prosecution is under a continuing duty to produce documents requested if any come to light, and is also under a continuing constitutional duty to disclose all exculpatory material that it has or may later obtain. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 75 (Chk. 2010).

Prosecutors are constitutionally required to provide criminal defendants with any and all exculpatory evidence they have regardless of whether the defendant has made a discovery request. This is a continuing obligation which does not cease at any deadline. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 293-94 (Chk. 2012).

Evidence is exculpatory if it clears or tends to clear from alleged fault or guilt. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 293 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

A prosecutor has an ethical obligation to make timely disclosure to the defense of all evidence or information known to the prosecutor that tends to negate the guilt of the accused or mitigates the offense, and, in connection with sentencing, disclose to the defense and to the tribunal all unprivileged mitigating information known to the prosecutor, except when the prosecutor is relieved of this responsibility by a protective order of the tribunal. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 (Chk. 2012).

Regardless of whether an accused has requested discovery, a prosecutor must disclose to the defense evidence that is favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory or because it is impeaching. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 294 (Chk. 2012).

Police are considered part of the prosecution team so that any evidence or information in the hands of the police is considered evidence or information in the prosecution's hands. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2012).

The FSM must provide the defendant with any prior witness statements once that witness has testified so that the defense may use it in any cross-examination. The FSM will usually, and is encouraged to, provide those statements far in advance of the witness's testimony. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 447 (Chk. 2014).

A litigant should not be allowed to make use of the liberal discovery procedures applicable to a civil suit as a dodge to avoid the restrictions on criminal discovery and thereby obtain documents he would not otherwise be entitled to for use in his criminal case, but in the absence of substantial prejudice to the rights of the parties involved, parallel proceedings are unobjectionable. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 627 (Pon. 2014).

Attempting to obtain, under the civil discovery rules, either through a deposition or otherwise, discovery materials that the parties could not obtain under the more restrictive criminal discovery process, is one of the primary reasons for granting a stay of the parallel civil case. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 627 (Pon. 2014).

Discovery differs greatly in civil and criminal cases. A party to a civil litigation is presumptively entitled to obtain discovery regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending case, but a criminal defendant is entitled to those documents which are material to the preparation of the defendant's defense or are intended for use by the government as evidence in chief at the trial. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 627 n.10 (Pon. 2014).

When the prejudice to the defendants in the civil proceedings is too great to allow for a complete stay, and those proceedings will continue in tandem with the criminal procedures, but certain procedures may be delayed based on the court's own sua sponte initiative or by motion of the parties. FSM v. Tokiwa Maru No. 28, 19 FSM R. 621, 629 (Pon. 2014).

When it has been brought to the court's attention that a party has failed to comply with Rule 16, the court may order such party to permit the discovery or inspection, grant a continuance, or prohibit the party from introducing evidence not disclosed, or it may enter such other order as it deems just under the circumstances. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 587, 590 (Pon. 2018).

In exercising its discretion to fashion the appropriate remedy, a court should take into account the reasons why disclosure was not made, the extent of the prejudice, if any, to the opposing party, the feasibility of rectifying that prejudice by a continuance, and any other relevant circumstances. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 587, 590-91 (Pon. 2018).

When there is compliance under the discovery rules, the government did not intentionally withhold evidence from the defendant. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 587, 591 (Pon. 2018).

The preferred remedy when the government makes a late disclosure of evidence is to offer the defendant a continuance to prepare to meet the additional evidence. This is because a court should impose the least severe sanction that will accomplish the desired result of prompt and full compliance with the court's discovery orders and Rule 16(c). FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 587, 591 (Pon. 2018).

When, at a pretrial hearing, the government did not call any of the witnesses that were listed in its recent submission, at this point, the prejudice to the defendant is minimal and not material to the hearing. Because the preferred remedy is to grant a continuance for the opposing party to consider the evidence, instead of excluding the discovery material, the court, in light of the new discovery material, will allow the defendants to file subsequent motions and to propose a schedule allowing them sufficient time to conduct their own examination and follow-up with the potential witnesses on their statements. FSM v. Chunn, 21 FSM R. 587, 591 (Pon. 2018).

One prosecutorial duty is the constitutional obligation to provide criminal defendants with any and all exculpatory evidence they have regardless of whether the defendant has made a discovery request, and this is a continuing obligation that does not end at any deadline. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 101 (App. 2018).

Regardless of whether an accused has requested discovery, a prosecutor must disclose to the defense evidence that is favorable to the accused, either because it is exculpatory, or because it is impeaching. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 101 (App. 2018).

A prosecutor is obligated to make timely disclosure to the defense of all evidence or information known to the prosecutor that tends to negate the guilt of the accused or mitigates the offense, and, in connection with sentencing, disclose to the defense and to the tribunal all unprivileged mitigating information known to the prosecutor, except when the prosecutor is relieved of this responsibility by a protective order of the tribunal. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 101 (App. 2018).

The prosecutor's obligation to produce exculpatory or impeaching evidence involves three types of situations. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

A prosecutor has an obligation to produce exculpatory or impeaching evidence when the undisclosed evidence demonstrates that the prosecution's case includes perjured testimony and that the prosecution knew, or should have known, of the perjury. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

Since the knowing use of perjured testimony is fundamentally unfair, such a conviction must be set aside if there is any reasonable likelihood that the false testimony could have affected the fact-finder's judgment. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

When there was a pretrial request for specific evidence, if the subject matter of such a request is material, or indeed if a substantial basis for claiming materiality exists, it is reasonable for the prosecution to respond either by furnishing the information or by submitting the problem to the trial judge. When the prosecutor receives a specific and relevant request, the failure to make any response is seldom, if ever, excusable. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

When there was a pretrial request for specific evidence or when there was no defense request at all or there was merely a generalized request for exculpatory material, the constitutional obligation is not measured by the prosecutor's moral culpability or willfulness. If evidence highly probative of innocence is in the prosecutor's file, the prosecutor is presumed to recognize its significance even if the prosecutor has actually overlooked it. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102 (App. 2018).

If the evidence sought actually has no probative significance at all, no purpose would be served by requiring a new trial simply because an inept prosecutor incorrectly believed the prosecution was suppressing a fact that would be vital to the defense. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 102-103 (App. 2018).

If the prosecution's suppression of evidence results in constitutional error, it is because of the evidence's character, not the prosecutor's. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 103 (App. 2018).

A primary limitation on a subpoena asking a witness to produce something is that it must be for "evidence," that is, information that will be admissible at trial. Such a subpoena may be challenged when the circumstances indicate that the defense's use is directed at a purpose other than a "good faith" effort to obtain evidence, but where the subpoena seeks a specific document that clearly is relevant, courts invariably conclude that the subpoena is proper. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 103 (App. 2018).

A defendant may request that the prosecution produce for his inspection, and any needed copying, a document material to the preparation of his case. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 104 (App. 2018).

A defendant may, at any time during the course of the proceedings, bring to the trial court's attention that he believes that the prosecution had not complied with his discovery request and seek appropriate relief, which could be a court order to permit the discovery, or inspection of the documents, or the grant of a continuance, or such other order as the court deems just under the circumstances. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 104 (App. 2018).

If the prosecution should find that it has exculpatory evidence, it must provide it, even though the defendant has already been convicted, because there is no deadline for the production of exculpatory evidence and the duty applies irrespective of the prosecution's prior good faith or bad faith. Wolphagen v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 96, 104 (App. 2018).

The court will dismiss charges for illegal possession of ammunition when the factual basis for the charges is entirely insufficient since no one in the FSM ever actually possessed the ammunition because customs officers seized it after postal officials notified them of an incoming package's contents. FSM v. Pelep, 22 FSM R. 400, 403 (Pon. 2019).

– Dismissal

Customary settlements do not require court dismissal of criminal proceedings if no exceptional circumstances are shown. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 140 (Pon. 1982).

After prosecution has been initiated, the court may dismiss litigation if there is no probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 140 (Pon. 1982).

The prosecutor does not have authority to dismiss an existing prosecution on the basis of customary law but the court does have power to respond to a prosecutorial suggestion for dismissal because of customary considerations. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 141 (Pon. 1982).

At common law, repeal of a criminal statute abated all criminal prosecutions which had not reached final disposition in the highest court authorized to review them. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 189-90 n.4 (App. 1982).

Although the prosecution has broad discretion in determining whether to initiate litigation, once that litigation is initiated in the FSM Supreme Court, the court also has responsibility for assuring that actions thereafter taken are in the public interest. Thus, criminal litigation can be dismissed only by obtaining leave of court. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 91 (Pon. 1987).

Although it is reasonable to analyze settlement agreements in civil actions on the basis of contract principles alone, important public policy considerations attach to the settlement of criminal cases. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 91 (Pon. 1987).

Where a court has dismissed a criminal case for lack of jurisdiction over the crimes for which the defendant was charged, the dismissal does not act as a discharge so as to preclude extradition on the charge. "Discharge" requires both personal and subject matter jurisdiction. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 107-08 (App. 1993).

Under the common law the death of a criminal appellant pending appeal abates the proceedings ab initio – not only the appeal but all proceedings from the inception of the prosecution, thus requiring the appellate court to dismiss the appeal, and remand the case to the trial court to vacate the judgment and dismiss the information. Palik v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 362, 364 (App. 1994).

When a criminal defendant dies while his conviction is on appeal and where there was no discrete victim and where there are no collateral matters impinging upon the case requiring further court proceedings it is appropriate under the facts of the case to abate the proceedings ab initio and vacate the conviction. Palik v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 362, 364 (App. 1994).

Where counts in an information other than the one count dismissed also charge illegal fishing violations the dismissal of two other counts for which illegal fishing is an element will be denied. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 126 (Pon. 1995).

A dismissal pursuant to FSM Crim. R. 48(a) is granted without prejudice and by leave of court. In considering whether to granted leave, a court must find that the dismissal is in the public interest. Factors among those customarily considered are whether the dismissal involved any harassment of the defendants and whether a bona fide reason, such as insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction, existed for the dismissal. FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 346, 7 FSM R. 162, 163 (Chk. 1995).

An information that, as a practical matter, is not sufficiently certain and unambiguous so as to permit the defendant to prepare its defense, or to inform the court of what alleged acts or omissions of this particular defendant result in criminal liability is defective, and may be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Xu Rui Song, 7 FSM R. 187, 190 (Chk. 1995).

After prosecution has been initiated, it may be dismissed by a court if there is no probable cause – evidence giving a reasonable ground for suspicion sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that the accused is guilty of the offense – to believe that a crime has been committed, or that the defendant has committed it. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 638 (Chk. 1996).

Because the trend of the application of customary settlements in the criminal justice system, is its use as excuse, justification or mitigation during the imposition of sentence after conviction for a crime and not as an element of guilt or the dismissal of an information and complaint charging a criminal offense, a motion for dismissal of a major criminal charge on the grounds that a customary settlement has been reached will be denied. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 579-80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A motion to dismiss an information because the named defendant is not a formally constituted entity is moot when the government's motion to amend the information to change the defendant's name to its proper name is granted. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 142 (Pon. 1999).

When there is no statutory requirement that a candidate submit his taped speech before it is aired and when there is no mention of criminal liability on the of the government broadcast facility should it do so, there is no probable cause to believe a crime has been committed, and the information and criminal summons should be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

A criminal prosecution for fishing in state waters will not be dismissed when even if the Foreign Fishing Agreement were to be construed as regulating commercial fishing in Kosrae's waters, the cooperative law enforcement public policy weighs in favor of Kosrae's ability to expressly ratify any such regulation by a specific request to institute a prosecution where the ratification facilitated the enforcement of a national law criminalizing conduct proscribed in the Foreign Fishing Agreement. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Fishery Co., 9 FSM R. 421, 423 (Kos. 2000).

A criminal defendant who presents clear evidence that shows that his prosecution violates his right to equal protection (is impermissible discrimination) would be entitled to a dismissal. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 8-9 (Chk. 2002).

The government may by leave of court file a dismissal of an information and thereupon terminate the prosecution. The purpose for requiring court approval of dismissal of a criminal case is to invest the court with sufficient discretion so that the court may determine that dismissal serves the public interest. FSM v. Tomiya Suisan Co., 11 FSM R. 15, 16 (Yap 2002).

Dismissal under Rule 48(a) is appropriate when the government represents that there is insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction. FSM v. Tomiya Suisan Co., 11 FSM R. 15, 16-17 (Yap 2002).

Reasons for which a court may exercise its discretion to dismiss a criminal case are: a plea agreement, the defendant's death, defendant's incompetency to stand trial, government security interests that might be placed at risk by disclosures at trial, when a defendant has cooperated with a prosecutorial investigation, and when the indictment has been superseded. FSM v. Tomiya Suisan Co., 11 FSM R. 15, 17 (Yap 2002).

The relationship between the defendant and victim is never a basis for dismissal of a criminal information. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A case will not be dismissed when the state's penal code does not excuse the criminal conduct alleged in the case based upon a father-daughter relationship. Many criminal cases with a variety of charges involving members of the same family as defendant-victim are prosecuted to final disposition. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Reconciliation is not a basis for dismissal of a criminal information. The law of our nation in this regard is clear. Custom, including customary apology and reconciliation, is to be considered during the sentencing of a criminal prosecution. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A prosecutor's request to dismiss a criminal information without any legal basis for such action and contrary to public policy will be denied. Kosrae v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 20, 23 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A criminal case will not be dismissed if the whole FSM Department of Justice must be disqualified from prosecuting since a special prosecutor can be appointed. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2003).

Even assuming that there was an illegal arrest, a defendant is still not entitled to dismissal of the information. The remedy for an illegal arrest, for failure to provide cause and authority of the arrest, is suppression of any statements made by the defendant. When he did not make any statements to the police, there are no statements to suppress. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 217, 219-20 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

It is the prosecutor's discretion to initiate, continue, or terminate a particular criminal prosecution. However, once prosecution has been initiated, the court also has responsibility to assure that all actions taken thereafter are in the public interest. Public interest requires the court to examine the grounds for a dismissal request. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Public interest requires the court to examine the grounds for dismissal request. The court may dismiss a criminal case on grounds that the court lacks jurisdiction over the crimes charged. The court may also dismiss a criminal case if there is insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction or if there is a lack of probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed by the defendant. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A criminal prosecution for driving under the influence will not be dismissed when the police officers had sufficient reasonable suspicion to conduct an investigatory stop of the defendant because the reasonable suspicion was supplied by an informant, whose identity, credibility, reputation and reliability were known. When at the investigatory stop, the police observed signs of the defendant's alcohol impairment, these signs provided grounds for the police to administer the field sobriety tests to the defendant, and when the defendant failed two field sobriety tests, it gave the police reasonable grounds and probable cause for defendant's commission of driving under the influence and probable cause to arrest the defendant. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When there is no way to determine if prosecutors who were not disqualified would have exercised their discretion to file these charges, the information must be dismissed to allow that to happen. This is because no matter how firmly and conscientiously a prosecutor may steel himself against the intrusion of a competing and disqualifying interest, he never can be certain that he has succeeded in isolating himself from the inroads on his subconscious. The defendant does not have to show actual prejudice, because on the basis of public policy, it will be presumed to exist as a matter of law. The purpose of this is to avoid the appearance of impropriety. This is designed not only to prevent the dishonest practitioner from improper conduct but also to preclude the honest practitioner from being put in a position where he will be forced to choose between conflicting duties. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 364 (Chk. 2004).

When a dismissal is not on the merits and the defendant has not been put in jeopardy, the dismissal is without prejudice. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 360, 365 (Chk. 2004).

Since the statute and possibly the rules require sworn written statements to be filed with the information, when no such statements were attached, motions to dismiss on this ground will be granted. These dismissals are not on the merits. Neither defendant has been put in jeopardy. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 384 (Chk. 2004).

The dismissal of a criminal case because of a statutorily defective information is without prejudice. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 384 (Chk. 2004).

Rule 48(b) is the mechanism by which a defendant may assert his constitutional right to a speedy trial, although it also embraces the court's inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution. The court's power to dismiss under Rule 48(b) is not limited to those situations in which the defendant's constitutional speedy trial right has been violated. The Rule is a restatement of the court's inherent power to dismiss a case for want of prosecution. It imposes a stricter standard of tolerable delay than does the Constitution. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 409 (Chk. 2004).

A four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations: – length of delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his right, and prejudice to the defendant – is an appropriate tool to analyze the meaning of the FSM Constitution's speedy trial right. It is also an appropriate tool to use in analyzing a Rule 48(b) dismissal. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 410 (Chk. 2004).

In determining whether to exercise its discretionary power to dismiss under Rule 48(b), the court may consider the same factors relevant to a constitutional decision regarding denial of a speedy trial. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 410 (Chk. 2004).

The attorney for the government may by leave of court file a dismissal of an information or complaint. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 491 (Pon. 2004).

While the prosecution has broad discretion in determining whether to initiate litigation, once that litigation is instituted in court, the court also has responsibility for assuring that actions thereafter taken are in the public interest; therefore criminal litigation can be dismissed only by obtaining leave of the court. In a fishing case where criminal and civil cases are filed together, and the dismissal of the criminal proceeding(s) is obviously "integral" to the settlement agreement for which court approval is sought, the same policy considerations apply to the settlement of the civil proceeding(s) as apply to the criminal dismissal. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 491 (Pon. 2004).

Factors to examine when determining whether a dismissal is in the public interest include whether the dismissal involved any harassment of the defendants and whether a bona fide reason exists for the dismissal. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 491 (Pon. 2004).

The court is required to exercise sound judicial discretion in considering a request for dismissal. This requires that the court have factual information supporting the request. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 491 (Pon. 2004).

Rule 48 contemplates public exposure of the reasons for a prosecution's abandonment in order to prevent abuse of the power of dismissal. The court must be satisfied that the reasons advanced for dismissal are substantial and in the public interest and are the real grounds upon which the application is based, and it should not be content with mere conclusory statements that the dismissal is in the public interest, but will require a statement of the underlying reasons and underlying factual basis. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 491 (Pon. 2004).

Title 24 establishes agencies to conclude fishing agreements and establish regulations for the exploitation of FSM marine resources. In fishing cases, when the prosecution seeks a dismissal, the court should be presented with evidence that appropriate agencies have been involved in the resolution of the case(s). FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 492 (Pon. 2004).

When, although the settlement contains fines which seem quite small in comparison to the potential fines the defendants face if found guilty, the particular violations are minor and somewhat technical violations of the law, rather than a blatant disregard of the law regulating foreign fishing vessels operating in FSM waters, and when the settlement amount includes an understanding by the FSM that its case is not a very strong one and it is very possible that it might not be able to prove its case against the defendants if it took the case to trial, the court finds sufficient reasons stated to justify dismissal of the action. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 492 (Pon. 2004).

The attorney for the government may by leave of court file a dismissal of an information or complaint. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 502 (Pon. 2004).

While the prosecution has broad discretion in determining whether to initiate litigation, once that litigation is instituted in court, the court also has responsibility for assuring that actions thereafter taken are in the public interest; therefore criminal litigation can be dismissed only by obtaining leave of the court. In a fishing case where criminal and civil cases are filed together, and the dismissal of the criminal proceeding(s) is obviously "integral" to the settlement agreement for which court approval is sought, the same policy considerations apply to the settlement of the civil proceeding(s) as apply to the criminal dismissal. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 502, 504 (Pon. 2004).

Factors to examine when determining whether a dismissal is in the public interest include whether the dismissal involved any harassment of the defendants and whether a bona fide reason exists for the dismissal. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 502, 504 (Pon. 2004).

The court is required to exercise sound judicial discretion in considering a request for dismissal. This requires that the court have factual information supporting the request. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 504 (Pon. 2004).

Rule 48 contemplates public exposure of the reasons for a prosecution's abandonment in order to prevent abuse of the power of dismissal. The court must be satisfied that the reasons advanced for dismissal are substantial and are the real grounds upon which dismissal is required. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 504 (Pon. 2004).

Title 24 establishes agencies to conclude fishing agreements and establish regulations for the exploitation of FSM marine resources. In fishing cases where the prosecution seeks a dismissal, the court should be presented with evidence that appropriate agencies have been involved in the resolution of the case(s). FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 504 (Pon. 2004).

Dismissal of a case is warranted when the statute of limitation applicable to both of the counts in the criminal information had elapsed before the case was filed. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 504-05 (Pon. 2004).

When a criminal information is not supported by written statement(s) under oath showing probable cause to the court's satisfaction before a penal summons (or an arrest warrant) is issued, there is no ground stated that would warrant dismissal of the information if there is nothing before the court that indicates that the information is not a "plain, concise and definite statement of the essential facts constituting the offense." But the summonses issued pursuant to such an information are improperly issued and the resulting initial appearances are as a consequence defective. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 48, 50 (Chk. 2004).

The Governor's issuance of Declaration of Temporary State of Emergency and the Executive Decree, which prohibited the issuance of drinking permits, possession and consumption of alcoholic drinks by persons under the age of 35 and revoked drinking permits which had been issued to persons under the age of 35, exceeded the authority granted to him by the Kosrae Constitution, Article V, Section 13 because there was no civil disturbance, riot, typhoon, natural disaster or immediate threat of war or insurrection which constituted an "extreme emergency" and the Decree was therefore unconstitutional and void. Any criminal charges which have been based upon violation of the Executive Decree must be dismissed. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The offense of negligent driving requires proof of driving a vehicle in such a manner as to constitute a substantial deviation from the standard of care a reasonable person would exercise in the situation and when the state did not present any witnesses who saw the defendant driving his vehicle and there was no evidence presented to show the manner in which defendant was driving his vehicle and whether it was a substantial deviation from the appropriate standard of care and an officer testified that the defendant reported that he had a problem with his vehicle, it is reasonable to infer that this problem may caused the vehicle to leave the road and come to rest in the culvert. The state thus failed to present a prima facie case and the defendant's motion for acquittal on that count was granted and that count dismissed. Kosrae v. Alokoa, 13 FSM R. 82, 83 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The offense of unauthorized operation of a motor vehicle requires proof of operating a motor vehicle on a road without possessing a valid license or learner's permit and when the state did not present any witnesses who saw the defendant operating his vehicle and did not present any evidence that the defendant did not possess a driver's license or learner's permit, there was no evidence presented to prove that the defendant operated his vehicle without a valid license or permit in his possession. The state thus failed to present a prima facie case and the defendant's motion for acquittal on that count was granted and that count dismissed. Kosrae v. Alokoa, 13 FSM R. 82, 83 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Although the initial filing of the case as a criminal matter, and not as a juvenile proceeding, was in error, when as soon as the court was informed that the defendant was minor, the Juvenile Rules were immediately applied to the proceedings and all proceedings were then closed to the public, and the court ensured that a parent of the defendant was present at all proceedings, there was no prejudice to the defendant and the defendant's motion to dismiss on that ground will be denied. Kosrae v. Ned, 14 FSM R. 86, 90 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A criminal statute must not be so vague and indefinite as to fail to give fair notice of what acts will be punished but the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation does not require absolute precision or perfection of criminal statutory language. When the statute complained of, while not mathematically precise, gives fair notice of the acts that will be punished, payment for expenses other than expenses incurred in the course of official public relations, entertainment activities or constituent services necessary to advance the national government's purposes and goals, the prosecution will not be dismissed on the ground that the statute was unconstitutionally vague. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 130 (Chk. 2006).

Since, under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the firearm was used to commit a crime, when the amended information does not allege what crime or crimes, the firearm was used to commit, or even that it was used to commit any crime, it therefore fails to allege an essential element of 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), and that count of the amended information will be dismissed for failure to state an offense. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 334 (Chk. 2006).

Asserting a duress defense at a pretrial stage in the proceedings and on the basis of the showing that another was armed and the defendants were assumed not to be armed does not entitle the movants to a dismissal at this point. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 334 (Chk. 2006).

A four-factor balancing test – 1) length of delay, 2) the reason for the delay, 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant – is used to analyze the meaning of the FSM Constitution's speedy trial right and to determine speedy trial violations; and it is also an appropriate tool to analyze whether a Rule 48(b) dismissal for unnecessary delay in prosecution is warranted. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 499 (Chk. 2006).

To determine whether to exercise its discretionary power to dismiss under Rule 48(b), a court may consider the same factors relevant to a constitutional decision regarding denial of a speedy trial. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 499 (Chk. 2006).

For speedy trial or unnecessary delay purposes, a defendant cannot take advantage of delays caused by his own conduct or consent, whether or not those delays were justified. The delay caused by a defendant's requests, although justified since the court granted relief based on his motions, thus cannot be used by the defendant to seek a dismissal on the ground that his speedy trial right was violated or that there has been unnecessary delay in bringing him to trial. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 497, 500 (Chk. 2006).

Although a motion to dismiss stands unopposed, and while failure to oppose a motion is generally deemed a consent to the motion, the court still needs good grounds before it can grant the motion. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 609, 613 (Pon. 2007).

A defendant cannot be sentenced on both a greater and lesser-included offense. However, this is not grounds for dismissal of either charge prior to trial. If the state proves all elements of both offenses, then the court may enter a conviction and sentence for the greater offense. Kosrae v. Likiaksa, 14 FSM R. 618, 621 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Denials of motions to dismiss on grounds such as a challenge to the sufficiency of the indictment are not immediately appealable by an accused, even if contained in a motion to dismiss on double jeopardy grounds. An order denying a motion to dismiss a charging document because it is defective is not "collateral" in any sense of that term because it goes to the heart of the issues to be resolved at trial.

Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 168 (App. 2007).

Denial of a defense motion to dismiss ordinarily is not final. Thus, appeals from a denial of a defense motion to dismiss based on challenges to the charging document's sufficiency or failure to charge an offense or and many other grounds will be dismissed. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 168 (App. 2007).

When a defendant fails to address the particular circumstances of his warrantless arrest or the bearing on the probable cause showing, if any, of the witness testimony contained in the police report referred to in the affidavit supporting the criminal information, the court can discern no legal basis for dismissing the case and even assuming the defendant's arrest was illegal, he is not entitled to dismissal of the information. The remedy for an illegal arrest is suppression of any statements made by the defendant. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 265 & n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Chuuk Criminal Rule 48(a) provides that the attorney for the state may by leave of court file a dismissal of an information or complaint and the prosecution shall thereupon terminate, but it is not a proper authority for a defendant to request a dismissal. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 280 & 281 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A defendant's motion to dismiss will be denied when the court is unable to ascertain, from its review of the motion and supporting memorandum, whether there is any factual or legal basis that may support it. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 281 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A criminal information filed against a legislator who is the chairman of an impeachment committee while there is an article of impeachment currently being investigated will not be dismissed on the basis of a statute that provides criminal penalties for attempting to interfere with the impeachment process since the statute could not provide a blanket protection against prosecution for any member of an impeachment proceeding or it would lead to the absurd result that a member of an impeachment proceeding could commit any crime with impunity. Chuuk v. Robert, 15 FSM R. 419, 425 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When a review of the amended informations and their supporting affidavits reveals no basis for the claim that the information fails to set forth the essential facts constituting the charges against the defendants, their motion to dismiss will be denied. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 462 (Chk. 2007).

When the accused produced no evidence to substantiate his claim that the weapon he allegedly possessed was in unserviceable condition (such as producing the weapon itself, or even a witness's report on the weapon's condition) and that it was kept as a curio, an ornament, or for historical purposes, but instead, argued that despite his repeated discovery requests, the government had failed to provide access to the firearm that he allegedly possessed so that it could, in turn, be inspected, this argument is more appropriately suited for a motion to compel discovery, rather than a motion to dismiss. The accused is free to raise at trial the defense that the weapon he allegedly possessed falls within the exemption. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2008).

When a prosecution was commenced within the time limits set by Kosrae State Code §13.106(2)(b), there is no statutorily-required dismissal. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Criminal Procedure Rule 12(a) abolished motions to quash an information, but any relief possible under the common law motions and pleas abolished by Rule 12(a) may be sought by motion under Criminal Rule 12(b). Thus, if a motion to quash information is filed, it will be considered a Rule 12(b) motion to dismiss the information. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 28 (Chk. 2008).

After prosecution has been initiated, the court may dismiss the case if there is no probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed, but a finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 29 (Chk. 2008).

The remedy for a defendant's unlawful detention over 24 hours is not the dismissal of the information against him or the suppression of all evidence and statements obtained from him. His only remedy in a criminal prosecution (as opposed to a civil suit) is suppression of any evidence obtained as a result of the illegal detention. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 30 (Chk. 2008).

Although, there may be cases when an affidavit containing multiple layers of hearsay is deemed sufficiently reliable to prove probable cause, when the affidavit fails even a minimal level of reliability that might be justified by exigent circumstances, which, in any case, were not present, the affidavit filed with the information was not reliable enough to prove probable cause and the defendant's motion to suppress the affidavit of probable cause and for dismissal was therefore granted, and the case was dismissed. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Under Criminal Procedure 48(a), the government's attorney may by leave of court file a dismissal of an information or complaint and the prosecution will thereupon terminate. Although the government has broad discretion in determining whether to initiate a criminal prosecution, once that prosecution is started in the FSM Supreme Court, the court has responsibility for assuring that actions taken thereafter are in the public interest. FSM v. Fritz, 16 FSM R. 175, 176 (Chk. 2008).

Rule 48 contemplates public exposure of the reasons for a prosecution's abandonment in order to prevent abuse of the dismissal power. The court thus must be satisfied that the reasons advanced for dismissal are substantial and in the public interest and are the real grounds upon which the application is based, and it should not be content with mere conclusory statements that the dismissal is in the public interest, but require a statement of the underlying reasons and underlying factual basis. FSM v. Fritz, 16 FSM R. 175, 177 (Chk. 2008).

A cost-benefit analysis – that the government does not want to bear the expense of trying the case by sending an FSM assistant attorney general from Pohnpei with the attendant airfare, per diem, and car rental costs and with only $1,000 in the budget for witness expenses when the vehicle the defendants were alleged to have conspired to steal from the national government was in its possession, and, after four years' of use since the case was filed, had become rundown and inoperative – is more appropriately made when the prosecution is exercising its discretion in deciding whether to file criminal charges, and not as a ground for leave to dismiss. FSM v. Fritz, 16 FSM R. 175, 177 (Chk. 2008).

When a new prosecutor stated that she had reviewed the case file and had concluded that the government had insufficient evidence to sustain convictions against the defendants, this is a stronger ground for motion for leave to dismiss. Factors among those customarily considered when the court is determining whether to grant leave to dismiss under Rule 48(a), are whether the dismissal involves any harassment of the defendants and whether a bona fide reason, such as insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction, exists for the dismissal. FSM v. Fritz, 16 FSM R. 175, 177 (Chk. 2008).

The court may grant leave to file a dismissal when the government doubts it has the evidence to sustain convictions in this case and thus thinks it advisable not to expend more of its limited resources on a prosecution it concludes that it does not have a reasonable chance of completing successfully. The prosecution of the case will terminate once the government's dismissal is filed. FSM v. Fritz, 16 FSM R. 175, 177 (Chk. 2008).

An oral motion to dismiss the case because the prosecution, by not putting on any witnesses or evidence, failed to establish a prima facie case against the accused at the hearing will be denied when the hearing was not a preliminary examination or an initial appearance, or some other proceeding at which the government is required to make a prima facie showing of the case against the defendant but was a pretrial hearing on the defendant's Rule 12(b)(2) and (3) motions – motions alleging defects in the information and to suppress evidence. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 185 (Chk. 2008).

The dismissal of a case is warranted when the statute of limitations applicable to the count in the criminal information elapses before the case is filed. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct.

Tr. 2008).

When the statute of limitations to both counts in a criminal information had elapsed before the case was filed, the dismissal of the case is warranted. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A motion to dismiss will be denied when motion contains only conclusory language that fails to specify the grounds with any particularity and when it speculates that the information was based on the movant's unlawfully-taken statement even though the information's supporting affidavit never mentions any statement. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 526 (Chk. 2009).

While a defendant cannot be sentenced to consecutive sentences on a greater and lesser-included offense arising from the same act, the government does not have to identify which of its charges in its criminal information it intends to pursue prior to conviction. Rather, it is entitled to pursue, at trial, multiple claims based on the same act, and a defendant's motion for pretrial dismissal or for a bill of particulars will be denied. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631-32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A motion to dismiss conspiracy counts will be denied when the affidavit stated the essential facts constituting the charges and was based on the first-hand knowledge of the affiant who was the investigating officer; when the information clearly stated the nature of the acts charged; and when, although the affidavit referred to witness statements that were suppressed, the affidavit also contained a considerable amount of other evidence, including the substance of the affiant's interviews with eye-witnesses, which supported probable cause. Such hearsay statements, if reliable, may support a finding of probable cause for instituting a prosecution. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The suppression of witness statements does not necessitate a dismissal when there is other evidence that supports probable cause for the charges. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When a count, even reading it together with the facts incorporated by reference and the supporting affidavit, does not include all the essential elements constituting the offense that the prosecution has charged, it must be dismissed. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 395 (Chk. 2011).

The pretrial dismissal of an information, or of counts in an information, does not, if the facts permit, bar the prosecution from filing a superseding information if the accused has not yet been put in jeopardy. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 398 n.6 (Chk. 2011).

An illegal arrest will not entitle a defendant to dismissal of the information. The remedy for an illegal arrest, for failure to provide cause and authority of the arrest, is suppression of any statements made by the defendant. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When an accused's motion to dismiss alleges, in the complete absence of supporting facts or reference to any legal standard under which such facts might be analyzed, that there is probable cause to believe the State has intentionally and maliciously instituted criminal actions against him, the court will not take such an allegation lightly as it implicates the integrity of the Chuuk State Attorney General's office and will order the defendant to show cause for making the allegation. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A superseding information is proper unless it and the dismissal of the original information were done for the purpose of harassment. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

The principal object of the Rule 48(a) "leave of court" requirement for a dismissal without prejudice by the prosecution is apparently to protect a defendant against prosecutorial harassment, e.g., charging, dismissing, and recharging, when the prosecution moves to dismiss an indictment over the defendant's objection. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

The dismissal of a prosecution without prejudice is proper when the information has been superseded since it is in the public interest that the prosecution accurately charges the offenses that may have been committed. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126-27 (Chk. 2011).

Seven months from alleged offense to trial is not an undue delay entitling an accused to a Rule 48(b) dismissal. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 127 (Chk. 2011).

If, when a superseding information has been filed, more time to prepare a defense is needed, the proper remedy to cure that prejudice would be a continuance, not a dismissal. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 127 (Chk. 2011).

An information must charge all the essential elements of the offense, when it does not include all the essential elements constituting the offense that the prosecution has charged, it must be dismissed. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

A pretrial motion cannot use the statutorily-defined defense of duress to dismiss an information, since duress is a defense that must be determined at trial. Self-defense is similar in that it also is a factual defense that must be determined at trial. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

A motion to dismiss is not the proper way to raise a factual defense because if the pretrial claim is substantially founded upon and intertwined with evidence concerning the alleged offense, the motion must be deferred because it falls within the province of the factfinder at trial. FSM v. Semwen, 18 FSM R. 222, 225 (Chk. 2012).

Rule 48(b) embraces the court's inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution. It is not limited to those situations in which the defendant's constitutional speedy trial right has been violated because it imposes a stricter standard of tolerable delay than does the Constitution. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2012).

Generally, in deciding whether the delay between the crime's commission and the filing of charges requires a dismissal, courts must find that the defendant has suffered actual prejudice due to the delay. Prejudice to an accused from delay may consist of: 1) oppressive pretrial incarceration; 2) the accused's pretrial anxiety; and 3) impairment of the defense, and of these, the most serious is the last. The burden of demonstrating actual prejudice is on the defendant and the proof must be definite and not speculative. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. 2012).

When an FSM court has not previously construed some aspects of an FSM criminal procedure rule, such as Rule 48(b), which is drawn from a similar U.S. rule, the court may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the rule. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 296 n.3 (Chk. 2012).

When an accused did not demonstrate any actual prejudice to him due to the delay before charges were filed, the court must deny his Rule 48(b) motion to dismiss. FSM v. Kool, 18 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. 2012).

Dismissal under Rule 48(a) is appropriate when the government represents that there is insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction. Chuuk v. Ranik, 19 FSM R. 25, 26-27 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A dismissal under Criminal Rule 48(a) is granted without prejudice and by leave of court. In considering whether to grant leave, a court must find that the dismissal is in the public interest. Factors among those customarily considered are whether the dismissal involved any harassment of the defendants and whether a bona fide reason, such as insufficient evidence to obtain a conviction, existed for the dismissal. Chuuk v. Ranik, 19 FSM R. 25, 27 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the court records indicate that the prosecution verbally moved for leave of the court to dismiss the case under Rule 48(a) of the Chuuk State Supreme Court Rules of Criminal Procedure and when the oral motion to dismiss coupled with the record fail to disclose any evidence of bad faith because the decision to terminate the prosecution was motivated by considerations that were not clearly contrary to manifest public interest, the dismissal will be granted. Chuuk v. Ranik, 19 FSM R. 25, 27 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

"Leave of court" in Rule 48(a) functions as a check on the prosecution's power to dispose of cases. Absent a demonstration of bad faith, the court has little discretion in regards to a Rule 48(a) motion to dismiss. Chuuk v. Ranik, 19 FSM R. 25, 27 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A dismissal will be granted when the court cannot conclude that the government used Rule 48(a) to gain a tactical advantage, nor was there a demonstration of bad faith. Chuuk v. Ranik, 19 FSM R. 25, 27 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The dismissal of a 2007 case is more than a mere attempt to enforce a scheduling order or to "clean up the docket" when it can reasonably be inferred from the lack of activity on the record that the prosecution had been deliberately proceeding in dilatory fashion. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 31-32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the four speedy trial factors, on balance, show that the defendant has suffered a violation of his right to a speedy trial because the record does not support any legitimate reasons for the delay, because an excessive length of time that has passed coupled with the absolute lack of diligence on the prosecution's part are sufficient to assume prejudice; when the delays were a direct result of the state failing to diligently prosecute the case, the case will be dismissed. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The better procedure is for the prosecution to insist on its need to have its day in court by filing a motion for reassignment, requesting a status conference, or scheduling of the case before a dismissal. Something more than nothing would be a necessary action to avoid dismissal. Chuuk v. Chopwa, 19 FSM R. 28, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations: 1) length of delay; 2) the reason for the delay; 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant, is also an appropriate tool to use in analyzing a Rule 48(b) dismissal. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has the authority to dismiss a case sua sponte. This is a necessary corollary of the judge's authority to process criminal cases. Cases that have remained dormant due to inaction and meet the standard for dismissal, may be dismissed. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the prosecution simply failed to move the case forward, a dismissal is more than a mere attempt to enforce a scheduling order or to "clean up the docket" when it can reasonably be inferred from the lack of activity on the record that the prosecution had been deliberately proceeding in dilatory fashion. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The court is not merely interested in "cleaning house" and dismissal is appropriate when the defendant would suffer a demonstrable prejudice or threat of prejudice from the excessive delay in the prosecution's bringing this case to trial because the case has been pending for over nine years and contains a stipulated dismissal from 2003, signed by both parties, which demonstrates the prosecution's desire to abandon the case rather than continue to prosecute, and because the prosecution has taken no action in the case since the stipulated motion's filing. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 42-43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the record shows that the delays were a direct result of the prosecution failing to diligently prosecute the case; when the court is unwilling to encourage this behavior by the prosecution; and when something more than nothing would be a necessary action, the action will be dismissed without prejudice for lack of prosecution. Chuuk v. Noboru, 19 FSM R. 38, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A four-factor balancing test for determining speedy trial violations: 1) length of delay; 2) the reason for the delay; 3) the defendant's assertion of his right, and 4) prejudice to the defendant, is also an appropriate tool to use in analyzing a Rule 48(b) dismissal. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 46 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When it can reasonably be inferred from the lack of activity on the record that the state had been deliberately proceeding in dilatory fashion, a dismissal is more than a mere attempt to enforce a scheduling order or to "clean up the docket." Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When the state offers no reason for its failure to comply with the defendant's constitutional right to a speedy trial; when it was only after the court issued a notice that the state requested leave to begin trial; when the state's failure to make the request on its own, further demonstrates a lack of diligence in prosecuting this case; and when, on three separate occasions, the prosecutor neglected to attend the trials, dismissal without prejudice is a relatively lenient penalty for the state's utter failure to prosecute the case since a dismissal without prejudice does not, in theory, irrevocably deprive the state of its day in court. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 47 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The case will be dismissed without prejudice for lack of prosecution when, taking a look at the state's processing of the case before the dismissal, the four speedy trial factors, on balance, show that the defendant suffered a violation of his right to a speedy trial because the record does not support any legitimate reasons for the delay, because the record does show that the delays were a direct result of the state failing to diligently prosecute the case, and because the excessive length of time that has passed coupled with the absolute lack of diligence on the state's part are sufficient to assume prejudice. Chuuk v. Haruo, 19 FSM R. 43, 48 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When in an information, one count requires proof of identical allegations (facts and elements) as another count, and would thus violate a defendant's double jeopardy protection if he were convicted of both and then punished for both, the proper remedy is not to dismiss before trial some counts based on what might happen since the government will not be denied the right to charge the separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 208 (App. 2013).

When some evidence was obtained by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint, it will not be suppressed, and therefore the court will not quash the information. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 350 (Pon. 2014).

Generally, the filing of an information within the statute of limitations time frame weighs in favor of non-dismissal, unless evidence of bad faith reasons for the delay are shown. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 506 (Pon. 2014).

There is no authority that a crime is no longer a crime and the case must be dismissed once the accused has repaid all of the alleged financial losses, but, if the accused were found guilty, the repayment would likely have some effect on the degree of punishment. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 131, 135 (Pon. 2015).

An accused's joblessness during the time period that the government was tardy in opposing his motion to dismiss, does not constitute prejudice in the legal sense since it did not adversely affect his legal position or his defense. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 234 (Pon. 2015).

The court will take an information's factual allegations as true for jurisdictional purposes and determine whether those factual allegations do allege a crime over which the court can exercise jurisdiction. The government's allegations remain to be proven at trial. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 234 (Pon. 2015).

Since the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over crimes committed by a national public official or public servant while that person is engaged in his or her official duties or in violation of a fiduciary duty, it will not dismiss a case where all of the acts and omissions the defendant is accused of committing, he did as a national government official or public servant while he was engaged in his official duty. FSM v. Itimai, 20 FSM R. 232, 235 (Pon. 2015).

When the FSM's failure to incorporate the fisheries management agreement provisions by reference in statute, or regulation, or in permits and access agreements leaves the law so vague and ill-defined that what are the acts prohibited cannot be understood by people of ordinary intelligence, and so it cannot serve as a basis for criminal prosecution, the court must grant the defendants' motion to dismiss those counts for the Information's failure to charge an offense. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 305 (Pon. 2016).

When a defendant's claim for due process violation is unsubstantiated and uncorroborated except by the defendant's testimony, the defendant's motion to suppress and to dismiss his case in its entirety will be denied. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 377 (Pon. 2017).

An information's fundamental purpose is to inform the defendant of the charges so that the defendant may prepare a defense, and to advise the court of the facts alleged so that the court may determine whether those facts, if proven, may support a conviction. An information deficient in these respects may be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 397 (Kos. 2017).

Dismissal will be denied when the government has sufficiently alleged attempt in the information, because it must be given the opportunity to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the defendant's: 1) intent to commit the alleged crime; and 2) that he took action which constitutes a substantial step in a course of conduct planned to culminate in the commission of that crime. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

When both the defendant's intent and whether he committed an act sufficient to amount to an attempt are questions of fact inappropriate for determination before trial, the defendant's motion to dismiss the charge of attempt to possess a firearm without having a valid identification card will be denied. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

The government may be granted leave to dismiss counts in an information when it does not have sufficient evidence to obtain or sustain a conviction on them. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 60 (Kos. 2018).

If there is unnecessary delay in filing an information against a defendant who has been held to answer, or if there is unnecessary delay in bringing a defendant to trial, the court may dismiss the information or complaint. Rule 48(b) is the mechanism by which a defendant may assert his constitutional right to a speedy trial, although it also embraces the court's inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 60 (Kos. 2018).

The court's power to dismiss under Rule 48(b) is not limited to those situations in which the defendant's constitutional speedy trial right has been violated. The Rule is a restatement of the court's inherent power to dismiss a case for want of prosecution and imposes a stricter standard of tolerable delay than does the Constitution. FSM v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 56, 60 (Kos. 2018).

Since Chuuk State Law No. 6-66 provides liability for the crime of another if the defendant intentionally aids, abets, advises, solicits, counsels, or conspires to commit an offense, or fails to follow a legal duty to prevent the offense's commission, or causes an innocent to engage in criminal conduct, when the affidavit of probable cause provides no facts to show that the accused did any of these things and, instead, it states that another's assault with a dangerous weapon crime occurred well before March 19, 2019, the accused's turning a boat around on March 19, 2019 could never qualify as aiding or abetting an act of alleged criminal activity completed well before that date and therefore fails to meet the standard of probable cause that a crime had been committed. Since the Chuuk Constitution requires a showing of probable cause for the State to file a case, and where there is none, the Chuuk Constitution requires the court to dismiss the case. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 414 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

At common law, the prosecutor could enter a nolle prosequi [dismissal] without the court's approval, but Rule 48(a) alters that so that only by leave of court can the prosecution file a dismissal. But the decision to prosecute is essentially for the government's executive branch, and the court cannot require the government to file a dismissal. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 443 n.2 (Yap 2020).

The reasons for which a court may, under Rule 48(a), exercise its discretion and grant the government leave to dismiss an information are: 1] a plea agreement; 2] the defendant's death; 3] the defendant's incompetency to stand trial; 4] when the government's security interests might be placed at risk by disclosures at trial; 5] when a defendant has cooperated with a prosecutorial investigation; and 6] when the information has been superseded. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 444 (Yap 2020).

A dismissal properly taken under Rule 48(a) is without prejudice, and within the period of statute of limitations, a second information may be brought on the same charge. The result will be otherwise, and the dismissal will be with prejudice, if the government sought dismissal for an improper purpose, such as harassment of the defendant. Besides harassment, the court may also deny a motion to dismiss without prejudice if the motion is clearly contrary to manifest public interest. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 (Yap 2020).

Prosecutorial harassment can occur when the prosecutor charges, dismisses, and recharges a defendant and moves to dismiss an information over the defendant's objection. But a request for a dismissal of the original information without prejudice once a superseding information has been filed is usually not in bad faith because it is in the public interest that the prosecution accurately charges the offenses that may have been committed. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 (Yap 2020).

Leave to dismiss an information (or charges therein) without prejudice will, unless the accused has consented, be denied if the leave is sought after the accused has been put in jeopardy or has pled guilty. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 (Yap 2020).

There are serious doubts that a defendant's not guilty plea would, by itself, ever be an adequate ground to deny a dismissal without prejudice after a superseding information has been filed. But a guilty plea would be a good reason because a guilty plea's waiver of trial means that jeopardy has attached. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 n.5 (Yap 2020).

A 9mm handgun that was not kept as a curio, ornament, or for its historical significance or value is not exempt under 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2). FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 533 n.2 (Yap 2020).

If a defendant is charged with violating both 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) and the court finds the defendant guilty of either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1), the court must then dismiss the other count because 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) charge the same crime. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 (Yap 2020).

Since 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 requires proof that the weapon was carried, while 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) does not, and 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) requires proof that the firearm was illegal, while 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 does not, and since the two statutes are directed to different evils – Section 1023(5) is directed to the evil of prohibited firearms and 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 is directed to the evil of improper carrying of a firearm, a defendant can be convicted of both. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

When the supporting affidavit fails to allege any involvement by the two co-defendants in a conspiracy with the lead defendant, no probable cause exists to pursue the matter against the co-defendants, and, since no other counts are alleged against them, the two co-defendants will be dismissed. Chuuk v. Hebwer, 22 FSM R. 542, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2020).

– Disturbing the Peace

The offense of disturbing the peace requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of wilfully committing any act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that she is deprived of peace and quiet. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the evidence is undisputed that the defendant intruded upon the victim while she was sleeping, committed acts to wake the victim from her sleep, restrained her and attacked her, and that she was deprived of her peace, quiet and sleep that night by the defendant's actions, the state has proven beyond a reasonable doubt all the elements of the criminal offense of disturbing the peace. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 12 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The criminal offense of disturbing the peace requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt of wilfully committing any act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that he is deprived of peace and quiet. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 610 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When it is undisputed that the defendant did lay down next to a girl while she was sleeping and pulled the sheets from her and this act woke up her from her sleep and caused her to be frightened by the defendant's acts and when it is undisputed that the defendant's acts caused the girl's mother to be woken from her sleep by her daughter's calls, and that the defendant's acts unreasonably disturbed the mother, the state has proven beyond a reasonable doubt the elements of the criminal offense of disturbing the peace, against two victims. Kosrae v. Anton, 12 FSM R. 606, 610 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Since the words "ulensumon" are so offensive such that they would unreasonably disturb a reasonable female and are so offensive such that they would provoke an immediate violent reaction in a reasonable female, a defendant who willfully stated the subject words "ulensumon" to a female complainant will be found guilty and convicted of the offenses of disturbing the peace and of offensive behavior in a public place. Kosrae v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 501, 502-03 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Disturbing the peace is willfully committing any act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that he is deprived of peace and quiet, or which provokes a breach of the peace. Kosrae v. Taulung, 14 FSM R. 578, 581 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the defendant telephoned the victim early in the morning and accused her of causing the death of a child and since such an alarming accusation had no purpose other than to disturb the person accused; when the call and the statement were not accidental or careless, but were intentional and willful and the timing of the call in the early morning and what was said demonstrated unreasonableness; and when the evidence that the victim was upset and disturbed by the call and statements, the elements of the charge of disturbing the peace were demonstrated beyond a reasonable doubt. Kosrae v. Taulung, 14 FSM R. 578, 581 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Although in many jurisdictions (and in the Model Penal Code) disturbing the peace requires a public disturbance or annoyance, in some jurisdictions, such as Kosrae, the statute requires only a private annoyance. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 209 (App. 2013).

Under the pleading theory, disturbing the peace is not a lesser included offense of sexual abuse when, as pled, to prove sexual abuse, Kosrae had to prove the genital licking and the fingering and that the victim was under 13 and to prove disturbing the peace, Kosrae had to prove the genital licking and that the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed. Thus, the victim's age and the fingering were facts that Kosrae had to prove to obtain a sexual abuse conviction that it did not have to prove to obtain the disturbing the peace conviction. That the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed was a fact that Kosrae had to prove to obtain the disturbing the peace conviction that it did not have to prove for the sexual abuse conviction. Kosrae did not have to prove that the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed to prove sexual abuse. Thus, the greater offense of sexual abuse could have been committed without committing the lesser offense of disturbing the peace. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 209-10 (App. 2013).

To prove sexual assault, the victim's lack of consent is necessarily pled and proven, which would necessarily also require pleading and proving something that would constitute annoyance and disturbance to the victim. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Since disturbing the peace is willfully committing any act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that she is deprived of peace and quiet, or which provokes a breach of the peace, and since every sexual assault – every intentional subjecting a person to sexual penetration against that person's will – is also the willful commission of an act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that she is deprived of peace and quiet, disturbing the peace is a lesser included offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154-55 (App. 2015).

– Double Jeopardy

The principal purpose of the protection against double jeopardy established by FSM Constitution, article IV, section 7 is to prevent the government from making repeated attempts to convict an individual for the same alleged act. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 521 (App. 1984).

The double jeopardy clause, FSM Const. art. IV, § 7, of the Declaration of Rights of the FSM Constitution was drawn from the Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution. Laion v. FSM, 503, 522 (App. 1984).

The double jeopardy clause of the FSM Constitution protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal, against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction, and against multiple punishments for the same offense. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 523 (App. 1984).

United States constitutional law at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional convention furnishes guidance as to the intended scope of the FSM Constitution's double jeopardy clause. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 523 (App. 1984).

When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. If the test is met a dual conviction will not violate the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 523-25 (App. 1984).

When assault with a dangerous weapon requires use or attempted use of a dangerous weapon, a fact not required for aggravated assault, and aggravated assault requires an intent to cause serious bodily injury, which need not be proved for conviction of assault with a dangerous weapon, conviction on both charges for the same wrongful act will not violate the double jeopardy clause of the Constitution. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 524 (App. 1984).

When a trial court orders concurrent sentences of two convictions of different offenses flowing from a single wrongful act, there is not cumulative or multiple punishments that might violate the double jeopardy clause. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 524 (App. 1984).

While Congress is not prevented by the double jeopardy clause from providing that two convictions of the same import may flow from a single wrongful act, a court will not merely assume such a congressional intention. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 525 (App. 1984).

When two statutory provisions aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and upholding citizen and public interests of the same nature would apply to a solitary illegal act, which caused only one injury, the statutes will be construed not to authorize cumulative convictions in absence of a clear indication of legislative intent. However, the government is not denied the right to charge separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 529 (App. 1984).

The protection against double jeopardy in a second trial is not available until the person has first been tried in one trial. Jeopardy does not attach in a criminal trial until the first witness is sworn in to testify. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 128 (Pon. 1995).

Where the defendant has not yet been convicted of any crime, the protection against double jeopardy does not attach. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 637 (Chk. 1996).

A prosecution for criminal contempt does not pose a double jeopardy problem when previous contempt proceedings were in the nature of civil contempt, nor does it violate the statutory prohibition against successive prosecutions for contempt. FSM v. Cheida, 7 FSM R. 633, 637 (Chk. 1996).

There is no violation of the double jeopardy clause of the FSM Constitution if each offense charged requires proof of a fact which the other does not. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 179 (Pon. 1997).

When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. If the test is met, a dual conviction will not violate the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 514 (App. 1998).

If, for the same act, both a lesser included and a greater offense are proven, the court should then enter a conviction on only the greater offense. A defendant cannot be sentenced on both the higher and the lesser included offense arising out of the same criminal transaction. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 516 (App. 1998).

The constitutional protection against double jeopardy protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal, against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction, and against multiple punishments for the same offense. When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 593-94 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the sexual abuse and sexual assault statutes each require proof of a fact which the other offense does not – the offense of sexual assault requires proof of the fact of intercourse, penetration, cunnilingus or fellatio; the offense of sexual abuse requires proof of the victim's age, but does not require proof of the fact of intercourse or penetration since sexual contact through touching is adequate – the court may enter findings and a decision on both offenses without violating double jeopardy protections. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 594 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

If for the same act, both a lesser included and a greater offense are proven, the court should enter a conviction on only the greater offense. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 594 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

If for the same act, both a lesser included and a greater offense are proven, the court should enter a conviction on only the greater offense. Kosrae v. Kilafwakun, 12 FSM R. 590, 596 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The double jeopardy clause protects an accused against the following: 1) a second prosecution for the same for the same offense after acquittal; 2) a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction; and 3) against multiple punishments for the same offense. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The test to determine whether the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Generally, there can be only one prosecution for a continuing crime. However, a distinct repetition of a prohibited act constitutes a second offense and subjects the offender to an additional penalty. Separate and distinct crimes occur, even when they are very similar acts done many times to the same victim, they are chargeable individually as separate and distinct criminal conduct. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Each instance of sexual penetration may be charged and prosecuted as a separate violation of Kosrae State Code, Section 13.311. Each factually distinguishable act of sexual penetration is subject to prosecution as a separate count, conviction and sentencing when the defendant committed three factually distinguishable acts of sexual penetration upon the same victim and the record reflects that each of the three acts that the defendant's conduct was separate in time and showed the defendant's new intent in his course of conduct. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 240 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

An argument that multiple acts of sexual penetration committed during a single continuous criminal episode can be subject only to conviction and sentencing on a single count is not supported by public policy. No principle exempts an accused from prosecution for all the offenses that were committed, just because the accused has the opportunity and willingness to multiply those offenses. Such a principle would encourage the more vicious and repeated criminal acts. The State Legislature could not have intended to grant immunity to a criminal who committed one sexual assault upon a minor victim, from prosecution and punishment for further criminal acts committed during the same encounter. When the defendant's conviction and sentencing upon three counts of sexual assault upon the same victim during the same criminal episode were based upon factually distinct acts and offenses, they are not multiple punishments for the same offense. Kosrae v. Kinere, 13 FSM R. 230, 241-42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Both the FSM and Kosrae constitutions contain protections against double jeopardy. The purpose of these provisions is to prevent the government from making repeated attempts to convict an individual for the same alleged act. They protect against a second prosecution for the same offense following conviction or acquittal and against multiple punishments for the same offense. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 383 (App. 2006).

There can be no cumulative punishment for a single offense absent clear legislative intent. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 383 (App. 2006).

When the defendant committed three distinct acts upon the victim and the act of fellatio occurred at a different time and in a different location than did the acts of anal intercourse and the two acts of anal intercourse were separated by an act of battery (a bite) the defendant penetrated the victim's body at least three times and he thus, did not receive multiple punishments for a single offense. On the contrary, he received multiple punishments for multiple offenses. The State was not required to prove that a significant amount of time elapsed between the three acts of penetration. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 384 (App. 2006).

A court will not approve any principle which exempts one from prosecution from all the crimes he commits because he sees fit to compound or multiply them. Such a principle would encourage the compounding and viciousness of the criminal acts. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 385 (App. 2006).

When, although the language of counts six and eight was identical, the two acts of anal penetration were separated by an act of battery and the defendant penetrated the victim three separate times and although counts six and eight should have included distinguishing language, the duplication in the information, in itself, did not compromise the defendant's constitutional right against double jeopardy.

Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 386 (App. 2006).

Having concluded that counsel was not constitutionally ineffective for failing to raise the defense of double jeopardy, the court must conclude that it is irrelevant whether counsel would have raised the defense if he had pondered the case longer. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 386 (App. 2006).

The principal purpose of the protection against double jeopardy is to prevent the government from making repeated attempts to convict an individual for the same alleged act. Thus, where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. If the test is met a dual conviction will not violate the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

Where a trial court orders concurrent sentences of two convictions of different offenses flowing from a single wrongful act, there are no cumulative or multiple punishments that might violate the double jeopardy clause. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

If, for the same act, both a lesser included and greater offense are proven, the court should then enter a conviction on only the greater offense. A defendant cannot be sentenced on both a higher and lesser included offense arising out of the same criminal transaction. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. If the test is met, a dual conviction will not violate the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

When the alleged violations are each the same, i.e., violation of 19 F.S.M.C. 425, the merger doctrine which merges higher and lesser offenses arising from a single criminal act, does not apply. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

When the language in an FSM rule or law is nearly identical to a United States counterpart, the court may look to the courts of the United States for guidance in interpreting the rule or law and may look to court decisions from the United States to assist in the interpretation of the double jeopardy clause set forth in the Declaration of Rights in the FSM Constitution, as that clause was drawn from the Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 615 (Pon. 2007).

When the unit of prosecution for 19 F.S.M.C. 425, as reflected in the legislative intent, is that there be a punishment for each violation of the law, as it relates to each person who is found at sea and who is in distress or capable of being lost at sea, but is denied assistance, the double jeopardy clause of the FSM Constitution, which parallels the double jeopardy clause of the United States Constitution, is not violated when a defendant, who commits the single act of failing to render assistance to a boat carrying four people – all of whom are purportedly in distress – is charged with four counts of violating the 19 F.S.M.C. 425. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 617 (Pon. 2007).

A defendant cannot be sentenced on both a greater and lesser-included offense. However, this is not grounds for dismissal of either charge prior to trial. If the state proves all elements of both offenses, then the court may enter a conviction and sentence for the greater offense. Kosrae v. Likiaksa, 14 FSM R. 618, 621 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An accused's claim that he was previously put in jeopardy and is about to be tried again for the same offense is a collateral order that is immediately appealable because it is a final decision, as is the denial of an accused's motion for reduction of bail on the ground that it is unconstitutionally excessive. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 167 & n.2 (App. 2007).

Because reversal on appeal from a conviction following a second trial comes too late to afford an accused protection against being twice put to trial for the same offense, an order denying a motion to dismiss on the ground that the accused had previously been tried for that offense is a final decision and thus appealable. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 167 (App. 2007).

The right not to be tried more than once and the right not to receive multiple convictions and punishments for the same offense are both protected by the double jeopardy clause but they are conceptually distinct rights. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 167 (App. 2007).

When the double jeopardy claim involves protection against multiple punishment, not the protection against being put on trial a second time, the rationale for granting pretrial appeals does not apply. There is no right to an immediate appeal from a double jeopardy claim of multiple punishments because that right can be fully vindicated on an appeal following a final judgment and therefore is not an immediately appealable final decision. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 167 (App. 2007).

A pretrial double jeopardy appeal will be dismissed as not from a final decision when the double jeopardy claim is not based on a claim that the defendants had been previously put in jeopardy. The "collateral order" exception for double jeopardy claims is limited to former jeopardy claims and an appellate court lacks jurisdiction to entertain an immediate pretrial appeal of a trial court denial of a motion to dismiss based on multiple punishment grounds. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 167 (App. 2007).

When an appellant asks to be advised on whether, if he goes to trial, and if he is convicted on more than one count, and then if he is sentenced on more than one count, would his sentence then violate his right not to be subjected to double jeopardy, any ruling the appellate court could make would be in the nature of an advisory opinion and the court does not have the jurisdiction to issue advisory opinions. Zhang Xiaohui v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 162, 167-68 (App. 2007).

In determining the double jeopardy clause's scope and meaning the court first looks to the language of the Constitution itself. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 354 (Pon. 2007).

Where the FSM Constitution's language has been borrowed from the United States Constitution, the court may look to leading United States cases for guidance in interpreting that language, especially where the meaning is not self-evident from the words themselves. The Double Jeopardy Clause, like most provisions of the Declaration of Rights, was drawn from the United States Constitution's Bill of Rights. Thus, United States constitutional law at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention furnishes guidance as to the intended scope of the FSM Constitution's Double Jeopardy Clause. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 354 (Pon. 2007).

Under the dual sovereignty doctrine, since the national government and its individual states are independent sovereigns, a state prosecution does not bar a subsequent national prosecution of the same person for the same acts, and a national prosecution does not bar a subsequent state prosecution. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 354-55 (Pon. 2007).

The constitutional protection not to be twice placed in jeopardy does not apply to a revocation hearing because revocation and a criminal prosecution can both be based on the same transaction without implicating double jeopardy concerns. FSM v. William, 16 FSM R. 4, 9 (Chk. 2008).

The rule against double jeopardy provides three types of protection for criminal defendants: it protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal; it protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction; and it protects against multiple punishments for the same offense. Chuuk v. Kasmiro, 16 FSM R. 404, 406 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The dual sovereignty doctrine provides an important limitation on the application of double jeopardy to related state and national prosecutions. Under the dual sovereignty doctrine, a state prosecution does not bar a subsequent national prosecution of the same person for the same acts, and a national prosecution does not bar a subsequent state prosecution. The reason is that the national government and its individual states are independent sovereigns, and prosecutions under the laws of those separate sovereigns do not subject a defendant to be twice put in jeopardy. If the constitutional protection against double jeopardy did apply to prosecutions under the laws of independent sovereigns, then prosecution by one sovereign for a relatively minor offense might bar prosecution by another sovereign for a much graver offense, effectively depriving the latter of the right to enforce its laws, and defendants would always race to stand trial in the court where the charges were less severe in order to bar the second action. Chuuk v. Kasmiro, 16 FSM R. 404, 406 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Double jeopardy only applies against multiple punishments for the same offense. When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. Chuuk v. Kasmiro, 16 FSM R. 404, 406 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Double jeopardy generally bars a second action if the defendant is acquitted on the merits, but the vacating of a conviction on the ground of a material variance between pleading and proof is not an acquittal on the merits. Rather, when there is a material variance between the pleadings and a court's findings that results in vacating a conviction, the defendant will not be in jeopardy against a subsequently filed information with new allegations because the defendant was never called to defend against those allegations. Chuuk v. Kasmiro, 16 FSM R. 404, 407 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The FSM Constitution's double jeopardy clause protects 1) against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal, 2) against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction, and 3) against multiple punishments for the same offense. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2009).

When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not, and, if the test is met a dual conviction will not violate the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2009).

A criminal information's allegations must be proven in order to obtain a conviction, and it is not sufficient that the evidence show a violation of the statute specified in the information if the actual violation is different from the one alleged. Thus, when in an information, one count requires proof of identical allegations (facts and elements) as another count, it would violate a defendant's double jeopardy protection if he were convicted of both and then punished for both. The proper remedy, however, is not to dismiss before trial some counts based on what might happen because the government will not be denied the right to charge the separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. But if, after trial, the court finds the defendant guilty of both counts, a conviction will be entered only on one of those two counts. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 530-31 (Chk. 2009).

When two statutory provisions aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and at upholding public interests of the same nature would apply to a solitary illegal act that caused only one injury, the statutes will be construed as not to authorize cumulative convictions. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 531 (Chk. 2009).

When the same conduct may amount to more than one offense, the defendant may be prosecuted for each offense. But he may not be convicted of more than one offense if one offense is included in the other, or if one offense as defined prohibits a certain kind of conduct generally, and the other prohibits a specific instance of such conduct. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 531 (Chk. 2009).

While a defendant cannot be sentenced to consecutive sentences on a greater and lesser-included offense arising from the same act, the government does not have to identify which of its charges in its criminal information it intends to pursue prior to conviction. Rather, it is entitled to pursue, at trial, multiple claims based on the same act, and a defendant's motion for pretrial dismissal or for a bill of particulars will be denied. Chuuk v. Suzuki, 16 FSM R. 625, 631-32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Constitutional constraints would bar the appellate reversal of a not guilty finding since both the FSM Constitution and the Kosrae Constitution protect an accused from being twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. Kosrae v. Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 1, 3 (App. 2010).

When an FSM or Kosrae constitutional protection, such as the FSM or Kosrae double jeopardy protection, is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Kosrae v. Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 1, 4 n.2 (App. 2010).

A pretrial dismissal of a criminal prosecution would not raise double jeopardy concerns if the appellate court were to order the case reinstated because the accused had not once been put in jeopardy. Jeopardy does not attach in a criminal trial until the first witness is sworn in to testify. Kosrae v. George, 17 FSM R. 5, 7 n.1 (App. 2010).

When faced with an accused's claim that it would violate his protection against double jeopardy if he were convicted of both of two charged counts and then sentenced for both, the proper remedy is not to dismiss before trial some counts based on what might happen. When two statutory provisions aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and at upholding public interests of the same nature would apply to a solitary illegal act that caused only one injury, the statutes will be construed as not to authorize cumulative convictions. The government, however, will not be denied the right to charge the separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 396 (Chk. 2011).

When faced with an accused's claim that it would violate his protection against double jeopardy if he were convicted of both on two counts and then sentenced for both, the proper remedy is not to dismiss before trial some counts based on what might happen. When two statutory provisions aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and at upholding public interests of the same nature would apply to a solitary illegal act that caused only one injury, the statutes will be construed as not to authorize cumulative convictions. The government, however, will not be denied the right to charge the separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 523 (Chk. 2011).

Jeopardy attaches only when the first witness is sworn in to testify at trial. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 126 (Chk. 2011).

The FSM Constitution's double jeopardy clause protects against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal, against a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction, and against multiple punishments for the same offense. The usual remedy for a successful double jeopardy claim is an order barring or dismissing the second prosecution or barring the imposition of the multiple punishment. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 279 (Pon. 2012).

When an official has been impeached, a trial on criminal charges is not foreclosed by the principle of double jeopardy. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 279 (Pon. 2012).

Since the FSM constitutional protection against double jeopardy is patterned after a U.S. Bill of Rights provision, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning and scope. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 279 n.1 (Pon. 2012).

The remedy of impeachment has the single role of affecting only the right to hold office and is not intended to bar or delay another remedy for a public wrong. The other remedy is often a criminal prosecution. This is because the remedy of impeachment is not exclusive of any other public remedy for the same misbehavior, and if the cause for which the officer is punished is a public offense, he may also be indicted, tried, and punished. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

A single act of misconduct may offend the public interest in a number of areas and call for the appropriate remedy for each hurt. Thus it may require removal from office. It may also require criminal prosecution. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

Impeachment and removal from office is not criminal punishment under the FSM Constitution's double jeopardy clause. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

A government official's misconduct does not present a government with an irrevocable choice to either criminally prosecute the official or to impeach and try to remove that official from office. If the offending official has not resigned from office first, the government may do, and is usually expected to do, both. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

A former government official cannot claim he was subjected to double jeopardy because he was convicted of public offenses and then impeached and removed from office for those same offenses. Nor could he have claimed double jeopardy if he had first been impeached and removed from office and then prosecuted for the same public offenses. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

The FSM and Kosrae Constitutions' double jeopardy clauses protect a person from a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal, from a second prosecution for the same offense after conviction, and from multiple punishments for the same offense. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 208 (App. 2013).

When in an information, one count requires proof of identical allegations (facts and elements) as another count, and would thus violate a defendant's double jeopardy protection if he were convicted of both and then punished for both, the proper remedy is not to dismiss before trial some counts based on what might happen since the government will not be denied the right to charge the separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 208 (App. 2013).

A criminal defendant is not in danger of being subjected to multiple punishments in the same prosecution until the defendant has been found guilty. A pretrial motion raising a double jeopardy claim of multiple punishments is premature because the defendant may be acquitted on one or all of the charges. Thus, multiple charges in an information is not a defect in the information and is not a claim that is required to be made before trial or it will be deemed waived. A defendant's multiple punishment double jeopardy claim is a claim that cannot be raised before trial but may be raised after guilty findings for more than one offense. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 208 (App. 2013).

A double jeopardy claim that a person was or will be tried twice for the same offense may be raised (and appealed) at any time. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 208 n.4 (App. 2013).

The applicable rule is that where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 209 (App. 2013).

The test for determining whether an offense is the lesser-included of another is whether the greater offense can be committed without committing the lesser. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 209 (App. 2013).

There are two theories under which a particular offense may be determined to be a lesser included offense of a charged offense – the "statutory theory" and the "pleading theory." Under the statutory theory, a crime may be a lesser included offense if its elements are necessarily included in the greater crime, as the greater crime is defined by statute. Under the pleading theory, a crime may be a lesser included offense if the charging document alleges facts the proof of which necessarily includes proof of the elements of the lesser included offense. In effect, under the pleading theory, an offense is an included offense if it is alleged in the information as a means or element of the commission of the higher offense. The pleading theory is the broader theory. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 209 (App. 2013).

Under the pleading theory, disturbing the peace is not a lesser included offense of sexual abuse when, as pled, to prove sexual abuse, Kosrae had to prove the genital licking and the fingering and that the victim was under 13 and to prove disturbing the peace, Kosrae had to prove the genital licking and that the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed. Thus, the victim's age and the fingering were facts that Kosrae had to prove to obtain a sexual abuse conviction that it did not have to prove to obtain the disturbing the peace conviction. That the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed was a fact that Kosrae had to prove to obtain the disturbing the peace conviction that it did not have to prove for the sexual abuse conviction. Kosrae did not have to prove that the victim was unreasonably disturbed or annoyed to prove sexual abuse. Thus, the greater offense of sexual abuse could have been committed without committing the lesser offense of disturbing the peace. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 209-10 (App. 2013).

The principal purpose of the protection against double jeopardy established by the FSM Constitution is to prevent the government from making repeated attempts to convict an individual for the same alleged act. Chuuk v. Koky, 19 FSM R. 479, 480 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

The test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. If the test is met a dual conviction will not violate the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. Similarly, where a trial court orders concurrent sentences of two convictions of different offenses flowing from a single wrongful act, there is no cumulative or multiple punishments that might violate the double jeopardy clause. Chuuk v. Koky, 19 FSM R. 479, 481 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

A defendant cannot be sentenced on both a higher and lesser included offense arising out of the same criminal transaction. Chuuk v. Koky, 19 FSM R. 479, 481 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

If both the use-of-a-slingshot offense and assault-with-a-dangerous-weapon offense are proven with respect to the same act, the court will enter a conviction on only the greater offense of assault with a dangerous weapon. Chuuk v. Koky, 19 FSM R. 479, 481 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

The FSM and Kosrae Constitutions prohibit double jeopardy. The purpose of these provisions is 1) to prevent the government from making repeated attempts to convict an individual for the same alleged act; 2) to prevent a second prosecution for the same offense following a conviction or a acquittal; and 3) to prevent multiple punishments for the same offense. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 153 (App. 2015).

The test for determining whether an offense is a lesser-included offense of another is whether the greater offense can be committed without committing the lesser. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 153-54 (App. 2015).

When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

An attempt to commit a crime is a lesser included offense that merges with the greater ("target") offense if the attempt is successful. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

If the target crime is in fact committed, there can be no conviction for attempt, since the actor's prior conduct is deemed merged in the completed crime. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

An assault is a lesser included offense of assault and battery. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Under the statutory theory, a crime may be a lesser included offense if its elements are necessarily included in the greater crime, as the greater crime is defined by statute. Under the pleading theory, a crime may be a lesser included offense if the charging document alleges facts the proof of which necessarily includes proof of the elements of the lesser included offense. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

To prove sexual assault, the victim's lack of consent is necessarily pled and proven, which would necessarily also require pleading and proving something that would constitute annoyance and disturbance to the victim. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Since sexual assault requires intentionally subjecting another person to sexual penetration against the other person's will and assault and battery requires striking, beating, wounding, or otherwise doing bodily harm to another, and since subjecting another person to sexual penetration against the other person's will is one of a number of ways to otherwise do bodily harm to another, assault and battery is a lesser included offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154 (App. 2015).

Since disturbing the peace is willfully committing any act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that she is deprived of peace and quiet, or which provokes a breach of the peace, and since every sexual assault – every intentional subjecting a person to sexual penetration against that person's will – is also the willful commission of an act which unreasonably annoys or disturbs another so that she is deprived of peace and quiet, disturbing the peace is a lesser included offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 154-55 (App. 2015).

Since the attempt to commit sexual assault merged into the completed sexual assault; since assault is a lesser included offense of assault and battery; and since assault and battery and disturbing the peace are both lesser included offenses of sexual assault, the convictions for all these lesser offenses must be vacated, and since the maximum sentence for sexual assault as a category two felony is five years, the accused's seven-year sentence, and therefore his convictions, for all offenses must be vacated and the case remanded for re-sentencing on, and thus for a conviction to be entered for, only the greater offense of sexual assault. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 155 (App. 2015).

The double jeopardy clause provides three basic protections. It protects a person against a second prosecution for the same offense after an acquittal, against a second prosecution for the same offense after a conviction, and against multiple punishments for the same offense. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 300 (Pon. 2016).

When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not, and, if the test is met a dual conviction will not violate the constitutional protection against double jeopardy. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 301 (Pon. 2016).

When there are counts that may duplicate another count and when a conviction on both counts would violate the protection against double jeopardy, the proper remedy is not to dismiss before trial some counts based on what might happen because the government will not be denied the right to charge separate offenses to guard against the risk that a conviction may not be obtained on one of the offenses. If the government obtains a guilty finding for the same defendant on two counts that do constitute the same offense, a conviction will be entered only on one of those two counts. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 301 (Pon. 2016).

If and when the defendants are found guilty on two or more counts they deem to constitute the same offense, they may then raise their double jeopardy concerns about being subjected to multiple punishments for the same offense and may argue the rule of lenity. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 301 (Pon. 2016).

Jeopardy only attaches once the first witness is sworn in to testify at trial. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R.

291, 299 (Chk. 2017).

When jeopardy has not yet attached in either of two prosecutions against an accused, it may be premature to address whether a double jeopardy claim exists for the contemporaneous cases. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 299 (Chk. 2017).

Prosecution for criminal contempt does not pose a double jeopardy problem when previous contempt proceedings were in the nature of civil contempt, nor does it violate the statutory prohibition against successive prosecutions for contempt. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 434 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Leave to dismiss an information (or charges therein) without prejudice will, unless the accused has consented, be denied if the leave is sought after the accused has been put in jeopardy or has pled guilty. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 (Yap 2020).

Jeopardy does not attach until the first witness is sworn in at trial. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 (Yap 2020).

There are serious doubts that a defendant's not guilty plea would, by itself, ever be an adequate ground to deny a dismissal without prejudice after a superseding information has been filed. But a guilty plea would be a good reason because a guilty plea's waiver of trial means that jeopardy has attached. FSM v. Teteeth, 22 FSM R. 438, 445 n.5 (Yap 2020).

When the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. The assumption underlying this rule is that Congress ordinarily does not intend to punish the same offense under two different statutes. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 533 (Yap 2020).

The test for determining whether an offense is the lesser-included of another is whether the greater offense can be committed without committing the lesser. There are two theories about how to determine this – the statutory theory and the pleading theory. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 533 (Yap 2020).

Under the statutory theory, a crime may be a lesser included offense if its elements are necessarily included in the greater crime, as the greater crime is defined by statute. Under the pleading theory, a crime may be a lesser included offense if the charging document alleges facts the proof of which necessarily includes proof of the elements of the lesser included offense. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 533 (Yap 2020).

Under the pleading theory, an offense is an included offense if it is alleged in the information as a means or element of the commission of the higher offense. The pleading theory is the broader theory. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 533 (Yap 2020).

Neither 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) nor 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) is the lesser included offense of the other because both impose liability for possession of a firearm or ammunition without an identification card. Section 1005(1) imposes liability for acquiring a firearm or ammunition in any manner, while Section 1006(1) imposes liability only if the acquisition is by purchase, and Section 1006(1) imposes liability for the use of a firearm or ammunition, while Section 1005(1) does not, but it is difficult to see how someone could use a firearm or ammunition without actually also possessing that firearm or ammunition, and it is also difficult to see how a person could acquire or purchase a firearm or ammunition without also then necessarily actually possessing that firearm or ammunition. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 535 & n.4 (Yap 2020).

When a defendant has been convicted under two different statutes of what is the same crime, the court must vacate one of the two convictions because for the purposes of applying the double jeopardy test, as a means of ascertaining congressional intent, punishment must be the equivalent of a criminal conviction and not simply the imposition of a concurrent sentence. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 (Yap 2020).

If a defendant is charged with violating both 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) and the court finds the defendant guilty of either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1), the court must then dismiss the other count because 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) charge the same crime. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 (Yap 2020).

Often a misdemeanor will be a lesser included offense of a felony. But that is not the case when the greater offense can be committed without committing the misdemeanor. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

A person without an identification card can violate either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) by acquiring or purchasing, or by possessing, or by using a firearm. But if that person, without a valid identification card, does any of those things but does not carry the firearm, that person has not committed the lesser misdemeanor of 11 F.S.M.C. 1007. The misdemeanor's key element is the carrying of a firearm. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

The prosecution, to secure a 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 conviction, has to prove an element that it does not have to prove to convict under either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1). It must prove that not only did the defendant possess the firearm without holding an identification card, but that the defendant also carried the firearm, which is not an element of either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006. Section 1007 is directed to a different evil – the carrying of a firearm, either unsafely or by someone without a valid identification card (or both), while Sections 1006 and 1005(1) are directed toward the evil of possession of a firearm or ammunition without an identification card. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

The Section 1007 misdemeanor is not a lesser included offense of 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) because that felony can easily be committed without violating 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 because, to violate 11 F.S.M.C. 1007, the firearm, whether legal or illegal, must be carried. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

The Laion test determines whether there are two crimes or only one – it determines whether Congress intended that a defendant be punished under both statutes. When the same act violates two distinct criminal statutes, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

To obtain a conviction under either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1), the prosecution must prove that the person in possession of a firearm does not hold a valid identification card. To obtain a conviction under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5), the prosecution must prove that the person possesses an illegal firearm, such as a handgun. Thus, each statutory provision (treating 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) as one provision) requires the proof of a fact that the other does not. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

Section 1023(5) is directed to the evil of prohibited firearms and 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) are directed to the evil of persons not obtaining a valid identification card before possessing firearms or ammunition. Thus, Congress clearly intended to address different evils with these different statutory provisions. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

Since 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 requires proof that the weapon was carried, while 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) does not, and 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) requires proof that the firearm was illegal, while 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 does not, and since the two statutes are directed to different evils – Section 1023(5) is directed to the evil of prohibited firearms and 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 is directed to the evil of improper carrying of a firearm, a defendant can be convicted of both. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

– Escape

The national escape statute's requirements are met where an escaped defendant was being held for law enforcement purposes by state police officers authorized to detain on behalf of the Federated States of Micronesia. 11 F.S.M.C. 505. FSM v. Doone, 1 FSM R. 365, 367 (Pon. 1983).

The law generally requires that a prisoner test the legality of his detention in a court of law rather than attempt to enforce his own claim to freedom. FSM v. Doone, 1 FSM R. 365, 368 (Pon. 1983).

A prisoner held illegally in a custodial facility is never permitted to escape. 11 F.S.M.C. 505(3). FSM v. Doone, 1 FSM R. 365, 368 (Pon. 1983).

Outside of a custodial facility, one illegally detained by a law officer acting in good faith is entitled to escape only if he can do so with "no substantial risk of harm to the person or property of anyone other than the defendant." FSM v. Doone, 1 FSM R. 365, 368 (Pon. 1983).

To minimize disruption and challenges to official police authority, the statutory exceptions to prohibitions against escape should be read restrictively. 11 F.S.M.C. 505. FSM v. Doone, 1 FSM R. 365, 368-69 (Pon. 1983).

A police car being used to maintain custody as well as transport a detainee from one custodial facility to another is a custodial facility within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 505(3). FSM v. Doone, 1 FSM R. 365, 369 (Pon. 1983).

A police vehicle being used to transport an arrest person from the police station to the jail is a custodial facility within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 505(3), and a person who, having been informed that he is under arrest, flees from such a vehicle and the custody of a police officer authorized to detain or arrest persons on behalf of the Federated States of Micronesia, is guilty of an escape under 11 F.S.M.C. 505(1). Doone v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 103, 106 (App. 1985).

Illegality of arrest or detention is no defense to a charge that one has unlawfully escaped from a custodial facility. Doone v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 103, 106 (App. 1985).

Escape from state police officers, authorized by a Joint Law Enforcement Agreement Between the National Government and the State to detain and arrest persons on behalf of the Federated States of Micronesia can be the foundation for an escape conviction under 11 F.S.M.C. 505(1), without regard to whether the detention was for a major crime. Doone v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 103, 106 (App. 1985).

In the absence of any explanation in the legislative history or from the government to justify a different interpretation, the only apparent reason for the deletion of the words "alleged to be found delinquent" from the Model Penal Code definition of official detention is that Congress wished to exclude detained juveniles from the national prohibitions against escape. 11 F.S.M.C. 505(1). In re Cantero, 3 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 1988).

Juveniles alleged or found to be delinquent children are not under "official detention" within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 505(1). In re Cantero, 3 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 1988).

One of the elements of escape is that the person charged is under lawful custody. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 17 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When an accused's custody had exceeded twenty-four hours at the time he committed the alleged escape and therefore the custody was not lawful and when the evidence to support the escape charge was obtained as a direct result of that unlawful detainment and was therefore inadmissible, escape could not be proven. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 17 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Resort to self-help by a detainee is inherently dangerous to the prisoner, the police, and to the public, as an attempted escape may result in circumstances where there is resort to force either by or against the detainee. Therefore, in cases of unlawful detainment, it is much preferred as a matter of public policy for counsel or other person to move the court for a detainee's immediate release. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 17 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A finding that the arrest was without probable cause may also support dismissal of an escape charge since an arrest without probable cause does not constitute an authorized arrest which can serve as a predicate for an escape charge where the escape was without force. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 17 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When a defendant has submitted no evidence showing that the government's failure to inform him of the state correctional facility's rules, procedures, and schedules unconstitutionally deprived him of a life, liberty, or property interest and when, since such an admonition is unnecessary, the "Prisoner Rights and Responsibilities" document which the defendant cites does not inform inmates that they have a responsibility to not commit unlawful acts while incarcerated, the defendant cannot claim that he did not know he was not permitted to leave the correctional facility premises without a court order or police escort while incarcerated and a motion for dismissal on that ground will be denied. FSM v. Andrew, 17 FSM R. 213, 215 (Pon. 2010).

– Expungement of Records

Without more, expungement is not appropriate when the court's order entered pursuant to a plea agreement specifically found sufficient factual basis to render a judgment of guilt against the defendant, and, although imposition of sentence was suspended pursuant to 11 F.S.M.C. 1002(4), the defendant served jail time, was under house arrest, and paid a total of $14,374.00 to the national treasury. FSM v. Kihleng, 8 FSM R. 323, 324-25 (Pon. 1998).

Expungement of criminal records falls generally within three categories: expungement pursuant to statute, expungement where it is necessary to preserve basic legal rights, and expungement based on acquittal. FSM v. Kihleng, 8 FSM R. 323, 325 (Pon. 1998).

Where the arrest itself was an unlawful one, or where the arrest represented harassing action by the police, or where the statute under which the arrestee was prosecuted was itself unconstitutional, courts have ordered expunction. FSM v. Kihleng, 8 FSM R. 323, 325 (Pon. 1998).

Although expungement calls for a balancing of the equities between the government's need to maintain extensive records in order to aid in general law enforcement and the individual's right to privacy, an acquittal, standing alone, is not in itself sufficient to warrant an expunction of an arrest record. FSM v. Kihleng, 8 FSM R. 323, 325 (Pon. 1998).

As the grant or denial of a motion to expunge the record of a Trust Territory convicytion lies solely within the court's discretion, as limited by law, no appearance is deemed necessary by Chuuk as the successor to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands government. The court can decide the motion without oral argument because no evidentiary proceeding is necessary, absent credible assertions of grounds, such as lack of competent counsel, innocence of the charges brought, or that the plea was not voluntarily made. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 305 & n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court cannot vacate a criminal conviction, based upon a voluntary guilty plea, in order to circumvent the constitutional and statutory proscriptions against felons being candidates for the FSM Congress when the defendant does not now complain that he was not guilty of the crimes, or that he was not afforded due process of law when he was accused of, and then pleaded guilty to, two separate felonies. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 308 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has no power to strike from the public records all evidence of the charges against a defendant, and his convictions, who seeks a way around the constitutional and statutory proscriptions which is unavailable even to one who has been pardoned for his crimes. It will therefore deny his motion to expunge. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 308 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The expungement of criminal records seem to fall generally within three categories: expungement pursuant to statute, expungement where it is necessary to preserve basic legal rights, and expungement based on acquittal. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 43 (Chk. 2008).

A defendant, having pled guilty and been sentenced, does not fit into the category of expungement cases where the defendant was never convicted, and when she does not allege that her conviction stems from the unlawful conduct of law enforcement agents she does not fit into another situation where courts have exercised an inherent power to expunge records. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2008).

A court exercising only its inherent power would need a very extraordinary and compelling case to expunge or seal not only the judicial branch's conviction records but also the arrest records maintained by the executive branch since that would implicate separation of powers concerns. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2008).

When the defendant has pled guilty and been sentenced and any statement about the effect on her possible enrollment in a nursing school is, at this time, premature and purely speculative, the case is unlike those extraordinary and unusual cases where the remedy of expungement has a logical relationship to the injury to the defendant and the court has balanced the government's need for the records with the harm to the person that results from the government's maintaining the records. This right is a narrow one but can be used to vindicate rights secured by the Constitution or statute. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2008).

Congress has granted the court the power to suspend jail sentences, to suspend the imposition of a sentence, and to parole prisoners after they have served part of their sentence, but it has not given the court the power to expunge convictions. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 45 (Chk. 2008).

Expunction of a criminal record can be applied 1) pursuant to statute; 2) where necessary to preserve basic legal rights, and 3) based on acquittal. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 556 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court will deny a motion to expunge because it has no power to strike from the public records all evidence of the charges against (and the convictions of) a defendant, who seeks a way around the constitutional and statutory proscriptions which is unavailable even to one who has been pardoned for his crimes. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 556 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

While a person's assertion that, given his rehabilitation over time and his good work in the community and on behalf of his municipality in the years since his conviction, it is a "manifest injustice" that his felony conviction prohibits him from serving in Congress, may be grounds for a pardon, it is not a valid ground for setting aside a conviction and permitting withdrawal of a guilty plea under Rule 32(d). In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 556-57 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Although a criminal record burdens a person with social stigma and potential discrimination by prospective employers, absent the presence of a statutory infirmity in the underlying criminal proceeding, or an illegality in the arrest and following proceedings, the mere impediment to a person's ability to run for an office is insufficient to reach the threshold for a violation of a basic legal right. The qualifications for placing a name on the ballot were determined by Congress and the FSM Constitution, and an expunction, merely to meet the prescribed requirements, would not fall under the category of rights expunction may be used to preserve. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Jurisdictions that are properly able to invoke the authority to expunge derive the power from a relevant statute. An enabling Chuuk state statute would be necessary to effectuate an expunction, but no such statute currently exists in Chuuk. If the legislature had intended for the Chuuk State Supreme Court to have the power to expunge a record, the legislature would have specifically provided that power. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

When state law does not provide for expunction of a criminal record, state courts may only consider expunction requests using ancillary jurisdiction, which is a court's jurisdiction to adjudicate claims and proceedings that arise out of a claim that is properly before the court. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A court exercising only its inherent power would need a very extraordinary and compelling case to expunge and seal not only the judicial branch's conviction records but also the arrest records maintained by the executive branches since that would implicate separation of powers concerns. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Irrespective of the source of power, courts relying on inherent judicial authority to expunge criminal records specify that said power should be sparingly used and no court has held that the government's interest in maintaining accurate criminal histories can be outweighed by an individual's right to privacy in any but exceptional circumstances. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 557-58 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Absent explicit authorization from the Chuuk Legislature, the judiciary has no power to expunge a criminal record. The Chuuk State Supreme Court has generally regarded expunction of criminal records as a matter of legislative prerogative that may only be granted or withdrawn by the legislature. Expunction of such records is therefore a matter of legislative discretion, and when a petitioner has not attacked the validity of the underlying conviction, the court must reject his contention that it has inherent jurisdiction over his petition for expunction. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 558 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The FSM counterpart to the United States "All Writs Act," 4 F.S.M.C. 117, does not give the court the power to order expungement unless the court already has jurisdiction to do so, and, absent a specific statute or invalid conviction, the court lacks such jurisdiction. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 295 n.1 (Pon. 2016).

Courts can exercise the power to expunge records to preserve basic legal rights only when the defendant's conviction stems from the unlawful conduct of law enforcement agents. In the absence of a statute, a court's jurisdiction is limited to expunging the record of an unlawful arrest or conviction, or to correcting a clerical error. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 295-96 (Pon. 2016).

The court lacks the authority to order expungement of the record of a valid and unchallenged conviction even though the defendant has been pardoned since a pardon does not create the factual fiction that the crime was never committed. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 296 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court lacks the power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress because the Constitution reserves that power to Congress, and the court cannot exercise a power that only Congress has. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 296 (Pon. 2016).

Since the FSM Supreme Court does not have the power to alter or amend another country's entry requirements, the United States could still decide to require a person to apply to its Embassy in order to travel to United States territory even if the court ordered expungement of FSM records because the court cannot order the alteration of another country's records. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 296 (Pon. 2016).

A court's power to expunge criminal records falls into three general categories: 1) expungement pursuant to a statute, 2) expungement when it is necessary to preserve basic legal rights, or 3) expungement based on an acquittal, although, in the case of an acquittal, the court doubts that expungement can be ordered based solely on the acquittal. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 599 & n.1 (Chk. 2016).

No FSM statute authorizes the expungement of records. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

Courts can exercise the power to expunge records to preserve basic legal rights only when the defendant's conviction stems from the unlawful conduct of law enforcement agents. In the absence of a statute, a court's inherent power is limited to expunging the record of an unlawful arrest or conviction, or to correcting a clerical error. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

If a Presidential pardon automatically entitled the pardoned person to an expungement of his criminal record, then the executive branch would have the power to interfere with the record-keeping of another co-equal branch of government (the judicial branch) while also preventing still another co-equal branch of government (Congress) from access to the judicial branch's records that would assist it in its constitutional duty to be the sole judge of the qualification of its members. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 601 (Chk. 2016).

Whether a pardoned felon's records are expunged cannot turn on the fact that he pled not guilty and later appealed while another pardoned felon who pled guilty is denied expungement. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 601 (Chk. 2016).

The court, following the Judicial Guidance Clause's mandate that its decisions be consistent with the Constitution, can order an expungement of criminal records of a pardoned felon, only if Congress grants it the authority to do so. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 601 (Chk. 2016).

Prior FSM caselaw recognizes the court's jurisdiction and authority to expunge criminal records in only three limited situations or categories, which are: 1) expungement pursuant to a statute, 2) expungement when it is necessary to preserve basic legal rights, or 3) expungement based on an acquittal, although, in the case of an acquittal, it is doubtful that expungement can be ordered based solely on the acquittal. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 273 (Pon. 2019).

There is no FSM statute authorizing expungement of criminal records. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 274 (Pon. 2019).

Although 4 F.S.M.C. 117 generally grants the court all powers needed to perform its functions, it does not grant the court the authority to expunge records unless the court already has such jurisdiction, and, absent a specific statute or invalid conviction, the court lacks such jurisdiction. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 274 n.2 (Pon. 2019).

The court is especially wary of making new law in an area where Congress has considered legislating, but has not yet decided what, if anything, should be enacted into law since Congress may yet act and provide a statutory means to seek an expungement. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 274 (Pon. 2019).

The court has the inherent power to expunge records when it is necessary to preserve basic legal rights or, in an unusual and exceptional case, based on an acquittal. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 274 (Pon. 2019).

When the defendant's arrest or conviction was not in any way unlawful or invalid and when the government has not engaged in misconduct, the court does not have the inherent power to grant expungement. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 274 (Pon. 2019).

The court does not have the power to expunge a record of a valid arrest and conviction solely for equitable considerations. Jurisdiction is limited to expunging the record of an unlawful arrest or conviction, or to correcting a clerical error. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2019).

The FSM promised that it would support the defendant's expungement petition if the FSM determined that all the sentencing conditions have been satisfied, and it kept that promise when, having determined that the defendant had satisfied the plea agreement's conditions, the FSM not only did not oppose the defendant's expungement petition, but it also affirmatively stated that it supported the petition. The FSM did not breach the plea agreement, and it also did not violate its plea agreement promise when it truthfully responded to the court's request for briefing about the current state of FSM law on expungement. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2019).

When the FSM did not (and, because of separation of powers issues, probably could not) promise a defendant that all record of the matter would be completely expunged (presumably ordered sealed), but promised to support the defendant's expungement petition, and when the FSM did not breach that plea agreement promise, the defendant is not entitled to an expungement as specific performance (or to any other remedy) for his breach of contract claim. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2019).

When the court currently has neither the jurisdiction nor the power to expunge a defendant's record in a matter, the defendant's petition for expungement will be denied. FSM v. Iriarte, 22 FSM R. 271, 276 (Pon. 2019).

– Falsification

To be criminally liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 524(1)(c) it is enough that the accused invite reliance on any writing which he knows to be lacking in authenticity. The statute does not require that he himself make the writing that is lacking in authenticity. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 522 (Chk. 2011).

– Felonies

A felony is an offense punishable by more than one year in prison and a misdemeanor is an offense punishable by more than 30 days imprisonment and up to one year. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 109 n.2 (Chk. 2003).

Under previous law, a felony is an offense which may be punished by imprisonment for more than one year; a petty misdemeanor is an offense which may be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 days; and every other offense is a misdemeanor. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 501 (Pon. 2004).

Misdemeanors are offenses punishable by imprisonment for more than 30 days up to one year. Felonies are offenses punishable by more than one year in prison. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 536 n.1 (Chk. 2005).

A felony under the Kosrae State Code is an offense punishable by imprisonment for a period of more than one year and a category one felony can carry a sentence of imprisonment not exceeding or equaling ten years, a fine not exceeding twenty thousand dollars, or both. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228d (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Under Pohnpei state law, a felony is defined as a crime or offense that may be punishable by imprisonment for a period of more than one year, and every other crime is a misdemeanor. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

11 F.S.M.C. 1007 is a misdemeanor because anyone convicted of it cannot be imprisoned for more than one year and because a felony is any crime which is punishable by imprisonment for more than one year. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 n.7 (Yap 2020).

– Filings

The general court order concerning facsimile transmission rejected indiscriminate filing by fax because it concluded that an effort to accommodate counsel by accepting filing through the use of fax would impose an undue burden upon the clerks and could also result in additional paperwork, expense, duplication efforts, and confusion. Therefore, filing by fax is permitted only by order of a justice given for special cause. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 408 (Chk. 2004).

The general court order authorizing fax filing for special cause is not an excuse to wait for the filing deadline and then fax the papers to the court because waiting to the last minute so that it can then be faxed does not constitute "special cause." FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 405, 408 (Chk. 2004).

General Court Order 1990-1 does not apply to filing by facsimile transmission in civil cases because the (later promulgated) applicable portion of Civil Procedure Rule 5(e) has superseded it. It may retain some vitality in criminal cases since the criminal rules do not contain a provision concerning fax filing. However, Civil Rule 5(e)'s pertinent part is identical to section 2 of General Court Order 1990-1. Goya v. Ramp, 13 FSM R. 100, 105 & n.3 (App. 2005).

Since the Disciplinary Rules provide for the confidentiality of all pending disciplinary matters, and since the defendant's various motions concerning possible disciplinary action against the Secretary of Justice have no bearing on the case's substantive outcome, the court, in its discretion, the various filings that refer in any way to a possible disciplinary matter, whether such a matter is pending or not, will be stricken from the record. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 613 (Pon. 2007).

A court may, at its discretion, enlarge the time for filing for cause shown if the enlargement request is made before the expiration of the time period in which the papers are to be filed, and if the enlargement request is made after the expiration of the original time period in which the papers were due, then the court may grant an enlargement only upon a showing of excusable neglect. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 393 (Chk. 2011).

A prosecutor cannot show excusable neglect for a motion to enlarge time when he had enough time to file a request for enlargement before he left on his trip and when, failing that, another admitted attorney in the same office could have filed a request for enlargement before the time to oppose a defendant's motion had expired, but did not. Thus, even though if the prosecution had moved to enlarge time before the time period expired, the assigned prosecutor's previously scheduled trip would have qualified as cause shown, it did not qualify as excusable neglect under the circumstances, and the prosecution's motion to enlarge time will be denied. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 393 (Chk. 2011).

– Finding

A court's finding of guilt and sentencing would not render illegal, or prevent, customary forgiveness of the defendant by the victim's family or clan. Whatever the court does, customary settlement may remain desirable to resolve lingering hostility and disputes between the families. Chuuk v. Sound, 8 FSM R. 577, 579 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Regardless of what the trial court chose to call it, a "judgment of conviction" that contains the plea, the findings (both general and special), and the adjudication, but it does not contain the sentence was not a judgment of conviction because a judgment of conviction must set forth the plea, the findings, and the adjudication and sentence. Neth v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 228, 231 (App. 2006).

When the trial court issued findings of guilt for the defendant's violation of both 11 F.S.M.C. 532 and 11 F.S.M.C. 701, but only entered a conviction for his violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701 and thereafter, the defendant was sentenced to a term of one year in jail, again, only for his conviction of 11 F.S.M.C. 701, the trial court's finding of guilt for the defendant's violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 532 is not at issue in the appeal. Wainit v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 43, 46 n.2 (App. 2007).

A guilty finding is not a "judgment of conviction" because in order to be a judgment of conviction, the "judgment of conviction" must set forth the plea, the findings, and the adjudication and sentence. Since a "judgment of conviction" must contain the sentence, it can only be entered after the sentence is pronounced. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 19 FSM R. 201, 204-05 n.1 (App. 2013).

A guilty finding, by itself, is not a conviction. For a document to be a judgment of conviction, it must set forth the plea, the findings, and the adjudication and sentence. Ned v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 147, 153 (App. 2015).

Regardless of what it is labeled, a document that contains the plea, the findings (both general and special), and the adjudication, but does not contain the sentence cannot be a judgment of conviction since a judgment of conviction must contain the plea, the findings, and the adjudication and the sentence. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 164 n.1 (App. 2015).

The court must make a general finding and must in addition, on request made before the general finding, find the facts specially and make necessary conclusions of law. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 630 (Chk. 2018).

A defendant's motion for special findings made after the court had already entered its general findings is untimely and will be denied. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 630 (Chk. 2018).

– Forgery

Forgery, as defined by the Kosrae State Code, is falsely making or materially altering a writing or document of apparent legal weight and authenticity, with intent to defraud, and is classified as a category one felony. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228d (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the defendant was charged with two counts of forgery, both containing the element of fraud, the statute of limitations is, since fraud is an element of the crime, extended to allow prosecution to commence the action within one year of the discovery of the offense by the aggrieved party, but not in any case is the period of limitation otherwise applicable extended by more than three years. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

– Fraud

When existing facts having a material bearing upon the desirability of a proposed investment are intentionally misrepresented, the investor has been defrauded, even if the person who has induced the investors by false statements fervently hopes that related promises of future actions, developments or profitability will be fulfilled. Wolfe v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 115, 120 (App. 1985).

When a person makes statements calculated to create a false impression as to value in order to induce those who heard him to give him their money, and the statements did have that result, the person has purposely obtained property through deception within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 932(6). Wolfe v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 115, 121 (App. 1985).

In order to find an accused guilty of cheating, the court must find that the accused: 1) unlawfully obtained the property, services or money of another; 2) by false pretenses, knowing the pretenses to be false; and 3) with the intent thereby to permanently defraud the owner thereof. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 76, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the accused obtained travel fund monies for a purpose not authorized by law, which was his taking of funds from the Speaker and staff travel fund for the expressed purpose of a medical referral; when the accused represented that he was entitled to the funds through use of the representation fund account and the Speaker and staff travel fund account; when the accused altered the travel authorization and represented to the Department of Administrative Services that he was authorized to receive the funds in the altered travel authorization; and when the accused intended to permanently defraud the funds' owner seeking and obtaining public funds for an impermissible purpose and intended to convert the funds by taking an unauthorized amount of funds and failing to return or account for the funds, the accused is guilty of cheating. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 81-82 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Under the Kosrae State Code, a prosecution for a felony must be commenced within three years after the alleged crime was committed but an extension of the statute of limitations is allowed when an element of the offense is fraud. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the defendant was charged with two counts of forgery, both containing the element of fraud, the statute of limitations is, since fraud is an element of the crime, extended to allow prosecution to commence the action within one year of the discovery of the offense by the aggrieved party, but not in any case is the period of limitation otherwise applicable extended by more than three years. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

– Fugitives

Extradition treaties are to be construed liberally to effect their purpose of surrender of fugitives to be tried for their alleged offenses. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 103 (App. 1993).

A criminal appeal involving a fugitive appellant, who has left the FSM in violation of three court orders, will be dismissed because the fugitive's ongoing disobedience to those orders precludes him from availing himself of the appellate process. He is thus disentitled to call upon the court for a review of his conviction. Walter v. FSM, 15 FSM R. 130, 132 (App. 2007).

Delay due to a co-defendant's unavailability is not attributed to the government, and this includes the time a co-defendant was a fugitive. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 180, 187 (Chk. 2007).

When the facts are sufficient to show an accused's knowledge of the charges against him and for the court to infer that he intended to avoid further prosecution by leaving the jurisdiction, the accused is therefore a fugitive. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 441-42 (Chk. 2007).

The fugitive disentitlement doctrine is not limited only to appellate review of a criminal conviction or of a related civil forfeiture. It may also apply in trial court proceedings, such as pretrial motions made by fugitives in the trial courts. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 442 (Chk. 2007).

The fugitive disentitlement doctrine has come to signify the unwillingness of courts to waste time and resources exercising jurisdiction over litigants who will only comply with favorable court rulings. Simply stated, a fugitive's absence does not entitle him to an advantage. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 442 (Chk. 2007).

The doctrine of fugitive disentitlement rests on the principle of mutuality. The rationale is that a court should not afford a fugitive who is unwilling to submit to its jurisdiction and stand trial for an alleged crime, the opportunity to improve his position by challenging the jurisdiction of the court. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 442 (Chk. 2007).

A fugitive, in bringing motions, is trying to obtain favorable rulings from the court without risking any burden that may flow from an adverse ruling. If the rulings are unfavorable to him, he will remain a fugitive. Then, if the government wishes to pursue prosecuting him, it must go to the effort and expense of extraditing him assuming he has not fled to a jurisdiction with which the FSM does not have an extradition agreement. That bestows a benefit on the fugitive and violates the principle of mutuality and reaching the merits of a fugitive's pretrial motions may encourage others in the same position to take flight from justice. Thus his motions will be denied without prejudice. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 443 (Chk. 2007).

A fugitive's pending motions will all be denied without prejudice. Once he has submitted to the court's jurisdiction by returning, he may reurge any motion not previously denied on the merits. The fugitive will be afforded due process and his right to a fair trial once he has returned. FSM v. Jacob, 15 FSM R. 439, 443 (Chk. 2007).

To be considered a fugitive, a person must have some knowledge of the charges against him or her and have then left or remained outside the court's jurisdiction. From that, the court may infer that the accused's intention is to avoid prosecution. He or she is then a fugitive. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 532 (Chk. 2008).

When the court cannot find that an accused has any knowledge that he has been charged with an offense, or that he left the FSM in anticipation that he was about to be charged, or that he has even communicated with the counsel that now appears on his behalf, it is doubtful that the fugitive disentitlement doctrine could be applied to his counsel's motion. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 532 (Chk. 2008).

– Homicide

In a criminal prosecution under 11 F.S.M.C. 301, where defendant's overt actions indicated their intention to aid those involved in attacks, and when it was reasonably foreseeable by them that somebody might be fatally injured as a probable consequences of the beatings that they aided and abetted, they may be held legally responsible for the death resulting from the assaults even if the defendants did not actually intend that the victims be killed or seriously injured. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 548 (App. 1984).

It is not unreasonable for a trial court to conclude that a police officer, claiming to effect an arrest, who hits a person four times with a mangrove coconut husker and kills him was trying to kill him. Loch v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 566, 576 (App. 1984).

When the defendant is fighting another person and uses a wrestling hold which causes the death of the other person, but when the court is unable to find that reasonable person would be aware that such a hold, as applied, would create a substantial risk of death, the defendant is not guilty of the crimes of manslaughter or negligent homicide. FSM v. Raitoun, 1 FSM R. 589, 590-92 (Truk 1984).

Under the law of the Federated States of Micronesia, manslaughter is a lesser degree of homicide included within the charge of murder. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 318 (App. 1988).

In order for trier of fact to be free to choose between the lesser offense, manslaughter, or a greater degree of homicide, there must be a factual element, the resolution of which will determine whether the greater or lesser offense is applicable. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 318 (App. 1988).

Defendant who fails to request consideration of a lesser offense normally may not successfully appeal from a conviction arrived at without such consideration, but where all elements for murder exist but homicide was caused under extreme mental or emotional disturbance for which there is reasonable explanation or excuse, defendant is entitled to be convicted of manslaughter rather than murder, without regard to whether request for consideration of manslaughter was made by either counsel. Runmar v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 308, 319 (App. 1988).

That a victim/aggressor scuffled with the defendant and chased the defendant with a rock in his hand before the defendant fatally stabbed the victim/aggressor is not such a mitigating factor as automatically to compel the reduction of a charge from murder to manslaughter. Bernardo v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 310, 315 (App. 1990).

A trial court must give specific consideration to the possibility of manslaughter where there is evidence suggesting that the person who caused a death was under the influence of mental or emotional disturbance and if the trial court then finds guilt for murder rather than manslaughter, it must make a specific finding, either orally or in writing, explaining why 11 F.S.M.C. 912 is not applicable. Bernardo v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 310, 315 (App. 1990).

Manslaughter is committed if death is caused by one acting recklessly. Robert v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 316, 318 (App. 1990).

If the acts which caused the death were in willful disregard of the attendant circumstances and unjustifiably created excessive risks, the acts need not have been done with the purpose of causing death or with substantial certainty that death would result. Robert v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 316, 319 (App. 1990).

A necessary element of proof in a prosecution for the homicide of an infant is that the infant was born alive. Welson v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 281, 285 (App. 1992).

In the absence of evidence as to how much alcohol the defendant drank and how it affected his conduct, the court need not determine whether the defendant's intoxication negated his ability to form the intent to kill. Jonah v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 308, 312 (App. 1992).

To act while disregarding something willfully or intentionally requires that the actor be aware of the information disregarded. Thus a conviction for reckless manslaughter may be upheld only if the circumstances known by the defendant at the time of acting created a substantial and unjustified risk of death and he nonetheless willfully and irresponsibly accepted this risk by acting in a manner considerably different from the conduct that might be expected of a well-meaning, law-abiding citizen. Alouis v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 83, 86 (App. 1993).

In assessing whether conduct which has caused death was reckless, courts must also determine whether the conduct was unjustifiable. Alouis v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 83, 88 (App. 1993).

Reckless manslaughter as defined in the FSM Code is intended to apply to willfully irresponsible, life-threatening behavior, actions which grossly deviate from the standards of conduct that a law-abiding person in the actor's situation would observe. Alouis v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 83, 88 (App. 1993).

In the Kosrae Code there are two alternative mens rea elements under which the killing of another can be second-degree murder – the killing is either done with malice aforethought, or it is done while perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate a felony other than one which would statutorily incur liability for first-degree murder. Proof of either one of the two alternative mens rea elements is sufficient for a second-degree murder conviction. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 514 (App. 1998).

The primary function of the felony-murder doctrine is to relieve the prosecution of the necessity of proving, and the trier of fact of the necessity of finding, actual malice on the part of the defendant in the commission of the homicide. The malice involved in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of the felony is transferred or imputed to the commission of the homicide so that the accused can be found guilty of murder even though the killing is accidental. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 514 (App. 1998).

The offense of aggravated assault is included in the resulting homicide. Accordingly, an aggravated assault conviction cannot be used to support a felony-murder conviction. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 515 (App. 1998).

Malice is always presumed when a person deliberately injures another, and if a person uses a deadly weapon on another maliciousness must be inferred. Thus the malice aforethought required for a second-degree murder conviction may correctly be inferred from the deliberate use of three dangerous or deadly weapons. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 515-16 (App. 1998).

A sentence of six years incarceration is not unduly severe on a manslaughter conviction. It may even be considered lenient. Chuuk v. Inos, 15 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A person commits murder if he unlawfully causes the death of another human being intentionally or knowingly, or recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life. This can be broken down into five separate elements which the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt: 1) the defendant, 2) unlawfully caused, 3) the death, 4) of another human being, 5) either intentionally or knowingly, or recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life. With respect to the second element, whether a defendant's "unlawfully caused" the victim's death, the defendant's acts in self-defense render their actions lawful or excusable. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 487 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Self-defense is not an affirmative defense and the burden of proof remains with the prosecution to prove each element of the offense when self-defense is asserted. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the court finds that the defendants' acts were in self-defense, but they employed unreasonable force, there is no compulsory reduction of a murder charge to manslaughter. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When a reasonable fact finder could find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants employed unreasonable force against the victim when he was no longer a threat to them, evidenced by their use of dangerous weapons against the victim when he no longer had a machete and their simultaneous beating of him when he was no longer offering resistance, the government has presented sufficient evidence that the victim's killing was unlawful. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 488 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the court finds that the defendants killed the victim while in a state of extreme mental or emotional disturbance for which there is a reasonable explanation or excuse, the court will find them guilty of, at most, manslaughter. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 489 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A finding that the victim clearly was the aggressor and that one defendant's intervention to aid his brother adds additional weight to his claim of provocation, is sufficient to suggest that the defendants may have been acting under the influence of mental or emotional disturbance. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 489 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Unless the court finds that extreme emotional or mental disturbance existed at the time of the killing, there is no basis for reducing the murder charge to manslaughter. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 489 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The reasonableness of a defendant's response to a provocation shall be determined from the viewpoint of a person in the defendant's situation under the circumstances as he believes them to be. The passion aroused from the provocation need not be anger or rage, but can be any violent, intense, high-wrought, or enthusiastic emotion other than revenge. However, if sufficient time has elapsed between the provocation and fatal blow for passion to subside and reason return, the killing is not voluntary manslaughter. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 489-90 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If from any circumstances whatever, it appears that the defendant reflected, deliberated, or cooled any time before the fatal stroke was given, or if there was enough time or opportunity for a reasonable person to cool, the killing will amount to murder, being attributable to malice and revenge, and not to mental disturbance. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If a reasonable fact finder could find beyond a reasonable doubt that during the extended period between the victim's initial assault and the defendants' finally relenting from their beating of him, during which the defendants had ample time to observe that the victim was suppliant, injured and helpless, then either the defendants had, in fact, regained their senses or reasonable persons in the defendants' situation would have cooled off and regained their senses. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

For the purposes of motions for acquittal, the government has presented sufficient evidence of the requisite intent to satisfy that element of the murder charges when the defendants' use of dangerous weapons to repeatedly beat the victim alone creates a strong inference of the requisite intent and when there is evidence sufficient to support the specific intent requirement for murder based on the prolonged duration of the beating and other attendant circumstances arising after the victim's initial assault. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 483, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A person commits murder if he unlawfully causes the death of another human being intentionally or knowingly, or recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A person commits the offense of manslaughter if he causes the death of another human being when acting recklessly; or a homicide which would otherwise be murder is committed under influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance for which there is reasonable explanation or excuse. The reasonableness of such explanation or excuse shall be determined from the viewpoint of a person in the defendant's situation under the circumstances as he believes them to be. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

In order to convict defendants on the counts of murder, for each defendant, the court must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of each element of the offense. The government must therefore prove: 1) the defendants 2) unlawfully caused 3) the death 4) of another human being 5) either intentionally or knowingly, or recklessly under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to the value of human life. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 501 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although it is apparent that one defendant and not the other struck the fatal blows, when the defendants acted together to kill the victim by continuing to beat the victim after he was helpless and by the other holding the victim down when the one struck the fatal blows, the evidence established beyond a reasonable doubt that it was defendants who caused the victim's death. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When, well after defendants subdued the victim and rendered him defenseless, they continued to beat him, use of force against the victim by a defendant claiming self-defense was not reasonably necessary for his self-defense because he did not face an imminent threat of serious bodily injury or death from the victim when the victim was killed. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Where the defendants together pinned the victim to the ground, rendering him defenseless, and used, respectively, a fresh coconut husk and fist-sized rock, to repeatedly strike him when he was obviously defenseless and where the defendants had long since rendered him helpless when the fatal blows were struck, such circumstances prove murderous intent. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When evidence of self-defense has been presented, the court must determine whether the circumstances surrounding the self-defense claim were sufficient to show that the defendant was provoked, with reasonable explanation or excuse, to commit the killing under a state of extreme emotional or mental distress. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the attack on one defendant provoked his brother, with reasonable explanation or excuse, to use force against the victim, and if either defendant killed the victim while in a state of extreme emotional or mental disturbance due to sufficient provocation, the murder charge against him must be reduced to manslaughter. The provocation must also have existed up until the time the victim was killed and the defendants did not have an opportunity to cool off. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When both defendants were acting under extreme mental or emotional disturbance for which they had a reasonable excuse or explanation at the time they caused the victim's death, although each of the elements of murder was met, each defendant's extreme mental or emotional disturbance at the time of the killing compels reduction of the murder charges to manslaughter. Chuuk v. William, 15 FSM R. 498, 503 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When A aims at B with a murderous intent to kill, but because of a bad aim he hits and kills C, A is guilty of the murder of C. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When the statute requires that a defendant convicted of murder be sentenced to a minimum of term of not less than 40 year(s), and eligible for parole after 20, the term imprisonment, as used within the statute, means a punishment of not less than 40 years in prison. Otherwise, the term parole is left meaningless, since it can only refer to release from prison, as opposed to house arrest, or the lifting of a suspended sentence. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 571 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Human Trafficking

When time is not an essential element in trafficking in children cases; when the pertinent statute does not require proof of an exact date; and when each count of the information alleges the offenses occurred in the latter months of 2015, including September and October, the criminal information alleges with sufficient specificity the time period the offenses were allegedly committed so as to satisfy the defendants' right to due process. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 202 (Chk. 2017).

Since location is not an essential element in trafficking in children cases and since the pertinent statute does not require proof of an exact location, when each count alleges the general areas on Patta Island of Chuuk where the offenses were allegedly committed, the criminal information alleges with sufficient specificity the locations that the offenses were allegedly committed so as to satisfy the defendants' right to due process. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 202 (Chk. 2017).

Since the human trafficking statute does not define recruiting, transporting, harboring, transferring, or receiving, these words' plain meaning will be used to determine whether the actions alleged in each count of the criminal information are included within the statute. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 203 (Chk. 2017).

When, without getting into a lesson in semantics, the statutory words' plain meanings lead to the conclusion that the human trafficking statute intended to include the actions allegedly taken by the defendants to secure access to the minor victim because the various methods by which they gained access to her were a form of recruitment and in each allegation the minor was received by the respective defendant. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 203 (Chk. 2017).

There is no bright-line division between human trafficking cases such that some can only be prosecuted under state statutes and the others cannot be prosecuted under a state statute but must be prosecuted by the national government. This is analogous to governmental criminalization of firearms possession in the FSM where both the national government and (most) states have weapons control statutes that criminalize many types of firearms possession. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 295 (Chk. 2017).

None of the national human-trafficking statutes require interstate movement of either the victim or the accused as an element of the offense. This is in contrast to the human smuggling statutes, in which Congress made the intent to cross an international border an element of the offense. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 295-96 (Chk. 2017).

The emphasis in the human trafficking statutes, as opposed to human smuggling statutes, is on the victim's exploitation, not on the movement of persons. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. 2017).

In human trafficking cases, the protection of the victims' fundamental rights is involved. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. 2017).

"Practices similar to slavery" include forced marriage, and a victim's repeated sexual exploitation by the same person is something akin to a "forced marriage" without the status of being a spouse. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. 2017).

Persons may be charged with the human trafficking offenses in the FSM Supreme Court when the alleged exploitation occurred herein (with "herein" meaning within the FSM), and they may also be prosecuted when the alleged offenses were committed against a victim who is an FSM national. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 298 (Chk. 2017).

All FSM citizens are FSM nationals, but not all FSM nationals are FSM citizens. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 298 & n.5 (Chk. 2017).

Section 621 of the FSM human trafficking statute does not restrict the court's jurisdiction; instead, it expands the court's human-trafficking jurisdiction by giving it extraterritorial reach. Section 621 expands (and was clearly intended to expand) the court's possible jurisdiction to include conduct constituting an offense that took place outside the FSM's jurisdiction – § 621 was intended to provide a means to prosecute persons in the FSM Supreme Court for acts they may have committed in places other than the FSM, and thus over which the court might otherwise not have had jurisdiction, but which have some connection to the FSM. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 298 (Chk. 2017).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 612, "exploitation" includes slavery and practices similar to slavery, and practices similar to slavery include debt bondage, serfdom, and forced marriage. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 331, 333 (Chk. 2017).

Since, under the constitutional provision barring slavery, Congress clearly has the authority to legislate in the area of human trafficking, the FSM Supreme Court has subject matter jurisdiction over a criminal case whose charges are all under the Trafficking in Persons Act and allege exploitation. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 331, 333 (Chk. 2017).

The human trafficking statute does not include the word "material" when describing benefits (it just says, "payments or benefits"). FSM v. Benedicto, 21 FSM R. 377, 380 (Chk. 2017).

The human trafficking statute reads in the disjunctive ("or"), not the conjunctive ("and"). For a guilty finding, it requires proof of the "giving or receiving of payments or benefits." It does not require that any one defendant do both the giving and receiving. FSM v. Benedicto, 21 FSM R. 377, 380 (Chk. 2017).

The prosecution does not have to prove a human trafficking defendant guilty of both giving and receiving payments and benefits. Finding the defendant guilty of the giving of payments or benefits is sufficient (although arguably he received the "benefit" of sex). FSM v. Benedicto, 21 FSM R. 377, 380 (Chk. 2017).

Receiving a child by any means for the purpose of exploitation includes the obtaining of financial or other material benefit from the prostitution of another person; or the exaction of forced labor or services, which were exacted under threat of any penalty and for which the person concerned has not offered himself or herself voluntarily, or the obtaining of labor or services through deceit, fraud, or by means of a material misrepresentation; or slavery or practices similar to slavery. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 627, 632-33 (Chk. 2018).

– Immunity

The granting of immunity is traditionally a matter within the powers of the prosecution. This is so because grants of immunity call for the balancing of numerous factors and weighing of important prosecutorial policies. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 551 (App. 1984).

The FSM Supreme Court may have the power to grant immunity, but the granting of immunity is traditionally a matter of executive or prosecutorial discretion. In the Federated States of Micronesia, where there is no right to trial by jury and the trial judge is the trier of both fact and law, it seems especially unwise for the court to play an aggressive or active role concerning grants of immunity. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 552 (App. 1984).

Courts generally have recognized that they should grant immunity only under extraordinary circumstances. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 552 (App. 1984).

– Information

When an information's language is more specific than the language of the statute under which the offense is charged, the prosecution is required to establish those specific facts in addition to a violation of the statute. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 24 (Pon. 1981).

An information which claims that the defendant entered a building for the purpose of "fighting" rather than "assaulting" a person within the building does not render the information inadequate for a conviction. A desire to fight carries with it a desire to commit an assault. FSM v. Boaz (I), 1 FSM R. 22, 26 (Pon. 1981).

The government's failure to prove the assertion in its information that a dangerous weapon was used to cause the victim to submit to the sexual assault need not result in dismissal of the case. It merely prevents an application of the greater punishment available under 11 F.S.M.C. 914(3)(b). Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 493-94 (App. 1984).

Allegations in the information alleging a criminal violation must be proven in order to obtain a conviction. It is not sufficient that the evidence show a violation of the statute specified in the Information if the actual violation is different from the one alleged. Buekea v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 487, 493-94 (App. 1984).

When an information sufficiently apprises the defendant of the charges against which he must be prepared to defend and is sufficiently detailed to enable him to plead his case as a bar to future prosecutions for the same offense, it is generally sufficient that an information set forth the offense in words of the statute itself. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 516-17 (App. 1984).

The language of Rule 7(c) of the FSM Supreme Court Rules of Criminal Procedure has been interpreted by other courts as permitting the prosecution to charge commission of a single offense by different means, or by charging in the conjunctive actions prohibited disjunctively in a statute. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 517 (App. 1984).

The FSM Supreme Court Rules of Criminal Procedure were designed to avoid technicalities and gamesmanship in criminal pleading. They are to be construed to secure simplicity in procedure. Convictions should not be reversed, nor the information thrown out, because of minor, technical objections which do not prejudice the accused. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 518 (App. 1984).

11 F.S.M.C. 301 is one of a set of sections in Chapter 3 of the National Criminal Code specifying general principles of responsibility which apply implicitly to all substantive offenses but do not themselves enunciate substantive offenses. These are not subject to "violation" and are therefore not reached by Rule

7 of the FSM Rules of Criminal Procedure. These general principles are deemed applicable to all crimes, and mere failure to restate them in an Information is not a failure to inform or a violation of due process. Engichy v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 532, 542 (App. 1984).

Dropping one count from a criminal information does not prevent the prosecution from proving that count as an element of other pending charges. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 126 (Pon. 1995).

Criminal defendants have the constitutional right to be informed of the nature of the accusation against them. This protection is implemented through Criminal Rule 7(c)(1), which requires that an information must "be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged." An information should not be thrown out because of minor, technical objections which do not prejudice the accused. FSM v. Xu Rui Song, 7 FSM R. 187, 189 (Chk. 1995).

The fundamental purpose of the information is to inform the defendant of the charge so that he may prepare his defense, and the test for sufficiency is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge as stated in the particular information. Another purpose is to inform the court of the facts alleged so that it may decide whether they are sufficient in law to support a conviction, if one should be had. FSM v. Xu Rui Song, 7 FSM R. 187, 189 (Chk. 1995).

The information should be sufficiently definite, certain, and unambiguous as to permit the accused to prepare his defense. Common sense will be a better guide than arbitrary and artificial rules, and the sufficiency of the information will be determined on the basis of practical rather than technical considerations. In an information each count should stand on its own although facts alleged therein may be incorporated by reference. This is true as to each defendant. FSM v. Xu Rui Song, 7 FSM R. 187, 189-90 (Chk. 1995).

An information that is sufficient for one co-defendant may be insufficient and defective as to another. FSM v. Xu Rui Song, 7 FSM R. 187, 190 (Chk. 1995).

An information that, as a practical matter, is not sufficiently certain and unambiguous so as to permit the defendant to prepare its defense, or to inform the court of what alleged acts or omissions of this particular defendant result in criminal liability is defective, and may be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Xu Rui Song, 7 FSM R. 187, 190 (Chk. 1995).

A person who allegedly aided and abetted another to commit an offense must be specifically charged with aiding and abetting in the information. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

A statute not cited in the information and not mentioned by the prosecution until closing argument cannot be the basis of criminal liability. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

Although the government is not precluded from charging and trying, in one information, violations of two or more separate provisions of the FSM codes which arise from the same course of conduct, but when the case involves conduct specifically addressed by the tax code (which has comprehensive civil and criminal penalties established for a clearly stated purpose) the government cannot also seek to charge the defendant with alternative violations of criminal code sections providing for criminal penalties up to ten times greater than those allowed under the tax code and which were not clearly intended to apply to tax crimes. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 546 (Pon. 1998).

Relevant provisions of Title 12 of the Trust Territory Code regarding traffic citations' definition and procedure continue in effect as Chuuk state law on criminal procedure, as long as these provisions have not been amended or repealed and are consistent with the Chuuk Constitution. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A "citation" is a written order to appear before a court at a time and place named therein to answer a criminal charge briefly described in the citation. It contains a warning that failure to obey it will render the accused liable to have a complaint filed against him upon which an arrest warrant may be issued. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The court may accept the statement of the charge or charges in a citation or a copy thereof in place of an information in any misdemeanor tried. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In accepting the use of a citation in place of a complaint or information in an action, a court must review the statement of charge or charges that appear on the citations in conformity with the nature and contents of an information or complaint. The citation must be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged, and must state for each count of the citation, the statute, rule, regulation or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged to have violated. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Police officers' authority to issue citations in lieu of complaints or information is provided by law. In any case in which a policeman may lawfully arrest a person without a warrant, he may instead, subject to such limitations as his superiors may impose, issue and serve a citation upon the person, if he deems that the public interest does not require an arrest. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 602 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When defendants have been charged in a citation with misdemeanor offenses, it is lawfully appropriate for the court to pursue the charges in litigation in place of complaints or information because police officers' issuance of citations to defendants in lieu of complaints or information for violation of Chuuk State Motor Vehicle Code provisions is authorized. Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 602 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The statements that appear on citations fulfill the essential requirement of that of a complaint or information in a criminal case as provided in Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 7(c)(1). Chuuk v. Dereas, 8 FSM R. 599, 602 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The purpose of an information, summons or warrant is to inform the defendant of what he is called upon to defend. Chuuk v. Defang, 9 FSM R. 43, 45 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An information shall be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

The purpose of a criminal information is to inform the defendant of the charges against him so that he may prepare his defense, and to advise the court of the facts alleged so that the court may determine whether those facts, if proven, may support a conviction. An information that is deficient in these respects may be dismissed without prejudice. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

When an information alleges violation of a statute, that statute must be drawn so as to give a person of ordinary intelligence fair notice that the contemplated conduct was forbidden. Laws must provide explicit standards for those who apply them. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

No probable cause to believe that a criminal offense has been committed exists when the defendants' alleged conduct as set out in the information has not been made criminal under any statute, rule, or regulation to which the court's attention has been directed. FSM v. Moses, 9 FSM R. 139, 145 (Pon. 1999).

The use of affidavits to support the filing of a criminal information does not violate a criminal defendant's right to confrontation. The defendant will have the opportunity to confront the affiants if they are called as witnesses at trial by either the government or the defendant. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

The court is authorized to issue an arrest warrant or penal summons if the information is supported by one or more written statements under oath showing probable cause. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 383

(Chk. 2004).

The statute, 12 F.S.M.C. 204, and the rule, FSM Crim. R. 4(a), applying to criminal complaints cannot be followed when no complaint was ever filed and when the government earlier filed a criminal information. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 383-84 (Chk. 2004).

When applying for an arrest warrant, the person giving evidence under oath by telephone must physically appear before someone who can identify the witness and administer the oath. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 384 (Chk. 2004).

Since an information is not made under oath, that would leave only affidavits as the means to show the required "probable cause under oath" for informations. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 384 (Chk. 2004).

Since the statute and possibly the rules require sworn written statements to be filed with the information, when no such statements were attached, motions to dismiss on this ground will be granted. These dismissals are not on the merits. Neither defendant has been put in jeopardy. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 384 (Chk. 2004).

The dismissal of a criminal case because of a statutorily defective information is without prejudice. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 384 (Chk. 2004).

When a criminal information is not supported by written statement(s) under oath showing probable cause to the court's satisfaction before a penal summons (or an arrest warrant) is issued, there is no ground stated that would warrant dismissal of the information if there is nothing before the court that indicates that the information is not a "plain, concise and definite statement of the essential facts constituting the offense." But the summonses issued pursuant to such an information are improperly issued and the resulting initial appearances are as a consequence defective. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 48, 50 (Chk. 2004).

Under 12 F.S.M.C. 210, the lack of sworn, written statements showing probable cause makes the issuance of the summonses defective. It does not make the information defective. FSM v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 48, 50 (Chk. 2004).

When the differences between two informations are sufficient to show that the prosecutor who signed the new information, had exercised the considered, independent judgment that the court asked to be present in any refiled information, that most of the wording was drawn from the earlier information, presumed invalid for the purpose of the motion, is not a sufficient ground to invalidate the information. That a new information is based on or drawn from an earlier invalid information does not invalidate the new information. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 439 (Chk. 2005).

When police officers viewed the defendant struggling and fighting and also heard the defendant swearing and yelling offensive words, based upon that conduct alone, the officers had reasonable grounds to believe that the defendant had committed one or more criminal offenses, including drunken and disorderly conduct, and disturbing the peace. The police officers' determination of reasonable grounds and probable cause is based upon their training and understanding of conduct which forms the basis of criminal offenses. Following an arrest of an accused, related or different criminal offenses may be charged in the information, based upon further investigation and research conducted by the state. Kosrae v. Jonithan, 14 FSM R. 94, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

FSM law provides that a prosecution commences when an information is filed, and the filing of an information is sufficient for statute of limitations purposes. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 128, 131 (Chk. 2006).

Although the government filed a motion to clarify that the one felony charge included the interference with the civil right to vote in not only the national election held March 2, 1999, but also the Chuuk state election held the same day, but since the information gave clear notice only that the felony charge arose from the national election, the government had to prove that the defendant unlawfully interfered with the right to vote in a national election because the information's allegations alleging a criminal violation must be proven in order to obtain a conviction. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 164, 169 (Chk. 2006).

When the information cites 11 F.S.M.C. 313(2)(c), but quotes the language of 313(2)(b) as the offense charged, the "(c)" in the information is considered a minor typographical error that does not prejudice the accused. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 315 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

Defenses and objections based on defects in the information (other than that it fails to show jurisdiction in the court or to charge an offense) must be raised prior to trial. Any deficiency in the information not raised before trial has been waived and therefore cannot be a substantial or close question on appeal. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 320, 326 (Chk. 2006).

Although the prior criminal code provided that no person could be convicted of aiding and abetting unless the information specifically alleged that the defendant aided and abetted and the information provided specific acts constituting the means of aiding and abetting so as to afford the defendant adequate notice to prepare his defense, that provision was eliminated when the current criminal code was enacted. It is thus no longer necessary for the information to recite each specific act each alleged aider and abetter allegedly committed. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 333 (Chk. 2006).

An information is sufficient if it contains a plain, definite, and concise statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged so that the defendant can prepare his defense and so that the defendant can avail himself of his conviction or acquittal as a bar to subsequent prosecutions. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 333 (Chk. 2006).

Since, under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the firearm was used to commit a crime, when the amended information does not allege what crime or crimes, the firearm was used to commit, or even that it was used to commit any crime, it therefore fails to allege an essential element of 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), and that count of the amended information will be dismissed for failure to state an offense. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 334 (Chk. 2006).

When, although the language of counts six and eight was identical, the two acts of anal penetration were separated by an act of battery and the defendant penetrated the victim three separate times and although counts six and eight should have included distinguishing language, the duplication in the information, in itself, did not compromise the defendant's constitutional right against double jeopardy. Kinere v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 375, 386 (App. 2006).

An argument that the name of the "Secretary of the Department of Transportation, Communication and Infrastructure," rather than the name of the "Federated States of Micronesia" should be in the case's caption and that this defect deprives the court of subject-matter jurisdiction over the case is utterly lacking in merit. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 609 (Pon. 2007).

By requiring that an information be "filed in the name of the Secretary," Title 19, section 1307 merely requires that the information filed with the court be signed by the Secretary of the Department of Transportation, Communication and Infrastructure. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 610 (Pon. 2007).

An "information" is an accusation in the nature of an indictment, from which it differs only in being presented by a competent public officer on his oath of office, instead of a grand jury on their oath. The information shall be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged. It shall be signed by the attorney for the government. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 610 (Pon. 2007).

In the case of a violation of Title 19 of the FSM Code, any information filed with the court must be signed by the Secretary of the Department of Transportation, Communication and Infrastructure and the attorney for the government who is authorized to appear before the court. That information's caption, like all other pleadings filed in criminal matters, will be in the name of the "Federated States of Micronesia." FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 610 (Pon. 2007).

An error in the citation or description or its omission shall not be ground for the dismissal of the information or for reversal of a conviction if the error or omission did not mislead the defendant to the defendant's prejudice. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 610 (Pon. 2007).

Regardless of how the information in this case might have otherwise been captioned, the FSM Supreme Court would not be deprived of its subject-matter jurisdiction over the case since the alleged violations are national offenses and the FSM Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction over cases in which the national government is a party. Thus, whether the information was filed in the name of the "Federated States of Micronesia" or "the Secretary of the Department of Transportation, Communication and Infrastructure" the national government would be a party. It is this controlling factor which serves as the basis for the court's subject-matter jurisdiction. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 610 (Pon. 2007).

Although Section 1306 of Title 19 of the FSM Code authorizes the Secretary of the Department of Transportation, Communication and Infrastructure to investigate violations, there is no provision in Title 19 that prescribes what action shall be taken if an investigation is not undertaken. As such, the requirement that an investigation be undertaken prior to the filing of an information is not mandatory. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 611 (Pon. 2007).

Although Section 1306(4) of Title 19 of the FSM Code does require notification of the maritime authority in the country where the vessel that the defendant purportedly masters is flagged, that provision of law, like all of section 1306 of Title 19, is not mandatory. The notification requirement imposed by Section 1306(4) is only required if the Secretary has caused an investigation to be undertaken, and only then if the investigation concerns a vessel. But when the only named defendant is an individual, and not a vessel, even if an investigation had been undertaken by the Secretary, there would have been no requirement to notify any foreign maritime authority. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 611 (Pon. 2007).

The government does not have to identify which of the six charges in a criminal information it intends to pursue since it is entitled to pursue multiple claims based on the same act. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 279 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A criminal information must be a plain, concise and definite written statement of the essential facts constituting the offense charged. It must be signed by an attorney for the state and for each count there must be citation of the statute, rule, regulation or other provision of law which the defendant is alleged to have violated. Allegations against the defendant in one count may be incorporated by reference in another count. Chuuk v. Menisio, 15 FSM R. 276, 279 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An information should be sufficiently definite, certain, and unambiguous as to permit the accused to prepare his defense, but an information should not be thrown out because of minor, technical objections which do not prejudice the accused. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380 (Chk. 2007).

When the information is sufficiently definite to put the accused on notice that he is charged with, in his capacity as NNDA Executive Director, being a member of a conspiracy to violate 55 F.S.M.C. 221(2), 55 F.S.M.C. 221(3) and 11 F.S.M.C. 529 and when the court has previously stated that nothing before it indicates that the information is not a plain, concise and definite statement of the essential facts constituting the offense, the accused's motion to dismiss on the ground of defective information will be denied. FSM v. Kansou, 15 FSM R. 373, 380-81 (Chk. 2007).

When the affidavit(s) did not state that the victim was thrown overboard but instead stated that the victim's body was thrown overboard after the victim was shot, the only fair inference that can be drawn from that allegation is that the prosecution alleges that the shooting killed the victim and the defendants are thus on notice that the government alleged that at least one of the offenses the firearm was used for was to commit a homicide. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 460 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

The Kosrae State Court standard for measuring delay when filing an information and proceeding to trial is that the court presumes that there has been no unnecessary delay if the information is filed within six months of the alleged criminal act, but if the information is filed more than six months after the alleged act, then the prosecution must show that the delay in filing was reasonable or necessary. Kosrae v. Langu, 15 FSM R. 601, 604 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A criminal information will not be dismissed on the ground that it fails to allege that the weapon in question was a handgun of .22 caliber or greater because the information alleges that the defendant possessed a .22 handgun and because a handgun's caliber is irrelevant since 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) prohibits the possession of any handgun, regardless of caliber. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 28 (Chk. 2008).

An information's fundamental purpose is to inform the defendant of the charges so that he may prepare his defense, and to advise the court of the facts alleged so that the court may determine whether those facts, if proven, may support a conviction, and an information deficient in these respects may be dismissed without prejudice. The test for a particular information's sufficiency is whether it is fair to the defendant to require him to defend on the basis of the charge as stated therein. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 29 (Chk. 2008).

To determine whether an information is deficient, the information and its supporting affidavit must be read together. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 29 (Chk. 2008).

When the supporting affidavit specifically alleges that the defendant beat the victim on her head with the handgun, the information's assault allegation is more than adequate and the defendant's ground that the information fails to state with specificity the nature of the crime of assault alleged must be rejected. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 29 (Chk. 2008).

When, at no time before closing argument did the defendant object to or seek clarification of the government's charges through a bill of particulars, motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, or other means, any defect in the information, other than lack of jurisdiction or failure to state a claim, was waived by defendant's failure to raise the issue before trial. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 80 n.7 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The pleading rules were designed to ensure simplicity of proceedings and to avoid technicalities and gamesmanship. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 80 n.7 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Since, under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the firearm was used in connection with or in aid of the commission of a crime, when the information does not allege what crime or crimes, the firearm was used to help commit, it fails to allege an essential element of 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), and that count of the information should be dismissed for failure to state an offense. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 183 (Chk. 2008).

A prosecution is commenced when an information is filed in court. Kosrae v. George, 16 FSM R. 228a, 228e (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A motion to dismiss the information will be denied when the information is sufficiently definite and unambiguous for the accused to be apprised of the charge against him and for him to prepare his defense and when it is sufficiently detailed to enable him to plead the case as a bar to any future prosecution for the same offense. FSM v. Sippa, 16 FSM R. 247, 249 (Chk. 2009).

An information will not be dismissed on the ground that the supporting affidavit was unreliable when the affidavit was prepared by an investigating officer who based his testimony on his own interviews with witnesses since hearsay statements of witnesses can establish probable cause. Chuuk v. Rotenis, 16 FSM R. 398, 401 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).
