An affirmative defense cannot be pled with only a conclusory statement, but must, in each instance, be tied to specific factual allegations so as to give the plaintiff notice of the defense. A defendant cannot claim to have meritorious defenses by just listing the possible affirmative defenses to the plaintiff's causes of action without supporting factual allegations. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 605 (Pon. 2020).

When a borrower made a $410 payment after the date the bank ended the accounting of her loan, she has a meritorious payment defense, at least as far as the $410 payment is concerned. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 605 (Pon. 2020).

When a defendant has a meritorious payment defense to part of the default judgment against her, the court will grant partial relief from the default judgment because any other approach would be unfairly detrimental or prejudicial to the debtor. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 607 (Pon. 2020).

– Relief from Judgment – Grounds

While Civil Rule 60(a) may be used to correct clerical errors in a judgment such as those of transcription, copying, or calculation it cannot be used to obtain relief for acts deliberately done. Therefore where the court deliberately intended to enter in a judgment the amount prayed for in a party's motion and that amount is based on a special master's report not before the court, the party cannot obtain relief under Rule 60(a) for errors in the special master's report. Senda v. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 6 FSM R. 440, 444-45 (App. 1994).

Relief from judgment cannot be granted when judgment was granted on two separate grounds and relief is only sought from one of the grounds. However, if meritorious, the record may be corrected to show that one ground ought to be stricken. Setik v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 446, 448 (Chk. 1994).

Failure of counsel to exercise due diligence in searching for "newly discovered" evidence is sufficient and independent grounds for denial of a motion for relief from judgment under FSM Civil Rule 60(b)(2). Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 567 (App. 1994).

Civil Rule 60(b) does not afford relief to a party where the errors complained of were calculated by that party, submitted to the court by that party, and judicially noticed upon that party's request, because it is apparent that that party seeks relief from the insufficient preparation, the carelessness, and the neglect of its own counsel. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 129, 135 (Pon. 1995).

A party may be estopped from seeking Rule 60(b)(1) relief from acts voluntarily undertaken by that party. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 129, 135 (Pon. 1995).

Relief from judgment will be denied when the relief sought is for someone not a party. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 350, 352-53 (Pon. 1995).

Relief from judgment may be granted to a party who failed to appear at trial when he was unaware that trial had been scheduled. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 519 (Chk. 1996).

Courts considering a Rule 60(b) motion also require that the moving party show a good claim or defense before relief from judgment may be granted. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 519 (Chk. 1996).

When there was no showing that the movant tried to obtain the evidence before judgment and where the evidence would not change the result, it cannot be considered newly discovered evidence that could not have been discovered previously by the exercise of due diligence entitling the movant to relief from judgment. Stinnett v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 142, 146 (Chk. 1997).

Failure to calendar the date for response and having only one attorney, busy handling a large volume of work, and a number of trial counselors in the office during the month the response was due is not "excusable neglect" entitling a party to relief from judgment. Even if the trial counselors were not prepared to handle the response to the submission, they were certainly capable of and experienced in drafting a motion for enlargement of time. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 455, 459 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A motion for relief from judgment must allege facts sufficient to establish a meritorious defense. Such defendants must make a showing of a meritorious defense that if established at trial, would constitute a complete defense to the action. Irons v. Ruben, 9 FSM R. 218, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court may set aside any judgment for fraud upon the court, or if the judgment is void as in a case where the judgment is against public policy, or if it is no longer equitable that the judgment should have prospective application, or for any other reason justifying relief from the operation of the judgment. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 499-500 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Relief from judgment under Rule 60 is addressed to the court's discretion. The discretion is not an arbitrary one to be capriciously exercised, but a sound legal discretion guided by accepted legal principles. Generally, the court's discretion does not reach neglect of counsel, which, without more, is not a basis for Rule 60(b) relief, except when the neglect itself is excusable. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 267, 268-69 (Pon. 2001).

Because clients are responsible for their counsel's conduct, the proper focus is upon whether the neglect of the clients and their counsel was excusable. Clients must be held accountable for their attorney's acts or omissions. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 267, 269 (Pon. 2001).

The conduct of both client and counsel is relevant to a determination of excusable neglect under Rule 60(b)(1). Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 267, 269 (Pon. 2001).

When even if former counsel's neglect were excusable, plaintiffs' failure to secure new counsel in a more timely manner is conduct sufficient in itself to preclude relief under Rule 60(b)(1), the motion for relief from judgment must be denied based on the plaintiffs' own conduct. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 267, 269-70 (Pon. 2001).

Serving the defendant himself and failure to serve defendant's counsel with documents was not improper conduct entitling the defendant to Rule 60(b)(3) relief from judgment when that defendant had no counsel of record and was appearing pro se. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 380 (Pon. 2001).

Service of a motion upon an opposing party is expressly required under Civil Procedure Rule 6(d). Such is not the case with a trial subpoena. Therefore, in the absence of any pre-trial order requiring it, failure to serve trial subpoenas on an opposing party does not constitute improper conduct justifying relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(3). Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 381 (Pon. 2001).

Attorney negligence, even gross negligence, if demonstrated, is not a separate basis for Rule 60(b)(6) relief from judgment. Under established FSM law, attorney neglect as a basis for Rule 60(b) relief falls within subsection Rule 60(b)(1), "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 381 (Pon. 2001).

Generally, attorney negligence is not a basis for Rule 60(b)(1) relief from judgment. Parties who freely choose their attorneys should not be allowed to avoid the ramification of the acts or omissions of their chosen counsel. A party in a civil case whose attorney's conduct has fallen below a reasonable standard has other remedies. To grant Rule 60(b)(1) relief in such circumstances would penalize the nonmoving party for the negligent conduct of the moving party's counsel. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 381 (Pon. 2001).

The exception to the rule that attorney neglect does not state a basis for relief under Rule 60(b)(1) is where the neglect itself is excusable. Clients must be held accountable for their attorneys' acts or omissions. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 381-82 (Pon. 2001).

Allegations of an attorney's gross negligence do not entitle his client to relief from judgment under the excusable neglect provision of Rule 60(b)(1). Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 382 (Pon. 2001).

An analysis of excusable neglect under Rule 60(b)(1) by its terms brings into play the conduct of the client, as well counsel because the proper focus is upon whether the neglect of the clients and their counsel was excusable. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 382 (Pon. 2001).

A pro se party's lack of full involvement in the pretrial process for whatever reasons when he had the opportunity to participate – and indeed was required to do so but did not when it came to responding to plaintiffs' discovery – does not constitute excusable neglect under Civil Procedure Rule 60(b) when he has not demonstrated that his own neglect of the litigation, either in his role of client or attorney, was excusable. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 382 (Pon. 2001).

Because procedural law cannot cast a sympathetic eye on the unprepared or it will soon fragment into a kaleidoscope of shifting rules, relief under Rule 60 is not appropriate when a party has demonstrated a pattern of delay and neglect. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 382 n.5 (Pon. 2001).

For the limited purpose of Rule 60(b)(1) relief from judgment the court will not allow a party, having elected at relevant times to be his own counsel of record, to ascribe his own on-the-record conduct of the litigation after the fact to off-the-record counsel. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 383 (Pon. 2001).

Subsection (6) is the grand reservoir of equitable power to do justice in a particular case, subject to the requirement that the provision is applicable only when the basis for relief is different from those enumerated in subsections (1) through (5) of Rule 60(b), and to the requirement that extraordinary circumstances exist for justifying relief. Extraordinary circumstances usually means that the movant himself was not at fault for his predicament. Conversely, the usual implication of fault on the movant's part is that there are no extraordinary circumstances. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 383 (Pon. 2001).

Relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(6) will be denied when there was sufficient action, and failure to act, on the movant's part to preclude the argument that there was no fault on his part and when there is also no distinct claim for relief that falls outside those specifically enumerated in subsections (b)(1) through (b)(5) of Rule 60. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 383 (Pon. 2001).

The determination of what sorts of neglect that can be considered excusable in order to justify relief from judgment is an equitable one. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 118, 122 (Chk. 2002).

Relief under Rule 60(b)(6) is reserved for extraordinary circumstances. Farata v. Punzalan, 11 FSM R. 175, 178 (Chk. 2002).

Relief from judgment will be denied when the movant has not shown the extraordinary circumstances required by Rule 60(b)(6) for her to be granted relief from a judgment, which was in her favor and which she had agreed to, and has not shown unforeseeable changed circumstances. Farata v. Punzalan, 11 FSM R. 175, 178 (Chk. 2002).

A judgment may be vacated for nonjoinder of a necessary or indispensable party or where it affects persons who were never made parties to the suit. Pastor v. Ngusun, 11 FSM R. 281, 285 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Rule 60(b) draws a distinction between relief from judgment for "fraud," which is subject to a one-year limitation, and for "fraud upon the court," which is not subject to such a limitation. These are two distinct types of fraud, since any other conclusion would render nugatory the one-year limitations period that is placed on "ordinary" fraud under Rule 60(b)(3). Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 635 (Pon. 2003).

The adversary process is designed to ferret out perjured testimony and the like, and if a party does not litigate vigorously and effectively to accomplish this, then he must live with the result. Thus, the advantage of focusing the inquiry on what the party seeking relief should have accomplished at the earlier trial serves all the purposes of the "intrinsic" versus "extrinsic" fraud distinction. It protects the sanctity of final judgments from those who did not adequately litigate the issues the first time around. The preservation of the sanctity of judgments and the certainty that this is meant to provide in the lives of litigants, irrespective of whether they win or lose, is the rationale for the heightened showing necessary for relief from judgment after one year has elapsed from the time of the entry of judgment. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 636 (Pon. 2003).

A finding of fraud on the court is justified only by the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or jury or fabrication of evidence by counsel, and must be supported by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 636 (Pon. 2003).

Nondisclosure is not a basis for seeking relief from an order or judgment based on allegations of fraud on the court. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 638 (Pon. 2003).

When a party has received a copy of an instrument evidencing the property transfer that she now claims was concealed from her, notwithstanding this omission, and regardless of the fact that the opponent answered the interrogatory "no," when the only correct answer was "yes," it remains that the discovery responses that were served on her attorney of record and are a part of the court file contain a copy of the document conveying the half interest. Thus, she cannot now say this transaction was not disclosed to her. At most, the inconsistency between the request for production and the interrogatory created an issue for resolution by further discovery. In light of the property transfer document, even the patently incorrect interrogatory answer does not entitle her to any relief under the fraud on the court provision. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 638-39 (Pon. 2003).

Miscategorization of the property cannot be a basis for a fraud on the court claim when the statement of the parties' assets and liabilities was, and is a part of the record, when the alleged miscategorization was evidently not an issue at the time the parties executed the separation agreement since the listing is attached to that agreement, and when it was not an issue when the parties stipulated to the entry of the divorce decree that incorporated the separation agreement with the attached asset listing. Ramp v. Ramp, 11 FSM R. 630, 639 (Pon. 2003).

Rule 60(b)(1) provides that a court may relieve an affected party from judgment on the basis of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 372 (App. 2004).

A trial court commits an abuse of discretion when it commits legal error by denying a motion for relief from judgment when a defendant was surprised by the date and time of trial since he was never served with a notice of trial because the trial court erred when, through its clerks' office, it failed to serve notice of the trial date and time on the pro se litigant. This error seriously affected the judicial proceedings' fairness, integrity, and public reputation, regardless of opposing counsel's service of a trial subpoena on the litigant. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 372 (App. 2004).

When the fundamental tenets of due process are violated by the trial court's failure to provide notice of the trial to a pro se litigant, the trial court's later denial of his motion for relief from judgment under Rule 60 is an abuse of discretion. Panuelo v. Amayo, 12 FSM R. 365, 374 (App. 2004).

Unlike other grounds under Rule 60(b), the court does not have any discretion when relief from judgment is sought on the ground that the judgment was void because either a judgment is void or it is valid. A judgment is not void merely because it is erroneous. It is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process of law. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 256 (Chk. 2005).

When the only ground offered to justify relief from judgment is that the movant was not properly served the amended complaint and when the court has concluded that he was properly served the amended complaint by mail since he had already appeared in the case to plead or otherwise defend, the motion for relief from judgment must be denied. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 258 (Chk. 2005).

When an amended complaint asserted additional factual claims, the defendant had to be served a summons with the amended complaint and the service had to be effected as would the service of any complaint and summons, and since he was served by ordinary mail, he was not properly served the amended complaint. The judgment based on the amended complaint is thus void as to him and a motion for relief from judgment will therefore granted as to him. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 258 (Chk. 2005).

On motion and upon such terms as are just, the court may relieve a party from a final judgment when the judgment is void. The court can order the plaintiff to serve the amended complaint and a summons issued by the court clerk on defendant being relieved from judgment by any means permissible under FSM Civil Procedure Rule 4 or 4 F.S.M.C. 204(2) or 4 F.S.M.C. 204(3) within a certain time. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 259 (Chk. 2005).

Relief from judgment cannot be for a mistake the bank made in preparing the loan agreement and promissory note when the court corrected that "mistake" by reforming the loan agreement and the promissory note to accurately reflect the agreement of the parties to it because the judgment from which relief is sought is not based on, or the result of, this "mistake," but is instead the result of the court's correction of the "mistake." FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 632 (Pon. 2008).

Legal rulings affirmed on appeal and therefore not error are not "mistakes" subject to relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(1). FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 632 (Pon. 2008).

Failure to sue the borrower as well as, or instead of, the guarantors cannot be considered a "mistake" subject to relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(1) because, as a general legal principle, a lender holding a guaranty of payment can sue a guarantor directly, without naming the borrower and because the terms of the guaranty, under which the guarantors were found liable, permitted the bank, in the case of a loan default, to sue the guarantors without suing the borrower. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 632 (Pon. 2008).

When the defendants do not assert that the judgment is void and do not allege that the court lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the case or personal jurisdiction over the defendants or that the court acted inconsistent with due process, the defendants are not entitled to relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(4). FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2008).

Rule 60(b)(5) which permits relief from a judgment on the ground that "it is no longer equitable that the judgment have prospective application," properly applies only to judgments with prospective effect, and so does not cover the case of a judgment for money damages. While a money judgment may be "prospective" to the extent that the defendant has failed to pay it in a timely manner, it is nevertheless a final order and is not "prospective" for purposes of Rule 60(b)(5). FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 634 (Pon. 2008).

Subsection 60(b)(6), which permits relief for "any other reason justifying relief," and the other subsections of Rule 60(b) are mutually exclusive. Thus, if the reasons offered for relief from judgment could have been considered under any of the subsections 60(b)(1) through (5), they cannot be considered under Rule 60(b)(6). FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 634 (Pon. 2008).

Relief under Rule 60(b)(6) is reserved for extraordinary circumstances. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 634 (Pon. 2008).

When the defendants do not allege that the FSM Development Bank, or IDF, or FDA committed any wrongdoing causing the borrower's non-performance on the loan repayments, they cannot rely on the principle that a promisor is discharged from liability when the promisor's non-performance is caused by the other contracting party since the other contracting party, the bank (and its principal, IDF) did not cause the non-performance and they cannot rely on the principle that a person is not permitted to profit by his own wrong at another's expense since neither the bank nor IDF are alleged to have committed a wrong, and it is IDF that will profit if the loan is repaid. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 635 (Pon. 2008).

When the terms of the guaranty under which the guarantors have been held liable waived any right to the borrower's defenses, the guarantors would need to overcome this express waiver in order to be entitled to relief from the judgment against them based on the ground that another's wrongdoing is a defense against the borrower being required to repay its loan. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 635 n.7 (Pon. 2008).

A litigant, as a precondition to Rule 60(b) relief, must give the trial court reason to believe that vacating the judgment will not be a futile gesture or an empty exercise, that is, that the litigant has a meritorious defense. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 635 (Pon. 2008).

When, taking the guarantors' factual allegations as true – that the bank misrepresented to plaintiffs that the documents were in accord with the loan, caused plaintiffs to rely upon said representations and knew plaintiffs would so rely – it is difficult to see how the guarantors were harmed thereby because, if the bank had prepared all the documents correctly, the documents would have shown that a corporation was the borrower and that the guarantors were guarantors with the result that the guarantors would be liable on their guaranty, and since this result is no different than that in the judgment rendered in the former litigation, any alleged reliance on the bank's representation could not have been to the guarantors' detriment since they were in no worse position than if the loan documents were accurately prepared. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 597-98 (Pon. 2009).

Since the court cannot ignore the facts that the guarantors agreed were true and stipulated to in the former litigation – that a corporation was the borrower, that the promissory note was incorrectly completed, and that they signed a guaranty – and instead pretend, for the sake of this independent action, that those facts are not true, and that the guarantors were the borrowers, the guarantors' current allegation that they were the borrowers cannot be taken as true because it is a conclusion of law masquerading as a factual conclusion that the court cannot accept or, alternatively, it is a conclusory factual allegation that is contradicted by facts which the court may judicially notice – the court filings, record, and reported decision in the former action and the appellate affirmance of that decision. Either way, the court cannot accept this allegation as true because it is not. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 598 (Pon. 2009).

When the guarantors steadfastly maintained, from the start and throughout the former litigation and subsequent appeal, their position that a corporation was the borrower and that they were only the guarantors, the guarantors cannot now pretend that, because the former judgment and appeal were unfavorable to them, they were instead the borrowers on the loan, something they had consistently denied throughout. If the guarantors were permitted to now assert that they were the borrowers, they would be relitigating the entire case from the beginning, and that they cannot do in an independent action, and, since the corporation was the borrower, the guarantors' allegations that can be taken as true fail to state a claim for fraud. Because the guarantors' allegation cannot make out a fraud claim, summary judgment could be granted in the bank's favor on this ground alone since, without the existence of the requisite fraud, res judicata prevails. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 598 (Pon. 2009).

When the issue of the bank's faulty preparation of some of the loan documents that showed the guarantors as borrowers and the effects of those scrivener's errors on the guarantors' liability was fully litigated in the former civil action and, on appeal, the guarantors' contentions were again fully considered and the trial court's decision was affirmed; when the defense of mistake in the document preparation was fully litigated in the trial court and also considered by the appellate court; and when the guarantors did not raise a fraud defense at that time but they could have if they had chosen to since all the facts known to them now were also known to them then, there is no genuine issue of material fact about whether the guarantors were misled by the bank's errors on the loan documents to believe that they were the actual borrowers and not guarantors since they all believed that the corporation was the borrower, not they, and that they had signed a guaranty, and, in the former action, had stipulated to these facts as true and that these facts were undisputed. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 598-99 (Pon. 2009).

Relief under Rule 60(b)(6) is reserved for "extraordinary circumstances," which usually means that the movant himself was not at fault for his predicament. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 659 (App. 2009).

An issue that should have been known to the appellants when the original suit was filed should have been raised as a defense in the original suit or an excuse offered for not raising it then. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 659 (App. 2009).

When there is no reason, other than the appellants' own carelessness or inadvertence, not to have raised a defense at the trial level or to have impleaded the State of Pohnpei for indemnification, but they did neither, the appellants fail to demonstrate that they were not at fault or negligent. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 659 (App. 2009).

When the appellants' first claim is that the contract reformation was a mistake on the court's part and that issue was already disposed of in their first appeal; when they have been before the trial court as well as the appeals court, and have had an opportunity to fully litigate their claims; when their claim that because the contract was reformed, they were unable to present their defense is unsupported and unpersuasive; when they were not denied any due process rights or remedies in law or equity as they were afforded an opportunity to fully litigate their claims and to present in the original action any meritorious defense against all claims; when they stipulated to the facts; and when many of their arguments are factual claims made in a prior appeal, in which that court already concluded were speculative arguments, the appellants have not demonstrated that their circumstances are in any way unusual and exceptional. Nor have they established that their own fault or negligence was not a factor in the resulting judgment. Therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying the appellants' request for relief from the judgment. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 659-60 (App. 2009).

When the appellants have had ample opportunity to present evidence on every ground or defense that they asserted, or could have asserted, but failed to do so; when the trial court comprehensively and correctly analyzed and denied their Rule 60(b) motion for relief from the trial court's judgment; and when they now urge on this appeal that the trial court's decision be vacated because it failed to treat their Rule 60(b) motion as an independent action under Rule 60(b)(6), this contention is spurious. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 660 (App. 2009).

Evidence does not qualify as newly discovered evidence that would be a ground for relief under Civil Rule 60(b)(2) when that evidence should have been in the plaintiff's possession all along (since he was a signatory to the agreement) or was evidence he would have, with due diligence, located before he filed suit, especially since this is his second suit for the breach of the same easement agreement and he should have had it for the earlier suit. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 203, 206 (Chk. 2012).

When all the defenses the defendant now seeks to raise were previously raised on his behalf and then considered and rejected by the court, he has not shown any grounds to revisit these issues or for relief from judgment under Civil Procedure Rule 60(b), which governs the defendant's motion to dismiss prior court judgments, which also was not timely. Saimon v. Wainit, 18 FSM R. 211, 214 (Chk. 2012).

Civil Procedure Rule 60(b)(4) provides for the relief from judgment when the judgment is void. Unlike other grounds for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b), the court does not have any discretion when the relief is sought because the judgment is void since a judgment is either void or it is valid and if it is void the court must vacate it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2013).

Although the court has no discretion and must grant the relief when relief is sought from a void judgment, a judgment is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2013).

Since a corporation's directors have a duty to act in the corporation's best interest and when, regardless of whether the judgment existed, the corporation had debts that greatly exceeded its assets and it was unable to pay those debts as they became due, bankruptcy was probably in the corporation's best interest, and the court cannot give any weight to the argument that this meant that the directors had accepted the judgment when they directed the corporation to seek bankruptcy protection. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2013).

The court cannot give any weight to the argument that the passage of time is enough to bar vacating a void judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 614 (Pon. 2013).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and subject to direct or collateral attack. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

There are civil procedure mechanisms to address situations where the Kosrae State Court would be in the position of being asked to enforce contradictory judgments. Under Kosrae Civil Procedure Rule 60(b)(5), on motion and on such terms as are just, the Kosrae State Court may relieve a party or a party's legal representative from a final judgment, order, or proceeding when a prior judgment upon which it is based has been reversed or otherwise vacated, or it is no longer equitable that the judgment should have prospective application. Thus, a party could be relieved from an inconsistent permanent injunction as a final order that it is no longer equitable that it should have prospective application. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 & n.7 (App. 2014).

A court may relieve an affected party from judgment on the basis of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. The grant or denial of relief under Rule 60 rests with the trial court's sound discretion. The court must balance the policy in favor of hearing a litigant's claims on the merits against the policy in favor of finality. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM), Inc. v. Gallen, 20 FSM R. 3, 6 (Pon. 2015).

Relief from judgment will be denied when the basis for relief is that there was mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect in the stipulated judgment because besides the fraudulent insurance policies that are the subject of the complaint, there were legitimate policies sold and the defendant mistakenly believed that the properly earned commission and proper rate of commission had already been taken into account when the parties stipulated to judgment, but, during a deposition, in discussing the stipulation, the defendant admitted that the judgment amount was correct and that she had the opportunity to review the stipulation for one to two days before signing it and when no further evidence was produced to support the claim that the judgment amount was inaccurate. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM), Inc. v. Gallen, 20 FSM R. 3, 6 (Pon. 2015).

Relief from judgment will not be granted when the defendants' arguments brought pursuant to subsections 60(b)(1), (2), and (3) are well outside the one-year time constraint and are thus untimely and when the defendants' remaining affirmations fail to demonstrate any other reason justifying relief. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 88 (Pon. 2015).

The movants do not qualify for a suspension of the proceedings when they do not deny the debt and therefore fail to denote that they are likely to prevail on the merits of the accompanying Rule 60(b) motion; when there has been an inadequate showing that irreparable harm will befall the movants without the stay; when they have made no attempt to meet their obligation under the mortgage even though the executed mortgage pledged the subject parcels as security; when the coveted issuance of a stay would further delay the plaintiff's ability to recoup money due and owing, as reflected in the judgment(s) that have languished for an inordinate length of time, coupled with the fact that the deterioration of the mortgaged buildings is inevitable with the passage of time, thereby adversely impacting the value of the mortgaged property; and when the stay could set a troubling public policy precedent by allowing other debtors to stave off satisfaction of final judgments when an underlying justification for suspension of proceedings has not been adequately depicted. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 89 (Pon. 2015).

A motion sounding in an attorney's purported negligence does not constitute a basis for Rule 60(b) relief from judgment, as clients are held accountable for their attorney's acts or omissions. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 103 (Chk. 2015).

In its discretion and on such condition for the adverse party's security as is proper, the court may, pending the disposition of a Rule 60 motion for relief from judgment, stay the execution of any proceeding to enforce a judgment. The criteria to be utilized when determining the propriety of a stay are: 1) whether the applicant has made a strong showing that the applicant is likely to prevail on the merits; 2) whether the applicant has shown that without a stay, the applicant will be irreparably harmed; 3) whether the stay's issuance would substantially harm other parties interested in the proceedings and 4) whether the public interest would be served by granting the stay. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104 (Chk. 2015).

A motion to stay will be denied when the defendants' arguments have failed to denote a likelihood of prevailing on the merits of their Rule 60(b) motions; when there has been an inadequate showing that irreparable harm will befall them without a stay, as they do not dispute the debt but have made no attempt to meet their obligation with respect to the outstanding judgment; when the stay's issuance would further delay the plaintiff's ability to recoup monies due and owing, as reflected in the judgment that has been languishing for an inordinate length of time; and when a stay could conceivably set a troubling public policy precedent, in terms of allowing other debtors to stave off satisfaction of final judgments although an underlying justification for a suspension has not been adequately shown. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 104-05 (Chk. 2015).

A motion for a new trial or for relief from judgment will be denied when none of the purported "newly discovered evidence" that it relies upon qualifies as newly discovered evidence which by due diligence could not have been discovered earlier. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 176-77 (Kos. 2015).

Evidence, that by its very nature, was in the plaintiff's possession the whole time cannot be considered "newly discovered" evidence especially when the motion for a new trial or relief from judgment does not address the plaintiff's complete failure to produce the evidence at trial. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. 2015).

A judgment is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 289 (Pon. 2016).

Whether a default judgment granted relief not prayed for in the complaint's demand for judgment; whether the guaranties that were signed were not attached to the promissory notes; whether the judgment was joint and several; and whether one of the guaranties was not signed by the person it should have been signed by but was fraudulently signed by another person, are not determinants of subject-matter jurisdiction. While they may be raised as defenses, none of these grounds is jurisdictional. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 290 (Pon. 2016).

When none of the movants' asserted grounds would alter the case's nature or the type of relief sought because the court had jurisdiction over the case's nature – enforcement and collection of defaulted FSM Development Bank loans – and had, under 4 F.S.M.C. 117, the power to grant the relief sought (including mortgage foreclosure) and when none of the movants' grounds would change that or would have limited the court's ability to rule on parties' conduct or the status of debt and grant relief or judgment in any party's (including any defendant's) favor, the court had full jurisdiction over the case's subject matter even if the defenses had been raised before judgment. A motion for relief from judgment on the ground the court lacked subject-matter jurisdiction will be denied on this ground alone. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 290 (Pon. 2016).

Rule 60(b)(6) is a grand reservoir of equitable power to do justice in a particular case, subject to the requirement that the provision is applicable only when there is a basis for relief different from those enumerated in subsections (1) through (5) of Rule 60(b), and when extraordinary circumstances exist for justifying relief. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 459 (Pon. 2016).

The "extraordinary circumstances" required for Rule 60(b)(6) relief usually means that the movant himself or herself was not at fault for his or her predicament, and conversely, the usual implication of fault on the movant's part is that there are no "extraordinary circumstances." Relief under Rule 60 is simply not appropriate where a party has demonstrated a pattern of delay and neglect. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 459 (Pon. 2016).

Rule 60(b) is not meant to relieve a party from its own carelessness and neglect, or from its counsel's carelessness and neglect. Rule 60(b) relief is precluded when the complained of injuries result solely from the carelessness or neglect of the moving party, or of the moving party's counsel, except when the neglect itself is excusable under FSM Civil Rule 60(b)(1). In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 459 (Pon. 2016).

With the exception of void judgments under Rule 60(b)(4), the grant or denial of relief under Rule 60 rests with the trial court's sound discretion, but that discretion is not an arbitrary one to be capriciously exercised, but a sound legal discretion guided by accepted legal principles, and the factors that should inform the court's consideration are: 1) that final judgments should not lightly be disturbed; 2) that the Rule 60(b) motion is not to be used as a substitute for appeal; 3) that the rule should be liberally construed in order to achieve substantial justice; 4) whether the motion was made within a reasonable time; 5) whether (if the judgment was a default or a dismissal in which the merits were not considered) the interest in deciding cases on the merits outweighs, in the particular case, the interest in the finality of judgments, and there is merit in the movant's claim or defense; 6) whether if the judgment was rendered after a trial on the merits the movant had a fair opportunity to present his claim or defense; 7) whether there are intervening equities that would make it inequitable to grant relief; and 8) any other factors relevant to the justice of the judgment under attack. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 460 & n.3 (Pon. 2016).

Rule 60(b) is not intended as a substitute for a direct appeal from an erroneous judgment. The fact that a judgment is erroneous does not constitute a ground for relief under the Rule. Nor is Rule 60(b) designed to circumvent the policy evidenced by the rule limiting the time for appeal. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 460 (Pon. 2016).

Although the term "void" describes a result, rather than the conditions that render a judgment unenforceable, a void judgment is one so affected by a fundamental infirmity that the infirmity may be raised after the judgment becomes final. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

A judgment is void and therefore subject to relief under Rule 60(b)(4), only if the court that rendered judgment lacked jurisdiction or in circumstances in which the court's action amounted to a plain usurpation of power constituting a violation of due process. The total want of jurisdiction must be distinguished from an error in the exercise of jurisdiction and only rare instances of a clear usurpation of power will render a judgment void. In other words, a court has the power to determine its own jurisdiction and an error in that determination will not render the judgment void. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 508 (App. 2016).

Generally, attorney negligence is not a basis for Rule 60(b)(1) relief. Since, parties may freely choose their attorneys and should not be allowed to avoid the ramification of their chosen counsel's acts or omissions, to grant relief under Rule 60(b)(1) for attorney negligence would penalize the nonmoving party for the negligent conduct of the moving party's counsel. Johnson v. Rosario, 21 FSM R. 7, 11 (Pon. 2016).

Keeping a suit alive merely because the plaintiff should not be penalized for the omissions of his own attorney would be visiting the sins of the plaintiff's lawyer upon the defendant. Johnson v. Rosario, 21 FSM R. 7, 12 (Pon. 2016).

Relief under Rule 60(b)(6) is reserved for "extraordinary circumstances." Subsection (6) is a grand reservoir of equitable power to do justice in a particular case, subject to the requirement that it is applicable only when there is a basis for relief different from those enumerated in subsections (1) through (5) of Rule 60(b), and to the requirement that "extraordinary circumstances" exist for justifying relief. Johnson v. Rosario, 21 FSM R. 7, 12 (Pon. 2016).

"Extraordinary circumstances" justifying relief under Rule 60(b)(6) means that the movant himself was not at fault for his predicament, and conversely, the usual implication of fault on the movant's part is that there are no "extraordinary circumstances." Johnson v. Rosario, 21 FSM R. 7, 12 (Pon. 2016).

The dilatory approach exhibited by not filing a substitution motion, even though the named plaintiff passed away almost three and a half years earlier, coupled with a representation that "a probate needs to be filed" in the future, is clearly not the type of "extraordinary circumstances" contemplated by Civil Rule 60(b)(6) for relief from judgment. Johnson v. Rosario, 21 FSM R. 7, 13 (Pon. 2016).

A self-proclaimed obliviousness, in failing to make a motion to substitute once the plaintiff's death was suggested on the record, is not a "mistake" justifying relief under Civil Rule 60(b)(1). Neither was it "extraordinary circumstances" justifying relief under Civil Rule 60(b)(6), since the failure to file the relevant motion for substitution was attributable solely to the movant. The defendants should not be expected to endure the prejudicial repercussions attendant to the plaintiff's disproportionate tardiness. Johnson v. Rosario, 21 FSM R. 7, 13-14 (Pon. 2016).

It is well established, that when a judgment has been entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard, it is void and subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 121 (App. 2017).

Under Civil Rule 60(b)(1), the trial court may relieve a party from a final judgment based on mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or neglect. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 385 (App. 2017).

Stipulated judgments, while they are judicial acts, also have many attributes of voluntarily-undertaken contracts, and when the parties have made a freely calculated, deliberate choice to submit to an agreed upon judgment rather than seek a more favorable litigated outcome (or risk a less favorable litigated outcome), the burden under Rule 60(b) is probably more formidable than had they litigated and lost. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 386 (App. 2017).

When the movant's evidence that the judgment amount was a mistake was inadequate, the trial court's denial of her Rule 60(b)(1) motion was not an abuse of discretion, since one of the basic tenets of our system of jurisprudence is that of finality of judgments. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 386 (App. 2017).

Even when the unjust enrichment remedy is otherwise available to a judgment-debtor claiming an inaccurate judgment amount, she would still need to first prevail on her Rule 60(b)(1) motion (based on mistake), before the unjust enrichment doctrine could become a viable remedy. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 386 (App. 2017).

The denial of a Rule 60(b) motion does not bring up the underlying judgment for review. The appellate court's review is limited to whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying the Rule 60(b) motion because Rule 60(b) is not a substitute for a direct appeal from an erroneous judgment. That a judgment is erroneous does not constitute a ground for relief under the Rule. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 514 (App. 2018).

That rental payments may have been diverted is not a ground for relief from judgments that were entered years before that diversion. At most, the judgment-debtors would have an argument about the amount outstanding on the judgments. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

A motion may seek timely Rule 60(b)(1) relief when it seeks relief from a recent order in aid of judgment, and not from the judgment itself. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

A claim that the FSM Development Bank should not be trying to make a profit is neither a ground for relief from judgment nor a meritorious defense. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 519 (App. 2018).

When the appellants' reasons were not sufficient to justify vacating the default judgments under the Rules generally available to them, Rule 60(b)(4) and 60(b)(6), and when they failed to show a meritorious defense, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it denied their motion for relief from judgment. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 519 (App. 2018).

An order that Pohnpei seek an earthmoving permit to remove a dredging berm was a final decision because it ended the litigation and did not contemplate further court action other than the enforcement of that order. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 300, 302 (Pon. 2019).

Under Civil Procedure Rule 60(b)(5), a party may obtain relief from a judgment or a final order when 1) the judgment has been satisfied, released, or discharged, or 2) a prior judgment upon which it is based has been reversed or otherwise vacated, or 3) it is no longer equitable that the judgment should have prospective application. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 300, 303 (Pon. 2019).

The Rule 60(b)(5) provision that permits relief from a final order or judgment on the ground that it is no longer equitable that the judgment have prospective application, properly applies only to final decisions with prospective effect. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 300, 303 (Pon. 2019).

Rule 60(b)(5) may not be used to challenge the legal conclusions on which a prior judgment or order rests, but the Rule provides a means by which a party can ask a court to modify or vacate a judgment or order if a significant change either in factual conditions or in law renders continued enforcement detrimental to the public interest. The party seeking relief bears the burden of establishing that changed circumstances warrant relief, but once that party carries this burden, a court abuses its discretion when it refuses to modify an order in light of such changes. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 300, 303 (Pon. 2019).

The movants have established that significantly changed circumstances warrant relief under Rule 60(b)(5) when the significant changes in the factual conditions of the dredging berm make it no longer equitable that the 1991 administrative agency decision and the dredging permit conditions have prospective application and when the changed circumstances have rendered the enforcement of the final order that the defendants seek a permit to remove the dredging berm detrimental to the public interest. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 300, 304 (Pon. 2019).

Relief under Rule 60(b)(6) is reserved only for extraordinary circumstances. It is the grand reservoir of equitable power to do justice in a particular case, subject to the requirement that the provision is applicable only when the basis for relief is different from those enumerated in Rule 60(b) subsections (1) through (5), and to the requirement that extraordinary circumstances exist for justifying relief. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

Extraordinary circumstances usually means that the movant himself was not at fault for his predicament, but if there was fault on the movant's part, the usual implication is that there are no extraordinary circumstances. Even then, a motion for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(6) must still be filed within a reasonable time. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

An allegation of neglect, which, if it were shown to be excusable, would be a ground for relief under Rule 60(b)(1), but when the one-year time limit for Rule 60(b)(1) relief expired long before the defendant filed his motion for relief, the defendant cannot use Rule 60(b)(6) to circumvent the Rule 60(b)(1) time limit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

A client is responsible for his attorney's actions, inactions, or omissions. Rule 60(b) is not meant to relieve a party from its own carelessness and neglect, or from his counsel's carelessness and neglect. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 593 (Kos. 2020).

Rule 60(b) relief is precluded when the injuries complained of result solely from the movant's carelessness or neglect, or from his counsel's carelessness or neglect, except when the neglect itself is excusable under FSM Civil Rule 60(b)(1). FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 593 (Kos. 2020).

Equitable estoppel (and unclean hands) is based on the other party's alleged misrepresentation or misconduct, this ground for relief can only be sought through Rule 60(b)(3), and that rule, as noted above, has a one-year absolute time limit, and that time limit expired four and a half months before the defendant filed his motion. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 594-95 (Kos. 2020).

Primarily salient to an analysis of an excusable neglect assertion are: 1) an explanation of the movant's diligent and good faith efforts and 2) the lack of prejudice to the opposing party, but good-faith efforts and lack of prejudice are not enough to justify a finding of excusable neglect. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 604 (Pon. 2020).

In a close case, it is probably best for the court to err on the side of caution and call the neglect excusable. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 604 (Pon. 2020).

– Relief from Judgment – Independent Actions

Where there are one or more legal remedies still available to a litigant the trial court has no jurisdiction to grant relief from a judgment through an independent action in equity. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Trial courts have jurisdiction to set aside judgments either by a Rule 60 relief from judgment motion or by an independent action in equity. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

There are five essential elements to an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment. They are 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. If any one of these elements is missing the court cannot take equitable jurisdiction of the case. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

In appropriate circumstances, a court will invoke its equitable jurisdiction and will permit an independent action to set aside a prior judgment. Union Indus. Co. v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 242, 245 (Pon. 1995).

Where an identical action was dismissed with prejudice, the parties were represented by competent counsel, and defendant relied upon the dismissal of the prior action as a final and unequivocal resolution of both parties' claims, it would be inequitable to allow the plaintiff to relitigate the issue. Union Indus. Co. v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 242, 245 (Pon. 1995).

Chuuk state trial courts have jurisdiction to set aside judgments either by a Rule 60 relief from judgment motion or by an independent action in equity. The FSM Supreme Court trial division therefore also has the power in a proper case to entertain an independent action for relief from a state court judgment. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 189-90 (Chk. 2003).

There are five essential elements to an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the defendant's part; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 190 (Chk. 2003).

Relief from a judgment may be sought either by a Rule 60(b) motion or by an independent action – through filing a separate case. It cannot be sought by both. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 636 (Pon. 2008).

It is not the function of an independent action to relitigate issues finally determined in another action between the parties. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 636 n.8 (Pon. 2008).

When the defendants have not filed their Rule 60(b) motion seeking relief in a separate action in equity collaterally attacking the judgment, but have instead filed it as a post-judgment motion in the original case, the motion may only be treated as a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment, and not as an independent action, despite the defendants styling their motion as one "in the nature of an independent action." FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 636 (Pon. 2008).

Resort to an independent action may be had only rarely, and then only under unusual and exceptional circumstances. The defendants must satisfy all five of an independent action's elements, which are: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the defendant's part; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 636 (Pon. 2008).

Rule 60(b) permits only motions for relief from judgment under that rule or independent actions. There is no such motion as one in the nature of an independent equitable action for relief filed in the original case. If a party wishes to seek relief through an independent action, it must file a separate independent action. If a party files a motion in the case in which the judgment was issued, it is a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 139 (Pon. 2008).

When an independent action's only purpose is to obtain relief from the judgment in another case; when certain named defendants were not parties in that other case, are not judgment-creditors in that other case, and have neither the power nor the authority to enforce that judgment since none of them has a judgment against the judgment-debtors and none of them is a successor-in-interest to that judgment's judgment-creditor; and when that judgment has not been assigned to any of them and thus, none of them can enforce the judgment, the independent action's complaint, as a matter of law, fails to state a claim against those certain named defendants upon which relief may be granted. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 594-95 (Pon. 2009).

Whether certain named defendants can be ordered to order a judgment-creditor to cease collection efforts is pointless and meaningless since the court can, if the right to such relief were shown, vacate the challenged judgment and directly order the judgment-creditor, the only entity with the authority to collect the judgment, to cease collection efforts. If a judgment in an independent action vacates a judgment-creditor's judgment it would grant all of the relief sought, the other named defendants are thus neither necessary nor indispensable parties without whom complete relief cannot be granted. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 595 (Pon. 2009).

Generally, claimants seeking equitable relief through an independent action must meet three requirements. They must 1) show that they have no other available or adequate remedy; 2) demonstrate that their own fault, neglect, or carelessness did not create the situation for which they seek equitable relief; and 3) establish a recognized ground–such as fraud, accident, or mistake–for equitable relief. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 596 (Pon. 2009).

Generally, relief from a judgment may be sought either by a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment filed in the original case or by a separate, independent action (a new case), but it cannot be sought by both. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 596 (Pon. 2009).

There is some authority that if a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment is denied solely as untimely, that denial does not act as res judicata precluding an independent action since the denial was not on the merits. Otherwise the two Rule 60(b) remedies (motion or independent action) are alternative, not cumulative, remedies, and res judicata applies to successive Rule 60(b) motions and independent Rule 60(b) actions. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 596 (Pon. 2009).

When the denial of a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment was not only on the ground that the motion was untimely, but also analyzed the merits of the grounds for relief and denied it on the merits of those grounds as well, summary judgment could be granted solely on the ground that the later independent action is precluded by the court's earlier denial on the merits of the motion. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 596-97 (Pon. 2009).

The plaintiffs in an independent action have the burden to allege such fraud as to support an independent action for relief from judgment. Without the existence of the requisite fraud, an independent action in equity may not be brought. Instead, res judicata prevails. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 597 (Pon. 2009).

An independent action cannot be used to withdraw a party's stipulation to the facts (or to have the court ignore their prior stipulation to the facts) and to then relitigate those issues since an independent action is not a vehicle for the relitigation of issues. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 599 (Pon. 2009).

An independent action cannot be made a vehicle for relitigation of issues. A party is precluded by res judicata from relitigation in the independent equitable action issues that were open to litigation in the former action where he had a fair opportunity to make his claim or defense in that action. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 599-600 (Pon. 2009).

When it is clear that an "independent action" is only an attempt to relitigate issues already litigated and decided by a trial court and affirmed by the appellate court and when the "fraud" allegation is merely an attempt to cast the same facts and claims in a different light in order to try to sneak under the bar of res judicata, there are no material facts genuinely in dispute and, as a matter of law, the independent action is barred by res judicata. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 600 (Pon. 2009).

Rule 60(b) permits an independent action for relief from a judgment based upon fraud upon the court. Fraud upon the court is defined as the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or fabrication of evidence by counsel, which must be supported by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 600 n.14 (Pon. 2009).

It is not important whether the trial judge considered the attack upon the judgment under 60(b) or as an independent equitable action, if based on all the evidence the trial judge in the exercise of his judicial and equitable discretion, denied relief. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 658 (App. 2009).

An independent action in equity to set aside a judgment must satisfy five essential elements: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident, or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. If any one of these elements is missing the court cannot take equitable jurisdiction of the case. Arthur v. FSM Dev. Bank, 16 FSM R. 653, 659 (App. 2009).

There are only three methods by which judgment-debtors may have a judgment against them set aside. One is to appeal the judgment and convince the appellate court to reverse it. The second is a motion for relief from judgment as provided for in Civil Procedure Rule 60(b). The third is an independent action in equity (as acknowledged in Rule 60(b)) to set aside a judgment. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 11 & n.5 (Pon. 2011).

In an appropriate case, the Kosrae State Court has the power to grant a party relief from a Trust Territory High Court judgment through an independent action in equity. This has even been acknowledged by treaty with the United States. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

Kosrae Civil Procedure Rule 60(b) does not limit the power of the court to entertain an independent action. A party collaterally attacking a judgment has the burden to establish its prerequisites. The five essential elements that an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment must satisfy are: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident, or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. If any one of the elements is missing the court cannot take equitable jurisdiction of the case. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 341 (App. 2014).

Although Rule 60(b) does not limit the court's power to entertain an independent action to relieve a party from a judgment, the procedure for obtaining any relief from a judgment is either by a Rule 60(b) motion or by an independent action; not by both. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 72 (Pon. 2015).

The mere filing of an independent action for relief is not in itself a ground for relief of any kind. Just as a Rule 60(b) motion does not affect the finality of a judgment or suspend its operation, an independent action's filing does not affect the judgment's finality or suspend its operation. An independent action is just that – independent of the case in which the judgment was entered unless and until a final judgment in the independent action grants relief from the judgment. The independent action proceeds on its own. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 72 (Pon. 2015).

The filing of an independent action is not a ground for a stay of judgment. It cannot be the basis for a stay since its filing does not affect or suspend the judgment's operation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 72 (Pon. 2015).

When the plaintiffs have already opted to seek the same relief via a Rule 60(b) motion, the present complaint is therefore an independent cause of action, and since a party seeking relief from a judgment is constrained to choosing, either a Rule 60(b) motion or an independent cause of action, the plaintiffs are thereby precluded from bringing the ostensibly redundant cause of action at hand. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 241 (Pon. 2015).

An independent action seeking equitable relief, must satisfy five (5) essential elements: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident, or mistake, which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the defendant's part and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. Since the components are prescribed in the conjunctive, if any one of these factors are absent, the court cannot take equitable jurisdiction of the case. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 241 (Pon. 2015).

An independent action cannot be made a vehicle for relitigation of issues. A party is precluded by res judicata from relitigation in the independent equitable action that were open to litigation in the former action, where he had a far opportunity to make his claim or defense in that action. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 241-42 (Pon. 2015).

Allegations in an independent action, which could have been previously broached consequently run counter to the doctrine of res judicata. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 243 (Pon. 2015).

Having already utilized a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment, the plaintiffs are not entitled to pursue a later independent cause of action to obtain relief because a party is limited to employing only one of these strategies. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 244 (Pon. 2015).

The mere filing of an independent action for relief, is not in itself a ground for relief of any kind. Such a filing does not affect the judgment's finality or suspend its operation. Nor is the filing of an independent action a ground for stay. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 315, 319 (Pon. 2016).

Parties are precluded from seeking relief from a judgment via an independent cause of action, after having previously chosen to utilize a Civil Rule 60(b) motion toward that end. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 320, 323 (Pon. 2016).

An independent action which seeks to belatedly stave off the transfer of land ownership, concerning the same property at issue in the previous actions, constitutes a redundant attempt that is prohibited under earlier case law, and as such, that proscription presents another hurdle, which this action cannot overcome. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 40 (Pon. 2016).

An independent action in equity to set aside a judgment must satisfy five essential elements: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident, or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 121 (App. 2017).

A collateral attack is not an opportunity to appeal or relitigate the matter. Merely leveling a claim of fraud, without connecting up such an allegation in terms of propounding sufficient evidence, does not satisfy the requisite burden of proof for a collateral attack of a Trust Territory judgment and fails to satisfy the five-prong test required to pierce a judgment via a collateral attack. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 122 (App. 2017).

An independent action in equity to set aside a judgment must satisfy five elements: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident or mistake, which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the defendant's part; and 5) the absence of an adequate remedy at law. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 312-13 (App. 2017).

When an independent action for relief from judgment fails, then res judicata applies. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 314 (App. 2017).

An appellate court reviews, under an abuse of discretion standard, a trial court's grant or denial of relief in an independent action to set aside a judgment. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 552 (App. 2018).

An independent action is a rare and unusual case. Resort to an independent action may be had only rarely, and then only under unusual and exceptional circumstances. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 552 (App. 2018).

An independent action in equity to set aside a judgment must satisfy five essential elements: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident, or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 552 (App. 2018).

Relief from a judgment may be sought either by a Rule 60(b) motion or by an independent action – through filing a separate case. It cannot be sought by both. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 552 (App. 2018).

An independent action to set aside a judgment made after a Rule 60(b) motion is denied, should be permitted only if it is made on a ground different from the ground in the denied Rule 60(b) motion. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 553 (App. 2018).

If a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment is denied solely as untimely, that denial does not act as res judicata precluding an independent action since the denial was not on the merits. A Rule 60(b)(1) motion's denial solely on the ground that the absolute time limit of one year precluded consideration of the merits of the grounds presented does not preclude a prompt independent action for relief in the same court. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 553 (App. 2018).

For an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment there are no time limits; the general statutes of limitation do not apply. Rule 60(b) permits an independent action and prescribes no time limitations for such action. In the absence of a controlling statute, the only time limitation is the equitable doctrine of laches. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 554 (App. 2018).

There is no time limit on when an independent action may be brought, but the doctrine of laches is applicable and undue delay may bar relief. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 554 (App. 2018).

An underlying judgment's res judicata effect is not a proper defense to, or an appropriate ground on which to grant a dismissal of, an independent action because an independent action seeks to set aside a judgment in another case that is presumed to be final and res judicata unless the independent action succeeds. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

The denial of a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment may have res judicata effect on a subsequent independent action to set aside a judgment, if the subsequent action is brought on the same ground as the earlier motion. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

When a decedent's estate does not own the property and has no interest in it (since it has been "probated"), a cause of action for interference with its ownership rights fails to state a claim on which the court could grant relief and does not constitute a good defense to set aside the judgments. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

Rule 9(b) requires that, in allegations of fraud, the circumstances constituting the fraud must be pled with particularity. When fraud is alleged, particularity is a pleading requirement that applies with equal force to independent actions brought under Rule 60(b). Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 556 (App. 2018).

Gross negligence and tortious interference with business relations and lost business opportunities and profits claims based on a decedent's estate owning the property and being under a probate court's supervision so that the bank's foreclosure wrongfully interferes with their business, fail to state claims on which the court could grant relief and do not constitute a good defense to set aside the bank's judgments when the decedent's estate does not own the property. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 557-58 (App.

The absence of any one essential element of an independent action precludes relief. In particular, the failure to show the essential element of a good defense, precludes relief. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 558 (App. 2018).

The element requiring the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the party seeking to set aside a judgment is more stringent in an independent action in equity than in a Rule 60(b) motion for relief. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 558 (App. 2018).

When, if the plaintiffs' "causes of action" were not good defenses but rather separate claims, they would have been compulsory counterclaims that would have had to have been raised as counterclaims in the answer. They cannot sit idly by while the bank's promissory note claim goes to a default judgment and then later raise the compulsory counterclaims as defenses warranting relief in an independent action. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 558 (App. 2018).

Neither the presence of other defendants, who were in privity with the defendant and who were nominal parties, nor the plaintiffs' request for an injunction to prevent the enforcement of the earlier judgment, change the nature of the action from one seeking independent relief from that earlier judgment. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

A new lawsuit obviously cannot be a motion to reopen a case under Bankruptcy Rule 9024 (or for relief from judgment under Civil Procedure Rule 60), since such a motion would necessarily be filed in the original bankruptcy case, but Civil Procedure Rule 60 (and thus Bankruptcy Rule 9024) authorizes one other procedure for relief – an independent action for relief. Rule 60(b) does not limit a court's power to entertain an independent action to relieve a party from a judgment. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 357 (Pon. 2019).

When the debtor's administratrix named only the bankruptcy receiver as the sole defendant, she would have standing in the action, to recover alleged overpayments to the receiver, but to recover alleged overpayments to the creditors, she would have to proceed against those creditors. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 357 (Pon. 2019).

For an independent action for relief, no statute of limitations would apply because there is no time limit on when an independent action may be brought, but the doctrine of laches is applicable and undue delay can bar relief. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 (Pon. 2019).

Res judicata would bar any suit by an administratrix of a decedent's estate, over a closed bankruptcy proceeding unless the suit is an independent action for relief because an independent action seeks to set aside a judgment in another case that is presumed to be final and res judicata unless the independent action succeeds. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 359 (Pon. 2019).

A suit that seeks to vacate or alter the bankruptcy court's orders in the bankruptcy case, but is not a motion to reopen that case under either Bankruptcy Rule 5010 or 9024, could be an independent action for relief as allowed by Bankruptcy Rule 9024 adopting Civil Procedure Rule 60(b) by reference. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 359 (Pon. 2019).

Under FSM case law, an independent action to set aside a judgment or final order must satisfy five essential elements: 1) a judgment which ought not, in equity and good conscience, to be enforced; 2) a good defense to the alleged cause of action on which the judgment is founded; 3) fraud, accident, or mistake which prevented the defendant in the judgment (who would be the plaintiff in an independent action) from obtaining the benefit of his defense; 4) the absence of fault or negligence on the part of the defendant; and 5) the absence of any adequate remedy at law. If any element is missing, the court cannot take equitable jurisdiction of the case. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 359 (Pon. 2019).

If Rule 60(b) is to be interpreted as a coherent whole, independent actions must be reserved for those cases of injustices which, in certain instances, are deemed sufficiently gross to demand departure from rigid adherence to the doctrine of res judicata. Due to the universal interest in the finality of judgments, resort to an independent action is only permitted under unusual and exceptional circumstances. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 359 (Pon. 2019).

A court will not grant relief if the complaining party has or by exercising proper diligence would have had, an adequate remedy at law, or by proceedings in the original action to open, vacate, or otherwise obtain relief against, the judgment. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 359-60 (Pon. 2019).

When the proponent's own fault, negligence, or carelessness, however innocent, contributed to the entry of the original judgment, an independent action for relief is improper unless the evidence to establish injustice is practically conclusive. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 360 (Pon. 2019).

If a fraud allegation, that failed to adequately plead a regular fraud cause of action, was meant to be an allegation of fraud on the court, which is a further ground to set aside a judgment that Bankruptcy Rule 9024 (by adopting Civil Procedure Rule 60) permits to be brought in an independent action, that allegation will also be wanting because the doctrine of fraud upon the court is narrow and limited in scope and not every allegation of fraud rises to the level of fraud upon the court. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

A finding of fraud on the court is justified only by the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or fabrication of evidence by counsel, and must be supported by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

A grant of relief for fraud on the court ordinarily requires that: 1) the fraud is directed to the judicial machinery itself and is not fraud between the parties or fraudulent documents, false statements or perjury; 2) the fraud involves the most egregious conduct, such as bribery of a judge or the fabrication of evidence in which an attorney is implicated; and 3) the party perpetrating the fraud acted with an intent to deceive or defraud the court. Further, the fraud must have actually deceived the court. These requirements are strictly applied because a finding of fraud on the court is exempt from time limits and because it permits the severe consequence of allowing a party to overturn the finality of a judgment. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

– Relief from Judgment – Time Limits

A motion for relief of a partial summary judgment under Civil Rule 59(e) is subject to a strict time limit of 10 days which cannot be enlarged by the court. Such a motion filed 10 months later is untimely. This very strict deadline cannot be avoided by an unsupported assertion that a copy of the judgment was not served. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (II), 6 FSM R. 354, 355-56 (Pon. 1994).

When a motion for relief from judgment is made pursuant to Civil Rule 60(b)(1), (2), or (3) the court must consider whether it was made within a reasonable time even when it is made within the one year time limit. Senda v. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 6 FSM R. 440, 445-46 (App. 1994).

Even where a request for Rule 60(b) relief is filed within the stated one-year time limit, a court still must examine whether the filing was made within a "reasonable time." In determining this issue, the court reviews all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the case and may require the party seeking Rule 60 relief to offer a sufficient explanation for not having taken appropriate action in a more timely manner. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Senda, 7 FSM R. 129, 136 (Pon. 1995).

When a motion for relief from judgment is made pursuant to Civil Rule 60(b)(1), a court must first consider whether it was made within a reasonable time even when it is made within the one year time limit. To determine if the time was reasonable it considers whether the nonmoving party was prejudiced and whether the moving party had some good reason for his failure to take appropriate action sooner. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 518 (Chk. 1996).

The time for making a motion for relief from judgment continues to run even while the case is on appeal. Walter v. Meippen, 7 FSM R. 515, 518 (Chk. 1996).

A motion for relief from judgment cannot be brought under Rule 60(b) subsections (1), (2), or (3) when it is more than one year after the judgment. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 600 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

A motion for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b) allows the court to consider a motion for relief from a final judgment for several listed reasons, but such a motion must be made within a reasonable time not more than one year after judgment was entered or taken. When the decision was entered nearly three years ago, the one year deadline in which to file a Rule 60(b) motion has long since expired and the motion is thus untimely and must also be rejected on that basis. Edwin v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 12 FSM R. 220, 222 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

There is no time limit on relief from a void judgment. The reason for this is obvious. If a judgment is void when issued, it is always void. When relief is sought from a void judgment, a court has no discretion but must grant relief from judgment. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 389 (Chk. 2005).

There is no time limit to seek relief from a void judgment because if a judgment is void when issued, it is always void, and when relief is sought from a void judgment, a court has no discretion but must grant relief from judgment. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 112 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A Rule 60(b) motion must be made within a reasonable time, and for reasons (1), (2), and (3) not more than one year after the judgment, order, or proceeding was entered or taken. The one-year time limit is not suspended by the pendency of an appeal because a Rule 60(b) motion can be made even though an appeal has been taken and is pending. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 632-32 (Pon. 2008).

The court is powerless to enlarge the one-year time limit to obtain relief from judgment under Rule 60(b) (1), (2), or (3) even if relief had been possible, and the concept of reasonable time cannot be used to extend the one-year limit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 632 (Pon. 2008).

Courts that have held that a court's legal error can be considered a "mistake" subject to relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(1), have ruled that "reasonable time" to seek relief in those cases cannot exceed the time in which an appeal might have been timely filed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 632 n.4 (Pon. 2008).

There is no time limit to seek relief from a void judgment under Rule 60(b)(4). FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2008).

Motions for relief from judgment for Rule 60(b) reasons (5) and (6) must be made within a reasonable time. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2008).

A factor to be considered in determining whether Rule 60(b) relief has been sought within a reasonable time is whether good reason has been presented for failure to act sooner. Courts have been unyielding in requiring that a party show good reason for the failure to take appropriate action sooner. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2008).

When the defendants have not shown good reason for waiting until March 2008 to seek relief from a 2004 judgment that was affirmed in 2006, the defendants have not moved for relief from judgment "within a reasonable time" as required and their motion to vacate the judgment can be denied on this ground alone. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2008).

Rule 60(b)(6) cannot be used to circumvent the one-year time limit for motions for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b) reasons (1), (2), and (3). FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 634 (Pon. 2008).

By moving to vacate a judgment, the movants automatically raise the issue of whether they had filed their motion within a reasonable time because a motion to vacate judgment made more than ten days after judgment is entered is a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment and Rule 60(b) requires that all motions for relief from judgment be made in a reasonable time. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 138-39 (Pon. 2008).

The court has no need to address the question posed by the movants in a motion to vacate judgment when the movants had to first surmount the hurdle of whether the motion to vacate judgment was filed within a reasonable time, and they could not. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 16 FSM R. 132, 139 (Pon. 2008).

Rule 60(b) requires that the movant explain why the seven-month lapse between the dismissal of his case and the motion for relief constitutes a reasonable time within which to make the motion for relief from judgment. Aake v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 607, 608 (Chk. 2009).

By moving to vacate a judgment, a movant automatically raises the issue of whether the motion is filed within a reasonable time because Rule 60(b) requires that all motions for relief from judgment be made in a reasonable time. A movant must explain why the lapse between the judgment in, or the dismissal of, the case and his motion for relief from judgment constitutes a reasonable time within which to move for relief from judgment. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 203, 205 (Chk. 2012).

A factor the court must consider when determining whether Rule 60(b) relief has been sought within a reasonable time is whether good reason has been presented for failure to act sooner. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 203, 205 (Chk. 2012).

Courts have been unyielding in requiring that a party show good reason for the failure to take appropriate action sooner. When a movant has not shown good reason for waiting to seek relief, the movant has not moved for relief from judgment "within a reasonable time" as required and the motion to vacate the judgment can be denied on this ground alone. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 203, 205 (Chk. 2012).

A court need not address a movant's claims in a motion to vacate judgment when the movant had to first surmount the hurdle of whether the motion for relief from judgment was filed within a reasonable time, and the movant could not. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 203, 205 (Chk. 2012).

When a movant has not shown why the six-month lapse between the summary judgment and his motion for relief from judgment is a reasonable time and has not given any reason for the delay, he has not shown that his motion was filed within a reasonable time and his motion for relief must therefore be denied. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 203, 205-06 (Chk. 2012).

When a motion for relief from judgment is made pursuant to Rule 60(b)(1), a court must first consider whether it was made within a reasonable time even when it is made within the one year time limit. To determine if the time was reasonable, it considers whether the nonmoving party was prejudiced and whether the moving party had some good reason for his failure to take appropriate action sooner. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 69 (Pon. 2013).

When a motion for relief from judgment is made pursuant to Civil Rule 60(b)(1), (2), or (3), a court must first consider whether it was made within a reasonable time even when it is made within the one year time limit. To determine if the time was reasonable, the court considers whether the nonmoving party was prejudiced and whether the moving party had some good reason for his failure to take appropriate action sooner. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM), Inc. v. Gallen, 20 FSM R. 3, 5 (Pon. 2015).

Four months may be a reasonable time for a defendant to seek relief from judgment when the defendant was pro se and the plaintiff was not prejudiced by the delay. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM), Inc. v. Gallen, 20 FSM R. 3, 6 (Pon. 2015).

A motion for relief from judgment must be made within a reasonable time and for most reasons, that time cannot exceed one year. Even if the reason given were one for which reasonable time greater than one year was allowed, a motion sixteen years after judgment, is not made within a reasonable time. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 72 (Pon. 2015).

Rule 60(b)(6) motions are reserved for extraordinary circumstances. Since Rule 60(b)(6), which delineates "any other reason justifying relief" and the other Rule 60(b) subsections are mutually exclusive, Rule 60(b)(6) cannot be utilized to circumvent the one-year time limit for motions seeking relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(1), (2), and (3). FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 88 (Pon. 2015).

Relief from judgment will not be granted when the defendants' arguments brought pursuant to subsections 60(b)(1), (2), and (3) are well outside the one-year time constraint and are thus untimely and when the defendants' remaining affirmations fail to demonstrate any other reason justifying relief. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 88 (Pon. 2015).

An April 4, 2014 motion for relief from a September 23, 2009 default judgment is well outside the time constraint for arguments based on Rule 60(b) subsections (1), (2), and (3), and as such, is untimely. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 102 (Chk. 2015).

A factor to be considered in determining whether Rule 60(b) relief has been sought within a reasonable time, is whether a good reason has been presented for failure to act sooner. Courts have been unyielding in requiring that a party show good reason for the failure to take appropriate action sooner. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 102 (Chk. 2015).

Since Rule 60(b)(6) relief is reserved for extraordinary circumstances and the language delineated therein: "any other reason justifying relief," cannot be utilized to circumvent the one-year time limit for motions brought pursuant to Rule 60(b) subsections (1), (2), and (3). FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 102 (Chk. 2015).

The defendants have not proffered any rationalization for the inordinate delay in seeking relief from judgment when they have not opposed or otherwise responded to the entry of the default judgment, the order(s) in aid of judgment, or the writ of garnishment that they now move to set aside and when, although they allege that they were not privy to the respective hearing dates, the record denotes that their previous counsel was in receipt of the motions and had notice of the relevant proceedings. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 98, 103 (Chk. 2015).

As grounds for post-judgment relief, motions raised under either Rule 60(b)(3) (for a fraud claim) or Rule 60(b)(1) (for mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect) must be made within a reasonable time, not more than one year after the judgment, and will be denied as untimely when the one-year time limit has long since passed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 290 n.4 (Pon. 2016).

Relief from judgment for an adverse party's fraud, such as fraud in the inducement, or misrepresentation is a motion that can only be made under Rule 60(b)(3) and that has a one-year deadline. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 291 (Pon. 2016).

The only type of fraud not subject to the one-year limitation for relief from judgment is fraud on the court. This is because Rule 60(b) does not limit the time in which the court may set aside a judgment for fraud on the court. Fraud on the court is a lawyer's or party's misconduct so serious that it undermines or is intended to undermine the integrity of the judicial proceeding. A finding of fraud on the court is justified only by the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or counsel's fabrication of evidence, and must be supported by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 291 (Pon. 2016).

A Rule 60(b) motion must be made within a reasonable time. A factor to consider in determining whether Rule 60(b) relief has been sought within a reasonable time is whether good reason has been presented for failure to act sooner. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 460 (Pon. 2016).

If a court's legal error were considered a "mistake" under Rule 60(b)(1), or if relief is sought under Rule 60(b)(6) for error involved a fundamental misconception of law, the "reasonable time" for a motion of this kind may not exceed the time in which appeal might have been taken a reasonable time for a motion to relief cannot exceed the 42-day time limit provided by FSM Appellate Rule 4(a)(1). Rule 60(b)(6)'s broad power is not for the purpose of relieving a party from free, calculated, and deliberate choices he or she has made. It is ordinarily not permissible to use a Rule 60(b) motion to remedy a failure to take an appeal. In re Contempt of Jack, 20 FSM R. 452, 460-61 (Pon. 2016).

The reason for there being no time limit on relief from a void judgment is obvious. If a judgment is void when issued, it is always void. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

Under Rule 60(b)(1), (2), or (3), a movant must file the motion within one year from the entry of final judgment. Otherwise, no specific time period is set forth, except that under Rule 60(b)(4), (5), or (6), the motion must be made within a "reasonable time." What constitutes a reasonable time, depends on the facts of each case. The relevant considerations include, whether the parties have been prejudiced by the delay and good reason presented for failing to take action sooner. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 508 (App. 2016).

Even when the motion for relief from judgment was not filed within the prescribed reasonable time, the court's analysis will not conclude, because if the judgment was void, relief may nevertheless be granted under Rule 60(b)(4). Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

Unlike its counterparts, Rule 60(b)(4), which provides relief from void judgments, is not subject to any time limitation. If a judgment is void, it is a nullity from the outset and any Rule 60(b)(4) motion for relief is therefore filed within a reasonable time. However, the concept of void judgments is narrowly construed. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

When the movants have failed to cite any reasons for the elongated delay in filing their motion for relief from judgment, much less extraordinary circumstances that would warrant having their Rule 60(b)(4) motion supersede the doctrine of res judicata, prejudice would invariably inure to the judgment creditor, in light of its justified reliance on the relevant December 28, 2007 default judgment's finality. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509-10 (App. 2016).

Since Rule 60(b) specifically provides that Rule 60(b) motions must be made within a reasonable time, and for reasons (1), (2), and (3) not more than one year after the judgment was entered, a Rule 60(b) motion on those grounds that was not made within one year of any of the judgments, but was made years later, is too late. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 515 (App. 2018).

Relief cannot be sought under subsection 60(b)(6) if the time has passed to seek relief under 60(b)(1), since Rule 60(b)(6) is reserved for extraordinary circumstances not covered in any of the other Rule 60(b) subsections and cannot be used to circumvent the one-year time limit for motions brought under subsections (1), (2), and (3). Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 515 (App. 2018).

Mere clerical errors in judgments, such as those of calculation, may be corrected under Rule 60(a) at any time. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

If a default judgment has been entered when the court lacked personal jurisdiction over the defendant, then that default judgment is void and relief can be sought under Rule 60(b)(4), for which there is no time limit to seek relief. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

If a Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment is denied solely as untimely, that denial does not act as res judicata precluding an independent action since the denial was not on the merits. A Rule 60(b)(1) motion's denial solely on the ground that the absolute time limit of one year precluded consideration of the merits of the grounds presented does not preclude a prompt independent action for relief in the same court. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 553 (App. 2018).

For an independent action in equity to set aside a judgment there are no time limits; the general statutes of limitation do not apply. Rule 60(b) permits an independent action and prescribes no time limitations for such action. In the absence of a controlling statute, the only time limitation is the equitable doctrine of laches. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 554 (App. 2018).

There is no time limit on when an independent action may be brought, but the doctrine of laches is applicable and undue delay may bar relief. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 554 (App. 2018).

For an independent action for relief, no statute of limitations would apply because there is no time limit on when an independent action may be brought, but the doctrine of laches is applicable and undue delay can bar relief. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 (Pon. 2019).

A grant of relief for fraud on the court ordinarily requires that: 1) the fraud is directed to the judicial machinery itself and is not fraud between the parties or fraudulent documents, false statements or perjury; 2) the fraud involves the most egregious conduct, such as bribery of a judge or the fabrication of evidence in which an attorney is implicated; and 3) the party perpetrating the fraud acted with an intent to deceive or defraud the court. Further, the fraud must have actually deceived the court. These requirements are strictly applied because a finding of fraud on the court is exempt from time limits and because it permits the severe consequence of allowing a party to overturn the finality of a judgment. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

The time for making a motion for relief from judgment continues to run even while the case is on appeal. Timsina v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 383, 386 (Pon. 2019).

Under Rule 60(b)(1), (2), or (3), a movant must file the motion for relief from judgment within a reasonable time not to exceed one year from the entry of judgment. Thus, when the movant filed his motion for relief well over a year after the final judgment was entered against him, he is precluded from any relief from judgment on the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, excusable neglect, newly discovered evidence, fraud, misrepresentation, or other misconduct of an adverse party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

Extraordinary circumstances usually means that the movant himself was not at fault for his predicament, but if there was fault on the movant's part, the usual implication is that there are no extraordinary circumstances. Even then, a motion for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b)(6) must still be filed within a reasonable time. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

An allegation of neglect, which, if it were shown to be excusable, would be a ground for relief under Rule 60(b)(1), but when the one-year time limit for Rule 60(b)(1) relief expired long before the defendant filed his motion for relief, the defendant cannot use Rule 60(b)(6) to circumvent the Rule 60(b)(1) time limit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 592 (Kos. 2020).

When counsel appeared for the defendant four and a half months after the court entered the default judgment and no good reason was shown why a motion for relief from judgment could not have been filed promptly thereafter instead of after eleven more months, the defendant has not shown that a motion for relief from judgment filed fifteen and a half months after judgment was entered (and eleven months after his counsel entered her appearance), was filed within a reasonable time, and, since a Rule 60(b)(6) motion for relief from judgment must be made within a "reasonable time," even if the defendant had shown extraordinary circumstances, Rule 60(b)(6) relief would still be time-barred because the motion was filed too late. FSM Dev. Bank v. Talley, 22 FSM R. 587, 593 (Kos. 2020).

– Stipulated

Judgment entered pursuant to compromise and settlement is treated as a judgment on the merits barring any other action for the same cause. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 564 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

Default judgments and stipulated or agreed judgments against the State of Chuuk are to be subjected to close scrutiny by the court. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The movant for relief from judgment must keep in mind that generally the standard for reopening a consent final judgment is a strict one. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 600 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Rule 60(b) may not allow a party in whose favor a judgment is entered to seek relief from that judgment because stipulated judgments, while they are judicial acts, also have many attributes of voluntarily-undertaken contracts, and when the parties have made a freely calculated, deliberate choice to submit to an agreed upon judgment rather than seek a more favorable litigated outcome (or risk a less favorable litigated outcome), the burden under Rule 60(b) is probably more formidable than had they litigated and lost. Farata v. Punzalan, 11 FSM R. 175, 178 (Chk. 2002).

In any case brought under 11 F.S.M.C. 701 et seq., a plaintiff must prove each element of his case by the preponderance of the evidence. In the case of a stipulated judgment under a settlement agreement, an equally basic jurisprudential principle dictates that a stipulated judgment will be entered only if it is well grounded both in law and in fact. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 24, 26 (Chk. 2003).

Although parties are free to stipulate to factual matters, they may not stipulate to conclusions of law to be reached by the court. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Jonas, 13 FSM R. 171, 173 (Kos. 2005).

A stipulated judgment is not a judicial determination or holding. Stipulated judgments, while they are judicial acts, also have the attributes of voluntarily-undertaken contracts. A stipulated judgment (also called a consent decree) although enforceable like any other judicial decree, is not a judicial determination of any litigated right. It may be defined as a contract of the parties acknowledged in open court and ordered to be recorded by a court of competent jurisdiction. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 467-68 (Chk. 2005).

A stipulated judgment is not a judicial determination, but is a contract between the parties entering into the stipulation. A consent decree or stipulated judgment does not constitute a resolution of parties' rights but is a mere recordation of their private agreement. Once a consent decree has been entered it is generally considered to be binding on the parties and it cannot be amended or varied without each party's consent. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 468 (Chk. 2005).

When it is necessary to construe a stipulated judgment or consent decree, courts resort to ordinary principles of contract interpretation. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 468 (Chk. 2005).

Even if the judgment was based on the parties' agreement, when there is no suggestion of fraud, lack of jurisdiction, or other serious injustice; only that the appellants themselves failed to timely pursue their case in the past and they claim that this should not be held against them but they recognize that they had two previous opportunities to pursue their case and that their own inaction led to the prior appeal's dismissal, under these circumstances, the policy supporting finality of judgments should apply and the earlier stipulated judgment should be treated as a final judgment precluding relitigation of ownership. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Heirs of Seymour, 15 FSM R. 342, 347 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the parties stipulate to a judgment, the judgment is not a decision by the court. FSM Dev. Bank

v. Kaminanga, 16 FSM R. 45, 46 (Chk. 2008).

Rule 58 does not, by its terms, apply to stipulated or consent judgments because such judgments are not decisions by the court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kaminanga, 16 FSM R. 45, 46 (Chk. 2008).

A stipulated judgment is not a judicial determination, but is a contract between the parties making the stipulation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kaminanga, 16 FSM R. 45, 47 (Chk. 2008).

A stipulated judgment (also called a consent decree) although enforceable like any other judicial decree, is not a judicial determination of any litigated right but may be defined as a contract of the parties acknowledged in open court and ordered to be recorded by a court of competent jurisdiction. It does not constitute a resolution of parties' rights but is a mere recordation of their private agreement and once a consent decree has been entered it is generally considered to be binding on the parties and it cannot be amended or varied without each party's consent. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kaminanga, 16 FSM R. 45, 47 (Chk. 2008).

Strict compliance with Rule 58 is unnecessary in the case of a stipulated judgment, but the better practice may be for the clerk to enter a judgment that reflects the parties' stipulation as approved by the court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kaminanga, 16 FSM R. 45, 47 (Chk. 2008).

A stipulated judgment may be defined as a contract of the parties acknowledged in open court and ordered to be recorded by a court of competent jurisdiction. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 17 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. 2011).

A stipulated judgment is a contract between the parties entering into the stipulation that has been approved by the court. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 17 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. 2011).

The parties' stipulated judgment in a state court action for breach of an easement agreement constituted a new contract – a new easement agreement – between the parties because it was a contract or agreement that was inconsistent with the original contract or agreement, especially when the amount stipulated to, $50,000, greatly exceeded the value of the undelivered 40 cubic yards of sand and 40 cubic yards of aggregates that constituted the breach. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 17 FSM R. 609, 611-12 (Chk. 2011).

While a stipulated judgment may not give rise to the doctrine of res judicata, a later court contemplating a civil action based on the same underlying facts may adopt the findings of fact in the stipulated judgment and any conclusions of law in the order granting the stipulated judgment, and in so doing finally adjudicate the matter. Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 156 (Pon. 2012).

While a stipulated judgment does represent a private agreement and not a judicial determination, it is a judicial act, binding on the parties. Thus, contract defenses are not available to a judgment debtor in a proceeding to enforce a money judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 20 FSM R. 70, 73 (Pon. 2015).

Preclusive effect is given to many decisions that have not actually been litigated on the merits – for example if it is the subject of a stipulation between the parties, or a judgment entered by confession, or consent, or default, where none of the issues is actually litigated. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 72 (App. 2016).

Stipulated judgments, while they are judicial acts, also have many attributes of voluntarily-undertaken contracts, and when the parties have made a freely calculated, deliberate choice to submit to an agreed upon judgment rather than seek a more favorable litigated outcome (or risk a less favorable litigated outcome), the burden under Rule 60(b) is probably more formidable than had they litigated and lost. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 386 (App. 2017).

Although parties may stipulate to factual matters, they may not stipulate to interpretations of law.

Thus, even though parties may stipulate to a judgment, they cannot stipulate to a court's subject-matter jurisdiction to enter that judgment. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2020).

When the parties' stipulation to enter a judgment would result in a void judgment, the court must reject the stipulation for judgment and dismiss the case for the lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because whenever it appears that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court must dismiss the action. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

– Void

Any judicial act, that has been done pursuant to a statute that does not confer the power to do that act, is void on its face. A judgment that is void on its face may be set aside by the court on its own motion. In re Jae Joong Hwang, 6 FSM R. 331, 331-32 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

A judgment may not be rendered in favor of or against a person who was not made party to the action. A party to an action is a person whose name is designated on the record as a plaintiff or defendant. A person may not be made a party to a proceeding simply by including his name in the judgment. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

When someone is accorded none of these due process guarantees with respect to a "judgment" against it, the judgment and ensuing order in aid of judgment and writ of execution are void as a matter of law, and these procedural infirmities inherent in the judgment are subject to attack at any time, and thus are outside the adjudicative framework established by the rules of procedure. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

Since any judgment in personam against an unknown defendant would be void, the court will dismiss John Doe defendants. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 412-13 n.1 (Pon. 2001).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Hartman v. Bank of Guam, 10 FSM R. 89, 97 (App. 2001).

With the exception of void judgments under Rule 60(b)(4), the grant or denial of Rule 60 relief rests with the trial court's sound discretion. The discretion is not an arbitrary one to be capriciously exercised, but a sound legal discretion guided by accepted legal principles. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 377 (Pon. 2001).

A judgment entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and subject to direct or collateral attack. Pastor v. Ngusun, 11 FSM R. 281, 285 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a party moves for relief from judgment under Civil Procedure Rule 60(b)(4) on the ground that the judgment was void, there is no requirement, as is usual when a default judgment is attacked under Rule 60(b), that the movant show that he has a meritorious defense. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 256 (Chk. 2005).

Unlike other grounds under Rule 60(b), the court does not have any discretion when relief from judgment is sought on the ground that the judgment was void because either a judgment is void or it is valid. A judgment is not void merely because it is erroneous. It is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process of law. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 256 (Chk. 2005).

When an amended complaint asserted additional factual claims, the defendant had to be served a summons with the amended complaint and the service had to be effected as would the service of any complaint and summons, and since he was served by ordinary mail, he was not properly served the amended complaint. The judgment based on the amended complaint is thus void as to him and a motion for relief from judgment will therefore granted as to him. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 258 (Chk. 2005).

There is no time limit on relief from a void judgment. The reason for this is obvious. If a judgment is void when issued, it is always void. When relief is sought from a void judgment, a court has no discretion but must grant relief from judgment. Ruben v. Petewon, 13 FSM R. 383, 389 (Chk. 2005).

If it appears that the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, the case must be dismissed since any judgment rendered by a court without subject matter jurisdiction would be void. Harper v. William, 14 FSM R. 279, 281 (Chk. 2006).

A judgment (or final order) entered against a person without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time, and a court that lacks personal jurisdiction over a person cannot enter a valid judgment against that person. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A judgment is void when the court lacked subject matter jurisdiction or when indispensable parties were not joined or when a certificate of title had previously been issued for the land and that certificate or the validity of the process that resulted in that certificate was never challenged. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 109-10 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When neither the Wito Clan nor the Rubens were ever duly summoned in Civil Action No. 64-98 before the August 20, 1998 judgment was issued so that court never had personal jurisdiction over them, the judgment, as to any interest either of them might have, is void. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

There is no time limit to seek relief from a void judgment because if a judgment is void when issued, it is always void, and when relief is sought from a void judgment, a court has no discretion but must grant relief from judgment. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 112 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In any action where a party seeks relief that would result in that party being declared the winner of an election rather than some other person, that other person is an indispensable party whose absence would make any judgment void and subject to collateral attack. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 224 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A judgment is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process. FSM Dev. Bank v. Arthur, 15 FSM R. 625, 633 (Pon. 2008).

A trial court's failure to notify the appellants of trial was plain error and the judgment that was entered is therefore void. Farek v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 154, 157 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Since any judgment in personam against an unknown defendant would be void, the retention of "John Doe" defendants is pointless. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 366 n.1 (App. 2011).

Civil Procedure Rule 60(b)(4) provides for the relief from judgment when the judgment is void. Unlike other grounds for relief from judgment under Rule 60(b), the court does not have any discretion when the relief is sought because the judgment is void since a judgment is either void or it is valid and if it is void the court must vacate it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2013).

If a judgment is void when issued, it is always void. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2013).

Although the court has no discretion and must grant the relief when relief is sought from a void judgment, a judgment is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2013).

The court cannot give any weight to the argument that the passage of time is enough to bar vacating a void judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 614 (Pon. 2013).

A judgment is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 304 (App. 2014).

When a judgment has been entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard, it is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. A judgment cannot be collaterally attacked merely because it is wrong. It can only be attacked on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction or due process violations that make the judgment void. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 304 (App. 2014).

A judgment is void only if the court that rendered it lacked jurisdiction of the subject matter, or of the parties, or if it acted in a manner inconsistent with due process. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 289 (Pon. 2016).

Whether a judgment is joint and several or not has no affect on whether the court has subject-matter jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 292 (Pon. 2016).

A judgment in a default case that awards relief that either is more than or different in kind from that requested originally is null and void. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 292 (Pon. 2016).

A void judgment is a legal nullity. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507, 509 (App. 2016).

Although the term "void" describes a result, rather than the conditions that render a judgment unenforceable, a void judgment is one so affected by a fundamental infirmity that the infirmity may be raised after the judgment becomes final. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

The reason for there being no time limit on relief from a void judgment is obvious. If a judgment is void when issued, it is always void. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

In the interests of finality, the concept of void judgments is narrowly construed. A judgment is not void merely because it may be erroneous or because the precedent upon which it was based is later altered or even overruled. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507-08 (App. 2016).

A judgment is void and therefore subject to relief under Rule 60(b)(4), only if the court that rendered judgment lacked jurisdiction or in circumstances in which the court's action amounted to a plain usurpation of power constituting a violation of due process. The total want of jurisdiction must be distinguished from an error in the exercise of jurisdiction and only rare instances of a clear usurpation of power will render a judgment void. In other words, a court has the power to determine its own jurisdiction and an error in that determination will not render the judgment void. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 508 (App. 2016).

Even when the motion for relief from judgment was not filed within the prescribed reasonable time, the court's analysis will not conclude, because if the judgment was void, relief may nevertheless be granted under Rule 60(b)(4). Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

Unlike its counterparts, Rule 60(b)(4), which provides relief from void judgments, is not subject to any time limitation. If a judgment is void, it is a nullity from the outset and any Rule 60(b)(4) motion for relief is therefore filed within a reasonable time. However, the concept of void judgments is narrowly construed. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

Since the requirement of subject matter jurisdiction is never capable of being waived, judgments rendered without such allocation of authority are void ab initio and can be attacked at any time. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

When the movants have failed to cite any reasons for the elongated delay in filing their motion for relief from judgment, much less extraordinary circumstances that would warrant having their Rule 60(b)(4) motion supersede the doctrine of res judicata, prejudice would invariably inure to the judgment creditor, in light of its justified reliance on the relevant December 28, 2007 default judgment's finality. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509-10 (App. 2016).

A manifest abuse of authority, a judgment obtained unfairly or working a serious injustice, fraud or collusion by a court, fraud, and lack of jurisdiction have been considered grounds to ignore a judgment's validity. Validity fundamentally includes the court's competence to adjudicate the matter with regard to subject-matter jurisdiction, territorial jurisdiction, and notice. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 71 (App. 2016).

It is well established, that when a judgment has been entered against a party without notice or an opportunity to be heard, it is void and subject to direct or collateral attack at any time. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 121 (App. 2017).

A court that lacks personal jurisdiction over a defendant cannot enter a valid judgment against that defendant. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

If a default judgment has been entered when the court lacked personal jurisdiction over the defendant, then that default judgment is void and relief can be sought under Rule 60(b)(4), for which there is no time limit to seek relief. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

Default judgments against a real party of interest will be voided for lack of due process when that party lacked a notice and hearing before being disposed of its claim to a property – even when the real party of interest lacked a certificate of title. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130L (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A judgment rendered by a court without subject-matter jurisdiction is void from the start. A void judgment is a legal nullity. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

A court should never enter a judgment it knows would be void. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

When the parties' stipulation to enter a judgment would result in a void judgment, the court must reject the stipulation for judgment and dismiss the case for the lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because whenever it appears that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court must dismiss the action. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

JURISDICTION

The burden is always on the one who seeks the exercise of the power of the court in her behalf to establish that the court does have jurisdiction. Neimes v. Maeda Constr. Co., 1 FSM R. 47, 47 (Truk 1982).

The Secretary of the Interior has the power to terminate the Trust Territory High Court's exclusive jurisdiction over suits against the Trust Territory because that jurisdiction was originally conferred upon the High Court by authority emanating from the Department of Interior. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 65-67 (Kos. 1982).

The Trust Territory High Court's former exclusive jurisdiction over lawsuits against the Trust Territory government has been delegated to the constitutional governments covered by Secretarial Order 3039. Within the Federated States of Micronesia, the allocation of this former exclusive High Court jurisdiction between the Supreme Court of the Federated States of Micronesia an the various state courts will be determined on the basis of jurisdictional provisions within the Constitution and laws of the Federated States of Micronesia and its respective states. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 68 (Kos. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court is empowered to exercise authority in probate matters where there is an independent basis for jurisdiction under the Constitution. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 104 (Pon. 1982).

There is no statutory limitation on the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction; the Judiciary Act of 1979 plainly contemplates that that court will exercise all the jurisdiction available to it under the Constitution. 4 F.S.M.C. 201-208. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 106 (Pon. 1982).

The allocation of judicial authority is made on the basis of jurisdiction, generally without regard to whether state or national powers are at issue. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 108 (Pon. 1982).

The Constitution contemplates that decisions affecting the people of the Federated States of Micronesia will be decided by courts appointed by the constitutional governments of the Federated States of Micronesia. This in turn requires an expansive reading of the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdictional mandate while we await establishment of functioning state courts. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 111 (Pon. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court may look to decisions under the United States Constitution for guidance in determining the scope of jurisdiction since the jurisdictional language of the FSM Constitution is similar to that of the United States. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 414 (Pon. 1984).

The standard method of obtaining a determination from the FSM Supreme Court as to its jurisdiction over specific parties or issues is to file a civil or criminal action with the FSM Supreme Court trial division. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products Co., 1 FSM R. 496, 500 (Pon. 1984).

The jurisdictional language in the FSM Constitution is patterned upon the United States Constitution. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 4 n.2 (Pon. 1985).

A case must be one appropriate for judicial determination, that is, a justiciable controversy, as distinguished from a difference or dispute of a hypothetical or abstract character, or one that is academic or moot. The controversy must be definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 5 (Pon. 1985).

Because the FSM Constitution states that the judicial power "is vested" in the Supreme Court, and the trial division "has" jurisdiction over certain cases – unlike the jurisdictional provisions of the United States Constitution, which are not self-executing – determinations as to the jurisdiction of the FSM courts are based on constitutional interpretation rather than statutory construction, and therefore it cannot be assumed that United States court holdings will yield the correct result under FSM jurisdictional provisions. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Nanpei, 2 FSM R. 217, 219 n.1 (Pon. 1986).

As a general rule the FSM Supreme Court trial division is obliged to exercise its jurisdiction and may not abstain simply because unsettled issues of state law are presented. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 1988).

State courts do not normally look to the national Constitution as a source of jurisdictional authority, but instead typically rely upon state constitutions and state law for their authorization to act, so in considering whether a state court may exercise jurisdiction in a case the proper question is not whether the national Constitution authorizes, but whether it bars state court jurisdiction. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 377 (Pon. 1988).

Article XI, section 6(c) of the Constitution places authority to prescribe jurisdiction only in the national Congress, and not in state legislatures. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 379 (Pon. 1988).

Failure to mention national courts in section 25 of the Pohnpei State Real Property Mortgage Act should not be read as an attempt to deprive litigants of access to the FSM Supreme Court's trial division. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 380 (Pon. 1988).

FSM Supreme Court's trial division does not lose jurisdiction over a case merely because land issues are involved, but if such issues are presented, certification procedures may be employed to avoid encroachment upon state decision making prerogatives. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 381 (Pon. 1988).

The Constitution's jurisdictional provisions are self-executing. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 394 (Pon. 1988).

The determination of jurisdiction itself normally qualifies for protection under the common law principle of res judicata, requiring a second court to presume that the court which issued the judgment did properly exercise its own jurisdiction, but plain usurpation of power by a court which wrongfully extends its jurisdiction beyond the scope of its authority, is outside of the doctrine and does not qualify for res judicata protection. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 107-08 (App. 1989).

In light of the Trust Territory High Court's insistence on maintaining control over cases within the Federated States of Micronesia in disregard of Secretarial Order 3039 and to the exclusion of the new constitutional courts, its characterizations of Joint Rule No. 1 as "simply a memorandum" and of the words "active trial" in Secretarial Order 3039 as merely "administrative guidance," its acceptance of appeals after it was precluded from doing so by Secretarial Order 3039, its decision of appeals after Secretarial Order 3039 was terminated and its continued remand of cases to the High Court trial division for further action even after November 3, 1986, there can be no doubt that for purposes of res judicata analysis, the High Court was a court lacking capacity to make an adequately informed determination of a question concerning its own jurisdiction United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 118 (App. 1989).

Although final judgment in a case has been entered by the Trust Territory High Court, because any effort by a party to have the High Court consider its own jurisdiction would have been futile, it is procedurally fair to later afford the party an opportunity to question that jurisdiction. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 118-19 (App. 1989).

Where the Trust Territory High Court's exercise of jurisdiction was a manifest abuse of authority, allowing the judgment of the High Court to stand would undermine the decision-making guidelines and policies reflected in the judicial guidance clauses of the national and state constitutions and would thwart the efforts of the framers of the Constitution to reallocate court jurisdiction within the Federated States of Micronesia by giving local decision-makers control over disputes concerning ownership of land. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 119 (App. 1989).

The decision as to jurisdiction is one to be made by the court, and counsel may not by agreement, confer upon a court jurisdiction that it does not have by law. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 369 (App. 1990).

The maritime jurisdiction conferred on the FSM Supreme Court by the Constitution is not to be decided with reference to the details of United States cases and statutes concerning admiralty jurisdiction but instead with reference to the general maritime law of seafaring nations of the world, and to the law of nations. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 374 (App. 1990).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over all cases which are maritime in nature including all maritime contracts, torts and injuries. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 374 (App. 1990).

The question of the enforceability of ship mortgages is a matter that falls within the maritime jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court under article XI, section 6(a) of the Constitution. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 376 (App. 1990).

A state law provision attempting to place "original and exclusive jurisdiction" in the Yap State Court cannot divest a national court of responsibilities placed upon it by the national constitution, which is the "supreme law of the Federated States of Micronesia." Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 23 (App. 1991).

Under traditional constitutional analysis, taxpayers' efforts to recover tax moneys unlawfully extracted from them by a state may be relegated to state procedures and decision-makers so long as there is a reasonable procedure under state law whereby the taxpayer may obtain meaningful relief. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 23-24 (App. 1991).

Under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement, civilian employees of the United States government have immunity from civil and criminal process for wrongful acts and omissions done within the scope and in performance of official duty, unless expressly waived by the U.S. government. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 95 (Pon. 1991).

The Compact of Free Association provides to the United States immunity from the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court for claims arising from the activities of United States agencies or from the acts or omissions of the employees of such agencies. Samuel v. United States, 5 FSM R. 108, 111 (Pon. 1991).

Issuance of a search warrant is indisputedly within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 392 (Pon. 1992).

A maritime contract cannot be converted into a non-maritime one by stipulation of the parties so as to divest the court of its admiralty jurisdiction. Maruwa Shokai (Guam), Inc. v. Pyung Hwa 31, 6 FSM R. 1, 4 (Pon. 1993).

The term "concurrent" in article XI, section 6(c) of the FSM Constitution has the same meaning as in section 6(b); i.e., that jurisdiction is concurrent as between the FSM Supreme Court and any other national courts that may be established by statute. It would be illogical and contrary to norms of constitutional interpretation to assume a different meaning for "concurrent" in section 6(c) than in section 6(b), since it is quite clear that the two sections are to be read together. Faw v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 33, 35 (Yap 1993).

Under the FSM Constitution the FSM Supreme Court may hear cases on appeal from the highest state court in which a decision may be had if that state's constitution permits it. The Chuuk State Constitution permits such appeals, which, in civil cases, Chuuk statute provides be made by certiorari. Gustaf v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 284, 285 (App. 1993).

The FSM Supreme Court will not interfere in a pending state court proceeding where no authority has been cited to allow it to do so, where the case has not been removed from state court, where it has not been shown that the national government is a party to the state court proceeding thereby putting the case within the FSM Supreme Court's exclusive jurisdiction, and where it has not been shown that the movants are parties to the state court proceeding and thus have standing to seek national court intervention. Pohnpei v. Kailis, 6 FSM R. 460, 463 (Pon. 1994).

A court may sua sponte raise the issue of jurisdiction at any time because it is the duty of the courts and counsel to insure that jurisdiction exists. Barker v. Paul, 6 FSM R. 473, 475 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Actions concerning the determination of land titles rest primarily with the Land Commission, which is statutorily charged with the registration and determination of land ownership. When the Land Commission has designated a registration area the courts cannot entertain any action with regard to interests in land within that registration area without a showing of special cause, although any determination of the Commission may be appealed to the Trial Division of the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Otherwise, it becomes final and conclusive. Barker v. Paul, 6 FSM R. 473, 475-76 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Absent a finding of "special cause" on the record the trial court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action asserting an interest in land located within a designated registration area. Barker v. Paul, 6 FSM R. 473, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

When the Land Commission has issued a Determination of Ownership which has become final upon the lapse of the time to appeal, the trial court has no authority or power to alter the final determination of ownership and boundaries. Barker v. Paul, 6 FSM R. 473, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court is a unified court system with two constitutionally mandated divisions – the trial division and the appellate division. All justices are members of both divisions, but a justice does not serve in the appellate division until he has been designated by the Chief Justice to be the presiding justice on a specific case. The trial division is the state's court of general jurisdiction. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 497 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

All justices in the trial division have concurrent jurisdiction, but once a case has been assigned to a particular justice, that justice has exclusive jurisdiction over the parties and issues of the case until the case is terminated in the trial division. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

A properly filed notice of appeal transfers jurisdiction from the trial court to the appellate court. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The nonexclusive constitutional grant to the states of regulatory power over marine resources located within twelve miles of island baselines cannot be read as creating exclusive state court jurisdiction over marine resources within the twelve mile limit. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 598-99 & n.7 (Pon. 1994).

The state and national courts have concurrent jurisdiction over cases involving state regulation of marine resources located within twelve miles of island baselines. Pohnpei v. MV Hai Hsiang #36 (I), 6 FSM R. 594, 602 (Pon. 1994).

Parties cannot confer or divest a court of jurisdiction by stipulation or by assumption. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 45 (App. 1995).

It is the duty of the court to insure jurisdiction exists. The fact that the defendant has not challenged the allegation of jurisdiction does not confer jurisdiction on the court if none exists. Joeten Motor Co. v. Jae Joong Hwang, 7 FSM R. 326, 327 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a suit against the national government by the states alleging that under the Constitution the states are entitled to 50% of all revenues from the EEZ because the FSM Supreme Court has the ultimate responsibility for interpretation of the Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 7 FSM R. 563, 567 (Pon. 1996).

A trial court has jurisdiction to issue an order assessing costs, even though it was issued after the notice of appeal was filed. Damarlane v. United States, 8 FSM R. 14, 17 (App. 1997).

A policy of judicial economy dictates against allowing further piecemeal appeals when the appeal in question arises from the same civil action and involves the same or similar questions of law. Damarlane v. United States, 8 FSM R. 14, 17 (App. 1997).

The FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction is derived from the FSM Constitution which grants the appellate division the jurisdiction to review cases heard in state or local courts if they require interpretation of the FSM Constitution, and a state constitution cannot deprive the FSM Supreme Court of this jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 8 FSM R. 23, 26-27 (App. 1997).

The FSM Supreme Court appellate division has jurisdiction over an appeal where a motion to recuse filed by the appellant in the state court appellate division raised an issue of due process under the FSM Constitution. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Legislature, 8 FSM R. 23, 27 (App. 1997).

When the state election law requiring election appeals to go directly to the state court appellate division has a provision applying the law to municipal elections if the municipal constitution or law so provides and there is no such municipal provision, then jurisdiction over the election appeal does not lie in the state court appellate division in the first instance. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A case challenging the Governor's authority to take certain actions where the Governor has cited the state constitution as his authority and where the issues are serious and substantial is clearly a case arising under the state constitution over which the state court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the state judiciary act gives the state court trial division authority to review all actions of an agency of the government, the trial division has jurisdiction over an appeal of the state election commissioner's denial of a petition to set aside a municipal election. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 245, 247 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division had jurisdiction to hear an election appeal from an election conducted, pursuant to the governor's emergency declaration, under a state law providing for such jurisdiction. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 275, 280 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Once land has been declared part of a registration area, courts shall not entertain any action with regard to interests in land within that registration area without a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable before it is likely the land commission can make a determination on the matter. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 526-27 (Chk. 1998).

When title to land in a designated registration area becomes an issue in a case involving damage claims for trespass, and there is no pending case before the land commission concerning this land or a previous final determination of ownership, a court may remand the question of ownership to the land commission to be determined within a limited time. Once ownership is determined, the court may proceed because more than an interest in land is at stake, and the land commission can only adjudicate interests in land. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 527 (Chk. 1998).

Venue does not refer to jurisdiction at all. Jurisdiction of the court means the inherent power to decide a case, whereas venue designates the particular county or city in which a court with jurisdiction may hear and determine the case. On the other hand, forum means a place of jurisdiction. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 125 (Pon. 1999).

A foreign government is an entity over whom the FSM Supreme Court may exercise jurisdiction if it engages in certain acts. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 371 n.1 (Kos. 2000).

The Constitution does not authorize the FSM Supreme Court to declare the law anytime a justice feels moved to do so or authorize the court to respond to every request for a legal ruling directed to it by citizens. Instead, Article XI, section 6 of the Constitution grants jurisdiction, and the power to exercise judicial powers, only in five specific kinds of "disputes" and five types of "cases." FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 482 (App. 2000).

Because a court is without jurisdiction to entertain an action asserting an interest in land located within a designated registration area and because all such actions must first be filed with the Chuuk State Land Commission, a quiet title action filed in the Chuuk State Supreme Court will be transferred to the Land Commission for consideration of ownership. Simina v. Rayphand, 9 FSM R. 508, 509 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When the court's jurisdiction is placed at issue, it is the plaintiff's burden to show that the Supreme Court does have jurisdiction, and that a colorable claim exists. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. 2000).

The FSM Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government and part of the national government for purposes of Article XI, Section 6(a) of the Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 4 (Chk. 2001).

The Constitution does appear not to bar the FSM Supreme Court from exercising jurisdiction over FSM Development Bank mortgage foreclosures. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2001).

Under the Chuuk Constitution, article VII, § 3(c), the Chuuk State Supreme Court has only appellate or review jurisdiction over the Land Commission, and thus a motion for review de novo of matters not raised before the Land Commission must be denied. Enengeitaw Clan v. Shirai, 10 FSM R. 309, 311 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When plaintiffs ask the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division to interpret a statute in light of various Chuuk Constitution provisions because in their view the statute unconstitutionally delegates the power to conduct elections to the municipalities themselves, it is a constitutional question of significant magnitude, given the past history of the conduct of elections in general in Chuuk. Given the clear jurisdictional mandate in the Chuuk Constitution for the court to determine issues regarding the state constitution and laws, the court has jurisdiction over the case, and a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction must therefore be denied. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 579-80 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The statutory prohibition on issuing writs against public property is jurisdictional. Since the statute deprives a court of jurisdiction to issue any such writ, the parties may not by agreement confer jurisdiction upon a court when a statute affirmatively deprives the court of jurisdiction. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 651 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

To read the language that a petitioner shall by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part, to mean that the 60 day time period is absolute, which is to say jurisdictional, would be to read the statute as limiting the trial division's jurisdiction to hear such appeals. Statutes which limit a court's jurisdiction are to be construed narrowly. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 78, 81 (Kos. 2003).

While ordinarily the court does not have jurisdiction over claims arising in land registration areas subject to the Land Commission's jurisdiction, an exception is that whenever the Land Commission, in its discretion, makes either of the determinations set forth in 67 TTC 108(1) or (2), it may refer the claim to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division for adjudication without itself making any determination. The statute thus expressly confers jurisdiction on the court upon a matter's referral from the Land Commission whenever cause appears pursuant to 67 TTC 108(1) or (2). The "special cause" is established by the statute, and the trial division clearly has jurisdiction if the circumstances meet the statute's requirements. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 159 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A default judgment must be vacated when the Chuuk State Supreme Court never had jurisdiction over the action to determine ownership of real property in the first place because, despite being framed as a declaratory relief action, the case sought a determination of ownership of land lying within a land registration area and only the Land Commission has jurisdiction to determine ownership of land within a land registration area. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 398-99 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the land in question clearly lies in a Land Commission registration area; when the action seeks a declaration that a party is the owner of the land and it does not allege, nor prove, that the Land Commission referred the matter to the court for resolution, and when she does not assert any "special cause" why the court should assert jurisdiction over the land claim, the court is statutorily deprived of jurisdiction over any action with regard to interests in land. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 399 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The courts have a duty to examine issues regarding their jurisdiction. Jurisdiction of the court may be raised at any time, even after judgment. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 399 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Acts in excess of a court's jurisdiction are void. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 399 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Questions regarding interests in land must be raised before the Land Commission. The Chuuk State Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to hear or decide such claims. The court can only refer the matter to the Land Commission, so that the Land Commission can resolve the dispute. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 401-02 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Any case over which the trial division has jurisdiction may be heard by any of the justices as assigned by the Chief Justice. Once a case has been assigned to a particular justice, that justice has jurisdictional priority over the parties and issues of the case to the exclusion of all other trial division justices. This exclusive jurisdiction continues until the case is terminated in the trial division. While the case is pending, the priority extends to any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

When the parties are identical in two civil actions and the plaintiffs sought the same relief in both civil actions – that the contents of certain ballot boxes not be counted and tabulated because of election irregularities and when the only difference in the later civil action was that the plaintiffs were contesting only two of the five boxes they contested in the first civil action and that the irregularities alleged in the later case were discovered during and in the course of the litigation of the first civil action (that is, during the counting and tabulating ordered by the judge in the first civil action), such irregularities would be expected to be brought immediately before the judge on the case in which they were discovered. When they were not, but were instead filed as a separate case, once the trial judge on the first case became available, the case should have been left to him to act upon. Therefore the second trial judge's presiding over the second civil action was in excess of his jurisdiction since the first trial division justice had jurisdictional priority over the parties and the issues in that case to the exclusion of all other trial division justices. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

A claim that civil matters should be dealt with in the defendant's country and that since both he and the plaintiff were Koreans, the court should dismiss this case is an assertion of forum non conveniens. Forum non conveniens is not a claim that the court lacks jurisdiction over the case, but is a doctrine that the court may, as a matter of its discretion, decline jurisdiction and dismiss a case when the parties' and the witnesses' convenience and the ends of justice would be better served if the action were brought and tried in another forum in which the action could be heard. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 257 n.5 (Chk. 2005).

A trial justice may not, sua sponte, assert jurisdiction over a case which has been fully dismissed, particularly when that case was dismissed by another justice. When a case has been dismissed, there is no case or dispute remaining before the court. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 183 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

Because the Kosrae State Court only has the authority to hear appeals from Land Court and it cannot act until the Land Court has adjudicated the matter and an appeal has been filed, a case concerning a claim of title to land filed in the Kosrae State Court will be dismissed without prejudice to allow the plaintiffs to file their claim in the Land Court, whose jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title of land and any interests therein. Alanso v. Pridgen, 14 FSM R. 479, 480 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Courts have no jurisdiction to hear cases with regard to interests in land in land registration areas unless there has been a showing of special cause, and a finding by the court, that action by a court is desirable or the Land Commission has asked the court to assume jurisdiction without the Land Commission having made a determination. Mathias v. Engichy, 15 FSM R. 90, 95 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When an order awarded attorneys' fees on the private attorney general theory and those fees are added to the judgment to be borne by the defendants, the issue of whether the fee award under the private attorney general theory will also stand as the fee award to plaintiffs' counsel in a final distribution is an issue that is not now before the court and will not be before the court until a proposal for a final distribution is before the court. Until then, anything the court might say would be in the nature of an advisory opinion, and the court does not have the authority to issue advisory opinions. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 15 FSM R. 133, 134-35 (Yap 2007).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division lacks jurisdiction over an election contest in a Chuuk state election since jurisdiction over election contests rests purely on statutory and constitutional provisions, and courts otherwise have no inherent power to determine election contests, and since the determination of such contests is a judicial function only when and to the extent that the determination is authorized by statute. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

The FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction is constitutionally limited to actual cases and disputes thereby precluding it from making pronouncements on hypothetical, abstract, or academic issues or when the matter is moot. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

When the constitutional issues the plaintiffs raise are either a part of an election contest over which the court has no jurisdiction or are hypothetical, abstract, or academic, the court lacks jurisdiction over the case. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

The decision as to the court's jurisdiction over an action is one to be made by the court, and the election commission is not empowered to assume or confer whether a court has jurisdiction. The election commission is limited to determining its own jurisdiction. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 411 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Although the court will not judge the actions of the U.S. government, when the case's disposition does not require the court to judge those actions, the court can and will judge the actions of the parties to the case if there are satisfactory criteria to do so. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 485 (Pon. 2009).

Chuuk Election Code, section 138 clearly contemplates that the FSM Supreme Court appellate division may exercise jurisdiction over a Chuuk state election contest even after the candidates that have been declared the winners have been sworn in. Chuuk State Election Comm'n v. Chuuk State Supreme Court App. Div., 16 FSM R. 614, 615 (App. 2009).

The section 6(a) phrase "except where an interest in land is at issue," does not preclude the FSM Supreme Court from exercising jurisdiction in a case where the national government entity is a party and land is involved. It does preclude the court from exercising exclusive jurisdiction – the jurisdiction becomes concurrent and a competent state court could instead entertain the matter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 93 (Yap 2011).

A Yap state statute cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of jurisdiction conferred on it by the FSM Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 94 (Yap 2011).

The FSM Supreme Court can exercise jurisdiction in a case where an interest in land is at issue if there is another basis for jurisdiction. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 182, 184 (Chk. 2012).

Although pleading requirements are interpreted liberally, it is the plaintiff's responsibility to see that his complaint states the grounds of jurisdiction. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 182, 184 (Chk. 2012).

If the case involves officials of foreign governments, or disputes between states, or admiralty or maritime matters, no further analysis is needed. The FSM Supreme Court trial division has exclusive jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 614 (Pon. 2013).

If the FSM Supreme Court does not have exclusive jurisdiction, the analysis will not end there. It proceeds to the next set of questions about the FSM Supreme Court's concurrent jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court either has exclusive jurisdiction over a case or it has concurrent jurisdiction. It cannot have both simultaneously because a court's jurisdiction over a case cannot be both exclusive and non-exclusive (concurrent) at the same time. It is either exclusive or it is not. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 618 (Pon. 2013).

The movants have not shown that there are any jurisdictional steps that the plaintiff failed to take or any jurisdictional deadlines that it failed to meet when the statute and attendant regulations that the movants rely on apply only to Pohnpei state government procurement contracts – bidding for contracts where the vendor bidders are competing to sell goods or services – personal property and, in this case, the bidders were not seeking to sell anything to Pohnpei, but were seeking to acquire real estate rights – to lease government land and fish processing facilities (not personal property) from the state government. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 653, 656-57 (Pon. 2013).

The Constitution does not mandate such a sweeping expansion of the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction over probate cases as would result if creditors were considered parties for jurisdictional purposes. The better view is that only the heirs, potential heirs, or devisees in a probate case be considered parties for jurisdictional purposes and that, in the usual case, the decedent's creditors would file their claims in a state court probate proceeding. This view comports with the proper respect due to the state courts as courts of general jurisdiction that should normally resolve probate and inheritance issues. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 62 (Kos. 2013).

For jurisdictional purposes, the parties in a probate case are those who have a claim that they are heirs. Creditors are not to be considered parties for jurisdictional purposes. This reasoning is suitable for the FSM. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 62 (Kos. 2013).

A creditor may open a probate case in state court without destroying the state court's jurisdiction because a creditor is not an heir. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 62 (Kos. 2013).

State laws vesting state courts with exclusive jurisdiction cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of its constitutional responsibilities. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 19 FSM R. 233, 235 (Pon. 2013).

When no defendant has started a case under bankruptcy law, the defendants cannot have the case dismissed because bankruptcy law would provide the legal framework for the case. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 19 FSM R. 233, 236 (Pon. 2013).

The probate exception reserves to state probate courts the probate or annulment of a will and the administration of a decedent's estate; it also precludes the national courts from disposing of property that is in a state probate court's custody. But it does not bar the national courts from adjudicating matters outside of those confines and otherwise within national court jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 430 (App. 2014).

Interference with the property of the estate, and the probate exception should be read narrowly so as not to bar national court jurisdiction over preliminary matters, or ancillary matters, such as in personam actions and equitable intervention for fraud, maladministration, or non-administration of the estate. In those matters, the national court may appoint an administrator or an administrator pendente lite on behalf of third party interests before, or while, the action is pending in state court. These actions are outside of the scope of the probate exception, but they should not be confused with direct challenges to the validity of the will itself, in interpreting the language of the will, or equitable charges of fraud, undue influence, or tortious interference with the testator's intent which are core matters within the probate exception. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 430 (App. 2014).

Ultimately, the bulk of probate matters are to remain with the states, but an express constitutional exception is carved out when the national government is a party to the suit. Furthermore, the Constitution's framers created a constitutional limitation on the national government's jurisdiction under the land clause exception of article XI, § 6(a). FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 433 (App. 2014).

Courts have no jurisdiction to hear cases about interests in land in land registration areas unless there has been a showing of special cause, and a court finding, that action by a court is desirable or that the Land Commission has asked the court to assume jurisdiction without the Land Commission having made a determination. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 104(7)(b)(i), the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over any crime committed in the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 633 (Pon. 2015).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. Carius v. Johnson, 20 FSM R. 143, 146 (Pon. 2015).

For purposes of jurisdiction, since the College of Micronesia was created by national statute, and given the nature of its structure and functions, it is an instrumentality or agency of the FSM national government. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 263 (Pon. 2015).

A state statute that vests exclusive jurisdiction over certain cases in a state court (such as the Pohnpei statute requiring all judicial actions for a mortgage foreclosure to be brought in the Pohnpei Supreme Court trial division), cannot deprive the FSM Supreme Court of jurisdiction or have any effect on its jurisdiction. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 416 (App. 2016).

Jurisdictional grants of power to the national courts in Article XI, § 6 appear to be self-executing, calling for no action by Congress. Since most U.S. Constitution jurisdictional provisions are not self-executing, determinations of U.S. courts' jurisdiction are typically based on statutory construction rather than constitutional interpretation, as in the FSM. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 n.5 (App. 2016).

A state law vesting exclusive jurisdiction in a state court cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of jurisdiction over a matter it would otherwise have jurisdiction, as mandated by the FSM Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 608, 613 (Pon. 2016).

Although standing is not expressly stated within the FSM Constitution, it is implied as an antecedent to the "case or dispute" requirement found in Article XI, § 6 and should be interpreted so as to implement the objectives of that requirement. Two factors are central to the determination of whether a party has standing: 1) the party must allege a sufficient stake in a controversy's outcome and it must have suffered some threatened or actual injury resulting from the allegedly illegal action or erroneous court ruling, and 2) the injury must be such that it can be traced to the challenged action and must be of the kind likely to be redressed by a favorable decision. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 57 (App. 2016).

When the asserted ownership of a parcel constitutes a sufficient stake in the outcome; and when a challenge to the Kosrae State Court's ruling is capable of being redressed by a favorable decision in the FSM Supreme Court appellate division, an appellant, who did not appeal the Land Court decision to the Kosrae State Court, possesses standing to bring the present appeal. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 57 (App. 2016).

A manifest abuse of authority, a judgment obtained unfairly or working a serious injustice, fraud or collusion by a court, fraud, and lack of jurisdiction have been considered grounds to ignore a judgment's validity. Validity fundamentally includes the court's competence to adjudicate the matter with regard to subject-matter jurisdiction, territorial jurisdiction, and notice. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 71 (App. 2016).

A court of competent jurisdiction is a court that has the power and authority to do a particular act; one recognized by law as possessing the right to adjudicate a controversy. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 71 n.14 (App. 2016).

A court has no more right to decline the exercise of jurisdiction which is given, than it does to usurp that which is not given. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 74 (App. 2016).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court is not the only forum with jurisdiction to foreclose a mortgage on Pohnpei real estate because it is undisputed that the FSM Supreme Court may exercise such jurisdiction when the FSM Development Bank is the mortgagee since a state statute cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of its jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 172 (Pon. 2017).

A person may be convicted and sentenced under the laws of the FSM if he or she commits, or attempts to commit a crime, in whole or in part within the FSM. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 298 (Chk. 2017).

The statute of limitations does not affect a court's jurisdiction because generally a statute of limitation is not jurisdictional unless it is a limitations period for claims against the government. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

A Chuuk probate court cannot have jurisdiction over real property on Pohnpei even though the property's registered owner was a Chuukese decedent for whom probate cases were filed in a Chuuk state court. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

Even if there had not been an heirship proceeding for the Pohnpei property in the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure, the Chuuk State Supreme Court would still lack jurisdiction to probate the property since the land and real estate are outside of Chuuk. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

When the Pohnpei state probate case was the first filed lawsuit and that case can afford a complete resolution of the issues between the parties; when the later-filed FSM Supreme Court case could, at best, afford only a partial resolution and certainly lacks jurisdiction to enforce a state court interlocutory order; and when the Pohnpei Supreme Court is perfectly competent to enforce its own orders and judgments and to take any further needed steps in the probate case pending before it, it is appropriate that that forum resolve the issues. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 13 (Pon. 2018).

When diversity jurisdiction does not exist, the FSM Supreme Court's subject-matter jurisdiction must be based on some other ground. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. 2019).

The general rule is that the lawsuit filed first has priority over any other case involving the same parties and issues, even if filed later before a court that could also take jurisdiction. O'Sonis v. O'Sonis, 22 FSM R. 268, 270 (Chk. 2019).

While it is true that parties cannot confer or divest a court of jurisdiction by stipulation or by assumption, a helicopter buyer who had to register that helicopter somewhere (some country) and chose to register it in the U.S., will be estopped from denying the U.S.'s regulatory authority over its helicopter. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 459 (Pon. 2020).

– Arising Under

The repealer clause of the National Criminal Code repealed those provisions of Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code above the monetary minimum of $1,000 set for major crimes. Where the value is below $1,000, section 2 does not apply because it is not within the national court jurisdiction. FSM v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 43, 46 (Truk 1981).

The Seaman's Protection Act, originally enacted for the entire Trust Territory by the Congress of Micronesia, relates to matters that now fall within the legislative powers of the national government under article IX, section 2 of the Constitution, and has therefore become a national law of the Federated States of Micronesia under article XV. That being so, a claim asserting rights under the Act falls within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution as a case arising under national law. 19 F.S.M.C. 401-437. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 72 (Kos. 1982).

Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code, before the effective date of the National Criminal Code, is not a national law because its criminal jurisdiction was not expressly delegated to the national government, nor is the power it confers of indisputably national character; therefore, it is not within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 127, 130 (Truk 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction to try Title 11 Trust Territory Code cases if they arise under a national law. Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code is not a national law. It was not adopted by Congress as a national law and it did not become national law by virtue of the transition article. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 178 (Truk 1982).

Exclusive national government jurisdiction over major crimes is not mandated by the Constitution; such jurisdiction would be exclusive in any event only if criminal jurisdiction was a power of indisputably national character. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 181 (Truk 1982).

The National Government has exclusive jurisdiction over crimes arising under national law. 11 F.S.M.C. 901. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 181 (Truk 1982).

Sections of Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code covering matters within the jurisdiction of Congress owe their continuing vitality to section 102 of the National Criminal Code. Thus, the criminal prosecutions thereunder are a national matter and fall within the FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 102. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 185 (App. 1982).

Section 102(2), the savings clause of the National Criminal Code, authorizes prosecutions of Title 11 Trust Territory Code offenses occurring prior to the enactment of the National Criminal Code. Therefore, these prosecutions fall within the FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 102(2). In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1982).

Presumably, Congress inserted no specific jurisdictional provision in section 102 of the National Criminal Code because Congress recognized that the FSM Supreme Court would have jurisdiction over all cases arising under national law by virtue of article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. 11 F.S.M.C. 102. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 193 (App. 1982).

The Trust Territory Weapons Control Act is not inconsistent with any provision of the Constitution. It therefore continued in effect. When the National Criminal Code was enacted, and major crimes were defined, the Trust Territory Weapons Control Act became national law and trials for violations thereof were within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 1201-1231. FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 302-03 (Truk 1983).

When petitioners raise serious and substantial constitutional claims supported by authorities and reasoning of legal substance, the case falls within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 391 (Pon. 1984).

Article XI, section 6(a) of the Constitution places jurisdiction in the Federated States of Micronesia Supreme Court over cases in which the national government is a party. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 153 (Pon. 1986).

National civil rights claims under 11 F.S.M.C. 701 furnish a jurisdictional basis for the case to be heard by the FSM Supreme Court. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 153 (Pon. 1986).

Activities and organizations created and controlled by the national government should remain subject to FSM Constitution article XI, section 6(a), but organizations merely authorized or licensed by the national government which operate for private purposes, with little governmental involvement or control, should not be treated as a part of the national government. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Nanpei, 2 FSM R. 217, 219-20 (Pon. 1986).

Exact scope of admiralty jurisdiction is not defined in the FSM Constitution or legislative history, but United States Constitution has a similar provision, so it is reasonable to expect that words in both Constitutions have similar meaning and effect. Weilbacher v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 320, 323 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division is required to decide all national law issues presented to it. Certification to state court is only proper for state or local law issues. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 354 (Pon. 1988).

In the absence of any special limitation, issues that arise under any state or national law within the particular state may fall within the jurisdiction of the state and local courts of that state through state constitutional and statutory provisions which place the "judicial power of the state" within those courts. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 17 (App. 1991).

Article XI, section 6(b) and 8 of the FSM Constitution places primary responsibility in the national courts for the kind of cases arising under the constitution or requiring interpretation of the Constitution, national law or treaties; and in disputes between a state and a citizen of another state, between state, citizen, of different states, and between a state or a citizen, a foreign state, citizen, or subject but they do not prohibit state court jurisdiction over issues of national law or cases which arise under national law. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 18 (App. 1991).

Issues that arise under any state or national law within the particular state may fall within the jurisdiction of the state and local courts of that state through state constitutional and statutory provisions which place the "judicial power of the state" within those courts, subject to the possibility that state or local courts may sometimes be barred from exercising jurisdiction in some such cases by the action of Congress, of this court, or of the state legislature. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 18 (App. 1991).

Article XI, section 8 of the FSM constitution does not bar state courts from exercising jurisdiction over cases which arise under national law within the meaning of Article XI, section 6(b). Gimnang v. Yap, 5

FSM R. 13, 18 (App. 1991).

Full abstention is not appropriate where claims are not essentially state law claims, and are made against another nation, thus falling within the national court's primary jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67E (Pon. 1991).

Abstention may be appropriate for causes of action that raise issues of state law only, but may not be where substantive issues of national law are raised. A national court may not abstain from deciding a national constitutional claim. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67E (Pon. 1991).

The intent of the Constitutional Convention is that major crimes, as defined by Congress and committed prior to voter ratification, fall within the jurisdiction of the national government and may be prosecuted pursuant to the national law after the effective date of the amendment. In re Ress, 5 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 1992).

The national court should not abstain from deciding a criminal case where the crime took place before the effective date of the 1991 amendment removing federal jurisdiction over major crimes because of the firmly expressed intention by the Constitutional Convention delegates as to the manner of transition from national jurisdiction to state jurisdiction. In re Ress, 5 FSM R. 273, 276 (Chk. 1992).

Where the crimes charged are no longer those expressly delegated to Congress to define, or are not indisputedly of a national character the FSM Supreme Court has no subject matter jurisdiction. FSM v. Jano, 6 FSM R. 9, 11 (Pon. 1993).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a suit against the national government by the states alleging that under the Constitution the states are entitled to 50% of all revenues from the EEZ because the FSM has waived its sovereign immunity in cases to recover illegally collected taxes and for claims arising out of improper administration of FSM statutory law. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 7 FSM R. 563, 568 (Pon. 1996).

A plaintiff's complaint, stating two causes of action for breach of fiduciary duty (both existing under common law), does not arise under the national laws of the FSM so as to confer original jurisdiction on the FSM Supreme Court or show on its face an issue of national law thereby creating removal jurisdiction. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

That a corporation chartered under the laws of the FSM is involved in a lawsuit does not necessarily mean that the interpretation of national laws will be required or that the state court is not otherwise equipped to hear the case. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

To determine whether a controversy arises under national law, the issue of national law must be an essential element of one or more of the plaintiff's causes of action, it must be disclosed upon the face of the complaint, unaided by the answer, the petition for removal or any pleadings subsequently filed in the case, it may not be inferred from a defense asserted or one expected to be made, and the issue of national law raised must be a substantial one. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

When a case has been removed from state court on the ground that it arose under national law but the plaintiff's complaint only relies upon common law principles of breach of fiduciary duty and as such does not arise under national law because no issue of national law appears on the face of the complaint and no substantial issue of national law is raised, the case will be remanded to the state court where it was initially filed. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

When an amended complaint's deliberate indifference or negligence allegations do not rise to the level of a constitutional due process claim, it does not state a claim upon which the FSM Supreme Court can grant relief and the trial court's dismissal of the amended complaint will therefore be affirmed. Primo v.

Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 9 FSM R. 407, 412 (App. 2000).

Determination of whether a case arises under the Constitution, national law, or a treaty is based on the plaintiff's statement of his cause of action, not on whatever defenses that are or that might be raised. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 4 (Chk. 2001).

National law defenses do not constitute a basis for arising under national law jurisdiction pursuant to section 6(b). FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 4 (Chk. 2001).

Determination of whether a case arises under the Constitution, national law, or a treaty is based on the plaintiff's statement of his cause of action, not on whatever defenses that are or that might be raised. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

A case that asserts five causes of action under 32 F.S.M.C. 301 et seq., is one that "arises under national law" within the meaning of Article XI, section 6(b). Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 203 (Pon. 2001).

A foreign corporation served pursuant to 4 F.S.M.C. 204 may be sued within the FSM for violations of 32 F.S.M.C. 302 or 303, regardless of where the service occurs, so long as that foreign corporation has done specific acts within the FSM to bring it within the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 204-05 (Pon. 2001).

A party to a dispute within the scope of article XI, section 6(b) has a constitutional right to invoke the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 100 (Pon. 2002).

Although national law provides for the reciprocal enforcement of child support orders, case law supports the conclusion that FSM Supreme Court should abstain from exercising its jurisdiction at least until the state court has had the opportunity to rule on the issues. Villazon v. Mafnas, 11 FSM R. 309, 310 (Pon. 2003).

When the plaintiff has alleged that his termination from the Head Start Program violated his rights secured under the FSM Constitution, the FSM Supreme Court has concurrent original jurisdiction over the matter. Reg v. Falan, 11 FSM R. 393, 399 (Yap 2003).

A motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction will be denied when the plaintiffs' complaint alleges claims that arise under national law and the national constitution because the FSM Supreme Court exercises jurisdiction over such cases, and, although state courts may also exercise jurisdiction over such cases, the plaintiffs have a constitutional right to bring such cases in the FSM Supreme Court if they so desire. Naoro v. Walter, 11 FSM R. 619, 621 (Chk. 2003).

A cross-claim cannot form a basis for the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction because determination of whether a case arises under the Constitution, national law, or a treaty is based on the plaintiff's statement of his cause of action, not on whatever defenses that are or that might be raised. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 600 (Chk. 2004).

The national courts, including the trial division of the Supreme Court, have concurrent original jurisdiction in cases arising under national law. National courts are the trial division of the FSM Supreme Court and any other national courts that might be established by statute, and not state courts. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 32 (Kos. 2004).

When a state law makes a specific reference to a national statute, any interpretation of that state law must simultaneously present a question of national law. The FSM Supreme Court would have subject matter jurisdiction over such a case. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 32 (Kos. 2004).

Section 6(b) of Article XI of the FSM Constitution provides that the national courts, including the Supreme Court trial division, have concurrent original jurisdiction in cases arising under the Constitution, national law or treaties, and in disputes between a state and a citizen of another state, between citizens of different states, and between a state or citizen thereof, and a foreign state, citizen, or subject. The national courts referred to in this section are the FSM Supreme Court trial division and any other national courts which may be established in the future. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 147 (App. 2005).

Determination of whether the FSM Supreme Court has subject matter jurisdiction over a case is based on the plaintiff's statement of his cause of action, not on whatever defenses that are or that might be raised. McVey v. Etscheit, 13 FSM R. 473, 476 (Pon. 2005).

Determination of whether a case arises under the Constitution, national law, or a treaty is based on the plaintiff's statement of his cause of action, not on whatever defenses that are or that might be raised. Etscheit v. McVey, 13 FSM R. 477, 479 (Pon. 2005).

To determine whether a case arises under national law, the issue of national law must be an essential element of one or more of the plaintiff's causes of action, it must be disclosed upon the face of the complaint, unaided by the answer, the petition for removal or any pleadings subsequently filed in the case, it may not be inferred from a defense asserted or one expected to be made, and the issue of national law raised must be a substantial one. Etscheit v. McVey, 13 FSM R. 477, 479 (Pon. 2005).

When the plaintiffs' fifth cause of action is expressly entitled "Violation of the FSM Anti-competitive Practices Law" and the text specifically states that it alleges violations of the "Federated States of Micronesia Anti-competitive Practices Act" and cites 32 F.S.M.C. §§ 302-306 twice and when no Pohnpei state law or the Trust Territory predecessor statute is cited, this is thus clearly a cause of action arising under national law. The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over cases arising under national law. Since the issue raised is a substantial one, the case was therefore not improvidently removed from the Pohnpei Supreme Court. Etscheit v. McVey, 13 FSM R. 477, 479-80 (Pon. 2005).

A case that came before the court based on the court's exclusive jurisdiction over cases when the national government is a party and where the plaintiff's asserted claims primarily arose under national law, is not a diversity case where state law provides the rules of decision. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

When the case was first filed in the FSM Supreme Court as an action for civil rights and due process and certain fact-finding functions were referred to the Pohnpei Board of Trustees because it was best able, at least initially, to make those determinations, the remand or reference to the Board did not divest the court of jurisdiction because in making that remand or reference, the court was not transferring this case to the Board of Trustees and the Board does not have the authority to grant much of the relief sought in the case – damages for civil rights and due process violations and for trespass and injunctive relief. Jurisdiction over the case remained with the court the whole time. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Do It Best Hardware, 14 FSM R. 152, 156-57 (Pon. 2006).

When the remand or reference to the Board of Trustees was analogous to this court's power to appoint a special master to make factual findings, which the court may or may not adopt as its own findings and was also similar to those cases that were initiated in the FSM Supreme Court in Chuuk and then "remanded" to the Chuuk Land Commission for certain factual determinations and those cases then either "appealed" back to, or referred back to, the FSM Supreme Court trial division when those determinations were either completed or some other issue came up that required court determination, and when the Board, in effect, acted as a special master – a court-designated fact finder. When the FSM Supreme Court had subject-matter jurisdiction over the complaint's allegations when it was filed, the court still retained that jurisdiction and the remand or reference is thus not a ground upon which to grant dismissal.

Since an allegation of police brutality implicates both the national and state constitutions and a plaintiff asserting a right arising under national law has a right to be heard in the FSM Supreme Court even if state courts may also assert jurisdiction, the fact that the Pohnpei Supreme Court may be equally equipped to decide the case will not divest the plaintiff of his day in the FSM Supreme Court. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 201 (Pon. 2006).

When, accepting the plaintiffs' allegations as true, which the court must on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the plaintiffs state a claim that their civil rights were violated by an illegal act under the color of law, their case will not be dismissed. A determination of whether a case arises under the national constitution or national law is based on the plaintiff's statement of his case in his complaint, and, although a state court may exercise jurisdiction over such cases, a plaintiff has the constitutional right to bring such claims in the national court. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 219 (Chk. 2006).

A claim of denial of the right to suffrage in a state election because no revote was ordered is not a claim arising under the national constitution or law. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 397 (Chk. 2009).

When the parties are of diverse citizenship and when some of the plaintiff's claims arise under a treaty to which the FSM is a party, the FSM Supreme Court would, on either ground, have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case if an actual case or dispute exists. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 157 (Chk. 2010).

When a plaintiff clearly bases his cause of action on 11 F.S.M.C. 701, the national civil rights statute, it is obvious that he is invoking the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction over the case as one arising under FSM national law. Welle v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 17 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. 2011).

National law is not at issue in a case when the plaintiffs, in the complaint or in their initial motion for injunction, do not cite a particular national law at issue and their only mention of any sort of national law is in their October 19, 2011 "Notice of Terminology" and their October 31, 2011 "Supplement to Pending Motion for Injunction," where they cite only twenty-year-old "findings" of the FSM Secretary of Health and Human Services, and the FSM Earthmoving Regulations, neither of which apply to the defendants named in the complaint. Damarlane v. U Mun. Gov't, 18 FSM R. 96,98-99 (Pon. 2011).

When the plaintiff alleges that the state took his property without just compensation, but he only cites to the Chuuk Constitution provision barring Chuuk from taking property without just compensation and does not allege that Chuuk's alleged acts violated any FSM Constitutional provision, his complaint does not appear to allege claims arising under national law and thus does not show FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 182, 184 (Chk. 2012).

A writ of habeas corpus may be used in situations involving an individual incarcerated without probable cause. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 320 (Kos. 2012).

The FSM Supreme Court has the power to issue all writs and must consider a petition for a writ of habeas corpus alleging imprisonment of the petitioner in violation of his rights under the FSM Constitution. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 321 (Kos. 2012).

In the absence of any statutory restrictions, the FSM Supreme Court will, under the proper circumstances, consider applications for a writ of habeas corpus on the grounds that a person is in custody in violation of the FSM Constitution. The overriding purpose of such a writ is to protect an individual's right to be free from wrongful intrusions and restraints upon their liberty. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 322 (Kos. 2012).

It is within the FSM Supreme Court's province to determine whether a Chuuk statute, as applied, runs afoul of the FSM Constitution. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 505 (Chk. 2013).

If the case arises under the FSM Constitution, national law, or treaties, then the FSM Supreme Court trial division has concurrent jurisdiction over the subject-matter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

For some cases arising under national law, Congress has placed exclusive jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court trial division. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 n.1 (Pon. 2013).

The determination of whether a case is one "arising under" the FSM Constitution, national law, or treaties is derived from the plaintiff's cause of action, not inferred from any possible defenses. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

Since the Constitution explicitly grants the FSM Supreme Court trial division concurrent and original jurisdiction over any cases arising under treaties and since a breach of the inviolability of the embassy premises is a direct violation of an international treaty and international law, the FSM Supreme Court trial division has original jurisdiction over a prosecution for a misdemeanor trespass and theft committed in a foreign embassy. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 491-92 (Pon. 2014).

As a defense raised in the answer to the original complaint, a defendant's due process claims would not make it a case over which the FSM Supreme Court would have jurisdiction because it would not be considered a case arising under the FSM Constitution or national law. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. 2014).

The determination of whether a case is one "arising under" the FSM Constitution, national law, or treaties is derived from the plaintiff's cause of action, not inferred from any possible defenses that are or that might be raised. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. 2014).

Since a cross-claim cannot form a basis for the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction because determination of whether a case arises under the Constitution, national law, or a treaty is based on the plaintiff's statement of his cause of action, not on whatever defenses that are or that might be raised, a third-party claim should not create subject-matter jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court either. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. 2014).

When the case is not a case arising under the FSM Constitution or national laws, the only grounds asserted for jurisdiction, the FSM Supreme Court does not have subject-matter jurisdiction over it, and when the FSM Supreme Court does not have any subject-matter jurisdiction over a case, the case will be dismissed without prejudice to any later adjudication in a state court. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 58 (Pon. 2015).

The FSM Constitution's Article VII, section 2 provides no basis for a party to seek relief in the FSM Supreme Court and no basis on which the party is likely to prevail when the party does not argue that the Chuuk has an undemocratic constitution but instead contends that the Chuuk executive branch is expending Chuuk state funds (albeit originally appropriated by Congress) without an appropriation of those funds by the Chuuk Legislature and that this is a violation of Chuuk's democratic constitution. Mailo v. Lawrence, 20 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2015).

Article XI, Section 6(b) grants the national courts concurrent original jurisdiction in cases arising under national law and these forums include the FSM Supreme Court trial division and any other national courts which might be established by statute, but not state courts. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 516 (App. 2016).

"Arising under" jurisdiction was limited to those matters, in which four factors exist: 1) a national law issue is an essential element of the cause of action; 2) the issue of national law is disclosed upon the complaint's face; 3) the issue of law is not inferred from a defense which is asserted and 4) the issue of law is a substantial one. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 (App. 2016).

The framers' intent was that "arising under" jurisdiction extend to cases involving the enforcement of a right protected or created by the national constitution, national law, or treaty and cases involving the construction or interpretation of the national constitution, national law, or treaty. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 (App. 2016).

In light of the self-executing grants of jurisdiction embodied within the FSM Constitution, the United States decisions, which address the underlying congressional intent, provide little guidance, in terms of analysis of the Article XI, Section 6(b) "arising under" language, against the backdrop of a constitutional provision. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 (App. 2016).

Arising under jurisdiction enables the FSM Supreme Court to explicate the meaning of our Constitution's jurisdictional grants and thereby ensure an appropriate level of uniformity in the applicability thereof. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 518 (App. 2016).

Concurrent jurisdiction properly exists given the diverse citizenship of the parties or when consonant with the "arising under" constitutional provision. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 518 (App. 2016).

When the complaint alleges violation of the plaintiff's civil rights under the FSM Constitution, the FSM Supreme Court has before it, at a bare minimum, a case that arises under the FSM Constitution and the court thus has jurisdiction under Section 6(b), with the state law matters that may be considered under the court's pendent jurisdiction. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 278 (Pon. 2017).

The FSM Supreme Court has held it may exercise jurisdiction over appeals from state administrative agencies when those appeals have included due process violation and civil rights claims arising under the FSM Constitution. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 442 (Pon. 2018).

When the defendant is not a governmental entity, is not alleged to have acted under color of law, and is not a private person (not acting under color of law) who injured, oppressed, threatened, or intimidated the plaintiff exercising or enjoying or having exercised or enjoyed any civil right, the plaintiff's claim is not a civil rights claim. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. 2019).

The determination of whether a case is one "arising under" the FSM Constitution, national law, or a treaty is derived from the plaintiff's cause of action and not inferred from any possible defense that is or that might be pled. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. 2019).

Whether an allegedly defamatory pleading in a case filed in a national court is privileged or actionable should be decided as a matter of national law and is thus a matter arising under national law. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2019).

A case that alleges that a state law is, or contains, a bill of attainder in violation of the FSM Constitution is a claim that arises under the Constitution and over which the FSM Supreme Court may exercise jurisdiction. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

As the constitutional prohibition of bills of attainder bars all such legislative acts, if a state law is a bill of attainder, the FSM Supreme Court has the jurisdiction to strike it (or the part of it that is a bill of attainder) down as unconstitutional and to enjoin its enforcement. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 263 (Chk. 2019).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a case as one arising under the Constitution, national law, or treaties, when the plaintiff asserts that the defendants violated three different FSM Constitution provisions and also violated an FSM Code provision. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 328 (Pon.

Congress's power to regulate bankruptcy and insolvency is an exclusive national power, and bankruptcy cases are, by law, assigned to the FSM Supreme Court trial division. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 351 (Pon. 2019).

Any claim that a bankruptcy receiver was overcompensated is solely a matter of national (bankruptcy) law, and a claim that a bankruptcy receiver paid the creditors of a debtor, who had sought bankruptcy protection, more than was their due is also a matter arising only under national bankruptcy law. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 351 (Pon. 2019).

– Diversity

The Trust Territory is not a foreign state such as to give the FSM Supreme Court diversity jurisdiction over a suit against the Trust Territory. Neimes v. Maeda Constr. Co., 1 FSM R. 47, 51 (Truk 1982).

Under the present state of affairs, the Trust Territory government cannot be considered a foreign state, citizen or subject thereof within the meaning of article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 74 (Kos. 1982).

The Federated States of Micronesia Supreme Court is specifically given jurisdiction over disputes between citizens of a state and foreign citizens. FSM Const. art. XI, § 6(b). The jurisdiction is based upon the citizenship of the parties, not on the subject matter of the dispute. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 101 (Pon. 1982).

The Constitution places diversity jurisdiction in the Supreme Court, despite the fact that the issues involve matters within state or local, rather than national, legislative powers. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 102 (Pon. 1982).

A primary purpose of diversity jurisdiction is to minimize any belief of the parties that a more local tribunal might favor local parties in disputes with "outsiders." In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 102 (Pon. 1982).

A requirement for complete diversity among all parties has no constitutional support as a prerequisite to FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 105-06 (Pon. 1982).

When jurisdiction exists by virtue of diversity of the parties, the FSM Supreme Court may resolve the dispute despite the fact that matters squarely within the legislative powers of states (e.g., probate, inheritance and land issues) may be involved. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 392-93 (Pon. 1984).

Diversity of citizenship is determined as of commencement of the action. Where diversity existed between the parties at the date and time the suit commenced, diversity will not be defeated by later developments. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 414 (Pon. 1984).

Where there is diversity of citizenship between the parties, litigation involving domestic relations issues, including custody and child support, falls within the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Mongkeya v. Brackett, 2 FSM R. 291, 292 (Kos. 1986).

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution, a corporation is considered a foreign citizen when any of its shareholders are not citizens of the Federated States of Micronesia. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage (III), 3 FSM R. 256, 260 (Pon. 1987).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has often decided matters of tort law without stating explicitly that state rather than national law controls, there has been acknowledgment that state law controls in the resolution of contract and tort issues. When the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, decides a matter of state law, its goal should be to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 360 n.22 (Pon. 1988).

Lack of mention of state and local courts in FSM Constitution article XI, section 6(b) reveals that national courts are to play the primary role in handling the kinds of cases, identified in that section, but nothing in article XI, section 6(b) may be read as absolutely preventing state courts from exercising jurisdiction over those kinds of cases. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 379 (Pon. 1988).

Parties to a dispute in which there is diversity have a constitutional right to invoke the jurisdiction of a national court, but if all parties agree, and if state law permits, a state court may hear and decide the kinds of cases described in article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 379 (Pon. 1988).

Only national courts are given jurisdiction by article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution and the concurrent jurisdiction referred to there is between the trial division of the FSM Supreme Court, and any other national courts which may be established in the future. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 377 (Pon. 1988).

The Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, which still exists and has governmental powers in the Republic of Palau, is now "foreign" to the Federated States of Micronesia and a corporation organized under the laws of the Trust Territory may itself be regarded as foreign for purposes of diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 392 (Pon. 1988).

The Constitution requires only that one plaintiff has citizenship different from one defendant for there to be diversity jurisdiction. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 392 (Pon. 1988).

The national Constitution does not prohibit state courts from hearing cases described in article XI, section 6(b) if all parties accept state court jurisdiction, but parties to a dispute within scope of article XI, section 6(b) have a constitutional rights to invoke jurisdiction of FSM Supreme Court trial division. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 392 (Pon. 1988).

Intent of framers of the Constitution was that national courts would handle most types of cases described in article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution and national courts therefore should not lightly find a waiver of right to invoke its jurisdiction. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 394 (Pon. 1988).

A party named as a defendant in state court litigation which falls within the scope of article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution may invoke national court jurisdiction through a petition for removal and is not required to file a complaint. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 394 (Pon. 1988).

The Truk State Court will not assert jurisdiction in a diversity case because the "The national courts, including the trial division of the Supreme Court, have concurrent original jurisdiction . . . in disputes between a state and a citizen of another state, between citizens of different states, and between a state or a citizen thereof, and a foreign state, or subject." FSM Const. art. XI, § 6(b). Flossman v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 438, 440 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

State courts are not prohibited by article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution from hearing and determining cases where the defendants are from FSM states other than the prosecuting state. Jurisdiction over criminal matters between the national and state governments is determined by the severity of the crime; not diversity of citizenship. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 543, 554 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1988).

"Concurrent jurisdiction" as used in article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution means concurrent jurisdiction between national courts, including the trial divisions of the FSM Supreme Court and of the four state courts. Pohnpei v. Hawk, 3 FSM R. 543, 554-55 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1988).

When all of the parties are citizens of foreign states there is no diversity of citizenship subject matter jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b). International Trading Co. v. Hitec Corp., 4 FSM R. 1, 2 (Truk 1989).

A joint venture, without the powers to sue or be sued in the name of the association and without limited liability of the individual members of the association, is not a citizen of Truk State for diversity purposes even though its principal place of business is in Truk State. International Trading Corp. v. Hitec Corp., 4 FSM R. 1, 2 (Truk 1989).

A cautious, reasoned use of the doctrine of abstention is not a violation of the FSM Supreme Court's duty to exercise diversity jurisdiction, or of the litigants' constitutional rights, under article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 39 (Pon. 1989).

While the FSM Constitution provides initial access to the FSM Supreme Court for any party in article XI, section 6(b) litigation, the court may, having familiarized itself with the issues, invoke the doctrine of abstention and permit the case to proceed in a state court, since the power to grant abstention is inherent in the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court, and nothing in the FSM Constitution precludes the court from abstaining in cases which fall within its jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b). Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 42-43 (Pon. 1989).

No jurisdiction is conferred on state courts by article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution, but neither does the diversity jurisdiction of section 6(b) preclude state courts from acting under state law, unless or until a party to the litigation invokes national court jurisdiction. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 89 (App. 1989).

It is consistent with the broad plan of the framers of the FSM Constitution that the Constitution would not require that diversity jurisdiction be available in criminal proceedings. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 94 (App. 1989).

Although the purpose of diversity jurisdiction is to provide parties who are not citizens of the state where a matter arises with a national forum for which the federation of states is responsible, the need to safeguard the legitimate rights of a noncitizen in a state forum must be balanced against the understandable concern of the society of that state to control standards of behavior in accordance with its own set of values. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 94 (App. 1989).

The diversity jurisdiction provisions of article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution do not apply to criminal proceedings. Hawk v. Pohnpei, 4 FSM R. 85, 94 (App. 1989).

Jurisdiction based upon diversity of citizenship between the parties is concurrent in the Supreme Court and the national courts, and therefore a party to state court litigation where diversity exists has a constitutional right to invoke the jurisdiction of the national court. In re Estate of Hartman, 4 FSM R. 386, 387 (Chk. 1989).

Issues concerning land usually fall into state court jurisdiction, but if there are diverse parties having bona fide interests in the case or dispute, the Constitution places jurisdiction in the national courts even if interests in land are at issue. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 246 (Pon. 1991).

When an estate is a party it is the citizenship of the estate representative that is to be considered for diversity purposes. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 246 (Pon. 1991).

Where, for six and a half years after the national court had come into existence the noncitizen petitioners made no attempt to invoke the national court's jurisdiction, the noncitizen petitioners affirmatively indicated their willingness to have the case resolved in court proceedings, first in the Trust Territory High Court and later in Pohnpei state court, and thus have waived their right to diversity jurisdiction in the national courts. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 247-48 (Pon. 1991).

The fact that a "tactical stipulation," made in 1988 to eliminate all noncitizens as parities to the litigation and thus place the litigation within the sole jurisdiction of the state court, may have been violated in 1991, does not retroactively change the effect of the stipulation for purposes of jurisdiction. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 248 (Pon. 1991).

National courts can exercise jurisdiction over divorce cases where there is diversity of citizenship although domestic relations are primarily the subject of state law. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 335, 336 (Pon. 1992).

In a diversity of citizenship case the FSM Supreme Court will normally apply state law. Youngstrom v. Youngstrom, 5 FSM R. 335, 337 (Pon. 1992).

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction a corporation is considered a foreign citizen when any of its shareholders are not FSM citizens. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 44 (App. 1995).

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction a joint venture is considered a foreign citizen when the parties to it are not FSM citizens. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 44 (App. 1995).

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction it is the citizenship of the estate administrator that is to be considered for determining citizenship of a decedent's estate. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 44 (App. 1995).

Where the constitutional language itself, following FSM precedents on constitutional interpretation, only requires minimal diversity for the national courts to have jurisdiction, and the constitutional journals do not reveal any intent to depart from the plain meaning of the constitutional language, there are no sound reasons why twelve years of FSM jurisprudence requiring only minimal diversity should be overturned. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 48 (App. 1995).

The FSM Supreme Court has diversity jurisdiction only in disputes between a state and a citizen of another state, between citizens of different states, and between a state or a citizen thereof, and a foreign state, citizen, or subject. Diversity jurisdiction thus does not exist when all the parties are foreign citizens, even though they may be citizens of different foreign nations. In such cases, the court's subject matter jurisdiction must be based on some other ground. Trance v. Penta Ocean Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 147, 148 (Chk. 1995).

For the purposes of diversity jurisdiction the citizenship of a corporation is considered foreign if any of its shareholders are not FSM citizens or if it was organized under the laws of a foreign government. The citizenship of a corporation formed in the FSM and wholly owned by FSM citizens is in the state of its principal place of business. Ladore v. U Corp., 7 FSM R. 296, 298 (Pon. 1995).

In a diversity case, a litigant may avail himself of the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction even though state law may determine the outcome of the litigation. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 18, 22 (Yap 1999).

There is no statutory or decisional authority in the FSM which would permit a joint venture to be considered a citizen of the state where its principal place of business is located. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 220, 223 (Yap 1999).

A corporation that has any foreign ownership at all is a noncitizen of the FSM for diversity purposes. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 220, 223 (Yap 1999).

Any business entity in which any ownership interest is held by a person who is not a citizen of the FSM is a non-citizen. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 220, 223 & n.1 (Yap 1999).

A general partnership is a foreign citizen for diversity purposes when any ownership interest is held by a foreign citizen. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 220, 223-24 (Yap 1999).

In order to invoke the FSM Supreme Court's diversity jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution, only one plaintiff need have citizenship different from one defendant. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 288, 290 (Yap 1999).

Since the FSM Supreme Court can decide a land issue under its diversity jurisdiction, the mere addition of the national government as another party to a diversity case should not divest the FSM Supreme Court of jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2001).

In determining the question of jurisdiction based on the parties' citizenship, the FSM Supreme Court must look only to the parties of record. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

When diverse citizenship was not present on the record in a case when it was removed, it cannot be created by the FSM Supreme Court's order when the court lacks the jurisdiction to issue any but procedural orders. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

When the FSM Supreme Court does not have subject-matter jurisdiction in a case, it does not have the authority or jurisdiction to issue an order joining a diverse party, and any such order it did issue would be void for want of jurisdiction. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

A state court joinder of a diverse party does not deprive the state court of jurisdiction, it merely makes its jurisdiction concurrent with the FSM Supreme Court. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court does not have diversity jurisdiction under Article XI, section 6(b) over disputes between two foreign citizens, even if they are citizens of different countries. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 203 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Constitution grants the FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction over disputes between a citizen of an FSM state and a citizen of a foreign state. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 242 (App. 2001).

No jurisdiction is conferred on state courts by article XI, section 6(b) but neither does section 6(b) diversity jurisdiction preclude state courts from acting under state law, unless or until a party to the litigation invokes national court jurisdiction. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 242 (App. 2001).

Both a state court and a national court may have jurisdiction over a case where, absent diversity considerations, the case is otherwise properly before the state court. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 242 (App. 2001).

In a diversity case, a plaintiff, as the party initiating suit, can file her action in either state or national court, and if she files in state court, the defendant has two alternatives, either to litigate on the merits in state court or to remove the matter to national court. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 242-43 (App. 2001).

The benefit the Constitution secures to diverse parties is the right to litigate in national court. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

The fact of the parties' diversity, without more, does not preclude a suit in state court because to invoke national court jurisdiction so as to divest a state court of jurisdiction means to remove the action to national court. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

A motion to dismiss a state court case because of diversity neither divests the state court of jurisdiction nor invokes the FSM Supreme Court's diversity jurisdiction. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

To invoke national court jurisdiction in a diversity case, a removal petition must be filed within 60 days of a party's receipt of papers from which his right to remove the case may first be ascertained. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

Failure to file a removal petition within the time requirements of FSM General Court Order 1992-2 constitutes a waiver of the right to invoke national court jurisdiction in cases involving parties of diverse citizenship. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

In diversity cases, state courts otherwise having jurisdiction pursuant to state law are not divested of jurisdiction unless or until a removal petition is timely filed, prompt written notice of such filing is served upon all parties, and a copy of the petition is filed with the state court clerk. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

Section 6(b) does not grant the FSM Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction over diversity cases. Section 6(b) does not bar a state court from exercising jurisdiction over a case in which the parties are of diverse citizenship, if the state court otherwise has jurisdiction. First Hawaiian Bank v. Berdon, 10 FSM R. 538, 539 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

If diverse parties wished to have a case in the Chuuk State Supreme Court heard in the FSM Supreme Court, they should have removed the case to the FSM Supreme Court using the procedure outlined in FSM General Court Order 1992-2. When they have not, a motion to dismiss filed in the Chuuk State Supreme Court will not invoke that court's jurisdiction. First Hawaiian Bank v. Berdon, 10 FSM R. 538, 539 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

There is no requirement of complete diversity of parties for the FSM Supreme Court to have jurisdiction over a matter. The FSM Constitution requires only that one plaintiff has citizenship different from one defendant for there to be diversity jurisdiction. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 17, 23 (Pon. 2002).

For purposes of diversity jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution, a corporation is considered a foreign citizen when any of its shareholders are not citizens of the FSM. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 17, 24 (Pon. 2002).

When jurisdiction exists by virtue of the parties' diversity, the FSM Supreme Court may resolve the dispute despite the fact that matters squarely within the states' legislative powers (e.g., probate, inheritance and land issues) may be involved. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 100 (Pon. 2002).

In property cases, if there are diverse parties having bona fide interests in the case or dispute, the FSM Constitution places jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court, and this is so even if interests in land are at issue in the litigation. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 100 (Pon. 2002).

A party to a dispute within the scope of article XI, section 6(b) has a constitutional right to invoke the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 100 (Pon. 2002).

The FSM Supreme Court has concurrent jurisdiction along with the state courts to hear cases where diversity of citizenship of the parties exists. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 2002).

It is well settled that the FSM Supreme Court may hear cases based on diversity even when land is at issue. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 2002).

The FSM Supreme Court cannot imply or create diversity of citizenship in a case. If it does not have subject matter jurisdiction in a case, it does not have the authority or jurisdiction to issue an order joining another party. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 110 (Pon. 2002).

Diversity jurisdiction does not exist when all the parties are foreign citizens, even though they may be citizens of different foreign nations. In such cases, the FSM Supreme Court's subject matter jurisdiction must be based on some other ground. Kelly v. Lee, 11 FSM R. 116, 117 (Chk. 2002).

A motion to dismiss for lack of diversity jurisdiction will be denied when the plaintiff's complaint does not plead diversity jurisdiction (found in section 6(b) of article XI of the Constitution), but clearly pleads that the court's jurisdiction under section 6(a), and when a fair reading of the plaintiff's claim is that it is based on the defendant's alleged breach of a maritime contract – the plaintiff's employment contract as a ship's captain. This, coupled with the complaint's allegation that the court has jurisdiction based on section 6(a), which provides for FSM Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction over certain cases including admiralty and maritime cases, indicates that the plaintiff did not base his jurisdictional plea on the parties' citizenship, but upon the case's alleged maritime nature. Kelly v. Lee, 11 FSM R. 116, 117 (Chk. 2002).

A corporation partly owned by non-FSM citizens, is a foreign citizen for diversity jurisdiction purposes because a corporation is deemed a foreign citizen when any of its shareholders are not FSM citizens. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 155 (Chk. 2002).

If diversity of citizenship among the parties were not present and there were no other basis of jurisdiction, the FSM Supreme Court would be without subject matter jurisdiction, and any judgment it might render would be void and without any res judicata effect because all proceedings that had taken place would have been for naught, and the plaintiffs would have to start all over again in state court if they still wished to pursue the matter. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 155 n.1 (Chk. 2002).

It is well established that the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction as a result of the parties' diversity of citizenship. Villazon v. Mafnas, 11 FSM R. 309, 310 (Pon. 2003).

It is well established that diversity is determined as of the commencement of the action. Once diversity jurisdiction attaches, or vests, it is not defeated by later developments, such as a party's later change of domicile or the dismissal of a party due to partial settlement. Island Homes Constr. Corp. v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 12 FSM R. 128, 129 (Pon. 2003).

When a consolidated case is before the FSM Supreme Court trial division under its diversity jurisdiction – because of the parties' diverse citizenship – state law will usually provide the rules of decision. This is especially true in real property cases. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 189 (Chk. 2003).

In a diversity case, the FSM Supreme Court trial division has no greater and no lesser power than the state court would have if it were hearing the case. It may exercise whatever powers the state court could have if the case been before that court. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 189 (Chk. 2003).

It has been a principle of long standing that, for purposes of diversity jurisdiction under the Constitution's article XI, section 6(b), a corporation or a joint venture is considered a foreign citizen when any of its shareholders are not FSM citizens. Its place of incorporation is irrelevant. Geoffrey Hughes (Export) Pty, Ltd. v. America Ducksan Co., 12 FSM R. 413, 414 (Chk. 2004).

When all parties to an action are foreign citizens, even if they are citizens of different foreign countries, the FSM Supreme Court does not have diversity jurisdiction. Geoffrey Hughes (Export) Pty, Ltd. v. America Ducksan Co., 12 FSM R. 413, 415 (Chk. 2004).

Section 6(b) of Article XI of the FSM Constitution provides that the national courts, including the Supreme Court trial division, have concurrent original jurisdiction in cases arising under the Constitution, national law or treaties, and in disputes between a state and a citizen of another state, between citizens of different states, and between a state or citizen thereof, and a foreign state, citizen, or subject. The national courts referred to in this section are the FSM Supreme Court trial division and any other national courts which may be established in the future. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 147 (App. 2005).

Section 6(a) contains a single jurisdictional exception limited in scope to a case involving the national government as a party. In contrast, Section 6(b) contains no exception of any kind. This admits of no conclusion other than the obvious one: the Framers intended that the limited exception stated in Section 6(a) apply to cases involving an interest in land in which the national government is a party, and with equal force intended that no such exception apply to any of the kinds of cases specified in Section 6(b). Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 148 (App. 2005).

The adoption of Committee Proposal No. 01-5 by the Third Constitutional Convention does not act as a check upon the exercise of the FSM Supreme Court's diversity jurisdiction in land cases because the proposed amendment was not ratified by the people. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 150 (App. 2005).

Parties to a dispute within the scope of article XI, section 6(b) have a constitutional right to invoke the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court and it is the solemn obligation of the court and all others within the Federated States of Micronesia to uphold that constitutional right to invoke national court jurisdiction under Article XI, Section 6(b). To accept the contention that the FSM Supreme Court trial division has no jurisdiction in diversity cases involving land would defeat the exercise of that right. The court upholds the right of litigants who fall within the scope of Article XI, Section 6(b) to invoke the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction in cases involving land issues. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 150 (App. 2005).

If in the complaint, a plaintiff asserts a contractual cause of action over which the FSM Supreme Court may exercise diversity jurisdiction, whether the defendants might ultimately prevail on one or more of their defenses does not deprive the FSM Supreme Court of subject matter jurisdiction. McVey v. Etscheit, 13 FSM R. 473, 476 (Pon. 2005).

Minimal diversity of citizenship, not complete diversity, is the rule in the Federated States of Micronesia. Lee v. Han, 13 FSM R. 571, 576 (Chk. 2005).

Diversity jurisdiction gives concurrent original jurisdiction to the state and national courts. FSM GCO 1992-2 provides for removal of diversity cases from the state to national courts and is directed solely to the issue of the transfer of cases between the state and national courts. It provides a procedure for removal, not authority for dismissal from state court. Muller v. Enlet, 16 FSM R. 92, 94 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A motion to dismiss filed in the Chuuk State Supreme Court asserting non-consent to the court's jurisdiction will not, by its invocation of the FSM court's jurisdiction, deprive the Chuuk State Supreme court of its jurisdiction. Rather, in diversity cases, state courts otherwise having jurisdiction pursuant to state law are not divested of jurisdiction unless or until a removal petition is timely filed, prompt written notice of such filing is served upon all parties, and a copy of the petition is filed with the state court clerk. Thus, when an action is originally filed in state court, the state court retains its jurisdiction, despite the diversity of parties, so long as the same action is not filed in or removed to the FSM court. An allegation of diversity jurisdiction is not a proper basis for a defendant's motion to dismiss. Muller v. Enlet, 16 FSM R. 92, 94 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the parties are of diverse citizenship and when some of the plaintiff's claims arise under a treaty to which the FSM is a party, the FSM Supreme Court would, on either ground, have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case if an actual case or dispute exists. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 157 (Chk. 2010).

Since national court jurisdiction is proper when the parties are diverse, a Kosrae statute that requires a foreclosure action to be filed in Kosrae State Court cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of its constitutionally mandated jurisdiction under the FSM Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 325 (Kos. 2011).

Minimal diversity, not complete diversity, is the rule in the Federated States of Micronesia. Damarlane v. U Mun. Gov't, 18 FSM R. 96, 98 (Pon. 2011).

When a fair reading of the complaint does not show a cause of action against the one diverse defendant, that person is thus merely a nominal party present only so that the plaintiff can plead the court's diversity jurisdiction. When the plaintiff has, for the sole purpose of attempting to create diversity of citizenship, named a person as a defendant against whom he asserts no cause of action or claim for relief, the court will dismiss the nominal diverse defendant from the case as improperly joined and then dismiss the complaint for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because there was no actual diversity of citizenship when the case was filed. Hauk v. Mijares, 18 FSM R. 185, 187 (Chk. 2012).

The court does not believe that it can exercise jurisdiction over every credit dispute between a customer and a local business merely because that business has a foreign accountant (or manager) who a plaintiff can name as a nominal, but diverse, defendant. Hauk v. Mijares, 18 FSM R. 185, 187 (Chk. 2012).

A Chuukese plaintiff in a suit against a Chuukese business or other Chuukese entity cannot create jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court merely by adding the defendant's non-citizen employees as co-defendants when the plaintiff's claims are only against the employer. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 409, 411 (Chk. 2012).

Even though a court must exercise its discretion liberally to grant leave to amend a complaint, the court should deny a motion to amend when it would be futile to amend the complaint to add diverse parties from whom no relief can be obtained since they are not statutorily liable to plaintiff. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 18 FSM R. 409, 411 (Chk. 2012).

If the case involves parties of diverse (different) citizenship, then the FSM Supreme Court trial division has concurrent jurisdiction, unless all the parties are foreign citizens. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

Only minimal, not complete, diversity of citizenship is required for subject-matter jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

If a party is a corporation, the corporation's citizenship is the citizenship of its shareholders and, for purposes of diversity jurisdiction, a corporation is considered a foreign citizen when any of its shareholders are not FSM citizens. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

Even if the FSM Development Bank were not an FSM national government agency, the FSM Supreme Court would still have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case as one between a plaintiff corporation with Chuuk and Kosrae citizenship and Pohnpei citizen defendants. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 618 (Pon. 2013).

Complete diversity of citizenship is not a requirement for the FSM Supreme Court to have subject-matter jurisdiction in a diversity case; only minimal diversity is required. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 653, 656 (Pon. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court is empowered to exercise authority in probate matters when there is an independent basis for jurisdiction under the Constitution, and the court has found such an independent basis when there was a diversity of citizenship among the heirs. In re Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 59, 61 (Kos. 2013).

Parties to a dispute within the scope of article XI, section 6(b) diversity jurisdiction have a constitutional right to invoke the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction and it is the solemn obligation of the court and all others within the Federated States of Micronesia to uphold the constitutional right to invoke national court jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b). Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court's solemn obligation to consider the interests and protect the rights of those who wish to invoke its constitutional jurisdiction counsels against the unfettered use of abstention. The benefit the Constitution secures to diverse parties is the right to litigate in national court. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

A diverse party's constitutional right to litigate in the FSM Supreme Court should not lightly be disregarded, and the FSM Supreme Court's discretionary power to abstain must be exercised carefully and sparingly. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

Diversity cases where the causes of action are state law are not subject to abstention and dismissal at a judge's whim. That would make the constitutional right for diverse parties to litigate in the FSM Supreme Court an empty one. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

When jurisdiction exists by virtue of diversity of the parties, the FSM Supreme Court may resolve the dispute despite the fact that matters squarely within the legislative powers of states (e.g., probate, inheritance and land issues) may be involved. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 431 (App. 2014).

A long line of precedents supports diversity jurisdiction as a proper independent basis for national jurisdiction of probate matters. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 431 (App. 2014).

The Constitution only requires minimal diversity. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 431 n.2 (App. 2014).

When the legal issue of whether the foreign citizen CPUC Chief Executive Officer could be a defendant in a lawsuit by the Chuuk Health Care Plan to collect unpaid health insurance premiums, thereby creating diversity jurisdiction, was previously litigated and a final decision rendered concluding that it could not be done; when the time to appeal that decision has expired; and when the same parties are present, res judicata bars the action in the FSM Supreme Court and the case will be dismissed without prejudice to any action in the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Waite, 20 FSM R. 282, 285 (Chk. 2016).

A corporation's citizenship, for diversity purposes, is the citizenship of its shareholders and only minimal diversity need exist. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 516 (App. 2016).

Concurrent jurisdiction properly exists given the diverse citizenship of the parties or when consonant with the "arising under" constitutional provision. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 518 (App. 2016).

A corporation's citizenship, for diversity purposes, is the citizenship of its shareholders and only minimal diversity need exist. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 36 (Pon. 2016).

Only minimal diversity of citizenship is needed to invoke the FSM Supreme Court's diversity jurisdiction. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 148 (Chk. 2019).

A corporation's citizenship, for diversity purposes, is the citizenship of its shareholders. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 148 (Chk. 2019).

If a non-profit corporation has no shareholders, its citizenship for diversity purposes should be the citizenship of its members, or, if it has no members, of its incorporators. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 148 (Chk. 2019).

If a party is an unincorporated association, then its citizenship is the citizenship of the association's individual members. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 148 (Chk. 2019).

Diversity jurisdiction does not exist when all parties are foreign citizens, even if they are citizens of different countries. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 148 (Chk. 2019).

When diversity jurisdiction does not exist, the FSM Supreme Court's subject-matter jurisdiction must be based on some other ground. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. 2019).

When there is diversity of citizenship between the parties, litigation involving domestic relations issues, including custody and child support, falls within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction, even though state law will furnish the rules of decision. O'Sonis v. O'Sonis, 22 FSM R. 268, 269 (Chk. 2019).

The FSM Supreme Court has diversity jurisdiction over a case where an FSM citizen sues a foreign citizen regardless of how long the foreign citizen has resided in the FSM or whether she is married to an FSM citizen. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 351 (Pon. 2019).

– Exclusive FSM Supreme Court

The National Criminal Code places in the FSM Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction over allegations of violations of the Code. No exception to that jurisdiction is provided for juveniles, so charges of crimes leveled against juveniles are governed by the National Criminal Code. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 15 (Pon. 1981).

A seaman's contract claim against the owner of the vessel upon which he served would be regarded as falling within the FSM Supreme Court's exclusive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. FSM Const. art. XI, § 6(a). Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 68-71 (Kos. 1982).

The FSM Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government and part of the national government for the purposes of FSM Constitution article XI, section 6(a), giving the trial division of the Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction over cases in which the national government is a party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Nanpei, 2 FSM R. 217, 221 (Pon. 1986).

In an action on a delinquent promissory note brought by an instrumentality of the national government which seeks to foreclose the mortgage securing the payment of the note, prior to the filing of an answer no interest in land is at issue, and therefore, the motion to dismiss on the ground that the court lacked jurisdiction is denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mori, 2 FSM R. 242, 244 (Truk 1987).

A dispute arising out of injury sustained by a passenger on a vessel transporting passengers from Kosrae to Pohnpei, at a time when the vessel is 30 miles from Kosrae, falls within the exclusive admiralty jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Weilbacher v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 320, 323 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The FSM Supreme Court's grant of original and exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty and maritime cases implies the adoption of admiralty or maritime cases as of the drafting and adoption of the FSM Constitution. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 57, 59 (Truk 1989).

The enforcement of ships' mortgages does not come within the admiralty jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 57, 60 (Truk 1989).

The maritime jurisdiction conferred on the FSM Supreme Court by the Constitution is not to be decided with reference to the details of United States cases and statutes concerning admiralty jurisdiction but instead with reference to the general maritime law of seafaring nations of the world, and to the law of nations. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 374 (App. 1990).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over all cases which are maritime in nature including all maritime contracts, torts and injuries. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 374 (App. 1990).

The question of the enforceability of ship mortgages is a matter that falls within the maritime jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court under article XI, section 6(a) of the Constitution. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 376 (App. 1990).

Where a claim is against the national government and an interest in land is not placed at issue the claim is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court and it cannot abstain on the claim. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 67A, 67E (Pon. 1991).

The framers of the Constitution made clear that the term "exclusive" in article XI, section 6(a) of the FSM Constitution means that for the types of cases listed in that section, the trial division of the FSM Supreme Court is the only court of jurisdiction. Faw v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 33, 35 (Yap 1993).

A state law cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of exclusive jurisdiction in cases arising under article XI, section 6(a) of the FSM Constitution. Faw v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 33, 36-37 (Yap 1993).

The FSM Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction in actions by the national government to enforce the terms of fishing agreements and permits to which it is a party. FSM v. Hai Hsiang No. 63, 7 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 1995).

The FSM Supreme Court has original and exclusive jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases. This grant of exclusive jurisdiction is not made dependent upon constitutional grants of powers to other branches of the national government. When the Supreme Court's jurisdiction is exclusive it cannot abstain from deciding a case in favor of another court in the FSM because no other court in the country has jurisdiction. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 459 (App. 1996).

Only the FSM Supreme Court has original and exclusive jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime and certain other cases under the Constitution. The other national courts authorized by the Constitution, but which Congress has never created, are only authorized to entertain cases of concurrent jurisdiction, and thus could never exercise jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases. Maritime jurisdiction can reside only in one national court – the Supreme Court. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 460 n.2 (App. 1996).

Actions to enforce in personam civil penalties for violations of state fishing laws are within the exclusive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 464-65 (App. 1996).

The FSM Supreme Court has original and exclusive jurisdiction over a suit on an FSM Development Bank promissory note because the national government is a party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 4 (Chk. 2001).

Jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases resides exclusively with the FSM Supreme Court trial division. The language of the FSM Constitution is clear and unambiguous in this regard. Robert v. Sonis, 11 FSM R. 31, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The exclusive nature of the national court jurisdiction is such that the FSM Supreme Court appellate division has held that it does not have the power to abstain from admiralty and maritime cases. Robert v. Sonis, 11 FSM R. 31, 33 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Plaintiffs cannot rely on a default judgment entered in excess of the trial court's jurisdiction in another case as conferring jurisdiction on the court in their cases. Robert v. Sonis, 11 FSM R. 31, 33 (Chk. S. Ct.

The only time the FSM Supreme Court does not have original and exclusive jurisdiction over the types of cases enumerated in Section 6(a) is in those specific cases where the national government is a party and an interest in land is at issue. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 2002).

A motion to dismiss for lack of diversity jurisdiction will be denied when the plaintiff's complaint does not plead diversity jurisdiction (found in section 6(b) of article XI of the Constitution), but clearly pleads that the court's jurisdiction under section 6(a), and when a fair reading of the plaintiff's claim is that it is based on the defendant's alleged breach of a maritime contract – the plaintiff's employment contract as a ship's captain. This, coupled with the complaint's allegation that the court has jurisdiction based on section 6(a), which provides for FSM Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction over certain cases including admiralty and maritime cases, indicates that the plaintiff did not base his jurisdictional plea on the parties' citizenship, but upon the case's alleged maritime nature. Kelly v. Lee, 11 FSM R. 116, 117 (Chk. 2002).

In contrast to Section 6(b), Section 6(a) of Article XI provides that the Supreme Court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction in cases affecting officials of foreign governments, disputes between states, admiralty or maritime cases, and in cases in which the national government is a party except where an interest in land is at issue. Section 6(a) names four different types of cases: 1) those affecting officials of foreign governments; 2) those involving disputes between states; 3) those that are admiralty or maritime in character; and 4) those where the national government is a party. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 148 (App. 2005).

Section 6(a) carves out a specific exception for cases involving land – the trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction in cases in which the national government is a party except where an interest in land is at issue. Or to cast this as a negative, the trial division does not have original and exclusive jurisdiction in a case in which the national government is a party and an interest in land is at issue. Gilmete v. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co., 13 FSM R. 145, 148 (App. 2005).

A case involving the hazardous duty pay claims of fifty-eight port operators and seamen employed by the defendants on Federated States of Micronesia Class III vessels comes before the FSM Supreme Court on the court's exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty and maritime cases. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 312 (Chk. 2005).

When the FSM Government is a party defendant, the court has subject matter jurisdiction under Article XI, § 6(a) of the Constitution, which provides that the FSM Supreme Court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction in cases in which the national government is a party. Emmanual v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 527, 529 (Chk. 2005).

A case that came before the court based on the court's exclusive jurisdiction over cases when the national government is a party and where the plaintiff's asserted claims primarily arose under national law, is not a diversity case where state law provides the rules of decision. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

The FSM Supreme Court has exclusive and original subject matter jurisdiction over a case in admiralty. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 414 (Yap 2006).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction in admiralty or maritime cases but the exact scope of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction is not defined in the Constitution or elsewhere. Ehsa v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 14 FSM R. 505, 507-08 (Pon. 2006).

The article XI, section 6(a) maritime jurisdiction extends to all cases which are maritime in nature. Since a maritime cause of action is one arising on the sea, ocean, great lakes, or navigable rivers, or from some act or contract concerning the commerce and navigation thereof, and when, although the plaintiffs attempt to characterize the issue as one of state law, they are essentially complaining about loss of business as a result of the penalties imposed by the port authority on the vessels resulting from the port authority's maritime-related activities, it is a maritime case and will not be remanded to state court. Ehsa v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 14 FSM R. 505, 508 (Pon. 2006).

The College is an instrumentality of the national government in the same way that the FSM Development Bank is even though its employees are not considered government employees. The College was created by Congress and is subject to suit only in the manner provided for and to the extent that suits may be brought against the National Government. So, since the national government is not subject to suit under the Pohnpei Wage and Hour Law, neither is the College. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 596 (App. 2008).

In a collection case based on a defaulted loan, no interest in land was ever at issue when the fee simple ownership of the parcel was never at issue and when the bank's registered mortgage lien was not at issue, so the jurisdictional language in section 6(a) is not applicable. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kansou, 17 FSM R. 605, 608 (Chk. 2011).

The FSM Supreme Court clearly has jurisdiction over the FSM Development Bank's two causes of action – 1) to collect an unpaid promissory note and 2) to foreclose the chattel mortgage and apply the proceeds to the unpaid loan – because, under section 6(a), the court has exclusive jurisdiction in a case where a party is an instrumentality of the national government and the FSM Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 93 (Yap 2011).

The section 6(a) phrase "except where an interest in land is at issue," does not preclude the FSM Supreme Court from exercising jurisdiction in a case where the national government entity is a party and land is involved. It does preclude the court from exercising exclusive jurisdiction – the jurisdiction becomes concurrent and a competent state court could instead entertain the matter. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 93 (Yap 2011).

The FSM Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government and part of the national government for the purposes of FSM Const. art. XI, § 6(a), which gives the FSM Supreme Court trial division exclusive jurisdiction over cases in which the national government is a party. Helgenberger v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 498, 500 (App. 2013).

When the property was lawfully transferred and this transfer is not a part of what is being appealed because the appellants are appealing the minimum sale price and when the mortgagee does not have title to the land but only a lien, the court will reject the appellants' claim of lack of subject-matter jurisdiction based on the exception for where an interest in land is at issue. Helgenberger v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 498, 500 (App. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court's subject-matter jurisdiction cannot be determined by reference to the Constitution's detailed command to the Public Auditor about the breadth and depth of the tasks that the Public Auditor must undertake. The exclusive jurisdiction that the FSM Supreme Court exercises when the national government is a party cannot be avoided, and was never meant to be avoided, by the mere device of naming a branch, or a department, or an agency, or a statutory authority of the national government as a party instead of naming the national government itself as a party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 614 (Pon. 2013).

If the FSM national government is a party to the case and an interest in land is not at issue, the FSM Supreme Court trial division has exclusive jurisdiction. If an interest in land is at issue, the FSM Supreme Court may still have jurisdiction but it will not be exclusive. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

For some cases arising under national law, Congress has placed exclusive jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court trial division. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 n.1 (Pon. 2013).

While the restructured FSM Development Bank differs from its earlier incarnation, it does not differ enough for it to be considered no longer an FSM national government instrumentality for Section 6(a) purposes because it is still imbued with a public purpose; it is still governed by a special act at title 30 of the FSM Code, rather than by the general banking statutes at title 29; there is still no private ownership of the Bank; 98.7%, of its shares are owned by the national government, making the FSM national government the shareholder that chooses the board of directors, with the exception of the Bank's president who is an ex officio member of the board and who is chosen by the other board members; the Bank is thus still under the control of the FSM national government that created it and still submits annual reports to the national government although now this is in the national government's capacity as a shareholder; and because in every fiscal year but one, Congress has appropriated funds for the restructured Bank's use. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 617 (Pon. 2013).

The restructured FSM Development Bank is fiscally independent of the national government as are a number of other national government instrumentalities and agencies – FSM Social Security Administration; National Fisheries Corporation; FSM Telecommunications Corporation; MiCare Health Insurance; and FSM Petroleum Corporation. This fiscal autonomy removes these FSM national government instrumentalities from the national government's every day political influence and control, but these instrumentalities were created by the national government and are still under its control, first as a shareholder or the shareholder, and second since Congress can, at any time, amend the statutes that created the restructured Bank, or any of these other instrumentalities, to exert or enforce some new national policy preference. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 617 (Pon. 2013).

That the national government is not legally responsible for the FSM Development Bank's debts, does not prevent the bank from being a national government instrumentality since other national government instrumentalities have similar status. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 617 (Pon. 2013).

As befits a national government agency or instrumentality, the FSM Development Bank is exempt from any taxes (except import taxes) or assessments on its property or operations, and similar statutory provisions exist for other national government instrumentalities and agencies. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 617 (Pon. 2013).

The restructured FSM Development Bank remains, regardless of the name given it and the other details of form, subject to the article XI, § 6(a) constitutional provision and, as with similar national government instrumentalities, it should be treated as part of the national government for jurisdiction purposes because it is an organization created by the national government for a public purpose and over which the national government can exercise control when it chooses. It is not an organization that the national government merely licensed or authorized to operate for private purposes. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 618 (Pon. 2013).

Since the FSM Supreme Court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction in cases in which the national government is a party except when an interest in land is at issue and since the Federated States of Micronesia Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government and part of the national government for the purposes of the Constitution's Article XI, § 6(a), the FSM Supreme Court's trial division therefore has original and exclusive jurisdiction in any case in which the bank is a party so long as no interest in land is at issue. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 432 (App. 2014).

The FSM Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government, and should be treated as if the national government itself is the actor. It, therefore, has an independent basis for jurisdiction under the Constitution article XI, § 6(a) and the national forum is available to it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 433 (App. 2014).

The FSM Development Bank may fully adjudicate many matters in the national court until land is at issue. At that time, unless, a separate and additional source of jurisdiction can be found, the case must be dismissed and returned to the state court, or alternately, held in abeyance until the land issue is certified. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 433 (App. 2014).

As an instrumentality of the government, the FSM Development Bank is, under Civil Rule 17's third party beneficiary clause, a real party in interest for the purposes collecting judgments from a party, limited by the land clause exception in article XI, § 6(a), and whenever "land is at issue" the national forum is no longer available so that if and when title to the land is disputed by the parties, the proceedings on that issue must be dismissed, or alternatively, the issue may be certified to the state court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 435-36 (App. 2014).

If an independent basis creates exclusive jurisdiction in the national courts, the action must be removed from the state court, and adjudicated in the national forum. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

When the defendant has failed to substantiate a legally recognizable possessory interest in the land on which he has settled and for which the FSM has a certificate of title and absent any such indicia that an interest in land is present, the FSM Supreme Court has subject matter jurisdiction. FSM v. Falan, 20 FSM R. 59, 61-62 (Pon. 2015).

Subject matter jurisdiction is proper for the FSM Supreme Court when the defendant has not adequately shown a possessory interest, much less an ownership interest, to reflect a case or dispute where an interest in land is at issue as the matter involves the defendant's entry upon land to which the FSM holds a certificate of title and the pending trespass cause of action therefore concerns one for an alleged violation of possession, not for challenge to title. FSM v. Falan, 20 FSM R. 59, 62 (Pon. 2015).

A mortgage foreclosure generally does not constitute an interest in land being at issue because in a mortgage foreclosure the interests in land are not in dispute – the parties all agree who owns the land and who holds the mortgage. The mortgagee just seeks to foreclose the mortgage which a mortgagor has pledged as security for a debt and which the mortgagor earlier agreed, when he signed the mortgage, could be sold if the debt remained unpaid. Thus, the Exception Clause does not preclude jurisdiction. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 416 (App. 2016).

A seaman's contract claim against the owner of the vessel on which he served falls within the FSM Supreme Court's exclusive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 448 & n.3 (Pon. 2016).

Cases involving claims for wages by seamen are maritime cases. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 448 (Pon. 2016).

The exclusive nature of the national court jurisdiction is such that the FSM Supreme Court does not have the power to abstain from admiralty and maritime cases. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 448 (Pon. 2016).

Since the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over all cases which are maritime in nature including all maritime contracts, torts, and injuries, it has jurisdiction over a seaman's claims for breach of contract and negligence. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 449 (Pon. 2016).

Although an aggrieved seaman, employed by the FSM, may file a petition at the administrative level, he, as a contract employee not covered under the FSM Public Service System, is free instead, to file suit in the FSM Supreme Court, which has exclusive jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime claims. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2016).

Because of the unique classification of seamen and their rights as employees, along with the limitations when it comes to the termination of their employment, and because this class of FSM national government employees is distinct, and in line with FSM Constitution Article XI, § 6(a), the FSM Supreme Court should exercise its exclusive jurisdiction over the matter rather than confer authority to an administrative body. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2016).

Since the FSM Development Bank was formed by the national government to undertake a public purpose and is subject to its creator's control, the reconfigured FSM Development Bank constitutes a national government instrumentality within Article XI, § 6(a), and is accorded the status equivalent to that of the national government. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 515 (App. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court's exclusive jurisdiction over cases in which the national government is a party is not paralleled in the United States, and such differences presumably reflect a conscious effort by the framers to select a road other than that paved by the United States Constitution. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 517 (App. 2016).

The FSM Development Bank is a national government instrumentality under Section 6(a) of Article XI. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 518 (App. 2016).

When the FSM was not a successor-in-interest to the lands in question because, as a matter of law, the Trust Territory government never transferred to the FSM national government any of the Trust Territory's interest in that land; when the only basis, asserted or apparent, for the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction is that the FSM national government is a party; and when the FSM was never properly a party because it had no interest in the land, the plaintiff has not stated a claim over which the FSM Supreme Court can exercise jurisdiction or for which it can grant relief and the FSM's motion to dismiss will therefore be granted and the FSM is dismissed and since the court never had jurisdiction over the case, it is dismissed without prejudice to any proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction. Chuuk v. Weno Municipality, 20 FSM R. 582, 585 (Chk. 2016).

That the FSM Development Bank seeks to sell land of undisputed ownership does not divest the court of jurisdiction when it otherwise has jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 608, 612 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases. Pt. Alorinda Shipping v. Alorinda 251, 21 FSM R. 129, 131 (Pon. 2017).

In an FSM Supreme Court criminal case, a "forum shopping" claim must be rejected because only the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a national crime – its jurisdiction over the prosecution of national crimes is exclusive. There is no alternative forum in which to prosecute a national crime. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 299 (Chk. 2017).

A defendant's alleged breach of a maritime contract falls within the FSM Supreme Court's original and exclusive jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime cases. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 200 (Pon. 2019).

The FSM Development Bank is an instrumentality of the national government and is part of the national government for the purposes of FSM Constitution article XI, § 6(a), which gives the FSM Supreme Court trial division exclusive jurisdiction over cases in which the national government is a party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 328, 328-29 (Pon. 2019).

It is well settled law that the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a case, regardless of the nature of the case's causes of action, when the FSM Development Bank is a party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 328 (Pon. 2019).

The FSM Supreme Court must deny a motion to dismiss for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction when the FSM Development Bank is a party because the court has jurisdiction when the FSM Development Bank is a party. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371 (Pon. 2019).

The Constitution generally confers original and exclusive jurisdiction over cases to which the national government is a party on the FSM Supreme Court trial division. The FSM Supreme Court also has pendent jurisdiction over state law claims whenever the Constitution or national law confers subject matter jurisdiction on the court and those state law claims arise from the same nucleus of operative fact as the claims under national jurisdiction and are such that they would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 513 (Pon. 2020).

– In Rem

Probate matters are statutory and involve proceedings in rem, that is, jurisdiction based on court control of specific property. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 103 (Pon. 1982).

In order to exercise in rem jurisdiction the thing over which jurisdiction is to be exercised (or its substitute, e.g., a bond) must be physically present in the jurisdiction and under the control of the court. In re Kuang Hsing No. 127, 7 FSM R. 81, 82 (Chk. 1995).

Where in rem jurisdiction over a vessel has not been established and its owner has not been made a party to the action an in rem action that includes a claim against the vessel's owner may be dismissed without prejudice. In re Kuang Hsing No. 127, 7 FSM R. 81, 82 (Chk. 1995).

The FSM Constitution, by its plain language, grants exclusive and original jurisdiction to the FSM Supreme Court trial division for admiralty and maritime cases. It makes no exceptions. Therefore all in rem actions against marine vessels, even those by a state seeking forfeiture for violation of its fishing laws, must proceed in the trial division of the FSM Supreme Court. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 463 (App. 1996).

Generally, to complete a court's jurisdiction in an in rem action, the res must be seized and be under the court's control. In other words, jurisdiction of the res is obtained by a seizure under process of the court, whereby it is held to abide such order as the court may make concerning it. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 370 (Kos. 2000).

When a vessel has not been seized and is not in the FSM, the court has not obtained jurisdiction over it and the complaint as to the vessel must be dismissed. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 370 (Kos. 2000).

When the complaint states that it is an admiralty and maritime action and that the plaintiffs are invoking the court's in rem and in personam jurisdiction, plaintiffs' failure to style their action against a vessel as in rem in the caption is merely a formal error and not a fatal defect, and the caption can always be amended to correct technical defects. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 51 (Chk. 2001).

The only way a vessel can be a defendant in a civil action is if the proceeding against it is in rem. The FSM Supreme Court may exercise in rem jurisdiction over a vessel for damage done by that vessel. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 51 (Chk. 2001).

In order for a court to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the thing (such as a vessel) over which jurisdiction is to be exercised (or its substitute, e.g., a posted bond) must be physically present in the jurisdiction and seized by court process and under the court's control, whereby it is held to abide such order as the court may make concerning it. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 51 (Chk. 2001).

When a vessel was never seized and brought under the court's jurisdiction and is no longer present in the jurisdiction, a court cannot exercise in rem jurisdiction over it and all such claims against the vessel will be dismissed without prejudice. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 52 (Chk. 2001).

In order for a court to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the thing over which jurisdiction is to be exercised must be physically present in the jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

The charterer under a demise is responsible for the proper performance of all agreements made with third parties in connection with the ship's operation. The charterer, as owner pro hac vice is also potentially liable for collision, personal injuries to the master, crew, and third parties, pollution damages, and for loss or damage to the chartered vessel. The vessel owner normally has no personal liability, but the vessel may be liable in rem. The charterer, however, has an obligation to indemnify the vessel owner if the damage was incurred through the charterer's negligence or fault. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 409 (Yap 2005).

When the proceeding against the defendant vessel is an in rem proceeding – the vessel's forfeiture is sought – a motion to release the vessel without any bond will be denied because in order to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the thing over which jurisdiction is to be exercised (or its substitute, e.g., a bond) must be physically present in the jurisdiction and under the court's control. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 300, 302 (Chk. 2006).

When the government's complaint seeks, among other things, a vessel's forfeiture under 24 F.S.M.C. 801(1), the case is, in part, an in rem proceeding, albeit one created by the marine resources statute. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 365, 367 (Chk. 2006).

In generally accepted admiralty practice, a letter of undertaking becomes the substitute res for a vessel in lieu of the vessel's seizure, providing the court with in rem subject matter jurisdiction. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 414 (Yap 2006).

The only way a vessel can be a defendant in a civil action is if the proceeding against it is in rem. A court cannot exercise in personam jurisdiction over a vessel, but can entertain an in personam suit against a vessel's owner if the court has obtained personal jurisdiction over the owner. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Easternline I, 17 FSM R. 81, 84 (Yap 2010).

For a court to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the thing (res) over which jurisdiction is to be exercised (or its substitute) must be physically present in the jurisdiction and under the court's control where it will be held to abide further order. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Easternline I, 17 FSM R. 81, 84 (Yap 2010).

When a vessel was never seized and brought under the court's control and is not in, or is no longer in, the FSM, the court cannot exercise in rem jurisdiction over it and all claims against the vessel will be dismissed without prejudice unless a letter of undertaking or a bond has been made a substitute res for the vessel in lieu of the vessel's seizure, thus permitting the court to exercise in rem jurisdiction. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Easternline I, 17 FSM R. 81, 84 (Yap 2010).

When two vessels were never arrested or seized in the FSM and no substitute res, a bond or letter of undertaking, has been provided to the court so that the court can exercise in rem jurisdiction through the substitute, the court lacks jurisdiction over the vessels regardless of the service on the vessels' agent, and no default can be entered against either vessel. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Easternline I, 17 FSM R. 81, 84 (Yap 2010).

Vessels are not subject to service of process under Rule 4(d)(3) (service on corporations), but must be proceeded against in rem because they are things, not corporations. This is unlike the vessels' owner, which is a corporation. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Easternline I, 17 FSM R. 81, 84 (Yap 2010).

When the court has not acquired in rem jurisdiction over the two vessels and since service on an agent cannot create jurisdiction over a vessel, the complaint against the two vessels will be dismissed without prejudice. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Easternline I, 17 FSM R. 81, 85 (Yap 2010).

The only way a vessel can be a defendant in a civil action is if the proceeding against it is in rem, and in order for a court to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the vessel over which jurisdiction is to be exercised (or its substitute, e.g., a posted bond) must be physically present in the jurisdiction and seized by court process and under the court's control, whereby it is held to abide such order as the court may make concerning it. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 284, 288 (Yap 2012).

If a vessel was never seized and brought under the court's control and is not in, or is no longer in, the FSM, the court has not acquired in rem jurisdiction over it and all claims against it will be dismissed without prejudice unless a letter of undertaking or a bond has been made a substitute res for the vessel in lieu of its seizure. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 284, 288 (Yap 2012).

When a tug is not present in the FSM and was not arrested when it was present and when no bond or letter of undertaking has been posted to provide a substitute res over which the court could exercise jurisdiction, the complaint against it must be dismissed without prejudice. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 284, 288 (Yap 2012).

The FSM Supreme Court cannot exercise jurisdiction over any vessel unless that in rem defendant has been validly arrested in the FSM and brought under the court's actual control or under its constructive control through the provision of a substitute security. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 461, 465 (Yap 2012).

Unlike in personam defendants, who may under certain circumstances be validly served process in foreign countries, valid service of process on an in rem defendant can only be made within the court's territorial jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 461, 465 (Yap 2012).

A court cannot order an in personam defendant to bring a vessel into the jurisdiction so that a plaintiff may then have it arrested and brought within the court's jurisdiction and made a separate defendant in rem because a court's authority to exercise in rem jurisdiction does not carry with it a concomitant derivative power to enter in personam orders. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 461, 465 (Yap 2012).

An in rem defendant ought not to be able to have the complaint against it dismissed for lack of service merely by keeping the res out of the court's jurisdiction for 120 days. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 461, 466 (Yap 2012).

The time for the plaintiffs to serve process on an in rem defendant vessel may be enlarged so as to allow the plaintiffs to perfect service in rem on the vessel if, at any time before the in personam action goes to trial, the vessel may be found and arrested within the court's jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 461, 466 (Yap 2012).

The court can exercise jurisdiction only over vessels that are present in the FSM and that have been brought into the court's jurisdiction by arrest or over vessels for which an adequate substitute has been provided. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 88, 94 (Yap 2013).

Another court's assumption of jurisdiction should be made with restraint, cognizant of the limitation that if a court has already assumed jurisdiction over the matter, a second court will not interfere and assume in rem jurisdiction over the same res. In those cases, abstention may be the appropriate course of action. A probate matter filed only in national court, however, causes no such conflict. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

Criminal cases are in personam proceedings, and brought against a person rather than property. Only civil actions may be brought in rem, or "against a thing." FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 619 n.1 (Pon. 2014).

The only way a vessel can be a defendant in a civil action is if the proceeding against it is in rem. In order for a court to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the vessel over which jurisdiction is to be exercised (or its substitute, e.g., a posted bond) must be physically present in the jurisdiction and seized by court process and under the court's control, whereby it is held to abide such order as the court may make concerning it. Pt. Alorinda Shipping v. Alorinda 251, 21 FSM R. 129, 132 (Pon. 2017).

For a court to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the thing (res) over which jurisdiction is to be exercised (or its substitute) must be physically present in the jurisdiction and under the court's control where it will be held to abide further order. Pt. Alorinda Shipping v. Alorinda 251, 21 FSM R. 129, 132 (Pon. 2017).

For in rem actions, venue is jurisdictional. Pt. Alorinda Shipping v. Alorinda 251, 21 FSM R. 129, 132 n.1 (Pon. 2017).

When a court exercises jurisdiction over land, it can only exercise that jurisdiction in the nature of an in rem proceeding. In rem proceedings encompass any action in which essential purpose of suit is to determine title to or affect interests in specific property located within the territory over which court has jurisdiction. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

In rem jurisdiction includes registration of land titles, mortgages, and probate proceedings involving land. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

To be able to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the property over which the court is to exercise jurisdiction must be physically present within the court's territorial jurisdiction and under its control. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

A court's jurisdiction over land is in the nature of an in rem proceeding. "In rem" proceedings encompass any action in which essential purpose of suit is to determine title to or affect interests in specific property located within the territory over which court has jurisdiction. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

In rem jurisdiction includes registration of land titles, mortgages, and probate proceedings involving land. To exercise in rem jurisdiction, the property over which the court is to exercise jurisdiction must be physically present within the court's territorial jurisdiction and under its control. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

Land on Pohnpei is not physically present in the Chuuk State Supreme Court's territorial jurisdiction. Thus, neither it, nor any court in Chuuk, can exercise jurisdiction over any Pohnpei land. Only a court in Pohnpei can do that. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction in rem over all vessels irrespective of their flag and all maritime claims wherever arising with respect to claims for goods, materials or services supplied to a vessel. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 200 (Pon. 2019).

– Pendent

When the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a violation of the National Criminal Code, it cannot then take jurisdiction over a non-major crime, which arose out of the same transaction and formed part of the same plan, under the theory of ancillary jurisdiction. FSM v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 43, 44-46 (Truk 1981).

Under article XI, section 6(b) of the FSM Constitution, it is proper to employ the rule of pendent jurisdiction over cases involving interpretations of the Constitution or national law, so that the court may resolve state or local issues involved in the same case. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 396 (Pon. 1984).

When a substantial constitutional issue is involved in a case, the national court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over state or local claims which derives from the same nucleus of operative fact and are such that the plaintiff would ordinarily be expected to try them all in one judicial proceeding. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 396 (Pon. 1984).

Even though the requirements for pendent jurisdiction are met in a case, a national court has discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction over state claims. This determination should turn on considerations of judicial economy, convenience and fairness to litigants and should be instructed by a desire of the federal or national court to avoid needless decisions of state law. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 397 (Pon. 1984).

A national court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over state law claims included in a plaintiff's cause of action if they arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact and are such that they ordinarily would be expected to be tried in one judicial proceeding, but its exercise of pendent jurisdiction will be limited so as to avoid needless decisions of state laws. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 116 (Pon. 1993).

The FSM Supreme Court can proceed on a mortgage foreclosure under its pendent jurisdiction because it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact as the promissory note (over which the FSM Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction) and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over a state law wrongful death claim when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as a plaintiff's national civil rights claims. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 13 (Chk. 2001).

A national court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over state law claims included in a plaintiff's complaint if they arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact and are such that they ordinarily would be expected to be tried in one judicial proceeding. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 205 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over state law claims of tortious interference with contractual relationships, defamation, and interference with prospective business opportunities when they are based on the same nucleus of operative facts as the claims under the national statute prohibiting anti-competitive practices. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 205 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court exercised pendent jurisdiction over a wrongful death claim, a state law cause of action when the plaintiffs' claim for civil rights violation under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) arose from the same nucleus of operative fact so as to create the reasonable expectation that the claims would be tried in the same proceeding. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 537 (Chk. 2003).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over a state law wrongful death action when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as the plaintiff's national civil rights claims. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. 2003).

When an FSM constitutional issue is involved in a case, the FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over state law claims which derive from the same nucleus of operative fact and are such that the plaintiff would ordinarily be expected to try them all in one judicial proceeding. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 600 (Chk. 2004).

When a citizen of Pohnpei, sues Pohnpei and one of its agencies over a state law tort claim of false imprisonment and the remaining four counts of the amended complaint allege violations of the national civil rights law, and are based on the same facts that form the basis for the state law claim, or the same nucleus of operative fact, the FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over the state law claim. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 492 (Pon. 2005).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over a state law cause of action when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as the plaintiff's national civil rights claims. Thus, when the issue of a proclamation's validity arises from the same nucleus of operative fact as the plaintiffs' national civil rights claim, the court may exercise jurisdiction. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 220 (Chk. 2006).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over a state law wrongful death action (or other state law cause of action) when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as the plaintiff's national civil rights claim. Therefore if the plaintiffs' civil rights cause of action states a claim upon which the court may grant relief, the FSM Supreme Court will have subject matter jurisdiction over the other state law causes of action as well. Harper v. William, 14 FSM R. 279, 282 (Chk. 2006).

Wrongful death is a state law cause of action created by a Trust Territory statute that is state law pursuant to the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions' transition clauses. The FSM Supreme Court exercises pendent jurisdiction over a wrongful death action when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as the national civil rights claims. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 352 (Chk. 2006).

When the court dismisses causes of action for the failure to state claims on which the FSM Supreme Court can grant relief and the remaining causes of action are all based in tort, which are properly the domain of state law, the court will grant the motion to dismiss with regard to the rest of the complaint because without at least one viable national law cause of action from which to hang, there is no pendent jurisdiction for the state law issues. Ladore v. Panuel, 17 FSM R. 271, 276 (Pon. 2010).

Arising from the same nucleus of operative fact is a requirement for the court's pendent jurisdiction. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 n.3 (Chk. 2011).

Ancillary jurisdiction is a court's jurisdiction to adjudicate claims and proceedings that arise out of a claim that is properly before the court. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

A court can employ ancillary jurisdiction as 1) to allow a single court to dispose of factually interdependent claims; and 2) to enable a court to function successfully, that is, to manage its proceedings, vindicate its authority, and effectuate its decrees. When courts refer to the "inherent power" of a court to consider a claim, they refer to the latter of these two uses of ancillary jurisdiction. In re Suka, 18 FSM R. 554, 557 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over the state law causes of action that arise from the same nucleus of operative fact and are such that they would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as the plaintiff's national civil rights claims. Wainit v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 20 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. 2015).

When tort claims arising from the power re-connection do not arise from a nucleus of operative fact common to the plaintiff's due process claims arising from the power disconnection, pendent jurisdiction is unavailable and those tort claims will be dismissed without prejudice to any future state court litigation. Wainit v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 20 FSM R. 135, 137 (Chk. 2015).

The Constitution generally confers original and exclusive jurisdiction over cases to which the national government is a party on the FSM Supreme Court trial division. The FSM Supreme Court also has pendent jurisdiction over state law claims whenever the Constitution or national law confers subject matter jurisdiction on the court and those state law claims arise from the same nucleus of operative fact as the claims under national jurisdiction and are such that they would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 513 (Pon. 2020).

When, before the defendants have even answered, the FSM Supreme Court dismisses, for the failure to state claims on which the court can grant relief, all of the claims that confer subject matter jurisdiction on the FSM Supreme Court, and all the causes of action that remain are the pendent state law claims, the court should dismiss the rest of the complaint without prejudice and allow the state law claims to proceed in state court. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 513 (Pon. 2020).

The FSM Supreme Court should consider and weigh in each pendent jurisdiction case, and at every stage of the litigation, the values of judicial economy, convenience, fairness, and comity in order to decide whether to exercise jurisdiction over a case brought in that court involving pendent law state-law claims. When the balance of these factors indicates that a case properly belongs in state court, as when the national-law claims have dropped out of the lawsuit at its early stages and only state-law claims remain, the national court should decline to exercise jurisdiction by dismissing the case without prejudice. The doctrine of pendent jurisdiction thus is a doctrine of flexibility. When the national law claims must all be dismissed, it may be an abuse of discretion to take pendent jurisdiction of a claim that depends on novel questions of state law. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 513-14 (Pon. 2020).

– Personal

Under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement, civilian employees of the United States government have immunity from civil and criminal process for wrongful acts and omissions done within the scope and in performance of official duty, unless expressly waived by the U.S. government. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 95 (Pon. 1991).

A United States federal employee does not waive immunity from civil liability under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement when the civilian employee initiated litigation in the FSM Supreme Court in a separate lawsuit with different claims against different parties and where the affirmative misconduct is within the scope and in the performance of the official duty. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 97 (Pon. 1991).

The purpose of the rules addressing process and service of process in civil cases is to assure that a defendant receives sufficient notice of all causes of action that are filed against him and thus has a fair and adequate opportunity to defend. Where a plaintiff fails to properly serve a defendant, the court does not have jurisdiction over that defendant, and the case may not proceed, but will be dismissed without prejudice. Berman v. Santos, 6 FSM R. 532, 534 (Pon. 1994).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has personal jurisdiction in civil cases only over persons residing or found in the state and who have been duly summoned. Joeten Motor Co. v. Jae Joong Hwang, 7 FSM R. 326, 327 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

For purposes of the motion to dismiss, the plaintiff has the burden of showing a prima facie case of personal jurisdiction, and the allegations in the complaint are taken as true except where controverted by affidavit, in which case any conflicts are construed in the non-moving party's favor. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 127 (Pon. 1999).

A court must be assured that it has acquired personal jurisdiction over a defendant before it enters a default against him, and a court does not have personal jurisdiction over a defendant unless or until he has been properly served. Medabalmi v. Island Imports Co., 10 FSM R. 32, 34 (Chk. 2001).

A venue provision that permits a civil action against a defendant who does not live in the FSM to be brought in a court within whose jurisdiction the defendant can be served or his property can be attached does not limit the FSM Supreme Court's subject matter jurisdiction, and does not render the long-arm statute superfluous. Such provisions do not preclude actions which are made procedurally possible by the long-arm statute, which gives litigants the means to effect service on entities not found within the FSM. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 204 (Pon. 2001).

To exercise jurisdiction, the court must also have personal jurisdiction over the parties. The Chuuk State Supreme Court has personal jurisdiction over all who reside or are found in the State of Chuuk and any who voluntarily appear before the court. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Lack of jurisdiction over the person is a defense that can be waived, whereas lack of subject matter cannot and requires dismissal. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a complaint and summons (the service of process) is not properly served on a defendant, the court does not have personal jurisdiction over that defendant. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 256 (Chk. 2005).

A court which lacks personal jurisdiction over a defendant cannot enter a valid judgment against that defendant. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 252, 256 (Chk. 2005).

Personal jurisdiction as a defense is waived only if the party raising it fails to raise it in a motion permitted by Rule 12(b), in his answer, or in an amendment to the answer permitted under Rule 15(a). Personal jurisdiction may not be raised in an amendment that requires leave of court. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 407 (Yap 2005).

For purposes of a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction over a defendant, the allegations of the complaint are accepted as true, except where those allegations have been controverted by affidavit, in which event conflicts are construed in the non-moving party's favor. Allegations based on information and belief are insufficient to support in personam jurisdiction, except where the truth of those allegations are admitted in the responsive pleading. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 407 (Yap 2005).

In analyzing a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, the court must undertake a particularized inquiry into the allegations that support personal jurisdiction. The complaint's allegations are accepted as true for a motion to dismiss, except where those allegations have been controverted by affidavit, in which event conflicts are construed in the non-moving party's favor. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 411 (Yap 2005).

In civil cases, a court has personal jurisdiction only over persons who have been duly summoned, that is, made a party by valid service of process. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A court is not competent to rule on the validity of a certificate of title to land when the court does not have (by its own statement) subject matter jurisdiction over the case and does not have personal jurisdiction over indispensable parties (the titleholders) or give them notice or an opportunity to be heard. Its orders were void and an order invalidating a person's certificate of title may even be void on its face when it held that that person was an indispensable party who was not present in the case and then proceeded to invalidate his certificate of title without him having been made a party to the case. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The failure to join an indispensable party may subject a judgment to collateral attack. A judgment (or final order) entered against a person without notice or an opportunity to be heard is void and is subject to direct or collateral attack at any time, and a court that lacks personal jurisdiction over a person cannot enter a valid judgment against that person. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In civil cases, a court has personal jurisdiction only over persons who have been duly summoned, that is, made a party by valid service of process. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When neither the Wito Clan nor the Rubens were ever duly summoned in Civil Action No. 64-98 before the August 20, 1998 judgment was issued so that court never had personal jurisdiction over them, the judgment, as to any interest either of them might have, is void. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Personal jurisdiction is the court's power to bring a person into its adjudicative process. A court always has personal jurisdiction over a plaintiff because, by filing a case, the plaintiff has consented to the court's jurisdiction over her person. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

When a defendant has been improperly served, the court lacks jurisdiction over the defendant and the case will be dismissed without prejudice, but, since a dismissal under Rule 12(b)(5) is without prejudice, a court will often quash service instead of dismissing the case so that only service need be repeated. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 096, 16 FSM R. 1, 3 (Pon. 2008).

Rule 4(j) provides that if service of the summons and complaint is not made on a defendant within 120 days after the filing of the complaint, the action will be dismissed as to that defendant without prejudice upon motion or on the court's own initiative, but dismissal for lack of service is also possible under Rule 41(b). A case against a defendant may be dismissed under Rule 41(b) for lack of personal jurisdiction over that defendant, that is, because that defendant was never properly served the summons and complaint and the court thus never acquired personal jurisdiction over that defendant. Dismissal under Rule 41(b) for lack of jurisdiction is without prejudice. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 269 (Chk. 2009).

The only way a vessel can be a defendant in a civil action is if the proceeding against it is in rem. A court cannot exercise in personam jurisdiction over a vessel, but can entertain an in personam suit against a vessel's owner if the court has obtained personal jurisdiction over the owner. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Easternline I, 17 FSM R. 81, 84 (Yap 2010).

When the court file does not contain a return of service for a summons and for either the original complaint or the first amended complaint on two named defendants, the court has nothing before it from which it can conclude that the court has personal jurisdiction over either of them. The court will therefore give the plaintiff time to show that the court has personal jurisdiction over those two defendants; otherwise, they may be subject, under Civil Procedure Rule 4(j), to dismissal for lack of service of process on them. Helgenberger v. Mai Xiong Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 326, 329 (Pon. 2011).

No ruling can be made against persons over whom the court does not have personal jurisdiction. Helgenberger v. Mai Xiong Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 326, 332 (Pon. 2011).

Insufficient service of process only affects personal jurisdiction – jurisdiction over the person of the defendants or respondents who should have been served properly. It does not affect subject-matter jurisdiction. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

In analyzing a motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, the court must undertake a particularized inquiry into the allegations that support personal jurisdiction. The complaint's allegations are accepted as true for a motion to dismiss, except when those allegations have been controverted by affidavit, in which event conflicts are construed in the non-moving party's favor. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 297, 302 (Yap 2012).

When some defendants were never served with the complaint and summons, the court never had personal jurisdiction over them and the plaintiffs' case against them was considered abandoned and dismissed. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 579 n.1 (Kos. 2013).

No ruling can be made or judgment entered against persons over whom the court does not have personal jurisdiction. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 579 n.1 (Kos. 2013).

A court obtains personal jurisdiction over a defendant when service of process – service of the complaint and summons – is properly made on that defendant. A court must have personal jurisdiction over a party before its orders can bind that party. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 324 (App. 2014).

For personal service of a complaint and summons to be effective when a defendant refuses to accept the papers, the complaint and summons must be left with the defendant or where they might reasonably be found and the process server must make an attempt to describe generally the meaning of the papers in a language the defendant can understand. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 324-25 (App. 2014).

When a person refused to accept the complaint and summons and the papers were not left with him, he was not properly served with the complaint and summons and the court therefore did not acquire personal jurisdiction over him. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 325 (App. 2014).

A court that lacked personal jurisdiction over a person because the complaint and summons were not properly served on him later acquired personal jurisdiction over that person when he filed an answer in which he did not challenge personal jurisdiction over him although he did challenge the court's personal jurisdiction over "his immediate family" since none of them had been named or served. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 325 & n.1 (App. 2014).

Unlike personal jurisdiction, which a court can obtain upon the parties' consent or failure to object, the lack of subject-matter jurisdiction is never capable of being waived. In essence, the court either possesses it or it does not; it cannot assert it. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

A defendant, who has properly asserted lack of personal jurisdiction over it, may move for the issue's determination as a preliminary matter. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 233 (App. 2017).

No substantial basis for difference of opinion exists about a defendant's right to move before trial for dismissal based on lack of personal jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 233 (App. 2017).

The issue is well settled that affidavits and other evidence may be submitted in support of or opposition to a Rule 12(b)(2) motion to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 233 (App. 2017).

The standard that a motion to dismiss should be denied unless it appears to a certainty that no relief could be granted is routinely applied to motions to dismiss under Civil Rule 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, but this rule of interpretation has no bearing on a motion to dismiss under Civil Rule 12(b)(2), where the burden is on the plaintiff to prove a prima facie showing of personal jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 233-34 (App. 2017).

One of the most fundamental questions of law is whether a court has jurisdiction to preside over a given case or has personal jurisdiction over a particular party. The need for minimum contacts is a matter of personal jurisdiction, and whether a court has personal jurisdiction over a particular defendant is reviewed de novo when appealed. Thus, a question of personal jurisdiction is a "question of law." People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 234 (App. 2017).

There must be personal jurisdiction over a party before a court may enter an order against it, whether in a civil or criminal case. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. 2017).

Personal jurisdiction refers to the court's authority to adjudicate the claim as to the person. That a court has "jurisdiction of a party" means either that a party has appeared generally and submitted to the jurisdiction, has otherwise waived service of process, or that process has properly issued and been served on such party. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. 2017).

Physical presence in the country usually supplies the only necessary prerequisite for personal jurisdiction in a national criminal prosecution. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. 2017).

In extradition cases, the receiving court, under the rules of speciality and double criminality, lacks personal jurisdiction over the defendant for crimes other than the crimes for which the defendant was extradited. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 n.4 (Chk. 2017).

When criminal defendants do not claim that they were not served process or that the process was not properly served on them or that they are not, or were not, physically present in the FSM, the court has personal jurisdiction over them. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. 2017).

For the trial court to have had personal jurisdiction over all the defendants, each defendant had to have been served the complaint and summons. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

A court that lacks personal jurisdiction over a defendant cannot enter a valid judgment against that defendant. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 516 (App. 2018).

Rule 12(b)(2) dismissal for lack of jurisdiction over the person raises a question as to whether the controversy or the defendant has sufficient contacts, ties, or relationships with the forum to give the court the right to exercise judicial power over the defendant. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 195 (Pon. 2019).

– Personal – Long-Arm

The Supreme Court may exercise personal jurisdiction in civil cases only over persons residing or found in the Federated States of Micronesia or who have been duly summoned and voluntarily appear, except as provided in the long arm statute. The terms "resides in," "is a resident of," and "residence is in" are roughly synonymous. Alik v. Moses, 8 FSM R. 148, 149-50 (Pon. 1997).

The FSM long-arm statute applies to persons without regard to their citizenship or residence. It may thus be applied to an FSM citizen. Alik v. Moses, 8 FSM R. 148, 150 (Pon. 1997).

To obtain personal jurisdiction over a non-resident defendant in a diversity action, a plaintiff must show that jurisdiction is consistent with the "long arm" statute, 4 F.S.M.C. §§ 203-04, and that the exercise of jurisdiction does not deny the defendant due process of law as guaranteed by article IV, section 3 of the FSM Constitution. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 128 (Pon. 1999).

Because Article IV, section 3 is based on the Due Process Clause of the United States Constitution, FSM courts can look to interpretations of the United States Due Process Clause to determine the extent to which the FSM long-arm statute may be used consistently with due process to exert jurisdiction over a non-forum defendant. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 128-29 (Pon. 1999).

Under the doctrine of minimum contacts a defendant must have certain minimum contacts with a forum such that maintenance of the suit does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. The FSM Supreme Court applies a minimum contacts analysis to determine the extent to which the FSM long-arm statute may be used consistently with due process to exert jurisdiction over a non-forum defendant. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 129 (Pon. 1999).

Except as provided for in 4 F.S.M.C. 204, the Supreme Court may exercise personal jurisdiction in civil cases only over persons residing or found in the Federated States of Micronesia or who have been duly summoned and voluntarily appear. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 129 (Pon.

The FSM Supreme Court can exercise personal jurisdiction in civil cases over an individual or agent of a corporation as to any cause of action arising from the commission of a tortious act within the Federated States of Micronesia. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 129 (Pon. 1999).

The mere allegation that an out-of-state defendant has tortiously interfered with contractual rights or has committed other business torts that have allegedly injured a forum resident does not necessarily establish that the defendant possesses the constitutionally required minimum contacts. In order to resolve the jurisdictional question, a court must undertake a particularized inquiry as to the extent to which the defendant thus purposefully availed itself of the benefits of the forum's laws. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 129 (Pon. 1999).

Generalized legal conclusions in an affidavit have no bearing on the particularized inquiry, which a court must undertake in order to determine whether defendants have minimum contacts with the forum in order to make a prima facie case that the court has personal jurisdiction over the defendants. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 130 (Pon. 1999).

Two – possibly four – letters and unspecified phone calls sent into the FSM are insufficient in themselves to establish the minimum contacts necessary to establish personal jurisdiction. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 130 (Pon. 1999).

Personal jurisdiction is not established when the alleged tortious conduct resulted only in economic consequences in the FSM because mere economic injury suffered in the forum is not sufficient to establish the requisite minimum contacts so as to sustain long-arm jurisdiction. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 130 (Pon. 1999).

When the tortious conduct is not shown to have occurred in FSM, and the alleged harm flowing from the conduct cannot be said to have been "targeted" to the FSM, it does not persuade the court that the defendants have caused an "effect" in this forum sufficient to justify jurisdiction over them under the FSM long-arm statute. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 131 (Pon. 1999).

When the defendants are not parties to the contract they tortiously interfered with and have no meaningful presence in the FSM, although the economic harm was allegedly targeted to an FSM plaintiff, it is insufficient to establish personal jurisdiction over the defendants. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 132 (Pon. 1999).

Except as provided in 4 F.S.M.C. 204, the FSM Supreme Court may exercise personal jurisdiction in civil cases only over persons residing or found in the Federated States of Micronesia or who have been duly summoned and voluntarily appear. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 370 (Kos. 2000).

A "long-arm statute" is a legislative act that provides for personal jurisdiction over persons and corporations which are non-residents of a state or country, and which go in to a state or country voluntarily, directly or by agent, for limited purposes, and in which the claim is related to those purposes. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 204 n.2 (Pon. 2001).

A venue provision that permits a civil action against a defendant who does not live in the FSM to be brought in a court within whose jurisdiction the defendant can be served or his property can be attached does not limit the FSM Supreme Court's subject matter jurisdiction, and does not render the long-arm statute superfluous. Such provisions do not preclude actions which are made procedurally possible by the long-arm statute, which gives litigants the means to effect service on entities not found within the FSM. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 204 (Pon. 2001).

The long-arm statute provides how service may be effected, outside of the FSM Supreme Court's territorial jurisdiction, against those who have done certain acts which subject them to the personal jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court, and such service has the same force and effect as though it had been personally made within the FSM. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 204 (Pon. 2001).

A foreign corporation served pursuant to 4 F.S.M.C. 204 may be sued within the FSM for violations of 32 F.S.M.C. 302 or 303, regardless of where the service occurs, so long as that foreign corporation has done specific acts within the FSM to bring it within the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 204-05 (Pon. 2001).

Transacting business in the FSM, engaging in tortious activity within the FSM, and causing injury within the FSM related to sales of products within the FSM, are arguably sufficient to bring a foreign defendant under the personal jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 205 n.4 (Pon. 2001).

A long-arm statute does not by itself grant a court personal jurisdiction over those who fall within the statute's reach. What a long-arm statute does is to permit a court to acquire personal jurisdiction over those persons subject to the statute once they have been properly served with notice that comports with due process. Northern Marianas Housing Corp. v. Finik, 12 FSM R. 441, 444 (Chk. 2004).

The FSM Supreme Court has personal jurisdiction over persons residing or found in the FSM or who voluntarily appear. Exceptions to this general rule are found in the FSM long-arm statute, 4 F.S.M.C. 204, which specifies the conditions under which a defendant found outside the FSM may be hailed into court here. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 410 (Yap 2005).

The FSM Supreme Court has personal jurisdiction, under 4 F.S.M.C. 204(1)(c), over a cause of action that arises from the operation of a vessel or craft within the FSM territorial waters. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 410 (Yap 2005).

The reach of the FSM's long-arm statute is circumscribed by the constitutional requirement that the putative defendant must have "minimum contacts" with the forum so that requiring him to litigate there does not offend "traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice." Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 410-11 (Yap 2005).

When a vessel is the subject to a bareboat charter, the hallmark of which is that the charterer takes complete control of the vessel, mans it with his own crew, and is treated by law as its legal owner, the vessel's owner cannot be said to have undertaken the operation of a vessel or craft within the FSM territorial waters within the meaning of 4 F.S.M.C. 204(c), and personal jurisdiction over the vessel's owner will not lie on that basis. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 411 (Yap 2005).

In analyzing the degree and extent of a defendant's business contacts with a forum jurisdiction, it is the nature and quality of acts and not their number that determines whether transactions of business have occurred. It does not mean that any single act suffices to allow personal jurisdiction. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 411 (Yap 2005).

Being the recipient of a letter sent from a jurisdiction, without more, does not aid the personal jurisdiction analysis. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 412 n.3 (Yap 2005).

The act of sending the single letter, which recites that the vessel remains under a bareboat charter and that the owner was put in a very bad position as a result of receiving only two charter payments over the course of two years and eight months, does not suggest a sufficient basis upon which to conclude that the owner was doing business in the FSM and subject to personal jurisdiction here, and neither does being the recipient of 60 e-mails or copies of e-mails sent to others. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 412 (Yap 2005).

When no evidence exists that the charter agreement between the owner and the charterer created an obligation on the owner's part to engage in any business activity in the FSM, although the vessel operated in Yap waters beginning in April of 2001; allegedly discharged petroleum effluent into Yap waters; and ultimately grounded in the Yap harbor, the existence of the bareboat charter leads to the conclusion that personal jurisdiction over vessel owner does not lie under the doing business provision of the FSM long-arm statute notwithstanding the presence of the vessel here. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 412 (Yap 2005).

When a vessel owner never purposefully availed himself of the privilege of conducting activities in the FSM because of the bareboat charter of his vessel, for the court to exercise in personam jurisdiction over the vessel owner would violate well established notions of fair play and substantial justice. The vessel owner's motion to dismiss will be granted and he will be dismissed as a defendant. Yap v. M/V Cecilia I, 13 FSM R. 403, 412 (Yap 2005).

The court has personal jurisdiction over a vessel's owner, charter, and manager, as each did business in the State of Yap with regard to the vessel's operation. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 414 (Yap 2006).

Exploitation of any economic resources in the FSM, is one of the grounds for personal jurisdiction in the FSM's long-arm statute. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 096, 16 FSM R. 1, 3 (Pon. 2008).

A corporation submits itself to the personal jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court if by an agent it engages in the exploitation of economic resources within the FSM exclusive economic zone. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 096, 16 FSM R. 1, 3 (Pon. 2008).

While there is no statutory definition of exploitation of an economic resource, these words' plain meaning leads to the conclusion that it includes fishing because the FSM's fisheries are undoubtedly a natural resource, marine in character, that are subject to economic exploitation as a result of the market demand for fish. It follows that fishing in the FSM EEZ constitutes the exploitation of a natural resource that subjects a party to the personal jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 096, 16 FSM R. 1, 3 (Pon. 2008).

The Trust Territory's long-arm statute for the Trust Territory courts' jurisdiction is 6 F.S.M.C. 131, which statute is thus obsolete. The FSM's long-arm statute is codified at 4 F.S.M.C. 204. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 297, 302 n.2 (Yap 2012).

A motion to dismiss Yuh Yow Fishery will be denied when the allegations in the amended complaint are sufficient to show personal jurisdiction over Yuh Yow Fishery if the plaintiffs succeed in proving the alter ego allegations that Yuh Yow Fishery is the alter ego of the corporations that own the vessels since Yuh Yow Fishery would have operated vessels that are alleged to have caused damage while in FSM waters. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 297, 302 (Yap 2012).

The FSM Supreme Court can exercise personal jurisdiction over persons not found in the FSM under the FSM "long-arm" statute so long as the exercise of jurisdiction does not deny the defendant due process of law as guaranteed by article IV, section 3 of the Constitution. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 54 (Yap 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court applies a minimum contacts analysis to determine the extent to which the FSM long-arm statute may be used consistently with due process to exert jurisdiction over a non-forum defendant. Under the minimum contacts doctrine a defendant must have certain minimum contacts with a forum such that maintenance of the suit does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 54 (Yap 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court has personal jurisdiction, under 4 F.S.M.C. 204(1)(c), over a cause of action that arises from the operation of a vessel or craft within the FSM territorial waters. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 54 (Yap 2013).

When a case or dispute is related to or "arises out of" a defendant's contacts with the forum, a relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation is the essential foundation of in personam jurisdiction. A case or dispute arising out of contacts with the forum may be referred to as specific jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 55 (Yap 2013).

"Specific" jurisdiction requires a showing of three distinct elements: 1) the nonresident defendant must purposefully direct his activities or consummate some transaction with the forum or residents thereof: or perform some act by which he purposefully avails himself of the conducting activities in the forum, thereby invoking the benefits and protections of its laws; 2) the claim must be one which arises out of or relates to the defendant's forum-related activities; and 3) the exercise of jurisdiction must comport with fair play and substantial justice, i.e. it must be reasonable. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 55 (Yap 2013).

When two of the defendants purposefully directed their activities to refloat a vessel stranded in FSM territorial waters and they purposefully availed themselves of the privilege of attempting salvage operations in FSM territorial waters for which the stranded vessel's owners hired them and when another defendant directed its vessel to FSM territorial waters to assist the stranded vessel and the plaintiffs' claims arise from that attempted assistance, the plaintiffs' claims against those defendants arise solely out of their activities in FSM territorial waters and the FSM Supreme Court's exercise of personal jurisdiction over those defendants is reasonable because, if for no other reason, it would be unreasonable for any other forum to exercise jurisdiction over the plaintiffs' claims. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 55 (Yap 2013).

When the defendants contend that the one time they were in FSM territorial waters they did not commit any tortious acts so that they do not have the minimum contacts necessary for the FSM Supreme Court to exercise jurisdiction over them, their argument is actually not a claim that they did not have minimum contacts needed for personal jurisdiction but rather that they did not commit the minimum acts necessary to have committed a tort within FSM territorial waters. This is a defense on the merits – that the plaintiffs cannot prove the tort's elements. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 55 (Yap 2013).

A defense that no damages can be proved and that no duty was breached is a defense on the merits. It is not a defense that the defendants lack the minimum contacts with the FSM so that the litigation against them would offend due process and traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 55-56 (Yap 2013).

Under the FSM long-arm statute, while the defendants have sufficient minimum contacts with the FSM for the FSM Supreme Court to exercise personal jurisdiction over them since the plaintiffs' claims against the defendants arise from their actions within FSM territorial waters which allegedly caused damages to the interests of FSM citizens, this does not mean that the defendants might not prevail on a summary judgment motion or that the plaintiffs will be able to prove these defendants liable at trial, but in this instance it is proper for the court to exercise personal jurisdiction over them. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 49, 56 (Yap 2013).

A "long-arm statute" is a legislative act that provides for personal jurisdiction over persons and corporations who are not residents of the state or country, and who go into a state or country voluntarily, directly or by an agent, for limited purposes, and for claims which are related to those purposes. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 209 n.1 (Yap 2015).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise personal jurisdiction over non-residents for any cause of action that arises from the transaction of any business within the FSM, the commission of a tortious act within the FSM; and contracting to insure any person, property, or risk located within the FSM at the time of contracting. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 210 (Yap 2015).

Insuring vessels that later navigate through FSM waters is not, by itself, sufficient to give the court personal jurisdiction over the insurer. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 210 (Yap 2015).

Since the FSM long-arm statute only requires for personal jurisdiction that the defendant be a party to a contracting to insure a risk located in the FSM, it may cover an agency providing underwriting and claims services for the actual insurers at Lloyd's of London. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 210-11 n.2 (Yap 2015).

Since the FSM long-arm statute specifically provides for personal jurisdiction over non-residents contracting to insure any person, property, or risk located within the FSM at the time of contracting, it does not allow the court to exercise personal jurisdiction over an insurer that insured a vessel that was not located in the FSM, but was in Singapore at the time of contracting for marine insurance. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 211 (Yap 2015).

The court may not have personal jurisdiction over an insurer when the insurer did not sell insurance in the FSM and did not provide insurance-like services to its insureds when they were present in the FSM. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 211 (Yap 2015).

Without a direct action statute, an injured third-party cannot sue an insurer directly because an insurer has no contractual obligation to persons other than its insured, at least until a court determines the liability of its insured and the insurer cannot be joined as a party to a lawsuit to determine that liability. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 211 (Yap 2015).

Even without a direct action statute, an insurer with world-wide coverage could expect to be called upon to help defend its insured in FSM courts. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 211 (Yap 2015).

The reach of the FSM's long-arm statute is circumscribed by the constitutional requirement that the putative defendant must have "minimum contacts" with the forum so that requiring him to litigate here does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 212 (Yap 2015).

In analyzing the degree and extent of a defendant's business contacts with the forum jurisdiction, it is the nature and quality of acts and not their number that determines whether business transactions have occurred. It does not mean that any single act suffices to allow personal jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 212 (Yap 2015).

Two e-mails and a letter that the defendant sent to recipients in the FSM and a letter of undertaking in a civil action, are insufficient to establish the minimum contacts necessary to establish personal jurisdiction over the defendant. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 212 (Yap 2015).

When the FSM plaintiffs are not parties to the insurance contract that the defendant allegedly tortiously breached with its I-Kiribati or Taiwanese insured; when it was to that insured that the economic harm was targeted although that harm had a secondary effect in the FSM; when the insurer has no meaningful presence in the FSM; and when the tortious acts that the defendant is alleged to have committed, were directed toward and targeted its insured, not the plaintiffs, personal jurisdiction is not established over the defendant because, since the plaintiffs' claims against the defendant are claims assigned to the plaintiffs by the insured, the case, at its heart, is a dispute between the insured and the insurer over insurance coverage. While an insurer who issues a policy under which it has a duty to defend its insured anywhere in the world, must expect, if the need arises, to defend its insured against a third-party's claim in the FSM, it cannot reasonably expect to be sued by its insured anywhere in the world in a dispute over insurance coverage. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 212 (Yap 2015).

For the FSM Supreme Court to properly exercise jurisdiction under the FSM long-arm statute, a defendant must have certain minimum contacts with an FSM forum such that maintenance of the suit does not offend traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 234 (App. 2017).

Whether a defendant's conduct amounts to the requisite minimum contacts necessary for the court to exercise personal jurisdiction over it, requires the court to undertake a particularized inquiry about the extent to which the defendant purposefully availed itself of the benefits of FSM laws. This "particularized inquiry" is a necessarily fact-intensive investigation into the alleged facts that constitute the conduct by which the defendant established minimum contacts. Since it would be impossible for the appellate court to determine the trial court's jurisdiction over a defendant without reference to the trial court record, personal jurisdiction cannot be seen as a "pure" question of law, and because the issue is not a pure question of law, it cannot be properly certified for interlocutory appeal. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 21 FSM R. 214, 234-35 (App. 2017).

– Removal

A party named as a defendant in state court litigation which falls within the scope of article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution may invoke national court jurisdiction through a petition for removal and is not required to file a complaint. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 394 (Pon. 1988).

Prolonged delay in seeking removal, as well as affirmative steps, such as filing a complaint in the state court, or filing a motion aimed at obtaining a substantive state court ruling, should normally be regarded as signaling acquiescence of a party to state court jurisdiction. U Corp. v. Salik, 3 FSM R. 389, 394 (Pon. 1988).

Jurisdiction based upon diversity of citizenship between the parties is concurrent in the Supreme Court and the national courts, and therefore a party to state court litigation where diversity exists has a constitutional right to invoke the jurisdiction of the national court. In re Estate of Hartman, 4 FSM R. 386, 387 (Chk. 1989).

If national court jurisdiction exists the national court should promptly grant the petition to remove. Thereafter the national court can entertain a motion to abstain or to certify specific issues to the state court. Proceedings in the national court do not have to stop while a certified issue is presented to a state court. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 246 (Pon. 1991).

Where, for six and a half years after the national court had come into existence the noncitizen petitioners made no attempt to invoke the national court's jurisdiction, the noncitizen petitioners affirmatively indicated their willingness to have the case resolved in court proceedings, first in the Trust Territory High Court and later in Pohnpei state court, and thus have waived their right to diversity jurisdiction in the national courts. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 247-48 (Pon. 1991).

The fact that a "tactical stipulation," made in 1988 to eliminate all noncitizens as parities to the litigation and thus place the litigation within the sole jurisdiction of the state court, may have been violated in 1991, does not retroactively change the effect of the stipulation for purposes of jurisdiction. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 243, 248 (Pon. 1991).

A motion for removal will be denied where, in an action in eminent domain under Truk state law the only defense available are those relating to the taking, and the counterclaims asserted as a basis for national court jurisdiction do not fall within a defense to the taking. Chuuk v. Land Known as Mononong, 5 FSM R. 272, 273 (Chk. 1992).

Removal to the Supreme Court pursuant to article XI section 6(b) of the Constitution cannot be ordered if there is no diversity of citizenship among the parties to the case pending in the state court. Etscheit v. Adams, 5 FSM R. 339, 341 (App. 1992).

Where a party petitions for removal after denial of its motion to dismiss brought in state court and the motion to dismiss was filed in lieu of answering the compliant and was not argued by the parties, such action will be considered a defense to suit on procedural grounds rather than a consent to state court adjudication of the merits such that waiver of the right to remove may not be implied. Mendiola v. Berman (I), 6 FSM R. 427, 428 (Pon. 1994).

If the FSM national court takes jurisdiction in a removal case all prior state court orders would remain in effect and record of all prior proceedings in the state court may be required to be brought before the court. Pohnpei v. M/V Zhong Yuan Yu #606, 6 FSM R. 464, 466 (Pon. 1994).

An attorney disciplinary proceeding in state court for violations of state disciplinary rules may not be removed to the FSM Supreme Court. Berman v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 231, 241 (Pon. 1995).

FSM Supreme Court General Court Order 1992-2 sets forth the governing procedures for the removal of state court actions to the FSM Supreme Court. Removal is effected upon compliance with these procedures. The state court takes no further action following removal unless and until a case is remanded. Wilson v. Pohnpei Family Headstart Program, Inc., 7 FSM R. 411, 412 (Pon. 1996).

A petition for removal must be accompanied by a short and plain statement of the facts which entitle the party to removal together with a copy of all process, pleadings and orders served upon the parties in the action. Wilson v. Pohnpei Family Headstart Program, Inc., 7 FSM R. 411, 412 n.2 (Pon. 1996).

When a case has been removed from state court after improperly pleading as a party a diverse citizen, it will be remanded as improvidently removed. Wilson v. Pohnpei Family Headstart Program, Inc., 7 FSM R. 411, 413-14 (Pon. 1996).

Another court's purported lack of subject matter jurisdiction over a case is not a basis for removing that case to the FSM Supreme Court. Rather, the basis for removing a state court case to the FSM Supreme Court is the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction to hear the case in question. Damarlane v. Harden, 8 FSM R. 225, 226 (Pon. 1998).

Any action brought in a state court of which the trial division of the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction may be removed by any party to the trial division of the FSM Supreme Court. This includes cases involving parties of diverse citizenship. Damarlane v. Harden, 8 FSM R. 225, 226 (Pon. 1998).

In order to remove a case from a state court to the FSM Supreme Court, the moving party must file a verified petition with the FSM Supreme Court within sixty days from the date that the party receives, through service or otherwise, a copy of an initial or amended pleading, motion, order or other paper from which it may first be ascertained that the case is removable. The petition for removal must contain a short and plain statement of the facts which entitle the party to removal along with a copy of all process, pleadings and orders served upon or by the moving party in such action. Damarlane v. Harden, 8 FSM R. 225, 227 (Pon. 1998).

A case may be removed from a municipal court to the FSM Supreme Court when diversity of citizenship exists. Damarlane v. Harden, 8 FSM R. 225, 227 (Pon. 1998).

Removal to the FSM Supreme Court is effected when, promptly after filing a verified removal petition together with copies of all state court process, pleadings and orders, the party seeking removal has given written notice thereof to all parties and has filed a copy of the petition with the clerk of the state court. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 436, 438 (Chk. 1998).

When removing a case to the FSM Supreme Court, a careful attorney ought to promptly notify the FSM Supreme Court when a copy of the removal petition has been filed with the state court clerk so as to avoid any confusion or delay. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 436, 438 (Chk. 1998).

An opposition to a removal petition, regardless of how it is styled, is actually a motion to remand the case to state court on the ground that it was improvidently removed. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 436, 438 (Chk. 1998).

The FSM Supreme Court may require a petition for removal of an action to be accompanied by a bond, but the bond requirement is discretionary with the court. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 463, 465 (Chk. 1998).

Actions taken by a state court prior to removal remain in effect when the case is removed until dissolved or modified by the FSM Supreme Court trial division. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 463, 465-66 (Chk. 1998).

When an FSM court rule, such as General Court Order 1992-2 governing removal, has not be construed by the FSM Supreme Court and is similar or nearly identical to a U.S. counterpart, the court may look to U.S. practice for guidance. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 463, 466 n.1 (Chk. 1998).

A removal petition must be filed within sixty days after the receipt by any party, through service or otherwise, of a copy of an initial or amended pleading, motion, order or other paper from which it may first be ascertained that the case is removable. Proper service is not required for the sixty-day period to start running – only receipt, which may be through service or otherwise. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 1998).

There is no obstacle to the removal of a defaulted case so long as it is done within the time limit set by the General Court Order 1992-2. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 1998).

Although removal after a default judgment is proper if done within time, it cannot be taken to supersede the default judgment which must be regarded as valid until set aside. Porwek v. American Int'l Co. Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 463, 466-67 (Chk. 1998).

A plaintiff's complaint, stating two causes of action for breach of fiduciary duty (both existing under common law), does not arise under the national laws of the FSM so as to confer original jurisdiction on the FSM Supreme Court or show on its face an issue of national law thereby creating removal jurisdiction. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

To determine whether a controversy arises under national law, the issue of national law must be an essential element of one or more of the plaintiff's causes of action, it must be disclosed upon the face of the complaint, unaided by the answer, the petition for removal or any pleadings subsequently filed in the case, it may not be inferred from a defense asserted or one expected to be made, and the issue of national law raised must be a substantial one. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

When a case has been removed from state court on the ground that it arose under national law but the plaintiff's complaint only relies upon common law principles of breach of fiduciary duty and as such does not arise under national law because no issue of national law appears on the face of the complaint and no substantial issue of national law is raised, the case will be remanded to the state court where it was initially filed. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

After the filing of a removal petition, removal is effected by giving all parties written notice and by filing a copy of the petition with the state court clerk. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 39 (Chk. 2001).

A case that is improvidently removed from a state court must be remanded to that state court. A case is improvidently removed when it has been removed to the FSM Supreme Court and either the FSM Supreme Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case at the time of its removal, or the party removing the case has waived its right to proceed in the FSM Supreme Court. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 39 (Chk. 2001).

FSM GCO 1992-2, § II(B), similar to 28 U.S.C. § 1446(b), states that the removal petition must be filed within sixty days after the receipt by any party, through service or otherwise, of a copy of an initial or amended pleading, motion, order or other paper from which it may first be ascertained that the case is removable. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

When diverse citizenship was not present on the record in a case when it was removed, it cannot be created by the FSM Supreme Court's order when the court lacks the jurisdiction to issue any but procedural orders. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

When the FSM Supreme Court does not have subject-matter jurisdiction in a case, it does not have the authority or jurisdiction to issue an order joining a diverse party, and any such order it did issue would be void for want of jurisdiction. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

For the parties' diversity of citizenship or other grounds to be the basis for removal, it must be present at the time the case is removed. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40 (Chk. 2001).

A state court filing that does not show diverse parties or other basis for FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction is not a paper from which it may be ascertained that the case is removable. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 40-41 (Chk. 2001).

Delay in effecting a case's removal by not filing a copy of the removal petition with the state court clerk until some days after the sixty days had run might prove fatal to the removal. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

Acts taken before a case first becomes removable cannot be the basis for an implied waiver of the right to remove because there is as yet no right to remove to waive. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

National courts, in removal cases, do not lightly find a waiver of right to invoke its jurisdiction. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

A state court pleading, order, or motion, or amended pleading that is filed much later than the complaint can be a paper "from which it may first be ascertained that the case is removable." Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

On remand for improvident removal the state court receives the case in the posture (with pending motions) and state it was in the FSM Supreme Court when that court remanded it. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

A party may file a request in the FSM Supreme Court for its just costs incurred by the improvident removal of a case. Enlet v. Bruton, 10 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. 2001).

In a diversity case, a plaintiff, as the party initiating suit, can file her action in either state or national court, and if she files in state court, the defendant has two alternatives, either to litigate on the merits in state court or to remove the matter to national court. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 242-43 (App. 2001).

The fact of the parties' diversity, without more, does not preclude a suit in state court because to invoke national court jurisdiction so as to divest a state court of jurisdiction means to remove the action to national court. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

The procedure for removal of state court cases to the FSM Supreme Court is controlled by General Court Order 1992-2, adopted pursuant to Article XI, section 9(d) of the Constitution. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

To invoke national court jurisdiction in a diversity case in state court, a removal petition must be filed within 60 days of a party's receipt of papers from which his right to remove the case may first be ascertained. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

Failure to file a removal petition within the time requirements of FSM General Court Order 1992-2 constitutes a waiver of the right to invoke national court jurisdiction in cases involving parties of diverse citizenship. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

In diversity cases, state courts otherwise having jurisdiction pursuant to state law are not divested of jurisdiction unless or until a removal petition is timely filed, prompt written notice of such filing is served upon all parties, and a copy of the petition is filed with the state court clerk. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 243 (App. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court Admission Rules apply to all cases properly before the national courts, regardless of where the case originated. There is no exception to these rules, express or implied, for legal representatives whose cases are removed to the national court from a state court. Nett Dist. Gov't v. Micronesian Longline Fishing Corp., 10 FSM R. 520, 521-22 (Pon. 2002).

If diverse parties wished to have a case in the Chuuk State Supreme Court heard in the FSM Supreme Court, they should have removed the case to the FSM Supreme Court using the procedure outlined in FSM General Court Order 1992-2. When they have not, a motion to dismiss filed in the Chuuk State Supreme Court will not invoke that court's jurisdiction. First Hawaiian Bank v. Berdon, 10 FSM R. 538, 539 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A plaintiff's opposition to a petition to remove, regardless of how it was styled, is actually a motion to remand the case to the state court on the ground that it was improvidently removed. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 107 & n.1 (Pon. 2002).

Removal of state court actions to the FSM Supreme Court is effected upon compliance with the procedures in FSM Supreme Court GCO 1992-2. The state court takes no further action following removal unless and until a case is remanded. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 109 (Pon. 2002).

In order to remove a case from a state court to the FSM Supreme Court, the moving party must file a verified petition with the FSM Supreme Court within sixty days from the date that the party receives, through service or otherwise, a copy of an initial or amended pleading, motion, order or other paper from which it may first be ascertained that the case is removable. The petition for removal must contain a short and plain statement of the facts which entitle the party to remove along with a copy of all process, pleadings and orders upon or by the moving party in such action. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 109 (Pon. 2002).

When diverse citizenship does not appear to be present on the record in a removed case and when, although defendants have argued that a diverse company is a necessary party, they have not joined it, the case will be remanded to the state court. Defendants may file another petition for removal when diversity of citizenship exists between the parties of record. Gilmete v. Adams, 11 FSM R. 105, 110 (Pon. 2002).

When a case has been properly removed from a municipal court where no complaint was filed, the FSM Supreme Court will require the plaintiff to file a complaint and allow the case to proceed therefrom. Damarlane v. Sato Repair Shop, 11 FSM R. 343, 344 (Pon. 2003).

When a party desires to remove a case from a state court to the FSM Supreme Court trial division, the requirements of General Court Order 1992-2 must be met. A petitioner cannot remove certain causes of action – that is, certain discrete legal issues and claims pertaining to petitioner – that are imbedded in a state court case. Bifurcation of a case is not anticipated nor authorized by GCO 1992-2, which pertains to the transfer of civil actions in their entirety. In re Estate of Helgenberger, 11 FSM R. 599, 600 (Pon. 2003).

Removal is effected when a copy of the verified petition of removal was filed with the state court clerk and the parties were served with written notice thereof. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 599 (Chk. 2004).

A verified petition for removal must contain a short and plain statement of the facts that entitle the party to removal along with a copy of all process, pleadings and orders served upon or by the moving party in such action. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 599 (Chk. 2004).

A case is improvidently removed when it has been removed to the FSM Supreme Court and either the FSM Supreme Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case at the time of its removal, or the party removing the case has waived its right to proceed in the FSM Supreme Court. A case that is improvidently removed from a state court must be remanded to that state court. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 600 (Chk. 2004).

In deciding whether a case has been improvidently removed from a state court to the FSM Supreme Court, the court must base its decision on whether subject matter jurisdiction existed at the time of removal and not on matter first raised in the case in papers filed in the FSM Supreme Court after removal. Subject matter jurisdiction must be present at the time of removal. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 600 (Chk. 2004).

When a plaintiff's complaint filed in state court states a cause of action as a violation of his right under the equal protection clause of the FSM Constitution, it asserts a claim that arises under the FSM Constitution, and the FSM Supreme Court had subject-matter jurisdiction when the case was removed. Mailo v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 597, 600 (Chk. 2004).

Under FSM General Court Order 1992-2, Section II(D), the filing of a petition for removal to the FSM Supreme Court itself effects removal so long as the specified requirements are met. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 32 (Kos. 2004).

An opposition to a verified petition to remove is a motion to remand because an opposition to a removal petition, regardless of how it is styled, is actually a motion to remand the case to state court on the ground that it was improvidently removed. Etscheit v. McVey, 13 FSM R. 477, 479 (Pon. 2005).

A case is improvidently removed when it has been removed to the FSM Supreme Court and either the FSM Supreme Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case at the time of its removal, or the party removing the case had waived its right to proceed in the FSM Supreme Court. Etscheit v. McVey, 13 FSM R. 477, 479 (Pon. 2005).

When the plaintiffs having clearly pled a cause of action arising under national law, they cannot, once the case has been removed to national court, change their minds and say that it was a mistake, that the complaint did not mean what it said, and that instead they really meant to plead a state law cause of action.

The court must take the plaintiffs' pleadings at face value. Etscheit v. McVey, 13 FSM R. 477, 480 (Pon. 2005).

A case stands removed to the FSM Supreme Court trial division when the party seeking removal files in the FSM trial division a verified petition for removal along with all the papers served on or by the removing party. The removing party must file the petition within 60 days of being served with any paper from which it is first ascertainable that the case is removable. San Nicholas v. Neth, 16 FSM R. 70, 71 (Pon. 2008).

A motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b) proceeds on the assumption that the allegations of the complaint are true. Similarly, the complaint's allegations are deemed true for purposes of a motion to remand a removed case to the state court on the basis that the FSM Supreme Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction. San Nicholas v. Neth, 16 FSM R. 70, 72 (Pon. 2008).

When the complaint's allegations do not point to any specific actions that a defendant took on the national government's behalf for which the national government should be held to account; when neither a descriptive allegation that a defendant was a Congress representative nor any other allegation alleges that he was acting as an agent of the FSM national government when he entered into the contract alleged; when the complaint alleges that the contract's purpose was to further the defendant's personal interest by facilitating his reelection to Congress; when the relief requested seeks nothing from the national government, but rather is a request for a joint and several judgment against the defendants individually, looking to the complaint's allegations and considering those as true, the complaint alleges that the defendant was acting for himself personally at relevant times that he allegedly entered into the contract and not as an agent of the national government. Since the only apparent basis for subject matter jurisdiction in this court is that the defendant was an agent of the national government at relevant times, the FSM Supreme Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction and the plaintiff's motion to remand will be granted. San Nicholas v. Neth, 16 FSM R. 70, 72 (Pon. 2008).

If at any time before final judgment it appears that a case was removed from state court improvidently and without jurisdiction, the FSM Supreme Court trial division must remand the case, and the clerk of court will mail a certified copy of the remand order to the state court. San Nicholas v. Neth, 16 FSM R. 70, 73 (Pon. 2008).

Diversity jurisdiction gives concurrent original jurisdiction to the state and national courts. FSM GCO 1992-2 provides for removal of diversity cases from the state to national courts and is directed solely to the issue of the transfer of cases between the state and national courts. It provides a procedure for removal, not authority for dismissal from state court. Muller v. Enlet, 16 FSM R. 92, 94 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If an independent basis creates exclusive jurisdiction in the national courts, the action must be removed from the state court, and adjudicated in the national forum. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

Under FSM GCO 1992-2, § II(D), a party has effected removal of a case to the FSM Supreme Court when written notice thereof has been given to all parties and a copy of the petition has been filed with the clerk of the state court. The removal is thus accomplished automatically without any FSM Supreme Court action. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 610 (Kos. 2014).

Regardless of how it is styled, an opposition to a verified petition to remove can only be a motion to remand the case to the state court it came from on the ground that it was improvidently removed. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 610 (Kos. 2014).

A party may remove a case from state court to the FSM Supreme Court if the case is one over which the FSM Supreme Court would have subject-matter jurisdiction if the case had originally been filed in the FSM Supreme Court; if the removal was effected within 60 days after the receipt by any party, through service or otherwise, of a copy of an initial or amended pleading, motion, order or other paper from which it may first be ascertained that the case is removable; and if the party removing the case has not previously waived the its right to remove. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. 2014).

A case arises under the FSM Constitution or national law when the FSM Constitutional issue or the national law issue is an essential element of one or more of the plaintiff's causes of action, and it must be disclosed upon the face of the complaint, unaided by the answer, the petition for removal, or any pleadings subsequently filed in the case, and it may not be inferred from a defense asserted or one expected to be made, and the national law issue must be a substantial one. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. 2014).

As a defense raised in the answer to the original complaint, a defendant's due process claims would not make it a case over which the FSM Supreme Court would have jurisdiction because it would not be considered a case arising under the FSM Constitution or national law. Saimon v. Nena, 19 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. 2014).

When the Pohnpei Supreme Court granted the FSM Development Bank's motion to intervene, the bank was clearly a party to the action and therefore, entitled to remove the action to the FSM Supreme Court contingent upon the jurisdictional criteria being satisfied. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 35 (Pon. 2016).

Subject-matter jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court is proper in a case involving an FSM Development Bank mortgage foreclosure, on any one of the following as an independent basis: 1) the bank's classification as an instrumentality of the national government; 2) the parties' diversity of citizenship; and 3) the implied challenge to the superiority of FSM Supreme Court; hence a case arising under the FSM Constitution or national law. As such, removal of such a state court case to the FSM Supreme Court is deemed appropriate. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 37 (Pon. 2016).

Under FSM General Court Order 1992-2, § II(D), the filing of a petition for removal to the FSM Supreme Court itself effects removal so long as all the specified requirements are met. Thus, a party accomplishes the removal automatically without any FSM Supreme Court action. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 115 (App. 2018).

An opposition to a removal petition must be considered a motion to remand because any opposition to a removal petition, regardless of how it is styled, is actually a motion to remand the case to the state court on the ground that it was improvidently removed. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 115 (App. 2018).

A case is improvidently removed when it has been removed to the FSM Supreme Court and either the FSM Supreme Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over the case at the time it was removed, or the party removing the case has waived its right to proceed in the FSM Supreme Court. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 115 (App. 2018).

A party's actions in the state court, such as conducting active litigation or waiting more than sixty days, may constitute a waiver of the right to remove that case to the FSM Supreme Court. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 116 (App. 2018).

When a party's only action in the state court was to file a motion seeking more time to answer or otherwise defend, that filing does not constitute the party's waiver, through active state court litigation, of the right to effect the case's removal. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 116 (App. 2018).

Although the court must first look to FSM sources of law, when it has not previously construed the effect of an FSM General Court Order 1992-2 provision that is identical or similar to a U.S. counterpart, the court may consult U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting that provision. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 116 n.10 (App. 2018).

The word "may" in FSM General Court Order 1992-2, § I, grants the discretion to remove to any party in a state court action, not to the FSM Supreme Court. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 116 (App. 2018).

In a removed case, the case arrives in the FSM Supreme Court in the same posture it was when it left the state court – the court treats everything that occurred in the state court before removal as if it had occurred in the FSM Supreme Court. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 116 (App. 2018).

In a removed case, the FSM Supreme Court properly treats the complaint that the plaintiffs filed in the state court as if it had been filed in the FSM Supreme Court. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 117 (App. 2018).

Once the state court granted an intervention as a party-defendant, that party had the same capacity as any party to quickly remove the case to the FSM Supreme Court, if the FSM court had jurisdiction, and to move to dismiss the case for the failure to state a claim, if it thought that was a viable defense. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 119 (App. 2018).

An oral assertion that the state court retained jurisdiction and that the FSM Supreme Court had not acquired it was a motion to remand the matter to state court, because any opposition to a case's removal is, regardless of how it is styled, actually a motion to remand the case on the ground it was improvidently removed. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 350 (Pon. 2019).

A case is "improvidently removed" when either the FSM Supreme Court did not have subject-matter jurisdiction over it when it was removed, or the party that removed the case had already waived its right to proceed in the FSM Supreme Court. An improvidently-removed case will be remanded to the court it was removed from. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 350 (Pon. 2019).

The Chief Justice by rule may govern the transfer of cases between state and national courts, and FSM General Court Order 1992-2 is the rule the Chief Justice promulgated to govern the transfer of cases between state and national courts when cases are removed from a state court. It is thus the applicable rule and must be followed. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 351 (Pon. 2019).

– Subject-Matter

Where the Trust Territory High Court improperly retained a case for four years after the FSM Supreme Court was certified, and continued to hold the case more than a year after the Truk State Court was established, issuing a judgment based upon filed papers, without there ever having been a trial, let alone an active trial, in the case, by the time judgment was issued the subject matter of the litigation was so plainly beyond the High Court's jurisdiction that its entertaining the action was a manifest abuse of authority. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 119 (App. 1989).

Where a court has dismissed a criminal case for lack of jurisdiction over the crimes for which the defendant was charged, the dismissal does not act as a discharge so as to preclude extradition on the charge. "Discharge" requires both personal and subject matter jurisdiction. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 107-08 (App. 1993).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has subject matter jurisdiction to hear suits alleging that the legislature has exercised its power to be the sole judge of the qualifications of its members in an unconstitutional manner in violation of the constitutional prohibitions against ex post facto laws. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Although, ordinarily, an issue must be raised at the trial level for it to be preserved for appeal, whether a court has subject matter jurisdiction is an issue that may be raised at any time. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 296 (App. 1993).

When it appears that the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction the case will be dismissed. Trance v. Penta Ocean Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 147, 148 (Chk. 1995).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction with concurrent original subject matter jurisdiction with other courts to try all civil cases except those matters that are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the national courts. Joeten Motor Co. v. Jae Joong Hwang, 7 FSM R. 326, 327 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A court with both subject matter jurisdiction of the case and personal jurisdiction over the defendant has complete jurisdiction of the matter. Joeten Motor Co. v. Jae Joong Hwang, 7 FSM R. 326, 327 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Whether a court has subject matter jurisdiction is an issue that may be raised at any time. Abraham v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 57, 59 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Whenever it appears by suggestion of the parties or otherwise that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court shall dismiss the action. Thus subject matter jurisdiction may never be waived, and may be raised at any time, even after judgment. Island Dev. Co. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 220, 222 (Yap 1999).

A venue provision that permits a civil action against a defendant who does not live in the FSM to be brought in a court within whose jurisdiction the defendant can be served or his property can be attached does not limit the FSM Supreme Court's subject matter jurisdiction, and does not render the long-arm statute superfluous. Such provisions do not preclude actions which are made procedurally possible by the long-arm statute, which gives litigants the means to effect service on entities not found within the FSM. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 204 (Pon. 2001).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction, which has subject matter jurisdiction over a landlord/tenant dispute. Pernet v. Woodruff, 10 FSM R. 239, 242 (App. 2001).

A court may raise the issue of jurisdiction at any time because it is the court's duty to insure that jurisdiction exists. Jack v. Paulino, 10 FSM R. 335, 336 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When an action was filed as an appeal under Kosrae State Code § 11.614, which provides that a Land Commission determination of ownership is subject to appeal, but there was no determination of ownership issued, the Kosrae State Court does not have subject matter jurisdiction to hear it as an appeal. When it appears that the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction, the case will be dismissed. Jack v. Paulino, 10 FSM R. 335, 336 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Subject matter jurisdiction can be raised at any time by any party or by the court, and if it appears that subject matter jurisdiction does not exist then the case must be dismissed. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 537 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction and has concurrent original jurisdiction to try all civil cases. As such, it may exercise, subject to the principle of forum non conveniens, jurisdiction over contract cases generally, regardless of where the contract was formed, unless exclusive jurisdiction for that particular contract resides in some other court. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 537 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Lack of jurisdiction over the person is a defense that can be waived, whereas lack of subject matter cannot and requires dismissal. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a court has both subject matter and personal jurisdiction over a case, a motion to dismiss on jurisdictional grounds will be denied. First Hawaiian Bank v. Engichy, 10 FSM R. 536, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The question of subject matter jurisdiction can be raised at any point in the proceeding. Alafanso v. Suda, 10 FSM R. 553, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The presence or lack of subject matter jurisdiction can be raised at any time by any party or by the court. Once raised, it must be considered. This is because a decision by a court without subject matter jurisdiction is void, and such occurrences should be avoided. Bualuay v. Rano, 11 FSM R. 139, 145 (App. 2002).

Subject matter jurisdiction cannot be waived, and must be considered no matter how late in the proceeding it is raised. Bualuay v. Rano, 11 FSM R. 139, 145 (App. 2002).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division has original and exclusive jurisdiction over disputes between municipalities and cases arising under the Chuuk Constitution, and, except for those matters which fall under the FSM Supreme Court's exclusive jurisdiction, it has concurrent original jurisdiction to try all civil, criminal, probate, juvenile, traffic and land cases, disputes over the waters in Chuuk, cases involving state laws, and cases in which the state government is a party. Rubin v. Fefan Election Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 573, 579 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Whether a court has subject matter jurisdiction is an issue which may be raised at any time, even after judgment. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 651 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A statute of limitations is one of the expressly stated affirmative defenses to an action under Civil Rule 8(c). As such, it may be waived. On the other hand, a defect in subject matter jurisdiction may never be waived, and may be raised at any time, even after judgment. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 78, 80 (Kos. 2003).

Subject matter jurisdiction may never be waived and may be raised at any time. Heirs of Palik v. Heirs of Henry, 12 FSM R. 415, 422 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When, viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the complaint does not state a civil rights cause of action and when no other basis for subject matter jurisdiction, such as diversity of citizenship, is alleged, the complaint does not state a claim upon which the FSM Supreme Court can grant relief, and the defendant's motion to dismiss will be granted. Harper v. William, 14 FSM R. 279, 282 (Chk. 2006).

When a Rule 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss raised a preliminary issue, the court's subject matter jurisdiction, the court had to address that before any trial on the merits could proceed or any decision on the merits could be made. The motion even had to be ruled upon before the defendants could be required to answer the complaint and thus put the case at issue on the merits. Murilo Election Comm'r v. Marcus, 15 FSM R. 220, 224 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A motion to dismiss for lack of standing is a claim that the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction and is properly filed in lieu of an answer under Rule 12(b)(1), or as a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(h)(3), which can be raised at any time, even after judgment. It is the plaintiff's burden to show that the court has jurisdiction, and that a colorable claim exists. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

It is within the court's discretion to allow or disallow affidavits and other matters outside the pleadings to be brought in when considering a motion to dismiss challenging the court's subject matter jurisdiction. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 16 FSM R. 213, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over a case when, if applied, the general principle that courts should first consider any non-constitutional grounds that might resolve the issue because unnecessary constitutional adjudication ought to be avoided, would unmask the case as an election contest and the matter would accordingly be dismissed. Ueda v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 395, 398 (Chk. 2009).

A court will refrain from addressing whether it has jurisdiction over an election contest when the matter is merely hypothetical and not a justiciable controversy, but if the issue comes properly before the court and if it appears that the court lacks jurisdiction over the complaint's subject matter, the court would dismiss the action. Doone v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 16 FSM R. 407, 411 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A court's subject-matter jurisdiction may be raised at any time by a party or by the court. Nelson v. FSM Nat'l Election Dir., 16 FSM R. 414, 419 (App. 2009).

If all the answers to the subject-matter analytical construct questions are no, then subject-matter jurisdiction must be in some (most likely the state) court other than the FSM Supreme Court. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 615 (Pon. 2013).

The FSM Constitution vests the FSM Supreme Court with jurisdiction over a matter when the FSM Development Bank, an instrumentality of the FSM government, is a party. A Pohnpei state law cannot divest the court of that subject matter jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 19 FSM R. 233, 235 (Pon. 2013).

Subject-matter jurisdiction can be raised at any time. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 364, 366 (App. 2014).

An open probate proceeding at the state level is not a bar to national court subject matter jurisdiction as long as the national court does not interfere with the estate's res. Under the longstanding "creditor exception," the national courts have subject matter jurisdiction to appoint an administrator or an administrator pendente lite and to initiate proceedings on behalf of interested third parties. This appointment has no impact on the res of the decedent's estate, does not interfere with administrative decisions regarding the decedent's estate, nor does it affect the distribution of those assets within the state's control. It is a preliminary matter outside of the scope of the probate exception. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 430-31 (App. 2014).

Preference toward state courts adjudicating the bulk of probate matters should be read narrowly, to permit creditors and other third parties to protect financial interests by initiating probate proceedings and resolving many auxiliary matters. The national courts are not barred from exercising subject matter jurisdiction over probate matters, and when an independent basis for jurisdiction is established, the national courts may proceed with the probate matter in its entirety. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 436 (App. 2014).

Lack of subject-matter jurisdiction is a defense that can be raised at any time by any party or by the court. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57 (Pon. 2015).

A suit for any damage allegedly caused by a neighbor's pigs would have to be made against the pigs' owner or custodian, and, unless there was diversity of citizenship between the plaintiff and the pigs' owner (an unlikely occurrence), the FSM Supreme Court would not have any jurisdiction over such a claim. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 95 (Pon. 2015).

Whether a default judgment granted relief not prayed for in the complaint's demand for judgment; whether the guaranties that were signed were not attached to the promissory notes; whether the judgment was joint and several; and whether one of the guaranties was not signed by the person it should have been signed by but was fraudulently signed by another person, are not determinants of subject-matter jurisdiction. While they may be raised as defenses, none of these grounds is jurisdictional. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 290 (Pon. 2016).

Subject-matter jurisdiction is jurisdiction over the nature of the case and the type of relief sought; the extent to which a court can rule on the conduct of persons or the status of things. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 290 (Pon. 2016).

Whether a judgment is joint and several or not has no affect on whether the court has subject-matter jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 292 (Pon. 2016).

Whenever it appears by suggestion of the parties or otherwise, including being raised as an affirmative defense in the answer, that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter the court must dismiss the action. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 354 & n.1 (Pon. 2016).

Subject-matter jurisdiction entails a court's power to entertain and adjudicate a given type of case. The fundamental requirement for subject matter jurisdiction is a power derived from the FSM Constitution that specifies the class of cases the FSM Supreme Court is granted authority to hear. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 506-07 (App. 2016).

A judgment rendered without the requisite subject-matter jurisdiction is void ab initio. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

Like res judicata, the concept of jurisdiction over the subject matter is based upon public policy: one dictates the finality of judgments and the other requires litigation to be addressed in the proper forum. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 507 (App. 2016).

While courts do not have the power to extend their subject matter jurisdiction, as a practical matter, they must have the power to interpret and determine whether they have subject matter jurisdiction. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

Unlike personal jurisdiction, which a court can obtain upon the parties' consent or failure to object, the lack of subject-matter jurisdiction is never capable of being waived. In essence, the court either possesses it or it does not; it cannot assert it. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

Since the requirement of subject matter jurisdiction is never capable of being waived, judgments rendered without such allocation of authority are void ab initio and can be attacked at any time. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 509 (App. 2016).

A party may not waive subject matter jurisdiction. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 516 (App. 2016).

Existence of jurisdiction can only be exclusive or non-exclusive/concurrent. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 516 (App. 2016).

Exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction cannot be simultaneously present. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 498, 518 (App. 2016).

In any matter before the court, the issue of standing should be addressed first as it is a threshold issue going to the court's subject matter jurisdiction. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 639 (Pon. 2016).

Subject-matter jurisdiction in the FSM Supreme Court is proper in a case involving an FSM Development Bank mortgage foreclosure, on any one of the following as an independent basis: 1) the bank's classification as an instrumentality of the national government; 2) the parties' diversity of citizenship; and 3) the implied challenge to the superiority of FSM Supreme Court; hence a case arising under the FSM Constitution or national law. As such, removal of such a state court case to the FSM Supreme Court is deemed appropriate. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 37 (Pon. 2016).

A standing issue is addressed first, as it is a threshold issue going to a court's subject matter jurisdiction. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 56 (App. 2016).

A dismissal for lack of subject-matter jurisdiction does not preclude a second action on the same claim. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 73 (App. 2016).

While limited, the Kosrae Land Court's subject-matter jurisdiction is broad enough to encompass factual determinations of fraud and misrepresentation to the extent that they affect the validity of titles or conveyances of land. Indeed, that is the Land Court's very purpose. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 73 (App. 2016).

When the Kosrae Land Court itself is implicated in the allegations of fraud, that court is not competent to adjudicate the subject matter. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 74 (App. 2016).

Subject-matter jurisdiction is addressed first because, if the court lacks it, any ruling it makes on other issues would be an advisory opinion (obiter dicta), and the court is not empowered to make advisory opinions. Pohnpei Arts & Crafts, Inc. v. Narruhn, 21 FSM R. 366, 368 (Pon. 2017).

Since the court must dismiss the action whenever it appears by the parties' suggestion or otherwise that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court will dismiss a civil rights action by a municipality against the state without prejudice to any future action in the state court. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 21 FSM R. 408, 409 (Pon. 2017).

A statue of limitation generally is not jurisdictional unless it is a limitations period for claims against the government. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

Raising a statute of limitation as a bar to a remedy does not deprive a court of jurisdiction to hear the cause in the first instance; the court could not adjudicate the question of proper application of the statute if it did not have subject matter jurisdiction. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

Raising a statute of limitation as a bar to a remedy does not deprive a court of jurisdiction to hear the cause in the first instance; the court could not adjudicate the question of proper application of the statute if it did not have subject matter jurisdiction. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

Courts that have subject matter jurisdiction over a case but not venue, have the inherent power to transfer the case to a court with both. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a case, regardless of the nature of the case's causes of action, when the FSM Development Bank is a party. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 115 (App. 2018).

A state court has no jurisdiction over real estate in the jurisdiction of a different sovereign state. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 119 (App. 2018).

When the court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction over a case, the court may still adjudicate the counterclaim if the court has an adequate independent basis for subject-matter jurisdiction over the counterclaim. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 248 (Pon. 2019).

Since subject-matter jurisdiction is a threshold matter, the court will address this point before considering the motion's merits. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 350 (Pon. 2019).

A statute that acts as a bar to an action does not deprive the court of subject-matter jurisdiction to hear the case in the first instance because the court cannot rule on the statute's proper application – the statute's effect on the case – if it does not have subject-matter jurisdiction to consider the case. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371 (Pon. 2019).

A statutory bar does not mean that the court would lack subject-matter jurisdiction over the case, but instead it would be an affirmative defense that would bar the plaintiff's claim and require that a judgment be entered for the defendant. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371 (Pon. 2019).

Although parties may stipulate to factual matters, they may not stipulate to interpretations of law. Thus, even though parties may stipulate to a judgment, they cannot stipulate to a court's subject-matter jurisdiction to enter that judgment. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2020).

Parties cannot confer subject matter jurisdiction upon the FSM Supreme Court by stipulation, and therefore their agreement to do so is irrelevant. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2020).

Because parties may not agree between themselves and stipulate to subject matter jurisdiction, the court has an obligation to independently determine whether it has subject matter jurisdiction. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 493-94 (Chk. 2020).

A court, whether trial or appellate, is obliged to notice want of jurisdiction, on its own motion. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

When the only basis the plaintiff asserts for subject-matter jurisdiction is that his state court judgments are property and the state's failure to pay is a taking of his property without due process, the plaintiff's suit does not involve subject matter over which the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction because the plaintiff's state court judgments are not property, and the state's failure to pay his judgments against it does not violate his due process or civil rights. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

When the parties' stipulation to enter a judgment would result in a void judgment, the court must reject the stipulation for judgment and dismiss the case for the lack of subject-matter jurisdiction because whenever it appears that the court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter, the court must dismiss the action. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

– Territorial

In order for a court to have jurisdiction over an action involving real property, particularly an action involving title, the real property must be within that court's territorial jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

Unlike in personam defendants, who may under certain circumstances be validly served process in foreign countries, valid service of process on an in rem defendant can only be made within the court's territorial jurisdiction. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 461, 465 (Yap 2012).

A manifest abuse of authority, a judgment obtained unfairly or working a serious injustice, fraud or collusion by a court, fraud, and lack of jurisdiction have been considered grounds to ignore a judgment's validity. Validity fundamentally includes the court's competence to adjudicate the matter with regard to subject-matter jurisdiction, territorial jurisdiction, and notice. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 71 (App. 2016).

When a court exercises jurisdiction over land, it can only exercise that jurisdiction in the nature of an in rem proceeding. In rem proceedings encompass any action in which essential purpose of suit is to determine title to or affect interests in specific property located within the territory over which court has jurisdiction. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

To be able to exercise in rem jurisdiction, the property over which the court is to exercise jurisdiction must be physically present within the court's territorial jurisdiction and under its control. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

No court located in Chuuk can exercise jurisdiction over land in Pohnpei. Only a court in Pohnpei can do that. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 519 (App. 2018).

A court's jurisdiction over land is in the nature of an in rem proceeding. "In rem" proceedings encompass any action in which essential purpose of suit is to determine title to or affect interests in specific property located within the territory over which court has jurisdiction. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

In rem jurisdiction includes registration of land titles, mortgages, and probate proceedings involving land. To exercise in rem jurisdiction, the property over which the court is to exercise jurisdiction must be physically present within the court's territorial jurisdiction and under its control. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

Land on Pohnpei is not physically present in the Chuuk State Supreme Court's territorial jurisdiction. Thus, neither it, nor any court in Chuuk, can exercise jurisdiction over any Pohnpei land. Only a court in Pohnpei can do that. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

Land on Pohnpei cannot be tied up in a Chuuk probate proceeding. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

It is a well established principle of law that a court's jurisdiction does not extend beyond the boundaries of the state of its creation. This is because the authority of every tribunal is necessarily restricted by the territorial limits of the state in which it is established, and any attempt to exercise authority beyond those limits would be deemed in every other forum an illegitimate assumption of power. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 624, 626 (App. 2018).

A state court has no jurisdiction over real estate in the jurisdiction of a different sovereign state. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 119 (App. 2018).

MANDAMUS AND PROHIBITION

The party seeking a writ of mandamus has the burden of showing that its right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable. Senda v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 336, 338 (App. 1994).

A denial of a motion to recuse may be reviewed by means of a petition for a writ of prohibition or mandamus. The standard of review is whether the trial judge abused his discretion in denying the motion to recuse. The petitioner must show that the trial judge clearly and indisputably abused his discretion when he denied the motion to disqualify. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1997).

Although mandamus cases usually involve judges and arise out of pending cases, a case may arise out of an administrative procedure and the public official may be a clerk instead of a judge or justice. Nonetheless the same principles apply, and mandamus may be the appropriate remedy where there is undue delay. In re Certification of Belgrove, 8 FSM R. 74, 78 (App. 1997).

The standards governing the issuance of a writ of mandamus are well-recognized. The exact formulations may, however, differ somewhat. Federated Shipping Co. v. Trial Division, 9 FSM R. 270, 272 (App. 1999).

The power to grant the writ is discretionary. Federated Shipping Co. v. Trial Division, 9 FSM R. 270, 273 (App. 1999).

The party seeking the writ of mandamus has the burden of showing that its right to the writ's issuance is clear and undisputable. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Merely being a case of first impression does not automatically make a petition not frivolous. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 12 FSM R. 437, 440-41 (App. 2004).

Rule 38 sanctions will not be awarded when the petition was not wholly without merit or was frivolous since the constitutional issues relating to a privacy right had not been previously ruled upon. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 12 FSM R. 437, 441 (App. 2004).

Rule 38 damages may be awarded when a mandamus petition is frivolous. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 12 FSM R. 450, 452 (App. 2004).

A writ of procedendo is a high prerogative writ of extraordinary nature that is an order from a superior court to an inferior court to proceed to judgment without trying to tell the inferior court what its judgment should be. It was the earliest remedy for refusal or neglect of justice by the courts, and, in many jurisdictions, the writ has become obsolete, and a writ of mandamus may be sought instead. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 16 FSM R. 382, 385 n.1 (Chk. 2009).

FSM Appellate Rule 21 is a nearly verbatim adoption of U.S. Federal Appellate Rule 21, and so special consideration should be given to United States decisions regarding application of Appellate Rule 21. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 253, 257 (Pon. 2014).

The rules do not stay trial division proceedings while a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought. The trial division is therefore free to act unless a stay has been specifically ordered. A writ applicant may seek a stay, first from the trial division, and if unsuccessful there, from the appellate division. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 577, 578 (App. 2016).

When no stay was ever issued (and none apparently ever sought), the trial division justice may, while a petition for a writ of prohibition to disqualify that justice is pending in the appellate division, continue to make such orders, and do all acts, not inconsistent with law or with the rules of procedure and evidence as may be necessary for the due administration of justice. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 577, 578 (App. 2016).

The Kosrae State Court has the power to issue all writs and other process, and may entertain a petition for a writ of mandamus. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 93 (App. 2016).

It is not proper to make the lower court a defendant when seeking judicial review of its actions in a higher court. Judicial review of a lower court's acts or omissions is usually accomplished by an appeal to a higher court or, on rare occasion, by a petition for a prerogative writ, such as prohibition or mandamus. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

A lower court should not be made a defendant when seeking judicial review of its actions in a higher court. Judicial review of a lower court's acts or omissions is properly accomplished by an appeal to a higher court or, on rare occasion, by a petition for a prerogative writ, such as prohibition or mandamus. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 620 (App. 2018).

– Authority and Jurisdiction

The FSM Supreme Court has inherent constitutional power to issue all writs; this includes the traditional common law writ of mandamus. 4 F.S.M.C. 117. Nix v. Ehmes, 1 FSM R. 114, 118 (Pon. 1982).

That the FSM Supreme Court has the general power to issue writs of mandamus is beyond controversy. 4 F.S.M.C. 117. However, exercise of such power must be tempered by sober judgment, for it is equally settled that the writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. Damarlane v. Santos, 6 FSM R. 45, 46 (Pon. 1993).

Chuuk State Supreme Court has the power to issue all writs for equitable and legal relief including writs of mandamus and prohibition. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 496 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The Supreme Court has the power to issue writs of prohibition or of mandamus but may only do so if the petitioner has met its burden to show that its right to the writ is clear and indisputable. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1997).

Writs of mandamus are issued in aid of the court's appellate jurisdiction. The court's authority is not confined to issuance of writs in aid of a jurisdiction already acquired by appeal but extends to those cases which are within its appellate jurisdiction although no appeal has been perfected. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

For the purposes of writs of mandamus an inferior court is one that is either placed under the supervisory or appellate control of the other court or is one whose jurisdiction is limited and confined. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

The historic use of writs of prohibition and mandamus directed by an appellate court to an inferior court has been to exert the revisory appellate power over the inferior court. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division is not a superior tribunal to the Pohnpei Supreme Court, although in certain circumstances the FSM Supreme Court appellate division is such a superior tribunal. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

If it were proper to issue a writ of mandamus directed to the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division, it could only be done upon application to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division, not to the trial division. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division is without jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus directed to the Pohnpei Supreme Court. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 120 (Pon. 2001).

The Kosrae State Court has the power to issue writs of mandamus but may only do so if the petitioner has met its burden to show that its rights to the writ is clear and undisputable. The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is to require an official to carry out a clear, non-discretionary duty. Jackson v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 198, 199 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Kosrae State Court has jurisdiction to issue writs and other process. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 260 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The statutory basis for Appellate Procedure Rule 21(a), which provides for application for a writ of prohibition, is 4 F.S.M.C. 117, which provides that the Supreme Court and each division thereof will have power to issue all writs. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 585 (App. 2004).

While none of the FSM Rules of Civil Procedure appear to govern the disposition of a mandamus petition filed before the trial division, the power of the FSM Supreme Court trial division to entertain a petition for such a writ is beyond dispute. In reaching a disposition of a pending petition, the court will proceed analogously with Appellate Rule 23(b), which governs mandamus petitions before the appellate division, and provides that if the court is of the opinion that the writ clearly should not be granted, the court will deny the petition even before an answer has been filed. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 34 (Kos. 2004).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has the power to issue writs of prohibition in the appropriate case. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

The Cuuk State Supreme Court derives its authority to issue writs of prohibition from Chk. S.L. No. 190-08, § 4, and Chk. App. R. 21(a). Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 182 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The FSM Supreme Court has inherent constitutional power to issue all writs, including writs of mandamus and writs of prohibition. The extraordinary writ of mandamus is used to compel public officials to perform a duty ministerial in nature and not subject to the official's own discretion while the extraordinary writ of prohibition is used to prevent a trial court from exceeding its jurisdiction and exercising unauthorized judicial or quasi-judicial power. The writs of mandamus and prohibition are similar in that the former commands the trial court to do something, while the latter commands the trial court not to do something. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2007).

A court that has the power to issue writs of prohibition may only do so if the petitioner has met its burden to show that its right to the writ is clear and indisputable. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 232 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Courts frequently, in addition to prohibiting a specified action, impose affirmative directions or commands found essential to adequate relief. When the lower tribunal is completely without jurisdiction to act, the court has the authority to not only prevent the lower tribunal's excesses but to also correct the results thereof. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 232 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has the authority to issue a writ of mandamus in a proper case. The Chuuk Judiciary Act gives all state courts the power to issue all writs for equitable and legal relief. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Unlike a notice of appeal, there are no jurisdictional time frames for filing a petition for a writ of prohibition or for other extraordinary writs. The Appellate Rule 4 time limits for filing notices of appeal do not apply to petitions for extraordinary writs under Appellate Rule 21. In re Sanction of George, 19 FSM R. 131, 132 (App. 2013).

The only procedure available to seek restraint of or injunctive relief against an FSM Supreme Court trial division justice is to be found in Rule 21 of the FSM Rules of Appellate Procedure. It is established in this jurisdiction that a writ of prohibition must be directed to a court or tribunal inferior in rank to the one issuing the writ. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 253, 257 (Pon. 2014).

The structure of the FSM Court system dictates that as a practical matter a writ against a trial division court may only be issued by the appellate division. Therefore, a writ of mandamus or prohibition, even if characterized as an "injunction" or "setting aside an order" may not be issued by one trial division justice against another FSM Supreme Court trial division justice. Appellate Rule 21 writs of prohibition are the sole procedure available for seeking restraint of a trial court judge's actions in a pending case. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 253, 257-58 (Pon. 2014).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division has the authority to issue writs of mandamus and prohibition as they may be necessary for the due administration of justice because the Supreme Court and each division thereof has power to issue all writs and other process not inconsistent with law or with the rules of procedure and evidence established by the Chief Justice, as may be necessary for the due administration of justice. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 288 (App. 2014).

Since a writ of mandamus issues from a higher tribunal to an inferior tribunal, the trial division may issue a writ of mandamus to compel a public official to perform a duty ministerial in nature and not subject to the official's own discretion. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 288 (App. 2014).

An appellate court considers whether a lower court also has original jurisdiction to issue mandamus with the appellate court. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 288 (App. 2014).

The FSM Supreme Court trial division is a tribunal superior to an FSM administrative agency. It has original jurisdiction over writs of mandamus directed to administrative agencies, and may in an appropriate case issue a writ of mandamus directed to the Secretary of Finance and Administration. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 288 (App. 2014).

The FSM Supreme Court appellate and trial divisions have concurrent original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus directed to administrative agencies. Though courts of last resort are given original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus it does not follow that such courts whose principal function is to exercise appellate or supervisory jurisdiction, will assume original jurisdiction in all cases in which their aid may be sought and which otherwise may be a proper case for the use of the remedy. When concurrent original jurisdiction exists, the petitioner ought to show why it is essential or proper that the writ issue from the appellate court rather than from the lower court, and in the absence of such a showing the appellate court may refuse to issue the writ. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 288-89 (App. 2014).

Although the FSM Supreme Court appellate division and the trial division have concurrent original jurisdiction over the issuance of a writ of mandamus directed to FSM administrative agencies, absent special circumstances, the writ should be sought first in the trial division and any petition for the writ filed in the appellate division should be dismissed without prejudice to any future filing in the trial division. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 289 (App. 2014).

Normally a petition for a writ of mandamus filed in the appellate division when the trial division has concurrent original jurisdiction should be dismissed without prejudice to a future petition filed in the trial division, but when it is obvious that the writ clearly should not be granted, the appellate division can deny it. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 290 (App. 2014).

Since a writ of prohibition can only issue from a superior court against an inferior court, when, although the plaintiffs' complaint requested injunctive relief rather than specifically requesting a writ of prohibition, it is clear that they in actuality were requesting a writ of prohibition, any possibility of relief is plainly foreclosed. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 367, 371-72 (Pon. 2014).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court trial division does not have appellate jurisdiction over Pohnpei municipal or local courts, and therefore the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division lacks jurisdiction over a petition for a writ of mandamus directed to a municipal court. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 401, 402 (App. 2014).

A writ of prohibition directed to the Nett District Court trial division must first be sought in the Nett District Court appellate division since that is the tribunal with immediate supervisory power over the Nett District Court trial division. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 401, 403 (App. 2014).

The FSM Supreme Court appellate division may exercise jurisdiction over an appeal from the Nett District Court to the extent that it is an appeal from the Nett District Court appellate division and it may consider a petition for a writ of prohibition if a writ of prohibition has already been sought and denied in the Nett District Court appellate division or to the extent that it is a petition for a writ of prohibition directed to the Nett District Court appellate division. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 401, 403 (App. 2014).

When the Chief Justice of the Nett District Court was acting as a Nett District Court trial division judge, a writ of prohibition directed against him must first be sought from the Nett District Court appellate division.

Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 401, 403 (App. 2014).

Under 4 F.S.M.C. 117, the FSM Supreme Court has a constitutional power to issue all writs, including writs of prohibition. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 248 (App. 2015).

A prerogative writ such as procedendo, mandamus, or prohibition can only be directed to a court or tribunal lower in rank to the one issuing the writ. Chuuk v. Chuuk State Supreme Court App. Div., 21 FSM R. 583, 586 (App. 2018).

Since the FSM Supreme Court appellate division is a court that is superior or higher in rank to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division because, as authorized by the FSM Constitution, FSM Const. art. XI, § 7, and the Chuuk Constitution, Chk. Const. art. VII, § 4. The FSM Supreme Court appellate division may thus, but only in the appropriate and rare and exceptional case, issue the high prerogative writ of procedendo or mandamus directed to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division. Chuuk v. Chuuk State Supreme Court App. Div., 21 FSM R. 583, 586 (App. 2018).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has the authority to issue a writ of mandamus because the Chuuk State Judiciary Act gives all state courts the power to issue writs for equitable and legal relief. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 659 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Nature and Scope

The writ of mandamus is used to compel public officials to perform a duty ministerial in nature and not subject to the official's own discretion. Nix v. Ehmes, 1 FSM R. 114, 118 (Pon. 1982).

The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, the object is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitution for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. In re Raitoun, 1 FSM R. 561, 562 (App. 1984).

Only under special circumstances that render the matter rare and exceptional should the Federated States of Micronesia Supreme Court appellate division issue a writ of mandamus to alter a trial judge's conduct before the trial court has completed proceedings and reached a final decision. In re Raitoun, 1 FSM R. 561, 562-63 (App. 1984).

The finality requirement and its underlying rationale mandate appellate court restraint and preclude issuance of writs of mandamus and prohibition on an interlocutory basis except in those rare and exceptional circumstances when the precise requirements for issuance of the writ are met and the appellate court in its discretion determines that immediate relief is called for. In re Main, 4 FSM R. 255, 258 (App. 1990).

The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy issued to require a public official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. Office of the Public Defender v. FSM Supreme Court, 4 FSM R. 307, 309 (App. 1990).

The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. Senda v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 336, 338 (App. 1994).

A writ of mandamus may only force a ministerial act or prevent a clear abuse of power and cannot be used to test or overrule a judge's exercise of discretion. Senda v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 336, 338 (App. 1994).

Mere legal error by a judge, even gross legal error in a particular case, as distinguished from a calculated and repeated disregard of governing rules, does not suffice to support issuance of the writ of mandamus. Senda v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 336, 338 (App. 1994).

The single issue presented by a writ of prohibition is whether or not an inferior court or tribunal is without jurisdiction or is about to act in excess of its jurisdiction. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 496 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The general requirements for the issuance of a writ of prohibition are that a court or officer is about to exercise judicial or quasi-judicial power, that the exercise of such power is unauthorized and will result in damage or injury for which there is no plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy. Generally, the writ will not be issued unless the petitioner has objected in the inferior court to that court's exercise of jurisdiction in order to allow the lower court the opportunity to rule properly on the question of its own jurisdiction. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 497 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The extraordinary writ of prohibition is proper to prevent an inferior tribunal acting without or in excess of jurisdiction which may result in wrong, damage, and injustice and there is no plain, speedy and adequate remedy otherwise available. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 497 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The principal and fundamental purpose of the writ of prohibition is to prevent an encroachment, excess, usurpation or assumption of jurisdiction on the part of an inferior court or tribunal. The issuance of the writ is discretionary and used with great caution for the furtherance of justice and to secure order and regularity in judicial proceedings. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 497 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

It is proper to issue a writ of prohibition to restrain a co-equal court or justice from proceeding in a matter that was already pending before another court or justice. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The purpose of a writ of mandamus is to compel a judicial or other public officer who has failed or refused to perform a non-discretionary act which results from his official station or from operation of law. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 108-09 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

The determination of whether the power to grant a writ of mandamus should be exercised entails a court's full recognition of the extraordinary nature of the relief requested. Though the power is curative, it is strong medicine and its use must therefore be restricted to the most serious and critical ills. Federated Shipping Co. v. Trial Division, 9 FSM R. 270, 272-73 (App. 1999).

Appellate review, in all but narrowly defined, exceptional circumstances, should be postponed until final judgment has been rendered by the trial court. Hence the party requesting a writ of prohibition or mandamus has the burden of showing a clear and indisputable right thereto, and must show exceptional circumstances necessitating review before final judgment below. Federated Shipping Co. v. Trial Division, 9 FSM R. 270, 273 (App. 1999).

A writ of mandamus is used to confine an inferior court to a lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction or to compel it to exercise its authority when it is its duty to do so. This is similar to a writ of prohibition, which, instead of commanding an inferior tribunal to do something, commands it not to do something. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 119-20 (Pon. 2001).

A writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy the purpose of which is to cause a public official to carry out his or her clear, nondiscretionary duty. FSM Dev. Bank v. Director of Commerce & Indus., 10 FSM R. 317, 319 (Kos. 2001).

Given the nature of the remedy of mandamus, and the caution exercised in affording it, it is important that the right sought to be enforced be clear and certain. There must be an immediate right to have the act in question performed, and such right must be specific, well defined, and complete, so as not to admit of any reasonable controversy. FSM Dev. Bank v. Director of Commerce & Indus., 10 FSM R. 317, 319 (Kos.

Five elements must be present before the court can exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer; 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial; 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act; 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act; and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Each of these five requirements must be satisfied. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Five elements must be present before the court can exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer; 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial; 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act; 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act; and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, the object is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear nondiscretionary duty. The writ's purpose is to compel a judicial or other public officer who has failed or refused to perform a non-discretionary act which results from his official station or from the operation of law. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A non-discretionary or ministerial act may be established by the Constitution, by state law or by regulation. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is not to cure a legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. A writ of mandamus may only force a ministerial act or prevent a clear abuse of power and cannot be used to test or overrule a judge's exercise of discretion. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 409 n.3 (App. 2003).

A writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is not to cure a legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. The writ may only force a ministerial act or prevent a clear abuse of power; it cannot be used to test or overrule a judge's exercise of discretion. It issues only where there is no other adequate remedy available. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 437, 441 (App. 2003).

Issuance now of a writ of mandamus cannot serve as a substitute for the pending appeal. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 437, 441 (App. 2003).

A mandamus action is an extraordinary remedy that is to be reserved for rare and exceptional circumstances. The requirements for mandamus relief are that 1) the respondent must be a public official; 2) the action sought to be compelled must be nondiscretionary or ministerial; 3) the respondent must be under a clear duty to perform the act; 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to do the act; and 5) no other remedy must exist. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 33 (Kos. 2004).

In order to state a claim for mandamus relief, a petitioner must allege that the respondent official owes him or her a duty so plainly described as to be free from doubt. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 33 (Kos. 2004).

Presumption and belief, irrespective of who makes the assumption or holds the belief, are insufficient to support allegations entitling a petitioner to mandamus relief. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 34 (Kos. 2004).

The general requirements for the issuance of a writ of prohibition are that: a court or officer is about to exercise judicial or quasi-judicial power, and the exercise of power is unauthorized and will result in damage or injury for which there is no plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy. Ordinarily, the writ will not issue unless the petitioner has objected in the lower court to that court's exercise of jurisdiction. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 182 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The court is mindful of its duty to issue the extraordinary writ of prohibition with great caution and is also mindful that it is especially important to exercise the writ in those cases where it is necessary to confine a lower court to its proper function. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 187 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The FSM Supreme Court has inherent constitutional power to issue all writs, including writs of mandamus and writs of prohibition. The extraordinary writ of mandamus is used to compel public officials to perform a duty ministerial in nature and not subject to the official's own discretion while the extraordinary writ of prohibition is used to prevent a trial court from exceeding its jurisdiction and exercising unauthorized judicial or quasi-judicial power. The writs of mandamus and prohibition are similar in that the former commands the trial court to do something, while the latter commands the trial court not to do something. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2007).

Mere legal error by a judge, even gross legal error in a particular case, as distinguished from a calculated and repeated disregard of governing rules, does not suffice to support the issuance of a writ of mandamus or prohibition. The issuance of writs is discretionary and must be used with great caution. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2007).

Only under special circumstances that render the matter rare and exceptional should the FSM Supreme Court appellate division issue a writ of mandamus or prohibition to alter a trial judge's conduct before the trial court has completed the proceedings and reached a final decision. The finality requirement and its underlying rationale mandate appellate court restraint, and preclude issuance of writs of mandamus and prohibition on an interlocutory basis, except in those rare and exceptional circumstances when the precise requirements for issuance of the writ are met and the appellate court, in its discretion, determines that immediate relief is necessitated. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2007).

The FSM Supreme Court's exercise of its power to issue writs of mandamus and prohibition must be tempered by sober judgment, since such writs are extraordinary remedies. The determination whether to grant a writ of mandamus or prohibition involves the court's full recognition of the extraordinary nature of the relief requested. Though the power is curative, it is strong medicine and its use must be restricted to the most serious and critical ills. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2007).

Each of these five elements must be satisfied. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2007).

The party seeking a writ of mandamus has the burden of showing that its right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable. Since a prerequisite to the issuance of a writ of mandamus or prohibition is the existence of a clear duty that is being violated by the trial court, no writ will issue when the petitioner has not established that the trial court had any duty, much less a clear duty. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 600 (App. 2007).

The general requirements for the issuance of an extraordinary writ of prohibition are that a court or an officer is about to exercise judicial or quasi-judicial power, that the exercise of such power is unauthorized or the inferior tribunal is about to act without or in excess of jurisdiction which may or will result in damage or injury for which there is no plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The issuance of writs is discretionary and must be used with great caution. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 231 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A writ of mandamus is used to confine an inferior tribunal to a lawful exercise of its prescribed jurisdiction or to compel it to exercise its authority when it is its duty to do so, which is similar to a writ of prohibition that, instead of commanding an inferior tribunal to do something, commands it not to do something. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20-21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The historic use of writs of prohibition and mandamus directed by an appellate court to an inferior tribunal has been to exert the revisory appellate power over the inferior tribunal. For the purpose of a writ of mandamus an inferior tribunal is one that is either placed under the supervisory or appellate control of the other court or is one whose jurisdiction is limited and confined. The Chuuk State Election Commission is an agency or tribunal inferior to the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The five elements that must be present before the court can exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus are: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer or body, 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial, 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act, 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act, and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A writ of prohibition is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal. Such a writ may only prevent a clear abuse of power and cannot be used to test or overrule a judge's exercise of discretion. Mere legal error by a judge, even gross legal error in a particular case, as distinguished from a calculated and repeated disregard of governing rules, does not suffice to support the issuance of a writ of prohibition. Ehsa v. Johnny, 19 FSM R. 175, 177 (App. 2013).

For the FSM Supreme Court to exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus or prohibition: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer; 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial; 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act; 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act; and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available, and each of these five elements must be satisfied. A writ of mandamus or prohibition is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear, non-discretionary duty or prevent a clear abuse of power. Tilfas v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 181, 184 (App. 2013).

The issuance of writs of mandamus or prohibition must be done with great caution and cannot be used to test or overrule a judge's exercise of discretion, and a mere legal error by a judge, even gross legal error in a particular case, as distinguished from a calculated and repeated disregard of governing rules, will not suffice to support the issuance of a writ of prohibition. Tilfas v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 181, 184 (App. 2013).

The single issue presented by a writ of prohibition is whether an inferior court or tribunal is without jurisdiction or is about to act in excess of its jurisdiction. The extraordinary writ of prohibition is proper to prevent an inferior tribunal acting without or in excess of jurisdiction which may result in a wrong, damage, and injustice when there is no plain, speedy, and adequate legal remedy otherwise available. Tilfas v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 181, 184 (App. 2013).

A writ of prohibition cannot be used as a substitute for a pending appeal of attorney sanctions that is currently being briefed, especially when the sanctions have been stayed while that appeal proceeds. That is an adequate legal remedy for the attorney sanctions. Tilfas v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 181, 184 (App. 2013).

Five elements must be present in order for the FSM Supreme Court to exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus or prohibition: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer; 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial; 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act; 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act; and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 2013).

A writ of prohibition is an extraordinary remedy, the object of which is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear, non-discretionary duty. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 2013).

A writ cannot be used to test or overrule a judge's exercise of discretion, and mere legal error by a judge, even gross legal error in a particular case, as distinguished from a calculated and repeated disregard of governing rules, does not suffice to support the issuance of a writ of prohibition. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 2013).

The single issue presented by a petition for a writ of prohibition is whether an inferior court or tribunal is without jurisdiction or is about to act in excess of its jurisdiction. The extraordinary writ of prohibition is proper to prevent an inferior tribunal acting without or in excess of jurisdiction which may result in a wrong, damage, and injustice when there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy otherwise available. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 2013).

The only procedure available to seek restraint of or injunctive relief against an FSM Supreme Court trial division justice is to be found in Rule 21 of the FSM Rules of Appellate Procedure. It is established in this jurisdiction that a writ of prohibition must be directed to a court or tribunal inferior in rank to the one issuing the writ. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 19 FSM R. 253, 257 (Pon. 2014).

When a case has languished in the Pohnpei Supreme Court trial division since 1991, any party, instead of filing suit in the FSM Supreme Court, could have sought from the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division a writ of mandamus or a writ of procedendo as a remedy for the lower Pohnpei state court's refusal or neglect of justice. Such a writ would order the trial court to make a decision in the case without telling the lower court what its decision should be. Carius v. Johnson, 20 FSM R. 143, 145-46 (Pon. 2015).

A writ of prohibition is an extraordinary remedy and may only prevent a clear abuse of discretion; it may not be used to overrule a trial judge's sound exercise of discretion. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 248-49 (App. 2015).

The determination of whether to grant a writ of mandamus or prohibition involves the court's full recognition of the extraordinary nature of the relief requested, and no writ will issue if the petitioner has not first established that the trial judge had a duty and violated it. Though the power is curative, it is strong medicine and its use must be restricted to the most serious and critical ills. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 249 (App. 2015).

A writ of procedendo is a high prerogative writ of extraordinary nature that is an order from a superior or higher court to a lower court to proceed to judgment without trying to tell the lower court what its judgment should be. It was the earliest remedy for refusal or neglect of justice by the courts, and, in many jurisdictions, the writ has become obsolete, and a writ of mandamus may be issued instead. Chuuk v. Chuuk State Supreme Court App. Div., 21 FSM R. 583, 586 (App. 2018).

A writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy issued to require a public official to carry out a clear, non-discretionary duty. The object of a writ of mandamus is not to cure a mere legal error or to serve as a substitute for appeal, but to require an official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 659-60 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A writ of mandamus may only force a ministerial act or prevent a clear abuse of power and cannot be used to test or overrule a judge's exercise of discretion. As the land commission occupies a semi-judicial role, a writ of mandamus may be directed to a Land Commissioner's decisions as well. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 660 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– Procedure

The proper method to obtain a writ of prohibition to disqualify a member of an appellate panel is to move for disqualification before that member, and, if the recusal motion is denied, to file a petition for a writ of prohibition as a separate matter to be considered by an appellate panel constituted pursuant to Appellate Rule 21(a). Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 1995).

The Office of the Attorney General is not a public officer – it is a public office. In order to meet the mandamus requirement of a public officer, the Attorney General should have been named as a respondent. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When an amended petition for writ of mandamus is filed, the petitioner will be limited to briefing the issues raised in its original petition for writ of mandamus, not the issues raised in its amended petition, and the amended petition will be designated as a case with a different docket number. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 409 (App. 2003).

An amended petition for a writ of mandamus is considered a separate petition for writ of mandamus involving the same parties. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 437, 440 (App. 2003).

When an application has been made for a writ of mandamus or prohibition directed to an FSM Supreme Court judge the remaining article XI, section 3 FSM Supreme Court justice(s), acting as the appellate division, are eligible to consider the petition. If the remaining fulltime justice(s) are of the opinion that the writ clearly should not be granted, they shall deny the petition. Otherwise, they shall order that an answer be filed. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 504 (App. 2003).

The rules do not stay trial division proceedings when a writ of mandamus is sought. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 203 (Chk. 2003).

It has been a principle of long standing that a stay will not be granted in a criminal matter while the defendant is seeking a writ of mandamus unless there is a substantial likelihood he will prevail. The court cannot see any reason why the standard should be lower when the defendant has also filed an interlocutory notice of appeal as well as a petition for a writ of mandamus. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 204 (Chk. 2003).

Rule 38 damages may be awarded when a mandamus petition is frivolous. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 12 FSM R. 437, 440 (App. 2004).

When the court refused to allow the original petition for a writ of mandamus to be amended and provided that the amended petition would be considered a separate petition involving the same parties, the petitioners' pursuit of the petition after the order denying amendment did not make the original petition frivolous. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 12 FSM R. 437, 440 (App. 2004).

The FSM Supreme Court Director of Court Administration is a court officer who may properly be the subject of a writ of prohibition when no other adequate remedy presents itself since a specially assigned justice's handling of cases specially assigned to him is not possible in the absence of certain administrative steps on the Director's part. Accordingly, the Court Director can properly be named a respondent. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 585 (App. 2004).

While none of the FSM Rules of Civil Procedure appear to govern the disposition of a mandamus petition filed before the trial division, the power of the FSM Supreme Court trial division to entertain a petition for such a writ is beyond dispute. In reaching a disposition of a pending petition, the court will proceed analogously with Appellate Rule 23(b), which governs mandamus petitions before the appellate division, and provides that if the court is of the opinion that the writ clearly should not be granted, the court will deny the petition even before an answer has been filed. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 34 (Kos. 2004).

A respondent justice, as is his right under Appellate Procedure Rule 21(b), may file a letter that he does not wish to participate further in the prohibition proceeding against him. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 134-35 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

A writ of prohibition directed to a Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division justice is not a matter that the justice is barred from hearing when it was not heard by such justice in the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division, and in an FSM Supreme Court case, the justice was careful not to decide anything on the merits. Not having expressed an opinion on the merits or done more than issue a preliminary injunction, a justice is not precluded from sitting on a panel considering a petition for writ of prohibition. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 141, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

A motion to stay proceedings pending consideration of a petition for a writ of mandamus concerning a lawyer's representation is denied when there: 1) is no substantial possibility that an appellate panel would grant the writ, 2) is no showing of irreparable harm if the stay is denied, and 3) are no equities presented that favor a stay. McVey v. Etscheit, 14 FSM R. 268, 271 (Pon. 2006).

When a petition addressed to an appellate justice asking that he disqualify himself has been denied by that justice, the party may file a petition for a writ of prohibition to prevent that justice from continuing to sit on the appeal. When the other two panel justices are of the opinion that the writ of prohibition clearly should not be granted, they will deny the petition. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 303, 304 (App. 2006).

A petition for a preemptory writ, such as prohibition or mandamus, is an expedited procedure that does not usually require the certification of a trial court record, or extended briefing, or even a transcript, or oral argument. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 355, 363 (Pon. 2006).

It is unclear whether a complaint and summons must be served with a petition for a writ of mandamus, but, service of the petition was defective because a summons should have been issued and served. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 19 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The Legislature is not an indispensable party when a petition seeks a writ commanding the State Election Commission to perform an act, not the Legislature to perform an act. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When parties seek relief from a final order and interlocutory relief in the nature of relief usually sought by a petition for a writ of prohibition, the two are deemed to be two separate appellate cases with the appeal from the final order proceeding on the usual course of an appeal on the merits and with the petition for a writ of prohibition proceeding separately under a different docket number on the Rule 21 expedited procedure pertinent to that form of relief. In re Sanction of George, 19 FSM R. 131, 133 (App. 2013).

Under Appellate Rule 21, if the appellate division is of the opinion that a writ of prohibition clearly should not be granted, it must deny the petition. Otherwise, it must order that an answer be filed. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 2013).

The party seeking a writ of mandamus has the burden of showing that its right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 289 (App. 2014).

The FSM Supreme Court appellate division may, in the interest of judicial economy, determine if a petition for a writ of mandamus that should have been filed in the trial division clearly should not be granted. If it is of the opinion that the writ clearly should not be granted, it will deny the petition, but if there is any doubt, it will dismiss the petition without prejudice so that the petitioner could file in the trial division. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 289 (App. 2014).

A writ of prohibition directed to the Nett District Court trial division must first be sought in the Nett District Court appellate division since that is the tribunal with immediate supervisory power over the Nett District Court trial division. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 401, 403 (App. 2014).

When the Chief Justice of the Nett District Court was acting as a Nett District Court trial division judge, a writ of prohibition directed against him must first be sought from the Nett District Court appellate division. Loyola ex rel. Edmund v. Hairens, 19 FSM R. 401, 403 (App. 2014).

A writ of mandamus petition will be dismissed without prejudice when the named respondent is the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division because it is not a public officer – it is a public office. To meet the mandamus requirement of a public officer, the trial judge should be the named respondent. Irons v. Chuuk State Supreme Court Tr. Div., 19 FSM R. 654, 655 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

A petition for a writ of mandamus will be dismissed when the named respondent is the Chuuk State Election Commission because it is not a public officer – it is a public office. In order to meet the mandamus requirement of a public officer, the Director and Commissioners should have been named as respondents. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 20 FSM R. 36, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

A petition for a writ of prohibition to disqualify a trial court judge is procedurally deficient when it includes a lone exhibit which reflects the trial judge's order; when there is no affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist; when it lacks a memorandum of points and authorities; and when it includes a motion to stay that does not properly belong before the appellate division since it should have been filed in the trial court. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 249 (App. 2015).

A petitioner for a writ of prohibition must allege facts that show an appearance of partiality. Without a supporting affidavit, the purported facts underpinning the allegation are absent, and only the petitioner's subjective assertions remain, and when the petitioner's unsupported allegations that the judge is not impartial are purely speculative, they are insufficient to support his disqualification. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

When there are too many procedural deficiencies to overlook because the application for a writ of prohibition's certificate of service shows service only on the respondent judge at her office; because the real parties in interest were not served and were not named as real parties in interest in the application or in the case caption; because the petition does not contain a copy of the respondent judge's order denying her recusal, if there was a written order, or a transcript of the denial on the record if the denial was made orally; and because, although the relevant judicial disqualification statute requires that an application to disqualify a justice be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist, no affidavit accompanied the petition although an "affidavit attached hereto" is mentioned in the application, the petition for a writ of prohibition will be denied without prejudice to any future application in which all of the procedural deficiencies have been cured. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 563, 564 (App. 2016).

When the previous application for a writ of prohibition was denied without prejudice because of various deficiencies in the application and a second application for a writ of prohibition is filed, the court clerks will assign it the next available appellate docket number since it is a new application. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 577, 578 (App. 2016).

When membership in the Mwoalen Wahu Ileile En Pohnpei is limited to the traditional paramount chiefs of Pohnpei and the paramount chiefs are only those persons who hold the title of either Nanmwarki or Nahnken and when the justice's father, as Wasahi Sokehs, is not a paramount chief and is therefore not now a member of the plaintiff Mwoalen Wahu Ileile En Pohnpei, and, unless one day he attains the title of Nanmwarki Sokehs, will never be a member of that council, a writ of prohibition, directed to the trial justice, clearly should not be granted. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 577, 579 (App. 2016).

The appellate rules require that a petition for a writ of prohibition be accompanied by proof of service on the respondent judge or justice and on all parties to the action in the trial court. Miju Mulsan Co. v. Carl-Worswick, 20 FSM R. 660, 662 (App. 2016).

Since Appellate Rule 21(a) requires that a petition for a writ of prohibition contain copies of any order or opinion or parts of the record which may be essential to an understanding of the matters set forth in the petition, that would, at a minimum, be the trial judge's written order denying her recusal and the reasons for that denial or, if the denial was oral, a transcript of that denial. Miju Mulsan Co. v. Carl-Worswick, 20 FSM R. 660, 662 (App. 2016).

The relevant judicial disqualification statute requires that an application to disqualify a justice, be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist. Miju Mulsan Co. v. Carl-Worswick, 20 FSM R. 660, 662 (App. 2016).

When the procedural deficiencies in a petition for a writ of prohibition are too many to overlook, the petition will be denied without prejudice to any future petition in which these procedural deficiencies have all been cured. Miju Mulsan Co. v. Carl-Worswick, 20 FSM R. 660, 662 (App. 2016).

When a new FSM Supreme Court associate justice has taken the oath of office and is not disqualified, he, as the remaining article XI, section 3 FSM Supreme Court justice is eligible to consider a petition for a writ of prohibition and he alone could deny that petition. But when a specially assigned justice has already sat on the appeal case since his designation in March 2016, both the specially assigned justice and the remaining article XI, section 3 justice will constitute the appellate division for the case. Miju Mulsan Co. v. Carl-Worswick, 20 FSM R. 660, 662 (App. 2016).

When the trial court clearly considered the petition for a writ of mandamus, it did not deprive the petitioner of his procedural due process by denying the writ without first having a hearing. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 93 (App. 2016).

The burden of proof lies with the party seeking the writ of mandamus; they must show that the right to issuance of the writ is clear and indisputable. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 660 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

– When May Issue

Where there is no evidence of arbitrary or capricious conduct, the Pohnpei Supreme Court will decline to issue a writ of mandamus compelling the State Legislature to exercise discretionary legislative functions, even though the State Constitution expressly commands the performance of those functions. People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 11 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

When a justice is called upon to alter the conduct of a trial judge in a state court before that court has completed proceedings and reached a final decision in a case, the pertinent inquiry is whether or not special circumstances exist so as to render the matter rare and exceptional for issuance of a writ of mandamus. Damarlane v. Santos, 6 FSM R. 45, 46-47 (Pon. 1993).

A request for mandamus so as to avoid a long and costly appeal does not present rare and exceptional circumstances so as to warrant issuance of a writ of mandamus. Damarlane v. Santos, 6 FSM R. 45, 47 (Pon. 1993).

Where the most the petitioner alleges is that the trial justice committed gross legal error and where the matter is already on appeal a writ of mandamus will not issue because it was not shown that the trial justice breached a duty, ministerial in nature, or that he had engaged in a clear abuse of power. Senda v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 336, 338 (App. 1994).

In order to overturn the trial judge's denial of a motion to recuse an appellant must show an abuse of the trial judge's discretion. The same standard of review applies to a petition for a writ of prohibition ordering a judge to recuse himself. Nahnken of Nett v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 339, 340 (App. 1994).

Since a prerequisite to the issuance of a writ of mandamus is the existence of a clear duty that is being violated by the trial court, no writ will issue when the petitioner has not established that the trial court had any duty, much less a clear duty. Gimnang v. Trial Division, 6 FSM R. 482, 485 (App. 1994).

Where a properly filed notice of appeal has transferred jurisdiction to the appellate court and the trial court is about to conduct either a hearing on a preliminary injunction or a trial on the merits of the case which is the same as those on appeal, it is proper for an appellate court to issue a writ of prohibition to prevent further action by the lower court. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

A writ of prohibition is proper to prevent a trial court from exercising equity jurisdiction in an election case. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Where an inferior court has acted in excess of its jurisdiction a writ of prohibition is proper to confine it to its proper role. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

When a court has concluded that the inferior court has acted or is about to act in excess of its jurisdiction the next requirement for the writ of prohibition to issue is that a harm or injury will result from the inferior court's action. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Where the Election Commissioner is in the untenable position of being subject to the inconsistent orders of two trial division courts because either order he chooses to obey will cause him to be in violation of the other order and where one trial court's assumption of jurisdiction also interferes with the order and regularity of the judicial proceedings because the same issues affecting the same parties cannot be decided at the same time by a trial division court and the appellate division, it is proper for a writ of prohibition to issue. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 500 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

When the Election Commissioner is caught between the two competing and inconsistent orders of courts of the same rank, and has pursued the only legal remedy available to him by objecting to the second court's jurisdiction, it is proper for a writ of prohibition to issue to confine the second court to its proper role because the Commissioner has no other plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy. Election Comm'r v. Petewon, 6 FSM R. 491, 501 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy designed to prevent public officials from committing clear abuses of power. As such, mandamus relief cannot be used as a precaution against future events that may never occur. Damarlane v. Pohnpei State Court, 6 FSM R. 561, 563-64 (Pon. 1994).

A writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy issued to require a public official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty to which the petitioner has an indisputable right, and it may not be issued for the purpose of requiring a public official to carry out an act that is not within his authority. Katau Corp. v. Micronesian Maritime Auth., 6 FSM R. 621, 622 (Pon. 1994).

Because the Micronesian Maritime Authority has discretion in negotiating and entering into foreign fishing agreements and because statutorily a fishing permit cannot be issued without a signed agreement a court cannot issue a writ of mandamus to compel issuance of a fishing permit because it cannot order performance of a statutorily forbidden act. Katau Corp. v. Micronesian Maritime Auth., 6 FSM R. 621, 624 (Pon. 1994).

A writ of prohibition will only issue to prevent an inferior court or tribunal from acting without or in excess of its jurisdiction. It must be directed to a court or tribunal inferior in rank to the one issuing the writ. As a general rule, it cannot issue from one court to another of equal rank. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 1995).

A writ of prohibition is an extraordinary writ and cannot be issued when there is a plain, speedy and adequate remedy otherwise available that has not been exhausted. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 1995).

A writ of prohibition will not issue to disqualify an FSM Supreme Court justice where the party seeking disqualification has not filed a motion to disqualify or recuse to be considered by the justice whose disqualification is sought. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 1995).

In order for a writ of prohibition to issue to require a judge to recuse himself it must be an abuse of discretion for the judge not to recuse himself. Where it is not apparent what interest of the judge could be substantially affected by the outcome of the proceeding or that the judge is biased or prejudiced the writ will not issue. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 7 FSM R. 8, 10 (App. 1995).

The central issues of law presented by an application for a writ mandamus are whether the act sought to be compelled is one that is ministerial or non-discretionary and whether the act is one which the respondent as a judicial or other public officer has a clear legal duty to perform. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 108 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

The five elements that must be present before the court can exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus are: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer, 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial, 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act, 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act, and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 109 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Pursuant to the Chuuk Judiciary Act judges in Chuuk have a clear ministerial, non-discretionary duty to resign from judicial office upon becoming a candidate for a non-judicial office. A writ of mandamus is the specific remedy to compel the performance of such a legally required ministerial act. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Although the Chuuk Constitution does subject members of the judiciary to removal from office by impeachment, the court need not decide if this is the sole method a judge may be removed from office because the issuance of a writ of mandamus is not a removal action. All the court did by issuing the writ is to require the judge to follow the applicable law and remove himself from office by resignation when he became a political candidate. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Because a judge has a ministerial, non-discretionary duty to state on the record his reasons for denying a motion to disqualify himself a writ of prohibition may issue to prevent him from proceeding further on a case until he has done so. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Trial Division, 7 FSM R. 642, 643 (App. 1996).

Mandamus will lie to require the performance of a clear non-discretionary duty, or to prevent a clear abuse of power, but it does not lie to control judicial discretion, except when that discretion has been abused. In re Certification of Belgrove, 8 FSM R. 74, 78 (App. 1997).

As with other extraordinary writs, mandamus will not issue unless no other adequate remedy is available. In re Certification of Belgrove, 8 FSM R. 74, 78 (App. 1997).

When there is no right of appeal from the Chief Clerk's deferral of an applicant's certification as an attorney entitled to practice law before the FSM Supreme Court, and no other remedy exists, and when the deferral was without giving the applicant a hearing, and the deferral was continued during an unexplained, lengthy delay in the subsequent disciplinary proceeding, constituting an abuse of the discretion allowed by the admission rules, a writ of mandamus will lie to compel the certification of the applicant. In re Certification of Belgrove, 8 FSM R. 74, 78 (App. 1997).

When the Kosrae State Code Section 18.506 requires a branch head to make and transmit his final decision to the Director of Administration and the appellant within 14 days of receipt of the committee's recommendation and more than 14 days have elapsed since the branch head's receipt with no final decision by him, the branch head has failed to carry out his clear, non-discretionary duty to issue and transmit his final decision within the time period provided by law. The petitioner's right to the writ of mandamus is thus clear and undisputable and the writ will issue. Jackson v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 198, 199 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a petition for mandamus to order the respondent to sell land does not identify the property, the right which the writ seeks to enforce is not sufficiently specific, well defined, and complete to justify the extraordinary remedy of mandamus. FSM Dev. Bank v. Director of Commerce & Indus., 10 FSM R. 317, 319 (Kos. 2001).

Mandamus lies to compel a public official to perform a clear, nondiscretionary duty. When the petition is devoid of any allegation that the respondent is acting in an official capacity, when the Kosrae deed of trust statute does not confer on the respondent either the obligation or the express power to act as a trustee under a deed of trust, and when the petition is silent as to any other mechanism or source of authority by which the respondent in his official capacity has assumed the duties of the trustee under the deed of trust at issue so as to make the performance of those duties a "clear and nondiscretionary," mandamus is not available. FSM Dev. Bank v. Director of Commerce & Indus., 10 FSM R. 317, 319 (Kos. 2001).

When there is no constitutional provision which specifies the type of food to be provided to inmates and no statutory or regulatory provisions which specify the type of food to be provided to inmates, there is no clear ministerial duty of the Chief of Police which states the type of food to be provided to inmates. Talley v. Timothy, 10 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A court may issue a writ of mandamus when the petitioner has met its burden to show that its right to the writ is clear and undisputable. The writ of mandamus is an extraordinary remedy issued to require a public official to carry out a clear non-discretionary duty. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Because no statute or regulation requires the Attorney General or Director of Administration to explain his decision to deny the request for hazardous pay differential, it is not a non-discretionary or ministerial act. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Mandamus will be denied when there is another adequate legal remedy available to the petitioners – to file a grievance on their hazardous pay differential claim and proceed through the administrative process. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The finality requirement and its underlying rationale mandate appellate court restraint and preclude issuance of writs of mandamus on an interlocutory basis except in those rare and exceptional cases when the precise requirements for issuance of the writ are met and the appellate court in its discretion determines that immediate relief is called for. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 409 n.3 (App. 2003).

Appellate review, in all but narrowly defined, exceptional circumstances, should be postponed until the trial court has rendered final judgment. Hence the party requesting a writ of mandamus has the burden of showing a clear and indisputable right thereto, and must show exceptional circumstances necessitating review before a final judgment is entered below. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 405, 409 n.3 (App. 2003).

The finality requirement and its underlying rationale mandate appellate court restraint and preclude issuance of writs of mandamus on an interlocutory basis except in those rare and exceptional cases when the precise requirements for issuance of the writ are met and the appellate court in its discretion determines that immediate relief is called for. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 437, 441 (App. 2003).

Only under special circumstances should the Appellate Division issue a writ of mandamus to alter the conduct of the trial judge before the trial court has completed proceedings and reached a final decision. The object of the requirement is to prevent piecemeal litigation which would result from the use of interlocutory appeals. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 437, 441 n.4 (App. 2003).

Appellate review, in all but narrowly defined, exceptional circumstances, should be postponed until final judgment has been rendered by the trial court. Hence the party petitioning for a writ of mandamus has the burden of showing a clear and indisputable right thereto, and must show exceptional circumstances necessitating review before a final judgment is entered below. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 437, 441 (App. 2003).

When, although a review of the record would appear to indicate that adequate notice and opportunity to be heard were provided, the issue of whether the petitioner had notice and an opportunity to be heard is one that is properly raised on appeal from a final judgment or order. That is its remedy at law and the petition will be denied when petitioner has not shown that this remedy is unavailable or inadequate, or that the extraordinary circumstances exist for the issuance of a peremptory writ and it has not provided compelling justification and the court does not find the exceptional circumstances that would justify the issuance of the extraordinary writ of mandamus necessitating review before a final judgment below. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yinug, 11 FSM R. 437, 441 (App. 2003).

A writ of prohibition may issue when a court or court officer is about to engage in judicial or quasi-judicial action that is unauthorized and when there is no other adequate remedy to address the injury that will result from the unauthorized conduct. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 585 (App. 2004).

Since the sole issue before an appellate panel considering a writ of prohibition directed against one judge is whether the petitioner has established that that judge must be prohibited from acting in a particular case, not whether some other judge may also be disqualified, a challenge to another judge's authority to act must be brought up in some other proceeding. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 136-37 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

The sole issue before the state appellate court on a petition for writ of mandamus is whether the petitioner has established that the trial judge must be prohibited from acting in a certain case, not whether some other judge may also be disqualified. The national government's removal of that case to the FSM Supreme Court does not affect the court's jurisdiction because the court has no way of knowing whether the required procedural steps to effect removal to that court were completed, or, even if they were, whether it might be remanded; because the state appellate proceeding is not an appeal from the civil action since the issue is whether the trial judge properly sit on the case and because since the purported removal action started, the trial judge has issued another preliminary injunction that does not name the national government as a party being restrained. Therefore the later "removal" did not deprive the appellate court of jurisdiction over the original action for a writ of prohibition. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

The general requirements for the issuance of an extraordinary writ of prohibition are that a court or officer is about to exercise judicial or quasi-judicial power, that the exercise of such power is unauthorized or the inferior tribunal is about to act without or in excess of jurisdiction which may or will result in damage or injury for which there is no plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy. The writ will usually not issue unless the petitioner has objected in the lower court to that court's exercise of jurisdiction. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

One instance where it is appropriate to issue a writ of prohibition is when a trial court justice is about to exercise unauthorized power without or in excess of his jurisdiction by exercising jurisdiction over a case where another judge already has jurisdictional priority over the parties and the issues. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

When a trial judge's presiding over a case is in excess of his jurisdiction since another trial division justice had jurisdictional priority over the parties and the issues in that case to the exclusion of all other trial division justices, when the petitioner objected to that judge's exercise of jurisdiction from the start, and when the petitioner will be injured if the writ does not issue since he will be subject to conflicting and contradictory orders from two different trial division justices, there is no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy otherwise available and the writ of prohibition will accordingly issue. Nikichiw v. O'Sonis, 13 FSM R. 132, 138-39 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2005).

A due process violation may be remedied through means other than a writ of prohibition, such as a direct appeal. A writ of prohibition is not a writ of right and cannot lie when there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy otherwise available which has not been exhausted. The court's job is simply to determine whether the respondent has acted without, or in excess of, his jurisdiction. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 183 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

In order for the extraordinary writ of prohibition to issue when a justice has denied a motion to recuse or disqualify, it must be an abuse of discretion for a justice not to recuse him- or herself. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 184 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

If the extraordinary writ of prohibition may issue where a justice has abused his discretion in ruling on a disqualification motion, it must likewise issue where a justice has patently disregarded a mandate which stripped him of any discretion to act in the first instance. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 184 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

A Chuuk State Supreme Court justice exceeds his jurisdiction when he refuses to refer a recusal motion to another trial division justice. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 185 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

The extraordinary writ of prohibition will lie where a trial justice exercises jurisdiction over a case wherein another justice has jurisdictional priority over the parties and issues. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 186 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

A writ of prohibition is proper when a trial justice interferes with the appellate division's jurisdiction. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 186 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

A justice's acts after a single appellate justice issued a stay that were not acts taken in aid of the appeal, but were acts designed to frustrate or nullify the appeal process and the respondent justice's interference with the jurisdiction of, and blatant disregard for a stay entered by, a justice having greater jurisdictional authority supports the conclusion that he must be prohibited from taking any further action in the case. Ruben v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 177, 186-87 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2006).

When a justice excluded counsel from a chambers conference in a Pohnpei Supreme Court case where counsel was trying to appear to represent a different client, her exclusion from that conference is inadequate to, and cannot, show personal bias by that justice toward counsel since, typically, only the judge and court personnel, the parties, and their counsel are permitted to attend a chambers conference and that counsel was not admitted to practice before the Pohnpei Supreme Court and her motion to appear pro hac vice in that case had not been granted. A petition for writ of prohibition will therefore be denied. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 303, 304-05 (App. 2006).

When a party has filed a writ of prohibition directed to disqualify one appellate justice, the remaining members of the appellate panel may deny that petition if it clearly should not be granted. Goya v. Ramp, 14 FSM R. 305, 308 n.2 (App. 2006).

Since a trial court's decision to disqualify an attorney from participation in a given case is a decision falling within a trial court's inherent discretionary powers, and since a petition for a writ of mandamus fails when it seeks appellate review that is explicitly beyond the curative parameters of mandamus or prohibition, the petition will be denied. The trial court had no legal duty to admit an attorney in the case, since the challenged disqualification was wholly within the trial court's discretion. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 601 (App. 2007).

An attempt to use a petition for writ of prohibition or mandamus to obtain a preemptory disqualification of an attorney not presently involved in the case is misplaced because, given the nature of the remedy of mandamus and prohibition and the caution exercised in affording it, the right sought to be enforced must be clear and certain. There must be an immediate right to have the act in question performed, and such right must be specific, well defined, and complete, so as not to admit of any reasonable controversy. As such, mandamus or prohibition relief cannot be used as a precaution against future events that may never occur. Etscheit v. Amaraich, 14 FSM R. 597, 601 n.1 (App. 2007).

The general requirements for the issuance of an extraordinary writ of prohibition are that a court or an officer is about to exercise judicial or quasi-judicial power, that the exercise of such power is unauthorized or the inferior tribunal is about to act without or in excess of jurisdiction which may or will result in damage or injury for which there is no plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A writ of prohibition will usually not be issued such a unless the petitioner has objected in the lower court to that court's exercise of jurisdiction. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A court that has the power to issue writs of prohibition may only do so if the petitioner has met its burden to show that its right to the writ is clear and indisputable. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since the jurisdiction of courts exercising general equity powers does not include election contests and since courts of equity are without jurisdiction to enforce purely political rights in election cases, a writ of prohibition is proper to prevent a trial court from exercising equity jurisdiction in an election case. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The extraordinary writ of prohibition is to be issued with great caution, but it is especially important to exercise the writ in those cases where it is necessary to confine a lower court to its proper function. Nikichiw v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 33, 39 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When certain issues raised are merely allegations of gross legal error which may be properly addressed by an appeal (and are already the subject of an appeal) and since a writ of prohibition can only be issued to confine a lower tribunal to its proper jurisdiction and is not a substitute for an appeal, those issues are not the proper subject for a petition for a writ of prohibition. A writ of prohibition will not lie to correct those alleged legal errors no matter how gross the error or how meritorious the petitioners' legal arguments. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 232 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since an order in aid of judgment to seize municipally-owned vehicles acted as an execution on public property, it is clearly and indisputably an attempt to exercise power in excess of the court's jurisdiction, that is, it is a power specifically denied to courts by the Chuuk Judiciary Act. Since the trial court justice had no discretion in the matter – he had no power to order the vehicles' seizure and since the petitioners have no plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy for this judicial act in excess of the court's jurisdiction and writ of prohibition will issue. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 232 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When issuance of a writ of prohibition without a further affirmative command to return the unlawfully seized property to the registered owner would not constitute adequate relief, and would leave the petitioner without any plain, speedy or adequate legal remedy and since the trial court was completely without jurisdiction to issue an order in aid of judgment executing on public property, to correct the results of that excess, the appellate court must order the return of the seized property. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 233 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When a trial justice makes no rulings on the motion to stay before him, he fails to exercise whatever discretion he may have had to rule on it because a court abuses its discretion by an unexplained failure to exercise its discretion within a reasonable time and since the trial judge neglected his duties by ignoring the motion to stay and further abused his discretion by failing to rule on it before issuing an order in aid of judgment, the appellate court issuing a writ of prohibition barring the order in aid of judgment will stay any enforcement of the judgment until the appeal of the judgment has been decided. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 233 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A trial judge's calculated and repeated disregard of governing rules of orders in aid of judgment would also support the issuance of a writ of prohibition that the trial judge issue no further orders in aid of judgment without complying with the statute and without first ruling on the pending motion to stay. Albert v. O'Sonis, 15 FSM R. 226, 234 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Whether sufficient funds are already appropriated to conduct a runoff election is not a ground to deny the petition. The lack of funds to perform a required duty is a problem to be solved by the political branches of government, not the court. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The State Election Commission cannot refuse to hold an election because it has insufficient funds. If it refuses to hold an election on that ground, it is clear that, if sought, a writ of mandamus would issue to command that the election be announced and held. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

If the State Election Commission has a duty to announce and conduct a runoff election, that duty can only be ministerial and non-discretionary. The State Election Commission does not have the discretion to choose whether to conduct an election or not. Its duty to conduct elections is mandated by the Constitution. Thus, whether the petitioner is entitled to a writ commanding the respondent Election Commission to announce (and conduct) a runoff election to fill the Governor's office depends solely on the meaning of the relevant provisions of the Chuuk Constitution. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 21 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

It is a clear non-discretionary duty for the State Election Commission to conduct a runoff election if, during the general election, no ticket of candidates for Governor and Lieutenant Governor receives a majority of the votes cast. However, in a special gubernatorial election to fill a vacancy, the candidates do not run on tickets. They run alone for the office of governor. The Section 7 provision for runoff elections applies to tickets of candidates, not to single candidates. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 21-22 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The Section 11 constitutional provision for special elections does not mention runoff elections if there is no candidate with a majority. Nor does it state that the gubernatorial special election shall be conducted in the same manner as the gubernatorial election in Section 7, and it also does not state that it should be conducted in a manner to be prescribed by statute. If it did then, Section 142 of the Election Code, which provides that "[a]ll special elections shall be conducted in the same manner and form as a general election, except as otherwise provided in this Act," would carry great weight and might lead the court to conclude that there was a clear, non-discretionary duty to conduct a runoff. However, there are no such provisions. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the Constitution's framers did not include provisions for runoff elections after special elections, and even if that was through oversight, the court will not insert into the Constitution a runoff provision that is not there. Accordingly, the petition for a writ of mandamus directed to the State Election Commission commanding it to hold a runoff election will be denied. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A writ of prohibition may issue when a court is about to engage in judicial action that is unauthorized and when there is no other adequate remedy to address the injury that will result from the unauthorized conduct. Whether to grant a writ of prohibition involves the court's full recognition of the extraordinary nature of the relief requested. Ehsa v. Johnny, 19 FSM R. 175, 177 (App. 2013).

When the issue of the trial court's jurisdiction is being appealed on various constitutional grounds but there has been no determination that the trial court lacks jurisdiction, the trial court retains jurisdiction to enforce the judgment and is not acting without authority or jurisdiction. The extraordinary writ of prohibition will not serve as a substitute for that appeal. Ehsa v. Johnny, 19 FSM R. 175, 177-78 (App. 2013).

When there is no basis for the court to depart from the procedures established for a stay to be put in place pending an appeal since the petitioner has other adequate remedies to obtain what he seeks and since the petitioner, who is also seeking an extraordinary writ of prohibition, has not met his burden to show that his right to the writ is clear and indisputable, the petition for a writ of prohibition will be denied. Ehsa v. Johnny, 19 FSM R. 175, 178 (App. 2013).

A petition for a writ of prohibition will be denied when any legal error or even gross legal error in striking the response brief is correctable by a pending or a future appeal. Tilfas v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 181, 184 (App. 2013).

When the respondent Kosrae State Court Chief Justice has not acted without jurisdiction or in excess of his jurisdiction, a writ of prohibition clearly should not be granted. Tilfas v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 181, 184 (App. 2013).

The Kosrae State Court Chief Justice is not acting in excess of his jurisdiction by appointing himself to sit as a temporary judge on a Land Court case when all the Land Court judges are disqualified when the Land Court is an inferior court within a unified state court system and since there is no constitutional impediment to a Kosrae statute authorizing a Kosrae State Court justice to sit as a temporary justice in another (inferior) court within the unified Kosrae state court system. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 194-95 (App. 2013).

When there appears to be no legal grounds, let alone a clear duty that the Kosrae Chief Justice not appoint himself a Land Court temporary judge to preside over a Land Court case, a writ of prohibition clearly should not be granted. Heirs of Tulenkun v. Aliksa, 19 FSM R. 191, 195 (App. 2013).

A petition for a writ of mandamus clearly should not be granted when a factual record will need to be developed and questions of fact are best determined in the trial division; when the voluntary payment rule may bar the recovery of taxes; when the FSM may also be able to prove statute of limitations defenses for some or all of the tax payments; when the petitioner has appealed the Secretary's denial of the relief sought and that appeal should afford it a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy and a forum in which it may prove its right to relief and the extent of that relief; and because a writ of prohibition is an extraordinary writ and cannot be issued when there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy otherwise available that has not been exhausted. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 289 (App. 2014).

Five elements must be present before the court can exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer, 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial, 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act, 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act, and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Irons v. Chuuk State Supreme Court Tr. Div., 19 FSM R. 654, 655 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

Five elements must be present before the court can exercise its discretion to issue a writ of mandamus: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer, 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial, 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act, 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act, and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 20 FSM R. 36, 38 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2015).

In order for the Supreme Court to issue an extraordinary writ of prohibition overruling a trial judge's denial of a motion to disqualify, the trial judge's ruling must be an abuse of discretion. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 248, 250 (App. 2015).

The court may issue a writ of prohibition only when the party seeking a writ has met his burden to show that his right is clear and indisputable. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 249, 250 (App. 2015).

A petitioner seeking a writ of prohibition to disqualify a trial judge must show an abuse of discretion, as the appellate court will not merely substitute its judgment for that of the trial judge. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 250 (App. 2015).

A petition for a writ of prohibition to disqualify a trial judge will be denied when it neither meets the burden of showing the that the judge harbors bias or prejudice nor shows that any disqualifying knowledge was derived from an extrajudicial source since the mere fact that the judge made an adverse evidentiary ruling and declared a mistrial does not mean the judge's impartiality might reasonably be questioned. Halbert v. Manmaw, 20 FSM R. 245, 251 (App. 2015).

When there are too many procedural deficiencies to overlook because the application for a writ of prohibition's certificate of service shows service only on the respondent judge at her office; because the real parties in interest were not served and were not named as real parties in interest in the application or in the case caption; because the petition does not contain a copy of the respondent judge's order denying her recusal, if there was a written order, or a transcript of the denial on the record if the denial was made orally; and because, although the relevant judicial disqualification statute requires that an application to disqualify a justice be accompanied by an affidavit stating the reasons for the belief that grounds for disqualification exist, no affidavit accompanied the petition although an "affidavit attached hereto" is mentioned in the application, the petition for a writ of prohibition will be denied without prejudice to any future application in which all of the procedural deficiencies have been cured. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 563, 564 (App. 2016).

When membership in the Mwoalen Wahu Ileile En Pohnpei is limited to the traditional paramount chiefs of Pohnpei and the paramount chiefs are only those persons who hold the title of either Nanmwarki or Nahnken and when the justice's father, as Wasahi Sokehs, is not a paramount chief and is therefore not now a member of the plaintiff Mwoalen Wahu Ileile En Pohnpei, and, unless one day he attains the title of Nanmwarki Sokehs, will never be a member of that council, a writ of prohibition, directed to the trial justice, clearly should not be granted. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 577, 579 (App. 2016).

A petition for a writ of prohibition will be denied when the petitioner's new points do not buttress its position, but instead further support the court's earlier denial of its previous petition. Young Sun Int'l Trading Co. v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 585, 588 (App. 2016).

A party seeking the extraordinary and exceptional remedy of a writ of prohibition must show that the party's right to the writ is clear and indisputable and that all of the following five elements are satisfied: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer; 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial; 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act; 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to have performed that act; and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Peterson v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 657, 658-59 (App. 2016).

A writ of prohibition clearly should not be granted based on a judge's adverse ruling that did not even remain adverse when the justice changed her mind and on factors that arose as part of the give and take during a contentious oral hearing on a controversial topic. Peterson v. Anson, 20 FSM R. 657, 659 (App. 2016).

When the procedural deficiencies in a petition for a writ of prohibition are too many to overlook, the petition will be denied without prejudice to any future petition in which these procedural deficiencies have all been cured. Miju Mulsan Co. v. Carl-Worswick, 20 FSM R. 660, 662 (App. 2016).

When the case's time delays have been excessive; when, under the Chuuk Rules of Appellate Procedure, the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division is prepared to consider cases on the merits promptly after briefs are filed; and when the FSM Supreme Court appellate division, although it has been dilatory, can see no reason why Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division appeal should not be set for argument, it will, considering the possibility there might be a reason and out of deference to the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division, defer action for sixty days, and, if, within that sixty days, the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division has held oral argument on all pending matters or if that court has fixed oral argument on a date certain in the near future, it will not issue the writ of procedendo or mandamus. Chuuk v. Chuuk State Supreme Court App. Div., 21 FSM R. 583, 586 (App. 2018).

When a court has jurisdiction to grant writs of mandamus in a matter, there are five elements that must be met: 1) the respondent must be a judicial or other public officer, 2) the act to be compelled must be non-discretionary or ministerial, 3) the respondent must have a clear legal duty to perform the act, 4) the respondent must have failed or refused to perform the act, and 5) there must be no other adequate legal remedy available. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 660, 661 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The Senior Land Commissioner is a public officer who oversees the Land Commission and who has the non-discretionary legal duty to issue a certificate of title to persons holding an interest in the land pursuant to the determination after the 120-day time limit for appeal has expired without an appeal. The Land Commission's continuous failure to issue a certificate of title for over 37 years following an un-appealed determination of ownership constitutes a breach of its duty and leaves the petitioner without any legal remedy other than to petition for a writ of mandamus, and to prevent this manifest injustice, equity requires that the court compel the Land Commission to fulfill its legal duty to issue a certificate of title to petitioner. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 661 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

MARINE RESOURCES

Traditional claims of exclusive ownership of marine resources have been recognized only in areas immediately adjacent to an island or submerged reef. Claims involving custom and tradition were recognized by the Constitution's drafters, but were restricted to areas within lagoons and near reef areas. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 377 (Pon. 1998).

A person holding a current and valid foreign investment permit is qualified to register a vessel in the FSM, and qualified persons may register in the FSM any vessel they wholly own. An FSM-registered vessel must fly the FSM national flag. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 304-05 (Pon. 2016).

– Exclusive Economic Zone

Congress intended that the prohibitions of 23 F.S.M.C. 105 extend throughout all the waters of the FSM. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 478 (Pon. 1988).

23 F.S.M.C. 105(3) is national law, at least as it applies beyond the twelve mile limit. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 479 (Pon. 1988).

Nothing in the language of the statute, 23 F.S.M.C. 105, or in the legislative history, indicates that Congress made an affirmative determination to enact national legislation applicable within twelve miles of prescribed baselines. Therefore, 23 F.S.M.C. 105 gives the national government regulatory power only outside the twelve mile zone. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 480 (Pon. 1988).

Regulation of the Exclusive Economic Zone rests exclusively with the Micronesian Maritime Authority, 24 F.S.M.C. 301-02. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 69 (Pon. 1993).

The Law of the Sea Convention first recognized that the Federated States of Micronesia as a nation has the exclusive right to exploit resources in its 200-mile EEZ. The FSM Constitution was drafted to vest authority over the EEZ in the national government with this in mind. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 378 & n.19 (Pon. 1998).

Issues related to the EEZ cannot be determined by relying on custom and tradition, as the commercial value of the EEZ to the Federated States of Micronesia was first realized when the nation acceded to the Law of the Sea Convention. While the rights of individual Micronesians, families and clans to living marine resources under particular circumstances might be amenable to determination by custom and tradition, the states' legal entitlement to share in fishing fees derived from commercial fishing ventures, extending to 200 miles from island baselines, is not. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 378 (Pon. 1998).

leads to the conclusion that it includes fishing because the FSM's fisheries are undoubtedly a natural resource, marine in character, that are subject to economic exploitation as a result of the market demand for fish. It follows that fishing in the FSM EEZ constitutes the exploitation of a natural resource that subjects a party to the personal jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 096, 16 FSM R. 1, 3 (Pon. 2008).

"Fishery waters" includes the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone, territorial waters, and internal waters. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 404 n.2 (Chk. 2011).

Where he has reasonable cause to believe that an offense against the provisions of Title 24 or any regulations made thereunder has been committed, any authorized officer may, with or without a warrant or other process, stop, board and search inside the fishery waters, or outside after hot pursuit, any fishing vessel which he believes has been used in the commission of that offense and he may, within the fishery waters, arrest any person if he has reasonable cause to believe that such person has committed a Title 24 offense and seize any fishing vessel involved, its fishing gear, furniture, appurtenances, stores, cargo, and fish, and seize any fish which he reasonably believes to have been taken in violation of Title 24. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 633-34 (Pon. 2015).

The territorial sea is the waters within 12 nautical miles seaward of FSM island baselines, and the exclusive economic zone is the water seaward of the territorial sea outward to 200 nautical miles from the island baselines. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

When an information charges, in different counts, contamination of both the FSM territorial waters and its Exclusive Economic Zone, the FSM must prove not only that the contamination occurred but also where it occurred since it is unlikely that the contamination took place when the vessel was at a location where trash thrown overboard could contaminate both the territorial sea and the EEZ. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

Only those fisheries management agreements that require the FSM to enforce, on a reciprocal basis, the fisheries laws of foreign countries against persons who have violated the fisheries law of that foreign country, must, under 24 F.S.M.C. 120(2), implemented by National Oceanic Resource Management Authority regulation. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 304 (Pon. 2016).

A fisheries management agreement is any agreement, arrangement, or treaty in force to which the FSM is a party, not including any access agreement, which has as its primary purpose cooperation in or coordination of fisheries management measures in all or part of the region. Such an agreement, by its nature, would not be self-executing. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 304 (Pon. 2016).

FSM citizens and FSM-flagged fishing vessels are required, on the high seas or in an area designated by a fisheries management agreement, to comply with any applicable law or agreement. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 304 (Pon. 2016).

– EEZ – Regulation of

While the FSM and Pohnpei foreign fishing statutes pose no specific requirements as grounds for the search of a fishing vessel, the power to seize is carefully conditioned upon illegal use of the vessel. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 1985).

Any attempt to grant statutory authority to permit seizure of a fishing vessel upon a lesser standard than probable cause would raise serious questions of compatibility with article IV, sections 3 and 4 of the Constitution. Such an interpretation should be avoided unless clearly mandated by statute. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

Seizure under the FSM and Pohnpei foreign fishing statutes must be based upon probable cause, that is, grounds to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the act has occurred and that the vessel was used in that violation. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

Negotiations between the FSM National Government and a U.S. owned fishing vessel reflect the new role of the national government and the methods by which the people of the Federated States of Micronesia govern their relations with other members of the community of nations. In this context, it is entirely appropriate to draw on principles of common law for guidance. FSM v. Ocean Pearl, 3 FSM R. 87, 91 (Pon. 1987).

As defined in 24 F.S.M.C. 102(22) "fishing" includes refueling or supplying fishing vessels. FSM v. Skico, Ltd., 8 FSM R. 40, 41 (Chk. 1997).

A company that stores its fuel cargo in a tanker, stations a cargo supervisor aboard the tanker, and sends messages that tell the tanker where to go to sell the company's fuel to fishing vessels needing refueling is an operator of the tanker within the meaning of Title 24. FSM v. Skico, Ltd., 8 FSM R. 40, 42-43 (Chk. 1997).

Section 404 of Title 24 sets forth certain minimum terms that all foreign fishing agreements must contain. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 84 (Pon. 1997).

Section 404 of Title 24 sets forth certain minimum terms that all foreign fishing agreements must contain. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 172 (Pon. 1997).

MMA cannot contract to insulate a foreign fishing agreement signatory from criminal liability because to do so would violate 24 F.S.M.C. 404. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 181 (Pon. 1997).

Article I, section 1 of the Constitution defines the FSM's national boundaries, and section 2 defines the states' boundaries in the event marine resources revenues should accrue to the state wherein the resources are found, but the Constitution's framers did not intend to confer ownership of marine resources, or revenues derived from such resources, when they defined the state boundaries. Offshore marine resources, and the division between national and state power with respect to these resources, are addressed in other articles of the Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 367-68 (Pon. 1998).

Article IX, section 2(m) of the FSM Constitution expressly grants to the FSM Congress the power to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of natural resources beyond 12 miles from island baselines. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 368 (Pon. 1998).

The express grant of power to the national government to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of natural resources, implicitly includes the power of the national government to collect revenues that are generated as a result. Thus, the national government has the authority to enact legislation related to offshore marine resources, including legislation related to collection and distribution of revenues derived therefrom. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

To empower the national government to regulate ownership and exploitation of fishery resources within the EEZ, without the power to collect and distribute revenues derived from these regulatory functions, would violate the intention of the Constitution's framers and unduly limit the national government in the exercise of its exclusive power over natural resources in the area beyond 12 miles from the island baselines. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

Since the national government has the express authority to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of fishery resources in the EEZ, the power to promulgate legislation which generates revenue from the regulation of these resources and provides for collection and distribution of such revenue, is incidental to or implied in the express grant. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371 (Pon. 1998).

The Constitution's framers intended to vest complete control of the EEZ in the national government, and the expressed intent of legislation passed by the Interim Congress which terminated the practice of distributing fishing fees from the EEZ to the districts, or states, was to bring certain provisions of the Fishery Zone legislation into conformity with the provisions of the FSM Constitution and the powers granted to the national government under the Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 371-74 (Pon. 1998).

That the states currently are dissatisfied with the national government's power over the fishing fees does not change the constitutional division of powers that each of the states agreed to when it ratified the FSM Constitution and entered the Federated States of Micronesia. The states clearly delegated all power over offshore fishing resources beyond 12 miles from their baselines to the national government in the Constitution. Thus, the FSM has the power to collect and distribute the fishing fees under article IX, section 2(m). Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 374 (Pon. 1998).

The national government's authority to collect and distribute the fishing fees derived from the FSM EEZ is indisputably of a national character and beyond the ability of a single state to control because of the numerous national powers which the national government is required to exercise in order to effectively regulate and control the FSM EEZ and because the individual states are incapable of regulating and controlling the EEZ. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 374-75 (Pon. 1998).

Management and control of the FSM's fishing resources in its EEZ requires the national government to exercise its exclusive treaty powers under article IX, section 2(b) of the FSM Constitution. The FSM national government has specific international rights, and has undertaken specific international obligations, with respect to its EEZ under certain treaties. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 375 (Pon. 1998).

Negotiating fishery agreements with foreign governments and foreign companies necessarily involves foreign affairs, another exclusive national power. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 375 (Pon. 1998).

The process of determining the appropriate level of the fishing fees, the best method to collect the fishing fees, and ultimately how to distribute the fishing fees, is indisputably of a national character. Thus the national government, not the states, has the power to collect and distribute the fishing fees. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 375 (Pon. 1998).

That Congress has legislated sharing revenues from fines and forfeitures with the states and that each of the states has a delegate on the Board of the MMA is not an admission or indication that the states are the owners of the underlying resources. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 376 (Pon. 1998).

Certain issues are not of a local or traditional nature, and not amenable to determination based upon custom and tradition, such as issues related to business ventures in the FSM by non-citizens, foreign shipping agreements, and international extradition. Fishing fees derived from commercial fishing contracts, and collected primarily from foreign companies pursuant to agreements negotiated by the MMA are transactions and behaviors that are also distinctly non-customary and non-local. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 377 (Pon. 1998).

The MMA can establish fees and other forms of compensation in foreign fishing agreements, which can include compensation in the field of refinancing, equipment and technology relating to the fishing industry, but no particular measure is set for the fishing fee in the FSM Code. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 380 (Pon. 1998).

The following factors are relevant to determining whether fishing fees are taxes: 1) the source of the levy – whether the entity imposing the tax is legislative or administrative; 2) the effect of the levy on the general public – whether the assessment is imposed upon a broad or narrow class; 3) the means by which the levy is made – whether it is voluntary, and produces a benefit to the payor which is commensurate with the payment; and 4) the relationship between the levy and government costs – whether the revenue generated bears a relationship to the costs of the government in administering the particular program. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 382-83 (Pon. 1998).

The level of fishing fees is set at a measure of the value of the asset to the payor, a percentage of the value of the estimated weighted catch. The measure of the value of the service to the payor can be an appropriate measure for a fee. That the value received by the government exceeds the cost of administration is not dispositive when a valuable resource is being removed from the government's control by fishing fees payors. The government is entitled to compensation for its asset like any private property owner. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 385-86 (Pon. 1998).

The FSM national government has the exclusive right to harvest living marine resources in its EEZ, just as it has the exclusive right to harvest offshore mineral resources. As the holder of this exclusive right, the national government is allowed to dispose of this resource and receive revenue in return. Under the Convention on the Law of the Sea, each nation is entitled to exploit its marine resources to the extent it is able to achieve a maximum sustainable yield. When the FSM does not fully exploit its own resources, it is entitled to compensation at the appropriate market rate from foreign fishing vessels which it allows to fish in its waters. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386 (Pon. 1998).

Revenues from natural resources are not taxes. The constitutional definition of tax was not meant to include amounts received by the national government from disposal of natural resources over which it has control. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386-87 (Pon. 1998).

A four-part analysis is applied to determine whether fishing fees are taxes: 1) the source of the levy, 2) the effect of the levy on the general public, 3) the means by which the levy is made, and 4) the relationship between the levy and government costs. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

Whether fishing fees are uniform is immaterial to a finding that fishing fees do not constitute a tax. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

How Congress appropriates fishing fees is irrelevant to whether they are a tax. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

The FSM national government has the exclusive right to regulate and harvest living marine resources in the EEZ and is therefore entitled to a reasonable compensation from those whom it allows to share that right. A determination of ownership of the living marine resources does not affect the national government's right. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

Although fishing fees, as currently assessed, may be related to a percentage of the expected landed catch's value – projected income – there is no legal or constitutional requirement that they be calculated that way. They could be assessed on a flat amount per day or per voyage basis, or some other method not related to income. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not assessed under the national government's constitutional authority to impose taxes on income. They are levied instead under the national government's constitutional authority to regulate the ownership, exploration, and exploitation of natural resources within the marine space of the Federated States of Micronesia beyond 12 miles from island baselines. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

Although income-related, neither the fishing fees levied under Article IX, section 2(m) nor the social security taxes levied under Article IX, section 3(d) are income taxes within the meaning of Article IX, section 2(e) or national taxes within the meaning of section 5. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not income taxes because the national government's power to impose them does not derive from its power to tax income. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

Not less than half of the national taxes must be paid to the state where collected, but fishing fees are not national taxes because they are imposed, not under the national government's power to impose taxes, but under its power to regulate exploitation of natural resources within the FSM exclusive economic zone. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

The Constitution grants the national government the exclusive right to regulate the exploitation of the natural resources within the EEZ, which necessarily includes the generation of revenue from the EEZ and the use of that revenue. The Constitution requires that of the EEZ-generated revenues, half of the net revenues derived from ocean floor mineral resources be given to the state governments. There is no Constitutional requirement that any revenue from the EEZ's living resources be shared with the state governments although the framers could have easily included one. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435-36 (App. 2000).

The national government is free to distribute or disburse its fishing fee revenues through its normal legislative process. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 436 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not an income tax because they are not a tax. The national government has the exclusive sovereign right to control access to and exploitation of the natural resources in the FSM's exclusive economic zone and when it imposes fishing fees, the national government is selling access to the exclusive economic zone's living resources to its fishing licensees and it is selling the licensees the opportunity to reduce some of those resources to the licensees' proprietary ownership. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 436 (App. 2000).

While the prosecution has broad discretion in determining whether to initiate litigation, once that litigation is instituted in court, the court also has responsibility for assuring that actions thereafter taken are in the public interest; therefore criminal litigation can be dismissed only by obtaining leave of the court. In a fishing case where criminal and civil cases are filed together, and the dismissal of the criminal proceeding(s) is obviously "integral" to the settlement agreement for which court approval is sought, the same policy considerations apply to the settlement of the civil proceeding(s) as apply to the criminal dismissal. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 491 (Pon. 2004).

A purpose of Title 24 is to protect marine resources, which are vital to the people of the FSM, from abusive fishing practices. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 492 (Pon. 2004).

Title 24 establishes agencies to conclude fishing agreements and establish regulations for the exploitation of FSM marine resources. In fishing cases, when the prosecution seeks a dismissal, the court should be presented with evidence that appropriate agencies have been involved in the resolution of the case(s). FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 398, 12 FSM R. 487, 492 (Pon. 2004).

A purpose of Title 24 is to protect marine resources, which are vital to the people of the FSM, from abusive fishing practices. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 504 (Pon. 2004).

Title 24 establishes agencies to conclude fishing agreements and establish regulations for the exploitation of FSM marine resources. In fishing cases where the prosecution seeks a dismissal, the court should be presented with evidence that appropriate agencies have been involved in the resolution of the case(s). FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 504 (Pon. 2004).

Protecting marine resources from abusive fishing practices is an important goal. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 505 (Pon. 2004).

When the applicable statute permits the court take into account the possible fishing violation fines, but states that the bond should not exceed the value of the property to be released and when it also provides that notwithstanding that provision, the amount determined by the court for a bond must not be less than the fair market value of the property to be released or the aggregate minimum fine for each offense charged, whichever is greater, Congress has left the court no choice but to set the vessel's bond at the aggregate minimum fine when this exceeds the vessel's value. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 300, 302 (Chk. 2006).

The statutory use of the phrase "offense charged," for fishing violations, while usually indicative of a criminal prosecution and not a civil suit (in civil cases, violations are alleged, not offenses charged), appears to be intended to cover both civil and criminal violations. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 300, 302

(Chk. 2006).

When the government's complaint seeks, among other things, a vessel's forfeiture under 24 F.S.M.C. 801(1), the case is, in part, an in rem proceeding, albeit one created by the marine resources statute. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 365, 367 (Chk. 2006).

The court will not direct that the government provide countersecurity under the admiralty rules for a defendant's counterclaims in an fishing boat seizure case. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 365, 367 (Chk. 2006).

The Marine Resources Act of 2002 amended the prior fisheries law for the purpose of ensuring the sustainable development, conservation and use of the marine resources in the exclusive economic zone by promoting development of, and investment in, fishing and related activities. Included in the definition of "fishing" under the Act is the actual or attempted searching for fish; the placing of any fish aggregating device or associated electronic equipment such as radio beacons; and the use of an aircraft in relation to any activity described in this subsection. "Fishing gear" is equipment or other thing that can be used in the act of fishing, including any aircraft or helicopter. Helicopters, which are used to search for fish and to place radio devices near schools of fish to assist fishing boats in locating fish, fall within the express definition of fishing equipment. Therefore, since fishing in the FSM's EEZ is subject to the exclusive national government jurisdiction and regulation, and since a company's helicopters, based on fishing vessels and piloted by the company's employees, are used to search for fish within the FSM's EEZ, those helicopters are engaged in fishing for purposes of the statutory definition and thus the helicopters, which the company charters to the purse seine operators, and their pilots are subject to the national government's exclusive regulation. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 334-35 (Pon. 2007).

Since engaging in business is defined as carrying out any activity relating to the conduct of a business and expressly includes leasing property of any kind for commercial purposes, when a foreign investment permittee engaged in the business of providing operational and maintenance support to helicopters servicing fishing vessels in the FSM, its leasing helicopters is one aspect of its business that relates to its fishing activity and is therefore that leasing activity is subject to the FSM's exclusive jurisdiction and regulation for foreign investment purposes. Thus Pohnpei may not require it to apply for a foreign investment permit. Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 335 (Pon. 2007).

Whether or not to pursue a citation in lieu of arresting the vessel lies within the FSM's discretion. Failure to pursue an administrative penalty under the Administrative Penalties Regulations does not render an arrest wrongful. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 19 (Pon. 2008).

The National Oceanic Resources Management Authority has the authority to adopt regulations for the issuance of citations and assessment of administrative penalties consistent with chapter 7 of Title 24 and for any violation of the statute or its regulations which would fall within section 920's penalty provisions, the Authority may, by regulation provide for an administrative penalty. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 19 (Pon. 2008).

NORMA's regulations provide for a discretionary system of citations and administrative penalties. The establishment of administrative penalties does not create any obligation on the part of the Authority or the Secretary to issue a citation instead of pursuing other legal remedies or to issue a citation prior to pursuing other legal remedies. Citations are issued by authorized officers, including Maritime Surveillance Officers, who may issue a citation under circumstances where the officer has a reasonable ground to believe that a violation has been committed. Anyone to whom a citation is issued may challenge it within 10 days of its receipt, and NORMA's executive director must issue a final decision on the challenge within 15 days thereafter. Any citation not so challenged is deemed final. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 19 (Pon. 2008).

With respect to the interplay between NORMA's Administrative Penalties Regulations and the FSM Code's Title 24, administrative penalties are those resulting from a citation issued by a Marine Surveillance Officer while civil penalties are those the FSM Supreme Court imposes in a civil lawsuit after a finding of liability for a Title 24 violation. The court has neither the authority nor the discretion to impose an administrative penalty for the violation in a civil lawsuit. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 19-20 (Pon. 2008).

While the fishing violations alleged in the complaint are subject to citation under the Administrative Penalties Regulations, the citation process is not mandatory. The citation process to assess an administrative penalty and a civil lawsuit for civil penalties proceed on two separate tracks. The fact that the FSM has not cited the vessel under the Administrative Penalty Regulations but instead has pursued Title 24 civil penalties is not a sufficient ground as a matter of law upon which to allege a cause of action for wrongful arrest against the FSM. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 20 (Pon. 2008).

When Congress enacted Title 24 and engaged in an executive function by formally inserting itself into the execution and implementation of a portion of that act by vesting in itself the power to control how the law regarding fishing access agreements is executed when more than nine vessels are involved, this was impermissible under the separation of powers doctrine since negotiated access agreements are not approved and licenses are not issued until Congress acts (and the parties to the negotiations presumably know this and adjust their behavior accordingly) and since negotiation and approval of commercial transactions is ordinarily an Executive power. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

When, if the section of Title 24 requiring congressional approval of access agreements for more than nine vessels is struck down, that section is easily severed from the rest of Title 24, which would function perfectly well without it; that is, it would function just as it already does for access agreements for nine or fewer vessels, then that section is not so vital to the whole Title 24 regulatory scheme that it cannot be severed from the rest of Title 24. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

If Congress feels that the current Title 24 statutory requirements for access agreements are too loose or are not in the nation's best interests and should be tightened, it can enact further and stricter requirements or it can provide for that review by creating a mechanism for further review in the executive branch, since Congress, through its investigatory powers, can always keep itself informed on the Executive's execution of the laws, and enact remedial legislation when it feels that the Executive needs further guidance in executing national policy that Congress has enacted. But Congress may not execute the laws itself. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

An "access agreement" is a treaty, agreement or arrangement entered into by the Authority pursuant to Title 24 in relation to access to the exclusive economic zone for fishing by foreign fishing vessels. But a fishing access agreement is usually not a treaty because treaties are compacts or agreements between sovereign nations and most fishing access agreements are commercial agreements between the FSM national government and a commercial enterprise. They are business deals – not treaties. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

Since the Constitution specifically delegates to Congress the power to ratify treaties but does not grant Congress the power to approve or reject fishing access agreements, ruling unconstitutional the statute that requires congressional approval for fishing access agreements for more than nine vessels would not impair Congress's ability to ratify treaties and to advise and consent to presidential appointments. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

Since approval of commercial fishing agreements is not a power that the Constitution confers on Congress, but a power that Congress has conferred upon itself by statute, the court's conclusion that that statute is unconstitutional does not have any effect on access agreements that are actually negotiated and concluded as treaties between sovereign nations because, just like any other treaty, the President would continue to submit those to Congress for ratification. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

The court's conclusion that requiring Congress to approve or reject fishing access agreements is unconstitutional has no effect on Congress's constitutional treaty-ratification and advice and consent powers. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

Since a government act in conflict with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of conflict, Congress's rejection of a successor access agreement was invalid because 24 F.S.M.C. 405 is in conflict with the Constitution. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

A party to a foreign fishing agreement is bound by statute and by the foreign fishing agreement to ensure that an authorized vessel complies with the FFA and all applicable FSM laws, rules, and regulations. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 404 (Chk. 2011).

A statute that purports to allow Congress to step around the bill-making process and approve fishing access agreements by resolution, is surely unconstitutional because under the Constitution, Congress may make law only by statute, and may enact statutes only by bill. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 546 (App. 2011).

Congress's decision to approve or disapprove fishing access agreements is legislation that must be enacted by the bill-making process. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 547 (App. 2011).

Because an access agreement does not give exclusive rights either to negotiate permits on behalf of all foreign vessels or to exploit the FSM's EEZ, it is more properly a permit or license. Administration of a permit or license scheme is, by its nature, administrative, and thus an executive branch function. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 549 (App. 2011).

If Congress is truly concerned by the amount of debt carried by proposed agents, it may be more specific by creating new minimum requirements for eligibility. But once Congress delegates power to the executive, it cannot have it both ways – it cannot then take back that power or modify the extent of that delegation without amending the statute through the bill-making process. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 550 (App. 2011).

Under 24 F.S.M.C. 121, all of the Marine Resources Act's components are severable. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 551 (App. 2011).

Since operators, owners, and agents are defined separately in the statute, the 24 F.S.M.C. 109 and 122 restrictions that apply to owners do not apply to agents for foreign fishing vessels. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 18 FSM R. 76, 77 (App. 2011).

Newly-ratified fisheries management agreement can be made part of FSM domestic law by statute, or by National Oceanic Resource Management Authority regulation under 24 F.S.M.C. 204(1)(d). FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 305 (Pon. 2016).

– EEZ – Regulation of – Acts Violating

The fact that a fishing vessel approaches a reef is by itself some basis for some suspicion that it may intend to engage in fishing. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 78 (Pon. 1985).

The government has probable cause to detain a fishing vessel for illegal fishing when the evidence and information indicate that the vessel was conducting fishing operations within the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone, there was freshly caught fish aboard, and the permit provided to the officers contained a name different from the actual name of the vessel. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584, 590-91 (Pon. 1994).

A person may be held criminally liable for violating any provision of Title 24 or of any regulation or permit issued pursuant to Title 24, or any provision of, or regulation under, an applicable domestic-based or foreign fishing agreement entered into pursuant to Title 24, or any condition of any permit issued in accordance with Title 24 and any regulations made under Title 24, respectively. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 211 (Pon. 1995).

A defendant may be held criminally liable for failure to maintain a daily English language catch log as required under the terms of its foreign fishing agreement and the Harmonized Minimum Terms and Conditions. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 211-12 (Pon. 1995).

A party to a foreign fishing agreement voluntarily assumes primary liability and responsibility for its own failure to comply with the law, and for similar failures on the part of its fishing vessels and vessel operators within the FSM. Such a party also assumes a legal duty to ensure that the operators of its licensed vessels comply with all applicable provisions of FSM law. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 212 (Pon. 1995).

A defendant may be held criminally liable for failure to have a radio capable of monitoring VHF channel 16, the international safety and calling frequency, as required under the terms of its foreign fishing agreement. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 213-14 (Pon. 1995).

A defendant may be held criminally liable for exceeding the crew size authorized under the terms of its foreign fishing permit which is a term that the permit holder cannot unilaterally alter by use of the notification of changes provision in the permit. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 214 (Pon. 1995).

A defendant cannot be held criminally liable for failure to properly stow all fishing gear aboard a vessel in such a manner that it would not be readily available for use in fishing when the vessel was in an area in which it was authorized to fish. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 215 (Pon. 1995).

A defendant may be held criminally liable for knowingly shipping, transporting, or having custody, control, or possession of any fish taken or retained in violation of Title 24 or any regulation, permit, or foreign fishing agreement or any applicable law even when the vessel is operating under a valid permit. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (II), 7 FSM R. 205, 216 (Pon. 1995).

A party's failure to "ensure" its vessel's compliance with FSM law constitutes a breach of its foreign fishing agreement. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 86 (Pon. 1997).

When the fishing statute sets forth a list of prohibited acts in the disjunctive, commission of any one of the listed acts is unlawful, and the government may pursue separate civil penalties for each. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 90 (Pon. 1997).

It is unlawful for any person to violate any provision of Title 24, or of any regulation or permit issued under it, or to violate any provision of, or regulation under, an applicable domestic-based or foreign fishing agreement entered into pursuant to 24 F.S.M.C. 401, 404-406. A person is any individual, corporation, partnership, association, or other entity, the FSM or any of the state governments, or any political subdivision thereof, and any foreign government, subdivision of such government, or entity thereof. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 173-74 & n.2 (Pon. 1997).

While 24 F.S.M.C. 116(1) places a duty to maintain the daily catch log upon the vessel master, the statute does not make the vessel master's liability for failure to maintain that log exclusive. Therefore when a party to a foreign fishing agreement that says that party ensures that its authorized vessels will properly maintain such a log that party may be held liable. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 174 (Pon. 1997).

An authorized vessel's master's knowledge is attributable to its foreign fishing agreement party because knowledge held by an agent or employee of a corporation may be attributed to its principal. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 180 (Pon. 1997).

A fishing association is not liable under a general theory of agency when the complaint does not make a general agency allegation, and instead asserts liability based on an agreement's language, and nothing in the agreement renders the other defendants the agents of the fishing association such that the association is liable under the respondeat superior doctrine for the damages flowing from a vessel's alleged negligent operation. Dai Wang Sheng v. Japan Far Seas Purse Seine Fishing Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 112, 115 (Kos. 2001).

Fishing agreement provisions that refer to vessels' compliance with FSM law address statutory law violations, not conduct governed by tort law principles. Dai Wang Sheng v. Japan Far Seas Purse Seine Fishing Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 112, 115 (Kos. 2001).

When a fishing agreement requires that the signatory organizations must only take "necessary steps to ensure" that their members comply with the laws, regulations, and their permits and the government has made no allegation and introduced no evidence that the signatory has failed to take any of these "necessary steps," the government cannot seek to impose some sort of strict liability on the signatory for the actions of its members' employees because the fishing agreement's terms, without more, do not create liability for the signatory organizations for each and every violation of FSM fishery law or the foreign fishing agreement that their members commit. The government is therefore not entitled to summary judgment because, as a matter of law, the foreign fishing agreement's contractual terms do not impose vicarious liability on the signatory. FSM v. National Offshore Tuna Fisheries Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 169, 173-74 (Chk. 2001).

Because NORMA does not have a legal duty to issue a fishing permit by an applicant's preferred effective date, a defense of unjustified withholding of the license because it was not issued on the applicant's preferred date is without merit. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 404 (Pon. 2007).

A defendant commits a separate violation of section 907(1) for each day he engages in commercial fishing without a valid fishing permit. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 404-05 (Pon. 2007).

A vessel owner is included within the definition of operator of a vessel and an operator is prohibited from fishing in the FSM's exclusive economic zone without a permit and is also mandated to keep fishing gear stowed except in an area where the vessel is permitted to fish. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 096, 16 FSM R. 1, 3 (Pon. 2008).

When a Rule 12(b)(6) movant points to no factual deficiencies in the complaint, whose allegations are deemed true for purposes of the motion to dismiss, and when, taking as true, the complaint's material allegation that the captain switched on the automatic locating device or transponder as the vessel was boarded, the transponder was not on at the time of boarding, which constitutes a violation of 24 F.S.M.C. 611(4), and the complaint thus states a claim for a 24 F.S.M.C. 611(4) violation. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 19 (Pon. 2008).

A fishing boat operator must, by statute, ensure that appropriate position-fixing and identification equipment is installed and maintained in working order on each vessel, and thus, a fishing boat's transponder is required to be on at all times while it is within the FSM EEZ, even while in transit. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 404 (Chk. 2011).

The act or omission of any crew member of a fishing vessel or in association with a fishing vessel, is deemed to be that of that fishing vessel's operator, and an "operator" is any person who is in charge of or directs or controls a fishing vessel, or for whose direct economic or financial benefit a vessel is being used, including the master, owner, and charterer. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 404 (Chk. 2011).

The statute imposes liability for a fishing civil penalty on "any person" and "person" is defined as any natural person or business enterprise or similar entity. It does not include a vessel in rem. The civil penalty is thus imposed jointly and severally against the fishing vessel operators only and not against the fishing vessel. But the vessel, or rather the bond posted for the vessel's release, may be considered the property or assets of an owner or operator from which a judgment against the owner or operator may be satisfied. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405 (Chk. 2011).

By statute, a fishing vessel's operator must ensure the continuous monitoring of the international distress and call frequency 2182 kHz (HF) or the international safety and call frequency 156.8 MHz (channel 16, VHF-FM) to facilitate communication with the fisheries management, surveillance and enforcement authorities, and both the Foreign Fishing Agreement and the foreign fishing permit also require that the vessel continuously monitor either of two radio frequencies. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405 (Chk. 2011).

When the FSM proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the fishing boat's HF radio was not on and it also proved that the vessel had a VHF radio, but there was no evidence whether the VHF radio was on or off or whether it was tuned to channel 16, the FSM's claim that the vessel was not monitoring a required radio frequency fails for lack of proof because the statute, the Foreign Fishing Agreement, and the foreign fishing permit all require that the vessel monitor only one of those two frequencies and the evidence shows that the vessel had the ability to monitor the VHF channel 16 and there is no evidence that it was not being monitored. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405 (Chk. 2011).

By statute, and as required by both the foreign fishing agreement and the fishing permit, a fishing boat operator must prominently display any permit issued for the vessel in the vessel's wheelhouse. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405 (Chk. 2011).

Because "display" means a fixed display such as being posted on a bulkhead, not being produced and displayed on demand, the FSM has proven a violation of the requirement to prominently display a fishing permit in the vessel's wheelhouse when the displayed permit had expired and was thus invalid, and the captain, only when asked for a current permit, promptly displayed one. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405-06 (Chk. 2011).

Title 24 imposes criminal liability on any person who commits an act prohibited by that title. A person is defined as any natural person or business enterprise or similar entity. It does not include a vessel in rem. By statute, a person specifically includes a corporation, partnership, cooperative, association, or government entity. Although not an actual, living person, the law treats a company as a person for the purposes of liability. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 617, 619 n.1 (Pon. 2014).

All licensed fishing vessels are required to send their position to NORMA when they enter or exit the FSM EEZ, and when in the FSM EEZ, the vessels are required to activate their transponder, broadcasting a unique signal to the FSM's Vessel Monitoring System which regularly records its location. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 634 (Pon. 2015).

24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) imposes strict liability for failure to comply with certain requirements of subsection (1), which reflects the legislative purpose to require that fishing vessels undertake all the various actions necessary to transmit required information continuously, accurately and effectively. To this end, a vessel's operator is required to install a transponder, maintain it in good working order, and ensure the effective transmission of required information. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 32 (Yap 2015).

Read in proper context, 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1)(b) and (c) are aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and uphold a public interest of the same nature. Thus, a vessel's failure to maintain its transponder in good working order, and its consequent failure to ensure transmission of required information from the transponder, is a solitary act that caused only one injury and therefore 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) should not be construed to authorize cumulative penalties. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 32 (Yap 2015).

Since Subsection (1) allows NORMA to require that operators perform an integrated act which, when completed in its entirety, ensures transmission of required information from a vessel's transponder and this is reflected in the use of the word "and" between 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1)(b) and (c); since the failure to perform any one part of the integrated act required under subsection 611(1) is sufficient to frustrate entirely the purpose of the subsection; and since a failure to perform multiple component parts of the act required under the subsection is no more frustrating to the statute's purpose than failure to perform only one part, the court will, in the absence of clear legislative intent to impose cumulative penalties, construe 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) to impose only a single penalty for the failure to comply with the integrated requirements imposed on them under 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1). FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 33 (Yap 2015).

To prove a violation of section 611(1), the government has to show that a defendant: 1) entered into an access agreement or secured a fishing permit; 2) that the access agreement or permit required the defendant to conform to the requirements that NORMA is authorized to impose under section 611(1), and 3) that the defendant failed to comply with these requirements. It follows that a defendant's failure to comply with section 611(1), will, ipso facto, constitute a violation of a permit or access agreement as proscribed by section 906(1)(a),(c). FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 34 (Yap 2015).

An act in violation of 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1) is the failure to maintain the transponder in good working order and the failure to ensure the transponder was transmitting required information or data continuously, accurately and effectively to the designated receiver. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 525 (App. 2020).

– EEZ – Regulation of – Fishing Permits

Conditions on commercial fishing permits issued by the Micronesian Maritime Authority need not be "reasonable" as with recreational permits. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 73 (Pon. 1993).

A vessel defined as a foreign fishing vessel for permitting purposes must enter into a foreign fishing agreement prior to receiving any fishing permits. Katau Corp. v. Micronesian Maritime Auth., 6 FSM R. 621, 623 (Pon. 1994).

Because the Micronesian Maritime Authority has discretion in negotiating and entering into foreign fishing agreements and because statutorily a fishing permit cannot be issued without a signed agreement a court cannot issue a writ of mandamus to compel issuance of a fishing permit because it cannot order performance of a statutorily forbidden act. Katau Corp. v. Micronesian Maritime Auth., 6 FSM R. 621, 624 (Pon. 1994).

A party entitled to apply for a fishing permit must file an application on prescribed forms; otherwise the Micronesian Maritime Authority cannot issue a fishing permit. An applicant may be given an opportunity to cure any defects in a filed permit application. Katau Corp. v. Micronesian Maritime Auth., 6 FSM R. 621, 625 (Pon. 1994).

A fishing permit issued by the national government prohibiting fishing in state waters unless authorized by the state which has jurisdiction does not constitute regulation of state waters by the national government because it merely tries to prevent a vessel that fishes illegally in state waters from continuing to fish in national waters. FSM v. Hai Hsiang No. 63, 7 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 1995).

Section 404 of Title 24 sets forth certain minimum terms that all foreign fishing agreements must contain. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 172 (Pon. 1997).

Revocation of a fishing permit is not the government's sole remedy for violation of the permit's terms. Civil and criminal penalties are also available. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 181 (Pon. 1997).

The fishing permit requirement attaches to vessels, not helicopters. "Vessel" is defined as any water-going craft, and does not include helicopters. Thus the fact that a helicopter company does not have a fishing permit is not dispositive with regard to whether its helicopters engage in "fishing" as that term is defined by 24 F.S.M.C. 102(32). Helicopter Aerial Survey Pty., Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 15 FSM R. 329, 335 (Pon. 2007).

No person shall use any fishing vessel for, and the crew and operator of any fishing vessel shall not engage in, commercial or non-commercial fishing or related activities in the exclusive economic zone unless it is in accordance with a valid and applicable permit. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 403 (Pon. 2007).

When the defendants' local agent – prior to defendants' fishing activities on August 18th, 19th, and 20th – had actual knowledge that NORMA would not be issuing the fishing permit, the knowledge of the defendants' agent is imputed to the defendants under the law of agency. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 404 (Pon. 2007).

The Marine Resources Act of 2002 gives NORMA broad discretion in the processing and approval of fishing permits. NORMA does not have a legal duty to process, let alone approve, an application for a fishing permit within one day after the submission of the application. Under 24 F.S.M.C. 108, the Executive Director is to review each application submitted and may, at his discretion, solicit views from appropriate persons in the states and hold public hearings when and where necessary. NORMA also has the discretion to grant or deny a permit under various circumstances, including denying applications when the Executive Director determines that the issuance of a permit would not be in the FSM's best interests. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 404 (Pon. 2007).

Because NORMA does not have a legal duty to issue a fishing permit by an applicant's preferred effective date, a defense of unjustified withholding of the license because it was not issued on the applicant's preferred date is without merit. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 404 (Pon. 2007).

Before NORMA issues a fishing permit, it performs a review of various items, including, among other things, the country of registration of the vessel, insurance status, and court cases against the vessel. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 503, 505 (Pon. 2008).

When, although NORMA informed defendant's local agent that it would not issue a permit on August 17th, there is no evidence defendant's local agent communicated that information to defendant before defendant commenced fishing on August 18th, the defendant's degree of culpability does not warrant imposition of a civil penalty in the amount of $500,000, but the defendant should not have been fishing under the false and uninformed presumption that NORMA would issue the permit on August 17th so the defendant should be required to pay more than the minimum civil penalty. And when the defendant has no history of prior offenses and when the defendant did commit three separate violations by fishing without a permit for three consecutive days, but it appears that the defendant may simply have commenced fishing under the false and uninformed belief that NORMA, as in the past, would issue the permit on the requested preferred effective date, August 17th, and that defendant stopped fishing on August 20th when he found out the permit had not issued, the court determines that $400,000 is the appropriate civil penalty to apply. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 503, 507 (Pon. 2008).

– EEZ – Regulation of – Penalties

A fishing vessel involved in criminal violations of FSM fishing laws is subject to forfeiture to the government in a civil proceeding against the vessel itself. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584,

By statute, only the cargo actually used illegally, or the fish actually caught illegally, are subject to forfeiture, although the burden of proof (presumptions) rest on different parties depending on whether fish or cargo is involved. It is a rebuttable presumption that all fish found a board a vessel seized for Title 24 violations were illegally taken, but there is no such presumption that the cargo found aboard was "cargo used" in the alleged violation. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (I), 7 FSM R. 550, 552 (Chk. 1996).

Where a fuel tanker illegally fueled a fishing vessel and then loaded on more fuel cargo, only the amount of fuel cargo on the tanker before it reloaded is "cargo used" in violation of Title 24 subject to forfeiture. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (I), 7 FSM R. 550, 552 (Chk. 1996).

A contract between a foreign fishing agreement party and the owner of vessels permitted under that agreement that the vessels' owner will be responsible for criminal and civil charges for fishing violations merely provides the foreign fishing agreement party with a contractual right of indemnity against the vessels' owner and does not bar the government's imposition of penalties for fishing agreement violations on the foreign fishing agreement party. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 89 (Pon. 1997).

While MMA is authorized to issue, deny, cancel, suspend or impose restrictions on FSM fishing permits for fishing law violations, this is not the government's exclusive remedy because the FSM Attorney General is separately authorized to enforce violations of the foreign fishing agreement, Title 24 or the permit through court proceedings for civil and criminal penalties and forfeitures. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 92-93 (Pon. 1997).

Revocation of a fishing permit is not the government's sole remedy for violation of the permit's terms. Civil and criminal penalties are also available. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 181 (Pon. 1997).

In fashioning an appropriate sentence for fishing violations, a court considers the nature, circumstances, extent, and gravity of the prohibited acts committed, the defendant's degree of culpability and history of prior offenses, whether other civil penalties or criminal fines have already been imposed for the specific conduct before the court, and such other matters as justice might require, keeping in mind the statutory purpose behind the provisions violated. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 166, 181-82 (Pon. 1997).

When assessing civil penalties for violations of the Marine Resources Act of 2002, the court is required to take into account several factors, including among other things, the degree of culpability, any history of prior offenses, whether there are multiple violations which together constitute a serious disregard of conservation and management measure and such other matters as justice may require. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 400, 405 (Pon. 2007).

The Marine Resources Act of 2002, requires the court to take into account several factors when assessing civil penalties for illegal fishing. These factors include the degree of culpability, any history of prior offenses, whether there are multiple violations which together constitute a serious disregard of conservation and management measures and such other matters as justice may require. 24 F.S.M.C. 901(2) sets a minimum civil penalty of $100,000 per violation and a maximum civil penalty of $1,000,000 per violation. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 503, 506, 507 (Pon. 2008).

When, although NORMA informed defendant's local agent that it would not issue a permit on August 17th, there is no evidence defendant's local agent communicated that information to defendant before defendant commenced fishing on August 18th, the defendant's degree of culpability does not warrant imposition of a civil penalty in the amount of $500,000, but the defendant should not have been fishing under the false and uninformed presumption that NORMA would issue the permit on August 17th so the defendant should be required to pay more than the minimum civil penalty. And when the defendant has no history of prior offenses and when the defendant did commit three separate violations by fishing without a permit for three consecutive days, but it appears that the defendant may simply have commenced fishing under the false and uninformed belief that NORMA, as in the past, would issue the permit on the requested preferred effective date, August 17th, and that defendant stopped fishing on August 20th when he found out the permit had not issued, the court determines that $400,000 is the appropriate civil penalty to apply. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 503, 507 (Pon. 2008).

The FSM is entitled to the proceeds of the sale of fish caught during defendant's illegal fishing activities. FSM v. Katzutoku Maru, 15 FSM R. 503, 507 (Pon. 2008).

Any person who commits a fishery violation for which no civil penalty is otherwise specified, is subject to a civil penalty of not less that $40,000 and not more than $100,000. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 19 (Pon. 2008).

The transponder-on violation in the Administrative Penalties Regulations is a violation of a condition of a fishing access agreement under the APRs' Violation Penalty section. Violation of an access agreement is something for which no specific penalty is provided under Title 24, and which falls within the catch-all provision of Section 920, and may be subject to administrative penalties. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 21-22 (Pon. 2008).

When a licensed vessel's captain had forgotten to turn the transponder back on after he had fixed and restarted the generator and the vessel was not fishing at the time, the captain's failure to turn the transponder back on immediately after fixing the generator was neither intentional nor reckless, but, at most, it was negligent. Taking into account the nature, circumstances, extent and gravity of this prohibited act, the violator's degree of culpability and any history of prior offenses, the court will determine that the minimum civil penalty permissible ($100,000) is appropriate. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 350, 354 (Pon. 2009).

Since the penalty for violating 24 F.S.M.C. 611 may be imposed on "any person," it, by statute, may be imposed only on a natural person or business enterprise or similar entity and not on a vessel. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 350, 354 (Pon. 2009).

In determining the amount of a Title 24 civil penalty, the court must consider the nature, circumstances, extent and gravity of the prohibited acts committed and, with respect to the violator, the degree of culpability, any history of prior offenses, whether there are multiple violations which together constitute a serious disregard of conservation and management measures, and such other matters as justice requires. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 404 (Chk. 2011).

Congress, by setting a high minimum fine, considers a fishing boat's failure to have the ALC transponder on at all times while in the FSM EEZ to be a grave violation, but when the fishing boat's failure to have the transponder on does not appear to be intentional; when it did not have any history of prior offenses; when, even taken together with the other alleged violations, the multiple violations together do not constitute a serious disregard of conservation and management measures; when the fishing boat had a valid fishing license; and when it was not fishing at the time and had not been fishing within the FSM EEZ on that voyage, the court determines that the $100,000 minimum penalty under 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) is appropriate. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405 (Chk. 2011).

When no specific civil penalty is provided for a Title 24 violation it is subject to a civil penalty of not less than $40,000 and not more than $100,000. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 406 (Chk. 2011).

Whether cumulative statutory penalties are permissible is properly determined by seeking out the legislative intent as expressed in the statute's language. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

Clear legislative intent for cumulative penalties can be indicated by provisions providing for separate penalties for each day of a violation, as found section 901(2) of the Marine Resources Act, or where a separate penalty is expressly imposed for each violation. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

Congress would have reasonably intended to restrict to the scope of 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) and its civil penalty of $100,000 to $500,000, to only those acts of interference that would result in a failure to ensure transmission of required information from a transponder, and that an act of interference that falls short of that standard would be penalized under the catch-all provision in 24 F.S.M.C. 920, and would be punishable by a lesser fine of between $40,000 and $100,000. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 32 (Yap 2015).

When the FSM's initial reliance on section 906(2) was in error but that mistake was merely a technical error in pleading since the catch-all cause of action under 24 F.S.M.C. 920 applied, and when granting leave to amend would not prejudice the defendants because the revised cause of action does not place any new facts in dispute, would not result in the need for additional discovery and would not otherwise delay the case's disposition, leave to amend the prayer for relief in four counts to seek a fine in the maximum amount of $100,000 under 24 F.S.M.C. 920 instead of $500,000 under 24 F.S.M.C. 906(2) will be granted. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 33 (Yap 2015).

In the absence of clear legislative intent to impose cumulative penalties against a single violative act, the court will construe 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5), 906(1) and 920 to impose only one penalty for failure to comply with the integrated requirements imposed as a condition of a permit or access agreement pursuant to 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1). But since 24 F.S.M.C. 901(2) evinces clear legislative intent for the imposition of cumulative penalties by making each day of a continuing violation a separate offense for violations of subtitle I and since the entire Marine Resources Act of 2002 constitutes FSM Code Title 24, Subtitle I, it is proper to impose a separate penalty for each of the four days between April 27, 2013 and April 30, 2013, inclusive, during which the vessel violated a provision of that Act. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 34-35 (Yap 2015).

Whether an administrative penalty could have been imposed in lieu of a civil action in a fishing case is irrelevant to the case's disposition because the citation process by which administrative penalties are imposed is not mandatory and the citation process to assess an administrative penalty and a civil law suit for civil penalties proceed on two separate tracks. That the FSM has not cited a vessel under the Administrative Penalty Regulations, but has instead pursued Title 24 civil penalties is not sufficient as a matter of law to warrant summary judgment for defendants, nor does it present a material question of fact to be reserved for trial. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 35 (Yap 2015).

Although penalties can only be assessed against persons – natural persons or business enterprises or similar entities – and the definition of person does not include a vessel in rem, the vessel or a bond posted for the vessel's release, may be considered the property or assets of an owner or operator from which a judgment against the owner or operator may be satisfied so that the vessel, as security for the bond, is therefore properly a party to the action. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 35 (Yap 2015).

Violations of 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1) that are also violations of 24 F.S.M.C. 906(1) should be penalized as one violation under 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) and that civil penalties should be assessed pursuant to section 24 F.S.M.C. 901(1) on a daily basis under 24 F.S.M.C. 901(2). The only exception to imposition of penalties under 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) is an act that does not rise to the level of failure to install, maintain, or ensure transmission of information from a transponder, which is to intentionally feed information or data into a transponder which is not officially required or is meaningless, as set forth in 24 F.S.M.C. 611(4). Such an act is penalized under 24 F.S.M.C. 920. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 524 & n.9 (App. 2020).

24 F.S.M.C. 611(1) is a strict liability statute. The pertinent inquiry is whether there was compliance with the statute, and if not, during what time period. Whether continuing "acts" occurred to cause the failure to comply is irrelevant. When the defendants were in violation of 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1) on four consecutive days, the imposition of multiple penalties under 24 F.S.M.C. 901(2) is justified. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 526 (App. 2020).

The only relevant question when evaluating a strict liability statute is whether there was compliance. A finding of discreet or overt acts in violation of the Marine Resources Act need not be established in order to find continuing violations under 24 F.M.S.C. 901(2). Thus, when the lack of compliance continued for four days, the court will impose penalties for each day of noncompliance. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 526-27 (App. 2020).

When the later enacted public law is silent about whether sections 611(4) and 611(5) were retroactively repealed, the law in effect at the time of the violations will control the imposition of the penalty. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 528 (App. 2020).

– Reef Damage

Various approaches exist for monetary valuation of damages to reefs: commodity value, which is posited on a sale of the components of the damaged area; tourism value, which is based on what visitors spend to visit the site; and replacement value involves, which is the cost of replacing the damaged corals by reseeding. People of Satawal ex rel. Ramoloilug v. Mina Maru No. 3, 10 FSM R. 337, 339 (Yap 2001).

When the class plaintiffs successfully pursued two separate causes of action arising from the same incident, negligence and nuisance, and were awarded compensatory damages, including damages for the physical damage to the reef and marine area as well as their loss of use of this resource, their purported discomfort and annoyance does not generate an additional, separate award of damages since the compensatory damages that were awarded, which flowed from the negligence claim, addressed the loss related to the use of property including any discomfort or annoyance that may have been experienced. Any additional award of damages for their nuisance claim would have resulted in a double recovery. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 63 (App. 2008).

While it may be uncontested that the value of a reef on the main island of Yap is $600 per square meter, the court cannot presume, without evidence, that $600 a square meter is an accurate value for any particular Yap outer island reef, especially where on the outer island there may be more reef and fewer people who have the right to rely on or depend on the reef's resources. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 22 (Yap 2018).

An appropriate measure of damages for a damaged coral reef may be the cost of restoration without grossly disproportionate expense. Or if the cost of restoration would not be an appropriate measure because it would entail a grossly disproportionate expense, damages could be measured by the economic value of the marine resources lost or diminished by the reef damage. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 22 (Yap 2018).

– State Waters

While the FSM and Pohnpei foreign fishing statutes pose no specific requirements as grounds for the search of a fishing vessel, the power to seize is carefully conditioned upon illegal use of the vessel. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 1985).

Any attempt to grant statutory authority to permit seizure of a fishing vessel upon a lesser standard than probable cause would raise serious questions of compatibility with article IV, sections 3 and 4 of the Constitution. Such an interpretation should be avoided unless clearly mandated by statute. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

Seizure under the FSM and Pohnpei foreign fishing statutes must be based upon probable cause, that is, grounds to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the act has occurred and that the vessel was used in that violation. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

To the extent that the state is unable to police its waters and enforce its fishing regulations of its own, the national government has an obligation to provide assistance. However, to the extent that the national government must provide assistance, the power to regulate state waters is beyond the state's control and is in fact a concurrent national power. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 73 (Pon. 1993).

A condition on an MMA fishing permit which prohibits fishing within 12 miles of the FSM unless authorized by the state which has jurisdiction is an exercise of the national government's unexpressed concurrent national power. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (I), 6 FSM R. 65, 73 (Pon. 1993).

The issue of whether all vessels in a purse seiner group can be held liable for the illegal fishing of one of the vessels inside the twelve mile territorial sea is not reached when there is insufficient evidence to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that one vessel was searching for fish inside the twelve mile limit. FSM v. Kotobuki Maru No. 23 (II), 6 FSM R. 159, 165 (Pon. 1993).

The regulation of foreign commercial fishing in state waters – within a limit of twelve miles, is a matter of state law. Pohnpei v. M/V Zhong Yuan Yu #606, 6 FSM R. 464, 465 (Pon. 1994).

A fishing permit issued by the national government prohibiting fishing in state waters unless authorized by the state which has jurisdiction does not constitute regulation of state waters by the national government because it merely tries to prevent a vessel that fishes illegally in state waters from continuing to fish in national waters. FSM v. Hai Hsiang No. 63, 7 FSM R. 114, 116 (Chk. 1995).

Even if an FSM Foreign Fishing Agreement has a regulatory effect in banning fishing in state waters, Kosrae acceded to that regulation when the Kosrae Attorney General requested that "the FSM Department of Justice institute a prosecution of the vessel and her owners and operators for fishing within state waters in violation of national law and the terms of the vessel's permit." When Kosrae requested the FSM's assistance in enforcing the national statute criminalizing the Foreign Fishing Agreement's strictures on fishing in state waters, and failing to keep fishing gear stowed in those same waters, Kosrae ratified any FSM regulation of its waters in those two respects and on the occasion in question. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Fishery Co., 9 FSM R. 421, 423 (Kos. 2000).

A criminal prosecution for fishing in state waters will not be dismissed when even if the Foreign Fishing Agreement were to be construed as regulating commercial fishing in Kosrae's waters, the cooperative law enforcement public policy weighs in favor of Kosrae's ability to expressly ratify any such regulation by a specific request to institute a prosecution where the ratification facilitated the enforcement of a national law criminalizing conduct proscribed in the Foreign Fishing Agreement. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Fishery Co., 9 FSM R. 421, 423 (Kos. 2000).

Internal waters are those waters on the landward side, or inside, of the baselines of the territorial sea. The exclusive economic zone starts twelve nautical miles seaward of the baseline and extending outward for another 188 nautical miles. A desire to maximize the area that might be included within the baselines, subject to the FSM's international treaty obligations, cannot be interpreted as a recognition of state ownership of the ocean resources 12 to 200 nautical outside of those baselines when drawn. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 430-31 (App. 2000).

As a result of the Pohnpei Executive Reorganization Act, the Department of Land and Natural Resources, not the Office of Economic Affairs, has the power to authorize the harvest and marketing of trochus in Pohnpei. Therefore, any actions taken by the Office of Economic Affairs with regard to publication of solicitations to bid, designating successful bidders, or entering into contracts on the state's behalf for the sale of trochus, were ultra vires, or without any legal authority. Nagata v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 265, 270-71 (Pon. 2002).

When the FSM had no involvement in or authority over Pohnpei's decisions not to declare a trochus harvest, summary judgment in the FSM's favor is appropriate with respect to the alleged constitutional violations concerning the plaintiff's trochus business. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 118-19 (Pon. 2003).

Under Yap traditional rights and ownership of natural resources and marine areas inside the Yap fringing reef – the rights to use and exploit, to the exclusion of all others, the marine resources of particular areas of the submerged lands inside the fringing reef around Yap – stem from a concept called a tabinaw. A tabinaw entails rights, duties and obligations for its members, and includes families and households. But a tabinaw is more than a concept. A tabinaw includes an estate in identifiable land and specific areas within the Yap fringing reef within which a tabinaw member can exploit the marine resources. A tabinaw member can only exploit marine resources in the marine area that appertains to his tabinaw. Each village includes a number of tabinaw. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 157 (Yap 2007).

Since a tabinaw member can only exploit marine resources in the marine area that appertains to his tabinaw, the court can and will redefine the class to include only those residents whose tabinaw membership gives them exclusive exploitation or use rights in the affected reef area, regardless of whether the state is the ultimate owner of the reef. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 157 (Yap 2007).

Under Yap traditional rights and ownership of natural resources and marine areas inside the Yap fringing reef – the rights to use and exploit, to the exclusion of all others, the marine resources of particular areas of the submerged lands inside the Yap fringing reef – stem from a concept called a tabinaw. A tabinaw entails rights, duties and obligations for its members, and includes families and households. But a tabinaw is more than a concept. A tabinaw includes an estate in identifiable land and specific areas within the Yap fringing reef within which a tabinaw member can exploit the marine resources. A tabinaw member can only exploit marine resources in the marine area that appertains to his tabinaw. Each village includes a number of tabinaw. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Nationwide I, 16 FSM R. 34, 38 (Yap 2008).

In a lawsuit for damage to the reef in a Yap municipality, a plaintiff class of all municipal residents is not sufficiently definite when the rights to exploit the reef are vested in only certain tabinaw and the tabinaw's members. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. M/V Nationwide I, 16 FSM R. 34, 38-39 (Yap 2008).

A trial court case that when affirmed on appeal held that the decision – that the State of Pohnpei and not its municipalities owned the marine areas in Pohnpei – concerned only Pohnpei and not the other three FSM states, is clearly not controlling precedent for the resolving issues unique to the State of Yap, including the interpretation of its Constitution and Code when, unlike Pohnpei, Yap not only repealed the relevant Trust Territory Code provision, but Yap's Constitution expressly recognizes the traditional rights and ownership over the natural resources and the marine space within the state of Yap. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 58 (App. 2008).

The State of Yap's ownership of public lands as provided for at 9 Y.S.C. 901, is not mutually exclusive with the traditional rights of ownership over these lands and related marine resources by the people of Yap through the tabinaw, as recognized in the Yap Constitution. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 58 (App. 2008).

The mere fact that there is someone outside the class who believes that they also have an interest in the damaged marine space would not preclude an award of damages to the class plaintiffs, provided the class could demonstrate that they had such an interest. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 60 (App. 2008).

When the class plaintiffs successfully pursued two separate causes of action arising from the same incident, negligence and nuisance, and were awarded compensatory damages, including damages for the physical damage to the reef and marine area as well as their loss of use of this resource, their purported discomfort and annoyance does not generate an additional, separate award of damages since the compensatory damages that were awarded, which flowed from the negligence claim, addressed the loss related to the use of property including any discomfort or annoyance that may have been experienced. Any additional award of damages for their nuisance claim would have resulted in a double recovery. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 63 (App. 2008).

"Fishery waters" includes the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone, territorial waters, and internal waters. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 404 n.2 (Chk. 2011).

No one may commercially harvest, commercially process, or commercially export sea cucumbers without having a valid permit issued by Kosrae Island Resource Management Authority. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165 (App. 2015).

Anyone, regardless of citizenship, is required to obtain the same sea cucumber permit because the permit requirement is part of a regulatory scheme to properly manage an important marine resource and avoid its depletion. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165 (App. 2015).

Kosrae Island Resource Management Authority is statutorily required to adopt regulations necessary for the protection and sustainable commercial harvesting, commercial processing, and commercial exportation of sea cucumbers, and to effect this regulatory scheme, the statute vests KIRMA with the authority to issue commercial sea cucumber permits and requires that those making commercial use of sea cucumbers to obtain KIRMA permits. Making persons who have a foreign investment permit also get a KIRMA permit is consistent with this regulatory scheme because if a foreign investment permit holder did not also need to obtain a KIRMA permit, then KIRMA would be unable to effectively manage or regulate the sea cucumber resource since it would not have any contact with or knowledge of the foreign investment permit holder's activities and thus be unable to effectively regulate the resource. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165 (App. 2015).

A foreign investment permit holder must also hold a Kosrae Island Resource Management Authority permit in order to commercially harvest, process, or export sea cucumbers. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165 (App. 2015).

A Kosrae Island Resource Management Authority sea cucumber permit is the only sea cucumber permit needed so as not to violate either Kosrae State Code § 13.523(5) or § 13.523(6). A foreign citizen also needs a foreign investment permit to engage in a sea cucumber (or any other) business, and the lack of a foreign investment permit or the violation of one or more of its conditions would be charged under the foreign investment statutes, not under § 13.523(5) or § 13.523(6). Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 229, 231 (App. 2015).

The territorial sea is the waters within 12 nautical miles seaward of FSM island baselines, and the exclusive economic zone is the water seaward of the territorial sea outward to 200 nautical miles from the island baselines. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

Irreparable harm may be threatened when, once the sea cucumber population is significantly impacted, it will take several years for the population to recover, if at all, and when the very nature of the surrounding ecosystem will suffer negative consequences as a result. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 546, 551 (Pon. 2016).

The Administrator of the Pohnpei Office of Fisheries and Aquaculture is granted the power to establish seasons for the harvesting of sea cucumbers from their natural marine habitat, and he or she shall do so with the aim of balancing the exploitation of sea cucumbers as an economic resource and the preservation of sea cucumbers as a renewable resource. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 546, 551 (Pon. 2016).

When a temporary restraining order enjoins the conduct, endorsement, or coordination of any further commercial sea cucumber harvesting in Pohnpei waters and the sale or purchase of sea cucumbers harvested in Pohnpei waters, it may also provide that any sea cucumber already harvested before the order's date may be sold and purchased pursuant to the laws and regulations and that any sea cucumber coming into the buyer's possession which was harvested before the order's date may be handled accordingly so as to prevent the unnecessary waste of those sea cucumbers. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 546, 553 (Pon. 2016).

Passage by Vietnamese through the FSM territorial waters was not innocent and therefore unlawful when it was for the purpose of illegal sea cucumber harvesting, and thus it provides a sufficient factual basis for a guilty plea to entry without a permit. FSM v. Bui Van Cua, 20 FSM R. 588, 590-91 (Pon. 2016).

The court recognizes the customary and traditional rights of municipalities, clans, families, and individuals to control the use of, or material in, marine areas below the ordinary high watermark and otherwise engage in the harvesting of fish and other marine resources from reef areas, but any traditional and customary right to control the use of, or material in, marine areas below the ordinary high watermark is subject to, and limited by, the inherent rights of the Pohnpei Public Lands Trust as the owner of such marine areas. Accordingly, the Mwoalen Wahu does not have standing on the basis that there exists a customary law that gives the traditional leaders the right to control the use of marine areas in their respective municipalities. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 641-42 & n.1 (Pon. 2016).

NAMES

In in personam actions, there is no authority to proceed against unknown persons in the absence of a statute or rule, and the FSM has no rule or statute permitting the use of fictitious names to designate defendants. Accordingly, John Doe defendants will be dismissed. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 412 n.1 (Pon. 2001).

A court decree is required to document a change of name, even for spelling changes. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 301, 302 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The court is unaware of any tradition or custom within Chuukese society for a child, or even an adult, to carry the last name of his or her step-father or step-mother, and finds and concludes that no such tradition or custom exists. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

At common law, a person is free to adopt and use any name he or she chooses, so long as there is no fraudulent purpose, and the name does not infringe on the rights of others. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The right to assume any name, absent fraud or infringement of the rights of others, operates at common law independently of any court order. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, any person may ordinarily change his name at will, without any legal proceedings, merely by adopting another name. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The lack of statutory procedures for name changes in Chuuk has led to a great variety of allegations in petitions for change of name, such as incorrect allegations regarding Chuukese tradition and custom. It is clearly more preferable that the Legislature act to provide statutory requirements for name change petitions. In the absence of such statutory regulation, it is prudent for the court to establish minimum requirements for name change petitions in Chuuk. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A petition for change of name must include: 1) the petitioner's current name and place of residence; 2) the petitioner's birth date and age, and place of birth; 3) the petitioner's citizenship, unless the petitioner is an FSM citizen; 4) the petitioner's marital status; 5) the names and ages of petitioner's children, if any; 6) a statement as to the absence or status of petitioner's criminal record; 7) a statement regarding the absence or existence of petitioner's status as a debtor, including the names and addresses of petitioner's creditors, if any; 8) the petitioner's proposed name, and a brief statement of the reasons, if any, for the requested name change; and 9) in the case of a petition for change of name of a minor child, parental consent to the change of name. The petition must contain a prayer for change of name, be signed by the petitioner or the petitioner's attorney or trial counselor, and the petition must be verified. In addition to these minimum requirements, the petitioner must give the general public notice of the petition sufficient to permit those who might object to appear and make written objection. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 567 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Given the difficulties of notice in Chuuk, for any petition for name change filed with the Chuuk State Supreme Court, the Clerk of the Court will prepare a radio announcement to be read on V6AK radio, containing the petitioner's name, the date the petition was filed, and requiring any objections to the name change to be filed with the court within four (4) weeks of the petition's filing date. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 567 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

No hearing on a name change petition will normally be required, unless objections to the petition are properly filed with the court within the time period required. If objections are filed, the court will schedule a hearing at the earliest possible opportunity, and the Clerk of the Court shall give notice of the hearing by the best means available to apprize the objectors of the hearing's date and time. In the absence of objection, and upon confirmation that the name change petition contains all necessary information, the court will grant the petition without hearing, and will give notice to the petitioner that the petition has been granted. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 567 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The court would prefer that the Chuuk Legislature adopt statutory procedures for name change petitions, as well as petitions for adoption and other matters involving family status. Name change petitions must contain the court-required minimum provisions only so long as the Legislature chooses not to enact a statutory scheme for such matters. In re Suda, 11 FSM R. 564, 567 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

NOTARIES

While the majority of notaries are employed by the state government, several are employed by other offices and by private entities. The duties of a notary public are the same, regardless of where they are employed. A notarization performed by a court employee carries the same weight as a notarization performed by a privately employed individual. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 245 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A notary only confirms that the person appeared before him or her, was identified by the notary, and signed the affidavit (or other document) in the presence of the notary. Identity is confirmed by personal knowledge or by appropriate documentation. The identity and signature of the person signing the affidavit are verified by the notary public, and so noted on the document. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 245 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A notary cannot and does not verify or confirm the statements in the affidavit because the notary does not have personal knowledge of those statements. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 245 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Notarization of a document does not establish truth to the statements made in the document: notarization only verifies the identity and signature of the person who signed the document. Consequently, notarization of a document by a court employee does not represent any court endorsement or certification of the statements made in the document. In re Phillip, 11 FSM R. 243, 245 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A notarized affidavit may be authenticated without the affiant's testimony, as it is presumed to be authentic so long as it is acknowledged in the manner provided for by law. A clerk of court's manner of acknowledging an affidavit is for the affiant to swear to it under oath in the clerk's presence. Peter v. Jessy,

Before a notary can apply the notary seal to an affidavit, the notary must confirm that the affiant has personally appeared to sign the affidavit before the notary, the affiant must be identified at that time by the notary, and the affiant must sign the affidavit in the notary's presence. The notary confirms the affiant's identity by personal knowledge or by reviewing appropriate documentation. When applying the notary seal, the notary notes on the affidavit that the affiant's identity and signature have been verified. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

The act of notarizing a document is in itself a verification of the identity and signature of the person who signed the document. If an affiant is not present, however, the notary cannot make the necessary verifications and should under no circumstances notarize the document, and is subject to liability for misconduct of a notary public. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 174 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Generally, a notarized signature is presumed to be authentic. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 19 FSM R. 579, 581 (Pon. 2014).

Until a party has become aware of operative facts to discover that the signature may have been forged, that party is entitled to rely on the authenticity of the notarized signature. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 19 FSM R. 579, 581 (Pon. 2014).

A party is ordinarily entitled to rely on the notarized signature on an agreement when it sues on that agreement, but if the party knows before filing suit that the defendant claims not to have signed the agreement or to know anything about the agreement, the plaintiff cannot base his suit on the presumption arising from the notarized signature. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 19 FSM R. 579, 581 (Pon. 2014).

When the attorney signing the complaint was unaware of operative facts to discover that the notarized signature of one of the defendants was not hers, the attorney made, under the case's circumstances, a reasonable inquiry before the complaint was signed and filed, and, a reasonable inquiry having been made, the defendants' motion for Rule 11 sanctions for filing the complaint will be denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 19 FSM R. 579, 581-82 (Pon. 2014).

The false notarization of a guaranty does not affect the guaranty's substantive provisions as it relates to the signer when the signer admits that he did sign the guaranty. This is because the purpose of notarization is to verify the identity and signature of the person who signed the document. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 292 & n.8 (Pon. 2016).

Under both the Pohnpei and FSM statutes, a notary public has the privilege and is authorized to receive proof and acknowledgments of writings and all copies of certification under his or her hand and the notarized seal shall be received as evidence of such transaction. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 29 (App. 2016).

Extrinsic evidence of authenticity, as a condition precedent to admissibility, is not required with respect to documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment, executed by a notary public in the manner provided by law. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 29 (App. 2016).

By virtue of having affixed the notary seal, a notary acknowledges the identity and signature of the individual who signed the document. This is because the notary receives proof of identity and signature before giving his or her imprimatur, as evidenced by the seal. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 29 (App. 2016).

Recognition of a notarized signature as indicia of reliability, is consistent with the governing statute(s), the rules of evidence, and case law; thereby meeting the reasonable inquiry requirement set forth in Rule 11. Ehsa v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 22, 29 (App. 2016).

Kosrae Land Court Rules (and good practice) require that all documents concerning transfer of title must be notarized and submitted to the Registrar for recordation. Signatures that are executed at different times or in different locations must be notarized separately. The signature page of each document may consist of as many duplicate pages as necessary for proper notarization. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

When the purported transferor's signature and that of his witnesses were not notarized on a duplicate page, but the notarization was instead on a page separate from their signatures, and since the Registrar must not accept any document which is not properly notarized, it is doubtful that the Land Court should have accepted for filing a deed of gift in this form, even if it had been accompanied by the surrender of the old certificate of title, which it was not. Since the deed of gift was in a doubtful form and since the transferor's certificate of title was not surrendered with it, the Land Court should not have issued the transferee a certificate of title for that parcel. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

The Kosrae Land Court Rules (and good practice) require that all documents concerning transfer of title be notarized and submitted to the Registrar for recordation. Each document must reflect the printed name and signature of each person signing the document, and the date of the signing. Signatures which are executed at different times or in different locations must be notarized separately, and the signature page of each document may consist of as many duplicate pages as necessary for proper notarization. The Registrar shall not accept any document which is not properly notarized. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 618 (App. 2018).

PROPERTY

The fact that one may have general privilege to enter property does not necessarily mean that the privilege may be exercised at all times and in every conceivable manner. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 39 (Truk 1981).

State courts, rather than national courts, should normally resolve probate and inheritance issues especially where interests in land are at issue. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 97 (Pon. 1982).

The power to regulate probate of wills or inheritance of property is not "beyond the power of a state to control" within the meaning of article VIII, section 1 of the Constitution and is consequently a state power. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107 (Pon. 1982).

Nothing about the power to regulate probate of wills or inheritance of property suggests that these are beyond the power of a state to control. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107 (Pon. 1982).

State officials generally should have greater knowledge of use, local custom and expectations concerning land and personal property. They should be better equipped than the national government to control and regulate these matters. The framers of the Constitution specifically considered this issue and felt that powers of this sort should be state powers. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 107, 109 (Pon. 1982).

The Ponape District Court, although not granted jurisdiction over land matters, may be given the opportunity to hear certified questions from the FSM Supreme Court on issues in a probate case involving land in order to further the intent of the framers that local decision-makers play a part in decision of local nature. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 110-12 (Pon. 1982).

When jurisdiction exists by virtue of diversity of the parties, the FSM Supreme Court may resolve the dispute despite the fact that matters squarely within the legislative powers of states (e.g., probate, inheritance and land issues) may be involved. Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 392-93 (Pon. 1984).

When an individual claiming an interest in land has no prior knowledge of an impending transaction of other parties concerning that land, his failure to forewarn those parties of his claim cannot be interpreted as a knowing waiver of his rights. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 418 (Pon. 1984).

Governmental bodies' adjudicatory decisions affecting property rights are subject to the procedural due process requirements of article IV, section 3 of the Constitution. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 422-23 (Pon. 1984).

There is a substantial state interest in assuring that land disputes are decided fairly because of the fundamental role that land plays in Micronesia. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 92, 98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

A claim that decision-makers in a land adjudication were biased raises serious statutory and constitutional issues and is entitled to careful consideration. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 92, 99 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

FSM Supreme Court's trial division does not lose jurisdiction over a case merely because land issues are involved, but if such issues are presented, certification procedures may be employed to avoid encroachment upon state decision-making prerogatives. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 381 (Pon. 1988).

In an action brought to enforce an agreement among three parties to "meet and divide up" land which is the subject of an ownership dispute, the court will enforce the agreement and, where there is no evidence to establish that any party is entitled to a larger share than the others, the court will presume that they intended to divide the land equally. Tauleng v. Palik, 3 FSM R. 434, 436 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

A party claiming ownership in land for which there is a determination of ownership showing another as owner, with the appeal period expired, has, at a minimum, the burden of showing facts to establish that the determination of ownership is incorrect. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 508, 510 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Plaintiff's possessory interest in land is sufficient to maintain standing to bring action for damages wrought when a road was built across the land. Benjamin v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 508, 511 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The FSM Supreme Court may and should abstain in a case where land use rights are at issue, where the state is attempting to develop a coherent policy concerning the disposition of public lands, where there is a similar litigation already pending in state court, where the state requests abstention as defendant in an action which may expose it to monetary damages, where Congress has not asserted any national interests which may be affected by the outcome of the litigation, and where abstention will not result in delay or injustice to the parties. Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 39 (Pon. 1989).

The FSM Constitution terminated all existing indefinite term land use agreements five years after the effective date of the Constitution. After that date, without a new lease agreement the occupier becomes a trespasser on the land. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 132 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Because of the special importance land has in Micronesian society the state has a substantial interest in assuring that land disputes are settled fairly. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 424 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

When a landowner voluntarily enters into a statement of intent to grant the state an easement the state has not violated the landowner's constitutional rights by "taking" his property without just compensation, and is not liable for trespass. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 425 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

A strong presumption exists under FSM law for deferring land matters to local land authorities. Kapas v. Church of Latter Day Saints, 6 FSM R. 56, 60 (App. 1993).

Because land ownership determinations in the FSM are conducted using different procedures and resources than in the United States, it is not appropriate to adopt the same legal prerequisites to title employed by U.S. jurisdictions. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1993).

The issue of indefinite parcel boundaries can be resolved by the state Land Commission subsequent to a declaration of title by the court. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1993).

The traditional remedy for the original landowners in an "ammot" transaction when the grantee no longer used the land for the purpose for which it was given was repossession of the land and nothing more. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 134 (App. 1993).

Patrilineal descendants – or afokur – have no rights to lineage land in Chuuk. They only enjoy permissive rights of usage from the members of the lineage. Mere usage of lineage land by afokur does not constitute title of any sort even if the usage lasts a lifetime. Transfer of lineage land to any descendants of male members requires the clear agreement of the Clan. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 196 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

It is an established principle of Chuukese land tenure, that lineage land is owned by the matrilineal descendants and not by the patrilineal descendants or "afokur." Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

When land is granted for "for so long as it is used for missionary purposes," the original grantors retain a reversionary interest. Dobich v. Kapriel, 6 FSM R. 199, 201 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Land granted for "for so long as it is used for missionary purposes," is not a constitutionally prohibited indefinite land use agreement because the length of the term of the land use will continue, with all certainty, as long as a court determines that the land is still being used for missionary purposes. The term is definite, because its termination can be determined with certainty. Dobich v. Kapriel, 6 FSM R. 199, 202 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The Constitutional prohibition against indefinite land use agreements does not apply to an agreement where none of the parties are a non-citizen, a corporation not wholly owned by citizens, or a government. Dobich v. Kapriel, 6 FSM R. 199, 202 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The sanction imposed on one who controls and manages the land of a group who does not fairly and according to custom concern himself with the rights of the other members or another member of the group is the censure of the community. In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 328 (Chk. 1994).

When the children of a landowner with full title to land inherit the land they form a land-owning group ("corporation"). The senior male, the mwäänii chi, is required to manage the property in the interest of the "corporation." The corporation owns the land even if one part or another is allotted to a member for his use. In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 329 (Chk. 1994).

Where a party has merely alleged inadequate notice at the time of the title determination by the Land Commission but has offered no evidence the a court must conclude the certificate of title is valid, especially when the party only entered the property nine years after the determination process and offers no evidence of interest in property dating back to the time of the determination process. Ponape Enterprises Co. v. Soumwei, 6 FSM R. 341, 344 (Pon. 1994).

Where the T.T. High Court found that a particular parcel of land was not public land in a suit brought by the Nanmwarki and Nahnken of Nett on behalf of all their constituents and subjects the doctrine of res judicata bars a party from presenting that issue as a counterclaim or defense. Ponape Enterprises Co. v. Soumwei, 6 FSM R. 341, 344 (Pon. 1994).

An action for damages for negligent surveying is not an action for the recovery of an interest in land, for which the twenty year statute of limitation would apply, therefore it may be barred by the lesser statue of limitations. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 361 (Pon. 1994).

German land reforms instituting the rule of primogeniture and prohibiting sale of land without approval of the Governor and the Nanmwarki and requiring a certain number of days of free labor to the Nanmwarki applied only to the public lands that were taken from the Nanmwarkis and given to the ethnic Pohnpeians actually farming them and not to lands already individually owned. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 374-75 (Pon. 1994).

Japanese land law on Pohnpei disregarded the rule of primogeniture instituted by the Germans and often allowed the division of land and ownership by women. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 376-77 (Pon. 1994).

Under the Trust Territory government the rule of primogeniture was only applied to land held under the standard German form deeds which stated the rule, and even then the courts frequently made exceptions to the restrictions. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 377-80 (Pon. 1994).

Because the customary Pohnpeian title system was primarily matrilineal and the court's decisions should be consistent with local custom, the primogeniture provisions of the standard form German deeds should be given narrow application and not applied more broadly than it was by the German, Japanese, or Trust Territory governments. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 381 (Pon. 1994).

Where the rule of primogeniture was not in effect when the land was individually acquired in 1903, was never fully in effect at any time, was largely ignored by the Japanese when the land was passed by will contrary to primogeniture, and has been repudiated by the state government, and where the person who would have inherited if primogeniture had applied never made that claim, and where primogeniture appears contrary to custom, the court must conclude that primogeniture never applied to the land in question. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 381-82 (Pon. 1994).

An assignor must be able to inherit the assigned expectancy from the source in order for his assignment of expectancy to be effective. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 382 (Pon. 1994).

A U.S. statute requiring aliens to dispose of landholdings within ten years of acquisition never applied in the Trust Territory because the Trust Territory never had the status of a U.S. territory and the U.S. Congress never specifically extended its application to the Trust Territory. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 524-25 (Pon. 1994).

A party who has not disturbed the natural contours of the land is not liable for loss of lateral support for removing fill pushed over the common boundary by the other party when the other party created the need for lateral support by altering the natural contours of the land at their common boundary. Setik v. Sana, 6 FSM R. 549, 553 & n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Heirs are those persons who acquire ownership upon someone's death. Thus the later issuance of a Certificate of Title to "heirs" confirms their earlier ownership of the property. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 49 n.8 (App. 1995).

Where a judge's pretrial order states that the only issue for trial is the ownership of land within certain boundaries as described on a certain map later litigants cannot claim that the determination of title does not include land that they admit is within those boundaries. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 49-50 (App. 1995).

On Kosrae, usru is a gift of land by a parent to one's children, and kewosr is an outright gift of land from a man to a favored lover. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

Under Kosraen custom one does not openly declare that a kewosr has taken place, but simply acts, with a witness present, in a certain fashion. A kewosr is a secret way of giving land that only the man and woman involved know about. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

In Kosrae, land ownership determinations are conducted using different procedures and resources than those in the United States. It is not appropriate to adopt the same legal reasoning employed in U.S. jurisdictions. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 37 n.6 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

Although transfer of land by kewosr fell out of favor after the arrival of Christianity on Kosrae, kewosr did continue afterward. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 37 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

Profit à prendre, the right to enter land for cultivation and to take the products of such cultivation, is an interest separate from ownership. It may be created by either grant or prescription. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 240 (App. 1998).

The FSM Supreme Court does not need to rule on whether to recognize to recognize the legal doctrine of profit à prendre when the claimant cannot satisfy the elements of that doctrine. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 240 (App. 1998).

The ownership of realty carries with it, as an incident thereto, the prima facie presumption of the ownership of both the natural products of the land and the annually sown crops. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 404 (App. 1998).

The criminal law is not to be used to settle conflicting claims to property. Property disputes in Micronesia strain the social fabric of the communities in which they occur. The filing of a criminal action injects an element of criminality into a matter which is, at its core, civil, and increases that strain. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 406 (App. 1998).

Trust Territory Code Title 67 remains in effect in Chuuk through the Chuuk Constitution Transition Clause. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 526 (Chk. 1998).

When a traditional and customary settlement provides a life estate in property, the land reverts to the grantor or his heirs upon the life estate's owner's demise. Muritok v. William, 8 FSM R. 574, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A person may only transfer such title to land as that person lawfully possesses. Muritok v. William, 8 FSM R. 574, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

If the seller had no authority to sell property, plainly, the buyer acquired no title to the property. Mere possession is not probative of title, because one in possession acquires no better title than his seller. Muritok v. William, 8 FSM R. 574, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A party who purchased the land from the life estate owner only purchased a life estate and upon the seller's death has no further title or interest in the land. Muritok v. William, 8 FSM R. 574, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Actions for the recovery of land or any interest therein must be commenced within twenty years after the cause of action accrues. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

A dedication is generally defined as the appropriation of land by the owner for the use of the public. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

An owner may be deemed to have dedicated his property based on his actions, which included throwing the property open to the public and his acquiescence in the property's maintenance by the municipality. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

In land cases, notice requirements must be followed. Failure to serve actual notice is a violation of due process of law and contrary to law. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 94 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The purpose of a quiet title action is to determine, as between the parties to the proceeding, who has the better title. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 179 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Implicit in the concept of ownership of property is the right to exclude others; that is, a true owner of land exercises full dominion and control over it and possesses the right to expel intruders. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 179 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The fact that a claimant's name is shown on the 1932 Japanese survey map of Kosrae is not dispositive as to the land's ownership. Ownership will be determined on the basis of all the evidence. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 180 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Determination of land ownership rests primarily with the Land Commission. After a designation of any registration area has been filed, a court will entertain only those land title cases where there is a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable. Simina v. Rayphand, 9 FSM R. 508, 509 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The German Land Code of 1912 applies only to land on Pohnpei, not to submerged areas. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 64 (Pon. 2001).

In order for a court to have jurisdiction over an action involving real property, particularly an action involving title, the real property must be within that court's territorial jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

A person may only transfer such title to land as that person lawfully possesses. So when someone did not own a parcel, he did not have the authority to transfer title and distribute it to his children through his will. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 165 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a trespass action is not an action to set boundaries or to determine the ownership of any particular property and when the defendant never directly asserts an ownership interest in the land on which he allegedly trespasses, but rather asserts the rights of third parties, who (and any claims they may have) are not currently before the court, it is not an "action with regard to interests in land" within the meaning of 67 TTC 105 requiring a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable before it is likely the Land Commission can make a determination on the matter. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 180 (Pon. 2001).

A case that appears to rest on the assertion that the Land Commission gave title to the land in question to a clan will be dismissed when the Determination of Ownership names a person as the sole owner of the land. Enengeitaw Clan v. Shirai, 10 FSM R. 309, 311 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Trust Territory Code Title 67 remains in effect in Chuuk through the Chuuk Constitution Transition Clause. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 369 (Chk. 2001).

It is a well-recognized rule of law in Chuuk that lineage land cannot be transferred, distributed or sold by an individual member of the lineage without the consent or acquiescence of all adult members of that lineage, and it is assumed that this rule of law applies to "transfers" by lease as well. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 389 (Chk. 2001).

There is no statute of frauds – a law requiring that certain agreements or contracts to be in writing before they are enforceable in court – in Chuuk. Customarily, any agreement, even that selling land, might be oral. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 389 (Chk. 2001).

In Kosrae, due to the customs regarding land inheritance and the delays in adjudicating title to land, many parcels are possessed and used by persons who do not have title to land. Land use agreements may be made in writing, but when the agreements involve family members, the agreements are usually verbal. James v. Lelu Town, 10 FSM R. 648, 649 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The consent of all adult members of the lineage is needed to sell lineage land. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2002).

Community censure is the sanction imposed on one who controls and manages the land of a group who does not fairly and according to custom concern himself with the rights of other members or another member of the group. That is not a sanction that a court can order or relief that a court could grant. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

Customary and traditional use rights to an island are a form of property right. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

"Color of title" is susceptible to ready definition: Any instrument having a grantor and a grantee, and containing a description of the lands intended to be conveyed, and apt words for their conveyance, gives a color of title to the lands described. When the College had color of title to the property because it held a quitclaim deed to the property, that recognition served as a means of assessing and comparing the quality of the respective possessory interests claimed by it and another. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 359 (App. 2003).

A trial court can hold that, as between the parties to the case, who had the better claim to ownership, but that is all the trial court could have decided regarding ownership. Its ruling could not apply to any claims to ownership by non-parties or to other claims not raised in the pleadings or at trial. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 454, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When the parties' position at trial, and on this appeal (until now), was that it was a dispute over ownership, the trial court's decision was limited to who among the parties had a better claim to ownership and did not include a claim that no one owned Fayu. Thus the claim that Fayu was owned by no one was not before the trial court. The appellate court's affirmance of the trial court thus does not preclude a non-party from later successfully maintaining a claim that no one owns Fayu. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 454, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The transfer of a void title to another does not make the title any more valid when the other also had notice that the title was being challenged on appeal. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 591 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Acheche is traditionally a gift of land at the time of the birth of the first son so there could not have been any acheche of the land later because the transfer would have had to have taken place when the son was born. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 593 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A party can have no legal interest in a lot when she never alleged that she purchased the lot from the true landowning group. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 595 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The law presumes that an owner of land knows his own property and truly represents it. Tulenkun v. Abraham, 12 FSM R. 13, 17 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the Chuuk Legislature has made no effort to repeal, supersede or amend the Trust Territory Code regarding land tenure in Chuuk, pursuant to Article XV, § 9 of the Chuuk Constitution, the Trust Territory Code provisions still apply to land disputes. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 158 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When determinations of ownership for adjoining land show that title to those lands is held not only by the named parties but by their brothers and sisters as well, these persons should be named in a boundary dispute and trespass case's pleadings and at least once in the caption, because as co-owners, they may be indispensable parties. In re FSM Telecomm. Corp. Cellular Tower, 12 FSM R. 243, 248 (Chk. 2003).

A party who seeks to quiet title to a piece of land must join all known persons who are claiming title in order to settle the property's ownership without additional litigation. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 279 (App. 2003).

All co-tenants are indispensable parties to the litigation when someone else claims complete ownership of the land. Otherwise, the co-tenants would either be deprived of their property interest without due process of law or they would be forced to share their property with a hostile co-owner who believes he should be the sole owner. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 279 (App. 2003).

An appeal will be dismissed for the lack of indispensable parties because an appellant's failure to join all the co-owners as parties is fatal to his appeal. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 279 (App. 2003).

All co-tenants would not be indispensable parties if a litigant were claiming only one co-tenant's share and not the other shares. Then only that co-tenant need be joined. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 279 (App. 2003).

When there is no clear evidence in the record that anyone else had significant involvement with the parcel, and given the trial court's judgment as to the witness's credibility, there is no significant evidence to overcome even "some evidence" of Timothy's ownership as presented by the 1932 Japanese Map. George v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 310, 318 (App. 2004).

Whether or not someone had a valid claim of land ownership arising out of his alleged purchase in 1959, he lost any claim he may have had to it by failing to raise the claim or perfect his interest prior to the issuance of a Certificate of Title for it in 1981. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 400 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A claim to land clearly could not be renewed when the statute of limitations on an action to recover land or an interest therein is twenty years and more than twenty years have passed since the Certificate of Title in another's favor was issued and since the court decision affirming ownership. Any subsequent attempt to litigate the land's ownership is barred by the statute of limitations. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 400 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The law of Chuuk provides that lineage land is owned by the matrilineal members of the lineage.

Lineage land may only be transferred with the consent of the lineage, and since the land is owned by the matrilineal members of the lineage, their consent is necessary. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 401 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Interests in land include fee simple ownership, easements, rights of way and leases. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 531, 535 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A person may only transfer such title to land as that person lawfully possesses. If the grantor had no authority to bequeath the property, plainly the devisees acquired no title to the property. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Implicit in the concept of ownership of property is the right to exclude others; that is a true owner of land exercises full dominion and control over it and possesses the right to expel intruders. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 72, 76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Fee simple title to land which is held by a group of heirs is held as tenants-in-common. Sigrah v. Heirs of Nena, 13 FSM R. 192, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Co-owners of land are generally considered indispensable parties to any litigation involving the land. A party who seeks to quiet title to a piece of land must join all known persons who are claiming title in order to settle the property's ownership. Sigrah v. Heirs of Nena, 13 FSM R. 192, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Pursuant to state law, when the Land Court found that Lonno was the "previous land owner" of the subject parcels and that Lonno died without leaving a will, all heirs of Lonno were therefore interested parties to the parcels. Heirs of Lonno v. Heirs of Lonno, 13 FSM R. 421, 423 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Land use agreements involving family members are usually verbal. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 424, 426 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Customary land use rights, such as for burials and gravesites, are a form of property right. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 424, 426 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

It is difficult to see how the after-acquired title doctrine could be any other way. The general rule is that a person may only transfer such title to land as that person lawfully possesses. However, if a person should transfer more than he lawfully possesses and then later comes to lawfully possess what he purported to transfer, it is only fair and just that he and the law honor his prior transfer. If a person should transfer an interest that he mistakenly believes he holds and then it is discovered that he does not hold it, the law should encourage him to cure this defective transfer and acquire the interest so that the innocent transferee continues to receive the benefit of his bargain and quietly enjoy what he has leased or bought. If the doctrine of after-acquired title (also called estoppel by deed and estoppel by lease for sales and leases respectively) were not the rule, an innocent transferee would be deprived of the benefit of his bargain, while permitting the after-acquiring transferor to unfairly benefit by disregarding the sale or lease although he has now acquired the right he earlier claimed that he had. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 469 (Chk. 2005).

A person may only transfer such title to land as that person lawfully possesses. If the seller had no authority to sell property, plainly the buyer acquired no title to the property. Mere possession is not probative of title, because one in possession acquired no better title than his seller. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

All causes of action arising out of the same event (and all defenses to a cause of action) must be raised in one case or else they are barred. A plaintiff cannot file one suit claiming title based on a will and then be allowed to file a second lawsuit for title to the same land claiming fraud and breach of contract. He must raise all causes of action for title to the land in the same case. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Taulung, 14 FSM R. 494, 496 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Japanese survey maps, alone, contain no assurance of who should be shown as owners as they were primarily concerned with boundaries but when the Trust Territory Court cases relied on them, along with the other evidence, in reaching their decisions, the Japanese survey maps, along with the sketches and boundary descriptions, may be used to give effect to those decisions. Heirs of Livaie v. Palik, 14 FSM R. 512, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Courts have no jurisdiction to hear cases with regard to interests in land in land registration areas unless there has been a showing of special cause, and a finding by the court, that action by a court is desirable or the Land Commission has asked the court to assume jurisdiction without the Land Commission having made a determination. Mathias v. Engichy, 15 FSM R. 90, 95 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

It is generally recognized that in order to sell lineage land in Chuuk, lineage heads need the lineage members' consent. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 218 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Lineage members' consent or acquiesce to the sale of lineage land can be shown by affirmative assent, or an acquiescence, or by ratification of the act. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Japanese survey maps, alone, contain no assurance of who should be shown as owners as they were primarily concerned with boundaries. The survey maps are some evidence of ownership, but that there must be substantial evidence to support the decision of ownership. Testimony from many witnesses to determine that the appellees controlled and used the land from over ten to fifteen years prior to the survey map through the time of filing claims, in excess of fifty years, is substantial evidence. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the Land Court findings consist of testimony of a number of witnesses of a family's undisputed use, control and development of the parcel without interference for over 50 years and that family continues to do so today, the Land Court finding was based on substantial evidence to support the family's ownership, even though another's name was on the Japanese survey map and when considering the evidence in a light favorable to the appellees, the appellants, the Land Court's decision was not clearly erroneous. Heirs of Taulung v. Heirs of Wakuk, 15 FSM R. 294, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The bona fide, or "innocent," purchaser rule arises from the statutory recording requirements for interests in real estate. For all real estate in each district, the clerk of court is required to make and keep in a permanent record a copy of all documents submitted to him for recording. No transfer of or encumbrance upon title to real estate or any interest therein, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, is valid against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same real estate or interest, or any part thereof, in good faith for a valuable consideration without notice of such transfer or encumbrance, or against any person claiming under them, if the transfer to the subsequent purchaser or mortgagee is first duly recorded. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 472 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The "registration" of interests in land, pursuant to 67 TTC 119 "has the same force and effect as to such land as a recording" under 57 TTC 301. In order for a subsequent, bona fide, or "innocent," purchaser to have valid title against a prior holder of an interest in the same real estate the subsequent purchaser must "register" or "record" the interest before the prior holder. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 472 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A buyer is not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice when she executes a purchase agreement with an individual seller when an earlier determination of ownership was notice to the world, and thus to her, of the lineage's interest in the property. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 473 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Lineage heads need the adult lineage members' consent for transfers of lineage land. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 474 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The rule of law that has gained precedence in Chuuk based on customary practice, and which the court is bound to apply, does not provide for any legally recognizable means to assure that the sale of lineage land will be valid other than by proving that all living, adult members of the lineage have consented to the sale. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 474-75 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

When adult lineage members did not consent to the sale of their interest, as lineage members, in lineage land and the buyer had notice of the lineage's ownership through the February 10, 1976 determination of ownership and therefore was not a bona fide purchaser without notice, the lineage head's transfer of the property was not valid since the lineage members did not ratify the unauthorized transfer of lineage land. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 475 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A judgment affecting an interest in land becomes enforceable, by registering the judgment with the appropriate land authority. Salik v. U Corp., 15 FSM R. 534, 537 (Pon. 2008).

When it was established that a decedent's real property at issue was lineage land, it continues to be property of the lineage, and is not part of the decedent's estate. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Title to land is not generally subject to probate but transfers pursuant to a valid will to the devisees specified in the will, or if there is no valid will, to the owner's heirs according to intestate succession. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The burden at trial is on the party asserting the existence of a customary right to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

When the appellate court does not find anything in the trial court record to suggest that the trial court should have found, by a preponderance of the evidence, that appellants were granted any an alleged enduring, customary right, the trial court's finding was not clearly erroneous. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The bona fide, or "innocent," purchaser rule arises from the statutory recording requirements for interests in real estate. For all real estate in each district, the clerk of court is required to make and keep in a permanent record a copy of all documents submitted to him for recording. No transfer of or encumbrance upon title to real estate or any interest therein, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, is valid against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same real estate or interest, or any part thereof, in good faith for a valuable consideration without notice of such transfer or encumbrance, or against any person claiming under them, if the transfer to the subsequent purchaser or mortgagee is first duly recorded. The "registration" of interests in land has the same force and effect as to such land as a recording. Therefore, a subsequent, bona fide, or "innocent," purchaser has valid title against a prior holder of an interest in the same real estate if one "registers" or "records" the interest before the prior holder. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 164-65 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

An agreement granting fishing rights is not alone conclusive evidence of land ownership. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 241-42 (App. 2009).

A tenancy in common is a form of co-ownership where two or more persons have equal and undivided shares in the whole with each having an equal right to the whole, but no right of survivorship. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 372 n.1 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the sole owner of land dies his fee simple interest would be inherited by his multiple heirs who would hold that fee simple estate as a tenancy in common. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 372 n.1 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

In resolving a land claim, it is irrelevant whether kewosr is a legally-recognized tradition with the force of law today when the kewosr land transfer at issue occurred about 1912. The relevant question would thus be whether kewosr was a tradition when the kewosr occurred. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 375 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Although the presence of a person's name on the 1932 Japanese Survey Map as the owner of a parcel of land is not conclusive or dispositive of that person's ownership but may be overcome or rebutted by other evidence, when there was substantial evidence in the record before the Land Court that Mackwelung used, controlled, and occupied Yekula continuously after 1932, including evidence and testimony presented at the original 1979 Land Commission proceeding, the Land Court reasonably assessed this evidence as supporting the Mackwelungs' position that a kewosr to Sra Nuarar had taken place, and since the testimony that a previously unmentioned person had owned the land and had later transferred it to Kun Mongkeya was reasonably assessed as not credible, the evidence did not overcome the 1932 Japanese survey map. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 377 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When the boundaries described in two May 9, 1957 land use agreements, one in which Kun Mongkeya granted about ¾ hectare for use by the Kusaie Intermediate School, and in the other in which Allen Mackwelung (and Daniel Aliksa) granted four hectares for the same purpose, and which were both signed not only by the grantors but also by a Tafunsak village chief, the Chief Magistrate of Kusaie, and five members of the Land Advisory Committee of Seven, including the District Administrator and the clerk of courts, abut each other; when the Land Commission-ordered "subdivision" reflects the boundary descriptions in both agreements; and when the boundary location was corroborated by witnesses who had been present in 1957 when the boundary was marked on the ground as personally directed by Allen Mackwelung, this all constitutes substantial evidence in support of the Land Court finding that the 1957 land use agreements reflect the true ownership of the land. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 377-78 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

It was not error for the Land Court not to award one side all of the disputed land based on an option agreement that was never exercised and that only refers to a parcel situated somewhere in the disputed land and not all of it and so it does not support a claim to all of the land, even assuming it is some evidence of ownership of some part. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 378-79 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

There is no property right that is recognized by the law of the FSM as "damages." Damages is a legal term of art that refers generally to a remedy which may be granted by the court to a party in a civil action. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2009).

A land title determination that someone is "the sole owner" means just that – she is the sole owner and that the land is individually owned by her and any further language in the determination identifying the individual's lineage and lineage head is a means of identifying further who the individual is, particularly if she did not have a surname. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

Generally, what constitutes property and interests in property is purely a matter of state law. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 562 (Chk. 2009).

Lineage rights descend through the female lineage members and that patrilineal descendants, as afokur, have only permissive use rights in lineage land. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

Once all the lineage members died, the intervener, as an afokur to the lineage ceased having even permissive rights to lineage lands because once the lineage was extinct, all lineage rights ceased. The lands were then validly acquired by another person and her descendants, not as lineage members, but as heirs. Peter v. Jessy, 17 FSM R. 163, 175-76 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2010).

A court does not need the presence of all owners of all property abutting the land's purported boundaries, and any other landowners in the vicinity whose property or property lines would have to appear on a certified survey map to decide the limited issue raised by a plaintiff's cause of action for trespass, that is, to decide whether the defendant is trespassing or occupying land to which the plaintiff church has a better right to possess or occupy. The court does not need to (and without the other necessary parties cannot) determine where all of the other boundaries lie because the only issue properly before the court, and the only issue the court may rule upon without violating the due process rights of non-parties, is whether it is more likely than not that the land the plaintiff leased was owned by the lessor and because the determination of boundaries of any other parts of the land which the plaintiff does not claim a leasehold or of the boundaries of any other parcels of land in the area is not before the court. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 233-34 (Chk. 2010).

In a trespass dispute over land, the only issue properly before the court, and the only issue the court may rule upon without violating the due process rights of non-parties, is whether it is more likely than not, and not whether it is certain beyond all doubt, or whether it is certain beyond a reasonable doubt, or whether it is clear and convincing that, as between the parties, the plaintiff has the superior right to possess the land. The plaintiff only has to prove its case by a preponderance of the evidence, that is, to show that it is more likely than not that its rights are superior. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 233 & n.4 (Chk. 2010).

The Barrett decision does not stand for the proposition that a judgment is a property right which affords judgment-creditors due process rights under the national Constitution. The FSM Supreme Court has not to date, made such a determination. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 289, 299 (App. 2010).

A person may acquire a vested interest in his living parent's land in many ways, such as by a gift, by becoming a trustee, by becoming a beneficiary, or by being named in a registered or otherwise evidenced will or other testamentary device. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 325 (Kos. 2011).

In Chuuk, lineage land cannot be transferred, distributed, or sold by an individual member of the lineage without the consent of all adult members of that lineage. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 474 (App. 2011).

The bona fide purchaser rule is a rule of property law, and as such is a question of state law. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 475 (App. 2011).

Good faith is an objective standard. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 475 (App. 2011).

The bona fide purchaser rule does not apply when the land was lineage land which the seller had no authority to convey since the courts have historically been wary of applying the rule where the purported seller has no authority to sell, and when the Land Commission's determination of ownership was invalid for lack of notice to the occupants since a certificate of title must be based on a valid determination of ownership. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 476 (App. 2011).

When an earlier trial court decision and the appellate opinion affirming it clearly stated in no uncertain terms that that case only concerned a tideland and did not concern the adjacent filled land; when the appellate opinion court noted that the owner of dry land is not necessarily the owner of the adjacent tideland; and when that entire proceeding was premised on the supposition that certain persons owned the filled land that they were living on, no plausible reading of the earlier decision can support a claim that it ruled that another was the owner of the filled land because only the most twisted logic could pervert that decision, in which the filled land's ownership was presumed undisputed, into a decision that awarded title of that land to that other. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 247, 251 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2012).

The Constitution does not create property interests, property interests are created and their dimensions are defined by existing rules or understandings that stem from an independent source, such as state law, that secure certain benefits and that support claims of entitlement to those benefits. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The hallmark of property is an individual entitlement grounded in state law, which cannot be removed except for cause. Once that characteristic is found, the types of interests protected as "property" are varied and, as often as not, intangible, relating to the whole domain of social and economic fact. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Property is more than mere ownership. It includes the right to acquire, use, enjoy, and dispose of acquisitions subject only to the law of the land. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The property right created by a judgment against a government entity is not a right to payment at a particular time but merely the recognition of a continuing debt of that government entity. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Since the court, adhering to the authority vested in the judicial branch, should only interpret the laws regarding property in Chuuk and should not take over the legislative branch's role, when there has been no legislative intent shown of a specific desire to ascribe a property right to judgments, therefore, absent a specific Chuuk State legislation creating a specific property right, such a right cannot be ascribed to judgments. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Although no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law is the mandate of the constitution, a party cannot be said to be deprived of his property in a judgment because at the time he is unable to collect it. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Plaintiffs are not deprived of their judgments, so long as they continue to be existing liabilities against the entity. Therefore a failure to timely fulfill a judgment does not constitute a taking in violation of the due process clause as there continues to be an existing liability against the state. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the issued judgment s valid, it represents an existing liability against the State of Chuuk. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When no property right can be ascribed to the judgment at issue; the due process standard is not applicable. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Traditionally, when someone no longer had the right to reside on another's land, he would be allowed to dismantle the house he had built and take the materials to rebuild somewhere else because he owned the building materials. This is usually not feasible with modern houses. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Chuukese custom generally follows the rule that a person who makes improvements on property has full title to these improvements even though he does not hold title to the property on which they are made. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 n.4 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the parties had agreed to a land exchange and the defendant has built houses on the land he received but the plaintiff did not receive any land because the defendant did not have the land to exchange, instead of returning the land to the plaintiff and having the plaintiff pay the defendant the value of the houses the defendant built the most equitable remedy (and the easiest for the court to fashion) is monetary compensation to the plaintiff for the value of the land that he did not receive in an exchange agreement that provided that he was to receive in exchange land of an equal amount to the land transferred to the defendants. To effectuate justice, the defendants should pay the plaintiff the value of the land the defendants received. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the parties neglected to put any admissible evidence of land values before the court, the Asian Development Bank valuation system, although officially adopted only for governmental transactions, is evidence of Chuuk land values of which a court may take judicial notice because it is information capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386-87 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The court will not award the plaintiff the land's rental value as well as its sale price when there was no evidence before the court that the plaintiff would have or would have been able to rent that land to someone else if the defendant was not occupying it because to recover both the sale price and the rental value would be a double recovery. Double recovery is not permissible. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Land does not "earn" interest. It may increase or appreciate in value, in which case, the current fair market value includes the increase or appreciation. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Real property is land and anything growing on, attached to, or erected on it, excluding anything that may be severed without injury to the land. Real property can be either corporeal (soil and buildings) or incorporeal (easements). A factory building is thus real property. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 597 (Kos. 2013).

When, although the factory building is real property to which the secured party does not have a right to pre-judgment possession, the secured party must be afforded access to the building so that it may take possession of the chattels to which it does have a right of pre-judgment possession. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 599 (Kos. 2013).

When, if the buyer had diligently inquired into or investigated the matter, all he would have found would have been a Pohnpei Supreme Court final distribution probate order transferring title to all the shares to the seller and stating that this was the final disposition of the case at bar, it was sufficient to create a prima facie case that the buyer was without notice of any prior adverse claims to seller's ownership of the shares and since the buyer paid good and valuable consideration for the shares he was a bona fide purchaser for value. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. 2013).

In rem jurisdiction includes registration of land titles, mortgages, and probate proceedings involving land. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

No court located in Chuuk can exercise jurisdiction over land in Pohnpei. Only a court in Pohnpei can do that. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 519 (App. 2018).

A court's jurisdiction over land is in the nature of an in rem proceeding. "In rem" proceedings encompass any action in which essential purpose of suit is to determine title to or affect interests in specific property located within the territory over which court has jurisdiction. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

In rem jurisdiction includes registration of land titles, mortgages, and probate proceedings involving land. To exercise in rem jurisdiction, the property over which the court is to exercise jurisdiction must be physically present within the court's territorial jurisdiction and under its control. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

Land on Pohnpei is not physically present in the Chuuk State Supreme Court's territorial jurisdiction. Thus, neither it, nor any court in Chuuk, can exercise jurisdiction over any Pohnpei land. Only a court in

Land on Pohnpei cannot be tied up in a Chuuk probate proceeding. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

Real property, or realty, is land and anything growing on, attached to, or erected on it, except anything that can be moved without injury to the land. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

Realty – real property cannot be "converted." Any such conversion claim is misconceived. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

A litigant's "conversion" claim over real estate can be conceived as a quiet title claim. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

A home may be owned by someone other than the owner of the land on which it sits. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 155 n.1 (Chk. 2019).

A joint tenancy gives each joint tenant the right of survivorship – to automatically become sole owner of the property on the other joint tenant's death. It differs from a tenancy in common because each joint tenant has a right of survivorship to the other's share. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.1 (Chk. 2019).

When a co-ownership is not a joint tenency (with right of survivorship), it is a tenancy in common. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.1 (Chk. 2019).

A tenancy in common is a form of co-ownership where two or more persons have equal and undivided shares in the whole with each having an equal right to the whole, but no right of survivorship. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.2 (Chk. 2019).

A co-owner's trespass case will be dismissed for failure to join the land's other co-owner as an indispensable party plaintiff because any judgment rendered in the other co-owner's absence would prejudice the defendant(s). This is because the other co-owner could later sue for the same trespass, thus subjecting the defendant(s) to multiple judgments for the same acts; because even a judgment in the defendant's favor would not prevent another co-owner from suing for the same acts; because no protective provisions could be included in a judgment that would lessen the defendant's prejudice; and because the plaintiff has an adequate remedy since the dismissal is without prejudice, and he may then refile the case with all the other co-owners included as plaintiffs. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 (Chk. 2019).

In a claim for damages to land, such as trespass, all the affected land's co-owners are indispensable parties to the action and must be joined if they are not already parties; otherwise the defendant faces the substantial risk that it may be subject to multiple or inconsistent judgments if any of the other co-owners later sue. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.4 (Chk. 2019).

When the plaintiff's averments in his proposed first amended complaint do not cure the complaint's indispensable party problem, the best course is to dismiss this case without prejudice to any future litigation by all of the land's co-owners (whoever they then are), claiming that the defendants are trespassing on the land. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 243 (Chk. 2019).

The enactment of FSM Code, Title 30 falls squarely within the Congress's express powers as delegated by the FSM Constitution. That 30 F.S.M.C. 137 deals with the FSM Development Bank's ability to acquire title to land places this activity squarely in the category of indisputedly national government powers. To function, the Bank must be able to deal with mortgages, as well as deeds and land titles, as land is the primary collateral possessed by most Micronesians. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321,

The states generally have power over land law and other local issues including personal property law, inheritance law, and domestic law including marriage, divorce, and adoption. However, where the national government concurrently has the power to acquire title to land within the FSM under powers expressly delegated to it, and state law purports to restrict it, the state law must fail as applied to the national government. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 331-32 (Pon. 2019).

Neither Secretarial Order No. 2969 nor Secretarial Order No. 3039 relates to privately held land, nor do they dictate how the FSM as a nation should structure its government to deal with issues related to private lands and their title, transfer, and ownership. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 332 (Pon. 2019).

A litigant's judgments against Chuuk are not vested property rights, and Chuuk's failure to pay those judgments is not a due process or civil rights violation. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

When the only basis the plaintiff asserts for subject-matter jurisdiction is that his state court judgments are property and the state's failure to pay is a taking of his property without due process, the plaintiff's suit does not involve subject matter over which the FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction because the plaintiff's state court judgments are not property, and the state's failure to pay his judgments against it does not violate his due process or civil rights. Suzuki v. Chuuk, 22 FSM R. 491, 494 (Chk. 2020).

While the Chuuk Constitution provides the Chuuk State Supreme Court with concurrent jurisdiction over land disputes, Article VII, § 3(d) of the Chuuk Constitution allows the specific court to be prescribed by statute. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Adverse Possession

Adverse possession must continue unabated for 20 years in order for the doctrine of adverse possession to be applicable in a land case. Similarly, the common law doctrine of prescriptive right is inapplicable if the 20-year statutory period is not completed. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 416 (Pon. 1984).

There was not the kind of consistent assertion of ownership, as distinguished from right of use, that would allow the doctrine of adverse possession to apply in this case. Heirs of Likiaksa v. Heirs of Lonno, 3 FSM R. 465, 468 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

For the state to acquire an easement by prescription, the state's use must by open, notorious, hostile, and continuous for the statutory period under a claim of right. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 154 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

In order for an action over an interest in land to be barred by the statute of limitations, the cause of action must arise more than twenty years before the action is brought. If the claim could have been made over twenty years before it was actually made, then the action can no longer be maintained, no matter how meritorious. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 194 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

When 38 years have elapsed since the determination of ownership of a tract of land in the Wito Clan, when there have been public notices posted concerning the determination and concerning its later lease to the Trust Territory; two separate High Court decisions and three determinations of ownership concerning the land, and when construction activity on he land began 36 years ago; this constitutes both constructive and actual notice of the Wito Clan's claim to the land to another clan whose numerous members lived on the same small island. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 195 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Adverse possession is a doctrine under which one can acquire ownership of land if he, without the owner's permission, uses the land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously and under a claim of right, and the owner does not challenge such action until after the statute of limitations has run. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 389 (Pon. 1994).

Because the Trust Territory statute of limitations did not go into effect until May 28, 1951 the 20-year period of unchallenged possession necessary to make out a claim for title to land under adverse possession cannot be met if possession was challenged before May 28, 1971. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 389 (Pon. 1994).

It is a general principle that members of a family may not acquire adverse possession against each other in the absence of a clear, positive, and continued disclaimer and disavowal of title, and an assertion of adverse right brought home to the true owner a sufficient length of time to bar him under the statute of limitations from asserting his rights. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 390 (Pon. 1994).

For adverse possession to be shown, the statute of limitations under which a challenge to possession can be made must have expired. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 390 (Pon. 1994).

Adverse possession is a method, which is not favored, of acquiring title to property, which has been defined as the open and notorious possession and occupation of real property under an evident claim or color of right. This possession must be exclusive and in opposition to the true owner of the land. Usually adverse possession is controlled by statute, including the length of time needed to qualify, which is often the same as the statute of limitation. Cheni v. Ngusun, 6 FSM R. 544, 547 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

One may not claim adverse possession against the government. Cheni v. Ngusun, 6 FSM R. 544, 548 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Where government title to the tidelands reverted to the traditional owners in 1989, and because the right to bring an action for trespass or ejection must be available to the owner before the time period for adverse possession has run, whether the doctrine of adverse possession exists in Chuukese land law need not be decided because the twenty-year statute of limitations did not start to run until 1989. Cheni v. Ngusun, 6 FSM R. 544, 548 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The doctrine of adverse possession is unrelated to the defense of laches. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 176 n.8 (Pon. 1995).

Adverse possession refers to the acquisition of the full benefit of a piece of property, whereas profit à prendre refers to the acquisition of a right of entry and the right to remove and take from the land the designated products or profits. Etscheit v. Nahnken of Nett, 7 FSM R. 390, 393 n.3 (Pon. 1996).

In addition to actual possession for the twenty-year statutory period, adverse possession requires the possessor's occupancy to have been open and notorious, exclusive, continuous and under a claim of right. Thus, a party claiming property rights based on adverse possession must demonstrate that he came onto the land with the intent of taking complete and exclusive control of the property. Etscheit v. Nahnken of Nett, 7 FSM R. 390, 395 (Pon. 1996).

Parties that claim they entered the land with permission to do exactly what they were doing, and did not take any affirmative steps to assert outright ownership, cannot be said to have been in "adverse" possession of the land in dispute. Etscheit v. Nahnken of Nett, 7 FSM R. 390, 396 (Pon. 1996).

Adverse possession is a doctrine under which one can acquire ownership of land if he, without the owner's permission, uses the land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously and under claim of right, and the owner does not challenge such action until after the statute of limitations has run. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

The applicable statute of limitations period for adverse possession is twenty years. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

The adverse possession element of "under claim of right" means that the claimant intends to hold the land as his own to the exclusion of all others. It has the same meaning as "hostile." Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

When the requisite element of hostility is absent from a party's assertion of adverse possession it is irrelevant whether the party had occupied the land for twenty years before the certificate of title was issued because their occupation was not hostile. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

The FSM Supreme Court does not acknowledge that ownership in land can be gained by adverse possession because when a party cannot satisfy elements to make out claim of adverse possession it is unnecessary to decide whether to recognize that doctrine. Even in those jurisdictions in which adverse possession is recognized, it is not favored as a method of acquiring title. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

An argument that a certificate of title is invalid because of an adverse possession claim must fail when the twenty years necessary for adverse possession has not passed. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

When parties' claim to possession of land changes from permission of someone without authority to give permission to hostility an adverse possession claim will fail if the period of hostility has not yet run twenty years. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 240 (App. 1998).

Profit à prendre, the right to enter land for cultivation and to take the products of such cultivation, is an interest separate from ownership. It may be created by either grant or prescription. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 240 (App. 1998).

Acquisition by prescription of the right to profit à prendre requires the same claim of right or hostility as required to gain ownership by adverse possession. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 240 (App. 1998).

When a party's possession of land was not hostile so as to give rise to an adverse possession or to a profit à prendre claim, failure to give the party notice is not a violation of the party's due process rights. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 240 (App. 1998).

A party's claim to land after a municipality has continued its open, notorious, exclusive and hostile occupation of the land for a period of 27 years before he files suit is barred by the twenty-year statute of limitations, and the municipality is the true and lawful owner of title to the land in dispute on the theory of adverse possession. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

Adverse possession is an acknowledged doctrine under the common law which is fully applicable in Chuuk state court. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

The presumptive rights in land arising from long possession and use, together with delay on the part of the lawful owner in asserting his title, have often been found to be sufficient grounds for taking title from a legal owner and granting it to the user. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

The doctrine of adverse possession provides that long-continued peaceful possession under claim of right is a strong indication of ownership. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

If a person of full age and sound mind stands by, or he and his predecessors in interest together have stood by, for twenty years or more and let someone else openly and actively use land under claim of ownership for that period or more, the person who so stood by will ordinarily be held to have lost whatever rights he may previously have had in the land and the courts will not, and should not, assist him in regaining such rights. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

To avoid trouble, a person who believes he owns certain land and raises no objection to someone else using it, should at least obtain some clear and definite acknowledgment of his ownership by the user's word or acts at intervals of less than twenty years. If he cannot obtain such an acknowledgment, he should bring the matter to the court for determination before the use has continued for more than twenty years either from the time it began or from the time of the last such acknowledgment. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

When in 1968 the Trust Territory entered the land in question and, pursuant to 6 TTC 302, acquired title by adverse possession 20 years later in 1988, Chuuk is the successor to the title. Sefich v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 517, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When the defendants have failed to show the elements of adverse possession have been met and have thus failed to show that they own or have a right to possess the property they presently occupy, the defendants' claim of long use and occupation of the land does not create a genuine issue as to a material fact since the defendants failed to establish that they acquired ownership or a right to possession. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 103 (Pon. 2002).

An adverse possession claim will never prevail over a validly-issued certificate of title. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

Since someone claiming land by adverse possession must prove that his possession was open, notorious, hostile, continuous, and exclusive for the required statutory (twenty-year) time limit, failure to prove any one of these elements causes the whole claim to fail. A court's conclusion concerning another's continuous use of the land can only mean that the claimant, at a minimum, failed to show that his claimed possession was "exclusive" for any twenty-year period. His failure to prove that element is enough so that the lower court did not need to further discuss adverse possession because his adverse possession claim had failed at that point. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 288 (App. 2003).

Adverse possession is not a claim that can be made against registered land, or land that has been one step (determination of boundaries) away from being registered land since 1981, and the filing of a trespass suit tolls (suspends) any running of the time period needed to assert an adverse possession claim. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99e (Chk. 2004).

The doctrine of adverse possession does not apply when the use of the land was made with the owner's permission. Heirs of Nena v. Sigrah, 14 FSM R. 283, 286 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The doctrine of adverse possession requires continuous use of the land for at least twenty years. An adverse possession claim must fail when the twenty years necessary for adverse possession has not passed. Heirs of Nena v. Sigrah, 14 FSM R. 283, 286 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In order to successfully assert a claim that property rights have been acquired through adverse possession, a party must establish that he entered the land at issue and remained in possession of the land for the entire statutory period of 20 years. In addition to actual possession for the statutory period, adverse possession requires the possessor's occupancy to have been open and notorious, exclusive, continuous and under a claim of right. Thus, a party claiming property rights based on adverse possession must demonstrate that he came onto the land with the intent of taking complete and exclusive control of the property. Heirs of Obet v. Heirs of Wakap, 15 FSM R. 141, 145 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Persons claiming land by adverse possession must show they had actual, exclusive, continuous, open and notorious possession under a claim of right for the statutory period of limitations, twenty years, before successfully asserting ownership of the land under this doctrine. Heirs of Obet v. Heirs of Wakap, 15 FSM R. 141, 145 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Once a claim is filed in court, the time set under a statute of limitations stops running. This means that a claim for adverse possession does not include the time after an action has been filed in a court. Therefore, the 20-year period for the claimants to occupy land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously, and under a claim of right must run prior to the time claims were filed. Heirs of Obet v. Heirs of Wakap, 15 FSM R. 141, 145 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The appellants did not cite any facts in the record to show that they exclusively and continuously possessed the land for any twenty year period prior to the time the claims were filed when the testimony showed that the appellees gave permission for others to use the land, that the appellees sometimes occupied the land, and that the appellees placed markers claiming ownership at the time of the survey. This evidence shows that the appellants did not have exclusive and continuous possession of the land. Heirs of Obet v. Heirs of Wakap, 15 FSM R. 141, 145 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

All elements of adverse possession must be demonstrated before title is issued based on this doctrine and when the appellants did not prove all of the elements, their claim of ownership based on adverse possession could not be upheld. Heirs of Obet v. Heirs of Wakap, 15 FSM R. 141, 145 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Adverse possession is a disfavored method or doctrine of acquiring title to land. To prove a adverse possession claim, a claimant must demonstrate that the occupation was without the owner's permission, the land was used openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously and under claim of right, and that the owner did not challenge such action until after the statute of limitations had run. A claimant must prove all elements of adverse possession before title is issued based on the doctrine. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 165 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The adverse possession element of "under claim of right" means that the claimant intends to hold the land as his own to the exclusion of all others. It has the same meaning as "hostile." Adverse possession does not apply when the use of the land is with the owner's permission. The consistent assertion of ownership necessary for a claim of adverse possession must, therefore, be distinguished from a mere right of use. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

When the requisite element of hostility is absent from a party's assertion of adverse possession, it is irrelevant whether the party had occupied the land for twenty years before the certificate of title was issued because the occupation was not hostile. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A trial court finding that the appellants occupied the land during the prior ownership under a right of use will not be overruled unless it is clearly erroneous, and when there is nothing in the record to indicate that the appellants ever challenged the ownership of the land, the court will not overturn the trial court's ruling against the claim for adverse possession without anything to indicate error in the trial court's finding that the appellants' use was permissive. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

An adverse possession claim will never prevail over a validly issued certificate of title. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Adverse possession is a doctrine under which one can acquire ownership of land if he, without the owner's permission, uses the land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously, and under claim of right, and the owner does not challenge such action until after the statute of limitations has run. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 476 (App. 2011).

For an adverse possession claim, the occupation must be without permission, open, notorious, and exclusive. Thus when the occupation of the land was permissive and non-hostile, the occupants have not adversely possessed the land. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 476-77 (App. 2011).

Adverse possession is a doctrine under which one can acquire ownership of land if he, without the owner's permission, uses the land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously and under claim of right, and the owner does not challenge such action until after the statute of limitations has run. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 657 (App. 2011).

Land Court proceedings are the time and place adverse possession can and should be raised since Land Court jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title of land and any interests therein. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 657 (App. 2011).

Land has a "true owner" or a rightful owner or a legal owner before any Land Court proceedings have been conducted even though it may be uncertain until the proceedings have concluded just who that owner is. A land occupant asserting adverse possession would have to prove that all the elements of adverse possession were satisfied against whoever would be the true owner or against all persons who could possibly be the true owner. Some authorities state that the possessor does not hold adversely unless he intends to hold against the whole world, including the rightful owner, but the really significant fact is that he hold against, that is, not in subordination to the rights of the legal owner. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

Once an owner has a certificate of title to land, that ownership can never be lost through adverse possession. Under a Torrens land title registration system, such as the one in Kosrae, an adverse possession claim will never prevail over a validly-issued certificate of title. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

Claims founded on adverse possession or prescription, are not permitted to come into existence once the title has been registered. Once a title is registered, it is impossible thereafter to acquire title to the registered land by holding adversely to the registered owner. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

One of the attractions of a land registration system (as opposed to a land recordation system) and one of the great benefits of land title registration (as opposed to title recordation) is that once a landowner has gone through the laborious process of validly registering title to land, that landowner and that landowner's successors can never lose that land to an adverse possession claim. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

The proper time and place to make adverse possession claims, if a land occupant has one, is in a Land Court (or other) proceeding before the land title has been registered. Afterward is too late. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

Adverse possession is a disfavored method or doctrine for acquiring title to land and a claimant must prove all the elements of adverse possession before title can be issued based on that doctrine. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

Adverse possession is a doctrine under which one can acquire ownership of land if that individual, absent the owner's permission, uses the land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously and under claim of right, coupled with a requirement that the owner does not challenge such action until after the statute of limitation has run. The applicable statute of limitation period for adverse possession is twenty years. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 58 (App. 2016).

In order to successfully assert a claim that property rights have become vested through adverse possession, a claimant must establish that he entered the land in issue and remained in possession of it for the entire twenty-year statutory period, and such possession, pursuant to a claim of right, must be continuous (i.e. uninterrupted, as far as being challenged by the owner). Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 58 (App. 2016).

When, in 1990, the Land Commission conducted preliminary and formal hearings, with contested ownership claims in order to determine ownership rights; when others expanded their boundaries, encroaching, and overlapping on the land in 2005; and when there were Land Court status conferences conducted to determine ownership rights during 2011, the requisite twenty-year "continuous" unchallenged time period needed for adverse possession was suspended by these interludes. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 58-59 (App. 2016).

In order to uphold a claim of ownership based on adverse possession, all elements of adverse possession must be demonstrated. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 59 (App. 2016).

– Deeds

Where two clauses within an agreement are inconsistent, the court should attempt to interpret the agreement so that each provision has meaning, but the paramount rule is that the deed must be construed so as to give effect to the intention of the parties as collected from the whole instrument. Melander v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 324, 327 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

A court interpreting a deed should attempt to determine the meaning of the words used rather than what the signatory later says he intended. Melander v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 324, 328 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Where fraud or mistake are involved, the court can reform or cancel a deed, but relief will be denied in either situation if the misunderstanding of the aggrieved party was caused by his unexplained failure to read the necessary documents. Melander v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 324, 329 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Where Trust Territory law in 1956 did not allow non-citizens to acquire land except as heirs or devisees, a deed from a landowner to her non-citizen children is invalid because the grantor was still living, and therefore her children were neither heirs or devisees. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 385-86 (Pon. 1994).

Where there is an issue of fact regarding the authenticity of a deed, summary judgment will not be granted to the parties claiming under the deed, and both sides will be allowed to present evidence on the issue. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 389 (Pon. 1994).

When a deed may be legally insufficient to transfer a property because of an inaccurate recitation of its size it may still be relied on as an expression of the intent of the parties at the time. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 7 FSM R. 375, 379 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

On Pohnpei, German land deeds were issued only for land taken from the Nahnmwarkis and distributed to ethnic Pohnpeians. The lack of a German land deed for land acquired in another way and thus not subject to German deeds is not an infirmity of title. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 588 (App. 1996).

A court interpreting a deed should attempt to determine the meaning of the words used. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 399 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A court interpreting a deed should attempt to determine the meaning of the words used rather than what the signatory or a relative later says he intended. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 547 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a quitclaim deed conveys all of the seller's rights, title and interest in a parcel to a buyer, his children and all his future heirs; when there is no reference made to the plaintiffs or to reservation of any rights for the plaintiffs; and when the quitclaim deed clearly indicates the parties' intent: the sale of all rights, title and interest in the parcel for $3000; the quitclaim deed was not made especially for the benefit of third persons. As the plaintiffs were not the intended beneficiaries on the contract, and do not satisfy the requirements of third party beneficiaries, they cannot recover on the breach of contract claim. Benjamin v.

Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 547 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When there is no reference to a "portion" or "part" or "subdivision" of a parcel in a deed and no language in it that would suggest the grantor's intent to transfer only a portion of the parcel to the grantees although it recites 682 square meters as the area, the clear inference drawn is that the Kosrae Land Court analyzed the deeds and determined that the grantor's intent was to transfer the entire parcel and not just a portion thereof, the Kosrae Land Court, in issuing the certificates of title utilized the full area of the parcel, as reflected in the prior grantor's certificate of title and as reflected in the cadastral plat map. The title to the entire 958 square meter parcel was effectively and validly transferred by the quitclaim deed. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 548 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Deeds, in describing or identifying the land affected in the transaction, may simply reference an appropriate parcel number on the official map. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 549 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A deed is effective when it is delivered. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 549 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a certificate of title was never issued to Tulpe Alokoa for parcel 006-K-07 and she was never determined by a Land Commission proceeding to be the title holder of that parcel and therefore could not transfer title to land that she did not own, her deed of gift was invalid, and should have been rejected for filing by the Land Commission. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A deed of gift that only described the gifted land as a "portion of 006-K-07" with no description of boundaries, no reference to a map or drawing of the portion, and no designation of the area of the portion on the deed of gift, is defective due to its failure to adequately describe or identify the affected land because a deed, to be valid, must describe or otherwise identify the land affected. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108-09 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A land purchase agreement's intent and effect was to transfer title to the lot to the State upon execution of the agreement; otherwise there would have been no need to include a clause requiring that the land be deeded back to the seller if she was not paid in full by a date certain. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 226 (Chk. 2006).

Forfeitures are abhorrent to the law, and are construed strictly. Because the law abhors a forfeiture, the language effecting defeasance in a deed must clearly spell that fact out. Uehara v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 221, 227 (Chk. 2006).

Since under Chuukese customary law, any contract may be oral, that the deed was an inadequate writing to convey land is irrelevant. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When credible evidence in the record more clearly supported the conclusion that Naau, Fonomu, and Ipis were three separate and distinct parcels of land, a 1910 German administration deed indicating the ownership of Naau was not germane since it did not involve the disputed island, Fonomu. Narruhn v. Aisek, 16 FSM R. 236, 241 (App. 2009).

When the deed conveying the land to the national government, only required it to "commence" development within five years, an argument that development of the land was not "completed" within that finite period of time, is without merit. FSM v. Falan, 20 FSM R. 59, 61 (Pon. 2015).

A deed of trust is a deed conveying title to real property to a trustee as security until the grantor repays a loan. Edmond v. FSM Dev. Bank, 22 FSM R. 77, 79 n.1 (App. 2018).

When, despite the use of the words "will" and "inherited," a document titled "Deed of Will" can only be an inter vivos deed transferring, on the date it was executed, whatever interest the grantor had on that date in the land to his son, because, if it were meant to be a will, it would undoubtedly have included bequests to some or all of the grantor's other children and mention other holdings, but it does not. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

– Easements

Read in the light of its legislative history, article XIII, section 5 of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia was intended to cover leases, not easements, and therefore an easement that is indefinite in term does not violate this constitutional section. Melander v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 324, 330 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

For the state to acquire an easement by prescription, the state's use must by open, notorious, hostile, and continuous for the statutory period under a claim of right. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 154 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Utility poles do not constitute trespass on land when the owner consented to their placement, accepted compensation for crop damage, and signed an agreement which effectively granted an easement for placement of utility poles. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 155-56 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Encroachment of a road on adjacent parcels is a trespass when the state has not used the property without interruption for the statutory period, nor for a period of time that would make the assertion of plaintiff's rights unfair. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 156 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Easements are not indefinite land use agreements prohibited by the Constitution because "indefinite land use agreement" is a term of art referring to Trust Territory leases for an indefinite term. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 423 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

An easement for a road is not an indefinite land use agreement prohibited by the Constitution because it is perpetual. It is not indefinite in that it is effective into perpetuity. Nena v. Kosrae (I), 6 FSM R. 251, 254 (App. 1993).

An easement may be created for a permanent duration, or, as it is sometimes stated, in fee, which will ordinarily continue in operation and be enforceable forever. The grant of a permanent easement is for as definite a term as the grant of a fee simple estate. Both are permanent and not for a definite term. Nena v. Kosrae (II), 6 FSM R. 437, 439 (App. 1994).

A grant of a permanent or perpetual easement is definite in the same sense that a grant of a fee simple estate is definite – it is a permanent transfer of an interest in land. Nena v. Kosrae (III), 6 FSM R. 564, 568 (App. 1994).

Although no Trust Territory statute expressly authorizes easements, they are recognized by clear implication in the Trust Territory Code. Island Cable TV v. Gilmete, 9 FSM R. 264, 266 (Pon. 1999).

Under Kosrae State Code § 11.615(3), land held under a certificate of title may be subject to a right of way whether or not the right of way is stated in the certificate of title. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 518 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A pre-existing right of way, such as an access road, passes with and remains necessarily attached to a parcel until it is cut off in a lawful manner Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 518-19 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A holder or user of an existing right of way does not have the right to widen or modify the right of way without the landowner's consent. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 519 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

An easement by prescription is a doctrine under which one can acquire ownership of land if he, without the owner's permission, uses the land openly, notoriously, exclusively and continuously for the statutory period under a claim of right. The statutory period for easement by prescription, which is an action for the recovery for an interest in land, is twenty years. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 519 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A preexisting easement or other right appurtenant to the land remains appurtenant, even if it is not described in the certificate of title. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 424, 426 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When, pursuant to state law, parties were granted and therefore maintain a permanent land use right to access a parcel and use a portion thereof for maintenance of their existing gravesites, this permanent land use right passes with the parcel until it is extinguished in a lawful manner independent of the certificate of title. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 424, 427 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the subject parcel was utilized for gravesites pursuant to a verbal land use right, prior to the certificate of title's issuance, and the land was utilized by the defendants for many years without interference by the plaintiff, the land use right granted to the defendants for their burial sites was necessarily a permanent right. When the permission granted to the defendants to utilize the parcels included construction of permanent burial sites and necessarily included permission for continuing access and care of the burial sites, by virtue of the permanent nature of burial sites, the defendants' rights pertaining to access and care for the burial sites are rights appurtenant to the parcel and pass with the parcel. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 14 FSM R. 91, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A permissive land use right, often referred to as an easement or right of way, constitutes a valid property interest in Kosrae. Land use rights in Kosrae are frequently granted verbally, particularly when the land use agreements are between family members. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 397 (App. 2007).

Kosrae State Code § 11.615(4), which governs the issuance of certificates of title, establishes that a preexisting easement or other right of way over the land remains appurtenant even if it is not described in the certificate; and passes with the land until cut off or extinguished in a lawful manner independent of the certificate. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 397 (App. 2007).

When the Trust Territory judgment that the appellant relies upon explicitly states that the judgment will not affect any rights of way there may be over the lands in question and when it is undisputed that the appellees were granted their right of way prior to the Trust Territory judgment, the Trust Territory judgment did nothing to alter the preexisting right of way. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 397-98 (App. 2007).

In general, an easement granted without a specified term is considered to be of permanent duration and may continue in operation forever and is not extinguished by the grantor's death. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 398 (App. 2007).

A grant of a right of way does not constitute a trespass because trespass laws are intended to protect those who have a right to possess and use land, and the doctrine of trespass does not act to prohibit the grantees' usage of land provided that they stay within the easement or right of way granted to them. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 398 (App. 2007).

When the appellees' general right to enter the land to tend to existing burial sites is established by the undisputed facts but the same cannot be said of the ten-foot buffer zone that was ordered to be maintained around the exiting burial sites since the trial court did not elaborate as to the exact operation of this "perimeter"; when the undisputed facts which establish the right of way do not support such a precisely defined area being designated; when the case relied upon by the trial court is factually distinguishable and does not alone justify the trial court's mandate of such a large buffer zone; and when the invocation of custom remains as the only basis for the trial court's order but the trial court was not provided supporting evidence of a custom or tradition involving such a specifically demarcated perimeter around burial sites, this single issue will be remanded to the trial court with instructions to strike the portion of its order that provides a 10-foot perimeter around the existing burial sites. The trial court may then receive supporting evidence of custom or tradition about the size of perimeters around graves and thereafter may enter an amended order based upon its findings. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 399 (App. 2007).

A proposed settlement is unimportant and only confuses the issues since even if the settlement made no issue of ingress or egress, the November 1997 court order ruled in favor of the appellant's right of way through the subject parcel onto his land behind it, ordering the appellee and his family members to refrain from any acts that may interfere with ingress or egress of appellant and his family members on the subject parcel. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 263 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

"Rights of way" over land are such things as roads, footpaths, and utility easements. A "right of way" is the right to pass through property owned by another or the strip of land subject to a nonowner's right to pass through. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 302 (App. 2014).

The Kosrae Land Court is entitled to determine an easement or right of way, because the land registration process is, with certain exceptions, supposed to determine all interests in the land, not just ownership interests. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 187 (App. 2015).

By statute, a certificate of title must show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year and the certificate is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them. A "right of way" over land is a thing such as a road, or footpath, or utility easement. A "right of way" is the right to pass through property owned by another or the strip of land subject to a nonowner's right to pass through. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

Any rights of way there may be over the land in question need not be stated in the certificate of title. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

A certificate of title's failure to mention the roadway or government right of way cannot extinguish the government's ownership of the roadway right of way. That right remained vested in the state government. When the government owned a right of way across the land that predated the current owners' ownership of the land, that right of way existed on the land when the land was homesteaded and thus still existed after a later buyer bought part of that homestead lot. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

The certificate of title statute does not exempt mineral rights if they are not mentioned. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 n.1 (Chk. 2016).

The government owners and users of a right of way across land are not liable for the landowners' neighbors' alleged encroachment on the land. Any remedy for that alleged encroachment, the landowners must seek from their neighbors. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 656 (Chk. 2016).

An easement that provides ingress and egress to a parcel, necessarily touches and concerns that parcel, with that parcel being the dominant estate or tenement and the parcel over which the easement runs, being the subservient estate or tenement. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 172-73 (Pon. 2017).

By Chuuk state law, a public utility may enter on any private land to dig out and replace or redistribute at the landowner's instruction earth or soil for the maintenance of any pipe or line, but the landowner's instruction is required only if the soil is to be redistributed. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 422 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

No trespass was committed when the public utility already had an easement over the pipes that it replaced on the plaintiff's land, and the law did not require instruction from the land owner since the soil that the utility dug up to replace the pipes was never redistributed – it was placed over the pipes again. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

No trespass was committed when the public utility placed primary utility poles to connect the general public in that area to electricity because the landowner's right to possessory interest remains subject to the public utility's right to use the soil above and below the land for public utility purposes. Thus, no interference with the land owner's possessory interest occurred. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

A public utility did not create a nuisance when it installed primary electric poles and replaced pipes because neither qualify as unreasonable conduct nor an abnormally dangerous activity. Public utilities often engage in the installation and replacement of utilities to provide the entire community with a higher standard of living. Neither create any realistic danger to the landowner or surrounding landowners and they provide benefits to the community. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423-24 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Chuuk state law requires a public utility to consult with the land owner and announce entry before it works on public utilities – but provides no relief for failure to consult. Due process requires consultation with the landowner before installing a new structure on the land (or extending another easement through that land), but the replacement of existing pipes falls outside that due process requirement since that easement already existed. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The respect for real property, as implicitly recognized under the Chuuk Constitution, requires that if the real property owner is known, a public utility must consult with the landowner before creating a new easement over a land – in part to alleviate the landowner's concerns and to create a practical easement which limits the easement's effect on the owner. But consultation with the real landowner may sometimes be impossible; so when the real property owner is absent or unknown, a public utility company may broadcast two radio announcements about its intent to place a new structure on a particular parcel of land and invite any parties who might have an ownership claim to attend a consultation meeting. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Eminent Domain

A motion for removal will be denied where, in an action in eminent domain under Truk State law the only defense available are those relating to the taking, and the counterclaims asserted as a basis for national court jurisdiction do not fall within a defense to the taking. Chuuk v. Land Known as Mononong, 5 FSM R. 272, 273 (Chk. 1992).

The acquisition of interests in private land by the state for a public purpose without the consent of the interested parties is permitted under the Kosrae Constitution, Article XI, § 5, which requires specific procedures to be followed, which are set forth in Kosrae State Code § 11.103. The state must first negotiate with each interested party, provide a written statement of the public purpose for which the interest is sought and negotiate in good faith. If the negotiations are not successful, the state may begin a court action to acquire the interest in land. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 519 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Since the state's statutory authority to acquire interests in land through court action has never been utilized to forcibly purchase an interest in private land for a public purpose, the court cannot conclude that the state is likely to prevail on the merits of its claim due to a complete absence of court decisions applying or interpreting this authority. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 519 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under the Chuuk Eminent Domain statute, the applicable Rules of Civil Procedures for the Chuuk State Supreme Court govern the procedure for the condemnation of private lands under the power of eminent domain, except as otherwise provided in the statute. In re Lot No. 029-A-16, 18 FSM R. 422, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the only relief pleaded by the respondent in his answer that could possibly be considered a counterclaim was his prayer for attorney's fees and costs and when the eminent domain statute precludes this type of relief, even if this part of the respondent's prayer for relief is considered a counterclaim, it is a counterclaim that the statute clearly forbids and therefore should not hinder a dismissal under Rule 41(a)(2). In re Lot No. 029-A-16, 18 FSM R. 422, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

In an eminent domain case, just compensation must be fully tendered before a taking may occur and the Chuuk government must deposit in court, for the benefit of the landowners entitled thereto, the amount of just compensation stated in the declaration. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 458 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The statutory provision adopting the Asian Development Bank Valuation System in the Governor's Executive Order 04-2007 and recognizing it as the prevailing land valuation system for all government land transactions only applied to land values without regard to any permanent structures that the landowner may also own on the condemned property. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The Chuuk eminent domain statute and its provision allowing the court to increase (or decrease) a land's valuation by 10% applies only to the taking of the land and the land valuation and it does not apply to permanent structures erected on the land that the state is taking. The 10% increase possible for any other reasonable factor could include such improvements to the land itself such as the installation of a drainage system, or leveling the land in preparation for building, or adding retaining walls or lateral support. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Even if the Trust Territory statute requiring payment for the improvements on land taken by eminent domain, 67 TTC 453 and 454, has been repealed by implication (it was not expressly repealed), the constitutional provision requiring just compensation for property taken would require compensation for a permanent structure on the land at its fair market value. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Since, under the Transition Clause, a statute in force in the State of Chuuk on the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution continues in effect to the extent it is consistent with the Chuuk Constitution or until it is amended or repealed, both 67 TTC 453 and 454 remain as Chuuk state law until amended or repealed since both are consistent with the Chuuk Constitution which requires "just compensation," and since they have not been repealed by implication because they occupy gaps in the recently enacted Chuuk eminent domain statute. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

An award of reasonable relocation or business interruption expenses may be the better view since such damages could be calculated with greater certainty than "lost profits," which would be too speculative. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 460 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the parties, by their settlement agreement, have liquidated all damages and compensation claims between them including the respondent's lost profits claim, the issue of whether the respondent in an eminent domain action can obtain damages for lost profits is moot. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 460 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A respondent in an eminent domain action cannot recover attorney's fees under a private attorney general theory since the court's ruling monetarily benefits only him. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 460 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Attorney's fees and expenses are not recoverable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) in an eminent domain case filed by the petitioner state since it is not a civil rights case and the respondent is receiving the process due him under the Chuuk statute and Constitution and thus his civil rights have not been violated In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 460 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Since the Chuuk eminent domain statute specifically prohibits an award for the expenses of litigation for either side in an eminent domain case, no attorney's fees or other costs of litigation can be awarded in an eminent domain case. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 460 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

– Gifts

On Kosrae, usru is a gift of land by a parent to one's children, and kewosr is an outright gift of land from a man to a favored lover. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

There must be a clear, unmistakable, and unequivocal intention on the part of a donor to make a gift of his property in order to constitute a valid, effective gift inter vivos. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 180 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Gifts inter vivos must be fully and completely executed – that is, there must be a donative intent to transfer title to the property, a delivery by the donor, and an acceptance by the donee. The intention to make a gift must be executed by a complete and unconditional delivery. Elaija v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 175, 180 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Gifts inter vivos, during the life of the owner, must be fully and completely executed. In other words, there must be donative intent to transfer title to the property, a delivery by the donor, and an acceptance by the donee. The intention to make a gift must be executed by a complete and unconditional delivery. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 106 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the certificate holder and owner, did not complete or submit any document of transfer for the subject portion of the parcel to the defendant and he did not survey or arrange for the survey of the subject portion of the parcel claimed by the defendant, there was no compliance with the statutory provisions governing a transfer of interest in land or transfer of interest in a portion of parcel by the certificate holder, and therefore, pursuant to state law, there was no gift of land made from the certificate holder to the defendant. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 107 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

– Improvements

Where the court cannot compel the state to honor an illegal and/or unconstitutional lease it can order the state to restore the illegally held land, with any and all public improvements removed, to its rightful owner who may also be entitled to damages. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Individuals have full title to the improvements (as distinguished from the soil) made upon land owned by a land-owning group or "corporation." In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 330 (Chk. 1994).

Under Pohnpei law, damage to reefs or soil under the high water mark resulting from dredging activities, the object of which is for public purposes, does not justify compensation to abutting land owners. If the Pohnpei Public Land Board of Trustees had granted certain rights in writing to an individual or group of individuals, and acting on that grant the grantees erected or constructed certain improvements, including fish maii (fish trap) in shallow waters, and if destroyed or value reduced as a result of state dredging activities, the owners thereof may be entitled to just compensation in accordance with the Pohnpei Constitution. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 69 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

A person may make improvements to land he possesses even if he does not own the land. The issue of making improvements is a matter between the owner of the land and possessor of the land. James v.

Lelu Town, 10 FSM R. 648, 649 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Individuals may have full title to the improvements (as distinguished from the soil) they make upon land not owned by them. Bank of the FSM v. Aisek, 13 FSM R. 162, 166 (Chk. 2005).

The Pohnpei Development Leasehold Act says that every development lease must contain a covenant stating that the lessor shall have the rights of future benefit to the improvements placed on the land by or on behalf of the lessee and that, upon the lease's termination, existing improvements thereon shall become the property of the lessor thereof or his successor in interest without further cost or condition to be met by the lessor, the property's title holder or any successor in interest to said property. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 225 n.1 (Pon. 2005).

Plaintiff landowners should not be permitted to unjustly enrich themselves through obtaining a house and other improvements built at the defendant's expense. Heirs of Nena v. Sigrah, 14 FSM R. 283, 286 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Individuals may have full title to the improvements (as distinguished from the soil) they make upon land not owned by them and thus may be entitled to compensation if it is determined that they do not own the land on which the improvements were made and cannot remove those improvements to another site. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 247, 251 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2012).

– Land Commission or Land Court

Under Kosrae state statute KC 11.614, which says appeals will be heard "on the record" unless "good cause" exists for a trial of the matter, the court does not have statutory guidance as to the standard to be used in reviewing the Land Commission's decision and therefore, in reviewing the commission's procedure and decision, normally should merely consider whether the commission: a) has exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, b) has conducted a fair proceeding, c) has properly resolved any legal issues, and d) has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 395, 398 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

When the land commission concludes that a traditional gift of land, a "kewosr," has been made, but is unable to determine who made the gift, and when, and does not explain any details about the customary gift sufficient to explain how it has determined that a kewosr was made, the opinion does not reflect proper resolution of the legal issues or reasonable assessment of the evidence and therefore must be set aside. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 395, 402 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Kosrae State Land Commission properly relied on the decision of the Trust Territory High Court in Civil Action No. 47 (1953) as establishing that a person's name on the Japanese Survey of Kosrae was not conclusive evidence of ownership in 1932 of the land indicated. Heirs of Likiaksa v. Heirs of Lonno, 3 FSM R. 465, 468 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Kosrae State Land Commission was not required as a matter of law to accept as true the Japanese Survey's designation of Fred Likiaksa as owner, in 1932, of certain lands called Limes, in Lelu, parcel No. 050-K-00. Heirs of Likiaksa v. Heirs of Lonno, 3 FSM R. 465, 468 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Kosrae State Land Commission properly relied on the decision of the Trust Territory High Court in Civil Action No. 47 (1953) as establishing that no rights given to plaintiff's family could have extended beyond the death of Nena Kuang in 1970. Heirs of Likiaksa v. Heirs of Lonno, 3 FSM R. 465, 468 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Determination of property boundaries is the responsibility of the state land commissions, and the national court should not intercede where the local agency has not completed its work. Kapas v. Church of Latter Day Saints, 6 FSM R. 56, 60 (App. 1993).

Land Commission procedures result in a determination of ownership wherein title to registered land is settled and declared by the government. The certificate of title issued by the government shows the state of the title and in whom it is vested. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 196 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Where a certificate of title issued by the Land Commission goes beyond the findings of its own determination of ownership as affirmed by the court's findings, the certificate of title is invalid to the extent that it goes beyond the determination. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 197 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Actions concerning the determination of land titles rest primarily with the Land Commission, which is statutorily charged with the registration and determination of land ownership. When the Land Commission has designated a registration area the courts cannot entertain any action with regard to interests in land within that registration area without a showing of special cause, although any determination of the Commission may be appealed to the Trial Division of the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Otherwise, it becomes final and conclusive. Barker v. Paul, 6 FSM R. 473, 475-76 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Absent a finding of "special cause" on the record the trial court had no jurisdiction to entertain an action asserting an interest in land located within a designated registration area. Barker v. Paul, 6 FSM R. 473, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

When the Land Commission has issued a Determination of Ownership which has become final upon the lapse of the time to appeal, the trial court has no authority or power to alter the final determination of ownership and boundaries. Barker v. Paul, 6 FSM R. 473, 476 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Once a section of land is considered for registration the Land Commission undertakes a five-step program: 1) survey and establish tentative boundaries, 2) notice and conduct preliminary inquiry, 3) notice and conduct formal hearing, 4) notice and issue determination of ownership, and 5) issue certificate of title. These duties are both administrative and adjudicative. Palik v. Henry, 7 FSM R. 571, 574 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

Before a preliminary inquiry is conducted, the Land Commission must notify any person who claims a portion of the area in dispute so that they might attend the inquiry and be heard. Palik v. Henry, 7 FSM R. 571, 575 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

It is critical that the Land Commission post notice on the land, at the municipal office, and at the principal village meeting place and serve notice on all interested parties at least thirty days in advance of a formal hearing and give similar notice of its determination of ownership. Notice is required because it gives a chance to be heard. Palik v. Henry, 7 FSM R. 571, 576 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

Judgments of the Land Commission are void when it has failed to serve notice as required by law. Palik v. Henry, 7 FSM R. 571, 576-77 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties and to post notice on the land, at the municipal office and principal meeting place at least thirty days in advance of the hearing. Palik v. Henry, 7 FSM R. 571, 577 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

Without a claim to the land in question there is no right to notice of a land commission proceeding or finding. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 589 (App. 1996).

An appeal from the land commission will be on the record unless the court finds good cause for a trial of the matter. At a trial de novo the parties may offer any competent evidence, including the record of proceedings before the land commission, but the question of whether the commission considered the evidence submitted to it is not normally a part of judicial scrutiny. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 35 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

On appeal the court should not substitute its judgment for those well-founded findings of the land commission, but questions of law are reserved to the court. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 8 FSM R. 31, 35 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1997).

Chuuk land commissioners have considerable adjudicatory powers under 67 TTC 109. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

State law specifically prohibits persons with an interest from being members of a land registration team, but no such statute specifically requires the disqualification of land commissioners with an interest from reviewing the registration team's determination. This brings constitutional due process concerns into play. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

Adjudicatory decisions affecting property rights are subject to the procedural due process requirements of article IV, section 3 of the Constitution. Due process demands impartiality on the part of adjudicators, including quasi-judicial officials, such as land commissioners. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

Grounds that require a person's recusal from the land registration team also require his disqualification as a land commissioner reviewing the land registration team's adjudication. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

When the statute requires the signature of at least two land commissioners in order to constitute an action of the commission and only two commissioners signed the section 109 review, and at least one of those should have disqualified himself, the review is void. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

Review of a land registration team's decision should, in the first instance, be done by the Land Commission, not a court. A land commission review that is void will therefore be remanded for a new review. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 8 FSM R. 116, 118 (Chk. 1997).

Once land has been declared part of a registration area, courts shall not entertain any action with regard to interests in land within that registration area without a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable before it is likely the land commission can make a determination on the matter. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 526-27 (Chk. 1998).

When title to land in a designated registration area becomes an issue in a case involving damage claims for trespass, and there is no pending case before the land commission concerning this land or a previous final determination of ownership, a court may remand the question of ownership to the land commission to be determined within a limited time. Once ownership is determined, the court may proceed because more than an interest in land is at stake, and the land commission can only adjudicate interests in land. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 527 (Chk. 1998).

The standard required for the review of a Land Commission decision by the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division is whether the decision of the Land Commission is supported by substantial evidence. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 8 FSM R. 552, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

When a court case containing a count for trespass and injunctive relief raises the issue of who holds title to the land in question, the case will be transferred to the Chuuk Land Commission for adjudication of the parties' claims to ownership pursuant to its administrative procedure. Choisa v. Osia, 8 FSM R. 567, 568 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Administrative agencies in the form of Registration Teams and the Land Commission are created and an administrative procedure are provided for the purpose of determining the ownership of land and the registration thereof. Choisa v. Osia, 8 FSM R. 567, 568 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When a person, who has applied for registration of land included within the boundaries of an area on which hearings are held and who, based upon his application, was, as required by 67 TTC 110, entitled to be served notice of the hearings, was not served notice of the hearings and was also not served a copy of the Determination of Ownership, there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties, and is required to post notice on the land, at the municipal office and principal meeting place at least thirty days in advance of the hearing. Failure to provide notice to an interested party is violation of due process. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The policy reasons supporting actual notice of hearings to land claimants, as required by law, are very important. There is a substantial interest in assuring that land disputes are decided fairly because of the fundamental role that land plays in Kosrae and throughout Micronesia. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 94-95 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

In reviewing the Land Commission's decision, the Kosrae State Court should merely consider whether the Land Commission exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, has conducted a fair proceeding, has properly resolved any legal issues and has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Isaac v. Benjamin, 9 FSM R. 258, 259 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

It is critical that before a preliminary inquiry is conducted, the Land Commission must serve notice at least thirty days in advance of a formal hearing on any person who claims a portion of the area in dispute so that they might attend the inquiry and be heard. Notice is required because it gives a chance to be heard. Isaac v. Benjamin, 9 FSM R. 258, 259 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties at least thirty days in advance of the hearing. Judgments of the Land Commission are void when it has failed to serve notice as required by law. Isaac v. Benjamin, 9 FSM R. 258, 259 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the record reflects that the Kosrae State Land Commission failed to serve notice, as required by law, on the appellants for the preliminary and formal hearings on adjoining parcels to which the appellants are interested parties its failure to serve notice as required by law makes its judgments void. The Kosrae State Court will vacate and remand to the Land Commission to, as necessary, give proper notice and conduct preliminary inquiries and formal hearings and take evidence from appellants and other interested parties regarding the boundaries and issue any new Determinations of Ownership. Isaac v. Benjamin, 9 FSM R. 258, 259-60 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Because a Kosrae Land Commission determination of ownership is subject to appeal to the Kosrae State Court within one hundred twenty days from the date of receipt of notice of the determination, when that time has passed and someone claims that he was never given notice of the original Kosrae Land Commission title determination proceedings as required under KC 11.609, his remedy lies with the Kosrae State Court. If he wishes to pursue that remedy on a lack of notice basis, he must file a complaint seeking to set aside the title determinations. His remedy is not to pursue his claims either within the confines of an earlier case concerning other land, or with the Land Commission. Palik v. Henry, 9 FSM R. 309, 312 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Under the Chuuk Constitution's transition clause, Trust Territory Code Title 67, which authorizes and empowers land commissions to determine the ownership of any land in its district, applies in Chuuk. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A land commission may appoint one or more land registration teams and may designate the area or areas for which each team shall be responsible. Each land registration team is responsible for adjudicating claims to land within that area. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Land registration teams may administer oaths to witnesses, take testimony under oath and subpoena witnesses. Once a decision is reached on any claim where a dispute has arisen, the land registration team shall include in the team's record the substance of all pertinent testimony it took. Land registration teams are to be guided by the civil procedure and evidence rules, and their determinations are subject to review by the land commission. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Land registration teams may decline to adjudicate a disputed claim and instead refer it to the land commission along with any record, including the substance of all pertinent testimony, taken by the team. The land commission may then adjudicate the claim or refer it to court. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 490 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The land commission, upon receipt of a land registration team adjudication and the record upon which it is based, may accept the land registration team's determination or reject it, and if it rejects the team's determination, the land commission may either remand the matter to the land registration team or itself hold further hearings and make its own determination of ownership. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 490, 492 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

If the land commission rejects a land registration team determination and instead holds further hearings, it may administer oaths to witnesses, take testimony under oath and subpoena witnesses, and it is to be guided by the civil procedure and evidence rules. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Any aggrieved party may appeal a land commission determination of ownership at any time within 120 days from the date of determination. If it is not appealed within 120 days, then the land commission shall issue a certificate of title which is conclusive evidence of ownership of the land as to all persons who received notice of the land commission's action. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division may review decisions of an administrative agency, including the land commission. The court reviews the whole record and gives due account to the rule of prejudicial error. The court may conduct a de novo review of an administrative determination when the agency action was adjudicative in nature and the fact finding procedures employed by the agency were inadequate. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A court reviewing a land commission determination must have before it a full and complete record upon which the land commission's final decision on the parties' claims was based. An agency action is subject to de novo review when the agency action is adjudicative in nature and its fact finding procedures are inadequate. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 492 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Just as the courts in the judiciary confirm their role in society by adjudicating claims in civil matters, so to must the land commission. When a court fails to provide an adequate record of its proceedings, the role of the judiciary fails. Because claims over land are of no lesser importance than claims in civil matters, the requirement of a full and complete record applies to the land commission. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 493 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Not only is a full and complete record of the land commission's action needed for court review, but the Trust Territory Code requires that there be a full and complete record of any land commission determinations. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 493 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Although the land commission may appoint a land registration team to conduct hearings and adjudicate the parties' competing claims, the land registration team's determination, including the record upon which it is based, is not the final determination of ownership. Rather, it is the subsequent action of the land commission that establishes a determination of ownership and which is, in turn, subject to judicial review. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 493 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

If the land commission approves the land registration team's report, either initially or after remand for further hearings, and issues a determination, it is the land registration team's record that will be subject to judicial review. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 493 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the land commission conducts its own hearings and reaches a determination of ownership, it must be based upon the record from the land registration team along with the record from the land commission's hearings. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 493 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the land commission has made a determination that results in a reversal of a land registration team's earlier determination, the record must also include an adequate basis supporting the land commission rationale for rejecting the land registration team's earlier findings. The absence of such information in the record gives the appearance that the land commission has acted arbitrarily in reaching its determination and has employed inadequate fact finding procedures. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 494 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Without a full and complete record of the land commission's determination, a reviewing court cannot conduct a fair and meaningful review of the land commission's actions. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 494 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the land commission's determination provides no explanation as to why it apparently rejected the land registration team's determination or how it reached its own determination, when the absence of a complete record makes it impossible for the court to review the land commission's determination, and when even if the court were to review the matter giving due regard for the rule of prejudicial error, the land commission's decision would be set aside for its failure to observe procedures required by the Trust Territory Code, the court, given the land commission's failure to prepare a complete record and the time elapsed, will conduct a de novo review of the land commission action. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 494-95 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court will not set aside a Land Commission determination on the ground that members of the land registration team were not residents of Weno when that issue was not raised and argued before the Land Commission. O'Sonis v. Sana, 9 FSM R. 501, 502 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Jurisdiction of the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division in appeals from the Land Commission is limited to a review of the Land Commission record and is not a trial de novo. O'Sonis v. Sana, 9 FSM R. 501, 502-03 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Determination of land ownership rests primarily with the Land Commission. After a designation of any registration area has been filed, a court will entertain only those land title cases where there is a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable. Simina v. Rayphand, 9 FSM R. 508, 509 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Because a court is without jurisdiction to entertain an action asserting an interest in land located within a designated registration area and because all such actions must first be filed with the Chuuk State Land Commission, a quiet title action filed in the Chuuk State Supreme Court will be transferred to the Land Commission for consideration of ownership. Simina v. Rayphand, 9 FSM R. 508, 509 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

One method to claim an interest in a parcel is to file a written claim with the Land Commission before the hearing. A verbal claim is invalid. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 513, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

It is the claimant's duty to submit a written claim to the Land Commission. The Land Commission does not have any statutory obligation to write down a claimant's verbal claim. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 519, 521 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The court, in reviewing the Land Commission's procedure and decision, should consider whether the Commission: a) has exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, b) has conducted a fair proceeding, c) has properly resolved any legal issues, and d) has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 9 FSM R. 523, 524-25 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties. Failure to provide notice to an interested party is violation of due process. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 9 FSM R. 523, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The registration team is required to serve actual notice of the hearing upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to have an interest in the parcel either by personal service or registered air mail. It is also required to serve actual notice of a determination of ownership upon all persons shown to have an interest in the parcel. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 9 FSM R. 523, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When the land commission voids one person's certificate of title and issues a new certificate of title covering the same land to another person without notice to the first person and affording the first person an opportunity to be heard, it is a denial of due process and the certificates of title will be vacated and the case remanded to the land commission to conduct the statutorily-required hearings. Enlet v. Chee Young Family Store, 9 FSM R. 563, 564-65 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Kosrae State Court, in reviewing the Land Commission's procedure and decision, should consider whether the Commission: a) has exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, b) has conducted a fair proceeding, c) has properly resolved any legal issues, and d) has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 164 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

On appeal the Kosrae State Court should not substitute its judgment for those well-founded findings of the Land Commission because it is primarily the task of the Land Commission, and not the reviewing court, to assess the witnesses' credibility and resolve factual disputes, since it is the Land Commission, and not the court, who is present during the testimony. Therefore, the Kosrae State Court should review the Land Commission record and determine whether the Land Commission reasonably assessed the evidence presented, with respect to factual issues. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 164 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A Land Commission opinion must reflect a proper resolution of the legal issues. If it does not, the decision must be set aside. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 164 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the Land Commission reasonably assessed the evidence with respect to who owned the land, its findings are not clearly erroneous, and when those findings are that Ittu never took back ownership of the land, the Land Commission did not reach the issue of applying Kosrae tradition and thus properly resolved that legal issue and did not exceed its constitutional authority. That Land Commission decision will be affirmed. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 10 FSM R. 162, 165 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a person who has asserted a claim to land was not given notice of the registration proceedings as required by law, the Determination of Ownership for that land is not conclusive as upon him. Kun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 214, 216 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a person had asserted a claim to a parcel and was identified as a claimant early in the Land Commission proceedings and also testified in support of his boundary dispute at several hearings, but was not served notice of the formal hearing and was also not served a copy of the Determination of Ownership for the parcel, the Determination of Ownership for the parcel is not conclusive upon him. Kun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 214, 216 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

In land cases, statutory notice requirements must be followed. Personal service of the notice of hearing and the Determination of Ownership upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to have an interest in the parcel is required. Failure to serve actual notice on a claimant is a denial of due process and violation of law, which will cause a Determination of Ownership to be set aside as void, and the case remanded to the Land Commission to hold the formal hearings and to issue the determination of ownership for that parcel. Kun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 214, 216 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Under the Chuuk Constitution, article VII, § 3(c), the Chuuk State Supreme Court has only appellate or review jurisdiction over the Land Commission, and thus a motion for review de novo of matters not raised before the Land Commission must be denied. Enengeitaw Clan v. Shirai, 10 FSM R. 309, 311 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Kosrae State Court, in reviewing the Land Commission's procedure and decision, should consider whether the Commission: a) has exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, b) has conducted a fair proceeding, c) has properly resolved any legal issues, and d) has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Land Commission does not conduct a fair proceeding when it issues a determination of ownership without compliance with statutory notice requirements. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties. Failure to provide notice to an interested party is violation of due process. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The registration team is required to service actual notice of the hearing, either by personal service or registered air mail, upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to have an interest in the parcel, and is also required to serve actual notice of a determination of ownership upon all persons shown to have an interest in the parcel. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the land registration team was informed at the preliminary inquiry that someone was an interested party due to his boundary dispute, but the land registration team failed to serve him actual notice of the formal hearing and the determination of ownership issued for the parcel, there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law, and due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, the determinations of ownership for both adjoining parcels must be set aside as void and remanded to the Land Commission. Nena v. Heirs of Melander, 10 FSM R. 362, 364 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Once land has been declared part of a registration area a court cannot entertain any action with regard to interests in land within that registration area without a showing of special cause why court action is desirable before it is likely a determination can be made on the matter by the land commission. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 369 (Chk. 2001).

Boundary determination in designated registration areas is a statutory function of the Land Commission. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 370 (Chk. 2001).

When the plaintiffs have not shown any special cause why action by a court is desirable before the land commission can determine the boundary between the plaintiffs' and the defendants' land and when there is a case pending before the Land Commission concerning the land, the issue of the land's boundaries will be remanded to the Land Commission. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 370 (Chk. 2001).

Under the doctrine of primary jurisdiction it is for the Land Commission, not the court, to decide land boundaries, and the Land Commission must be given the chance to conclude its administrative process. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 370 (Chk. 2001).

Adjudicatory decisions of governmental bodies affecting property rights are subject to the procedural due process requirements of the Constitution. Due process requirements are applicable to the proceedings of the Kosrae Land Commission. Ittu v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 10 FSM R. 446, 447 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a party was not given an opportunity to comment or rebut the evidence presented by the adverse claimants at the formal Land Commission hearing, and was not given an opportunity to cross examine adverse witnesses or an opportunity to present his own testimony to rebut adverse claims, this procedural failure is a violation of the due process protection provided by the Kosrae Constitution; and the issued determination of ownership will be set aside, and held null and void and the matter remanded to the Land Commission. Ittu v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 10 FSM R. 446, 448 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the Senior Land Commissioner failed to disqualify himself after the parcel was recorded for adjudication, took part in the hearing and consideration of the parcel by appointing the two pro-tempore members of the registration team, and failed to disqualify himself from the matter until after the two Associate Land Commissioners had concurred on the findings and decision, awarding ownership of the parcel to his family, his actions violated Kosrae State Code, Section 11.602 and the due process protection provided by the Kosrae Constitution. Langu v. Heirs of Jonas, 10 FSM R. 547, 549 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Due process demands impartiality on the part of adjudicators, such as land commissioners. Langu v. Heirs of Jonas, 10 FSM R. 547, 549 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

It is a land commissioner's duty to disqualify himself when necessary, as soon as the commissioner is aware of the grounds for his disqualification. Langu v. Heirs of Jonas, 10 FSM R. 547, 549-50 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When there has been a violation of law or a denial of due process, a determination of ownership must be vacated and the matter remanded for further proceedings. Land Commission judgments are void when the Land Commission has failed to follow the requirements of the law. Langu v. Heirs of Jonas, 10 FSM R. 547, 550 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the Land Commission has not served an interested party statutory notice, the law is clear. Determinations of ownership and certificates of title have been held void and vacated when proper notice was not given pursuant to statute. Actual notice by personal service to an interested party is required. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When an interested party was never served proper statutory notice of the formal hearings or Determinations of Ownership issued for the land in question, the 120-day appeal period never began to run and has never expired. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The twenty year statute of limitation does not apply to claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process, violation of statute and for failure to apply an earlier judgment as they are not claims for the recovery of land. These claims are subject to a limitations period of six years and are barred by the statute of limitations and will be dismissed when the Land Commission actions all occurred more than six years ago. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 175 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The law is clear when the Land Commission knew of a civil action judgment and that a person was a claimant and interested party for the parcels, which were the subject of the judgment and later the subject of Land Commission proceedings, but that person was not served personal notice of the formal hearings or the Determinations of Ownership for the parcels. Pursuant to established precedent, Determinations of Ownership and Certificates of Title will be held void and vacated when proper notice was not given pursuant to statute. Actual notice to an interested party is required by personal service. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 246, 248 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The law does not require notice to potential adverse claimants in completing the preliminary inquiry. The preliminary inquiry's purpose was to record all claims for a parcel, so that the claimants would be on record and would then be notified of the formal hearing. Heirs of Henry v. Palik, 11 FSM R. 419, 422 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Land Commission may withdraw a disputed claim from a registration team. If that withdrawal takes place, then the Land Commissioners must hold the hearing, hear the evidence and make an adjudication. Heirs of Henry v. Palik, 11 FSM R. 419, 422 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When testimony presented at the first formal hearing was not heard by the full panel of adjudicators due to a Land Commissioner's late disqualification and the addition of temporary adjudicators, only one person of the adjudication panel heard that testimony. This resulted in a due process violation because the testimony was not heard by the full adjudication panel when the acting replacement commissioners did not hear the testimony, yet they participated in the findings of fact, opinion and decision. The Land Commission exceeded it constitutional and statutory authority by the adjudication panel's failure to hear all the evidence presented at the hearings. Heirs of Henry v. Palik, 11 FSM R. 419, 422 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the Land Commission has not followed statutory requirements for the formal hearings and there was no substantial compliance with the requirements specified by law, the Kosrae State Court must set aside the Determination of Ownership as void and remanded to Kosrae Land Court for further proceedings. Heirs of Henry v. Palik, 11 FSM R. 419, 423 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Land Commission is required by statute to give actual, and not constructive notice for hearings to all interested parties. Failure to provide notice as required by law to an interested party is violation of due process. Albert v. Jim, 11 FSM R. 487, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The registration team is required to serve actual notice of the hearing upon all parties shown to have an interest in the parcel either by personal service or registered air mail. Albert v. Jim, 11 FSM R. 487, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

If the Chuuk State Supreme Court determines that a de novo review of an appeal from Land Commission is appropriate, the plaintiff must prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence, and the court may make its own findings of fact based on the total record in this case, but if the court does not conduct a de novo review of the case, it merely determines whether the Land Commission's decision was arbitrary and capricious, and whether the facts as found by the Land Commission were clearly erroneous. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 588-89 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When no detailed findings of fact are included either in the Land Commission Registration Team's two decisions or in the full Land Commission's one decision; when the full Land Commission gave no reason for reversing the Registration Team's determinations and supports its decision with nothing but a mere conclusion; when the newly-discovered Land Commission hearing transcripts do not assist the court in determining how the Land Commission reached its decision; and when there is no indication in the Land Commission record that witness testimony was taken under oath, or that the admitted exhibits were properly authenticated and identified and the exhibits were not contained within the record, there was no basis for the court to review the Land Commission's actions, and a trial de novo was necessary. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

De novo review is appropriate when reviewing an administrative hearing when the action is adjudicative in nature and the fact finding procedures employed by the agency are inadequate. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 589 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the Land Commission only has authority to issue a certificate of title after the time for appeal from a Land Commission determination of ownership has expired without any notice of appeal having been filed, when a notice of appeal was timely filed with the Chuuk State Supreme Court and the appellee had notice of the appeal, she is precluded from using the certificate of title against the appellant, and its issuance has no conclusive effect because once a notice of appeal had been filed, the Land Commission acted ultra vires, or outside of its authority, when it issued the certificate of title. The certificate is thus void. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Where the provisions of former Kosrae State Code, Title 11, Chapter 6, were applicable to the Land Commission proceedings now on appeal, the court will apply the provisions of former Kosrae State Code, Title 11, Chapter (repealed) to its review of the Land Commission's procedure and decision in the matter. Tulenkun v. Abraham, 12 FSM R. 13, 15-16 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The court, in reviewing the Land Commission's procedure and decision, should consider whether the Commission: a) has exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, b) has conducted a fair proceeding, c) has properly resolved any legal issues, and d) has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Tulenkun v. Abraham, 12 FSM R. 13, 16 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the determined parcels' boundaries are clear by either permanent markers or by readily recognizable natural features, the Land Commission is not required to give written notice to the claimants before planting monuments. The planting of monuments is an administrative task and is completed pursuant to the Land Commission's instructions. The Division of Survey's planting of monuments, by itself, does not establish boundaries for purposes of an appeal. Tulenkun v. Abraham, 12 FSM R. 13, 16 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the Land Commission did not exceed its constitutional or statutory authority, and did conduct a fair proceeding for determination of title, there was no violation of state law and no violation of constitutional and statutory due process based upon the Land Commission's failure to notify the appellant in writing of the planting of monuments. Tulenkun v. Abraham, 12 FSM R. 13, 16 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Kosrae State Court, on appeal, will not substitute its judgment for the Land Commission's well-founded evidentiary findings. An appellate court will not reweigh the evidence presented at the hearing. When the court, in reviewing the Land Commission's record and decision in a matter, concludes that the Commission has reasonably assessed the evidence presented regarding the parcel's size, the Land Commission's factual finding of the parcel's size is adequately supported by substantial evidence in the record, and its findings of fact are not clearly erroneous and will not be disturbed on appeal. Tulenkun v. Abraham, 12 FSM R. 13, 17 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

If the land registration team deems that consideration of a disputed claim will seriously interfere with accomplishment of the purpose of land registration, it may refer the claim to the Land Commission without the team's making any decision thereon and if a Land Commission deems that a team is spending an undesirable amount of time on a particular disputed claim, it may withdraw that claim from the team's consideration. In either of these situations, the Land Commission may then proceed itself to hear the parties and witnesses and make a determination on the claim or it may refer the claim to Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division for adjudication without any determination by the Commission. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 158 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

While ordinarily the court does not have jurisdiction over claims arising in land registration areas subject to the Land Commission's jurisdiction, an exception is that whenever the Land Commission, in its discretion, makes either of the determinations set forth in 67 TTC 108(1) or (2), it may refer the claim to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division for adjudication without itself making any determination. The statute thus expressly confers jurisdiction on the court upon a matter's referral from the Land Commission whenever cause appears pursuant to 67 TTC 108(1) or (2). The "special cause" is established by the statute, and the trial division clearly has jurisdiction if the circumstances meet the statute's requirements.

Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 159 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

In order for the Land Commission to exercise its discretion pursuant to statute and send a dispute to the trial division, either the land registration team must conclude that the dispute is interfering with the purpose of the law, and send the dispute to the Land Commission, or the Land Commission must determine that the land registration team is spending too much time on a particular dispute, and take control over the dispute from the land registration team. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 159 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Land Commission's decision to refer a dispute to the court was not arbitrary and capricious when the land registration team failed to resolve the dispute over the twenty-eight years since the first claim to the land was presented and when the Land Commission's request for transfer recited the problems in resolving the dispute and the lack of sufficient Land Commissioners (due to disqualification) to render a decision. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 160 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

In an appeal from a Land Commission determination of ownership, the reviewing court will apply the clearly erroneous standard of review. If the agency decision is a considered judgment, arrived at on the basis of a full record and careful reflection, the court is more likely to rely on the agency's knowledge and judgment and to restrict the scope of review. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 160 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The Land Commission has primary jurisdiction to determine and register land titles. Once an area has been designated as a land registration area, courts cannot entertain any action regarding land titles in that area unless special cause has been shown. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

The statute authorizes only the Land Commission to declare a land registration area. No authority has been identified that would permit a court to designate a land registration area, or to order the Land Commission to designate one. The statute leaves that to the Land Commission's discretion based upon its determination of desirability and practicability, which is uniquely within its expertise and authority to make. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

While the Land Commission has the statutory authority to determine and register land titles, whether the Land Commission has the legal authority and the technical ability to determine, survey, and register tidelands is an unanswered question. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

The 120-day statutory time limit to appeal from the Kosrae Land Commission to the Kosrae State Court is jurisdictional because deadlines set by statute, especially deadlines to appeal including those from administrative agency decisions, are generally jurisdictional. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 278 (App. 2003).

An assertion that a Land Commission decision was tainted and a party denied due process because various members of the Land Commission and Land Registration Team were close relatives of the appellee or the appellee's wife is a serious allegation that, if true, would usually be enough to vacate the decision and remand the case to the Land Court for new proceedings with a new determination to be made by impartial adjudicators. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 284 (App. 2003).

Since the Kosrae State Court has not been shy in vacating and remanding Land Commission decisions for due process violations, including involvement of commissioners who should have disqualified themselves, Kosrae's social configuration should not prevent an appellant from timely raising the issue of disqualification of persons in the Land Commission proceedings. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 285 (App. 2003).

The Kosrae State Court must hear an appeal from the Land Commission on the record unless it finds good cause exists for a trial of the matter. The Land Commission's failure to follow the Kosrae Rules of Evidence does not constitute good cause for a trial de novo because those rules do not apply in the Land Commission. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 286 (App. 2003).

That the Land Commission did not properly consider certain evidence, is an issue the Kosrae State Court may properly consider under its standard of review without the need for a trial de novo, and, if the appellant should prevail, it can order a remand. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 287 (App. 2003).

The statute contemplates that judicial review of a Land Commission appeal would be the norm and that a trial de novo would be held only in the uncommon event that the Kosrae State Court had found good cause for one. When that court did not, and when there has been no showing that would warrant a conclusion of good cause, the Kosrae State Court has not abused its discretion by not holding a trial de novo. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 287 (App. 2003).

The Kosrae State Court, in reviewing Land Commission appeals, properly uses the following standard of review – it considers whether the Commission: a) has exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, b) has conducted a fair proceeding, c) has properly resolved any legal issues, and d) has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Under this standard, that court cannot substitute its judgment for the Land Commission's well-founded findings, but questions of law are reserved to it. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 287 (App. 2003).

It violates due process for the Land Commission to hold a hearing and adjudicate ownership of a parcel of land without giving notice to a party with a demonstrated interest in that land. George v. Nena, 12 FSM R. 310, 316 (App. 2004).

When title to land in a designated registration area becomes an issue in a case involving damage claims for trespass, a court may remand the question of ownership to the land commission to be determined within a limited time. Once the land commission has determined ownership, the court may proceed because more than an interest in land is at stake, and the land commission can only adjudicate interests in land. Kiniol v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 335, 336 (Chk. 2004).

When the plaintiffs have not shown any special cause why court action is desirable before the land commission can determine the boundary between the plaintiffs' and the defendants' land, the issue of the land's boundaries will be remanded to the land commission. Kiniol v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 335, 336 (Chk. 2004).

When the issue of the location of the boundary between the plaintiffs' land and the defendant's land is remanded to the Chuuk Land Commission, the owner of the tower on the land with the defendant's permission is not a party to the remanded Land Commission proceedings as that proceeding only concerns title, not trespass to or possession of, land. But it remains a party to the trespass action in court. Kiniol v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 335, 337 (Chk. 2004).

A default judgment must be vacated when the Chuuk State Supreme Court never had jurisdiction over the action to determine ownership of real property in the first place because, despite being framed as a declaratory relief action, the case sought a determination of ownership of land lying within a land registration area and only the Land Commission has jurisdiction to determine ownership of land within a land registration area. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 398-99 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When someone offers no evidence of irregularity in the Land Commission proceedings and no evidence that her father (through whom she claims the land) was deprived in some way of participating in the proceedings, and when, to the contrary, documents establish that the Land Commission followed all statutory requirements regarding notice of the proceedings involving the land, any action taken thereafter must be conclusively presumed valid. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 400 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Questions regarding interests in land must be raised before the Land Commission. The Chuuk State Supreme Court has no jurisdiction to hear or decide such claims. The court can only refer the matter to the Land Commission, so that the Land Commission can resolve the dispute. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 401-02 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A Land Commission determination of ownership is subject to appeal to the Kosrae State Court within 120 days from the date of receipt of notice of the determination. If the determination was not received, then the appeal time limit of 120 days never began to run. Kinere v. Kosrae Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 78, 80 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When a partial transcript's inclusion in the record for a parcel infers the Land Commission's reliance upon that transcript in making its Determination of Ownership for that parcel and when the partial transcript contains evidence that was not properly before the Land Commission because the appellants were not provided statutory notice of that hearing, and were not provided an opportunity to participate in the hearing and cross-examine a witness on his testimony regarding the parcel, the Land Commission did not conduct a fair proceeding because it did not comply with statutory notice requirements and because it considered evidence not properly before the Commission. Heirs of Wakap v. Heirs of Obet, 13 FSM R. 418, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When title to land in a designated registration area or its boundaries becomes an issue in a trespass case, a court may remand the ownership question to the Land Commission for it to determine within a limited time. If no special cause has been shown why court action is desirable before the Land Commission can make its boundary determination, the boundary issue should be remanded to the Land Commission. Once the Land Commission has determined ownership or boundaries, the court may proceed when more than an interest in land is at stake, and the Land Commission can only adjudicate interests in land. Kiniol v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 456, 458 (Chk. 2005).

Determination of property boundaries is generally the responsibility of the state land commission because under the primary jurisdiction doctrine it is for the Land Commission, not the court, to decide land boundaries, and the Land Commission must be given the chance to conclude its administrative process. Kiniol v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. 2005).

When the plaintiffs have not shown that the Land Commission committed an error of law or that its findings lacked a substantial factual basis, the court will accept the Land Commission's finding that no part of the tower is on the plaintiffs' property. Kiniol v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. 2005).

The Kosrae State Land Commission was never a court nor an instrumentality of the Kosrae state judiciary. Isaac v. Saimon, 14 FSM R. 33, 36 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A six years' statute of limitations applies to all claims to which neither the specific twenty-year, or two-year statutes, apply. Claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process, as they are not claims for the recovery of land (twenty-year statute of limitation), are subject to a six-year limitations period and are barred and will be dismissed when the Land Commission actions are all over six years old since a complaint against the Land Commission cannot assert a claim for the recovery of an interest in land against the defendant Land Commission because it does not own any interest in the land at issue. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 n.5 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Land Court took over the Land Commission's responsibilities and is required by statute to give effect to determinations issued by the Land Commission. It does not have the discretion to ignore a Land Commission determination because it is handwritten or because it has not yet been served on the parties. The Land Court's duty is to take over, or "succeed" to the Land Commission's responsibilities, not re-hear matters previously decided by it. Heirs of Tara v. Heirs of Kurr, 14 FSM R. 521, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

In reviewing a Land Commission decision, the Kosrae State Court considers whether the Land Commission exceeded its constitutional or statutory authority, has conducted a fair proceeding, has properly resolved any legal issues, and has reasonably assessed the evidence presented. Heirs of Tara v. Heirs of Kurr, 14 FSM R. 521, 525 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When creating the Land Court, the Kosrae Legislature provided for the transition of cases from the Land Commission to the Land Court and the Land Court succeeded to all Land Commission responsibilities, registers, properties and assets and Land Commission land determinations and registrations are equivalent to Land Court title determinations and registrations. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 14 FSM R. 556, 558 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Since The Land Court took over the Land Commission's responsibilities and is required by statute to give effect to Land Commission determinations, it does not have the discretion to ignore a Land Commission determination even when the Commissioners signed an adjudication to indicate their decision rather than issue a separate document. The Land Court does not have the discretion to ignore a Land Commission determination because it has not yet been served on the parties. The Land Court's duty is to take over, or "succeed" the Land Commission's responsibilities, not re-hear matters previously decided by them. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 14 FSM R. 556, 559 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

That the Land Commission determination was not timely served on the parties since it was signed in 1990 and not served until the Land Court took action to complete the matter in January 2006, is not a ground to set aside the determination or to ignore the record made by the Land Commission because Kosrae Code § 11.616 requires that the Land Court treat the Land Commission's determinations as equivalent to its own determinations and there is no language setting a time restriction on this requirement. Despite the extended delay in service, the Land Court correctly gave force and effect to the Land Commission's determination. Heirs of George v. Heirs of Dizon, 14 FSM R. 556, 559 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Courts have no jurisdiction to hear cases with regard to interests in land in land registration areas unless there has been a showing of special cause, and a finding by the court, that action by a court is desirable or the Land Commission has asked the court to assume jurisdiction without the Land Commission having made a determination. Mathias v. Engichy, 15 FSM R. 90, 95 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A trial court can determine no more than who among the parties before it has a better claim to title or in the case of trespass, possession. A court cannot determine who has title good against the world. Land registration (determination of title presumptively good against the world) is the province of the Land Commission and its procedures, not of a court. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 112 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since the trial court stated that it was using a "clearly erroneous" standard of review on the Land Commission's findings, it would have had to examine, as one of the three possible ways to satisfy the clearly erroneous standard, whether the Land Commission decision was supported by substantial evidence in the record, the standard that the statute requires. Thus, although it may not have correctly named the standard, the trial court did use the proper standard of review as part of its review. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

When the matter is remanded to the trial court for it to rule on whether the lineage members consented or acquiesced to the sale of the land in question and if the trial court is unable to determine whether the requisite consent or acquiescence was shown in the Land Commission proceeding or determines that the record is inadequate to make that determination, the trial court shall then remand the matter to the Land Commission for it to make further findings of fact on whether such consent or acquiescence or ratification was made. The Land Commission may rely on the record and transcript and may take further evidence if it is necessary to make the inquiry. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 219 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The Land Commission is vested with the authority to register land. The Commission's statutory powers and duties include designating land to be registered, surveying the land and establishing boundaries, and determining title and adjudicating disputed claims through investigation, notice, and public hearings. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 471 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Adjoining landowners, even if not claimants, would, because of their common boundaries, be interested parties, along with anyone else who holds some interest in the land, such as a mortgagee, an easement holder, or a holder of a covenant running with the land. But even if the adjoining landowners were not interested parties, Land Court notice to them is not contrary to law. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

Because of the conclusive nature of a certificate of title, the Land Court should give the adjoining landowners notice of the formal hearing so that the resulting boundaries will be conclusive against them. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

Notice of land registration hearings must be given to the public in general. The hearings are public, and anyone may attend. Land Court proceedings are not ones which only the known claimants may attend. One purpose of public notice at various stages of the registration process is to reach as many persons as possible so that, at the end, the certificate of title will be conclusive against as many persons as possible, which is to the certificate holder's considerable benefit. The statute requiring that actual notice be given to claimants, is a minimum requirement, not the maximum permissible. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 572 (App. 2008).

The Kosrae Land Assessor must prepare one or more preliminary sketches clearly marking the land and the boundaries claimed by each claimant, and a qualified surveyor must make a survey based on the preliminary sketch, do the survey, and prepare a preliminary map, which the Land Assessor is required to post the preliminary map so that it will be visible to the presiding judge and any witness on the witness stand. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 572 (App. 2008).

Once a new claim arose, the other claimants were entitled to notice of it and to have a preliminary map showing the claims in dispute posted during a formal hearing. Due process requires that the new claim be surveyed, a new preliminary map prepared showing the overlapping claims, and a new, or second, formal hearing held with the new preliminary map posted. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 572 (App. 2008).

The process due to land claimants under the Kosrae Land Court Rules requires that a preliminary map showing all claims be posted at a formal hearing so that the presiding judge and the witnesses can view it and the claimants have an opportunity to be heard on any disputes. When the Land Court based its decision on a map prepared long after the formal hearing and on which the appellants had no opportunity to comment and no map showing the overlapping claims was available at the hearing, a second formal hearing should have been held once the new (second) preliminary map was prepared showing both sides' claims. The matter will therefore be remanded to the Land Court for that court to hold another formal hearing at which a map showing all the claimed boundaries must be posted and at which the parties will have the opportunity to be heard on the matter of the overlapping claims and the two preliminary maps and for which the Land Court will give actual notice to all claimants and to all interested parties. Interested parties shall be interpreted to include the adjoining landowners. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 573 (App. 2008).

Claims against the Land Commission for negligence, violation of due process and failing to apply statutes are actions against the government which fall within the limitations period of six years. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 619 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The Kosrae Land Court is statutorily created as an inferior court within the State Court. It was created for specific purposes – title investigation, title determination, and the registration of interests in lands within Kosrae and to provide one system of filing all recorded interests in land. Thus, it is a court granted specific, limited jurisdiction. It is not a court of general jurisdiction. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM

R. 657, 662 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Equitable relief is not generally necessary for a court to resolve disputes relating to title because establishment of title is available by law. This is true for the Kosrae Land Court. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Common law, or case law, and statutes provide the basis for Land Court orders, in other words, a complete and adequate remedy. The Legislature established the Land Court's authority to hear and decide title determinations. Statutes require that Land Court decisions not be contrary to law and must be based on substantial evidence. Case law guides the Land Court on what constitutes substantial evidence to support a decision; this is legal precedent. The Land Court must establish title based on substantial evidence by considering the testimony and record before it. There is no need to resort to equitable jurisdiction to make a title determination. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662-63 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The Land Commission's statutory powers and duties include designating land to be registered, surveying the land and establishing boundaries, and determining title and adjudicating disputed claims through investigation, notice, and public hearings. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The Land Court's "subdivision" of land was not reversible error nor was it arbitrary when the original 1982 Land Commission determination of ownership explicitly divided the unsurveyed part of the land in its determination and since this division recognized the different history (with different evidence) for the two parts. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 375-76 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

There was no reversible error when the parties certainly had adequate notice of a "subdivision" before the October 18, 2005 Land Court hearing since they knew of it before the 2003 appeal and the 2005 remand and hearing; when one side's assertion that they were not "given the chance to stake out their claims" before the land was subdivided would be a cause of concern if they had claimed less than the entire land, but they claimed the whole unsurveyed land, as did the other side; and since, if the Land Commission erred, it was harmless error because neither side can show that they were prejudiced by this "subdivision" and both sides had the opportunity to assert and to prove their respective claims to both parcels and because the "subdivision" did not prevent or hinder either side from claiming, and trying to prove, that they had title to both parcels. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 376 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A court instruction to the Land Commission to take further action consistent with its decision, including a preliminary survey, and such preliminary and formal hearings as might be necessary to make a determination of ownership, would not be necessary on remand if all that Land Commission was required to do was issue a determination of ownership in a calmant's favor with a certificate of title to follow. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 376 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Since a determination of ownership for the unsurveyed portion of Yekula was not before the court when it rendered its 1997 decision on the other parcels involved in the dispute between the claimants, the State Court's 1997 instructions to Land Commission about Yekula can only be considered further guidance (beyond and in addition to that given in 1988) to the Land Commission on how it ought to proceed in resolving the remainder of the dispute. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 368, 376-77 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Even if the Land Commission thinks it is only correcting its own error, due process still requires that it give notice and an opportunity to be heard to any party which the "correction" might appear to adversely affect. Although the Land Commission may think it is only correcting its own error, it is always possible that its "correction" could be an error. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When an owner of any interest in registered land dies, the Land Commission's duty is to cancel the original and duplicate certificates and issue new ones in the name(s) of the decedent's devisees or heirs. A certificate of title cannot be issued in the name of a person already deceased. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 555 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When the owner of registered land is deceased, it is the Land Commission's statutory responsibility to make a determination of the devisee or devisees or heir or heirs and the interests or respective interests to which each are entitled, and, to make this determination, the Land Commission must conduct a hearing at which evidence shall be heard for the purpose of determining the heir or heirs or devisee or devisees entitled to the decedent's land. Proper notice must be given for the hearing, and within 30 days after the hearing's conclusion, the Land Commission should issue its finding as to the heir or heirs or devisee or devisees and the respective interest or interests to which each are entitled. Once the Land Commission has issued its determination, it cannot issue any certificates of title unless and until after one hundred twenty days – the time to appeal – has passed, and only then, if the 120 days have passed without an appeal or if an appeal has been taken and decided, can the Land Commission issue certificates of title. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 555 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A suit against the Land Commission (or successor institution) cannot end with a land title transferred to a successful plaintiff. Only a successful suit against the current titleholder, a necessary and indispensable party to any suit over title, could result in the transfer of the land title to the successful plaintiff although a successful suit against a Land Commission might result in a money damages award. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 40 (App. 2010).

Determination of a land's exact boundaries, certification of a survey map for the area, and the issuance of a certificate of title for the land, are all acts that a court is legally unable to do when the court would need before it all the current owners of the part of the land not claimed by the plaintiff, all owners of all property abutting the land's purported boundaries, and any other landowners in the vicinity whose property or property lines would have to appear on a certified survey map for the land and when none of these necessary parties, with the exception of the defendant are before the court and because the court cannot make rulings that would affect or determine their rights without their presence or participation. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 233 (Chk. 2010).

A court will not order the Land Commission to issue a certificate of title when that would require a determination of the current lessor(s), that is, who the lessor's heirs are since a Land Commission heirship proceeding is needed to determine current owners before an certificate of title can issue. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 235 (Chk. 2010).

The court will not order the Land Commission to certify a survey map when that would require the determination of boundary lines to properties whose owners and claimants are not before the court. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 235 (Chk. 2010).

Before a land registration team commences hearing with respect to any claim, the Land Commission must provide notice at least thirty (30) days in advance. Specific notice must be served upon all parties shown by the preliminary inquiry to be interested. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 473 (App. 2011).

In failing to make a reasonable inquiry as to the Setiks' occupation of the land, in failing to provide notice to the Setiks of the determination of ownership hearing, and in issuing the determination of ownership to another without an application by her, the Land Commission deprived the Setiks of due process. The determination of ownership was thus not valid, and the matter must be remanded to the Land Commission for a new determination. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 474 (App. 2011).

Due process demands impartiality on the part of the adjudicators, including Kosrae Land Court judges. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 503 (App. 2011).

By statute, the standard under which the Kosrae State Court must review Land Court decisions is by applying the "substantial evidence rule." And, if the State Court finds the Land Court decision was not based upon substantial evidence or that the Land Court decision was contrary to law, it must remand the case to the Land Court with instructions and guidance for re-hearing the matter in its entirety or such portions of the case as may be appropriate. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 655 (App. 2011).

When reviewing a Land Court decision, the State Court, applying the substantial-evidence rule, does not determine where, in its view, the preponderance of the evidence lies. Under the substantial-evidence rule, the court's sole obligation is to review the entire record and determine whether the evidence as a whole is such that reasonable minds could have reached the same conclusion. The State Court thus must determine if the record contained evidence supporting the Land Court decision that was more than a mere scintilla or even more than some evidence. If there was, the State Court must affirm the Land Court decision even if the evidence would not, in the State Court's view, amount to a preponderance of the evidence but would be somewhat less and even if the State Court would have decided it differently. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 655-56 (App. 2011).

The Kosrae State Court cannot assume the role of fact-finder. The statute mandates that the standard of review that the State Court must apply to a Land Court decision is whether there was substantial evidence in the record to support it, not whether the Land Court "reasonably assessed" the evidence. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 656 (App. 2011).

The Kosrae Legislature has mandated that the State Court must use the substantial-evidence rule when it reviews all Land Court decisions. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 657 (App. 2011).

Land Court proceedings are the time and place adverse possession can and should be raised since Land Court jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title of land and any interests therein. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 657 (App. 2011).

The proper time and place to make adverse possession claims, if a land occupant has one, is in a Land Court (or other) proceeding before the land title has been registered. Afterward is too late. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

The Land Court should not exclude any relevant evidence and the Kosrae Rules of Evidence do not apply in the Land Court, but the State Court cannot consider evidence that was not "received" in the Land Court. "Received" in the statute is read to include evidence offered or introduced but improperly excluded. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 659 (App. 2011).

The statute does not give the State Court the power to reverse the Land Court and order it to enter a decree the opposite of the Land Court's original decision, but it does allow the State Court to vacate the Land Court decision and to give the Land Court such instructions and guidance that may result in a reversal after the Land Court re-hearing. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 660 (App. 2011).

A Land Court case is in fact a title dispute rather than a boundary dispute when the case was remanded to the lower court specifically directed a party's boundary claim be heard and in order to have the claim on display for the hearing, the lower court gave the party the opportunity to stake out his claim on subject land parcel and the party staked out his boundary claim as encompassing the entire parcel rather than just a portion of it. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 262 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

When a party claimed a boundary to subject land, but now claims the entire parcel, that caused the court to find and conclude that the party was uncertain as to what he was claiming and because of the inconsistencies the land court questioned his credibility. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 262 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr.

Due regard must be given to the trial judge's opportunity to weigh the witnesses' credibility. In considering whether the decision is based upon substantial evidence, the reviewing court recognizes that it is primarily the Land Court's task to assess the witnesses' credibility, the admissibility of evidence, and to resolve factual disputes. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 262 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

Land Court findings of fact will not be set aside unless clearly erroneous. To reverse its findings of fact, the appellate court must find that 1) its findings are not supported by substantial evidence; 2) there was an erroneous conception by the Land Court of the applicable law; and 3) the appellate court has a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 262 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

A proposed settlement is unimportant and only confuses the issues since even if the settlement made no issue of ingress or egress, the November 1997 court order ruled in favor of the appellant's right of way through the subject parcel onto his land behind it, ordering the appellee and his family members to refrain from any acts that may interfere with ingress or egress of appellant and his family members on the subject parcel. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 263 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

A land case was a boundary dispute until the appellant claimed the entire parcel. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 263, 264 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

It is primarily the Land Court's task to assess the admissibility of evidence and when it was reasonably assessed, the reviewing court will accept its finding. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 263 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

The Land Court's finding is based on substantial evidence in the record and not clearly erroneous when the appellant spends most of his argument repeating the same point that this matter is a boundary dispute within a parcel and not a title dispute but he not only claimed the entire parcel before the lower court, but he also surreptitiously asks for the Certificate of Title for the parcel in the same brief in which he calls for it boundary dispute. The appellant's repeated arguments are disingenuous. Ittu v. Ittu, 19 FSM R. 258, 264 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2014).

Under the res judicata effect as enshrined by Kosrae statute, a Land Court justice must not adjudicate a matter previously decided by a court between the same parties or those under whom the parties claim which dispute involves the same parcel. The Kosrae Land Court must accept prior judgments as res judicata and determine those issues without evidence. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 339 (App. 2014).

When a previous court case has res judicata effect and status, it is conclusive only between the parties to the case and those claiming under them and no one else. But there could be persons who were not parties to the court case and who do not claim under those parties but who have their own claim to the land. The Land Court must still go through all of its usual procedures to determine if there are other claimants and, if there are, adjudicate their claims, before it can issue a determination of ownership and, if there is no appeal or if its decision is affirmed on appeal, a certificate of title. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 364, 367 (App. 2014).

A view that only successful land claimants have to be notified of the Land Commission's determination of ownership is gross legal error. All claimants to a parcel of land must be notified of the determination of ownership for that parcel, and if boundary determinations are involved, the adjoining landowners must also be notified. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 536 & n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

When the Trust Territory Code Title 67, chapter three, which includes 67 TTC 115, was repealed and replaced by a similar Chuuk state law in 2004, and since the Land Commission acts complained of took place in 1998, and the trial division case was filed in 2000, the Trust Territory Code, Title 67, chapter 3 is the applicable law, but the 2004 Chuuk state statute enacted will apply to the further proceedings on remand. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 537 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

There is no time limit to seek relief from a void Land Commission decision. To rule otherwise would leave an interested party without any recourse even though that party was unconstitutionally deprived of notice and an opportunity to be heard at the Land Commission formal hearing or was denied the opportunity to file a timely appeal of an adverse determination of ownership of which they never had timely notice. This is similar to the principle that there is no time limit to seek relief from a void judgment because if a judgment is void when issued, it is always void, and a court has no discretion but must grant relief from a void judgment whenever relief is sought. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 537 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

Courts have no jurisdiction to hear cases about interests in land in land registration areas unless there has been a showing of special cause, and a court finding, that action by a court is desirable or that the Land Commission has asked the court to assume jurisdiction without the Land Commission having made a determination. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

By statute, the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division jurisdiction in appeals from the Land Commission is limited to a review of the Land Commission record and cannot act as a trier of fact unless it grants a trial de novo. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

When the case was not an appeal from a Land Commission determination of ownership because it was filed too late for that and when it was not, at least initially, a trial court action with regard to interests in land within that registration area before it is likely a determination can be made on the matter by the Land Commission because the Land Commission had already made a decision, the trial court action was, instead, an action to collaterally attack (an allegedly) void Land Commission final decision. Once the trial court had determined that the Land Commission decision was void for the lack of due process, then the statute applied to the case before it and if the trial court wanted to proceed on the merits it had to first find special cause existed. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

When, while the trial court might have been able to make out a showing of special cause, it never did so, the appellate court must vacate the trial court determination of ownership and remand the matter to the Land Commission for it to conduct the formal hearing after at least 30 days notice to all interested parties and notice to the general public on the island. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

An answer or a Rule 12(b) motion is not untimely and will not be disregarded or stricken when no default has yet been requested and entered. Killion v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 539, 540 (Chk. 2014).

When, while the trial court might have been able to make out a showing of special cause, it never did so, the appellate court must vacate the trial court determination of ownership and remand the matter to the Land Commission for it to conduct the formal hearing after at least 30 days notice to all interested parties and notice to the general public on the island. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The Chuuk Constitution provides that the trial division of the State Supreme Court has "concurrent original jurisdiction with other courts to try all civil, criminal, probate, juvenile, traffic, and land cases." The word "concurrent" modifies the term "original jurisdiction" and when jurisdiction is concurrent, the appropriate court may be prescribed by statute. The appropriate court for land cases in declared land registration areas was prescribed by statute as an administrative agency, the Chuuk Land Commission. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 574, 575 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

While it is a matter of some concern, whether the Land Commission will be able to decide the case in a timely manner because of certain vacancies on the Commission, it is not a ground on which the appellate court can base its decision whether to remand to the Land Commission. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 574, 575 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The Chuuk Land Commission is not a court as that word is used in the Chuuk Constitution. It is an administrative agency that functions as a quasi-judicial tribunal. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 612, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The Chuuk Legislature, by statute, has determined that a land case in a declared land registration area must first go through the Land Commission procedure before it can become a land case in the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 612, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The constitutional grant of original court jurisdiction does not prevent the Legislature from prescribing by statute that certain land cases must first go to an administrative agency, the Chuuk Land Commission, before the trial court can exercise its original jurisdiction over them. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 612, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The Kosrae Land Court is entitled to determine an easement or right of way, because the land registration process is, with certain exceptions, supposed to determine all interests in the land, not just ownership interests. Ittu v. Ittu, 20 FSM R. 178, 187 (App. 2015).

While limited, the Kosrae Land Court's subject-matter jurisdiction is broad enough to encompass factual determinations of fraud and misrepresentation to the extent that they affect the validity of titles or conveyances of land. Indeed, that is the Land Court's very purpose. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 73 (App. 2016).

When the Kosrae Land Court itself is implicated in the allegations of fraud, that court is not competent to adjudicate the subject matter. Waguk v. Waguk, 21 FSM R. 60, 74 (App. 2016).

The Kosrae Land Court's written decision must be served on all claimants who appeared at the hearing, pursuant to the State Court rules prescribing service requirements. Esau v. Penrose, 21 FSM R. 75, 80 (App. 2016).

Any subsequent transfer from a registered owner, does not require notice, much less a hearing, to determine ownership anew or a written decision. Heirs of Alokoa v. Heirs of Preston, 21 FSM R. 94, 102 (App. 2016).

The Kosrae Land Court's statutory jurisdiction includes all matters concerning the title of land and any interest therein. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 578 (App. 2018).

An action alleging fraud or negligence or due process violation and in which the plaintiffs seek to regain the registered title to a land parcel their predecessor once held and in which the defendants seek to retain the registered title in their predecessor's name so that, in the future, they will become the parcel's registered owners, is a dispute over the parcel's title and is thus a matter concerning the title of land and the interests therein, over which the Kosrae Land Court has original jurisdiction. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 578-79 (App. 2018).

In past practice, it was common for the Kosrae Land Commission to be named a defendant when a party had occasion to complain about one of its acts or omissions since administrative agencies were often named as defendants when a party sought judicial review of the administrative agency's act or omission. But there is no reason why the Land Court should be a party to such an action because the Kosrae Land Court, unlike its predecessor, is not an administrative agency; it is a court. It is not proper to make the lower court a defendant when seeking judicial review of its actions in a higher court. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

When the Land Court does not own, or claim to own, any interest in a land parcel, it is not a proper party to any dispute over title to that parcel. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

The Land Court is not a proper party – a real party in interest – to any dispute over title because no judgment against the Land Court could ever give the plaintiffs the relief they seek – ownership of a parcel, which can only be done by an action against the current registered owner or his heirs, if he is deceased. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 620 (App. 2018).

Although the Kosrae Legislature did not vest exclusive jurisdiction in the Kosrae Land Court, it did create the Land Court as the court with original jurisdiction over land matters, and reserved appellate jurisdiction in the Kosrae State Court. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

When the proper place for a suit to have started was the Kosrae Land Court, but it was filed on the Kosrae State Court, the Kosrae State Court should have dismissed the Kosrae Land Court and the Kosrae state government as parties and, since it is the superior court in a unified court system, transferred the case from its docket to the Land Court's docket. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 623 (App. 2018).

The land registration team is designated to settle claims and adjudicate competing claims for parcels of land within a registration area, and if the Land Commission, upon review the record, is satisfied, it will issue a determination of ownership. If the Land Commission remains unsatisfied with the record, it can either remand with instructions to the registration team or hold further adjudications itself. It must provide notice of the determination of ownership to the interested parties, who then have 120 days to appeal, and if the time for appeal expires without any notice of appeal having been filed, the Commission must issue a certificate of title setting forth the names of all persons holding an interest in the land pursuant to the determination, and such certificate of title shall be conclusive proof upon all persons who have had actual or constructive notice of the proceedings. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 660 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Land Registration Team findings are superseded by a legal presumption of ownership over a parcel when the Land Commission has issued a valid and un-appealed determination of ownership. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 660 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

The Senior Land Commissioner is a public officer who oversees the Land Commission and who has the non-discretionary legal duty to issue a certificate of title to persons holding an interest in the land pursuant to the determination after the 120-day time limit for appeal has expired without an appeal. The Land Commission's continuous failure to issue a certificate of title for over 37 years following an un-appealed determination of ownership constitutes a breach of its duty and leaves the petitioner without any legal remedy other than to petition for a writ of mandamus, and to prevent this manifest injustice, equity requires that the court compel the Land Commission to fulfill its legal duty to issue a certificate of title to petitioner. Hartman v. Mailo, 21 FSM R. 657, 661 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Because Fefan and all areas under its political jurisdiction were designated as Land Registration Area 14, and because a tideland in Fefan falls under the political jurisdiction of Fefan, it thus lies within Registration Area 14, and the Land Commission therefore has primary jurisdiction to determine its ownership, as opposed to the court – unless, special cause is shown. Irons v. Rudolph, 22 FSM R. 408, 410 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

While an action for trespass remains proper for the court to hear because it is a court of general jurisdiction under the Chuuk State Judiciary Act of 1990, the Land Commission must resolve the question of title before the court can determine the trespass issue since the tideland was in a land registration area and no special cause was shown for court jurisdiction. Irons v. Rudolph, 22 FSM R. 408, 410 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Upon the filing of a registration area with the court, courts cannot entertain any action with regard to interests in land within that registration area without a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable before it is likely that the land commission can determine the matter. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

Land registration teams are to adjudicate claims to as much land within a registration area as practical within a year of the designation. If the registration team deems that a disputed claim's consideration will seriously interfere with accomplishing this or the land commission deems that one of its teams is spending an undesirable amount of time on a claim, the land commission may withdraw the claim from that team's consideration, and may then proceed to hear the claim itself or to refer the claim to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division for adjudication. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

Upon receipt of a land registration team's adjudication, the Land Commission may issue a determination of ownership if satisfied, but, if not satisfied with the adjudication, the Land Commission may either hold hearings on the matter or remand the issue back to the registration team, but the Land Commission has no authority to refer the matter to the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When a land commission consists of more than a senior commissioner, the concurrence of at least two members is necessary to constitute action by the commission. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576-77 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When the Senior Land Commissioner's letter of referral states that the land registration team would take an undesirable amount of time over the matter as the dispute had numerous issues of law which the land registration team was incapable of resolving, and when it states that the Land Commission decided against adjudicating since the parties and commissioners exhibited ill-will towards each other and therefore, the commissioners felt conflicted and prejudiced, that written explanation satisfies the statutory requirements for removal of an adjudication from a registration team in order to refer it to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 578 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When the entire commission body suffered from a conflict of interest in the matter as a result of ill feeling towards one of the parties, and the Senior Land Commissioner appeared to have the only valid signature for a decision, the statutory two-commissioner requirement does not apply to a decision as in that matter, because the Senior Land Commissioner's one signature referral to the court does not violate 67 TTC 116, since the two-signature requirement is for a valid Land Commission action or decision on substantive matters concerning property rights, not for a decision on procedural matters such as referral of a dispute to the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 579 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Leases

Although the court is powerless to compel Chuuk State to honor its lease agreement it has full power to restore unlawfully held property to its rightful owner as a remedy for forcible entry and unlawful detainer. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 136-37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where a party purchases land subject to prior liens and a lease is a prior lien noted on the title the purchase was made subject to the lease. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 198 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

A person, who acquires leased land from the lessees and the houses the lessees built on it, has no rights superior to the rights given the lessees in the lease. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

When a lease provides that lessees may build "such buildings as they see fit" on the land and that such buildings will become the lessor's property when the lease ended, the lessor has a vested future interest in the buildings if they are built. The interest is executory, resulting from a springing use, the event of which is when and if the lessees built structures. The lessor has a vested future interest in the buildings, once built, which ripens into possession at the lease's termination. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

A lessor's vested future interest in houses may be protected from an alteration which would change the structures' character. A wrongful eviction counterclaim based on the lessor's refusal to allow the houses to be turned into a bar will therefore be dismissed. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

When a lease provides that the lessees have the right to build such structures as they see fit with the buildings to become the lessor's property upon the lease termination and the lessees built two houses, they built such structures as they saw fit, and in doing so defined the nature of those structures. Once built, those structures became the lessor's property, although not until the lease's termination. At that time, the lessor was entitled to find himself the owner of dwellings, not a bar. He was within his rights to prevent the houses from being renovated for use in that manner. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 195 (App. 1999).

It is a well-recognized rule of law in Chuuk that lineage land cannot be transferred, distributed or sold by an individual member of the lineage without the consent or acquiescence of all adult members of that lineage, and it is assumed that this rule of law applies to "transfers" by lease as well. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 389 (Chk. 2001).

It would seem that for a long-term land lease (especially one that could last two or three or more generations) the level of lineage members' consent needed should be equivalent to that needed for a sale. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2002).

When a lineage as a whole has accepted all of the benefits of a lease – all of the payments that the lessee was required to make – up to the present and even beyond, it cannot now reject the burden of the lessee exercising its options to renew. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 161 (Chk. 2002).

Under the after-acquired title doctrine as it applies to leases, if a lessor purports to make a lease at a time when the lessor does not have title to the realty that is subject to that lease but then subsequently acquires legal title to the realty, such after-acquired title will inure to the lessee's benefit by means of estoppel and will be subject to the lessee's rights under the lease. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 468 (Chk. 2005).

The after-acquired title doctrine may be applied in favor of one holding the lease under an assignment from the original lessee, because an assignee of a landlord or tenant by estoppel stands in as good a position as his assignor and may sue on the lease's covenants. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 469 (Chk. 2005).

A lease agreement entered into by the parties was a valid contract because the promise to pay rent in exchange for exclusive use of the property constituted an offer, acceptance, and consideration and the agreement's terms were definite and enforceable. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2014).

A lease is a contract by which a rightful possessor of real property conveys the right to use and occupy the property in exchange for consideration, usually rent. A leasehold is a tenant's possessory estate in land or premises or an estate in realty held under a lease. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 466 n.2 (Pon. 2018).

A leasehold is the right to use property on which a lease is held for the purposes of the lease. FSM v. Tihpen, 21 FSM R. 463, 466 n.2 (Pon. 2018).

Any lease or use rights for a term not exceeding one year does not need to be stated in the certificate of title to be effective. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

A long-term lease (a lease for greater than one year), is an interest in land subject to Land Commission adjudication and must be stated in the certificate of title for it to be effective against third parties. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

A long-term lessee is entitled to notice as an interested party – as a claimant to an interest in that land – when that land is first registered. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

Persons, including a purported long-term lessee, known to a claimant, if not to the Land Commission, to claim interests in the land, are entitled, as interested parties, to actual notice of any Land Commission proceedings determining the land's ownership and other interests therein. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

When the lease did not require the lessee, at the lease's termination, to remove the structures and foundations, the lessor's requested damages will be reduced because the lessee should not have to pay for the removal of slabs and foundations that remain on the property. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

– Mortgages

In an action on a delinquent promissory note brought by an instrumentality of the national government which seeks to foreclose the mortgage securing the payment of the note, prior to the filing of an answer no interest in land is at issue, and therefore, the motion to dismiss on the ground that the court lacked jurisdiction is denied. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mori, 2 FSM R. 242, 244 (Truk 1987).

Failure to mention national courts in section 25 of the Pohnpei State Real Property Mortgage Act should not be read as an attempt to deprive litigants of access to the FSM Supreme Court's trial division. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 380 (Pon. 1988).

A lawsuit to enforce a mortgage is an attempt to enforce a type of lien against a delinquent debtor. Such a case bears a relationship to the power to regulate "bankruptcy and insolvency," which the Constitution, in article IX, section 2(g), places in the national Congress. Bank of Guam v. Semes, 3 FSM R. 370, 381 (Pon. 1988).

When loan collateral is in the lender's possession and the borrower has made a reasonable request that the lender liquidate the collateral to preserve its value, the lender should do so; but there is no duty in law requiring the lender to take possession of the collateral and foreclose on property at the borrowers' request when that property is not in the lender's possession, unless there is a provision in the mortgage requiring it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gouland, 9 FSM R. 605, 607 (Chk. 2000).

A mortgage foreclosure generally does not involve a dispute over who owns the land, but rather the mortgagor's undisputed ownership being transferred, often involuntarily, to a buyer or to the mortgagee to satisfy the mortgagor's debt. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 4 (Chk. 2001).

The Constitution does appear not to bar the FSM Supreme Court from exercising jurisdiction over FSM Development Bank mortgage foreclosures. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 1, 5 (Chk. 2001).

Only two courts have jurisdiction over the territory of Chuuk – the Chuuk State Supreme Court and the FSM Supreme Court. A mortgage foreclosure on land in Chuuk therefore could not be in any court other than those two. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 107, 110 (Chk. 2001).

Mandamus lies to compel a public official to perform a clear, nondiscretionary duty. When the petition is devoid of any allegation that the respondent is acting in an official capacity, when the Kosrae deed of trust statute does not confer on the respondent either the obligation or the express power to act as a trustee under a deed of trust, and when the petition is silent as to any other mechanism or source of authority by which the respondent in his official capacity has assumed the duties of the trustee under the deed of trust at issue so as to make the performance of those duties a "clear and nondiscretionary," mandamus is not available. FSM Dev. Bank v. Director of Commerce & Indus., 10 FSM R. 317, 319 (Kos. 2001).

A statute that requires the creditor to give written notice to the debtor of the creditor's intention to foreclose prior to foreclosing on the property, is inapplicable to setoffs because foreclosures and setoffs are very different things. Bank of the FSM v. Asugar, 10 FSM R. 340, 342 (Chk. 2001).

A foreclosure is a legal proceeding to terminate a mortgagor's interest in property, instituted by the lender (the mortgagee) either to gain title or to force a sale in order to satisfy the unpaid debt secured by the property. Bank of the FSM v. Asugar, 10 FSM R. 340, 342 (Chk. 2001).

Generally, money deposited in a bank account is a debt that the bank owes to the depositor – the bank is obligated to repay the money to the depositor, either on demand or at a fixed time. Money deposited in a bank account is thus not property mortgaged to the bank. Bank of the FSM v. Asugar, 10 FSM R. 340, 342 (Chk. 2001).

If a judgment-creditor were to attempt to execute against a piece of land for which there was a certificate of title and that certificate showed an outstanding mortgage on the land, or if there was no certificate of title for the land but a mortgage had been duly and properly recorded at the Land Commission so that anyone searching the records there should necessarily find it, then that would be a security interest that was not a secret lien and therefore valid against third parties. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 365 (Chk. 2003).

Certificates of title are required to show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year. A mortgage can and must show on the certificate to be effective against third parties. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 365 n.2 (Chk. 2003).

A buyer would usually expect to buy land without a mortgage or, if the land carries a mortgage, that a part of his purchase price will be used to pay off the mortgage so that he receives title free and clear of any mortgage. (Alternatively, a buyer might reduce his offer by the mortgage's outstanding balance and then pay off the mortgage himself.). In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

If a creditor's judgment is secured by a mortgage, it would have priority over the other unsecured judgment-creditors for the proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged property. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

If a judgment-creditor were to attempt to execute against a piece of land for which there was a certificate of title and that certificate showed an outstanding mortgage on the land, or if there was no certificate of title for the land but a mortgage had been duly and properly recorded at the Land Commission so that anyone searching the records there should necessarily find it, then that would be a security interest that was not a secret lien and therefore valid against third parties. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

Certificates of title are required to show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year. Therefore a mortgage can and must be shown on the certificate of title to be perfected and thus effective against third parties. If the property has not been issued a certificate of title, then the mortgage must be properly recorded in the chain of title so that someone searching the Land Commission files would expect to find it. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

A perfected security interest in land (the mortgage either shown on the certificate of title, or if no certificate, properly recorded) would have priority over any unsecured judgment-creditors, even those with writs of execution, should the mortgaged property be sold to satisfy the landowners' debts. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

The proper way to record a mortgage under the Torrens land registration system in use in Chuuk is for the mortgage and the landowner's [duplicate] certificate of title to be submitted to the Land Commission at the same time. The mortgage document is then recorded; the mortgage is endorsed on the certificate of title permanently on file at the Land Commission; and then a (new) duplicate certificate of title, showing the endorsement of the newly-recorded mortgage, is given (or returned) to the landowner. If this is done, then the security interest is perfected and the mortgage is valid and enforceable against all the world and has priority over all other claims to the proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged property. If all these steps are not done, then the security interest is not perfected and the mortgage does not carry priority over and is not effective against parties without notice of it – it is a disfavored secret lien. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 531 (Chk. 2003).

Failure to perfect a security interest does not affect the mortgage's validity and enforceability between the parties to it. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 531 (Chk. 2003).

A social security tax lien has priority over a mortgage because section 607 grants social security tax liens priority over all other liens regardless of whether the other liens arose earlier. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

Under the general rule a mortgage first in time has superior right in the absence of the applicability of a statutory provision to the contrary. Section 607 is a statutory provision to the contrary because it grants social security tax liens priority over all other liens regardless of whether the other liens arose earlier. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

A mortgagee's due process rights are not violated by a statute making another lien superior to its mortgage when the statute was enacted prior to the mortgage's execution. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

By state statute, a mortgage creates a lien on the land, but does not pass title to the mortgagee. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 68 (Chk. 2003).

Any land may be mortgaged by its owners, and such a mortgage may be recorded. But a mortgage on unregistered land can only be recorded, not registered because no certificate of title had been issued for it. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 68 (Chk. 2003).

The Chuuk Real Estate Mortgage Law confirms and adopts by reference rather than modifying or repealing the Title 67 provisions applicable to the endorsement of mortgages on certificates of title. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 70 (Chk. 2003).

A mortgage endorsed on a certificate of title cannot be given retroactive effect. To do so would destroy the purpose of the land registration system – that the original certificate of title at the Land Commission is conclusive and if there are no endorsements anyone searching the state of the title need look nowhere else for mortgages and for the other encumbrances that, with certain exceptions, are required to be listed there. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 71 (Chk. 2003).

A mortgagee will have a secured interest in any future funds that from the sale of the mortgaged land when, although the mortgage was not endorsed on the certificate of title before the case was consolidated with other judgment-creditors', all of the necessary documents for the Land Commission to endorse the mortgage had been submitted to the Land Commission by then. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 71 (Chk. 2003).

While a mortgagee bank may have policies and rules it must follow that require it to inquire into the purported collateral or security and require ownership documents and certified maps of the property's location when land is used as collateral or security for its loans, it has not been shown that violation of these policies and rules creates a duty to a stranger to the mortgage. They may create a duty to the bank's shareholder, and failure to follow them may result in the bank holding worthless security, but the bank has not been shown to have a general duty to all landowners not to accept a mortgage to land one of them might later claim. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127-28 (Chk. 2005).

The result of "negligence" in failing to properly record a mortgage on unregistered land is that the mortgage is ineffective against third parties – someone other than the mortgagor who had no notice of the mortgage (and the result is the same for registered land when a mortgage is not properly endorsed on the certificate of title). Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 & n.4 (Chk. 2005).

A mortgagor can only mortgage an interest in land that he owns at the time the mortgage is granted. If the mortgagors held no interest in the land they mortgaged, the bank would never be able to foreclose the mortgage (essentially it holds no security) since it can only foreclose the interests that the mortgagors held and mortgaged. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 (Chk. 2005).

There is some authority that a mortgagor can mortgage land that he does not own but will own in the future and that the mortgage then becomes effective when he acquires the land. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 n.5 (Chk. 2005).

A mortgagee that fails to ascertain the mortgagor's true interest in the mortgaged property does so at its own risk. Its punishment, if it can be called that, is that it has no security for the debt it is owed. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 (Chk. 2005).

When a plaintiff's determination of ownership is for a lot with one number and the bank holds mortgages on lots with other numbers, the bank does not have a mortgage for the plaintiff's lot and there is no proximate cause between the bank acquiring the mortgage and any later alleged damage to the plaintiff's lot. Whether the mortgage was properly recorded is immaterial. If the plaintiff was damaged, the mortgage did not cause it. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 (Chk. 2005).

Since a bank owed no duty of care to a plaintiff when it took a mortgage to secure a loan to another, and that mortgage, even if it is unenforceable, was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's alleged damages, the bank is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law on the plaintiff's negligence and void mortgage causes of action. Additional reasons for this are that the bank has not attempted to foreclose its mortgage and that the mortgage does not cover the lot for which the plaintiff has a determination of ownership. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 (Chk. 2005).

Holding a mortgage to property in which the mortgagor had no interest cannot be taking dominion over property. A mortgagee may take dominion over a mortgaged property only when it has foreclosed on the property and either taken title to it itself or had it sold to another. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 129 (Chk. 2005).

By taking a mortgage, a mortgagee does not claim title to (or dominion over) the property. A mortgage creates a lien on the land, but does not pass title to the mortgagee. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 129 n.6 (Chk. 2005).

A mortgagee, is not an insurer or guarantor of the mortgagor's actions. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 129 (Chk. 2005).

Since national court jurisdiction is proper when the parties are diverse, a Kosrae statute that requires a foreclosure action to be filed in Kosrae State Court cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of its constitutionally mandated jurisdiction under the FSM Constitution. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 325 (Kos. 2011).

Public policy cannot abide by the perverse result that would never leave a title quiet if the court were to recognize an indefinite expectancy right for a person to inherit his living parent's land and require a complainant to name all the landowner's children. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 325 (Kos. 2011).

When a landowner's children do not have a vested interest in the land, the foreclosure statute does not require a judgment creditor to name them as defendants. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 325 (Kos. 2011).

In a collection case based on a defaulted loan, no interest in land was ever at issue when the fee simple ownership of the parcel was never at issue and when the bank's registered mortgage lien was not at issue, so the jurisdictional language in section 6(a) is not applicable. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kansou, 17 FSM R. 605, 608 (Chk. 2011).

When the complaint alleges that a person is bound by the mortgage because another defendant, who signed the mortgage, held that person's power of attorney to act on his behalf in regard to the land, the plaintiff is estopped from and cannot deny that that person is a party to the mortgage and, since he is a party to the mortgage, he has standing to enforce its provisions. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 94 (Yap 2011).

The court will enforce a forum selection clause when the bank drafted the real estate mortgage and the bank chose to include the forum selection clause as one of the terms it insisted upon in the preprinted mortgage form it used to execute the mortgage; when a mortgagor not only does not expressly waive the bank's forum selection but he affirmatively insists upon the forum selection clause's enforcement; and when no other valid reason is apparent or has been asserted by the bank that would allow the clause's waiver. The bank may thus assert its real estate mortgage foreclosure remedy in the Yap State Court, the forum it chose, and the mortgagor may raise his defenses to the mortgage's validity there and the FSM Supreme Court will adjudicate the bank's action on the promissory note and on the chattel mortgage. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ayin, 18 FSM R. 90, 94 (Yap 2011).

A mortgagee does not have title to the land, only a lien. Helgenberger v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 498, 500 (App. 2013).

A mortgagee under the provisions of a chattel mortgage covering all the personal property of the insolvent may, on default, be entitled to take possession of the property and sell it to satisfy his claim. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 596 (Kos. 2013).

Since the Secured Transactions Act does not apply to the transfer of an interest in real property except as provided with respect to fixtures, crops, timber to be cut, or minerals to be extracted, a lender cannot have perfected a security interest in a factory building unless it had obtained a mortgage on the factory building (and presumably the land underneath it or an easement) and recorded that mortgage. The lender is therefore not entitled to pre-judgment possession of the factory building since it does not have a perfected security interest in it under the Act. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 597 (Kos. 2013).

The Pohnpei Mortgage Law requires that the complaint name all persons having or claiming an interest in the property subordinate to the mortgage interest. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 19 FSM R. 233, 235 (Pon. 2013).

When there are no transfers or encumbrances registered against the mortgaged parcels except for the bank's mortgages and a separate conveyance of a property interest in the land to the bank; when all the parties with an interest in the parcels are parties to the litigation; and when it is undisputed that the named defendants were duly served with a summons and complaint, an argument that the bank failed to comply with the statutory notice requirements must fail. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 19 FSM R. 233, 235 (Pon. 2013).

A mortgage foreclosure generally does not involve a dispute over who owns the land, but rather the mortgagor's undisputed ownership being transferred, often involuntarily, to a buyer or to the mortgagee to satisfy the mortgagor's debt. FSM Dev. Bank v. Estate of Edmond, 19 FSM R. 425, 432 (App. 2014).

When the subject mortgage required that the mortgagor not only refrain from removing or demolishing the buildings on the premises but also maintain the structures in good repair, as well as assign to the mortgagee all rents and profits derived from same, this language reflects that the buildings, and not just the land they were on, were expressly contemplated, in ascribing the respective value to the mortgage, as security for the underlying loan. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 88 (Pon. 2015).

When the previously court-appointed land sales agent has died and the mortgagee has proposed a successor agent and when the defendants have failed to cite any legal authority in support of their opposition to this proposed successor, the court will confirm the successor since he is familiar with the case's operative facts and is an employee of the mortgagee whose services would thus require no additional compensation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Setik, 20 FSM R. 85, 90 (Pon. 2015).

A mortgage foreclosure generally does not constitute an interest in land being at issue because in a mortgage foreclosure the interests in land are not in dispute – the parties all agree who owns the land and who holds the mortgage. The mortgagee just seeks to foreclose the mortgage which a mortgagor has pledged as security for a debt and which the mortgagor earlier agreed, when he signed the mortgage, could be sold if the debt remained unpaid. Thus, the Exception Clause does not preclude jurisdiction. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 416 (App. 2016).

When security, such as a guaranty, is given as part of the same transaction that created the debt to the bank, no further or independent consideration is needed. The loan itself is sufficient consideration. This principle holds true when a mortgage is the security given for a loan to a third party. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

The consideration for a mortgage may consist of a loan to a third person. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

It is not essential to a mortgage's validity that the mortgagor should have received the consideration. It is sufficient that the mortgagee parted with consideration. The consideration need not go directly from the mortgagee to the mortgagor. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 417 (App. 2016).

When a parcel was pledged as collateral for a loan in an executed security instrument and when the borrowers defaulted on the loan and the lender bank instituted enforcement proceedings and was allowed to enforce the mortgage's terms, the borrowers surrendered their ownership interest in this parcel and the ultimate transfer of ownership, as approved by the FSM Supreme Court, cannot be categorized as "wrongful or unauthorized," or a "frozen asset," when the borrowers had earlier obtained a Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure determination of heirship for the parcel that named them as the legal heirs to the property. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 37-38 (Pon. 2016).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court is not the only forum with jurisdiction to foreclose a mortgage on Pohnpei real estate because it is undisputed that the FSM Supreme Court may exercise such jurisdiction when the FSM Development Bank is the mortgagee since a state statute cannot divest the FSM Supreme Court of its jurisdiction. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 172 (Pon. 2017).

That the bank has also named persons in the mortgage foreclosure whose inclusion may be superfluous, does not affect the validity of the foreclosure against the registered owner as long as that person is named and all the proper steps for foreclosure are taken against that person. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 173 (Pon. 2017).

When no stay pending appeal had been granted, the trial court had the jurisdiction to not only deny the defendants' Rule 60(b) motion for relief from judgment, but it also had the jurisdiction to enforce the money judgment by mortgage foreclosure. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 518 (App. 2018).

The trial court's issuance of an order transferring title six days after the bank filed its motion and notice of payment was not reversible error when an earlier order in aid of judgment required that a court order transferring title to the parcel had to be issued no later than ten days after notice is given of delivery of a cashier's check in the full amount and when the appellants do not contend that there were any procedural defects in the sale on which they could base a challenge to its outcome. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 520 (App. 2018).

The Pohnpei State Mortgage Law provides that a deceased mortgagor's heirs and devisees take subject to a mortgage. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 643 (Pon. 2018).

FSM Development Bank loans that are determined to be no longer collectable are subject to write-off, but when the mortgaged parcel securing the loan is still generating income, in the form of monthly rent, the loan is still deemed to be capable of being paid off. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 21 FSM R. 640, 643-44 (Pon. 2018).

The enactment of FSM Code, Title 30 falls squarely within the Congress's express powers as delegated by the FSM Constitution. That 30 F.S.M.C. 137 deals with the FSM Development Bank's ability to acquire title to land places this activity squarely in the category of indisputedly national government powers. To function, the Bank must be able to deal with mortgages, as well as deeds and land titles, as land is the primary collateral possessed by most Micronesians. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 330 (Pon. 2019).

Under Pohnpei law, when a bank is entitled to a foreclosure of the mortgaged land as a matter of law, and the full judgment amount is not paid into court within three months of the judgment date, the court may, order the foreclosed property sold for the mortgagee's (the bank's) benefit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2020).

When the defaulting borrowers had executed a chattel mortgage to help secure a loan, and when the bank registered and thereby perfected its security interests in the chattels, the bank is entitled to a judgment on its claim to foreclose its chattel mortgage. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2020).

When the FSM Development Bank has a statutory right to reduce its claim to judgment and to foreclose its perfected security interest in the borrowers' medical equipment and also has the contractual right to do the same, the Constitution's Professional Services Clause does not make that contract illegal. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 481 (Pon. 2020).

– Personal

Because farming of short term crops, such as sugar cane, on someone else's land is not uncommon in Kosrae, the fruits of such farming are considered the personal property of the person planting them. Kosrae v. Tolenoa, 4 FSM R. 201, 204 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The property owned in full title by one who dies is inherited by the children of the deceased. Personal property suited for use by women is inherited by daughters and sisters. In re Estate of Hartman, 6 FSM R. 326, 330 (Chk. 1994).

Personal property is property other than land or interests in land. House of Travel v. Neth, 7 FSM R. 228, 229 (Pon. 1995).

Personal property is property other than land or interests in land. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R.

102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a judgment-creditor has requested a writ and no motion for an order in aid of judgment is pending, he is entitled to a writ of execution against the judgment-debtor's non-exempt personal property. Personal property is property other than land or interests in land. Saimon v. Wainit, 18 FSM R. 211, 214 (Chk. 2012).

A mortgagee under the provisions of a chattel mortgage covering all the personal property of the insolvent may, on default, be entitled to take possession of the property and sell it to satisfy his claim. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 596 (Kos. 2013).

Fixtures are goods that are fixed to real property, or are intended to become fixed to real property in a manner that causes a property right to arise in the goods under the prevailing law. Goods are all things that are movable when a security interest attaches and the term includes fixtures. Readily removable factory machines, office machines, and domestic appliances are not fixtures. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 598 (Kos. 2013).

A bona fide purchaser for value is someone who buys something for value without notice of another's claim to the property and without actual or constructive notice of any defects in or infirmities, claims, or equities against the seller's title; one who has in good faith paid valuable consideration for property without notice of prior adverse claims. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 21-22 (Chk. 2013).

An improper sale by a fiduciary (estate administrator) that has already taken place can be vacated, but not if the buyer was a bona-fide purchaser because, when property of an estate has been transferred to a bona-fide purchaser for value, the latter is protected even if the fiduciary was acting improperly. The beneficiaries' remedy is not to void the transaction but to seek damages for the personal representative's breach of his fiduciary duty. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. 2013).

A bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, should be as protected buying shares from the distributee as he would have been buying them from the fiduciary administrator, especially when it was the same person. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 23 (Chk. 2013).

Someone who has wrongfully sold property to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice can be compelled to buy a replacement if this is reasonably possible. Sometimes damages are the only appropriate remedy. Either way, the rightful heir's remedy is against estate administrator. If it were any other way, then anyone who ever bought property after it had been inherited and distributed by a Pohnpei probate court final order could never be certain that his or her title would not be taken away by a future final probate court order that the distributee seller was not the proper distributee. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 23 (Chk. 2013).

The elements of a conversion action are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. "Personalty" is personal property as distinguished from real property. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

When the defaulting borrowers had executed a chattel mortgage to help secure a loan, and when the bank registered and thereby perfected its security interests in the chattels, the bank is entitled to a judgment on its claim to foreclose its chattel mortgage. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2020).

– Personal – Bailment

Bailment occurs when one person has lawfully acquired possession of another's personal property; the bailor retains ownership, but the bailee has lawful possession and exclusive control over the property for the duration of the term of the lease. Vehicle rental agreements are bailment leases. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 305 (Pon. 2004).

A bailment is created by the delivery of personal property by one person to another, in trust for a specific purpose, pursuant to an express or implied contract to fulfill the trust. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The delivery of property to another under an agreement to repair is a bailment. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The bailee, having custody of the bailor's property, has the obligation to exercise due care to protect the property from loss, damage or destruction. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A presumption arises that a bailee who has sole actual and exclusive possession of the goods has been negligent if he cannot explain the loss, disappearance or damage of the bailed property, its parts or contents. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A bailee is liable for all repairs and replacement for the bailed property that are necessary due to his neglect or lack of care. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

In assessing damages, the court may take judicial notice of the prevailing cost in Kosrae of items similar to the ones lost. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A bailment is created by the delivery of personal property by one person to another, in trust for a specific purpose, pursuant to an express or implied contract to fulfill the trust. The delivery of property to another under an agreement to repair is a bailment. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 189 (Pon. 2017).

– Public Land

Basic notions of fair play, as well as the Constitution, require that Public Lands Authority decisions be made openly and after giving appropriate opportunity for participation by the public an interested parties. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 420-21 (Pon. 1984).

When there is reason to believe that provisions of a public land lease may have been violated by the lessee, and where another person has notified the Public Lands Authority of his claim of a right to have the land leased to him, the Public Lands Authority may not consider itself bound by the lease's renewal provision but is required to consider whether it has a right to cancel the lease and, if so, whether the right should be exercised. These are decisions to be made after a rational decision-making process in compliance with procedural due process requirements of article IV, section 3 of the FSM Constitution. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 421 (Pon. 1984).

When a Public Land Authority has erred procedurally, but there is no suggestion of bad faith or substantive violations by the Authority, the FSM Supreme Court may appropriately employ the doctrine of primary jurisdiction to remand the public land issue to the Authority for its decision. Etpison v. Perman, 1 FSM R. 405, 429 (Pon. 1984).

The Pohnpei Public Lands laws do not provide for the disposal or lease of public lands in Kolonia Town by the Pohnpei Public Lands Authority. Micronesian Legal Servs. Corp. v. Ludwig, 3 FSM R. 241, 247 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Abstention by national courts is desirable in a case affecting state efforts to establish a coherent policy concerning how private persons may obtain rights to use land currently held by the state government.

Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 44 (Pon. 1989).

Plaintiff's due process rights were not violated where the government did not use condemnation procedures specified in 67 TTC 451, but followed land registration procedures to obtain title and treated the plaintiff fairly and in the same way it treated other landowners. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 152-54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where the alleged trespassers did not claim to have an interest in the land at the time of the determination of ownership they cannot now raise as a defense a claim that the land in question is public land when that issue was decided in the determination of ownership process and certificates of title issued. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 156-57 (Pon. 1993).

A Certificate of Title issued by a state land commission precludes a claim by the state that the land is public land. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 51 (App. 1995).

Since under 67 TTC 1 public lands were lands situated within the Trust Territory as the government of the Trust Territory had acquired or would acquire for public purposes, in Chuuk public lands are those lands located in Chuuk that the state has acquired or will acquire for public purposes. Sana v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 252, 254 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

In Chuuk the leasing of private land by the government for public purposes is an exercise of the state's eminent domain power because the Chuuk Constitution requires that the state should negotiate a voluntary lease, sale or exchange, if possible, instead of an involuntary taking. Sana v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 252, 254 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

In Chuuk land leased by the government for a public purpose is public land for the duration of the term of the lease. Sana v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 252, 255 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Early termination of a lease for which the State of Chuuk has fully paid is a disposal of public land which the governor cannot do without the advice and consent of the legislature. Sana v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 252, 255 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Prior to the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution the ownership of the filled marineland was with the Japanese government and that title was transferred to the Trust Territory pursuant to 67 TTC §§ 1 and 2 and later to Truk State. Atin v. Eram, 7 FSM R. 269, 271 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A forced sale of land under duress to the Japanese government does not make that land public land. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 588 (App. 1996).

Private individuals lack standing to assert claims on behalf of the public and cannot bring claims against the state on behalf of the public with respect to state land. Therefore a private landowner does not have standing to sue the state with respect to black rocks deposited below the ordinary high water mark because that is state land, but he does have standing to sue with respect to black rocks located above the high water mark and on his land. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 341 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A claim that no one owned an island is in the nature of a claim that the island is public land. Generally, but not always, it is the state government that would assert that some land is public land. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 454, 457 & n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

When a plaintiff obtained an assignment that was registered and subsequently dissolved by the Public Lands Board, the plaintiff was directly and adversely affected by the Board's decision, and thus has standing to sue the Board. There can be no question that the plaintiff is the real party in interest. Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 90 (Pon. 2003).

The Board of Trustees of the Pohnpei Public Lands Trust is the sole entity empowered and authorized to execute a lease agreement in regard to Pohnpei public lands, and when the Board has executed a residential lease agreement, the holder of the residential lease for the property is the present tenant and enjoys privity of contract and privity of estate in relation to that parcel. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2003).

Under Pohnpei law, an executory interest in the assignment of a public lands leasehold expires on the grantor's death. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2003).

When an assignment of public land was never approved by the Board and by the form lease agreement's terms, the tenant could not sublease, transfer or assign any interest in the premises without the Board's prior written consent, the assignment could not become a possessory interest until the Board gave its written approval. Upon the assignor's death, the leasehold interest became part of the assignor's estate, and the assignment was extinguished. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 206, 213 (Pon. 2003).

The doctrine of equitable estoppel operates to preclude a party from asserting a right he otherwise might have had, based upon his previous conduct. Equitable estoppel is applied to governments in the FSM when this is necessary to prevent manifest injustice and where the interests of the public will not be significantly prejudiced. Equitable estoppel thus applies to prevent (or estop) the Board of Trustees from claiming that a party had no existing right to a lot when it had given that party a lease (which was duly recorded at the State Land Registry) to that lot and had taken that party's lease payments for years. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 14 FSM R. 458, 462 (Pon. 2006).

When a party had some right to a lot, it was, at a minimum, entitled to notice that the Board of Trustees believed the party's lease was invalid and that the Board intended to revoke the lease and put that lot up for public bid. The party was also entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard on the issue of the lease's validity before the Board revoked the lease. When the Board did not give the party any notice and revoked its lease and issued a lease to another, this lack of notice to the party would thus make the later issuance of a lease invalid. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 14 FSM R. 458, 462 (Pon. 2006).

Since in 2004 the plaintiff held an unexpired, recorded lease to Lot No. 014-A-08 for which the lease payments were current and up to date, it was entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard before the Board of Trustees could disregard or void that lease and advertise Lot No. 014-A-08 for immediate lease or could lease Lot No. 014-A-08 to another. This is true even if the Board considered the lease "illegal" due to omissions in the approval process. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 109 (Pon. 2010).

When the plaintiff's lease had not been voided after notice and an opportunity to be heard before its leased lot was advertised for immediate commercial lease, the Board violated the plaintiff's civil rights because it denied the plaintiff the due process of law when it did not give the plaintiff prior notice and an opportunity to be heard on the validity of its lease. This is because notice and an opportunity to be heard are the essence of due process of law. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 110 (Pon. 2010).

A public land lease is void when it was issued without any prior notice to the then current lessee of record and without any opportunity for the current lessee to be heard and when it was issued without any prior notice to the then current lessee during the term of the lease held by the then current lessee and since it was set to start on a date during the term of the lease held by the then current lessee. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 110 (Pon. 2010).

When no one holds a valid lease for a lot, no one owes any lease payments for the lot. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 111 (Pon. 2010).

A public land lease that has a provision that a holdover by a lessee does not give rise to any right to a renewal of the lease by the holdover lessee, indicates that any right to renew would not be automatic. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 111 (Pon. 2010).

Since one of the Board's purposes is to administer, manage and regulate the use of public lands for the people of Pohnpei, this purpose is not served by leaving a lot without a lessee and not in productive use, especially when, the Pohnpei Legislature has directed that public lands in the cadastral plat including that lot be leased in an expeditious manner with the intent that all public land within that plat should be fully leased. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 111 (Pon. 2010).

When a plaintiff, based on its paid-up and unexpired prior lease, had a right superior to a later lessee to possess or occupy a public land lot No. 014-A-08, when the later lessees occupied that lot, they were trespassing. This is because the issue in a trespass action is who among the parties has the superior right to possession. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

It cannot be said that consequential damages were contemplated for the termination of a lease five months early when the leased land had remained undeveloped for a long while and when it is difficult to see what development could have taken place in those five months that would have earned the plaintiff a profit during those five months, that is, whether there would be any consequential damages because the plaintiff was deprived of the use of an undeveloped lot for the last five months of its lease. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

Where the evidentiary hearing or trial mandated by the appellate court is to determine the plaintiff's actual damages for the defendant's violation of the plaintiff's civil rights when it terminated the lot lease five months early, and where damages beyond the five-month period are contingent on whether the plaintiff should be granted a new or renewed lease to the lot, that is not the subject of the trial but is the subject of what will be a different proceeding. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 378 (Pon. 2014).

When, if specific performance were ordered, the court would order that the plaintiff be allowed to resume possession of a lot for five more months, but when, because that lot was undeveloped and did not generate any revenue, five months of resumed occupation by the plaintiff would not affect the plaintiff's income and thus specific performance of the last five months of the lease would seem pointless, a money award for actual damages should suffice. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 378 (Pon. 2014).

The Pohnpei Residential Shoreline Act of 2009 outlines procedures to be followed in applying for a residential leasehold from the Chief of the Division of Public Land of the Department of Land and Natural Resources. It mandates that, upon the receipt of an application pursuant to the Act, the Chief of the Division of Public Land shall orchestrate a survey of the filled land for which the application has been submitted, and upon satisfaction that the applicant and the land meet the Act's criteria, the Chief must issue a certificate of eligibility for a residential leasehold to the applicant. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 529 (Pon. 2014).

Under Pohnpei state law, submerged public trust lands to a distance of not more than 150 feet extending seaward from a residential shoreline that have been filled for the purpose of constructing all or a portion of a residence thereon before December 31, 2008 are designated as available for residential lease. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 529 (Pon. 2014).

When the court cannot establish that the plaintiffs' pending application under the Pohnpei Residential Shoreline Act of 2009 complies with the Act's requirements, the plaintiffs have not demonstrated an inchoate possessory interest over the landfill by virtue of their pending application for a leasehold interest, and since the plaintiffs do not have title or a leasehold interest in the landfill and cannot demonstrate an inchoate possessory interest under the Act, they cannot demonstrate a legally cognizable property right to exclusive possession of the landfill and therefore their trespass claim must fail. Damarlane v. Damarlane,

Under a plain reading of Secretarial Order 2969, Trust Territory public lands were transferred to the respective Trust Territory districts, and thus Trust Territory public lands on Weno were earlier transferred to the Truk District government. Although, on July 12, 1979, when the FSM Constitution took effect, any Trust Territory government interest in property was transferred to the FSM for retention or distribution in accordance with the FSM Constitution, public land on Weno was not Trust Territory government property since all Trust Territory public land there had already been transferred to the Truk district government. It would thus have been Truk district government property. Chuuk v. Weno Municipality, 20 FSM R. 582, 584-85 (Chk. 2016).

In Pohnpei, all marine areas below the ordinary high watermark belong to the government, and such lands are a part of the Pohnpei Public Lands Trust with certain exceptions reestablishing customary rights to the people in areas below the high watermark. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 641 (Pon. 2016).

By law, public land cannot be subdivided for homesteading or development unless public roads were laid out or established insuring public access to each new lot or parcel. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 654 (Chk. 2016).

Under Secretarial Order 2969, Amendment No. 1, Trust Territory public lands in Chuuk were conveyed to the Chartered Truk District Government, and the Chuuk state government is the legal successor to the Truk district government. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

Even though the lessee's inertia could lead the Board to reasonably conclude that the leased lot would remain undeveloped, this dormancy did not relieve the Board from providing notice and an opportunity to be heard with regard to the improperly executed lease to a different lessee. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 21 FSM R. 525, 534 (App. 2018).

A court will not overturn a Pohnpei Public Lands Trust Board decision for which there was a rational basis unless that decision was rendered unlawfully – in violation of one or more subsections of 8 Pon. C. § 3-104(2). Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 22 FSM R. 137, 143 (Pon. 2019).

A Public Lands Trust Board decision had a sound basis in reason and with regard to the facts when it favored the expansion of an existing business that serves the general population over another's proposed new business that would serve a narrow market segment because it was not unreasonable or irrational for the Board to favor assisting or encouraging an existing business with a proven track record rather than take a chance on the possible success of a proposed new development of uncertain utility or usefulness; because the Board had sufficient evidence upon which to make this determination; and because it followed procedures that should have assured a fair and rational decision-making process. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 22 FSM R. 137, 144 (Pon. 2019).

Being the prior lessee of Pohnpei public land does not entitle that party to an automatic renewal of its lease upon request, especially when the lessee has not yet developed the lot. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 22 FSM R. 137, 145 (Pon. 2019).

When the Public Lands Trust Board, in reaching its decision, did not act in excess of its jurisdiction, or violate lawful procedure, or act arbitrarily and capriciously, or in abuse of its power, the court has no alternative but to confirm the Board's determination that the lot should be leased to one of two bidders. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 22 FSM R. 137, 145 (Pon. 2019).

A clear legislative directive, that all public lands in a certain cadastral plat should be fully leased in an expeditious manner, is a clear statement of the public interest about that particular public land. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 22 FSM R. 203, 210 (Pon. 2019).

The Pohnpei Public Lands Authority is a legal entity that receives, holds, and disposes of Pohnpei public lands, but does not relate to the national government's ability to hold title to private land through the FSM Development Bank. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 332 (Pon. 2019).

The FSM Constitution, art. XV, § 3, states that a property interest held by the Trust Territory government is transferred to the FSM for retention or distribution in accordance with the Constitution. Other FSM Constitution provisions govern land ownership and use, and FSM law allows for national government eminent domain and real property acquisition. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 333 (Pon. 2019).

– Registered Land

Heirs are those persons who acquire ownership upon someone's death. Thus the later issuance of a Certificate of Title to "heirs" confirms their earlier ownership of the property. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 49 n.8 (App. 1995).

Where parties had no claims to the land at the time the title was determined they were not entitled to notice. The lack of notice to them does not raise a genuine issue of material fact as to the validity of a Certificate of Title. Where a court proceeding determined title, the lack of a record of notice in the Land Commission files does not raise a genuine issue of material fact as to the validity of the Certificate of Title because the Land Commission did not conduct the hearing on title and so would not have any record of notice. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 49 (App. 1995).

FSM courts must consider customary law where relevant to a decision, but it is not error for a court to consider custom and find that it is not relevant to its decision because a Certificate of Title had been issued for the land. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 50 (App. 1995).

While, as a general rule, res judicata applies only to parties, and their privies, to an earlier proceeding, a Torrens system land registration Certificate of Title is, by statute, prima facie evidence of ownership stated therein as against the world, and conclusive upon all persons who had notice and those claiming under them. As a general rule a Certificate of Title can be set aside only on the grounds of fraudulent registration. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 50-51 (App. 1995).

A Certificate of Title issued by a state land commission precludes a claim by the state that the land is public land. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 51 (App. 1995).

A court need not decide whether a party who is being sued for trespass, and who does not claim ownership, may raise as an affirmative defense a challenge to the validity of a plaintiff's Certificate of Title issued under the Torrens land registration system when the issues raised by the defendant are insufficient to challenge the Certificate of Title. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 51-52 (App. 1995).

Certificates of Title to real property are conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings that resulted in the issuance of the certificates, and all those claiming under them, and are prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world. Etscheit v. Nahnken of Nett, 7 FSM R. 390, 392 (Pon. 1996).

Because Certificates of Title are prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world, a court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them when considering challenges to their validity or authenticity. Etscheit v. Nahnken of Nett, 7 FSM R. 390, 394 (Pon. 1996).

Once a Designation of Land Registration Area is made, courts should not entertain actions with regard to interests in such land unless special cause is shown for so doing. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 238 (App. 1998).

The statutory provisions required for notice to those the land registration team might find from preliminary inquiry to have claims includes both actual service on known claimants and posting. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 238 (App. 1998).

When a court makes the determination of ownership the Land Commission is not relieved from giving notice of that determination prior to issuing the certificate of title. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 238 (App. 1998).

An argument that a certificate of title is invalid because of an adverse possession claim must fail when the twenty years necessary for adverse possession has not passed. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

Because Certificates of Title are prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world, a court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them when considering challenges to their validity or authenticity. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

As a general rule, a Torrens system land registration Certificate of Title is, by statute, prima facie evidence of ownership stated therein as against the world, and conclusive upon all persons who had notice and those claiming under them; but when a person has asserted a claim to the land and was not given notice of the registration proceedings as required by law, the Determination of Ownership and the Certificate of Title for that land is not conclusive as upon him. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 93 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

In land cases, notice requirements shall be followed. Failure to serve actual notice on a claimant is a denial of due process and violation of law. Due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, Determinations of Ownership and Certificates of Title will be set aside as void. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 89, 95 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Any aggrieved party may appeal a land commission determination of ownership at any time within 120 days from the date of determination. If it is not appealed within 120 days, then the land commission shall issue a certificate of title which is conclusive evidence of ownership of the land as to all persons who received notice of the land commission's action. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A Certificate of Title is prima facie evidence of ownership and is conclusive upon a person who appeared as a witness at the formal hearing and those claiming under her. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 513, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

As a general rule, a Torrens system land registration Certificate of Title is, by statute, prima facie evidence of ownership stated therein as against the world, and conclusive upon all persons who had notice and those claiming under them. However, when a person has asserted a claim to the land and was not given notice of the registration proceedings as required by law, the Determination of Ownership and the Certificate of Title for that land is not conclusive as upon him. Nena v. Heirs of Nena, 9 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A Determination of Ownership is not conclusive upon a claimant who was identified early in the Land Commission proceedings and who also testified in support of his claim at the formal hearing but was not served a copy of the Determination of Ownership. Nena v. Heirs of Nena, 9 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

In land cases, statutory notice requirements must be followed. Failure to serve actual notice on a claimant is a denial of due process and violation of law. Due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, Determinations of Ownership and Certificates of Title will be set aside as void. Nena v. Heirs of Nena, 9 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a party, who had shown an interest in the parcel, was not served the Determination of Ownership as required by law, the parcel's Determination of Ownership and the Certificate of Title will, due to the violations of the statutory notice requirement, be vacated and set aside as void and remanded to the Land Commission to again issue and serve the Determination of Ownership for the parcel in accordance with statutory requirements. Nena v. Heirs of Nena, 9 FSM R. 528, 530 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The issuance of a Determination of Ownership is not the final step in the land registration process. Issuance of a Certificate of Title is. Generally, certificates of title are to be issued shortly after the time to appeal a determination of ownership has expired or shortly after an appeal has been determined. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 370 (Chk. 2001).

A Certificate of Title must, with exception of rights of way, taxes, and leases of less than one year, set forth the names of all persons or groups of persons holding interest in the land, and should include a description of the land's boundaries. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 370 (Chk. 2001).

When a Determination of Ownership has been issued but no Certificate of Title has been issued, the Land Commission's ownership determination process has been started but has not been completed. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 370 (Chk. 2001).

A plaintiff with a certificate of title for a parcel clearly has greater possessory interest to the disputed property so that a defendant is liable for trespass on the plaintiff's parcel when he has entered, cleared and planted crops inside the established boundaries of the plaintiff's parcel without the plaintiff's consent. Shrew v. Killin, 10 FSM R. 672, 674 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Certificates of title are by statute, prima facie evidence of ownership stated therein as against the world. Because of this, a court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them when considering challenges to their validity or authenticity. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Because certificates of title to real property are prima facie evidence of ownership as stated therein against the world, a court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them when considering challenges to their validity or authenticity. A party challenging the certificates' validity thus bears the burden of proving that they are not valid or authentic. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 101 (Pon. 2002).

When to dispute the plaintiffs' ownership of the property, the defendants have the burden of showing that the plaintiffs' certificates of title are not valid or authentic, or that the relevant certificate of title does not cover the land the defendants occupy, whether the land the defendants occupy was part of the land in a 1903 auction is not a genuine issue of material fact because the defendants' unsupported contention does not dispute the validity of the certificates showing the plaintiffs to be the property's owners. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 101 (Pon. 2002).

That a later survey was performed and another certificate of title issued for the same land does not somehow dilute the certificate holders' ownership of the property, or make defendants' claim to it any more substantial. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 102 (Pon. 2002).

Whether a certificate of title issued in 1983 was voidable is not a genuine issue as to a material fact which would prevent the granting of summary judgment because the plaintiffs presently hold a certificate of title for the property defendants presently occupy. The party challenging the certificate's validity bears the burden of proving that it is not valid or authentic, and when the defendants have failed to show that the relevant certificate of title is invalid, their argument does not create a genuine issue of material fact. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 104 (Pon. 2002).

Courts are required to attach a presumption of correctness to a certificate of title. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 158 (Chk. 2002).

It would seem that due process would require that in any lawsuit to remove someone's name from a certificate of title that that person would be an indispensable party to the action. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 11 FSM R. 152, 158 n.4 (Chk. 2002).

When the plaintiffs are entitled to continued use of a parcel on a permanent land use basis pursuant to a land use grant made in 1974 by the defendant's now decreased father, title to the parcel will be issued in the defendant's name as fee simple owner, but the Certificate of Title to that parcel must also reflect the plaintiffs' permanent land use right. Robert v. Semuda, 11 FSM R. 165, 168 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The law is clear when the Land Commission knew of a civil action judgment and that a person was a claimant and interested party for the parcels, which were the subject of the judgment and later the subject of Land Commission proceedings, but that person was not served personal notice of the formal hearings or the Determinations of Ownership for the parcels. Pursuant to established precedent, Determinations of Ownership and Certificates of Title will be held void and vacated when proper notice was not given pursuant to statute. Actual notice to an interested party is required by personal service. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 246, 248 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the plaintiff was never served statutory notice of the formal hearings or Determinations of Ownership issued for the parcels, those Determinations of Ownership and Certificates of Title must be vacated and set aside as void and the matter remanded for further proceedings consistent with statute. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 246, 248 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Certificates of title are required to show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year. A mortgage can and must show on the certificate to be effective against third parties. UNK Wholesale, Inc. v. Robinson, 11 FSM R. 361, 365 n.2 (Chk. 2003).

When a person, entitled to be served notice of the hearing, was not served actual notice of the hearing by personal service, there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law and when there was no substantial compliance with the notice requirements specified by law, the Certificate of Title and the Determination of Ownership will be vacated and set aside as void, and the matter remanded to Kosrae Land Court for further proceedings. Albert v. Jim, 11 FSM R. 487, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Certificates of title are required to show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year. Therefore a mortgage can and must be shown on the certificate of title to be perfected and thus effective against third parties. If the property has not been issued a certificate of title, then the mortgage must be properly recorded in the chain of title so that someone searching the Land Commission files would expect to find it. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 530 (Chk. 2003).

The proper way to record a mortgage under the Torrens land registration system in use in Chuuk is for the mortgage and the landowner's [duplicate] certificate of title to be submitted to the Land Commission at the same time. The mortgage document is then recorded; the mortgage is endorsed on the certificate of title permanently on file at the Land Commission; and then a (new) duplicate certificate of title, showing the endorsement of the newly-recorded mortgage, is given (or returned) to the landowner. If this is done, then the security interest is perfected and the mortgage is valid and enforceable against all the world and has priority over all other claims to the proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged property. If all these steps are not done, then the security interest is not perfected and the mortgage does not carry priority over and is not effective against parties without notice of it – it is a disfavored secret lien. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 531 (Chk. 2003).

A party must comply strictly with the Torrens land registration system's procedures in order to claim its benefits. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 531 (Chk. 2003).

Since the Land Commission only has authority to issue a certificate of title after the time for appeal from a Land Commission determination of ownership has expired without any notice of appeal having been filed, when a notice of appeal was timely filed with the Chuuk State Supreme Court and the appellee had notice of the appeal, she is precluded from using the certificate of title against the appellant, and its issuance has no conclusive effect because once a notice of appeal had been filed, the Land Commission acted ultra vires, or outside of its authority, when it issued the certificate of title. The certificate is thus void. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 11 FSM R. 582, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

It is fairly clear that a purchaser who has actual knowledge of some adverse claim to the land will take subject to it, even though the certificate of title fails to memorialize it. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 67 n.4 (Chk. 2003).

On registered land encumbrances such as a mortgage must be endorsed upon the certificate of title. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 68 (Chk. 2003).

American common law authorities are applicable in the Federated States of Micronesia, if they are applicable at all, only to "recorded" land – to land that has not been issued a certificate of title. Land with a certificate of title is not part of a land recordation system but is part of a Torrens land registration system. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 68 (Chk. 2003).

A Torrens land registration system is a legal concept completely foreign to American common law and the related recording statutes. Common law precedents and procedures do not apply to registered land. Land registration is wholly statutory. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 68-69 (Chk. 2003).

The purpose and benefit of the lengthy procedure and notice requirements needed to register land is that a certificate of title, once issued, is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them and shall be prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world. This is unlike a "conventional" recording system, which makes no averments to the public about the state of title to any parcel of land. Instead it merely invites searchers to inspect the copies of the instruments which it contains and to draw their own conclusions as to title. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

The ownership as stated in the certificate of title is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them and prima facie evidence against the world. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

No lengthy title searches, which may fail to turn up important claims, need be done on registered land because all transfers and encumbrances of any interest in the land covered by a certificate of title must be noted thereon or therewith except for rights of way over the land, taxes on the land due within the two years prior to the certificate's issuance, and leases or use rights of less than one year. One only needs to consult the Land Commission's original certificate of title, which will show at a glance the ownership of, and the encumbrances on, the property, and the title searcher need then only read and evaluate the documents referred to by the current endorsements. No historical search of the title is ever necessary or relevant. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

An adverse possession claim will never prevail over a validly-issued certificate of title. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

The benefits of land registration all flow from the adherence to the Torrens land registration statutes and people's ability to rely on the certificate of title. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

The Chuuk Real Estate Mortgage Law confirms and adopts by reference rather than modifying or repealing the Title 67 provisions applicable to the endorsement of mortgages on certificates of title. In re

Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 70 (Chk. 2003).

Although preferable, endorsements on certificates of title are not required to be typewritten. Hand printing would suffice. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 70 (Chk. 2003).

In some Torrens land registration system jurisdictions, considering that the purpose of land registration acts is to allow confident reliance upon the land registration agency's original certificate of title, the absence of even an obvious encumbrance (or an encumbrance of which there is actual knowledge) from the certificate is fatal because the certificate itself is conclusive. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 70-71 (Chk. 2003).

A mortgage endorsed on a certificate of title cannot be given retroactive effect. To do so would destroy the purpose of the land registration system – that the original certificate of title at the Land Commission is conclusive and if there are no endorsements anyone searching the state of the title need look nowhere else for mortgages and for the other encumbrances that, with certain exceptions, are required to be listed there. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 71 (Chk. 2003).

A mortgagee will have a secured interest in any future funds that from the sale of the mortgaged land when, although the mortgage was not endorsed on the certificate of title before the case was consolidated with other judgment-creditors', all of the necessary documents for the Land Commission to endorse the mortgage had been submitted to the Land Commission by then. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 71 (Chk. 2003).

The Land Commission has primary jurisdiction to determine and register land titles. Once an area has been designated as a land registration area, courts cannot entertain any action regarding land titles in that area unless special cause has been shown. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

The statute authorizes only the Land Commission to declare a land registration area. No authority has been identified that would permit a court to designate a land registration area, or to order the Land Commission to designate one. The statute leaves that to the Land Commission's discretion based upon its determination of desirability and practicability, which is uniquely within its expertise and authority to make. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

A court can determine no more than who among the parties before it has a better claim to title (or in the case of trespass – possession). A court usually cannot determine who has title good against the world. Land registration (determination of title presumptively good against the world) is the province of the Land Commission and its procedures. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

No court could grant as relief a sweeping request to nullify all certificates of title to all persons who are not heirs of legatees pursuant to a will when such a request would reverse long-settled, final cases not now before the court, with parties not now before the court, and award others title to land for which certificates of title have already been issued because that would have the court void certificates of title in a manner that would violate every notion of due process of law. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 277 (App. 2003).

Co-owners of land are generally considered indispensable parties to any litigation involving that land. This should be especially true when full title to the land is at stake, and even more important when the land will be registered and a certificate of title issued for it because a certificate of title, once issued, is conclusive upon a person who had notice of the proceedings and a person claiming under him and is prima facie evidence of ownership. This is because a cotenant cannot be divested of his interest by a proceeding against all the co-owners of the common property unless he is made a party to the proceeding and served with legal process. Anton v. Heirs of Shrew, 12 FSM R. 274, 278-79 (App. 2003).

No court could grant as relief a far-reaching request to nullify all certificates of title to all persons who are not heirs of legatees pursuant to a will when such a request would reverse long-settled, final cases not now before the court, with parties not now before the court, and award others title to land for which certificates of title have already been issued because that would have the court void certificates of title in a manner that would violate every notion of due process of law. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 288-89 (App. 2003).

Properly issued certificates of title are by statute prima facie evidence of the ownership stated therein as against the whole world, and a court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 400 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under Kosrae State Code § 11.615(3), land held under a certificate of title may be subject to a right of way whether or not the right of way is stated in the certificate of title. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 518 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world. Therefore the court, pursuant to established precedent and in accordance with Kosrae's Torrens system land registration process, must attach a presumption of correctness to a certificate of title for a parcel, including its ownership and its boundaries. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 531, 533-34 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A quiet title court judgment is only good against the parties to the case and those in privity with them, while a certificate of title to registered land is presumptively valid against the world. Dereas v. Eas, 12 FSM R. 629, 633 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world, and a court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them when considering challenges to their validity. Since a certificate of title issued to the defendant carries a presumption of correctness, it must be presumed that the defendant is the true owner of the parcel. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The Land Commission has no authority to reopen a 1981 determination of ownership that is final and res judicata, but it must determine the land's exact boundaries before it can issue a certificate of title. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99e (Chk. 2004).

Adverse possession is not a claim that can be made against registered land, or land that has been one step (determination of boundaries) away from being registered land since 1981, and the filing of a trespass suit tolls (suspends) any running of the time period needed to assert an adverse possession claim. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99e (Chk. 2004).

In light of the appellate court's insistence that the Land Commission should have the primary responsibility for determining, surveying, and certifying the land's exact final boundary, and the court's general unsuitability to perform those functions, the court will remand the case to the Land Commission to perform this work. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99e (Chk. 2004).

Since a certificate of title must describe the land's exact boundaries, the Land Commission must, before it can issue a certificate of title, locate, survey, and certify all of the boundaries, which must be as they existed when its determination of ownership was made. The certificate must also show that it is subject to a 99-year lease, if that lease was, is, or becomes properly recorded. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99f (Chk. 2004).

Under 67 TTC 106, upon the designation of a registration area, the district surveyor's duty was to cause an accurate survey to be made of the area's exterior bounds and thereafter to make such surveys of plots or claims and place such markers within the area as the commission may direct; and under former Kosrae State Code Section 11.605 (repealed) upon designation of a registration area, a qualified person designated by the Land Commission made an accurate survey of the area's exterior bounds and claimed parcels within the area, placing markers at the Commission's direction. The Land Commission and surveyors were to recognize and mark claims made within a designation area. Sigrah v. Heirs of Nena, 13 FSM R. 192, 197-98 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Nothing in former Title 11 of the Kosrae State Code required that the boundaries of Japanese Lots be maintained during the registration process, and it was the Land Commission's established practice of recognizing claims for plots and portions of Japanese Lots, and partitioning Japanese Lots into smaller parcels during the registration process. Sigrah v. Heirs of Nena, 13 FSM R. 192, 198 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The partitioning of Japanese Lots into smaller parcels for the land registration process has been a continuing Land Commission practice, and is completed in accordance with statutory mandates for the recognition of claims of plots made within a designation area. No statutes or regulations prohibit the partitioning of Japanese Lots into smaller parcels for the land registration process. Sigrah v. Heirs of Nena, 13 FSM R. 192, 198 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The Kosrae Land Commission was required by Trust Territory law and by Kosrae state law to recognize and survey claims of plots made within a registration area. Sigrah v. Heirs of Nena, 13 FSM R. 192, 198 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Since a certificate of title is prima facie evidence of ownership and courts are required to attach a presumption of correctness to a certificate of title, a plaintiff with a certificate of title is presumed to be an owner of the subject parcels and thus the factor of the likelihood of success on the merits weighs in the plaintiffs' favor. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 13 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A certificate of title is prima facie evidence of ownership, and courts are required to attach a presumption of correctness to a certificate of title. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 321, 323 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 424, 426 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A preexisting easement or other right appurtenant to the land remains appurtenant, even if it is not described in the certificate of title. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 424, 426 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When, pursuant to state law, parties were granted and therefore maintain a permanent land use right to access a parcel and use a portion thereof for maintenance of their existing gravesites, this permanent land use right passes with the parcel until it is extinguished in a lawful manner independent of the certificate of title. Norita v. Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 424, 427 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The law regarding the validity of certificates of title is well established in Kosrae and the FSM. Certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership as stated against the world. A court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them when there are challenges to their validity. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 546 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The Kosrae Constitution permits certain conveyances of land to be subject to conditions. Article II, Section 3 provides that any conveyance of land from a parent or parents to a child or children, may be subject to such conditions as the parent or parents deem appropriate, provided, that such conditions are in writing at the time of conveyance and duly reflected in the certificate of title. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 546 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

It is the Kosrae Land Court's statutory duty to issue certificates of title. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13

FSM R. 542, 548 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A cause of action based upon a claim of defective certificate of title, must fail when the issuing entity, the Kosrae Land Court, is not a party to this action. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 548 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The notice required by state law is intended to reach all parties, claimants and provide notice to the general public on the schedule of proceedings. The statutory notice required includes notice to the public: posting of the notice in at least three conspicuous places or at least two areas of public access and further notice to the public is required by posting at the municipal building of the municipality where the property is located and through announcements on the Kosrae radio station on several occasions. Notice to parties, claimants, and public is provided by at least two separate postings of the notice in different locations, and notice by radio broadcast. These substantial requirements for notice of land proceedings reflect the Kosrae Land Court's calculated goal to reach as many claimants, parties and members of the general public as possible. Kun v. Heirs of Abraham, 13 FSM R. 558, 561 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A party challenging a certificate of title bears the burden of proving that the certificate of title is not valid or authentic, and when the party has failed to show that the relevant certificate of title is invalid, their argument does not create a genuine issue of material fact. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Generally, Kosrae State Code, Title 11, former Chapter 6 (repealed) specified the former Kosrae State Land Commission's duties and responsibilities, and the procedures for determination and registration of interests in land. It did not specify any duties of private party claimants, or govern the conduct of private party claimants. When the defendants are individuals and private parties, Kosrae State Code, Title 11, including former Chapter 6, does not create a cause of action against the defendants. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 570 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the complete absence of any map or sketch from the entire Land Court record raises grave concerns as to the correct identification of the subject parcel, area and boundaries at the hearing; as to the parties' potential confusion; and regarding notice to the claimants of the area and boundaries of the subject parcel, and when the parties were not, as required, provided the map or sketch with the Land Court's memorandum of decision, this failure resulted in inadequate notice of the decision to the parties, and was contrary to law. The memorandum of decision must thus be vacated and the matter remanded to the Land Court for further proceedings. Heirs of Weilbacher v. Heirs of Luke, 14 FSM R. 99, 101 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Certificates of Title must show all interests in the land except for with rights of way, taxes due and lease or use rights of less than one year. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 107 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the owner did not execute nor record any lease for a portion of the parcel in the defendant's favor, any lease granted to the defendant in excess of one year did not comply with law as it was not recorded on the certificate of title, and since legal recognition of a grant of a permanent land use right also requires written documentation to be executed by the grantor, there was no permanent land use right granted by the owner in the defendant's favor. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 107 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Since the Land Commission is required to make a determination of lawful devisees or heirs and their respective interests following a hearing, when the Land Commission did not hold any hearing to determine the devisees or heirs and their interests following the owner's death, and when the Registrar's personal evaluation of the owner's oral will and determination of its validity was contrary to law, it is therefore vacated and the certificate of title issued based upon the invalid oral will is therefore also invalid. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a certificate of title was never issued to Tulpe Alokoa for parcel 006-K-07 and she was never determined by a Land Commission proceeding to be the title holder of that parcel and therefore could not transfer title to land that she did not own, her deed of gift was invalid, and should have been rejected for filing by the Land Commission. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Certificates of Title are prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world. Heirs of Nena v. Sigrah, 14 FSM R. 283, 285 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A party has standing to challenge a certificate of title when, although he admits that some of the land was sold to others, he asserts that even after those sales, he still retained part of the land. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 453-54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Certificates of title are by statute, prima facie evidence of ownership stated therein as against the world, and because of this, a court must attach a presumption of correctness to them when considering challenges to their validity or authenticity. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 454 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

No court can grant as relief a request to set aside or nullify a certificate of title to a person who is not a party before the court and effectively award someone else ownership to some or all of the land for which the certificate of title was issued because that would have the court void a certificate of title in a manner that would violate every notion of due process of law. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 454 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In any lawsuit to remove someone's name from a certificate of title, that is, to deprive a person of ownership of the registered land that the certificate represents, due process requires that that person is an indispensable party to the action. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

No court can set aside, void, nullify, invalidate, or alter a person's certificate of title to land without that person first having been made a party to the action before the court. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

As a general rule, a certificate of title can be set aside only on the grounds of fraudulent registration. While the Land Commission may be a necessary party to such an action, the titleholder is an indispensable party to any action to set aside, void, nullify, or alter the titleholder's certificate of title who must be joined, or any ensuing adjudication is void. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A court is not competent to rule on the validity of a certificate of title to land when the court does not have (by its own statement) subject matter jurisdiction over the case and does not have personal jurisdiction over indispensable parties (the titleholders) or give them notice or an opportunity to be heard. Its orders were void and an order invalidating a person's certificate of title may even be void on its face when it held that that person was an indispensable party who was not present in the case and then proceeded to invalidate his certificate of title without him having been made a party to the case. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the one person's certificate of title was voided and a new certificate of title covering the same land issued to another person without notice to the first person and affording the first person an opportunity to be heard, it was a denial of due process and that action was void. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 455 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A person's certificate of title on file at the Chuuk Land Commission constituted notice to the world of that person's ownership of all of the land it was for and that certificate and the Plat No. cited constituted notice of the boundaries of the ownership. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When no court with jurisdiction to do so has ever invalidated or altered a person's certificate of title to a lot and the statute of limitations bars any further action to invalidate that certificate, the presumption of that certificate's correctness has not been overcome and the titleholder's motion to quiet title to that lot will be granted. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 458 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The registration process for Land Court is designed to ensure all interested parties and claimants receive notice. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Taulung, 14 FSM R. 494, 496 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When title to land is at issue, all known persons who are claiming title must be joined in order to settle ownership without additional litigation. The policy supporting this rule is that all persons needed for a full, fair, and just adjudication should be part of the case and have an opportunity to be heard. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Taulung, 14 FSM R. 494, 496 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Trust Territory Court decisions are valid and binding, consistent with the Kosrae constitutional provisions on transition of government. The doctrine of res judicata applies and Trust Territory Court decisions must be upheld. Therefore, the Land Court lacked jurisdiction to receive additional evidence and issue a new decision in a case where the Trust Territory Court, in three previous cases, had established the ownership and boundaries of the land in question. Heirs of Livaie v. Palik, 14 FSM R. 512, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A Land Court decision is contrary to law when it failed to give effect to the decisions in previous Trust Territory Court cases, and will therefore be remanded to the Kosrae Land Court with instructions and guidance to re-survey the parcels, if needed to issue a memorandum of decision consistent with the Trust Territory Court decisions. Heirs of Livaie v. Palik, 14 FSM R. 512, 516 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In any lawsuit to, in effect, remove someone's name from a certificate of title, that is, to change the registered ownership of the land that the certificate represents and deprive the certificate titleholder of the titleholder's property interest, due process requires that that person is an indispensable party to the action. Any action that seeks to claim an interest in land for which a certificate of title or a determination of ownership has already been issued, must, at a minimum, name the registered titleholder as a party. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Certificates of title are required to show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year and are conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them and are prima facie evidence of ownership as stated therein against the world. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 112-13 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

In order for a judgment granting ownership to land to which someone else has a certificate of title to be valid, the judgment would first have to have set aside the other's certificate of title and as a general rule a certificate of title can be set aside only on the grounds of fraudulent registration. When the pleadings never addressed, or even mentioned the existence of, the certificate of title, this was a fatal flaw. Ruben v. Hartman, 15 FSM R. 100, 113 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Title is prima facie proof of ownership and is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them and it is prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world. But when the plaintiff filed his request for a subdivision of the parcels with the Land Commission but never had notice of any proceedings or an opportunity to be heard on his claim, the title issued in 2002 was not conclusive as to his interest. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

For the process of issuing title to be fair and rational, it must address all claimed interests in title. If a person claims an interest in land, that claim must be considered before title is issued to someone else. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 194 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When, before issuing title to someone else, the Land Court never gave the plaintiff notice or an opportunity to be heard on his claim of ownership based on a subdivision and since having notice and an opportunity to be heard are the core requirements of due process and fundamental fairness, the Land Commission and Land Court deprived the plaintiff of his right to due process when title was issued in 2002 without giving the plaintiff notice or an opportunity to be heard on his claim of ownership filed with the Land Commission in 1987, and therefore, the 2002 title is not valid as to the plaintiff. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 194-95 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A certificate of title is conclusive upon any person who had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under that person and is prima facie evidence of ownership against all others. Thus, the land registration statute creates conclusive title, a title that cannot be challenged, as to anyone who had notice of the proceedings and as to anyone whose interest is derived from a person with notice. As to the world at large this statute creates a presumption of ownership. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 321 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

For a person who has asserted a claim to the land and was not given notice of the registration proceedings as required by law, the determination of ownership and the certificate of title for that land is not conclusive as upon him. When that person is claiming ownership of land, another person has title, and the appeals period has expired, then that person now claiming ownership must at least show enough facts to establish that the previous ownership decision is incorrect. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 321 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When a plaintiff failed to submit evidence that he was entitled to notice in the previous Land Commission proceedings and testimony shows that he was not entitled to notice in the proceedings, and when the plaintiff's interests are derived from someone who received notice and participated and the record even suggests that the plaintiff himself was present at the hearing, the issued certificate of title is conclusive title and cannot be challenged by the plaintiff. Even if the plaintiff had submitted sufficient evidence showing he was entitled to notice and did not receive it, he must also show enough facts to establish the previous ownership decision was incorrect, and when he submitted no evidence on this issue, he has not carried his burden of proof on claims of ownership of land and he is not entitled to the requested relief. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 321 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The need for finality in litigation is particularly important for claims to land. The statute covering designation of registration areas, recognizes this need and provides 1) that a justice must not adjudicate a matter previously decided by a court between the same parties or those under whom the parties claim which dispute involves the same parcel and 2) that the Land Court must accept prior judgments as res judicata and determine those issues without receiving evidence. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 321 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When an earlier civil action heard and determined the subject land's ownership and the plaintiff was in privity to one of the parties, he cannot relitigate the subject land's ownership. The earlier case determined ownership in a final judgment and, based on res judicata, the plaintiff is barred from re-litigating that case again. The Land Commission was statutorily created to address disputes about ownership and to issue a Torrens Title that is conclusively correct as to the parties and presumptively correct as to everyone else. When the plaintiff's interests are derived from a party in the Land Commission proceedings, that title is conclusive as to his interests and he is barred, under the statutorily adopted doctrine of res judicata, from relitigating an ownership claim already determined. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 321-22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Kosrae State Code § 11.615(4), which governs the issuance of certificates of title, establishes that a preexisting easement or other right of way over the land remains appurtenant even if it is not described in the certificate; and passes with the land until cut off or extinguished in a lawful manner independent of the certificate. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 397 (App. 2007).

The current system of land registration in Chuuk dates from the Trust Territory period. Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code, governing land registration, has been retained by the Chuuk. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 471 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Land registration is based on the Torrens system of land registration, whereby land ownership is conclusively determined and certified by the government and thereby is easy to determine. The certificate of title issued by the government shows the state of the title and the person in whom it is vested. Determination of title is the system's basic requirement. To that end, the Land Commission holds a proceeding to settle and declare the state of the title. Once the Commission completes its inquiry and conducts a public hearing, it must issue a determination of ownership, pursuant to which a certificate of title is issued. Determinations of ownership are appealable to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 471 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A party claiming ownership of land for which there is a determination of ownership showing another as owner, with the appeal period expired, has, at a minimum, the burden of showing facts to establish that the determination of ownership is incorrect. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 471 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

When a determination of ownership was issued to a party, but no certificate of title was issued, and there has been no allegation that the determination of ownership was incorrect, the court proceeds as if a certificate of title had been issued. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 472 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The "registration" of interests in land, pursuant to 67 TTC 119 "has the same force and effect as to such land as a recording" under 57 TTC 301. In order for a subsequent, bona fide, or "innocent," purchaser to have valid title against a prior holder of an interest in the same real estate the subsequent purchaser must "register" or "record" the interest before the prior holder. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 472 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Individual lineage members are not required to register their interest in their individual names in order to protect their interests as lineage members in the property. There is no legal requirement that the individual names of the lineage members appear in a registration or recording in order to give notice of their interest or otherwise protect their legal interest in lineage property. Such a requirement would be impracticable under the system of lineage land ownership. If such a requirement existed, each new member of the lineage would be required to seek an amendment of the ownership documents to the lineage land in order to obtain a legally protected right in the disposition of the land. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 472-73 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The identification of a person as the lineage head in a determination of ownership was for the purpose of clarifying the identification of the lineage. It is not the Land Commission's function to vest, in any particular person, the authority to sell lineage land. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 473 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The statute requires that a notice of a land registration hearing be given to all interested parties and claimants, and to the public. "Interested parties" is not defined. Claimants are presumably those persons who are known to have filed a claim to register the land. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

In a Torrens land registration system, it is in the land owner's interest for notice to be given as broadly as possible since the certificate of title the landowner gets at the end of the process is conclusive upon any person who had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under that person, but only prima facie evidence of ownership against all others. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

Adjoining landowners, even if not claimants, would, because of their common boundaries, be interested parties, along with anyone else who holds some interest in the land, such as a mortgagee, an easement holder, or a holder of a covenant running with the land. But even if the adjoining landowners were not interested parties, Land Court notice to them is not contrary to law. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

Because of the conclusive nature of a certificate of title, the Land Court should give the adjoining landowners notice of the formal hearing so that the resulting boundaries will be conclusive against them. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 571 (App. 2008).

Notice of land registration hearings must be given to the public in general. The hearings are public, and anyone may attend. Land Court proceedings are not ones which only the known claimants may attend. One purpose of public notice at various stages of the registration process is to reach as many persons as possible so that, at the end, the certificate of title will be conclusive against as many persons as possible, which is to the certificate holder's considerable benefit. The statute requiring that actual notice be given to claimants, is a minimum requirement, not the maximum permissible. Heirs of Jerry v. Heirs of Abraham, 15 FSM R. 567, 572 (App. 2008).

Common law, or case law, and statutes provide the basis for Land Court orders, in other words, a complete and adequate remedy. The Legislature established the Land Court's authority to hear and decide title determinations. Statutes require that Land Court decisions not be contrary to law and must be based on substantial evidence. Case law guides the Land Court on what constitutes substantial evidence to support a decision; this is legal precedent. The Land Court must establish title based on substantial evidence by considering the testimony and record before it. There is no need to resort to equitable jurisdiction to make a title determination. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 15 FSM R. 657, 662-63 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

In order to ensure the legal protection of any right they had in the land, parties are required to register that interest. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Land registration is based on the Torrens system of land registration, whereby land ownership is conclusively determined and certified by the government and thereby is easy to determine. The certificate of title issued by the government shows the state of the title and the person in whom it is vested. Determination of title is the basic requirement of the system. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership as stated therein against the world. A party claiming ownership in land for which there is a determination of ownership showing another as owner, with the appeal period expired, has, at a minimum, the burden of showing facts to establish that the determination of ownership is incorrect. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

In order for a judgment granting ownership to land to which someone else has a certificate of title to be valid, the judgment would first have to have set aside the other's certificate of title. As a general rule, a certificate of title can be set aside only on the grounds of fraudulent registration. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Land claimants are not exempted from the registration and recording requirements due to their alleged rights being of a customary nature. The preservation of customary rights, as with other enduring rights in property, requires that it be registered. A certificate of title must show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year and are conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them. A claim of customary interest in land will not be implicitly recognized in a land registration, but must be explicitly identified. In cases where a certificate of title has been issued, therefore, it is not clearly erroneous for a trial court to disregard the existence of a purported customary right arising prior to the certificate of title's issuance. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

Under Chuuk's statutory system of land registration, which is designed to ensure good title through the land registration proceedings, it is not for the appellate court to determine whether or not someone had a valid claim of land ownership arising prior to the issuance of a certificate of title, if the claim was never raised or perfected. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

When neither the 1989 determination of ownership nor the 2000 certificate of title identifies any customary rights in appellants; when in order to preserve the customary rights the appellants contend they were granted in 1973, they were required to register them; when the appellants do not contend that there was anything fraudulent in the registration of the land or that they were in any way deprived of their rights through the registration proceedings; when the appellants do not otherwise present any basis for setting aside the 1989 land registration proceedings; and when they appellants do not present any reason to justify why they failed to assert their alleged customary rights when the land was registered and recorded that might provide a basis to set aside the Land Commission's determination, the 1989 determination of ownership was therefore conclusive as between appellants and appellees. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The purpose and benefit of the lengthy procedure and notice requirements needed to register land is that a certificate of title, once issued, is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them and is prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world. This is unlike a "conventional" recording system, which makes no averments to the public about the state of title to any parcel of land but merely invites searchers to inspect the copies of the instruments which it contains and to draw their own conclusions as to the state of title. Rather, Chuuk's statutory system of land registration is designed to ensure that buyers can rely on the determination of ownership as a representation of good title. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 165 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

When the appellants' claim is based on a customary grant in 1973 and the grantors' successors in interest registered the land when the Land Commission issued a determination of ownership to them in 1989 and when the Land Commission issued a certificate of title in 2000 to the appellees based on the 1989 determination of ownership and the appellees' 1999 purchase of the property from the grantors' successors in interest; and when the appellants did not object that they failed to receive notice of the Land Commission proceedings or that they were entitled to notice, the appellees, as purchasers, were entitled to rely on the 1989 determination of ownership as conclusive evidence of all interests in the property since the appellants were, in order to preserve any rights they had to the property with respect to appellees, required to assert those rights prior to appellees' registering or recording their interest. When there is no evidence to suggest the appellants ever attempted to register or record their alleged interest, it will not be recognized implicitly and the appellees were therefore bona fide purchasers without notice of appellants' claim when they sought and received a certificate of ownership in 2000. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 165 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

An adverse possession claim will never prevail over a validly issued certificate of title. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The Kosrae Land Court is required to set forth on every certificate of title the names of all persons holding an interest in the land. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 535, 536 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The Kosrae Land Court must make orders and decisions which determine any claim of heirship to a deceased person's title or interest in the lands, and once the Land Court heirship proceeding has determined the names of all persons who are heirs to a parcel, it may then issue a certificate of title for that parcel. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mongkeya, 16 FSM R. 535, 536 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When there were no valid certificates of title for the land at the time of the Land Commission decision, the decision was a determination from which any party aggrieved thereby had 120 days to appeal, and, as such, the Chuuk State Supreme Court's trial division could exercise review jurisdiction over a timely appeal from that Land Commission decision, and the appellate division could exercise review jurisdiction over a timely appeal from the trial division review decision. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 553 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

The issuance of a certificate of title is generally not appealable, but since the Land Commission is not authorized to issue certificates of title until after the 120-day appeal period has passed or until after an appeal has been duly taken and decided, certificates of title issued before then are prematurely issued and are thus invalid and may be canceled. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 553 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When an owner of any interest in registered land dies, the Land Commission's duty is to cancel the original and duplicate certificates and issue new ones in the name(s) of the decedent's devisees or heirs. A certificate of title cannot be issued in the name of a person already deceased. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 555 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

When the owner of registered land is deceased, it is the Land Commission's statutory responsibility to make a determination of the devisee or devisees or heir or heirs and the interests or respective interests to which each are entitled, and, to make this determination, the Land Commission must conduct a hearing at which evidence shall be heard for the purpose of determining the heir or heirs or devisee or devisees entitled to the decedent's land. Proper notice must be given for the hearing, and within 30 days after the hearing's conclusion, the Land Commission should issue its finding as to the heir or heirs or devisee or devisees and the respective interest or interests to which each are entitled. Once the Land Commission has issued its determination, it cannot issue any certificates of title unless and until after one hundred twenty days – the time to appeal – has passed, and only then, if the 120 days have passed without an appeal or if an appeal has been taken and decided, can the Land Commission issue certificates of title. Enengeitaw Clan v. Heirs of Shirai, 16 FSM R. 547, 555 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2009).

A 1986 determination of ownership in the Land Commission's records constituted notice to the world that the named owner owned the land, and that if any potential purchaser of the land had sought to buy it from the plaintiff, the purchaser would be charged with notice that named owner, and not the plaintiff, owned the parcel. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 41 (App. 2010).

In any lawsuit that, in effect, seeks to change the registered ownership of the land that a certificate of title represents and deprive the certificate titleholder of the titleholder's property interest, due process would require that that person be an indispensable party to the action. Any action that seeks to claim an interest in land for which a certificate of title or a determination of ownership has been issued, must, at a minimum, name the registered titleholder as a party. Setik v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 304, 306 (Chk. 2010).

Certificates of title are by statute, prima facie evidence of ownership stated therein as against the world. Because of this, a court is required to attach a presumption of correctness to them when considering challenges to their validity or authenticity. Truk Trading Co. v. John, 17 FSM R. 382, 384 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When the defendants do not dispute the veracity of the certificates of title provided, nor have they presented or offered any relevant or even meaningful evidence that would support a claim that the plaintiff uses or occupies or has otherwise encroached upon land it does not own, the court, accepting the certificates of title as prima facie evidence, will find that the land ownership is certain and a remand to the Land Commission for the purpose of establishing ownership is not warranted because ownership is not at issue. Truk Trading Co. v. John, 17 FSM R. 382, 384 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A certificate of title must, with exception of rights of way, taxes, and leases of less than one year, set forth the names of all persons or groups of persons holding interest in the land and should include a description of the land's boundaries. Truk Trading Co. v. John, 17 FSM R. 382, 384 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

If the plaintiff requires a description of the boundaries of lots that he unquestionably owns, then it behooves him to obtain the relevant documentation from Land Commission directly, especially in light of its trespass accusations since it has demonstrated no special circumstances that would justify or otherwise necessitate the court ordering the Land Commission to re-survey the lots. Truk Trading Co. v. John, 17

FSM R. 382, 384 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

There is no statute of frauds – a law requiring that certain agreements or contracts to be in writing before they are enforceable in court – in Chuuk. Customarily, any agreement, even that selling land, might be oral, but in some situations, a customary oral transfer must be registered to be enforceable. The reason is not that the Torrens land registration system must supplant custom and tradition. Rather, the reason is one of evidence because certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership as stated therein against the world. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 472 (App. 2011).

A determination of ownership is presumed valid and cannot be set aside unless a challenger proves by a preponderance of the evidence that there has been fraud in the registration process. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 472 (App. 2011).

Chuuk has retained Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code, governing land registration, which is based on the Torrens system. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 473 (App. 2011).

The purpose and benefit of the lengthy procedure and notice requirements needed to register land is that a certificate of title, once issued, is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them and shall be prima facie evidence of ownership as therein stated against the world. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 475 (App. 2011).

Since a certificate of title must be based on a valid determination of ownership, the invalidity of a determination of ownership means that the subsequent certificate of title is likewise invalid and thus cannot be conclusive against the world. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 476 (App. 2011).

A certificate of title is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them and is prima facie evidence of ownership as stated therein against the world. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kansou, 17 FSM R. 605, 607-08 (Chk. 2011).

Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code remains Chuuk state law pursuant to the Chuuk Constitution's Transition Clause and because it has not been amended or repealed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kansou, 17 FSM R. 605, 608 n.2 (Chk. 2011).

When the land is registered land, the interests in it that are registered are the only interests that exist. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kansou, 17 FSM R. 605, 608 (Chk. 2011).

Once an owner has a certificate of title to land, that ownership can never be lost through adverse possession. Under a Torrens land title registration system, such as the one in Kosrae, an adverse possession claim will never prevail over a validly-issued certificate of title. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

Claims founded on adverse possession or prescription, are not permitted to come into existence once the title has been registered. Once a title is registered, it is impossible thereafter to acquire title to the registered land by holding adversely to the registered owner. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

One of the attractions of a land registration system (as opposed to a land recordation system) and one of the great benefits of land title registration (as opposed to title recordation) is that once a landowner has gone through the laborious process of validly registering title to land, that landowner and that landowner's successors can never lose that land to an adverse possession claim. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 658 (App. 2011).

The proper time and place to make adverse possession claims, if a land occupant has one, is in a Land Court (or other) proceeding before the land title has been registered. Afterward is too late. Heirs of

Certificates of title that state that the owners are the heirs of a person, who died three years before the certificates were issued and who has now been dead for twenty-eight years, have remained for too long in what should only be a very temporary designation because the Kosrae Land Court, like the Land Commission before it, has the power to make orders and decisions which determine any claim of heirship to a deceased person's title or interest in lands. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 327 (App. 2014).

Certificates of title naming the heirs of someone as the owners do not conform to the statutory requirement that a certificate of title must set forth the names of all persons holding an interest in the land. None of the co-owners' names are set forth on the certificates of title, although all of their names should be set forth on the certificates, when the only name on the certificate is that of a person who does not hold an interest in the land since he is deceased. For those persons who are the deceased's true and only heirs, their names, only their names, should be on the certificates of title. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 327 (App. 2014).

One of the purposes of a Torrens land registration system, such as Kosrae's, is that one document – the certificate of title – names every person who has an interest in the parcel covered by that certificate and describes the extent of that interest without the need to consult other sources to determine who the owners and the interest holders are and the interests they hold. That purpose is defeated if the ownership interests are listed as held by unnamed persons whose identity can only be determined by consulting birth and death records or the decedent's will, if there was one. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 327 (App. 2014).

The issuance of certificates of title to "the Heirs of" should be done only sparingly, if at all, and the Land Court should determine who the heirs are and name them and the interest they hold on any certificates of title it issues. A certificate that designates "the Heirs of" as the owners does not set forth the name of any person, let alone the names of all persons, holding an interest in the land and that phrase does not name an "entity." It just designates a group of unnamed persons whose identities and interests will presumably be identified at some later time. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 327 (App. 2014).

The presence of others on the land for over 60 years who had never been notified of the land registration proceedings would lessen the plaintiffs' likelihood of success on the merits of a trespass action because persons who have been openly residing on land for a long time are persons who must be given notice of any land registration proceedings for that land, otherwise the determination of ownership (and any subsequent certificate of title) is not valid – when a person has a claim to the land and was not given notice of the registration proceedings as required by law, the determination of ownership and the certificate of title for that land is not conclusive as upon him. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 328 (App. 2014).

The argument that someone who had occupied or used the land for a long time did not have to be given notice because they did not own the land must be rejected because the determination of who the land owners are is made at the end of the land registration process, not before it has started. Their long-term presence on the land entitled them to notice of the land registration proceeding for the land. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 328 (App. 2014).

The land registration process is, with certain exceptions, supposed to determine all interests in the land, not just ownership interests. Thus, even if someone does not own the land, they may hold some other interest, such as a use interest exceeding one year, that has to be determined and included in the certificate of title. Nena v. Saimon, 19 FSM R. 317, 328 (App. 2014).

A Trust Territory High Court case that renders a judgment about ownership of land between certain parties does not, by itself, entitle one of those parties (or a party claiming under that party) to a certificate of title for that land because there may be other persons who have claims, even better claims to ownership than the parties in the Trust Territory case. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 340 (App. 2014).

When a previous court case has res judicata effect and status, it is conclusive only between the parties to the case and those claiming under them and no one else. But there could be persons who were not parties to the court case and who do not claim under those parties but who have their own claim to the land. The Land Court must still go through all of its usual procedures to determine if there are other claimants and, if there are, adjudicate their claims, before it can issue a determination of ownership and, if there is no appeal or if its decision is affirmed on appeal, a certificate of title. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 364, 367 (App. 2014).

A view that only successful land claimants have to be notified of the Land Commission's determination of ownership is gross legal error. All claimants to a parcel of land must be notified of the determination of ownership for that parcel, and if boundary determinations are involved, the adjoining landowners must also be notified. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 536 & n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division certainly has jurisdiction to consider an attack on a Land Commission determination of ownership as void due to the lack of notice of the formal hearings and lack of notice of the issuance of the determination of ownership because the Chuuk State Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review administrative agency decisions as provided by law, its trial division can exercise appellate review of Land Commission decisions. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 537 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

When the case was not an appeal from a Land Commission determination of ownership because it was filed too late for that and when it was not, at least initially, a trial court action with regard to interests in land within that registration area before it is likely a determination can be made on the matter by the Land Commission because the Land Commission had already made a decision, the trial court action was, instead, an action to collaterally attack (an allegedly) void Land Commission final decision. Once the trial court had determined that the Land Commission decision was void for the lack of due process, then the statute applied to the case before it and if the trial court wanted to proceed on the merits it had to first find special cause existed. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 538 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

Courts must attach a presumption of correctness to a Certificate of Title. FSM v. Falan, 20 FSM R. 59, 61 (Pon. 2015).

By statute, a certificate of title must show all interests in the land except for rights of way, taxes due, and lease or use rights of less than one year and the certificate is conclusive upon all persons who have had notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them. A "right of way" over land is a thing such as a road, or footpath, or utility easement. A "right of way" is the right to pass through property owned by another or the strip of land subject to a nonowner's right to pass through. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

Any rights of way there may be over the land in question need not be stated in the certificate of title. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

A certificate of title's failure to mention the roadway or government right of way cannot extinguish the government's ownership of the roadway right of way. That right remained vested in the state government. When the government owned a right of way across the land that predated the current owners' ownership of the land, that right of way existed on the land when the land was homesteaded and thus still existed after a later buyer bought part of that homestead lot. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

The certificate of title statute does not exempt mineral rights if they are not mentioned. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 n.1 (Chk. 2016).

The government owners and users of a right of way across land are not liable for the landowners' neighbors' alleged encroachment on the land. Any remedy for that alleged encroachment, the landowners must seek from their neighbors. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 656 (Chk. 2016).

A valid certificate of title constitutes prima facie evidence of ownership. Courts must attach a presumption of correctness to a certificate of title. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 39 (Pon. 2016).

A "registration area," is any area, which has been designated for treatment by the Kosrae Land Court, to determine boundaries and ownership interests. Heirs of Alokoa v. Heirs of Preston, 21 FSM R. 94, 101 (App. 2016).

The party challenging the authenticity or validity of a certificate of title, bears the burden of proving it is not authentic or valid because a certificate of title is prima facie evidence of ownership and courts must attach a presumption of correctness to it. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 113, 120-21 (App. 2017).

An ancillary probate proceeding for registered land (land with a certificate of title) on Pohnpei is through an heirship proceeding in the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 519 (App. 2018).

The only place to "probate" registered land in Pohnpei would be through an heirship proceeding in the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

A decedent's estate ceased to own Pohnpei land once the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure ruled on the heirship petition for that land and the time to appeal that decision expired. Because the decedent's estate does not have, and, since Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure ruling, has not had, any interest in the property, it has no standing to seek the relief regarding that land. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 551 (App. 2018).

When the type of interest allegedly harmed is land ownership; when the right that the plaintiffs sue upon is their right to own a certain land parcel; when the remedy sought is to recover registered title to that land parcel that the plaintiffs contend that was lost through the defendants' predecessor's wrongful act; and when the primary interest that the alleged wrongdoer invaded was the plaintiffs' predecessor's registered ownership of that parcel, the action is one for the recovery of title to land. The theory of recovery might be fraud, or due process violation, or negligence, or some other theory such as reformation of contract, but that theory does not change the action's nature for statute of limitations purposes. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 580 (App. 2018).

For registered land, strict compliance with the Torrens land registration system's procedures is a must in order to claim the system's benefits of title good against the world. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

For registered land, strict compliance with the Torrens land registration system's procedures is a must in order to claim the system's benefits of a valid certificate of title with a title good against the world. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 618 (App. 2018).

The proper way for someone to acquire a valid certificate of title for a decedent's previously registered parcel is for the Kosrae Land Court to conduct an heirship proceeding to determine the landowner's heirs and to issue a new certificate of title in those persons' names. Then, if those persons wish to transfer the parcel's title (give or sell) to one of themselves, they will execute a deed, with all their signatures properly notarized, and then present that deed to the Land Court while also surrendering their new certificate of title to the Land Court. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

A certificate of title must set forth the names of all persons holding an interest in the land. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 n.4 (App. 2018).

When the record supports a prima facie case that a certificate of title was issued without the process due the plaintiffs as the supposed grantors and that therefore title was fraudulently registered in another's name, they may challenge that certificate of title's validity. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

When the alleged fraudulent registration of a parcel is based on the alleged misrepresentation in the "deed of gift" that the "grantor" had the ability to grant and convey full title to parcel to the grantee, the plaintiffs have stated a claim for which they could be granted relief. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619-20 (App. 2018).

When the plaintiffs do not seek money damages, but only seek undisturbed registered title to a parcel, the entity alleged to be negligent, the Kosrae Land Court, should not be a party to the action. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 620 (App. 2018).

In past practice, the Kosrae Land Commission, was often named a defendant when a plaintiff complained about one of its acts or omissions because plaintiffs often named administrative agencies as defendants when they sought judicial review of that administrative agency's act or omission. But the Kosrae Land Court, unlike the Kosrae Land Commission, is not an administrative agency. It is a court. It should not be a party to the action. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 620 (App. 2018).

The titleholder is an indispensable party to any action to set aside, void, nullify, or alter the titleholder's certificate of title because due process makes that person an indispensable party to the action. Courts generally hold court orders void when the real party of interest was not present and the matter concerned the removal of that (indispensable) party from a certificate of title. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130L (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Default judgments against a real party of interest will be voided for lack of due process when that party lacked a notice and hearing before being disposed of its claim to a property – even when the real party of interest lacked a certificate of title. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130L (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A stipulated motion, that proffers no proof of service on the real party of interest, but asks the court to void the real party in interest's years-old, un-appealed determination of ownership and thus seeks to dispossess her of her property rights without notice or hearing, asks the court to issue an order in violation of the real party in interest's due process rights. The court will deny any such motion because voiding a determination of ownership based on stipulation that fails to provide notice to the real party of interest violates the real party of interest's due process rights under the Chuuk Constitution. Einat v. Chuuk Land Comm'n, 22 FSM R. 130j, 130m (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Any lease or use rights for a term not exceeding one year does not need to be stated in the certificate of title to be effective. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

A long-term lease (a lease for greater than one year), is an interest in land subject to Land Commission adjudication and must be stated in the certificate of title for it to be effective against third parties. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

A long-term lessee is entitled to notice as an interested party – as a claimant to an interest in that land – when that land is first registered. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

Persons, including a purported long-term lessee, known to a claimant, if not to the Land Commission, to claim interests in the land, are entitled, as interested parties, to actual notice of any Land Commission proceedings determining the land's ownership and other interests therein. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

It is to a land claimant's advantage and great benefit to make sure that the Land Commission gives actual notice to everyone that the land claimant knows has or makes some sort of claim to the land that the claimant claims is his own. That is because a certificate of title, once issued, is conclusive upon all persons who have had actual or constructive notice of the proceedings and all those claiming under them, but is otherwise only "prima facie evidence of such ownership. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

When a long-term lessee was an interested party entitled to notice of the Land Commission proceedings determining the ownership of and interests in the land and when it never received any actual or constructive notice of the proceedings that determined ownership, the new owner's certificate of title is not conclusive against the lessee. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

Even when not conclusive, a certificate of title is generally prima facie evidence of such ownership. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

A certificate of title is ineffective against someone who was entitled to notice of the determination of ownership proceedings but did not receive any. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

When the plaintiff's certificate of title (and underlying determination of ownership) is ineffective against the lessee, the plaintiff has not shown by the preponderance of the evidence that he has a current possessory interest in the land superior to that of the lessee on the land. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

Upon receipt of a land registration team's adjudication, the Land Commission may issue a determination of ownership if satisfied, but, if not satisfied with the adjudication, the Land Commission may either hold hearings on the matter or remand the issue back to the registration team, but the Land Commission has no authority to refer the matter to the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When the Senior Land Commissioner's letter of referral states that the land registration team would take an undesirable amount of time over the matter as the dispute had numerous issues of law which the land registration team was incapable of resolving, and when it states that the Land Commission decided against adjudicating since the parties and commissioners exhibited ill-will towards each other and therefore, the commissioners felt conflicted and prejudiced, that written explanation satisfies the statutory requirements for removal of an adjudication from a registration team in order to refer it to the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 578 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When the entire commission body suffered from a conflict of interest in the matter as a result of ill feeling towards one of the parties, and the Senior Land Commissioner appeared to have the only valid signature for a decision, the statutory two-commissioner requirement does not apply to a decision as in that matter, because the Senior Land Commissioner's one signature referral to the court does not violate 67 TTC 116, since the two-signature requirement is for a valid Land Commission action or decision on substantive matters concerning property rights, not for a decision on procedural matters such as referral of a dispute to the Chuuk State Supreme Court. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 579 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Registered Land – Transfer

Someone who by her written request transferred the Certificate of Title to her daughter is no longer the fee owner of that parcel, and therefore has no rights to the parcel and no standing to bring an action concerning the parcel. Jack v. Paulino, 10 FSM R. 335, 336 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

No lengthy title searches, which may fail to turn up important claims, need be done on registered land because all transfers and encumbrances of any interest in the land covered by a certificate of title must be noted thereon or therewith except for rights of way over the land, taxes on the land due within the two years prior to the certificate's issuance, and leases or use rights of less than one year. One only needs to consult the Land Commission's original certificate of title, which will show at a glance the ownership of, and the encumbrances on, the property, and the title searcher need then only read and evaluate the documents referred to by the current endorsements. No historical search of the title is ever necessary or relevant. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

It is the owner's duty in requesting any transfer or upon notice that an involuntary transfer has been effected to submit his owner's duplicate certificate for proper endorsement or cancellation, if it is physically practicable for him to do so and if the owner is unable to physically submit the certificate because it has been lost or destroyed, there is a method whereby he may obtain a new duplicate certificate for submission. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 70 (Chk. 2003).

Someone who has transferred the certificate of title to another person is no longer the fee owner of the parcel and therefore has no rights to the parcel. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 72, 75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Upon the undisputed owner's death, title to land transfers pursuant to a valid will to the devisees specified in the will, or if there is no valid will, to the owner's heirs, according to intestate succession. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 106 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Before noting a transfer of interest in a parcel, the Land Commission was required to determine that the document of transfer was in proper form, including a correct description of the parcel and for a transfer of a portion of a parcel, the Land Commission may require that the certificate holder have the transferred portion be surveyed at his expense. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 106 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the certificate holder and owner, did not complete or submit any document of transfer for the subject portion of the parcel to the defendant and he did not survey or arrange for the survey of the subject portion of the parcel claimed by the defendant, there was no compliance with the statutory provisions governing a transfer of interest in land or transfer of interest in a portion of parcel by the certificate holder, and therefore, pursuant to state law, there was no gift of land made from the certificate holder to the defendant. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 107 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a certificate of title was never issued to Tulpe Alokoa for parcel 006-K-07 and she was never determined by a Land Commission proceeding to be the title holder of that parcel and therefore could not transfer title to land that she did not own, her deed of gift was invalid, and should have been rejected for filing by the Land Commission. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 108 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The identification of a person as the lineage head in a determination of ownership was for the purpose of clarifying the identification of the lineage. It is not the Land Commission's function to vest, in any particular person, the authority to sell lineage land. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 473 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

A buyer is not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice when she executes a purchase agreement with an individual seller when an earlier determination of ownership was notice to the world, and thus to her, of the lineage's interest in the property. Mori v. Haruo, 15 FSM R. 468, 473 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

The bona fide, or "innocent," purchaser rule arises from the statutory recording requirements for interests in real estate. For all real estate in each district, the clerk of court is required to make and keep in a permanent record a copy of all documents submitted to him for recording. No transfer of or encumbrance upon title to real estate or any interest therein, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, is valid against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same real estate or interest, or any part thereof, in good faith for a valuable consideration without notice of such transfer or encumbrance, or against any person claiming under them, if the transfer to the subsequent purchaser or mortgagee is first duly recorded. The "registration" of interests in land has the same force and effect as to such land as a recording. Therefore, a subsequent, bona fide, or "innocent," purchaser has valid title against a prior holder of an interest in the same real estate if one "registers" or "records" the interest before the prior holder. Setik v. Ruben, 16 FSM R. 158, 164-65 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2008).

There is no statute of frauds – a law requiring that certain agreements or contracts to be in writing before they are enforceable in court – in Chuuk. Customarily, any agreement, even that selling land, might be oral, but in some situations, a customary oral transfer must be registered to be enforceable. The reason is not that the Torrens land registration system must supplant custom and tradition. Rather, the reason is one of evidence because certificates of title are prima facie evidence of ownership as stated therein against the world. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 472 (App. 2011).

Land Commission determinations of ownership are meant to dispose of all competing claims to land. When a customary oral transfer has been confirmed in a writing, that writing constitutes tangible prima facie evidence of the claim, which preserves the claim, and as such assists any tribunal, including the Land Commission, before which the claim is raised. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 472 (App. 2011).

The bona fide purchaser rule does not apply when the land was lineage land which the seller had no authority to convey since the courts have historically been wary of applying the rule where the purported seller has no authority to sell, and when the Land Commission's determination of ownership was invalid for lack of notice to the occupants since a certificate of title must be based on a valid determination of ownership. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 465, 476 (App. 2011).

Since a seller cannot sell more than he owns, when a purchaser bought land with a roadway right of way across it, that right of way remained even though the right of way was not mentioned in the later issued certificate of title. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 656 (Chk. 2016).

There is no need for the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure to go through the whole process of having to designate the land, serve notice of the hearing, conduct a hearing, determine ownership and service notice of an issuance of this new title when the land already had a certificate of title and the FSM Supreme Court had issued an order transferring that title. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 39 (Pon. 2016).

When registered land is later transferred by deed, there is no need to again designate, serve notice, hold hearings, and determine ownership, in order to issue a certificate of title to the new owner. Heirs of Alokoa v. Heirs of Preston, 21 FSM R. 94, 101 (App. 2016).

Any subsequent transfer from a registered owner, does not require notice, much less a hearing, to determine ownership anew or a written decision. Heirs of Alokoa v. Heirs of Preston, 21 FSM R. 94, 102 (App. 2016).

Under Kosrae Court Rule 13, when registered land is transferred, the owner of the parcel must surrender the certificate of title to the Registrar to transfer title. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

A landowner's failure to surrender the his certificate of title may indicate that the landowner does not intend to transfer title to the land. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

Kosrae Land Court Rules (and good practice) require that all documents concerning transfer of title must be notarized and submitted to the Registrar for recordation. Signatures that are executed at different times or in different locations must be notarized separately. The signature page of each document may consist of as many duplicate pages as necessary for proper notarization. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

When the purported transferor's signature and that of his witnesses were not notarized on a duplicate page, but the notarization was instead on a page separate from their signatures, and since the Registrar must not accept any document which is not properly notarized, it is doubtful that the Land Court should have accepted for filing a deed of gift in this form, even if it had been accompanied by the surrender of the old certificate of title, which it was not. Since the deed of gift was in a doubtful form and since the transferor's certificate of title was not surrendered with it, the Land Court should not have issued the transferee a certificate of title for that parcel. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 581 (App. 2018).

The hearing and notice procedure in Kosrae State Code § 11.612 is inapplicable to the transfer of already registered land. It only governs the registration of unregistered land. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 582 (App. 2018).

When the owner of registered land sells or gifts registered land, all that is needed for a valid transfer is the delivery to the Land Court of a properly notarized deed (with each needed signature properly notarized) combined with the surrender of the grantor's old duplicate certificate of title. Proper and strict compliance with these requirements is the due process that is sufficient (and required) for the issuance of a new certificate of title to the grantee. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 582 (App. 2018).

On rare occasions, when the landowner's old certificate has been lost, mislaid, or destroyed and the landowner wishes to transfer title, the proper practice is for the Land Court, following its practices and procedures for replacing a lost, mislaid, or destroyed certificate, to issue and deliver to the grantor a new duplicate certificate of title so that the grantor may turn around and surrender that certificate to Land Court when the deed is presented for registration. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 582 (App. 2018).

Whenever a landowner of registered land wishes to transfer an interest in the registered land (such as subjecting it to a lien such as a mortgage) or to transfer title, it is the landowner's duty in requesting any transfer to submit his or her owner's duplicate certificate for proper endorsement or cancellation. When the landowner has not done so, the landowner's intent might reasonably be questioned and the Land Court ought not to act. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 582 (App. 2018).

The Kosrae Land Court Rules (and good practice) require that all documents concerning transfer of title be notarized and submitted to the Registrar for recordation. Each document must reflect the printed name and signature of each person signing the document, and the date of the signing. Signatures which are executed at different times or in different locations must be notarized separately, and the signature page of each document may consist of as many duplicate pages as necessary for proper notarization. The Registrar shall not accept any document which is not properly notarized. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 618 (App. 2018).

When registered land is transferred, the parcel's owner must surrender the certificate of title to the Registrar for title transfer. A landowner's (or the landowner's heirs') failure to surrender the old certificate of title could indicate that the landowner (or his heirs) do not intend to transfer land title. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 618 (App. 2018).

When the "deed of gift" was not signed by all of the registered landowner's heirs; when it was not signed by the registered owner, since he was deceased; when the "land deed," which did contain the (unnotarized) signatures of all the other heirs, did not show an unequivocal intent to do anything other than to permit the grantee to build a house on the parcel; since the "deed of gift" was in a doubtful form and the "land deed" was equivocal; and since the old certificate of title was not surrendered with the deed of gift when it was filed, the Land Court should not have issued a new certificate of title for parcel to the grantee. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 618 (App. 2018).

Kosrae State Code § 11.612 does not apply to the transfer of registered land. It governs only the registration of unregistered land. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

When the owner of registered land sells or gifts registered land, all that is needed for a valid transfer is the delivery to the Land Court of a properly notarized deed (with each needed signature properly notarized) combined with the surrender of the grantor's old duplicate certificate of title. Proper and strict compliance with those requirements is the due process that is sufficient (and required) for the valid issuance of a new certificate of title to the grantee. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

If the landowner's old certificate has been lost, mislaid, or destroyed, the proper practice to transfer title is for the Land Court, following its practices and procedures for replacing a lost, mislaid, or destroyed certificate, to issue and deliver to the would-be grantor a new duplicate certificate of title so that the would-be grantor may then turn around and surrender that certificate to the Land Court at the same time that the deed is presented for registration. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

Whenever a landowner of registered land wishes to transfer an interest in that land (such as subjecting it to a lien such as a mortgage) or to transfer title, it is the landowner's duty in requesting any transfer to submit or surrender his or her owner's duplicate certificate for proper endorsement or cancellation. When the landowner has not done so, the landowner's intent might reasonably be questioned and the Land Court ought not to act. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

The proper way for someone to acquire a valid certificate of title for a decedent's previously registered parcel is for the Kosrae Land Court to conduct an heirship proceeding to determine the landowner's heirs and to issue a new certificate of title in those persons' names. Then, if those persons wish to transfer the parcel's title (give or sell) to one of themselves, they will execute a deed, with all their signatures properly notarized, and then present that deed to the Land Court while also surrendering their new certificate of title to the Land Court. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619 (App. 2018).

When the alleged fraudulent registration of a parcel is based on the alleged misrepresentation in the "deed of gift" that the "grantor" had the ability to grant and convey full title to parcel to the grantee, the plaintiffs have stated a claim for which they could be granted relief. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 619-20 (App. 2018).

When the owner of registered land passes away, the Land Commission has the statutory duty to determine the devisee or devisees or heir or heirs and their interests or respective interests to which each is entitled. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.3 (Chk. 2019).

– Tidelands

The people of Chuuk have always considered themselves to have rights and ownership of the tidelands, and thereby hold the property rights in them, throughout all of the several foreign administrations. These traditional and customary claims came down from time immemorial. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 208 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The Chuuk State Constitution recognizes all traditional rights and ownership over all reefs, tidelands, and other submerged lands subject to legislative regulation of their reasonable use. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 209 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

It was the intent of the framers of the Chuuk State Constitution to return the rights and ownership of all reefs, tidelands (all areas below the ordinary high watermark), and other submerged lands to the individual people of Chuuk State. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 210 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The constitutional grant of ownership of the tidelands back to the rightful individual owners, shall be given prospective application only. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 212 (Chk. S.

Ct. Tr. 1993).

The reversion of reefs, tidelands and other submerged lands to private owners granted by article IV, section 4 of the Chuuk Constitution does not apply to any tidelands that were previously filled or reclaimed. Nena v. Walter, 6 FSM R. 233, 236 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Tideland is land below the ordinary high water mark. Filled or reclaimed land, by its nature, is not land below the ordinary high water mark, and it cannot be considered tideland or submerged land. Nena v. Walter, 6 FSM R. 233, 236 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Where government title to the tidelands reverted to the traditional owners in 1989, and because the right to bring an action for trespass or ejection must be available to the owner before the time period for adverse possession has run, whether the doctrine of adverse possession exists in Chuukese land law need not be decided because the twenty-year statute of limitations did not start to run until 1989. Cheni v. Ngusun, 6 FSM R. 544, 548 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

The Chuuk State Constitution, effective on October 1, 1989, recognizes traditional rights over all reefs, tidelands, and other submerged lands. Tidelands, including man-made islands, that were filled prior to this effective date are no longer classed as tidelands and have become dry land. Sellem v. Maras, 7 FSM R. 1, 3-4 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Tidelands traditionally are those lands from the dry land to the deep water at the edge of the reef, and must be shallow enough for Chuukese women to engage in traditional methods of fishing. Sellem v. Maras, 7 FSM R. 1, 4 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A deep water passage through a reef too deep for Chuukese women to engage in their traditional fishing methods is not a tideland. While under Chuukese tradition and custom channels may have been owned, the constitution does not recognize traditional rights over channels. The state thus retains ownership of the channels, as was the situation prior to the adoption of the Chuuk Constitution. Sellem v. Maras, 7 FSM R. 1, 5 & n.9 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Tidelands within the meaning of article IV, section 4 of the Chuuk Constitution are those marine lands from the shore to the face of the reef that are shallow enough for traditional fishing activity by women. The constitutional recognition of traditional rights in tidelands does not include deep water channels or tidelands that have become dry land prior to the effective date of the constitution, through filling or other activity that raised the level of the marine lands above the mean high tide mark. Sellem v. Maras, 7 FSM R. 1, 7 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Under Pohnpei state law, owners of the land adjacent to the lagoon do not have sufficient property rights in the reef and the lagoon as to entitle them to monetary compensation or other relief for damage to the reef caused by unauthorized dredging activity in the lagoon near their land. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 59-60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei state law persons simply possessing a permit in the lagoon do not have sufficient property rights in the reef and the lagoon as to entitle them to monetary compensation or other relief for damage to the reef caused by unauthorized dredging activity in the lagoon near their land unless there has been some affirmative action such as prior written approval from the appropriate authority and effecting some development in the area in question. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei state law, if a reef is damaged by persons carrying out dredging activities authorized by state officials for a public purpose, adjacent or nearby coastal landowners are not entitled to a payment of just compensation for the depreciation of the value of the reef and fishing grounds. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei state law, if a fish maii [trap] is damaged by persons carrying out dredging activities authorized by state officials for a public purpose, adjacent or nearby coastal landowners are entitled to a payment of just compensation for the damage to a fish maii which they had constructed in the lagoon, if the fish maii was constructed pursuant to the dictate of customary law as a joint enterprise of the villagers, supervised by the village chief, managed, maintained and owned in common by the villagers; or, if an individual constructed the fish maii, prior written permission from the District Administrator, now the Pohnpei Public Land Board of Trustees, was obtained. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 60 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

The rights of citizens of Pohnpei in areas below the high watermark are prescribed by 67 TTC 2. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 63-64 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Under Pohnpei law, damage to reefs or soil under the high water mark resulting from dredging activities, the object of which is for public purposes, does not justify compensation to abutting land owners. If the Pohnpei Public Land Board of Trustees had granted certain rights in writing to an individual or group of individuals, and acting on that grant the grantees erected or constructed certain improvements, including fish maii (fish trap) in shallow waters, and if destroyed or value reduced as a result of state dredging activities, the owners thereof may be entitled to just compensation in accordance with the Pohnpei Constitution. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 56, 69 (Pon. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Prior to the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution the ownership of the filled marineland was with the Japanese government and that title was transferred to the Trust Territory pursuant to 67 TTC §§ 1 and 2 and later to Truk State. Atin v. Eram, 7 FSM R. 269, 271 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Any filling of marineland prior to the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution is dry land and has become part of the land adjacent to the fill activity. Atin v. Eram, 7 FSM R. 269, 271 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

An owner of dry land that erodes has no legal basis to claim ownership of tideland. Mailo v. Atonesia, 7 FSM R. 294, 295 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Claims for damages for violation of the FSM Environmental Protection Act and for damage based on an alleged property interest in the reef and lagoon adjoining plaintiffs' land will be dismissed for failure to state a claim for which relief may be granted. Damarlane v. FSM, 8 FSM R. 119, 121 (Pon. 1997).

Traditional claims of exclusive ownership of marine resources have been recognized only in areas immediately adjacent to an island or submerged reef. Claims involving custom and tradition were recognized by the Constitution's drafters, but were restricted to areas within lagoons and near reef areas. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 377 (Pon. 1998).

The waters, land, and other natural resources within the marine space of Kosrae are public property, the use of which the state government shall regulate by law in the public interest, subject to the right of the owner of land abutting the marine space to fill in and construct on or over the marine space. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 340 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

All marine areas below the ordinary high water mark belong to the Kosrae state government. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 340 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Private individuals lack standing to assert claims on behalf of the public and cannot bring claims against the state on behalf of the public with respect to state land. Therefore a private landowner does not have standing to sue the state with respect to black rocks deposited below the ordinary high water mark because that is state land, but he does have standing to sue with respect to black rocks located above the high water mark and on his land. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 341 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A Kosrae state regulation that covers all persons wanting to fill in and construct on or over land below the ordinary high water mark does not provide any private right of action and cannot be the basis of a claim against the state for violation of law or regulation even if it did not have a specific plan for the seawall that was part of a road-widening project for which it had an overall plan. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 342-43 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The customary and traditional rights of municipalities, clans, families and individuals to engage in subsistence fishing, and to harvest fish and other living marine resources from reef areas are recognized, but a municipality is not directly entitled to compensation when resources in a particular reef area of Pohnpei are damaged. Thus, absent any damage to municipal property besides the reef itself or the living marine resources, the municipality is entitled only to that amount which Pohnpei appropriates to the municipality to compensate it for damage to its traditional subsistence fishing rights. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 60-61 (Pon. 2001).

The state owns the submerged reef areas, but this ownership carries with it certain responsibilities with respect to the people in whose trust these areas are held. It must preserve and respect the traditionally recognized fishing rights of the people of Pohnpei. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 61 (Pon. 2001).

Submerged reef areas are government lands which passed from the Trust Territory to Pohnpei, and the rights of the municipalities to use these areas are subject to the state's ownership rights. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 61 (Pon. 2001).

Under the Trust Territory Code the state has the power to control all marine areas below the ordinary high water mark, subject to a few notable exceptions. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 62 (Pon. 2001).

The power of the states to regulate ownership, exploration and exploitation of natural resources in the marine area within 12 miles from the island baselines is not absolute as it is limited by the national powers to regulate navigation and shipping, and to regulate foreign and interstate commerce. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 63 & n.8 (Pon. 2001).

Pohnpei has legal ownership of the submerged reef area as long as none of the relevant exceptions to 67 TTC 2 are applicable. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 63 (Pon. 2001).

The assertion that municipalities own submerged reef areas is not sound because 67 TTC 2(1) expressly states that the law established by the Japanese administration was that all marine areas below the ordinary high watermark belong to the government and because a finding that the municipalities were the underlying owners of all submerged reef areas, would render the statute granting them the right to use marine resources there superfluous and inconsistent with the rest of the statute. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 64 (Pon. 2001).

The German Land Code of 1912 applies only to land on Pohnpei, not to submerged areas. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 64 (Pon. 2001).

The Japanese owned all areas below the high water mark during their administration, then ownership of this land passed to the Trust Territory, and subsequently to the State of Pohnpei. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 65 (Pon. 2001).

Control over areas within 12 miles from island baselines was reserved to the states, subject to the national government's control over foreign and interstate commerce, and navigation and shipping. Thus, under the transition clause, the "government" ownership referenced in 67 TTC 2 should be interpreted as "state" ownership within 12 miles from island baselines. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 65 n.13 (Pon. 2001).

Because the state has assumed the duty of regulating exploration, exploitation and conservation of natural resources within the 12 mile zone from island baselines, and it is presumably the state which bears the costs associated with enforcing state laws related to such natural resources within state waters, it is logical that the state should recover the damages flowing from injury to these resources. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 65 (Pon. 2001).

Title 67, Section 2 of the Trust Territory Code continues in effect under the transition clause of the FSM Constitution, is consistent with other provisions in the FSM and Pohnpei Constitutions, and clearly confirms that all marine areas below the ordinary high water mark belong to the government. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

Pohnpei does not have a proprietary ownership interest in the tideland, as it is public land which is intended to benefit the public. Thus, Pohnpei may not sell submerged reef areas, or destroy or waste these resources with impunity because such actions would violate the public trust, and any damages recovered by Pohnpei should be returned in kind to the people in accordance with Pohnpei's obligation to protect and preserve the natural resources for the people's use. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

The ownership of submerged land and marine resources has a public character, being held by all of the people for purposes in which all of the people are interested. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

The people of Pohnpei's traditional and customary rights to freely navigate the reef, engage in subsistence fishing in that area, and control the use of and materials in that marine environment is recognized in 67 TTC 2(1)(e), in the FSM Constitution, and the Pohnpei Constitution. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

A municipality is precluded from recovering damages for injury to the submerged lands and living marine resources damaged by a fishing vessel grounding, but will be provided an opportunity at trial to prove any damage to other municipal resources. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 67 (Pon. 2001).

When tidelands were never properly divided during the father's lifetime, the logical conclusion is that those tidelands remain lineage or family property according to Chuukese tradition and custom and cannot be transferred without the consent of all male adults of the lineage, subject only to the traditional rights of afokur as consented to. Lukas v. Stanley, 10 FSM R. 365, 366 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When deciding the ownership of tideland, the trial court did not err in not taking judicial notice of and following the judgment in a different case that dealt only with the boundaries and ownership of adjacent filled land. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 544 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

An owner of dry land is not necessarily the owner of the adjacent tideland. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 544 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Tideland ownership derives from the Chuuk Constitution's recognition (as of its effective date, October 1, 1989) of traditional rights in the tidelands. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 544 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Since traditional rights in tideland were not recognized in the law until October 1, 1989, no prior assertion of ownership over filled land could affect the traditional tideland rights. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Any assertion of ownership over the filled land in a different case could not affect the continuing traditional rights in the adjacent tidelands. Phillip v. Moses, 10 FSM R. 540, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Prior to the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution, all tidelands were owned by the government. When the Chuuk Constitution became effective, traditional tideland rights were restored over only those areas that were still tidelands on that date (Oct. 1, 1989). Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 41 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The tideland that is subject to traditional claims of ownership does not include deep water. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 42 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

While the Land Commission has the statutory authority to determine and register land titles, whether the Land Commission has the legal authority and the technical ability to determine, survey, and register tidelands is an unanswered question. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

During the German Administration, it was widely known on Ponape that all property from high-water mark out was considered to belong to the German Government with the exception of three private mangrove reserves. Subsequently, the Japanese claimed everything below the high water mark. In due course this passed to the Trust Territory, which shortly before the Trust Territory broke up, granted its rights to the several districts. In the area that became the Federated States of Micronesia, the districts became states. Pohnpei thus became the owner of the marine areas below the high water mark. Such ownership rests with the sovereign, and in this case the sovereign is the State of Pohnpei. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 508 (App. 2005).

The national government does not own or control tidelands, reefs, or natural resources within 12 nautical miles of the island baselines. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 509 (App. 2005).

Chuuk, in its Constitution, retroceded tideland rights to their traditional holders. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 509 (App. 2005).

When the people of Kitti, as opposed to the municipal government, were not parties to the case, the trial court decision did not affect were the traditional rights of the people of the various municipalities to fish in the submerged reef areas. These rights of the people to marine resources remain unaffected and are protected by Trust Territory statute. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 509 (App. 2005).

The Yap Constitution provides that the state recognizes traditional rights and ownership of natural resources and areas within the marine space of the State within 12 miles from island baselines and Yap statutory law provides that traditionally recognized fishing rights wherever located within the State Fishery Zone and internal waters must be preserved and respected and also preserves existing private rights of action for civil damages, for damage to coral reefs, seagrass areas, and mangroves. Thus 67 TTC 2 is no longer Yap state law. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 414 (Yap 2006).

Under Yap traditional rights and ownership of natural resources and marine areas inside the Yap fringing reef – the rights to use and exploit, to the exclusion of all others, the marine resources of particular areas of the submerged lands inside the fringing reef around Yap – stem from a concept called a tabinaw. A tabinaw entails rights, duties and obligations for its members, and includes families and households. But a tabinaw is more than a concept. A tabinaw includes an estate in identifiable land and specific areas within the Yap fringing reef within which a tabinaw member can exploit the marine resources. A tabinaw member can only exploit marine resources in the marine area that appertains to his tabinaw. Each village includes a number of tabinaw. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 415 (Yap 2006).

When a vessel's grounding and subsequent oil spill was an unreasonable interference with the interests in the affected marine resources, resulting in significant damage, and resulted in physical injury to the reef and mangroves, and other features of the lagoon environment, a significant harm, and when the plaintiffs have suffered an injury special in kind from other Yap residents because of their traditional ownership and use interests in the particularly affected natural resources, the defendants are thus liable to plaintiffs on the theory of both public and private nuisance since the court considers the interest of the Yapese in exclusive use and exploitation of the submerged lands inside the fringing reef analogous to interests in dry land in other common law countries. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 417 (Yap 2006).

A trial court case that when affirmed on appeal held that the decision – that the State of Pohnpei and not its municipalities owned the marine areas in Pohnpei – concerned only Pohnpei and not the other three FSM states, is clearly not controlling precedent for the resolving issues unique to the State of Yap, including the interpretation of its Constitution and Code when, unlike Pohnpei, Yap not only repealed the relevant Trust Territory Code provision, but Yap's Constitution expressly recognizes the traditional rights and ownership over the natural resources and the marine space within the state of Yap. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 58 (App. 2008).

The State of Yap's ownership of public lands as provided for at 9 Y.S.C. 901, is not mutually exclusive with the traditional rights of ownership over these lands and related marine resources by the people of Yap through the tabinaw, as recognized in the Yap Constitution. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 58 (App. 2008).

FSM admiralty law recognizes a cause of action for nuisance. The Yapese interest in exclusive use and exploitation of their submerged lands on and within the fringing reef is analogous to interests in dry land. A nuisance is a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land (either dry or submerged in Yap) resulting from intentional and unreasonable conduct or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 176 (Yap 2012).

The Pohnpei Residential Shoreline Act of 2009 outlines procedures to be followed in applying for a residential leasehold from the Chief of the Division of Public Land of the Department of Land and Natural Resources. It mandates that, upon the receipt of an application pursuant to the Act, the Chief of the Division of Public Land shall orchestrate a survey of the filled land for which the application has been submitted, and upon satisfaction that the applicant and the land meet the Act's criteria, the Chief must issue a certificate of eligibility for a residential leasehold to the applicant. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 529 (Pon. 2014).

Under Pohnpei state law, submerged public trust lands to a distance of not more than 150 feet extending seaward from a residential shoreline that have been filled for the purpose of constructing all or a portion of a residence thereon before December 31, 2008 are designated as available for residential lease. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 529 (Pon. 2014).

A plaintiff whose tideland is being dredged by another is threatened with irreparable harm because once a tideland has been dredged its very nature is altered and cannot easily be restored and because, analogously, harm to land is often considered irreparable since land is unique. Killion v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 539, 541 (Chk. 2014).

Harm to land is often considered irreparable because land is unique. The same should hold true of the reef and surrounding environment where harvesting is to occur as well as the precious population of sea cucumbers. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 546, 551 (Pon. 2016).

In Pohnpei, all marine areas below the ordinary high watermark belong to the government, and such lands are a part of the Pohnpei Public Lands Trust with certain exceptions reestablishing customary rights to the people in areas below the high watermark. Mwoalen Wahu Ileile en Pohnpei v. Peterson, 20 FSM R. 632, 641 (Pon. 2016).

Because Fefan and all areas under its political jurisdiction were designated as Land Registration Area 14, and because a tideland in Fefan falls under the political jurisdiction of Fefan, it thus lies within Registration Area 14, and the Land Commission therefore has primary jurisdiction to determine its ownership, as opposed to the court – unless, special cause is shown. Irons v. Rudolph, 22 FSM R. 408,

410 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

PUBLIC CONTRACTS

When the state's letter says that the bid was incomplete and that the contract was awarded to another bidder, it is a fair inference that the bid was rejected. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 362, 364 (Yap 2000).

Rejection of a contractor's bid on the basis it was incomplete is a final administrative determination which confers on the bidder the right to judicial review. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 362, 365 (Yap 2000).

A suit for injunctive relief is the appropriate vehicle by which to challenge a contract award under public bidding statutes because as a general rule, a declaratory judgment and an injunction are the only adequate means of protecting the public interest, the integrity of the competitive bidding process, and the individual bidder's rights. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 394 (Yap 2000).

A court must fully take into account the discretion that is typically accorded an official in the procurement agencies by statutes and regulations. Such discretion extends not only to the evaluation of bids submitted in response to a solicitation but also to the agency's determination with respect to the application of technical, and often esoteric, regulations to the complicated circumstances of individual procurement. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 396 (Yap 2000).

Under 9 Y.S.C. 528, all Yap state government contracts must be in writing and be executed by the agency which is authorized to let contracts in its own name and must be made with the lowest responsible bidder. The lowest responsible bidder is the lowest bidder whose offer adequately responds in quality, fitness, and capacity to the particular requirements of the proposed work called for by the contract. The lowest responsible bidder may be the bidder who submits the lowest price, but not necessarily. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 397 (Yap 2000).

All state contracts shall be in writing and made with the lowest responsible bidder. If the lowest bid is rejected, the contracting officer may, at his discretion, award the contract to the lowest remaining responsible bidder or advertise anew for bids. In each instance the officer, at his discretion, after determining the lowest responsible bidder, may negotiate with that bidder, and that bidder only, to reduce the scope of work and to award the contract at a price which reflects the reduction in the scope of work. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 397 (Yap 2000).

While the better procedure under 9 Y.S.C. 528 would have been for Public Works to formally select the second lowest bidder as the lowest responsible bidder before beginning negotiations with it to reduce the scope of work, and consequent price, the essential point is that the state had legally sufficient reasons for rejecting the lowest bidder's bid when it did so. As a result, no substantial right of the lowest bidder was violated by the state's failure to strictly conform to the statutory procedure. The court therefore will not reverse, modify, or remand the case for further proceedings pursuant to 10 Y.S.C. 165 on the basis of the state's negotiations with the second lowest bidder. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 398 (Yap 2000).

The state must provide contract bidders with substantial, material, and detailed information necessary for a bidder to make a knowing and fully informed bid. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 399 (Yap 2000).

Materials provided by the state, however denominated, must provide sufficient specificity to permit real competition between the bidders on contracts, and fair comparison among the several bids. The state-provided specifications may be sufficient to provide real competition and a fair comparison although the bid form requires the bidder to provide additional specifications. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9

FSM R. 390, 400 (Yap 2000).

When the state's bid documents provided specifications for metal buildings in extreme detail it could properly require a contract bidder to provide the brand name and additional specifications for the metal buildings as part of its bid, and could reject the bid on this basis when those items were not provided. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 401-02 (Yap 2000).

The lowest responsible bidder is the lowest bidder whose offer adequately responds in quality, fitness, and capacity to the particular requirements of the proposed work called for by the contract. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 403 (Yap 2000).

The lowest responsible bidder for a contract for public work is one who is responsible and the lowest in price on the advertised basis. The term "responsible" as thus used is not limited in its meaning to financial resources and ability. Authorizations of this kind invest public authorities with discretionary power to pass upon the bidder's experience and his facilities for carrying out the contract, his previous conduct under other contracts, and the quality of his previous work, and when that discretion is properly exercised, the courts will not interfere. A bidder's experience in his field of expertise is a valid factor which may be considered in evaluating competing bids in order to determine the lowest responsible bidder. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 403 (Yap 2000).

In addition to the names of any joint or subcontractors and the work they will do, all bids for state contracts must include any other materially relevant information the contracting officer may require, and any bid which does not comply with the advertisement's requirements or the statutory provisions shall be rejected. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 403 (Yap 2000).

It is not for the court to second-guess the state's determination that a bidder's related experience was insufficient to qualify it as the lowest responsible bidder because a court has no warrant to set aside agency actions as arbitrary or capricious when those words mean no more than that the judge would have handled the matter differently had he been an agency member. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 404 (Yap 2000).

The state may reject a contract bid when the bidder has not supplied the names and curriculum vitae of its key personnel which was materially relevant information required by the bidding documents. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 404 (Yap 2000).

When the subcontractors' professional experience was not required under the terms of the bid documents themselves, nor was its submission a customary practice, a bidder's failure to submit them was not properly a basis for the rejection of its bid. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 405 (Yap 2000).

When the statute provides that any bid which does not comply with the bid advertisement's requirements or the statutory provisions shall be rejected, and when the bidder's qualification statement makes it clear that failure to provide any of the information requested may result in the contracting officer's rejection of the bid, the lack of materially relevant information required by the bid documents was a sufficient basis upon which to reject the bid. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 405 (Yap 2000).

Although the statute requires the state to determine before a bid is submitted whether a potential bidder's financial ability to perform the work and its experience in performing similar work, the state may also require that a bidder provide, as part of its bid package, additional information regarding the qualifications of those specific individuals within its organization who would be working on the project. International Bridge Corp. v. Yap, 9 FSM R. 390, 406 (Yap 2000).

A contract for public work or public property or supplies must be executed on the public body's behalf by some officer or officers possessed of the power to contract on behalf of the governmental body which they represent. The fundamental rule is that a public officer, who has only such authority as is conferred upon him by law, may make for the government he represents only such contracts as he is authorized by law to make. Nagata v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 265, 271 (Pon. 2002).

The terms and conditions of a contract with a successful bidder for public contracts where competitive bidding is required are to be gathered from the terms and specifications of the advertisement or solicitation for bids. Nagata v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 265, 271 (Pon. 2002).

When the plaintiffs have shown that the state has acted ultra vires with regard to soliciting bids, designating successful bidders, and entering into contracts for trochus, and has acted arbitrarily in determining what constitutes evidence of available funds and in attaching other conditions to the contract awards which were not included in the solicitation to bid documents, they have demonstrated that they will be irreparably injured if the trochus harvest is permitted to proceed, as the bid solicitation and contract award processes were contrary to Pohnpei state law. The plaintiffs are thus entitled to a declaratory judgment that the defendants' trochus harvest activities are illegal and to a permanent injunction, prohibiting the defendants from proceeding with any trochus harvest until the state has implemented procedures to conduct a fair and transparent bidding process for trochus, through the department authorized by law to conduct it. Nagata v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 265, 272 (Pon. 2002).

A fair and transparent bidding process requires that regulations for soliciting bids, designating successful bidders, and awarding contracts for trochus be properly noticed, published, and distributed by the authorized department and that the department's solicitations to bid set forth in clear terms each and every term and condition of the contract to be formed with a successful bidder for a trochus harvest, which terms may not be varied by the state after a bid is awarded. Nagata v. Pohnpei, 11 FSM R. 265, 272 (Pon. 2002).

The statutory provision entitled "State Acquisition of Land" applies to the state's acquisition of interests in private land, which includes purchases of land in fee simple, and also other interests such as leases, easements for access roads and rights of way. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 521-22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the timing and manner in which a parcel was selected for a state quarry site, and when the negotiations were conducted and a lease agreement executed without public notice, without bidding procedures and without testing the suitability of the rock therein for aggregate production, it raises issues of public trust, transparency of government operations and propriety of the these actions under state law. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 513, 522 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The Kosrae Financial Management Regulations, Section 4.2(b) requires free, open and competitive bidding for purchases more than $25,000. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 531, 534 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The Financial Management Regulations, Section 4.17 provides the requirements for an exemption from open bidding when the Governor, in the event of an emergency affecting public health, safety, or convenience so declares in writing, describing the nature of the emergency and danger, an exemption to open bidding will be made to the extent necessary to avoid the stated danger. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 531, 534 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The State of Kosrae acquires an interest in private land at the direction of the Governor through negotiation or through a procedure for acquisition of an interest in private land through court proceedings. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 531, 535 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

If the state's lease interest in parcels of which the Governor as a co-owner was acquired at the Lt. Governor's direction, or at the direction of any person other than the Governor, then it appears that lease interest was acquired in violation of Kosrae State Code, Section 11.103(1), but if the lease interest in the parcels was acquired at the Governor's direction, in compliance with Section 11.103, then it appears that the lease interest was acquired in violation of the Kosrae State Ethics Act. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 531, 535 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

An insurance broker did not violate the Chuuk Financial Management Act by advancing the premium on Chuuk's behalf when it was not a state officer, employee, or allottee within the meaning of the statute and it thus did not create an obligation within the statute's meaning because no evidence suggests that the broker was anything other than one of Chuuk's many vendors with whom Chuuk entered into a binding contract. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 654 (Pon. 2008).

All contracts for the purchase of personal property involving $50,000 or more made on behalf of any national government agency must be let by free and open competitive bidding. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 655 (Pon. 2008).

When the FSM assumed the responsibility for arranging for insurance coverage for the vessels owned by the FSM including those operated by the four states, and the broker, Chuuk, and the FSM knew that the vessels' operators would be responsible for paying for the insurance for their respective vessels, the public bidding statute, as a matter of law, does not create liability on the FSM's part to the broker for Chuuk's premiums. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 655 (Pon. 2008).

When none of the questions to be decided by the court directly touch upon treaty relations between the FSM and the United States, the FSM Supreme Court may determine whether the FSM wrongfully provided false information to U.S. officials, whether, if proven, those actions were actionable, and if so, what damages the defendant-counterclaimant suffered since the court can also decide the issue of whether either party breached the contract, and if so, who owes what sums to the other. The mere existence of a funding mechanism agreed to by two sovereign nations cannot strip the court of jurisdiction to issue a decision on the merits of this case. Nor does the Compact intend to so hobble the court. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 484 (Pon. 2009).

When a public law's statutory language seems to speak only in prospective terms and certainly does not expressly state or clearly, explicitly, positively, unequivocally, unmistakably, and unambiguously show legislative intent to make the statute retroactive or for it to be applied retrospectively to previously-awarded public contracts, the movant is entitled to summary judgment and a declaration that the public law does not apply to the parties' earlier contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 592 (Pon. 2011).

Chuuk cannot escape liability when the plaintiff did not accept the risk that Chuuk might not be able to find funds and was not promised payment only when and if funds were available; when the plaintiff was told on November 24, 1995, that Chuuk was still awaiting the Chuuk Department of Treasury's issuance of a check for full payment of the insurance premium which Chuuk hoped would be within a week, and was asked to "Please bear with us your usual patient [sic] and understanding"; when the plaintiff would have had every reason to believe that the funds had been appropriated and, apparently like in previous years, Chuuk was waiting for them to become available and the paperwork done to cut the check; when the same should be true for fiscal 1997, when Chuuk informed the plaintiff that it had submitted a requisition to Chuuk Finance for $84,000 and was making daily follow-up; and when the judgment was not on a breach of contract theory. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 119 (App. 2011).

There is no authority that a party to a government contract has a duty to inquire and determine for itself whether the funds to pay for the contract have been properly appropriated and are certified as available, although there is plenty of authority that the government cannot create an obligation to pay unless there has been an appropriation and certification. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 119 (App. 2011).

Governments are generally not liable on contracts unless there has been an appropriation and a certification of availability of funds, and Chuuk, by its own Financial Management Act, Truk S.L. No. 5-44, has similar statutory requirements. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 119 (App. 2011).

The public interest factor favors the plaintiffs since the public interest should favor a fair and thorough, but not rushed, evaluation of the power generation bids which ends with the PUC Board of Directors approving a contract with the bidder with the best plan because it involves proposals for a long-term improvement of PUC's power generation capacity and the expenditure of a large sum. The public interest also favors adherence to the Pohnpei statutes that govern an independent public corporation such as PUC, rather than a blatant disregard of PUC's independent nature. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 440 (Pon. 2012).

The public interest favors a bidding process that is fair and transparent. It also favors that foreign investors be seen to be treated fairly and thus encouraged to invest in Pohnpei to the State's benefit. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 563, 568 (Pon. 2013).

A declaratory judgment and an injunction are the only adequate means of protecting the public interest, the integrity of the competitive bidding process, and the individual bidder's rights to challenge a contract award under the public bidding statutes. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 563, 568 (Pon. 2013).

The successful bidder on a public contract is a necessary and indispensable party to litigation by an unsuccessful bidder that challenges the public bidding process. Luen Thai Fishing Venture, Ltd. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 573, 575 (Pon. 2013).

The mandate of 55 F.S.M.C. 221(2) prohibits any employee of the FSM to authorize an expenditure or create or authorize an obligation in advance of the availability of funds. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 223 (Pon. 2015).

When the applicable regulations require that any public contracts awarded under those regulations are subject to mandatory alternative dispute methods; when the movants have filed a complaint and thereby "invoked the litigation machinery"; when the parties availed themselves of an alternative dispute method by virtue of a mediation session but the settlement agreement thus reached was unenforceable because it did not receive the required Presidential approval; and when the government is not disposed to resume alternative dispute resolution, the plaintiff's motion to compel arbitration will be denied. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 224-25 (Pon. 2015).

When an FSM court has not previously construed an FSM civil procedure rule that is similar to a U.S. rule, it may look to U.S. sources for guidance in interpreting the FSM rule, such as when it has not previously considered the application of FSM Civil Rule 56 to litigation involving the termination of a government construction contract. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 283, 289 (Pon. 2017).

A contractor asserting claims of bad faith must overcome the strong presumption, that in the absence of clear, contrary evidence, public officials act conscientiously in the discharge of their duties. Thus, unless bad faith is demonstrated, the government is prevented only from engaging in actions motivated by a specific intent to harm the plaintiff. For a contractor attempting to show that a government act was undertaken in bad faith requires well-nigh irrefragable proof to induce the court to abandon the presumption of good faith dealing. The necessary irrefragable proof is equated with evidence of some specific intent to injure the plaintiff, motivated solely by malice or actuated by animus toward same. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 283, 289 (Pon. 2017).

Unsubstantiated suspicions and allegations of bad faith actions are not enough to demonstrate bad faith. A contractor must identify specific instances of the government's ill will directed toward it – the contracting officer's state of mind is critical. No less than the contracting officer's knowing and intentional conduct can support a finding of bad faith. Thus, claims of bad faith have been rejected when the contractor can only prove that the convenience termination was an outgrowth of the contracting officer's negligent conduct, or the government's mere error, even if would constitute sufficient ground for contractual breach. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 283, 289 (Pon. 2017).

A contractor may attack a contracting officer's decision to terminate on the grounds that such decision was an abuse of discretion or arbitrary and capricious, but the contractor has the burden of proving arbitrary and capricious conduct. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 283, 289 (Pon. 2017).

Summary judgment will be denied when a genuine issue of fact exists about whether the contractor had met all material terms of the contract or that the delay was excusable and when the contract provides that if, after termination of the contractor's right to proceed, it is determined that the contractor was not in default or that the delay was excusable, the parties' rights and obligations will be the same as if the termination had been issued for the government's convenience. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 283, 290 (Pon. 2017).

PUBLIC OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

When a purported state employment contract erroneously and consistently recites that it is between the employee and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and contains other statements demonstrating that the contract words were not to be taken seriously and did not comport with reality, the document is unpersuasive evidence of the relationships among the employee, the state, and the national government. Manahane v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 161, 165-67 (Pon. 1982).

The National Public Service system Act plainly manifests a congressional intention that, where there is a dispute over a dismissal, the FSM Supreme Court should withhold action until the administrative steps have been completed. 52 F.S.M.C. 157. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 206 (Pon. 1982).

Due process may well require that, in a National Public Service system employment dispute, the ultimate decision-maker review the record of the ad hoc committee hearing, at least insofar as either party to the personnel dispute may rely upon some portion of the record. 52 F.S.M.C. 156. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 206 (Pon. 1982).

Government employment that is "property" within the meaning of the Due Process Clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the Constitution, there must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 351-52 (Pon. 1983).

The National Public Service System Act's provisions create a mutual expectation of continued employment for national government employees and protect that employment right by limiting the permissible grounds, and specifying necessary procedures, for termination. This, in turn, is sufficient protection of the employment right to establish a property interest. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 353-54 (Pon. 1983).

The government's right to discipline an employee for unexcused absence is not erased by the fact that annual leave and sick leave were awarded for the days of absence. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 357 (Pon. 1983).

The highest management official must base his final decision on a national government employee's termination, under section 156 of the National Public Service System Act, upon the information presented at the ad hoc committee hearing and no other information. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 359-60 (Pon. 1983).

If, pursuant to section 156 of the National Public Service system Act, the highest management official declines to accept a finding of the ad hoc committee, the official will be required by statutory as well as constitutional requirements to review those portions of the record bearing on the factual issues and to submit a reasoned statement demonstrating why the ad hoc committee's factual conclusion should be rejected. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 360-61 (Pon. 1983).

The National Public Service System Act, by implication, requires final decisions by unbiased persons. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 362 (Pon. 1983).

The highest management officials cannot be said to be biased as a class and they cannot be disqualified, by virtue of their positions, from final decision-making as to a national government employee's termination under section 156 of the National Public Service System Act, without individual consideration. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 363 (Pon. 1983).

The high public office of state prosecutor may be the most powerful office in our system of justice. The prosecutor invokes and implements the sovereign powers of the state in the justice system and is given a wide degree of discretion in so doing. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 13 (Pon. 1985).

No common law rule has been applied universally in all contexts to determine the status of government officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 15 (Pon. 1985).

Some government workers have been held partially or completely immune from tort liability on grounds that they are public officers. This immunity, intended to serve the purpose of encouraging fearless and independent public service, has been bestowed upon prosecutors as well as other public officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 16 (Pon. 1985).

The emphasis in governmental tort liability cases has been on the special status of government, its functions and its officials rather than on the degree of control tests commonly employed in nongovernmental cases. Even those commentators who specifically note that the respondeat superior doctrine applies to the government analyze governmental liability issues in terms of public policy considerations rather than through a degree of control analysis which distinguishes between closely supervised and high-ranking officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 16 (Pon. 1985).

There is a common law of taxation which addresses the status of public officials as employees. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 17 (Pon. 1985).

A taxpayer who held the high public office of Chief of Finance, whose contract gave him a wide degree of discretion in carrying out governmental powers; and who was not an outside consultant who could merely suggest or advise but was an integral part of the governmental operation is a governmental official, therefore an employee for purposes of the FSM Income Tax Law. Heston v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 61, 65 (Pon. 1985).

All government officials are employees of the government within the meaning of the Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law. Heston v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 61, 65 (Pon. 1985).

Defendants were not acting as police officers or under the direction of police officers so as to make their conduct lawful where the record reveals generally that the defendants' actions were not those of police officers acting in good faith to enforce the law, but were taken on their own behalf to punish and intimidate their victims. Teruo v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 167, 171 (App. 1986).

The National Public Service System Act and the FSM Public Service System Regulations establish an expectation of continued employment for nonprobationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds and specifying procedures necessary for their dismissal; this is sufficient protection of the right to continued national government employment to establish a property interest for nonprobationary employees which may not be taken without fair proceedings, or "due process." Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 73 (App. 1989).

In the absence of statutory language to the contrary, the National Public Service System Act's mandate may be interpreted as assuming compliance with the constitutional requirements, because if it purported to preclude constitutionally required procedures, it must be set aside as unconstitutional. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 74 (App. 1989).

Where there are no directly controlling statutes, cases or other authorities within the Federated States of Micronesia, it may be helpful to look to the law of other jurisdictions, especially the United States, in formulating general principles for use in resolving legal issues bearing upon the rights of public employees and officers, in part because the structures of public employment within the Federated States of Micronesia are based upon the comparable governmental models existing in the United States. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 191 (Pon. 1990).

A basic premise of public employment law is that the rights of a holder of public office are determined primarily by reference to constitutional, statutory and regulatory provisions, not by the principles of contract which govern private employment relationships. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 191 (Pon. 1990).

Subject to constitutional limitations, the public has the power, through its laws, to fix the rights, duties and emoluments of public service, and the public officer neither bargains for, nor has contractual entitlements to them. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 191 (Pon. 1990).

The power of the President to appoint executive branch officers is not absolute, but is subject to check by the advice and consent of Congress. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 197 (Pon. 1990).

If someone constitutionally ineligible for appointment, is appointed a judge then his status is that of a de facto judge. A de facto judge is one who exercises the duties of the judicial office under the color of an appointment thereto. Where there is an office to be filled, and one, acting under color of authority, fills the office and discharges its duties, his actions are those of an officer de facto, and binding on the public. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 298-99 (App. 1993).

The Title 51 provision barring nonresident workers from gainful employment for other than the employer who has contracted for him does not apply to national government employees because the national government is not an employer for the purposes of Title 51 of the FSM Code and does not contract with the Chief of the Division of Labor for employment of nonresident workers. FSM v. Moroni, 6 FSM R. 575, 578 (App. 1994).

Title 51 does not preclude nonresident national government employees from engaging in off-hours, secondary, private sector employment, but simply means that in order to engage in secondary employment nonresident national government employees must comply with its statutory provisions covering the private sector employment of nonresidents. FSM v. Moroni, 6 FSM R. 575, 579 (App. 1994).

A permanent employee has a one year probationary period after a promotion or transfer. A probationary employee has all of the rights of a permanent employee except the right to appeal from removal from the new position. Once the probationary period expires, an employee becomes a permanent employee in the new position. No adverse action (including a demotion) may be taken against a permanent employee except as prescribed by regulations which entitle the employee to notice of the action taken and a hearing regarding the merits of the action before an ad hoc committee if the employee appeals. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 332 (Pon. 1998).

Title 52 F.S.M.C. 151-57 and PSS Regulation 18.4 establish an expectation of continuous employment for nonprobationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds, and specifying necessary procedures, for their dismissal. This is sufficient to establish a "property interest" for the nonprobationary employee which cannot be taken without fair proceedings, or "due process." Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 333 (Pon. 1998).

When there is no applicable FSM precedent on the point, it is helpful to look to U.S. law in order to formulate general principles for use in resolving legal issues bearing upon the rights of public employees and officers because the public employment structures within the FSM are based upon comparable government models existing in the United States. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 333 (Pon. 1998).

A provisionally or temporarily appointed individual is not ordinarily entitled to a permanent civil service position merely by reason of his or her retention beyond the probation period prescribed for regular appointees. At least two conditions must be present before a temporary appointment may become permanent, so as to entitle an affected employee to the procedures in the PSS Act and Regulations, regarding adverse action against permanent employees: 1) the employee must have been among the first three on the eligible list at the time of the appointment, so as to be qualified and capable of receiving the appointment, and 2) there must have been a vacancy. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 334 (Pon. 1998).

A court finding that an employee, who held an acting position for four years and was certified as qualified or eligible for the vacant position, had been permanently promoted, does not take away management discretion in hiring and establish for employees a legal right to promotion. Rather, it recognizes the reality of the employee's employment situation, and prevents the government from circumventing the procedural requirements of the PSS Act and Regulations. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 334 (Pon. 1998).

The PSS Act's purpose is to provide employees with just opportunities for promotion, reasonable job security (including the right to appeal), and tenure in positions. 52 F.S.M.C. 113, 115. If the national government is allowed to "temporarily" promote employees for indefinite periods of time and subsequently return them to their previous positions, the government can effectively circumvent all of the Act's merit and tenure principles. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 334-35 (Pon. 1998).

Under the PSS Act and Regulations, a permanent employee after a promotion or transfer is a probationary employee who becomes permanent and non-probationary at the end of a maximum one year probationary period. Thereafter, an action returning the employee to his previous pay level is a demotion, an adverse action. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 335 (Pon. 1998).

The protections afforded a permanent employee include: 1) notification of the adverse action, containing a full and detailed statement of the reasons for the action; 2) notification of his right to appeal the adverse action; 3) the right to appeal the adverse action and have his appeal heard publicly by an ad hoc committee; and 4) the right to receive a written report from the ad hoc committee containing findings of fact and written recommendations concerning the adverse action. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 335, 337 (Pon. 1998).

An employee receiving a temporary promotion must be informed in advance and must agree in writing that at the expiration of the temporary promotion, he will be returned to the former salary (grade and step) that he would be receiving had he remained in his former position. But such a written agreement has no effect if the promotion has become permanent. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 335 (Pon. 1998).

A permanent employee cannot be demoted to his former position based on a regulation which, by its terms, only applies to a temporary promotion. A permanent employee's constitutional right to due process is violated by the national government when it has thus demoted him. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 335 (Pon. 1998).

Every permanent and probationary employee is to receive an annual written rating of performance. Employees who receive "Satisfactory" or "Exceptional" ratings are eligible for step increases within their pay level. Employees who receive "Less than Satisfactory" ratings are not eligible. The absence of a performance evaluation gives rise to the presumption that the individual was performing at a "Less than Satisfactory" level. Pay and step increases are discretionary. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 336-37

Because Congress has not explicitly made employment contracts which violate 11 F.S.M.C. 1305 unenforceable, the FSM Supreme Court may properly decide whether a contravention of public policy is grave enough to warrant unenforceabillty. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1999).

When there is no national precedent on the issue of the enforcement of an employment contract term which was violative of public policy, and there is no custom or tradition governing the matter, the FSM Supreme Court may look to the common law of the United States. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1999).

Although there was a public interest in denying enforcement because the hiring violated public policy, this is outweighed by the special public interest of the government's failure to provide any hearing or opportunity to be heard concerning its failure to pay the employee or take any steps to terminate the contract, thus constituting a violation of due process rights; the employee's justified expectations of being paid; and the substantial forfeiture would result if enforcement were to be denied. Therefore the trial court did not abuse its discretion in its weighing of the factors on the issue of enforceability. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1999).

An illegally-hired public employee has a constitutionally protected interest in employment because the Secretary of Finance must give notice and an opportunity to be heard after taking the action to withhold his pay, and the government must terminate his employment after it determines his hiring had violated public policy, giving him notice and an opportunity to be heard. Failure to take such steps violated the employee's due process rights. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1999).

Trust Territory Code Title 61 governed the Public Employment System during 1978, and provided that the grievance procedures would hear and adjudicate grievances for all employees where the employees would be free from coercion, discrimination or reprisals and that they might have a representative of their own choosing. Skilling v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 448, 451 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

In 1978, the Trust Territory Public Service Grievance System covered all Public Service employees and covered any matter of concern or dissatisfaction to an eligible employee, unless exempted. Skilling v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 448, 451 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An employee had to complete the informal grievance procedure before presenting the grievance to the Trust Territory Personnel Board. The employee was required to present a grievance concerning a particular act or occurrence within fifteen calendar days of the date of the act or occurrence. The informal grievance procedure permitted presentation of the grievance orally. The Regulations also provided a formal grievance procedure, which the employee may have utilized and which had to be done in writing, if his grievance was not settled to his satisfaction under the informal grievance procedure. The formal grievance procedure was not mandatory upon employees. Skilling v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 448, 451-52 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Trust Territory Public Service System Regulations did not require an employee grievance be heard by the Personnel Board in the formal grievance procedure prior to filing suit in court on that grievance. There was no limitation on judicial review of grievances imposed by the Public Service System Regulations, as long as the informal grievance procedure was completed. Skilling v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 448, 452 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

After a Trust Territory employee's cause of action accrued in 1980 when he completed the informal grievance procedure with his supervisor, he had two options: follow the formal grievance procedure for review by the Personnel Board; or file suit in court for judicial review of his grievance. Since his right to sue was complete then, a suit, filed in 2000, will be barred by the six-year statute of limitations and dismissed. Skilling v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 448, 452-53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The over-obligation of funds statute, 55 F.S.M.C. 220(3), was not intended to create a basis for private parties to sue government officials, but for the government to be able to punish employees and officials who are found to be misusing public funds. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 634 (Pon. 2002).

Under the FSM criminal code a "public servant" is any officer or employee of, or any person acting on behalf of, the FSM, including legislators and judges, and any person acting as an advisor, consultant, or otherwise, in performing a governmental function; but the term does not include witnesses. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 110 (Chk. 2003).

The common and approved usage in the English language of the term "public officer" is a person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. "Public officer" is not a legal term of art but carries only its common, ordinary, and unambiguous English language meaning as found in the dictionary. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 110-11 (Chk. 2003).

Strictly construing the term "public officer" by using only its plain, ordinary, and unambiguous meaning (or in the code's terms "its common and approved usage"), a mayor falls within the public officer exception to the criminal statute of limitations. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

The plain, unambiguous, and ordinary meaning of "public officer," an ordinary term for which no construction is required, is that the term includes any person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

The ad hoc committee is required to prepare a full written statement of its findings of fact and its recommendations for action within seven calendar days after the close of its hearing. Maradol v. Department of Foreign Affairs, 13 FSM R. 51, 54 (Pon. 2004).

The English language's common and approved usage of the term "public officer" is a person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions or one holding office under the government of a municipality, state, or nation. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 538 (Chk. 2005).

The plain, unambiguous, and ordinary meaning of "public officer," an ordinary term for which no construction is required, is that the term includes any person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 539 (Chk. 2005).

Section 105(3)(b) "public officer" exception to the statute of limitations applied to persons based upon their status as public officers – persons holding posts and exercising governmental functions. It did not matter whether that status was defined and bestowed upon a person by the national government or by another level of government. It only mattered that the person held that status. That the term "public officer" cannot possibly refer to state and municipal public officials since the national government lacks the constitutional power to define those offices and to determine or install those officials is a frivolous and misplaced contention because national laws are often applied to persons based on their status, even when that status is defined solely by another government. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 539 (Chk. 2005).

When an FSM statute defines a public servant as an officer or employee of the FSM, that section did not include within its definition of public servant all public officers. It only included those that were officers of the FSM national government. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 540 (Chk. 2005).

Qualified immunity is not a defense to a criminal prosecution. "Qualified immunity" partially shields public officials performing discretionary functions from civil liability and damages. Public officials are not immune or exempt from criminal liability and prosecution. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 (Chk. 2006).

A law enforcement officer is one whose duty is to preserve the peace. A mayor has the duty to faithfully implement the municipality's laws and ordinances, but he does not have the power of arrest, and even if he were a law enforcement officer, he would not be immune from prosecution because a law enforcement officer may be prosecuted for an offense committed while he was arresting someone. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 (Chk. 2006).

National police officers are public officials. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 60 (Chk. 2006).

A public officer is not denied due process of law by the abolition of his office before his term expires or by his removal or suspension according to law. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 216, 218 (Chk. 2006).

While the defendant's position as Weno mayor would not satisfy the FSM officer or employee element in sections 55 F.S.M.C. 221(3) and 223, the defendant's service as the project manager on a project for which the national government supplied all the funding, for the purpose of that project, would because he was subject to the national government's control and supervision concerning the project he was manager of, and in that capacity, he performed a national government function – expending national government funds. Spending national government funds is an exercise of the national government's sovereign power. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 314-15 (Chk. 2006).

For the purpose of that project, a project manager of a national government project funded by national government funds, is an officer of the national government since he was exercising powers on the national government's behalf. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 315 (Chk. 2006).

As a project manager for the Compact funds, a defendant was a national government officer (for that purpose only) because he was exercising powers on the national government's behalf over national government money in a national government project. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 315 (Chk. 2006).

The term "officer or employee of any government of the FSM" in 55 F.S.M.C. 313(2) includes municipal mayors. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 315 (Chk. 2006).

The term "officer or employee of any State" in 55 F.S.M.C. 338 includes municipal officers and employees. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 316 (Chk. 2006).

Currently each of the states and the FSM national government have hiring preference laws. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 449 n.4 (App. 2011).

Sovereign immunity should not be confused with official immunity for public officers. Government officials who are performing their official duties are generally shielded from civil damages, and the court has previously recognized that some government workers have been held partially or completely immune from tort liability on grounds that they are public officers. This immunity, intended to serve the purpose of encouraging fearless and independent public service, has been bestowed upon prosecutors as well as other public officials. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 64 (Chk. 2011).

A qualified official immunity applies to public officials. An official who simply enforces a presumptively valid statute will rarely thereby lose his or her immunity from suit. Absent extraordinary circumstances, liability will not attach for executing the statutory duties one was appointed to perform. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 65 (Chk. 2011).

When no extraordinary circumstances are present in a suit over the enforcement of a statute, public officers, in their individual capacities, will be dismissed from the suit, but since injunctive relief can be had against them in their official capacities, they will not be dismissed in their official capacities. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 65 (Chk. 2011).

Since a suit against an official in his or her official capacity is a suit against that official's office and since a national government office with nationwide scope and authority must be "found" or be "present" in some form in each state in the nation regardless of whether it has an actual year-round physical presence there, for the purpose of the venue statute, none of the defendant national government officials "reside" on Pohnpei. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 66 (Chk. 2011).

Disciplinary actions of government employees are not subject to judicial review until the administrative remedies have been exhausted and are not subject to such review thereafter except on the grounds of violation of law or regulation or of denial of due process or of equal protection of the laws. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 238 (Pon. 2012).

The statute requiring that the ad hoc committee hearing be conducted within the 15 calendar days of the receipt of the employee's appeal is directory and not mandatory, as the statute does not prescribe what happens if the prescribed time period is not adhered to. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 246 (Pon. 2012).

While rights are often freely assignable, duties are not freely delegated. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 227, 232 (Yap 2013).

If chiefs were considered state officers and thus a state authority and were permitted to espouse the Receiver of Wreck's claims, then they would have claims that they do not share with the other class members and since a person whose claims are not common to the class would have to be removed as class representatives of, and membership in, the certified class and some other person(s), who could adequately protect the class interests, would have to be named as class representative(s), the chiefs would then not be permitted to participate in, or receive, or share any of the damages awarded to the certified class. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 227, 232 (Yap 2013).

Since a statutory receiver or public officer cannot, even with a court's approval, delegate his powers or duties, or surrender assets which the law compels him to administer and since the Receiver of Wreck is both a statutory receiver and a public officer (the Secretary of Transportation and Communications), the delegation of the Receiver's duties to private persons (the class plaintiffs) would be unlawful because the statute only permits delegation to "relevant state authority" and cannot be approved as a class action settlement agreement. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 227, 232-33 (Yap 2013).

The Public Service System Act delineates procedures that must be followed in terminating an employee for unsatisfactory performance and mandates that no dismissal or demotion of a permanent employee is effective until the management official transmits to the employee a written notice setting forth the specific reasons for the dismissal or demotion and the employee's rights of appeal and it further mandates that any regular employee who is dismissed may appeal through an administrative review process. A crucial part of the administrative review process is a hearing before an ad hoc committee, and subsequent preparation of a full written statement of findings of fact. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386 (Pon. 2014).

In reviewing a government employee's termination under Title 52, the FSM Supreme Court will review factual findings insofar as necessary to determine whether there is evidence to establish that there were grounds for discipline. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386 (Pon. 2014).

Under Title 52, since the FSM Supreme Court's review is for the sole purpose of preventing statutory, regulatory and constitutional violations, review of the factual findings is limited to determining whether substantial evidence in the record supports the administrative official's conclusion that a violation of the kind justifying termination has occurred. The statute evinces a clear congressional intent that the courts avoid serving as finders of fact. When there are non-frivolous disputes about the grounds for termination, the decision of the ad hoc committee should identify and address those grounds with specificity, and when they have not, the court will remand the case to the ad hoc committee to prepare a full written statement of its findings of fact. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386-87 (Pon. 2014).

The court's role is not to serve as a finder of fact substituting its judgment for that of the ad hoc committee and the President. Rather, the court's role is to determine whether the administrative review process was conducted in accordance with statutory guidelines and in a manner that protects the plaintiff's right to due process. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 387 n.2 (Pon. 2014).

The National Public Service System Act and the Public Service System Regulations establish continued employment for non-probationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds, and specifying the necessary procedures for their dismissal. This is sufficient protection of the right to continued employment to establish a property interest for non-probationary employees which may not be taken without due process, including notice and an opportunity to be heard. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 390 (Pon. 2014).

The Public Service System Act is designed to further the public interest in hiring the most qualified employees, and the public and the government are the losers and public policy is violated when the public service system procedures, which are designed to obtain the best qualified public employees, are not followed. FSM v. Halbert, 20 FSM R. 42, 47 (Pon. 2015).

As the managing official under 52 F.S.M.C. 135(1), the Secretary has the discretion to ask the Personnel Officer to certify a new eligible list if the current list has no one that is "available or acceptable," and a letter, in which the Secretary stated that, as a result of the interviews, no one was found to be suitable for the position, fulfills the requirement that the list be rejected in writing, but if the Personnel Officer finds the reasons for rejection inadequate, the same list will be returned and an appointment made from the list. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 67 (Pon. 2015).

Because no one shall report to work nor receive a salary unless that person has been previously certified on an appropriate eligible list by the Personnel Officer or his authorized representative, and selected by a Department or agency head, an applicant is not entitled to declaratory relief that he should be hired when, although he was placed on the eligible list, the Secretary, as the result of interviews, found, in writing, no one was available or acceptable and the Personnel Officer did not find the Secretary's reasons inadequate and return the list. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 67-68 (Pon. 2015).

Since the full rights of continued employment only vest upon appointment, when an applicant was not selected from the certified list, was never appointed to the position he applied for, and no agreement for employment was entered into between the parties, he was never a public employee, and therefore his due process rights never vested. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 68 (Pon. 2015).

Because specific performance is a remedy in equity under contract law, an applicant's claim for specific performance is unenforceable when no valid agreement exists between the applicant and the government since, for the court to order the Secretary to hire the applicant based on an invalid contract, through specific performance, would be unlawful and a violation of public policy. Panuelo v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 62, 69 (Pon. 2015).

The express language of Title 52 creating the National Public Service System Act, requires that the exhaustion of remedies doctrine be applied. Ramirez v. College of Micronesia, 20 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2015).

The National Public Service System Act created a system of personnel administration based on merit principles and accepted personnel methods governing the classification of positions and the employment, conduct, movement, and separation of public officers and employees. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 354 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court cannot entertain Public Service System disputes until all administrative remedies have been exhausted, and, without a final decision, the court has no authority to hear the dispute. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 355 (Pon. 2016).

A former employee may still pursue a grievance through the public service system administrative procedure if the grievance arose while the employee was a public service system member, especially if the grievance was pending at the time the employee left the public service system since access to the administrative procedure is not precluded even though the aggrieved party is no longer a public service system employee. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 355 (Pon. 2016).

A permanent employee is an employee who has been appointed to a position in the public service who has successfully completed a probation period. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 355 n.2 (Pon. 2016).

Declaratory judgment is the least intrusive judicial remedy. Usually it is enough that the courts advise the agency on the law and allow the agency the flexibility to determine how best to bring itself into compliance. Notably, under the arbitrary and capricious standard, as required by the Public Service System Act, the court must be very careful to fashion a relief so as not to inappropriately infringe on the function of the agency. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 356 (Pon. 2016).

Every new employee must successfully serve a probation period before becoming a regular employee, and the Public Service System Regulations require that the probationary period last at least six months and that it can be extended to up to one year. Alexander v. Hainrick, 20 FSM R. 377, 379 (App. 2016).

A Presidential administrative order about vehicle use cannot be applied to the Public Auditor because, under the Constitution, the Public Auditor is independent of administrative control. Alexander v. Hainrick, 20 FSM R. 377, 382 (App. 2016).

When a person's employment is established pursuant to shipping articles, which is a contract between the FSM national government and seamen, it is unlike employment positions protected under the Public Service System, since there is no continued expectation of employment because the shipping articles have a one-year duration, and may be renewed upon expiration. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 450 (Pon. 2016).

A seaman employed by the FSM is a contract employee and therefore does not fall under the purview of Title 52 and would not be required to have his grievance reviewed at the administrative level before filing suit in the FSM Supreme Court. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 450 (Pon. 2016).

Although an aggrieved seaman, employed by the FSM, may file a petition at the administrative level, he, as a contract employee not covered under the FSM Public Service System, is free instead, to file suit in the FSM Supreme Court, which has exclusive jurisdiction over admiralty and maritime claims. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2016).

Because of the unique classification of seamen and their rights as employees, along with the limitations when it comes to the termination of their employment, and because this class of FSM national government employees is distinct, and in line with FSM Constitution Article XI, § 6(a), the FSM Supreme Court should exercise its exclusive jurisdiction over the matter rather than confer authority to an administrative body. Gilmete v. Peckalibe, 20 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2016).

Government employment that is property within the meaning of the due process clause cannot be taken without due process. To be property protected under the FSM Constitution, there must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. These assurances may come from various sources, such as statute, formal contract, or actions of a supervisory person with authority to establish terms of employment. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 558 (Pon. 2016).

Although a governmental entity's breach of contract, without more, does not constitute a civil rights or due process violation, a person who has been employed for twelve years under a series of one year contracts could prove that by that length of employment, there was an unwritten claim to continued employment. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 558 (Pon. 2016).

When the executive branch was substantially responsible for conducting administrative tasks in relation to the plaintiffs' employment as well as assigning work to them; when the person with the power to renew and approve their contracts was the allottee, the FSM President, who designated a sub-allottee; when the past contracts were also signed by the FSM Attorney General and for each of the plaintiffs' past periods of employment were prepared by procuring a form from the Attorney General's office and working with the suballottee's employees to complete, after which the FSM Attorney General and the suballottee would sign them; when no one in Congress ever signed any of the plaintiffs' contracts; and when the completed time sheets were submitted, reviewed and approved and signed by the suballottee and forwarded to the Department of Finance for disbursement of wages, the preponderance of the evidence supports the conclusion that the plaintiffs were executive branch employees. There was substantial evidence to confirm that the plaintiffs were performing work to execute the laws passed by Congress by implementation of public projects. That is to say that the plaintiffs' work was executive in nature. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 560 (Pon. 2016).

The "office" of First Lady is not a constitutional office. Nor is it an office created by statute. It is not an office for which a writ of quo warranto will lie to determine the right to hold the office. It is a title that is, or has been, customarily bestowed on or used to honor the President's wife, who is then expected to perform varied social and diplomatic functions on the President's or the nation's behalf. But the person acting as the First Lady would not necessarily be the President's wife. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 512-13 (Pon. 2020).

Public officials are generally entitled to qualified official immunity so that government officials who are performing their official duties are generally shielded from civil damages. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 630-31 (Pon. 2020).

The objective test to determine whether public officials are shielded from liability for damages is that government officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 631 (Pon. 2020).

More than bare allegations of malice are required to deny public officials' qualified immunity for acts conducted in the course of official duties. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 631 n.4 (Pon. 2020).

A government official is not personally liable when the official was not in a situation where the official could be expected to know that certain conduct would violate statutory or constitutional rights or when the tone or content of the official's letters to the plaintiff was not threatening and there was no evidence that the motive for these letters was personal vengeance. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 632 (Pon. 2020).

– Chuuk

Courts may not speculate as to the powers and duties of the office of the Attorney General, but must look to the wording of the relevant law, and further, may not speculate as to the probable intent of the legislature apart from the words. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 562 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

The Truk Attorney General represents the government in legal actions and is given the statutory authority pursuant to TSL 5-32 to conduct and control the proceedings on behalf of the government and, in absence of explicit legislative or constitutional expression to the contrary, possesses complete dominion over litigation including power to settle the case in which he properly appears in the interest of the state. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 561-63 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

Under Rule 1.11 of the Truk State Code of Professional Responsibility, a lawyer may not represent a private client in connection with a matter in which the lawyer participated "personally and substantially" as a public officer or employee, unless the appropriate government agency consents after consultation. Nakayama v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 565, 570 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

For purposes of Rule 1.11, an attorney who, as a government attorney, signs his name to a lease agreement, approving the lease "as to form," is personally and substantially involved. Nakayama v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 565, 571 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

An attorney holding public office should avoid all conduct which might lead the layman to conclude that the attorney is utilizing his former public position to further his subsequent professional success in private practice. Nakayama v. Truk, 3 FSM R. 565, 572 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The Governor, as all public officials, occupies a fiduciary relationship to the state he serves, may not use his official power to further his own interest, and shall cooperate with any legislative investigating committee. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

It is unreasonable for a public official, required by law to cooperate with legislative investigating committees, to have an expectation of privacy in matters that are linked to his performance in office, and it is unreasonable for a public official, such as the Governor, who is a trustee of the state's finances and who owes a fiduciary duty to the state to expect that his personal finances will be kept private if there is some reason to believe he has violated his trust. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 267 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

All citizens generally have the duty to, and state officials are obligated by statute to, cooperate with legislative investigations. These obligations of citizenship and public office are linked with the assumption that the legislature will respect individuals' constitutional rights, including the right of privacy. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 333-34 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

All Chuuk public officers are statutorily required to cooperate with legislative investigations, but an officer being tried in the Senate on a case of impeachment after the House of Representatives has voted a bill of impeachment is no longer required to cooperate. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 336 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

A commitment in a personnel action form for permanent employment without the existence of an appropriation to fund such a position violates the Truk Financial Management Act. Hauk v. Terravecchia, 8 FSM R. 394, 396 (Chk. 1998).

Granting of permanent employment without advertisement, examination (if required) and the preparation of a eligible list by the Personnel Officer violates the Truk State Public Service System Act. Hauk v. Terravecchia, 8 FSM R. 394, 396 (Chk. 1998).

Principles of contract are inapplicable to employment cases when the proper issue is whether plaintiff has shown a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Truk State Public Service System Act. Hauk v. Terravecchia, 8 FSM R. 394, 396 (Chk. 1998).

The regulations provide in part that overtime must be requested by the immediate supervisor and approved by his superior or the department head. Osi v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 565, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Government employees who worked overtime during inaugural ceremonies are not entitled to recovery when there is no convincing evidence that they were directed to work overtime by the proper authority such as would entitle them to overtime pay. Osi v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 565, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Overtime voluntarily performed is not compensable. Osi v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 565, 566 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Governor of Chuuk has no constitutional or statutory power or authority to appoint an acting Executive Director of the Board of Education or head of the Education Department other than as provided for in section 4, article X, Chuuk Constitution and that any other appointment to that position is void. Welle v. Walter, 8 FSM R. 572, 573-74 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Only the lawful Director or Head of Education is entitled to all the rights, powers, privileges and emoluments thereof, including the benefits of office. Welle v. Walter, 8 FSM R. 572, 574 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Chuuk Attorney General has no duty to act on a successful plaintiff's behalf in collecting the plaintiff's judgment against the state. Judah v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 41, 41-42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A public employee who explained that he would be absent because he contested the demotion, was not absent without explanation as required by the Public Service regulations and statute for abandonment of his job. Marar v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 313, 315 (Chk. 2000).

It is beyond the power of the Legislature to enact a law to prohibit government employees from becoming candidates for legislative service. Olap v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 531, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The prevailing rule is that when the Constitution provides no direct authority to establish qualifications for office in excess of those imposed by the Constitution, such qualifications were unconstitutional by their very terms and under equal protection, due process, and freedom of speech and assembly. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A governor has only a delegated power and a limited sphere of action, and the Chuuk Constitution does not give the Governor the power to add qualifications, that a person must not be a state employee, to be a candidate for a seat in the Chuuk Legislature. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 307 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A person entering upon a public office is generally required to qualify by performing all the steps customarily or legally required to hold the office. This includes the taking of an oath of office and attendance upon the duties of the office. Songeni v. Fanapanges Municipality, 10 FSM R. 308, 309 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the plaintiffs have never qualified for the public office for which they seek compensation, their case will be dismissed. Songeni v. Fanapanges Municipality, 10 FSM R. 308, 309 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the state has not paid plaintiff employees as mandated by its state law and has alleged as affirmative defenses that a supervening cause prevented performance and that funds intended to pay lapsed, frustrating performance, these are defenses of payment, not liability, and the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment as a matter of law, the liability or obligation resting on the public law of the defendant state itself with the affirmative defenses being inadequate as a matter of law as to liability. Saret v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 320, 322-23 (Chk. 2001).

Since the Oneisomw municipal constitution provides for succession in the event of a mayor's death or disability, that document, not Article VI, § 1, nor Article XIII, § 1 of the Chuuk Constitution, governs succession to the position of Mayor of Oneisomw upon the mayor's passing. In re Oneisomw Election, 11 FSM R. 89, 92 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Neither Article VI, § 1, nor Article XIII, § 1 of the Chuuk Constitution provides authority to the Governor to appoint any person to any municipal office. Absent any state law authorizing the Governor to so act, he is without power to affect municipal political offices in any manner. In re Oneisomw Election, 11 FSM R. 89, 92 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Under Article XIII, § 5 of the Chuuk Constitution, if rules of succession to the office of municipal mayor in the event of the mayor's death or disability are to be found anywhere, they are to be found in the municipality's constitution and laws. In re Oneisomw Election, 11 FSM R. 89, 92 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Governor cannot interfere with the political rights of a municipality's people by appointing a mayor when the municipal constitution has provided for the orderly succession of an elected official to that office. Such an appointment is void. In re Oneisomw Election, 11 FSM R. 89, 93 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

While under normal circumstances exhaustion of administrative remedies is a pre-requisite to bringing an action in court challenging the constitutionality of personnel actions, an exception to this general rule exists. When exhaustion of administrative remedies is rendered futile, due to the bad faith, improper actions or predetermination of the administrative body itself, exhaustion of the administrative process is not required, and redress may be immediately sought in the courts. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 270 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When it is clear that any attempt by plaintiff to obtain relief through the Public Service Act would have been futile, the court has jurisdiction to hear the plaintiff's claims. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 270 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Neither the Legislature, nor the Governor, may add qualifications for public office beyond those qualifications provided in the Chuuk Constitution. It matters not whether the employee in question is an "exempt" employee, or one covered by the Public Service Act. All government employees, with the express exception of the Governor's principal officers and advisors (who serve at the Governor's pleasure), are protected in their political activities from the Governor's interference with their employment. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 271 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A plaintiff, who failed to prove monetary damages, is still entitled to a permanent injunction, against the Governor, the Director of Personnel, the Director of Budget, and any designee acting on their behalf or in their stead, permanently enjoining them from interfering in any way or manner with plaintiff's lawful exercise of all of the duties, obligations and responsibilities of his office. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 273 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Statutes clearly prohibit Chuuk state employees from engaging in any outside employment not compatible with the discharge of the employee's duties to the state. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 396 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Under the Reorganization Act, gubernatorial nomination and senatorial advice and consent is required for principal officers or directors, deputy directors, principal advisors, and other officials in positions requiring such advice and consent as prescribed by statute. Chiefs (division heads) are not designated as officials subject to senatorial advice and consent, although the Legislature could easily have included all (or some) of them, if it so desired. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 257, 260 (Chk. 2006).

Considering the provisions making chiefs out of former department or office heads division heads against the entire reorganization act's background to arrive at an interpretation consistent with the act's other provisions and with its general design, the court can only conclude that the Legislature's intent when it reorganized the executive branch was that none of the positions designated as chiefs were principal officers or were subject to senatorial advice and consent. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 257, 260 (Chk. 2006).

The Chuuk personnel regulations permit the hiring of person through non-competitive examinations when the positions require rare or special qualifications which did not permit competition. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 257, 261 (Chk. 2006).

When the affidavit of the former Chief of the Division of the Personnel was conclusory and potentially self-serving affidavit since his employment situation and termination is the same as the plaintiffs' and when it averred that the plaintiffs were hired in their public service system positions as chiefs without the usual competitive examination because they were the only persons qualified for their jobs and that their positions required rare or special qualifications which did not permit competition and when there is no evidence presented that a non-competitive examination of any of the plaintiffs was ever held, the affidavit is thus insufficient to show that there is no genuine issue of material fact that, after the reorganization statute had abolished their former positions that the plaintiffs were lawfully hired to fill the new public service positions. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 257, 261 (Chk. 2006).

The public and the state are the losers and public policy is violated when the public service system procedures, which are designed to obtain the best qualified public employees, are not followed. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 445 (Chk. 2006).

The applicable employment taxes should be deducted from a back pay award and paid to social security and the national government as required by law. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

In order to be eligible to be paid sick leave, an employee must be ill. The employee will not be paid sick leave when he was not sick. When a plaintiff was not sick when he was wrongfully terminated, he is not entitled to any sick leave. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

The purpose of a personnel action form is to implement government policies and regulations as well as contractual arrangements. The personnel action form reflects and implements rights derived from other sources. It does not independently establish rights. Billimon v. Refit, 16 FSM R. 209, 212 (Chk. 2008).

Government employment contracts contain the terms of employment, regardless of what is contained in the corresponding personnel action form. In other words, the contract speaks for itself, and the personnel action form cannot be used to modify the terms of the contract. Billimon v. Refit, 16 FSM R. 209, 212 (Chk. 2008).

A personnel action form cannot modify the terms of a person's employment to make him a permanent employee if his position was an exempt or contract employee and he had not gone through the proper statutory procedures to become a permanent employee under the Truk State Public Service System Act. Billimon v. Refit, 16 FSM R. 209, 212 (Chk. 2008).

A state employee who has been hired to fill a "permanent" position, must first successfully serve a probationary period. Billimon v. Refit, 16 FSM R. 209, 212 (Chk. 2008).

Any "permanent" designation in a new hire's first personnel action form is suspect because it, if the person were hired for a position covered by the Truk Public Service System, should designate his status as probationary, with a later personnel action form changing his status from probationary to permanent. Billimon v. Refit, 16 FSM R. 209, 212 (Chk. 2008).

The Truk Public Service System Act requires that its covered employees be paid a differential for work performed at night, on holidays, or for overtime. Weriey v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 329, 331 (Chk. 2009).

A public service system employee's claim or disagreement over the employee's pay, working conditions, or status is a grievance for which the Truk Public Service System Act requires that regulations prescribe a system for hearing. The Truk Public Service Regulations provide for a Truk Public Service Grievance System that covers any employment matter of concern or dissatisfaction to an eligible employee. The regulations contain two grievance procedures, an informal grievance procedure, and a formal grievance procedure. An employee must show evidence of having pursued the employee's grievance informally before the employee can utilize the formal grievance procedure. Weriey v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 329, 331 (Chk. 2009).

If an employee's immediate supervisor does not settle a grievance to the employee's satisfaction, then the employee may forward the grievance in writing to the State Personnel Officer and request review by a formal panel. The formal panel will then be provided with the necessary government records, hear the grievance, and make its recommendation to the Governor. The Governor then resolves the grievance. The administrative procedure does not include asking the Director of the Department of Administrative Services to resolve the matter (unless the Director is the aggrieved employee's immediate supervisor). Weriey v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 329, 331 (Chk. 2009).

When an employee has made no attempt to seek redress through the administrative procedure although she apparently did seek payment directly from the Department of Administrative Services, which is not part of the administrative grievance procedure, she has not exhausted her administrative remedies before she filed suit because neither the Department of Administrative Services nor its Director is the arbiter of administrative grievances. Weriey v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 329, 332 (Chk. 2009).

An employee has not shown that trying to obtain relief for unpaid wages through the administrative process would have been futile when the only evidence is the Director of Administrative Services's letter that applied only to employees in another department whose paychecks were not processed since there is no evidence that funds were not available to pay employees in the employee's department or that liability would be denied for any just claim for unpaid wages on the ground no funding was then available, especially since a claimed inability to pay is not a defense to liability. Thus, whether the state had funds to pay has no bearing on whether it is liable for payment. Weriey v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 329, 332 (Chk. 2009).

The Chuuk Constitution only requires that legislation changing the transitional salaries take effect after the general election. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 489 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The Constitution set the transitional salaries of the Governor ($25,000) and Lieutenant Governor ($22,000). The transitional salaries were to remain in effect until after the first general election in March of 1990. Then, new salaries could be statutorily prescribed. Under the new Constitution, salaries of the presiding members of the Legislature, Governor and Lieutenant Governor could only be increased by voter referendum and only by an amount not to exceed $2,000 for each officer. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Constitutional, statutory, and regulatory provisions determine a public officer's right to a given salary. A public officer may only collect and retain such compensation as authorized by law. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Statutes setting salaries of public officials, like any other statutes, are presumed constitutional, and it is the court's duty to determine whether statutes conform to the Constitution, and if they do not, they will be treated as null and void. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The Chuuk Legislature was constitutionally authorized to initially set post-transitional salaries without a voter referendum. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The salaries of the governor and lieutenant governor were set by Chuuk Constitution article XV, section 10 during the transition period, and those salaries were only effective, according to that provision, until prescribed by statute. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

As with the salaries of legislative member salaries, the salaries of the governor and lieutenant governor were only subject to the referendum provision once they had been initially set from the transitional salaries and since Chk. S.L. No. 6-91 was the first law under the new government to set the salaries of the governor and lieutenant governor, Chk. S.L. No. 6-91 validly set the salaries of the governor and lieutenant governor. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 491 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The court can find no provision in the public service system regulations that precludes a former state public service system employee from pursuing a grievance that arose during the state employee's period of employment through the public service system administrative grievance procedure even though the aggrieved party is no longer a public service system employee. Indeed, if the grievance involved termination, the regulations specifically provide for it. Aake v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 607, 609 (Chk. 2009).

It would seem incongruous, if a public service system employee could avoid the administrative grievance procedure and have an immediate right to resort to court action merely by retiring, resigning, or otherwise leaving public service system employment (especially if a grievance were pending at the time the employee left the public service system). A former state employee may still pursue a grievance through the public service system administrative procedure if the grievance arose while the former employee was a member of the public service system. Aake v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 607, 609 (Chk. 2009).

A position is either filled by a person identified on an eligibility list or a promotional list and the requirements for filling a position depend on the list. No requirement exists in the Chuuk Public Service System Act that an individual slated for promotion need to submit to an examination or that the position to which he or she is promoted be advertised. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 621, 623 (App. 2009).

Once an employee of the Public Service System reaches the age of sixty years, he must retire from the Public Service within thirty days. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 622 (App. 2009).

The Chuuk Board of Education has eight members who are appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Education Department head, who is also appointed by the Governor with the advice and consent of the Senate, serves as the Board's executive director. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 60 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A vacancy on the Board of Education occurs when a member dies; resigns; is removed from the Board; has been incapacitated or disabled; or becomes a Department of Education employee or staff, except the member who represents the public school system, and, if there is a vacancy, the Governor appoints a replacement member who serves for the duration of the departed member's term. The vacancy provision's plain meaning is that temporary appointments are only be made when a vacancy occurs for one of the enumerated reasons; otherwise, an incumbent's term must expire and a new appointee must first be confirmed by the Senate before the new incumbent can sit on the Board. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 61 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The Director's responsibilities to the Board of Education include duties and functions as assigned by the Board, attendance at Board meetings, and providing logistical and administrative needs to the Board and other needs as declared by the Board, and the Board is the only authority that may remove the Director, which is by a majority vote of all Board members for misconduct, incompetency, neglect of duty, or other good cause. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 61 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Since the expiration of a board member's term is not one of the enumerated occurrences giving rise to a vacancy, it follows that during any interim after the expiration of the incumbent's term and the confirmation of a new appointment, no vacancy is created. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 61 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The Board of Education Act should be read so that its provisions are internally consistent and sensible and each provision should be considered against the entire Act's background so as to arrive at a reasonable interpretation consistent with other specific provisions and the Act's general design. Since the Board's statutorily-mandated purpose is to provide control and direction and to formulate policy for the Chuuk educational system, if the Act were construed so as to render the Board unable to perform its duties each time members' terms expired without replacements having been confirmed, the Board's ability to discharge its duties would be severely handicapped and its purpose to act towards the betterment of education in Chuuk would be undermined and since the Act contemplates an independent board with the power to perform its functions without interruption, construing the provisions for filling vacancies and appointments, and taking into account the Board's statutory purpose and the Act's overall intent, holdover incumbents continue to hold their seat until there are new incumbents. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 61 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When no provision is made by law for an official's holdover, the official is regarded as a de facto official. A holdover official's de facto authority ends when the office is filled by appointment or election, as provided by law. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 62 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

A de facto officer is one who is in possession of an office, and discharging its duties, under color of authority. In the context of incumbent de facto officials, "under color of authority" means authority derived from an election or appointment, however irregular or informal, so that the incumbent is not a mere volunteer. The principle of de facto authority is based on the public's interest in having a safeguard against unnecessary interruption of public governance. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 62 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The generally applied rule is that where a term of office is fixed by law simply for a period of time and no particular date is established for the beginning or ending of the term, each incumbent takes a term running from the date of his appointment equal in duration to the period of time fixed; and a new term does not begin at the end of the preceding term but only when the new incumbent is appointed, or holdover incumbent is reappointed. Thus, in the absence of a constitution or statue providing otherwise, an officer is entitled to hold his office until his successor is appointed or elected and has qualified. In this context, the term "holding over" when applied to an officer, implies that the office has a fixed term and the incumbent is holding the office into the succeeding term. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 62 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The de facto doctrine is applied even in cases of executive branch officials so long as it is not otherwise expressly, or by clear implication, prohibited by law. The reasons for the application of the de facto doctrine to independent board members appears to be even stronger than other executive branch officials, since they are statutorily mandated to exercise their duties and powers independently. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 62 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

In instances where there is no FSM precedent, the court may consider cases from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 62 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

What is clear from the Board of Education Act is that a term's expiration does not create a vacancy and, other than the confirmation of new members, there is otherwise no provision that would allow the Board to proceed uninterrupted after the expiration of board member terms and since the Act does not set a fixed date for the beginning and ending of Board member terms but only for staggered five year terms and because the underlying public policy for the application of the de facto doctrine is especially applicable when the Board of Education's purpose is to provide uninterrupted educational services to the Chuuk public, a holdover incumbent Board member exercises de facto authority until there is a new incumbent. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 63 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

Board members were due compensation and benefits while they continued discharging their duties as holdover members. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 63 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

When Chuuk has acknowledged that any further pursuit by the employee of his administrative remedies would be futile, Chuuk cannot, since futility is a legal exception to the exhaustion of administrative remedies doctrine, prevail on its defense that the employee has failed to exhaust his administrative remedies or on the ground that the court lacks subject-matter jurisdiction because that ground was based on the failure to exhaust his administrative remedies. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 48, 50 (Chk. 2011).

Since, by statute, a governor must send a nomination to the Senate within 45 days of a vacancy in an office requiring the Senate's advice and consent and since a resignation is an act or an instance of surrendering or relinquishing of an office or a formal notification of relinquishing an office or position, when cabinet officers and special assistants have submitted "courtesy resignations," those offices are vacant and new nominations (or renominations) must be submitted. The court cannot discern any difference (in result) between a "courtesy resignation" and a resignation for other reasons since a resignation is a resignation. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 137, 140 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A state employee's speech that concerns genuine public issues is protected speech. Tither v. Marar, 18 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. 2012).

Since the Executive Director of the Department of Education is an office uniquely created by the Chuuk Constitution, and since both the Chuuk Constitution and the applicable statute provide the sole means by which an Executive Director may be removed, the court must conclude that the general statutory provisions of the Administrative Procedures Act do not apply to the removal of the head of the Education Department. When it comes to the Executive Director's removal, there is no higher administrative agency than the Board of Education. Macayon v. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ., 19 FSM R. 644, 648-49 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

– Chuuk – Termination

While the principal officers and advisors serve during the current term of the appointing Governor unless sooner removed by the Governor, the dismissal of non-policy making employees from public employment solely on the ground of political affiliation is not permissible. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The executive policy requiring resignation before running for a seat in the Chuuk Legislature adds a qualification prohibited by the Chuuk Constitution and is void, and therefore, the plaintiffs' forced resignation pursuant to the Governor's Executive Order or policy is unconstitutional and beyond his power. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A public employer may not discharge either a tenured or a non-tenured employee for the reasonable exercise of constitutional rights such as freedom of speech. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Termination resulting from the decision of any government employee (other than a "principal officer" or "advisor") to run for public office violates that employee's free speech and association rights as guaranteed by the Chuuk Constitution, as well as depriving the employee of a property interest (his right to continued employment) without due process of law. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 271-72 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When plaintiffs sue the state for wrongful termination, the proper issue is whether the plaintiffs have shown a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Truk State Public Service System Act. But when none of the proper procedures were followed to hire any of the plaintiffs before (or after) the Governor appointed them to fill the permanent chief positions; when no competitive process was involved when the plaintiffs became chiefs, none of the plaintiffs have shown a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Truk State Public Service System Act. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 442 (Chk. 2006).

The Truk Public Service System Regulation that allows persons whose public service system positions have been abolished by a reduction in force to be reassigned, without the loss of permanent status, to another vacant public service position for which they are qualified applies only to persons who held permanent public service system positions before their positions were abolished. It does not apply to political appointees whose exempt advice-and-consent positions are abolished by the Legislature. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

Even when a reduction in force of the public service system is necessary, a competitive process is mandated to assure equitable competition, recognition of merit, and the public interest. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

When, even though discharged state employees held their position without legal entitlement, they are entitled to compensation for any work done for which they were not paid. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

An employee of a state or local government who is discharged in violation of the civil rights statutes has a duty to actively look for and accept any reasonable offer of employment, otherwise back pay damages cannot be awarded. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

When an employer has unlawfully discharged an employee in violation of his civil rights and the former employee obtains alternative employment, in calculating damages, the income from the alternative employment will be deducted from the back pay owed to the employee, since otherwise the plaintiff could recover a windfall, which would violate the principles of compensatory damages. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

In order to recover compensatory damages, the plaintiffs must prove actual injury from the civil rights deprivation. When, if proper procedure had been followed, the plaintiffs still would have been terminated from their positions, there is no actual injury to compensate with back pay or other benefits. Nominal damages may, however, be awarded for the deprivation of the important right to procedural due process. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 444 (Chk. 2006).

There is no authority, precedent, or principle of law that would require the state to obtain judicial approval before terminating an employee. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 445 (Chk. 2006).

When plaintiffs sue the state for wrongful termination, the proper issue is whether the plaintiffs have shown a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Truk State Public Service System Act. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 666 (Chk. 2008).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination to the date he is reinstated are remedies generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge with the amount awarded in back pay reduced to the extent the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. But the court cannot reinstate a terminated employee in his former position when he is past the mandatory retirement age. It can only award him back pay for time before his retirement date, and any income through alternative employment that was received for employment after he would have had to retire from his Public Service System employment will not be used to reduce the back pay award. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 666 (Chk. 2008).

When no evidence was introduced at trial of how much, if any, unused annual leave the plaintiff had accrued before he was wrongfully terminated, the court cannot make an award for unused accrued annual leave. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

When, in a wrongful termination case, no evidence of physical pain or a physical manifestation of suffering was introduced, no damages can be awarded for pain and suffering because the rule is well settled that to award damages for pain and suffering, such must be the result of physical injury or of a physical manifestation of emotional distress. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

When a plaintiff sues the State of Chuuk (and its officers) for wrongful termination, the proper issue is whether the plaintiff has shown a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Truk State Public Service System Act. But when the proper statutory procedures were not followed to hire the plaintiff as a "permanent" employee, the plaintiff has not shown a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Truk State Public Service System Act. Billimon v. Refit, 16 FSM R. 209, 211 (Chk. 2008).

Since the State Public Service System applies to all state government employees unless the employee is exempt, when a state employee's position as a division chief was a lawful non-exempt position under the Executive Branch Organization Act, the proper issue for consideration regarding a wrongful termination matter is whether the plaintiff had a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Public Service System Act. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 620-21 (App. 2009).

Removal of a Public Service System employee is a disciplinary action or termination and the employee must be given at least five work days advance written notice before removal. The action taken must be for good and justifiable cause and must be appropriate to the infraction, if there was one. The employee must also be informed of his appeal rights. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 622, 623-24 (App. 2009).

When the state employee was not given the required five business days' notice concerning removal/dismissal from permanent employment but was notified that effective immediately he was dismissed and replaced pursuant to an Executive Order and was not given notice of his appeal rights, this did not comply with the protections afforded a Public Service System classified employee and he was thus not afforded due process of law and was thus wrongfully terminated. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 622 (App. 2009).

A Public Service System classified employee has a legal entitlement to permanent employment under the Public Service System Act and should be afforded due process rights not available to an exempt political appointee. Termination of an exempt political appointee and non-exempt Public Service System employee are not handled the same way. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 623 (App. 2009).

Redress for a wrongfully-terminated state employee would include reinstatement and back pay, except when the former employee could not be reinstated due the Public Service System Act's mandatory retirement policy. But the former employee could be awarded back pay if he had mitigated his damages. Simina v. Kimeuo, 16 FSM R. 616, 624 (App. 2009).

Being forced to resign a Chuuk public service system job on December 2, 2002, because the employee was going to run for a seat in the Chuuk House of Representatives, was, as a matter of law, illegal because the statute and regulations requiring such resignations had already been held unconstitutional. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 53 (Chk. 2010).

It would have been futile for Chuuk public service system employees, who were forced to resign in December 2002 because they wished to be candidates in the 2003 election, to pursue their administrative remedies before proceeding to court. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

The applicable limitations period for a wrongful termination suit against the State of Chuuk is six years (subject to statutory tolling provisions). Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

Even if the Board of Education had the authority to terminate the Director, the Board was still required to adhere to appropriate procedures and requirements for the termination to be effective. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 63 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The remedies generally available to a state public service system employee who has shown that he was wrongfully discharged are reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 94 (Chk. 2010).

A wrongfully discharged government employee has a duty to mitigate his damages by actively looking for and accepting any reasonable offer of employment; otherwise back pay damages cannot be awarded. If the former government employee obtains other employment, the amount he is awarded in back pay must be reduced by the amount he mitigated his damages – by the amount he received from the other employment – since otherwise he could recover a windfall, which would violate the principles of compensatory damages. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 94 (Chk. 2010).

When the discharged employee has not presented any evidence about whether and where he sought employment during a certain time period, he has introduced no evidence of his efforts to mitigate his damages by attempting to secure a job during his periods of unemployment, and he is thus precluded from recovery of damages for those periods since it is the plaintiff's burden to prove every element of his case, including all of his damages. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 95 (Chk. 2010).

Back pay compensatory damages are the measure of compensatory damages for wrongful discharge. Compensation for an injury is not doubled just because the plaintiff has two different causes of action on which to base that recovery because only the injury itself is compensated. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 95-96 (Chk. 2010).

From awards of back pay damages the employer must deduct the applicable wage and salary taxes and social security taxes, which must then be remitted to the appropriate tax authorities. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 96 (Chk. 2010).

Reinstatement to his former position (or its equivalent) is the usual remedy for a state public service system employee who has shown that he was wrongfully discharged. This is true even though the former position has been filled by another employee since if the existence of a replacement constituted a complete defense against reinstatement, then reinstatement could be effectively blocked in every case simply by immediately hiring an innocent third-party after the unlawful discharge has occurred, thus rendering the reinstatement remedy's deterrent effect a nullity. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 96 (Chk. 2010).

Since the appropriateness of an equitable remedy of reinstatement is determined by current conditions rather than past conditions, the court may reinstate a wrongfully-discharged state employee provided that the former employee is ready, willing, and able to work and is ready for assignment. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 96 (Chk. 2010).

In a case alleging a retaliatory discharge, the plaintiff bears the burden to demonstrate that his conduct is both constitutionally protected and a substantial or motivating factor in his government employer's decision to discharge him. If the employee has met this burden, then the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that it would have taken the same action in the absence of the protected conduct. Tither v. Marar, 18 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. 2012).

A plaintiff has not met his burden to prove that his protected speech was a substantial or motivating factor in his termination when he was not terminated because he engaged in protected speech about a patient's treatment but his termination occurred many months later and after a much more substantial ground and the more likely motivating factor – his behavior during the USNS Mercy visit and because his work performance while a probationary employee was not up to the level of professionalism expected of a practical nurse as shown by the series of incidents of unprofessional conduct. Tither v. Marar, 18 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. 2012).

A plaintiff's termination or discharge was not unlawful when, even if he had been able to prove that his constitutionally-protected conduct had been a substantial or motivating factor in his termination and the burden had have shifted to the defendants, he still would not prevail because the defendants demonstrated that they would have taken the same action in the absence of the protected conduct because of his probationary status and his unsatisfactory and unprofessional conduct prevented him from being converted from a probationary employee to a permanent employee and he would have been terminated anyway. Tither v. Marar, 18 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. 2012).

The Director of Education does not serve at the Board's, or the Governor's, pleasure. The Governor cannot remove the Director from office. Only the Board, by majority vote, can remove the Director, and then only for one or more of four reasons: misconduct, incompetency, neglect of duty, or other good cause. Macayon v. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ., 19 FSM R. 644, 649 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

When at a minimum, the Education Director should have been given notice of the allegations and evidence on which the Board based its resolution to terminate her, and she should have been given an opportunity to respond or to explain her actions or omissions and to rebut any false allegations but was not, her likelihood of success on her due process claim seems almost certain because this is the essence of due process – notice and an opportunity to be heard. Macayon v. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ., 19 FSM R. 644, 649 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

When an agency action gives the court no record to review, the better course in most instances, and the most likely course of action is that the matter would be remanded to the administrative agency – in this case, the Board of Education – for it to give the terminated employee notice of which of her actions and omissions it considers might be grounds for her removal and to give her an opportunity to respond and explain or justify or rebut the allegations against her before it votes on whether to remove her. Macayon v. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ., 19 FSM R. 644, 649 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

– Compensation

When an individual begins working for a federal government agency, he is justified in believing that he will be allowed to hold that position until terminated by a supervisor and in believing that he will be compensated for his work. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 198 (Pon. 1987).

An expectation of being paid for work already performed is a property interest qualifying for protection under the Due Process Clause of the FSM Constitution. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 200 (Pon. 1987).

Any withholding of private property, such as a government employee's paycheck, without a hearing can be justified only so long as it take the authorized payor to obtain a judicial determination as to the legality of the payment being withheld. Falcam v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 194, 200 (Pon. 1987).

The amount of compensation a public employee receives is not based on quasi-contract doctrines such as quantum meruit or unjust enrichment, but instead is set by law, even if the actual value of the services rendered by a public officer is greater than the compensation set by law. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 192 (Pon. 1990).

Public employees are only entitled to receive the benefits prescribed by law for positions to which they have been duly appointed, even if an officer or employee has performed duties or services above and beyond those of the appointed office. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 192 (Pon. 1990).

A public officer claiming certain compensation or other benefits must show a clear legal basis for his right to these emoluments; hopes and expectations, even reasonable ones, are not enough to create that legal entitlement, nor are any moral obligations which may be incurred, without clear warrant of law. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 193 (Pon. 1990).

The compensation of public officials in the FSM is not determined by a contract for specific services, express or implied, but by the judgment of the people, through their elected representatives and executive officials who properly exercise delegated power pursuant to statutory or other authorization; specifically, the FSM Constitution and statutes establish how a person may attain public office, and the National Public Service System Act and regulations thereunder set the compensation to be paid to holders of the respective

Where a public official claims additional compensation, it is inappropriate to ask whether he received compensation equal to the value of his services to the public, but instead the court must inquire whether he received the amount that was due to him by law or whether he can demonstrate a clear legal entitlement to the office which would have provided the compensation he now seeks. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 194 (Pon. 1990).

A temporarily-promoted employee is compensated at the step in the new pay level which is next above his current pay, and the employee must be informed in advance and must agree in writing that at the end of the temporary promotion, he will be returned to the former salary (grade and step) that he would be receiving had he remained in his former position. No temporary promotion can exceed one year. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 332 (Pon. 1998).

Every permanent and probationary employee is to receive an annual written rating of performance. Employees who receive "Satisfactory" or "Exceptional" ratings are eligible for step increases within their pay level. Employees who receive "Less than Satisfactory" ratings are not eligible. The absence of a performance evaluation gives rise to the presumption that the individual was performing at a "Less than Satisfactory" level. Pay and step increases are discretionary. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 336-37 (Pon. 1998).

Because Congress has not explicitly made employment contracts which violate 11 F.S.M.C. 1305 unenforceable, the FSM Supreme Court may properly decide whether a contravention of public policy is grave enough to warrant unenforceabillty. FSM v. Falcam, 9 FSM R. 1, 4 (App. 1999).

When an employer has unlawfully discharged an employee in violation of his civil rights and the former employee obtains alternative employment, in calculating damages, the income from the alternative employment will be deducted from the back pay owed to the employee, since otherwise the plaintiff could recover a windfall, which would violate the principles of compensatory damages. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

Under 52 F.S.M.C. 164(3),overtime is determined by a three-prong test: 1) the employee is directed to work; 2) the employee does work; and 3) the employee has first worked forty hours straight time in the same week and more than eight hours on any single day. "Directed to work," indicates that an employee cannot work overtime on his own initiative, but must be instructed to work or have received prior approval by a supervisor or government official. "Does work," indicates that overtime compensation only accrues when an employee worked outside regular working hours, in accordance with instructions or directions given by the supervising authority. And an employee cannot begin to accrue overtime hours until and unless the employee first worked a minimum of forty hours in a regularly scheduled workweek and more than eight hours on any single day worked. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 76 (Pon. 2013).

Sea vessels and aircraft arriving in the FSM must compensate the FSM Treasury for the actual costs of overtime that immigration officials accrue clearing sea vessels and aircraft into the FSM. These costs must be 1) associated with the arrival of sea vessels and aircraft into the FSM; 2) actual; 3) originate in the official duties of immigration officers carrying out Title 50's requirements; and 4) accrue outside immigration officers' normal working hours. "Actual hours worked" will always correlate with hours that have already been worked or performed and the FSM Treasurer will not be compensated for subjective or imputed work. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

Reading 52 F.S.M.C. 164(3) and 50 F.S.M.C. 115, jointly in order to ensure that the FSM Treasurer is compensated for all actual overtime expenses, the cost of overtime compensation allotted to employees under § 164(3) must equal the compensation the treasury receives under the second part of § 115, and as the treasury is compensated only for actual hours worked, it is clear that the treasury may remunerate employees only for actual hours worked. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

A calculation of actual hours worked may not include imputed hours because the meaning of the pertinent statutes regarding overtime is plain and unambiguous that overtime compensation will be allotted for actual hours worked only. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

Because overtime is based on actual hours worked, the automatic two-hour credit provision under the regulations is inconsistent with the statute and is, therefore, null and void. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

When Congress enacted unambiguous statutes it chose what the public policy is – that the FSM national government be paid in full for its expenses in clearing the ships and planes after hours and that those ships and planes pay for actual overtime work. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App. 2014).

When no one ever notified the plaintiffs that they must stop working in their respective positions or that they would not be paid for the work done from October 2014 to April 2015; when the government continued to assign them projects and retained the benefits conferred by their work, but did not compensate them for the work; when the plaintiffs never received notification from the government that their contracts had not or would not be renewed although the plaintiffs eventually became aware that the Project Control Documents that controlled their contracts were unsigned; when the government's consistent delay in renewing the contracts and disbursing wages was a common occurrence experienced by the plaintiffs during their previous years' contracts; and when the government continued to accept, approve, sign, and maintain the plaintiffs' submitted time sheets thereby implying assurances of forthcoming wages, the evidence, viewed in its entirety, presents a situation whereby the plaintiffs had a reasonable justified expectation to continued employment and, therefore, payment for those services rendered to the government's benefit between October 2014 and April 2015. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 558 (Pon. 2016).

A government employee's pay is a form of property that a government cannot deprive the employee of without due process. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 559 (Pon. 2016).

When the government has willingly deprived the plaintiffs of wages that they are entitled to without due process of law, it is civilly liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) for violating the plaintiffs' civil rights. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 559 (Pon. 2016).

When the evidence shows that the plaintiffs did in fact perform work during the relevant time period and that the standard operating procedure for many years was to submit employee-created time sheets similar to those that the plaintiffs submitted and when the government concedes that, if there was a valid contract, the plaintiffs would have been paid based on the submission of the same time sheets, there is sufficient evidence to carry the plaintiffs' burden on damages. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 562 (Pon. 2016).

– Impeachment

Although the Chuuk Constitution does subject members of the judiciary to removal from office by impeachment, the court need not decide if this is the sole method a judge may be removed from office because the issuance of a writ of mandamus is not a removal action. All the court did by issuing the writ is to require the judge to follow the applicable law and remove himself from office by resignation when he became a political candidate. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 110 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

The Chuuk House of Representatives possesses the sole authority and power to pass a Bill of Impeachment seeking to remove those state officials responsible for misfeasance or malfeasance. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The Chuuk House of Representatives has no criminal prosecution function. It is limited to passing laws and under the proper circumstance bringing bills of impeachment, which are not criminal in nature. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A committee of the legislative house constitutionally charged with the function of impeachment whose authorizing resolution empowered it to investigate the state's insolvency and the executive branch officers' misfeasance, malfeasance, or failure to carry out their duties and responsibilities, presented with evidence that the governor has illegal sources of income that may involve state funds is seeking relevant material related to its function when it seeks to subpoena the governor's bank records. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

All Chuuk public officers are statutorily required to cooperate with legislative investigations, but an officer being tried in the Senate on a case of impeachment after the House of Representatives has voted a bill of impeachment is no longer required to cooperate. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 336 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

A criminal information filed against a legislator who is the chairman of an impeachment committee while there is an article of impeachment currently being investigated will not be dismissed on the basis of a statute that provides criminal penalties for attempting to interfere with the impeachment process since the statute could not provide a blanket protection against prosecution for any member of an impeachment proceeding or it would lead to the absurd result that a member of an impeachment proceeding could commit any crime with impunity. Chuuk v. Robert, 15 FSM R. 419, 425 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When an official has been impeached, a trial on criminal charges is not foreclosed by the principle of double jeopardy. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 279 (Pon. 2012).

Under ancient English practice, impeachment was a criminal proceeding to which "jeopardy of life or limb" attached; that is, anciently criminal punishment could be imposed in the impeachment proceeding but now a conviction on impeachment affects only the right to hold office and does not include criminal punishment or other public remedy. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 279 (Pon. 2012).

Under the practice in the FSM that has been inherited from the U.S., the extraordinary remedy by impeachment does not prevent an indictment and conviction thereunder, and does not extend beyond a removal from office and a disqualification to hold office. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

The remedy of impeachment has the single role of affecting only the right to hold office and is not intended to bar or delay another remedy for a public wrong. The other remedy is often a criminal prosecution. This is because the remedy of impeachment is not exclusive of any other public remedy for the same misbehavior, and if the cause for which the officer is punished is a public offense, he may also be indicted, tried, and punished. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

A single act of misconduct may offend the public interest in a number of areas and call for the appropriate remedy for each hurt. Thus it may require removal from office. It may also require criminal prosecution. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

Impeachment and removal from office is not criminal punishment under the FSM Constitution's double jeopardy clause. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

A government official's misconduct does not present a government with an irrevocable choice to either criminally prosecute the official or to impeach and try to remove that official from office. If the offending official has not resigned from office first, the government may do, and is usually expected to do, both. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

A former government official cannot claim he was subjected to double jeopardy because he was convicted of public offenses and then impeached and removed from office for those same offenses. Nor could he have claimed double jeopardy if he had first been impeached and removed from office and then prosecuted for the same public offenses. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 280 (Pon. 2012).

Since, in a criminal case, a court is not constitutionally required to allow defense counsel to withdraw or to be replaced at a strategic moment in the proceedings, the right to counsel of an official who wanted to switch trial counsel before the end of his impeachment trial has not been violated even if that official had a constitutional right to counsel during his impeachment trial. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 281 (Pon. 2012).

While an impeachment conviction may not be appealable, a contempt conviction certainly is. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 282 n.6 (Pon. 2012).

Bills or resolutions of impeachment are not criminal in nature, and impeachment and removal from office is not criminal punishment. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 279 (Pon. 2017).

While it may be true that, in two recent instances impeachment proceedings and criminal prosecutions were pursued consecutively rather than simultaneously, nothing requires that it be done that way. Simultaneous proceedings are not only probable, but sometimes expected or likely. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 279 (Pon. 2017).

The Pohnpei Constitution clearly and demonstrably textually commits the investigation of, and the impeachment of Pohnpei state government officials, including the Pohnpei Chief Justice, to the Pohnpei Legislature. An impeachment proceeding's procedure, including its timing, is thus also a non-justiciable political question. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 280 (Pon. 2017).

The Pohnpei Legislature's procedures for, including the timing of, its investigation and possible impeachment of the Pohnpei Chief Justice, are non-justiciable. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 280 (Pon. 2017).

A preliminary injunction seeking to enjoin the possible impeachment of the Pohnpei Chief Justice, will be denied when there is no possibility of success on the merits because the case involves a non-justiciable political question, and the equities all favor the Pohnpei Legislature, and the public interest will be served by permitting the Legislature's investigation of a possible impeachment to proceed. Rodriguez v. Ninth Pohnpei Legislature, 21 FSM R. 276, 281 (Pon. 2017).

Impeachment is only a preliminary step to the removal of a person from a public office, and for Kitti municipal offices, impeachment by the Kitti Legislature results in suspension from office and is preliminary to an impeachment trial before a different municipal tribunal, at which the impeached official is either convicted or acquitted of the charges in the articles of impeachment. Luhk v. Anthon, 22 FSM R. 69, 71 (Pon. 2018).

– Kosrae

Written notice in a letter giving a limited-term employee three days' notice of the reasons for his two week suspension from work is sufficient compliance with the requirement of 61 TTC 10(15)(a), which provides that a suspended employee must receive notice of the reasons for suspension, and is also sufficient compliance with the notice requirements of due process under the Kosrae Constitution. Taulung v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 277, 279 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

To be property protected under the Constitution, the employment right must be supported by more than merely the employee's own personal hope. There must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Taulung v.

Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 277, 280 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

A public officer's right to a given salary is based primarily upon constitutional, statutory, and regulatory provisions. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 298 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The Kosrae Code contemplates the problem of persons performing services in excess of their prescribed duties, and KC 5.427 provided a means for compensating such extra labor. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

When a Kosrae state employee makes a claim for additional compensation or benefits, on grounds that he has been temporarily assigned to a position by detail, "acting" assignment, or temporary promotion and is performing services in excess of prescribed duties, the burden is on the employee to show that a clear legal basis exists for the employee's right to those emoluments. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

There is no provision in the laws of Kosrae that provides that Kosrae State is entitled to reimbursement of salary paid over and above a state employee's pay level. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Representations by officials with authority to set and change salaries can alter the general rule that salaries are set by law and not contract. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

In order for a Kosrae state employee's salary to be set by contract and not law, it must be shown that direct representations were made to the employee regarding the fixing of a salary not otherwise determined by law and made by an official with legal discretion to do so. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

In Kosrae, a permanent employee has the right to hold his position during good behavior, subject to suspension, demotion, reduction-in-force, or dismissal, except when an employment contract provides otherwise. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 302 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The right of Kosrae State to demote an employee is limited to disciplinary reasons based on good cause. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 303 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Kosrae State has the right and the power to adjust its employment scheme according to the availability of funds and work. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 303 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

When a public officer is requested to perform a duty mandated by law which he feels would violate the constitution, he has standing to apply to the court for a declaratory judgment declaring the statute unconstitutional. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 334 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The public service system applies to all state employees except for listed exemptions, which include positions of a temporary nature. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 273 (App. 1998).

A regular or permanent state employee is an employee who has been appointed to a position in the public service in accordance with the statute and who has successfully completed an initial probation period of not less than six months nor more than one year. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 273 (App. 1998).

A state employee appointed to successive, discrete six-month temporary positions with terminations at the end of some of them, is not a permanent state employee or a member of the public service system. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 273-74 (App. 1998).

A management official may not suspend any employee without pay for a period of three working days or more, unless the management official gives the employee a written notice setting forth the specific reasons upon which the suspension is based and files a copy of the statement with the director. Taulung v.

Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 274 (App. 1998).

A limited-term employee does not have an assurance of continual employment in the sense of continuing indefinitely in time without interruption, but he is assured of employment until the end of his limited term, and of dismissal for only specified reasons, namely, when the good of the service will be served thereby. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 275 (App. 1998).

The procedural due process requirements of notice and an opportunity to be heard are met when Kosrae provides a limited-term employee being suspended for two weeks the notice mandated by 61 TTC 10(15)(a) and an opportunity to be heard by the official suspending him. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 275 (App. 1998).

A salient feature of Chapter 5 of Title 5 of the 1985 Code drew a distinction between the employees whose compensation was determined according to specific contract, which the sections anticipate and authorize, and those permanent state employees whose salary was determined according to the base salary schedule contained in § 5.502. Chapter 4 conferred a wide range of rights on permanent employees that contract employees did not enjoy, such as the right given by § 402 to continued employment "during good behavior." Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 350-51 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

There is a dichotomy between employees whose salaries are set by statute – "as prescribed by law" – and those whose salaries are subject to individual contract. Certain individuals or groups are subject to individual contracts, and excluded from the Public Service System. The Public Service System gives substantial rights to permanent employees that are denied contract employees. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 351 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Kosrae law has historically recognized a permanent work force of employees given specified rights whose compensation is statutorily determined; and a second group of employees who do not have the specified rights given permanent employees, who serve for a contract term, and whose compensation is determined by those contracts. It is this former group whose salaries were subject to reduction by S.L. No. 6-132. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The phrase "all State Government employees" as it appears in article VI, section 5, means those employees whose salaries are "prescribed by law." Only those employees whose salaries are set in the first place by statute are the employees to whom subsequent statutory reductions should apply. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The phrase "all State Government employees" means employees whose compensation is determined by statute, and does not include those employees who have individual contracts with Kosrae. Therefore a state law reducing state public service system employees' pay can constitutionally be applied to a Kosrae State Court justice's pay. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In reviewing appeals from the Executive Service Appeals Board, the Kosrae State Court is empowered to overturn or modify the ESAB's decision if it finds a violation of law or regulation, but the court is precluded from re-weighing the ESAB's factual determinations. If there is any factual basis for the ESAB's decision, it will be upheld, assuming no other violation or law or regulation. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 432 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The statutory and regulatory authorities in effect during the time the employees' grievances took place will be applied to the decision. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 432 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Upon successfully completing probation, an employee becomes a permanent employee. Positions in the Executive Service are either permanent or temporary. Permanent positions are authorized to last longer than one year. Temporary positions are authorized to last up to twelve months. Permanent employment may be part-time, so long as the work time exceeds sixty hours per month. Temporary or limited-term appointments may be either full-time or part-time. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 432 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When employees were classified as permanent employees on their Personnel Action Forms, their scheduled work time during the school year was full-time, and their bi-weekly salaries were full-time base salaries, the employees were full-time permanent employees of the Kosrae Executive Service System. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 433 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Permanent employees have the right to hold their position during good behavior, subject to suspension, demotion, reduction-in-force or dismissal, unless an employment contract provides otherwise. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 433 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Suspension and demotion of a permanent employee are actions that may be taken only for disciplinary reasons based on good cause. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 433 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When an employee has been laid off for the summer, it is not a termination for disciplinary reasons or a reduction-in-force. A layoff is a termination of employment at the will of the employer, which may be temporary or permanent. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A state employee's right to a given salary is based primarily upon constitutional, statutory and regulatory provisions. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A permanent Kosrae government employee's right to hold his position during good behavior is not subject to a "lay off" because neither the term "lay off," nor the concept of a "lay off" is present anywhere in Title 5. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Leave with pay (annual leave) must be requested by the employee in advance on a written form. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Leave without pay may be granted to an employee if the reason is sufficient and is in the best interests of the Executive. The maximum is thirty calendar days. Leave without pay is not a disciplinary tool to be imposed upon an employee who has not requested it; instead it is a benefit to be granted to the employee in appropriate circumstances. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

There is no authority that permits the Kosrae government to impose annual leave or leave without pay upon its permanent employees. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When state employees have been required to apply for annual leave, if it was available, and did receive their salary during the annual leave, the employees have not suffered any monetary damages with respect to their annual leave. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The state's imposition upon its employees of leave without pay violated the Kosrae State Code, Title 5, and deprived them of their right to continued employment and salary. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The Kosrae State Court cannot substitute its judgment for that of the Executive Service Appeals Board, but in reviewing the ESAB's findings it may examine all of the evidence in the record in determining whether the factual findings are clearly erroneous, and if it is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed with respect to the findings, it must reject the findings as clearly erroneous. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 435 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Permanent state employees are subject to the laws and regulations implementing the Executive Service System, and a finding that some were exempted from all regulations and policies applicable to Kosrae government employees is clearly erroneous. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 435 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr.

Although the statutory time periods are directory and not mandatory, a significant delay in proceedings can deprive the Executive Service Appeals Board procedure of its meaningfulness, in violation of the due process rights protected by the Constitution. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 435 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

State employees are entitled to recover the base salary that they would have received during the periods of time that they were placed on leave without pay because the state's imposition of a "lay off" and leave without pay violated the employees' right to continued employment under the Kosrae Constitution and the Kosrae State Code. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 436 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Employee grievances were subject to judicial review by the Kosrae State Court, following the completion of certain administrative procedures, specifically review by the Executive Service Appeals Board. The court may reverse or modify ESAB's decision only if finds a violation of law or regulation. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 455, 457, 458 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Under Kosrae state law, a "grievance" is an employee action to present and resolve a difficulty or dispute arising in the performance of his duties and not from a disciplinary action. Abraham v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 57, 61 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

There are no provisions in Title 18 that prohibit an the filing of a civil action by non-employee for a grievance based upon facts which occurred during his or her employment with the Kosrae state government. For employees, Title 18 provides that an administrative procedure must be followed first, as prescribed by their branch heads. Abraham v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 57, 61 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Disciplinary actions, suspensions, demotions and dismissals, taken in conformance with Title 18 are in no case subject to review in the courts until the administrative remedies have been exhausted. Grievances are not disciplinary actions. Title 18 does not provide any limitations on the court's review of grievances or grievance appeals. There is no limitation of judicial review with respect to grievances. Abraham v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 57, 61 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Under Title 18, there is no limitation on the court's jurisdiction to hear claims based upon a grievance filed by a former employee of the Executive Branch. Abraham v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 57, 61 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Under the Executive Services Regulations when they were in effect, a Kosrae state employee may present a grievance concerning a continuing practice or condition at any time. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 246 & n.1 (App. 1999).

Under the Executive Service Regulations, when they were in effect, an appeal from a grievance was identical to that for an appeal from a disciplinary action, and was made to the Executive Service Appeals Board. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 246 (App. 1999).

An appeal from the Executive Service Appeals Board's decision to the Kosrae State Court was available for state employee grievances. The Kosrae State Court trial division's jurisdiction to reverse or modify a finding of the ESAB was limited under Kosrae State Code section 5.421(2) to violations of law or regulation. In this regard, the state court acted as an appellate tribunal. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 246 & n.2 (App. 1999).

On an appeal from the Executive Service Appeals Board's decision it was not within the authority of the Kosrae State Court to make new factual determinations in light of the express stricture in section 5.421(2) that the state court could reverse or modify an ESAB finding only if it finds a violation of law or regulation. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 248 (App. 1999).

Although an inquiry whether state employees were not exempt, but were permanent employees under section 5.409, is fact driven – the court or other administrative body must determine material facts before it can apply the statute to those facts – the final determination whether an individual falls within a specific category defined by statute is necessarily one of law, not fact. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 248 (App. 1999).

Issues of law, such as whether cooks were permanent state employees in the legal sense such that they were entitled to all the protections afforded to them under the statute and regulations, are reviewed de novo on appeal. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 248 (App. 1999).

Kosrae state employees must fall within one of three categories – exempt, i.e., exempt from the protections afforded to state employees by the Kosrae Executive Service as it was then structured; probationary; or permanent. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 248 (App. 1999).

A permanent state employee has the right to hold his position during good behavior, subject to suspension, demotion, reduction-in-force, or dismissal, except when an employment contract provides otherwise. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 249 (App. 1999).

A summer layoff of school cooks that required the cooks to take annual leave first, then leave without pay when school was not in session was not a reduction-in-force because a reduction-in-force means an employee's termination. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 250 (App. 1999).

Once the Kosrae State Court has correctly determined that placing cooks on unpaid leave was a violation of law or regulation, the appropriate factfinder for the determination of cooks' back pay, which constitutes their damages, is the Executive Service Appeals Board or its successor, not the state court. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 250 (App. 1999).

When an administrative procedure and ensuing appeal has afforded parties complete relief for their grievances pursuant to statutes and regulations and the parties' constitutional claims are not the basis for any separate or distinct relief, the constitutional issue need not be reached. Kosrae v. Langu, 9 FSM R. 243, 250-51 (App. 1999).

Under Kosrae State Code, Title 18, there is no limitation on the Kosrae State Court's jurisdiction to hear claims based upon a grievance, filed by a former Executive Branch employee. There is no limitation on a plaintiff's right, as a former employee, to file suit on his grievance and his right to file suit on his grievance arose in 1997, when he took early retirement and terminated his state employment. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 612-13 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

While the plaintiff was a state employee, he was subject to the administrative procedures specified for grievances, but when his administrative action was still pending when he retired in 1997, because his grievance had never been ruled on, he was no longer an employee required to comply with the administrative procedures. His right to bring suit on his claim did not become complete and his cause of action therefore did not accrue his early retirement resulted in termination from state government employment. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 613 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When two Directors of Education failed to act properly by not acting upon the plaintiff's grievance and not making a written finding on plaintiff's grievance, as required by regulation, the State cannot invoke the equitable doctrine of laches in its defense. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 613 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A public officer's right to a given salary is based primarily upon constitutional, statutory, and regulatory provisions. The amount of compensation a public employee receives is set by law. Palsis v. Mayor of Tafunsak, 10 FSM R. 141, 144 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Because the Tafunsak Municipal Constitution requires that salaries for elected Council members be established by ordinance and because a public officer's right to compensation depends entirely upon him being able to show clear authority of law entitling him to remuneration for performance of public duties, Tafunsak public officials' salaries must be appropriated by municipal ordinance. Palsis v. Mayor of Tafunsak, 10 FSM R. 141, 144 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Compensation for a public officer's official services depends entirely upon the law. A public officer may only collect and retain such compensation as is specifically provided by law. Palsis v. Mayor of Tafunsak, 10 FSM R. 141, 144 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When no Tafunsak municipal ordinance has been enacted to establish and pay salary for council members, other municipal officers and employees, there is no authority, as required by the municipal constitution, to pay salaries to Tafunsak municipal public officers and employees. A municipal council member is thus not entitled to receive unpaid salary, particularly when no evidence has been presented of a Tafunsak municipal ordinance enacted for appropriation of funds for payment of salaries for the 4th quarter of 1998 and when the municipal constitution requires that all payments from the municipal treasury be made according to appropriation by ordinance. Palsis v. Mayor of Tafunsak, 10 FSM R. 141, 144 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Any payments for salaries of elected officials and staff made from the Tafunsak municipal treasury without the authority of a municipal ordinance establishing such salary and appropriating funds for the payment of such salary have been made in violation of the municipal constitution. Palsis v. Mayor of Tafunsak, 10 FSM R. 141, 144 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

While it appears that elected officials and staff of Tafunsak municipal government have been paid and continue to be paid salaries without authority of law, the Kosrae State Court cannot approve or order any salary to be paid to a Tafunsak Municipal Council member in violation of the municipal constitution. Palsis v. Mayor of Tafunsak, 10 FSM R. 141, 144 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the Kosrae State Code Section 18.506 requires a branch head to make and transmit his final decision to the Director of Administration and the appellant within 14 days of receipt of the committee's recommendation and more than 14 days have elapsed since the branch head's receipt with no final decision by him, the branch head has failed to carry out his clear, non-discretionary duty to issue and transmit his final decision within the time period provided by law. The petitioner's right to the writ of mandamus is thus clear and undisputable and the writ will issue. Jackson v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 198, 199 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Because the Oversight Board has not adopted any policies, rules or regulations, the Director of Administration, who is responsible for administration of the Public Service System consistent with Title 18, and any policies, rules and regulations adopted by the Oversight Board, must implement all the Speaker's decisions pertaining to the Legislative Branch's public service employees, as long as the decision is not inconsistent with Kosrae State Code, Title 18. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature v. Abraham, 10 FSM R. 299, 302 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When two legislative branch employees, effective October 1, 1998, had met the statutory requirements to qualify for performance increases, but the personnel action forms to implement the increases were never submitted to the Department of Administration for processing due to administrative oversight at the Legislature; when in June 2001, the Speaker ordered the Director of Administration to implement the performance increases effective October 1, 1998 and backdated personnel action forms were submitted on both employees' behalf; when the personnel action forms contemplate an effective date that may be different than the approval date; when backdating of personnel action forms was a common practice in all three branches of state government and are routinely processed and implemented by the Department of Administration; when the Department's refusal to process the backdated personnel actions deprives both employees of the performance increases they qualified for and are entitled to by law; and when backdating employees' personnel action forms is consistent with all three state government branches' accepted and continuing practice and is not inconsistent with Kosrae State Code, Title 18; the Director of Administration is required to implement the performance increase, retroactive to October 1, 1998, and subsequent pay level adjustments ordered by the Speaker. Seventh Kosrae State Legislature v. Abraham, 10 FSM R. 299, 302-03 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Kosrae Executive Service System provides for the systemic classification of positions and for one pay level for each class of positions, and the state's action in assigning two different pay levels to the same class of positions was a violation of Kosrae State Code §§ 5.401(6), 5.410(1) and 5.506(1). Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 441, 444 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When plaintiffs should have been classified at the time the state hired them in 1997 at the same pay level as the medical officers who the state hired as Staff Physicians I prior to the plaintiffs and when the plaintiffs' grievances were granted increasing their pay in 2000 only partially corrected the situation from May 1, 2000 forward, the plaintiffs are entitled to summary judgment for a retroactive adjustment to their entrance salary. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 441, 444-45 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Pre-judgment interest is rarely awarded as an element of damages. Because tort claims are generally "unliquidated" in that the defendant does not know the precise amount he will be obligated to pay, most courts will not award interest on unliquidated monetary claims, which amount cannot be computed without a trial. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 441, 445 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

There is no Kosrae statute allowing or directing the court to award pre-judgment interest in public employment cases involving violation of law or regulations, and although pre-judgment interest has been allowed in certain contract and conversion cases, it has not been awarded in these type of cases and will be denied. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 441, 445 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Kosrae State Court's standard of review in its judicial review of State Public Service System final decisions is that the court will decide all relevant questions of law and fact, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action, and the court is authorized to compel, or hold unlawful and set aside agency actions. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 458 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Former Kosrae State Code, Title 5 (repealed) and Regulation 11 (repealed) are applicable to positions within the Executive Service System from 1990 through 1992. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 458 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An employee was required to present a grievance related to a particular act or occurrence within 15 calendar days of the date of occurrence or the date when the employee should have become aware of it had he been exercising reasonable diligence. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 459-60 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The time limits prescribed in the Executive Service Laws and Regulations are directory and not mandatory because the law and the regulations do not prescribe what happens if the prescribed time limits are not met. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 459 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Because the regulation that an employee grievance be presented no later than 15 days after the subject action is directory and not mandatory, a plaintiff's late presentation of his grievance after the specified 15 day period does not bar his claim. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 459 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An Executive Service position is a defined set of work responsibilities in the Executive. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 460 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Each Executive Service position was required to be classified by the Director of the Department of Personnel and Employment Services and all executive branch employee positions fall within the Executive

System and Kosrae State Code, Title 5, chapters 4 and 5, unless exempted under section 5.101(18). When the Director failed to classify the Head Teacher position before, during, or after the plaintiff was moved into that position, he did not perform his duties as required, and therefore violated state law. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 460 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

If an employee performs duties in addition to those stated in the classification plan for his regular position and the compensation for the position which normally includes the additional duties is greater than his regular salary, he receives the greater salary during the period of performance. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 460 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

There are several types of salary adjustment for additional duties: detail, acting assignment and temporary promotion. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 460 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A detail is an employee's temporary assignment to a different position for a specified period, with the intention that the employee will return to his regular position and duties at the end of the detail. A position is not filled by detail, as the employee continues to the incumbent of the position from which detailed. A teacher's temporary assignment to the different position of Head Teacher for a maximum period of one year, with the intention that he would return to his regular position of Classroom Teacher II at the end of the detail no later than one year later, is a detail. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 461 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An employee who is temporarily assigned to a position by detail will be compensated at the step in the new pay level which is equivalent to a two step increase above his regular salary. A one step increase is unlawful and is therefore set aside. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 461 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The term demotion means reduction to lower rank or grade, or to lower type of position, or to lower pay scale. For disciplinary reasons based upon good cause a management official may demote an employee. An employee's demotion is not effective for any purpose until a management official gives the employee written notice stating the reasons for the demotion and the employee's right of appeal. Demotion for a non-disciplinary reason is a statutory violation. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 461-62 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A regulation that permits demotions for non-disciplinary reasons is in conflict with Kosrae State Code § 5.418 and is therefore an impermissible extension of the statute. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 462 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The state's failure to give an employee the required written notice of his demotion and his right of appeal is a statutory violation, and makes the demotion ineffective for any purpose. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 462 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

After successfully serving a maximum probation period of one year, an employee may be converted to a permanent employee. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 462 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A position which is established to meet continuing government need and which is authorized to last longer than one year, must be identified as a permanent position. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 462 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When an employee successfully served the full one year probationary period as Head Teacher, his position as Head Teacher with its higher pay level, became a permanent position when the probationary period expired. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 462 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When a state employee's demotion was unlawful and is set aside, his salary will be established as if the demotion never occurred. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 462 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The Kosrae State Court's standard of review in its judicial review of State Public Service System final decisions is that the court will decide all relevant questions of law and fact, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action, and the court is authorized to compel, or hold unlawful and set aside agency actions. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 489 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Former Kosrae State Code, Title 5 (repealed) and Regulation 11 (repealed) are applicable to positions within the Executive Service System from 1990 through 1997. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 489 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An Executive Service position is a defined set of work responsibilities in the Executive. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Each Executive Service position was required to be classified by the Director of the Department of Personnel and Employment Services and all executive branch employee positions fall within the Executive System and Kosrae State Code, Title 5, chapters 4 and 5, unless exempted under section 5.101(18). When the Director failed to classify the Head Teacher position before, during, or after the plaintiff was moved into that position, he did not perform his duties as required, and therefore violated state law. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

If an employee performs duties in addition to those stated in the classification plan for his regular position and the compensation for the position which normally includes the additional duties is greater than his regular salary, he receives the greater salary during the period of performance. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 490 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

There are several types of salary adjustment for additional duties: detail, acting assignment and temporary promotion. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 491 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A detail is an employee's temporary assignment to a different position for a specified period, with the intention that the employee will return to his regular position and duties at the end of the detail. A position is not filled by detail, as the employee continues to the incumbent of the position from which detailed. A teacher's temporary assignment to the different position of Head Teacher for a maximum period of one year, with the intention that he would return to his regular position of Classroom Teacher II at the end of the detail no later than one year later, is a detail. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 491 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

An employee who is temporarily assigned to a position by detail will be compensated at the step in the new pay level which is equivalent to a two step increase above his regular salary. A one step increase is unlawful and is therefore set aside. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 491 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the plaintiff did not assume all of the administrative duties of the Vice Principal position and did not assume the duties of a vacant position, he was not assigned a "temporary promotion" to the position of Vice Principal. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 491-92 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When an employee was given added duties as a Head Teacher, the state will be required to classify the position of head teacher, including position description and pay level, and to pay compensation equivalent to a two-step increase. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 486, 492 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The law does not require that a supervisor (Director or Governor) implement a hazardous pay differential decision made by a subordinate employee, such as the Administrator of Division of Personnel. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Mandamus will be denied when there is another adequate legal remedy available to the petitioners – to file a grievance on their hazardous pay differential claim and proceed through the administrative process. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 569 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Any decision made by the Director's subordinate, the Administrator of Personnel, would only be deemed as advice to the Director, and not binding on the Director of Administration and Finance. Ultimately, it is the Director who is responsible for administering the Public Service System, consistent with Title 18 and applicable regulations. Benjamin v. Attorney General Office Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 566, 569-70 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Since a state employee classification plan that identifies class specifications for each class, including appropriate pay levels, must be approved by the Oversight Board, of which the Chief Justice is a member, it would be improper for the Chief Justice to order a classification of a position that would ultimately be reviewed and approved by him as an Oversight Board member. The court will therefore delete from its order the requirement that the state must create Head Teacher position classification. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 185 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae State Court's standard of judicial review of final decisions made under the State Public Service System is that the court will decide all relevant questions of law and fact, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions, and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action. The court is authorized to compel, or hold unlawful and set aside agency actions. Jackson v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 197, 199 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A position in the Executive Service is a defined set of work responsibilities in the Executive, and if an employee performs duties in addition to those stated in the classification plan for his regular position and the compensation for the position which normally includes the additional duties is greater than her regular salary, she receives the greater salary during the period of performance. Jackson v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 197, 200 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the duties performed by the plaintiff in the Diabetic and Hypertension Program were regular duties of the Head Nurse position pursuant to the classification plan and were not in addition to those stated in the classification plan for the Head Nurse position, the plaintiff is not entitled to additional compensation or a higher salary during the time she performed those duties. Jackson v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 197, 200 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The state was not required to change the plaintiff's position to the CDC Coordinator when her duties did not substantially change after she was assigned to perform some of the CDC Coordinator duties and when it was not a "temporary promotion" to the position of CDC Coordinator because she did not assume all or nearly all of the CDC Coordinator duties, which were shared and completed by four employees including her. Jackson v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 197, 200 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A state employee's government service is governed by law, first by the Kosrae State Code, Title 5, the Executive Service Law, and later by Title 18, the State Public Service System Law. A public service employee does not have any contractual entitlements, and thus a state employee's contract claim against the state is without merit and will be dismissed. Jackson v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 197, 201 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When, despite several tries by counsel, a state employee's 1987 written grievance was never acted upon due to the state's inaction throughout the administrative process although the applicable statutes entitled him to a written response, the employee's cause of action accrued and the statute of limitations began to run only when he left state employment in 1997. The state's own inaction cannot be used to run against the six-year statute of limitations. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 316-17 (App. 2003).

When a state employee did not engage in inexcusable delay or a lack of diligence in bringing suit, as the delay was caused by his engaging the administrative grievance process and waiting for the state's required response, and when the state, by its own inaction on the employee's claims, was not in compliance with the applicable regulation and statute, failed to act properly with regard to his grievance, the state, being the cause of the delay, cannot invoke the equitable doctrine of laches. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

When a state employee would not have been entitled to payment at his usual hourly rate for unused sick leave since he was never injured or ill and denied sick leave, he cannot claim that he has suffered a loss when he lost his accumulated hours of sick leave. Sam v. Chief of Police, 12 FSM R. 587, 589 (Kos. 2004).

A new law that results in a state employee's loss of his accumulated sick leave hours is not unconstitutional and a deprivation of property without due process because the right to take payment for sick leave to be taken in the future is a mere expectancy, and does not constitute a vested right entitling the employee to compensation. "Vested" means having the character or given the rights of absolute ownership. Sam v. Chief of Police, 12 FSM R. 587, 589 (Kos. 2004).

For the period of 1993-97, the law and regulations for the Executive Service System are applicable. For the period of 1997 to 2002, the law and regulations for the Kosrae State Public Service System are applicable. Former Kosrae State Code, Title 5, Chapter 4 (repealed) governed the Executive Service System during a portion of the relevant period, from 1993 to 1997. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 315, 319 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Since the then applicable law limited compensation for additional duties only when the additional duties performed were duties for a position with a greater salary and the plaintiff's tasks were duties of another classified position that, in the position classification plan, was compensated at the same as his, the plaintiff is not entitled to additional compensation for the additional tasks that he performed from 1993 to 1998. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 315, 319 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

For additional compensation, the "additional duties" performed by the public employee must be the duties of a position that has a greater salary than the employee's regular salary. When the journeyman tradesman (refrigeration mechanic) plaintiff's "additional duties" are the duties of another journeyman tradesman position (i.e. electrician or plumber) which has the same salary as the plaintiff's regular salary, the plaintiff is not entitled to additional compensation for the additional duties since all journeyman tradesman positions, regardless of specialization, are classified at pay level 7. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 315, 319 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The Kosrae State Public Service System establishes a state-wide public service system applicable to all branches of government and is governed by Kosrae State Code, Title 18. The PSS applies to all Kosrae state employees and positions except for those employees and positions which are specifically exempted. Specific exemptions include "contract employees." Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 325, 329-30 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

There are no limitations on the "contract employees" exemption: all contract employees are exempt from application of the Public Service System under Kosrae State Code, Title 18. There are no limitations imposed through any other state law upon the hiring of state government employees pursuant to ungraded, PSS exempt contracts. The State is permitted to hire ungraded, PSS exempt employees by contract, in its discretion, subject only to funding and budgetary limitations. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 325, 331 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

There are no provisions in state law which prohibit the state government from hiring employees by contract for positions which are also classified under the Public Service System classification plan. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 325, 331 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Kosrae State Code, § 18.104, which provides a preference to FSM citizens and Kosrae state residents in making appointments to positions within the PSS is not applicable to the contract position of Chief of Secondary Education. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 325, 331 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Kosrae State Code, section 18.302, which provides that the position classification plan must classify all positions subject to the provisions of the State Public Service System according to their duties and responsibilities, is not applicable to the contract position of Chief of Secondary Education since that position was not one classified within the PSS at the time of the contract hiring. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 325, 331 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Regardless of the reason for a Public Service System position vacancy or the length of time for the position vacancy, there is no statutory or constitutional requirement for the State to fill any vacancies of Public Service System positions. Allen v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 325, 332 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Once a property interest is found to exist, the next step is to determine if due process rights were violated. The court looks at whether the procedures used to apply the disciplinary action were fair based on the circumstances of the case; procedures must assure a rational decision making process. Municipal defendants are not required to follow the State of Kosrae's Public Service System laws and regulations and are not required to adopt their own written procedures, but they must be fair considering all the circumstances and use a rational decision making process. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 14 FSM R. 517, 520 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Kosrae State Code Title 18 creates the comprehensive Public Service System. An integral part of this system is a classification plan for all state positions subject to the plan. The position classification plan classifies all positions subject to the State Public Service System provisions according to their duties and responsibilities. Positions that are classified under the plan are filled by examination. Allen v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 18, 21 (App. 2007).

The Kosrae Public Service System applies to all employees and positions in the state government with fourteen different categories, including contract employees, exempted from its provisions. There are no restrictions on the exemptions that would foreclose or prohibit the Kosrae Department of Education from hiring teachers or a Chief of Secondary Education on a PSS-exempt, contract basis. In the absence of any such limitations, the contract employee exemption applies. Allen v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 18, 21-22 (App. 2007).

When the Legislature has altered the statutory framework only to increase, and not decrease, Kosrae's hiring discretion for contract employees by removing the single qualification that it had placed on the contract employees exemption, the court cannot limit the hiring discretion thus conferred by the Kosrae Legislature in the absence of a statutory basis for doing so since it is the Kosrae Legislature's role to consider and determine the public policy that supports a statute, and to enact legislation that reflects that public policy. Allen v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 18, 22 (App. 2007).

When the Kosrae statute defines "public service" as all offices and positions in the state government not exempted by Section 18.107, the requirement that preference be given to FSM citizens with a view to insuring full participation by FSM citizens and state residents in its public service means that the preference will apply to the hiring of individuals for non-exempt, Public Service System positions. Thus, when the position for which another was hired was exempt from the PSS because it was filled on a contract basis, the preference had no application to the hiring. Allen v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 18, 23 (App. 2007).

The statute does not specifically require a good cause standard to be met when dismissing or demoting an employee. A management official may, for disciplinary reasons, dismiss or demote an employee when he determines that the good of the public service will be served thereby. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 305, 311 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

For the due process clause to apply, a life, property, or liberty interest must be implicated. In an employment case, to be property protected under the Constitution, the employment right must be supported by more than merely the employee's own personal hope. There must be a claim of entitlement based upon governmental assurance of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 307 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Any regular employee who is suspended for more than the three working days, demoted, or dismissed may appeal to the branch head or his designee within fifteen days after written notice of the suspension, demotion or dismissal has been transmitted to him, and upon receiving such appeal, the branch head, or his designee, shall form an ad hoc hearing committee of three members. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 312 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Since the court is required to set aside agency action if unwarranted by the facts, the court must also consider the additional evidence submitted at the trial de novo. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 313 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Under Kosrae state law, a "grievance" is an employee action to present and resolve a difficulty or dispute arising in the performance of his duties but not a disciplinary action. Grievances are not disciplinary actions and Title 18 does not provide any limitations on the Kosrae State Court's review of grievances or grievance appeals although the Kosrae State Court does not have jurisdiction to review grievances of employees who do not first comply with the required administrative procedure. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 513 (App. 2013).

Failure to exhaust administrative remedies and failure to timely file a suit for judicial review are both affirmative defenses which have to be asserted in the answer otherwise that affirmative defense is waived. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 513 (App. 2013).

The Kosrae State Court has original jurisdiction in all cases except those within the exclusive and original jurisdiction of inferior courts and it has jurisdiction to review all decisions of inferior courts. Since no inferior court is assigned original jurisdiction over state employee grievances, the Kosrae State Court has jurisdiction over state employees' claims for pay once they have exhausted their administrative remedies. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 513 (App. 2013).

Kosrae's contention that the plaintiffs could not use the public service system appeals process because they were contract employees should mean that they could (or had to) file a court suit to obtain relief but if, Kosrae contends that they never became vice-principals, then they remained elementary school teachers and were thus public service system employees eligible to use the appeals process. Kosrae's reasoning is circular and leads nowhere. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 513 (App. 2013).

State employees suing for unpaid compensation for work they performed, obviously have a sufficient stake in the case's outcome when they allege that they each have suffered an actual injury (insufficient pay) and that that injury can be traced to the Director's challenged action and their claim is one that a favorable court decision can redress by awarding damages. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

When the appellees did not officiously thrust their services as vice-principals on Kosrae but had applied for the vice-principal position; thought they had been hired for the position (and did not know their contracts were invalid); and then performed the duties required by that position and as they were instructed by their superiors, Kosrae was unjustly enriched and therefore should compensate the appellees. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 515 (App. 2013).

An illegally-hired government employee is entitled to be paid for the work he actually performed. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 516 (App. 2013).

A cause of action to collect salary or wages accrues when an employee has a right to collect the money allegedly owed to him. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 89 (App. 2016).

A school teacher could not have successfully maintained a cause of action for improper salary classification as of the date of his initial hiring when he had not submitted documentation to the government proving his educational background, thereby giving him a right to collect the higher salary allegedly owed to him. His cause of action began to accrue when, if ever, he submitted the relevant documents necessary to prove he should have been placed at the higher pay level. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 89 (App. 2016).

If a public employee does not prevail on his grievance, then he could have sought judicial review of the decision within the applicable six-year statute of limitations, but when the employee received a decision in his favor, the statute of limitations was immediately suspended and the State's own inaction thereafter cannot be used to run the six-year statute of limitations. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 90 (App. 2016).

The statute of limitations cannot be said to have continued to run as against a public employee's claim when the administrative decision was issued in his favor and the administrative grievance process was still pending as to a determination of damages. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 90 (App. 2016).

The statute of limitations does not to continue to run against a state employee when a favorable decision was rendered to him. To come to such a conclusion would mean any agency could immunize itself from judicial review simply by extending delay for six years or until the statute of limitations has run. Therefore, the statute of limitations was suspended when the favorable decision was rendered on December 12, 2001 until the January 22, 2015 decision to overturn the first determination, and thus a petition for writ of mandamus filed in Kosrae State Court on April 1, 2015 was, as a result of the tolled period, well within the six-year limitations period. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 91 (App. 2016).

When a state employee's claim for wrongful probation status accrued, at the very latest, on August 26, 1989, because that was when the event triggering the cause of action occurred and when he could have first successfully maintained a suit on his claim since he remained classified as a probationary employee despite working, as of then, one day longer than one year. Thus, when that employee first exercised his administrative remedies and filed a grievance on April 30, 1997, his action for wrongful probationary status is time-barred because his grievance and the initiation of this lawsuit clearly fall outside the six-year statute of limitations. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 92 (App. 2016).

– Kosrae – Termination

When shortage of work or funds requires the dismissal of a Kosrae state employee the Executive should consider an employee's individual merit, qualifications through education, training, and experience and the employee's seniority. Edwin v. Kosrae, 4 FSM R. 292, 303 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Title III of the Kosrae State Court manual of administration permits dismissal of a government employee if the employee is convicted of felony. In the case of non-felonies, section 11(5)(c) permits dismissal only if it is shown that the employee's "criminal conduct . . . is detrimental to the performance of the duties and responsibilities of his position." Palsis v. Kosrae State Court, 5 FSM R. 214, 217 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

An employee may not be dismissed for conviction of a misdemeanor unless the nature of the conduct leading to the conviction is itself detrimental to the performance of the employee's duties. Palsis v. Kosrae State Court, 5 FSM R. 214, 218 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

When a law enforcement officer during performance of his duties reveals an unacceptable lack of respect for legal authority such as obstructing another officer from performing similar duties, the nature of his conduct is itself detrimental to the performance of his duties and his dismissal is justified. Palsis v. Kosrae State Court, 5 FSM R. 214, 218 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

An employee may be terminated without notice and an opportunity to be heard if she has abandoned her job. If not, the state must provide written notice stating the reasons for the dismissal and an opportunity to present mitigating circumstances, defenses, or other positions in opposition to the proposed disciplinary action. Klavasru v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 86, 89-90 (Kos. 1995).

It is an impermissible extension of the reach of the statute for the executive service regulation to define abandonment of public office as absent without authorization for two weeks. Klavasru v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 86, 91 (Kos. 1995).

A public employee, who supplied an explanation for her absence from work and who made clear, both before and after the absence that she did not intend to take permanent leave of her position, cannot be terminated for abandonment of office or disciplined without the statutory safeguard of notice and an opportunity to be heard. Klavasru v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 86, 92 (Kos. 1995).

Government employment that is property with the meaning of the Due Process Clause cannot be taken without due process. Only if an employment arrangement has an entitlement based upon governmental assurances of continual employment or dismissal for only specified reasons does the FSM Constitution require procedural due process as a condition to its termination. Taulung v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 270, 274 (App. 1998).

A permanent employee may be dismissed for disciplinary reasons based upon good cause or the employee may be dismissed within a reduction-in-force. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 433 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Kosrae's right and power to adjust its employment scheme according to the availability of funds and work is not unlimited. When the shortage of funds require dismissal of an employee, certain procedures are to be followed to ensure that seniority and qualifications are given due consideration. The government must give employees written notice that he has been reached by a reduction-in-force and that his services shall be terminated. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 433 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Termination of employment means a complete severance of the relationship of employer and employee. Reductions-in-force mean dismissal or termination of employees. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 433 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When an employee has been laid off for the summer, it is not a termination for disciplinary reasons or a reduction-in-force. A layoff is a termination of employment at the will of the employer, which may be temporary or permanent. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 434 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the administrative steps essential for court review of employment terminations have not yet been completed, the court cannot review the termination. Abraham v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 57, 60 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When the statutory provisions intend and ensure that an entity is run as a corporation with its own management and employees, and not as a Kosrae state government agency and when, although the state government remains its sole shareholder, the state government does not assume its debts, does not own its assets, and has no control over its day to day operations, it is not a "state actor," and its termination of an employee is therefore not a "state action." Livaie v. Micronesia Petroleum Co., 10 FSM R. 659, 666-67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Employment is a property right protected by the Kosrae Constitution when there is an assurance of continued employment or when dismissal is allowed for specified reasons. An employee's personal hope of continued employment or the expiration of a contract with no provisions for renewal does not give rise to a property interest. Thus, when the Tafunsak Constitution states that the position of Treasurer is a four-year term and the plaintiff's employment was terminated before the term's end, this is sufficient to show an assurance of continued employment and gives rise to a property right protected by due process under the Kosrae Constitution. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 14 FSM R. 517, 520 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Where the plaintiff claims that he was not given an administrative remedy and did not have an opportunity to meet or rebut the allegations against him and when the defendants began by giving the plaintiff written notice listing specific issues and specifying their concerns about the plaintiff's failure to perform his duties and gave the plaintiff several months until late February 2004 to correct his behavior; when the plaintiff did not change his behavior to perform his job responsibilities and he spoke with the defendants about resigning from employment during this time period, thus demonstrating that he met with the defendants and had an opportunity to rebut the first letter's allegations; the Council gave him a copy of its March 2004 letter to the Mayor recommending termination of his employment; when the Mayor's letter to the plaintiff based on this recommendation again gave him an opportunity to bring forth any grievances, this procedure consistently gave the plaintiff notice of the defendants' specific reasons for concern and gave him several opportunities to meet and rebut allegations and bring forth grievances and was thus fair based on the circumstances and was based on a rational decision-making process. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 14 FSM R. 517, 520 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The Tafunsak Constitution provisions about the Treasurer's employment do not conflict with the provision that the Council can terminate a municipal employee with a ⅔ vote. Palsis v. Tafunsak Mun. Gov't, 14 FSM R. 517, 520-21 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The statute does not specifically require a good cause standard to be met when dismissing or demoting an employee. A management official may, for disciplinary reasons, dismiss or demote an employee when he determines that the good of the public service will be served thereby. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 305, 311 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Although Kosrae statutes do not specifically state that a pre-dismissal hearing is required, constitutional due process in the FSM does require that a governmental, non-probationary employee be given some opportunity to respond to the charges against him before his dismissal may be implemented, which includes: oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Although Kosrae statutes do not specifically state that a pre-dismissal hearing is required, once it is determined that the statute establishes a property right subject to protection under the due process clause, constitutional principles determine what process is due as a minimum. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The constitution is consistent with the Kosrae State Code and the Public Service System statutes which will not be set aside as contrary to due process since, in the absence of statutory language to the contrary, the statutory mandate may be interpreted as assuming compliance with the constitutional requirements. Thus, when the Kosrae State Code states that written notice setting forth the specific reasons for the dismissal or demotion and the employee's rights of appeal must be transmitted to the employee but is silent as to whether a dismissal may be implemented before some kind of hearing is provided, this is not read as an attempt to authorize immediate dismissal for all purposes without giving the employee a right to respond but instead as an indication of solicitude, demonstrating the intention to assure that employees' rights be observed. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 306-07 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

When, at the time of her termination, the plaintiff was a permanent state employee and since a "regular employee" or "permanent employee" means an employee who has been appointed to a position in the public service and who has successfully completed a probation period, the plaintiff's claim to employment was supported by more than her mere personal hope of employment and the state had a legal obligation to employ the plaintiff. Thus, the plaintiff had a property right which was protected by the due process clause. Procedural due process requires notice and an opportunity to be heard, so as to protect the employee's rights and insure that discipline is not enforced in an arbitrary manner. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 307 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A state employee with a property right is entitled to a pre-termination hearing that includes notice and an opportunity to be heard. The employee is entitled to oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Palsis v.

An essential principle of due process is that a deprivation of life, liberty, or property be preceded by notice and an opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case. This requires some type of hearing prior to the discharge of an employee who has a constitutionally-protected interest in his or her employment. The pre-termination hearing, though necessary, need not be elaborate. The formality and procedural requisites for the hearing can vary, depending upon the importance of the interest involved and the nature of the subsequent proceedings that are available. In general, something less than a full evidentiary hearing is sufficient prior to adverse administrative action. The pre-termination hearing does not definitively resolve the propriety of discharge, but is an initial check against mistaken decisions. The essential requirements are notice and an opportunity to respond. The state employee is entitled to oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story and to require more than this prior to termination would intrude to an unwarranted extent on the government's interest in quickly removing an unsatisfactory employee. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 309 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

Since a state employee's pre-termination hearing need not be elaborate and since a notice of a hearing can be oral and is highly informal, given that the employee is given the opportunity for a post-deprivation hearing, where the employee was given notice on August 7, 2007 when she received a notice-of-dismissal letter and the dismissal did not become effective until August 30, 2007 and thus she was not deprived of benefits until then, an August 7, 2007 meeting constituted a pre-termination hearing as did a later August 15, 2007 meeting because, at both meetings, she was given an opportunity to respond to the charges against her and she had not yet been deprived of benefits and because the meetings served as an initial check of the charges since she was given an opportunity to explain her side of the story and the Director discussed the evidence for dismissal as stated in the termination letter and was open to questions regarding the reasons for dismissal. Also, when, at the August 15, 2007 meeting, her representative took the opportunity to be heard on her behalf, asked questions to the Director; tried to negotiate a settlement; and presented her side of the story, the requirements of notice and an opportunity to respond were met. Because she had notice and an opportunity to be heard prior to dismissal, her due process rights were not violated as a pre-termination hearing was held. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 311 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The good of the public service is served by an employee's dismissal if the management official determines that the employee has had 1) three consecutive performance evaluation reports with less than satisfactory ratings in any category; or 2) a total of three suspensions, whether imposed as minor discipline or disciplinary action; or 3) a conviction of any crime that the management official determines makes the employee unfit for his job; or 4) more than eight working days in two years that the employee has been taken unauthorized leave; or 5) a determination has been made that the applicant was not truthful on his employment application; or 6) the employee ceases work without explanation for more than 6 consecutive working days; or 7) any other grounds causing the management official to justifiably believe that the good of the public service will be served by dismissal. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 311-12 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

If the agency abused its discretion, or acted arbitrarily or capriciously, then the employee dismissal should be set aside. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16 FSM R. 297, 313 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

The standard is that a dismissal can occur if it is done for the good of the public service and the court will set aside the agency decision if it finds that the decision was arbitrary, capricious, and abuse of discretion or that the decision was unwarranted by the facts. When, in analyzing the facts, the court finds that each complaint and factor as a reason for dismissal alone does not rise to the level that would allow a management official to terminate an employee, but when the culmination of all of the factors and complaints does rise to a level where dismissal was a viable option and at the management official's discretion, the good of the public service was served by her dismissal since the health care industry is vital to the Kosrae community and nurses affect the well being of all citizens of Kosrae. Palsis v. Kosrae, 16

When a terminated state employee, since she was given an immediate opportunity to respond and another opportunity to respond one week later, had two opportunities to be heard after being informed of the reasons for her dismissal, and when after these two opportunities, she had two full post-termination evidentiary hearings that analyzed the Hospital's decision to terminate her employment, her procedural due process rights were not violated. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2010).

Since a Kosrae public service system management official may, for disciplinary reasons, dismiss an employee when he determines that the good of the public service will be served thereby but since no dismissal of a permanent employee is effective for any purpose until the management official transmits to the employee, by the most practical means, a written notice setting forth the specific reasons for the dismissal and the employee's rights of appeal, the employee must be provided with notice that specifically identifies the reasons for dismissal and the employee's rights of appeal, which is the opportunity to be heard. When the trial court's findings of fact indicate that these specific mandates were satisfied, the appellate court is unable to find that the State Court's reasoning was clearly erroneous. Palsis v. Kosrae, 17 FSM R. 236, 242 (App. 2010).

– Pohnpei

A Pohnpei state government official is an employee for purposes of the Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 12 (Pon. 1985).

Working for the Pohnpei state government, whose policy of public service is based explicitly on the merit, is merely a privilege which can be withheld subject to the due process of law. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 217 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The right to governmental employment in Pohnpei is not a fundamental right, constitutionally protected, requiring invoking a strict scrutiny test. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 217 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The Pohnpei State Government has discretion in hiring or firing employees, but that discretion does not carry with it the right to its arbitrary exercise. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 217 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Section 14(1) of the State Public Service System Act of 1981 (2L-57-81), prohibiting any person who has been convicted of a felony and is currently under sentence from being considered for any public employment or from continuing to hold any previously attained public service position, operates to effect double punishment on persons classified as felons, by preventing such individuals' attempts at rehabilitation, and as such this statute does not support Pohnpei State Government's policy of rehabilitating persons who are convicted of crimes. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 219 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Section 14(1) of the State Public Service System Act of 1981 (2L-57-81) is impermissibly arbitrary and irrationally unfair in its blanket prohibition of employment of any person who has been convicted of a felony and is currently under sentence; such statutory prohibition fails to tailor its impact to those convicted felons who otherwise lack the habits of industry. Consequently, this section of the statute is violative of the Equal Rights Clause of the Pohnpei Constitution by failing to demonstrate that the exclusion of all felons is necessary to achieve the articulated state goal. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 220 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

A statute providing that any person who has been convicted of a felony and who is currently under sentence shall be terminated from public employment, constitutes an unconstitutional deprivation of procedural due process by allowing for an affected individual's termination without a hearing, and thus must be struck down. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 221-22 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Each division of the Pohnpei Department of Treasury and Administration, except in instances where the director maintains direct management of the division, has a division chief. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 284, 287 (Pon. 2010).

When the Department Director held a hearing, he could conceivably have been acting as the de facto chief of PL&MD, or, if PL&MD did have a chief then, the Director may not have had implied authority, unless he was the division chief's designee. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 284, 287 (Pon. 2010).

All powers statutorily granted to PL&MD are necessarily a subset of those powers granted to the Pohnpei Department of Treasury and Administration, particularly in light of the statute wherein a department director may assume a division chief's responsibilities and the statute which empowers a division chief to designate another person to act in his stead. Smith v. Nimea, 17 FSM R. 284, 287-88 (Pon. 2010).

Pohnpei Code Title 9, chapter 2, section 105 states that preference shall be given to qualified legal residents of Pohnpei in making appointments and promotions and providing opportunities for training in the public service, but the term "legal residents" is not defined in Title 9. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 446 (App. 2011).

Pohnpei Code Title 19 and its definitions, apply only to private employers and their employees, not to Pohnpei public employees. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2011).

Pohnpei Code Title 9 provides for a promotion preference, as well as a hiring preference. It offers two tiers of hiring and promotion preferences. A higher hiring and promotion preference is given to legal residents of Pohnpei, and the lower hiring and promotion preference for all FSM citizens who are not legal residents of Pohnpei. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2011).

If the legislature wanted the statute to provide a hiring and promotion preference to Pohnpeian or FSM citizens, then the legislature would have used "citizen" rather than "legal resident." By not defining the term "legal residents" the term's meaning must be the term's common, recognized definition. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

The statute's plain meaning of term "legal residents of Pohnpei" is individuals who are domiciled in Pohnpei. This interpretation allows a Pohnpeian citizen living abroad, who maintained his or her domicile in Pohnpei, to receive the same hiring preference as a Pohnpeian citizen living in Pohnpei and it would give all FSM citizens and non-citizens who have moved to Pohnpei and made Pohnpei their domicile, equal opportunity for job selection and promotion. This interpretation is also internally consistent with the statute's other parts which give a second preference for employment to FSM citizens who are not legal residents of Pohnpei when applying for a position or promotion and who would receive a preference over non-citizens who are temporarily living in Pohnpei and over other non-residents. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

Unless the regulations directly violate a national statute or are found to be unconstitutional, Pohnpei is free to regulate its own public service system. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 449 (App. 2011).

The right to work for the Pohnpei state government is not a constitutionally protected right, and, although there is a right to seek employment, there is no fundamental right for employment particularly to public employment. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 450 (App. 2011).

Section 2-114(1), by its terms, only applies to persons who have completed their sentence and are applying for a Pohnpei public service position. It does not apply to persons already holding public service positions. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 442 (Pon. 2018).

Personnel disciplinary actions are in no case subject to review in the courts until the statutory administrative remedies have been exhausted. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 443 (Pon. 2018).

A court's review of a Pohnpei Personnel Review Board decision is governed by statute. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 443 (Pon. 2018).

When, even though the employment contract was printed with a Pohnpei state government letterhead, the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau's actual function and operation shows that it is independent of the Pohnpei state government; when the PVB's funding is provided for under the Compact of Free Association, but is deposited with the Pohnpei Department of Treasury and Administration for custodial purposes and disbursement; and when the PVB's actual decision-making lies with its Board, the PVB is an entity that operates independent of the state government, and its Board is responsible for its General Manager's hiring, thus making the state's non-renewal of the plaintiff's contract unlawful. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

Although the contract in question is a personal services contract which names the State of Pohnpei as the contracting party, because the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau operates and is controlled by its Board, and not by the state government, the agreement is between the plaintiff and the PVB, through its Board of Directors. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

Since the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau is a non-governmental organization with duly enacted articles of incorporation and bylaws, whose funding is provided for under the Compact of Free Association, the Pohnpei state government had a ministerial duty to certify the plaintiff's employment contract after the Board's approval, because the discretion of whether to hire the plaintiff was with the PVB Board. "Ministerial" means of or relating to an act that involves obedience to instructions or laws instead of discretion, judgment, or skill. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 500 & n.4 (Pon. 2018).

– Pohnpei – Termination

The removal or termination of a public service system employee is a disciplinary action, and the applicable Pohnpei state statute provides that a management official may, for disciplinary reasons, dismiss an employee for such causes that will promote the public service's efficiency. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 443 (Pon. 2018).

When the court cannot say that the Personnel Review Board's decision was arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion since Pohnpei had a rational basis for its decision – that the plaintiff, because of his cheating conviction, was an inappropriate role model or mentor for the children he had been employed to instruct, the plaintiff's termination was thus in compliance with Section 2-139 since his disciplinary dismissal was for such cause that would promote the public service's efficiency. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 443 (Pon. 2018).

Due process requires that a non-probationary government employee be given some opportunity to respond to the charges against him before his dismissal may be implemented; including oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Phillip v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 439, 444 (Pon. 2018).

– Termination

It is inappropriate for the FSM Supreme Court to consider a claim that a government employee's termination was unconstitutional when the administrative steps essential for review by the court of employment terminations have not yet been completed. 52 F.S.M.C. 157. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 202 (Pon. 1982).

The National Public Service System Act fixes two conditions for termination of a national government employee. Responsible officials must be persuaded that: 1) there is "cause," that is, the employee has acted wrongfully, justifying disciplinary action; and 2) the proposed action will serve "the good of the public service." 52 F.S.M.C. 151-157. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 353 (Pon. 1983).

In reviewing the termination of national government employees under the National Public Service System Act, the FSM Supreme Court will review factual findings insofar as necessary to determine whether there is evidence to establish that there were grounds for discipline. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 71 (App. 1989).

Under the National Public Service System Act, where the FSM Supreme Court's review is for the sole purpose of preventing statutory, regulatory and constitutional violations, review of factual findings is limited to determining whether substantial evidence in the record supports the conclusion of the administrative official that a violation of the kind justifying termination has occurred. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 72 (App. 1989).

The National Public Service System Act places broad authority in the highest management official, authorizing dismissal based upon disciplinary reasons when the official determines that the good of the public service will be served thereby. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 73 (App. 1989).

The National Public Service System Act and the FSM Public Service System Regulations establish an expectation of continued employment for nonprobationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds and specifying necessary procedures for their dismissal; this is sufficient protection of the right to continued national government employment to establish a property interest for nonprobationary employees which may not be taken without fair proceedings, or "due process." Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 73 (App. 1989).

Constitutional due process requires that a nonprobationary employee of the national government be given some opportunity to respond to the charges against him before his dismissal may be implemented; including oral or written notice of the charges against him, an explanation of the employer's evidence, and an opportunity to present his side of the story. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 76 (App. 1989).

Implementation of the constitutional requirement that a government employee be given an opportunity to respond before dismissal is consistent with the statutory scheme of the National Public Service System Act, therefore the Act need not be set aside as contrary to due process. Semes v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 66, 77 (App. 1989).

A person whose temporary promotion became permanent has the right to be discharged only for cause, and is entitled to all of the other protections afforded a permanent employee. Isaac v. Weilbacher, 8 FSM R. 326, 337 (Pon. 1998).

A timely appeal by a public employee of his termination by submitting a letter brief to the Assistant Secretary for Personnel Administration entitles him to a hearing on his appeal within fifteen calendar days after the Personnel Officer receives the appeal, unless the appellant requests a delay. A postponement longer than that by the government not consented to by the appellant is not in compliance with the law. Maradol v. Department of Foreign Affairs, 13 FSM R. 51, 52-53 (Pon. 2004).

When there are non-frivolous disputes about the grounds for termination, the decision of the ad hoc committee should identify and address those grounds with specificity, and when they have not, the court will remand the case to the ad hoc committee to prepare a full written statement of its findings of fact to be forwarded to the President for his final review. If, after the President completes his final review, any party believes such action is necessary and appropriate, the party may file a motion to reinstitute the judicial proceedings. Maradol v. Department of Foreign Affairs, 13 FSM R. 51, 54-55 (Pon. 2004).

Under Title 52, when the FSM Supreme Court's review is for the sole purpose of preventing statutory, regulatory, and constitutional violations, review of the factual findings is limited to determining whether substantial evidence in the record supports the administrative official's conclusion that a violation justifying termination has occurred. The court is thus required to uphold the President's findings of fact if there is substantial evidence in the record to support them. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 239 (Pon. 2012).

The court will limit itself to reviewing the ad hoc committee's decision and not deal with the issue of job abandonment when the committee's decision is affirmed since there is no need for a review of a further ground for the employee's termination. Additionally, the employee was accorded his right to appeal and did so. If he was terminated for job abandonment he would have no right to appeal. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 241 n.5 (Pon. 2012).

When the court has found substantial evidence in the record to support all three grounds for an employee's termination and is not left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed, no mistake was committed by the ad hoc committee's findings and recommendation, and the President's affirmance. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 243 (Pon. 2012).

The National Public Service System Act and the Public Service System Regulations establish continued employment for non-probationary national government employees by limiting the permissible grounds and specifying the necessary procedures for their dismissal. This is sufficient protection of the right to continued national government employment to establish a non-probationary employee's property interest which may not be taken without due process, including notice and an opportunity to be heard. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 244 (Pon. 2012).

When an employee's termination, effectuated on October 28, 2009, could not have taken effect before he was given an opportunity to be heard, which he later received at the ad hoc committee hearing, his termination would be effective, at the earliest, on the December 21, 2009 date of the ad hoc committee's decision because the ad hoc committee hearing was his first opportunity to respond to the charges against him. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 245 (Pon. 2012).

When there was evidence of the terminated employee receiving approval of an advance leave request of 60 hours, but there was no evidence of how much of this advance leave was actually used, how much had already been paid back, and how much was still outstanding, the court will deny the government's request to offset the employee's pay to cover for the advance leave still owed since there is a lack of evidence on this matter. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 245 (Pon. 2012).

52 F.S.M.C. 146 does not provide for administrative remedies or administrative appeals of any kind in abandonment of employment cases. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386 (Pon. 2014).

Since an employee who abandons his position does not have the right to an administrative appeal, a court reviewing an agency decision to terminate a plaintiff's employment for reason of abandonment will be unable to limit its role to reviewing factual findings developed during an administrative appeal. A court evaluating the merits of an abandonment claim must instead conduct a trial de novo to determine whether there is substantial evidence to support an agency decision to terminate a plaintiff's employment for reason of abandonment. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386 (Pon. 2014).

The Public Service System Act delineates procedures that must be followed in terminating an employee for unsatisfactory performance and mandates that no dismissal or demotion of a permanent employee is effective until the management official transmits to the employee a written notice setting forth the specific reasons for the dismissal or demotion and the employee's rights of appeal and it further mandates that any regular employee who is dismissed may appeal through an administrative review process. A crucial part of the administrative review process is a hearing before an ad hoc committee, and subsequent preparation of a full written statement of findings of fact. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386 (Pon. 2014).

In reviewing a government employee's termination under Title 52, the FSM Supreme Court will review factual findings insofar as necessary to determine whether there is evidence to establish that there were grounds for discipline. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386 (Pon. 2014).

Under Title 52, since the FSM Supreme Court's review is for the sole purpose of preventing statutory, regulatory and constitutional violations, review of the factual findings is limited to determining whether substantial evidence in the record supports the administrative official's conclusion that a violation of the kind justifying termination has occurred. The statute evinces a clear congressional intent that the courts avoid serving as finders of fact. When there are non-frivolous disputes about the grounds for termination, the decision of the ad hoc committee should identify and address those grounds with specificity, and when they have not, the court will remand the case to the ad hoc committee to prepare a full written statement of its findings of fact. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 386-87 (Pon. 2014).

When a discharged employee was denied an opportunity to engage in the administrative review process, the court is left without a record to review, and therefore the government's decision to terminate the plaintiff's employment on the grounds of unsatisfactory performance is not supported by substantial evidence in the record. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 387 (Pon. 2014).

If the government wants to terminate an employee for unsatisfactory job performance, it must follow the procedures established in the National Public Service System Act and accompanying regulations, including providing the employee with notice of his right to file an administrative appeal. If, after an administrative appeal, the employee is terminated for unsatisfactory performance then the employee may appeal to the FSM Supreme Court, and the court will evaluate the administrative appeal's record to determine if the decision to terminate the employee for unsatisfactory job performance is supported by substantial evidence. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 387 n.3 (Pon. 2014).

If an employee ceases work without explanation for not less than six consecutive working days, the management official shall file with the personnel officer a statement showing termination of employment because of abandonment of position. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 389 (Pon. 2014).

When an employee's supervisor is contacted with a request for leave due to illness, the supervisor is on notice that the requesting employee is absent for a reason other than a desire to abandon his employment; when any senior management official who read the departmental attendance log and saw LWOP beside the employee's name should have understood that the employee did not wish to resign, but rather that his absences were approved; when it is clear that the employee did not cease work without explanation for six consecutive days and at worst only four of the six absences were without explanation, the employee did not cease work without explanation for six consecutive days and the court must conclude that a finding that the employee abandoned his employment is not supported by substantial evidence. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 389-90 (Pon. 2014).

It is well established that a plaintiff seeking an award of back pay as damages for wrongful termination has a duty to mitigate damages by actively seeking alternative employment. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 391 (Pon. 2014).

The failure to mitigate damages is an affirmative defense for which the defendant bears the burden of proof. The common law rule establishing failure to mitigate damages as an affirmative defense is sound because to hold otherwise would be to impose a burdensome requirement upon every plaintiff in a wrongful termination case and because a holding that failure to mitigate damages is an affirmative defense puts the burden of proof on defendants, who presumably would refrain from litigating this issue unless the question of failure to mitigate damages is actually in dispute. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 391 (Pon. 2014).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay from the date of termination to the date of reinstatement are remedies generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge. However, the amount of back pay must be reduced to the extent that the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 391-92 (Pon. 2014).

A wrongfully discharged employee is entitled to the equitable remedy of reinstatement to his former position. Reinstatement is appropriate even if the position has been filled by another employee since, if a replacement's existence constituted a complete defense against reinstatement, then reinstatement could be effectively blocked in every case simply by immediately hiring an innocent third-party after the unlawful discharge has occurred, thus rendering the reinstatement remedy's deterrent effect a nullity. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 392 (Pon. 2014).

An aggrieved employee is entitled to the administrative process regardless of his or her current employment status if it emerges from an employment dispute that was existing at the time the employee left, or if the termination itself is the reason that the person left the public service system. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 356 (Pon. 2016).

It is without jurisdictional significance that a person may, or may not be, covered under the Public Service System Act in her current employment position. It is enough that she indisputably was and that she properly began that grievance process and has the right to see it through to completion. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 356 (Pon. 2016).

When the plaintiff has in good faith requested the resumption of the administrative process and the agency has verbally denied that request, the court may grant relief to the extent that the plaintiff requests declaratory relief requiring the administrative proceedings' resumption, but to the extent that the plaintiff has requested further declaratory relief regarding the validity of her termination, or the legality of a settlement offer, the court cannot grant that relief because that determination is within the administrative agency's exclusive jurisdiction and it is inappropriate for the court to unnecessarily encroach on the administrative domain. Eperiam v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 351, 356-57 (Pon. 2016).

A pattern of untruthfulness that had preceded the probationary employee's lying about posting comments on a website, along with his disrespectful and insubordinate attitude to his supervisor, were more than sufficient to terminate a probationary employee, even if he had not posted any comments. Alexander v. Hainrick, 20 FSM R. 377, 383 (App. 2016).

If the preponderance of evidence shows that a government employee would have been terminated even in the absence of the protected free speech conduct, then the employee's termination should be upheld. Alexander v. Hainrick, 20 FSM R. 377, 383 (App. 2016).

To grant a wrongfully discharged probationary employee a substantial back pay award would be to convert him from the probationary employee he was to a regular or permanent employee, and he cannot be treated as a regular employee since he did not successfully complete his probationary period before he was terminated. Thus, the most a court could do would be to reinstate him as a probationary employee. Alexander v. Hainrick, 20 FSM R. 377, 383 (App. 2016).

A complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face, but a plaintiff's allegation that there was a "sheer possibility" that her termination was based on petty and insufficient grounds, is inadequate, as far as withstanding a Rule 12(b)(6) challenge. Solomon v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 396, 401 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court's review of an agency decision is for the sole purpose of preventing statutory, regulatory and constitutional violations, review of factual findings is limited to determining whether substantial evidence in the record supports the administrative official's conclusions that a violation of the kind justifying the termination has occurred. Solomon v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 396, 402 (Pon. 2016).

When the plaintiff's reasoning neglects to cite what constituted an alleged illegal termination since the only factual averments which depict allegedly untoward conduct on the defendants' part, albeit nebulous, only apply to one defendant, the requisite nexus to support a substantive due process violation is wanting. Solomon v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 396, 402 (Pon. 2016).

– Yap

Section 23 of Yap State Law 1-35, affecting resignation and abandonment of employment positions, does not provide for administrative remedies or administrative appeal of any kind. Dabchur v. Yap, 3 FSM R. 203, 205 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1987).

Abandonment of a public office is a voluntary form of resignation wherein the employee's intention to relinquish his position must be clear, either through declaration or overt acts. Dabchur v. Yap, 3 FSM R. 203, 207 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1987).

Where the statute in question classifies "constructive" abandonment as an employee ceasing work "without explanation" for not less than six consecutive working days, any explanation from the employee, written or verbal, would suffice to indicate the employer that the employee does not intend to relinquish his position absolutely. Dabchur v. Yap, 3 FSM R. 203, 207 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1987).

An employee who contests the factual allegation of voluntary abandonment is not entitled to any administrative remedies or administrative appeal, and has recourse only in the court. Dabchur v. Yap, 3 FSM R. 203, 208 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1987).

Once Yap's Director of Education took over control of YHS, appointed a DOE employee as the YHS Acting Director, and exercised the power to terminate a YHS employee on a Yap Assistant Attorney General's advice, YHS employees are then state employees since when an individual or entity exercises the power to fire an employee, they become an employer of that employee. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 436 (Yap 2006).

– Yap – Termination

No dismissal or demotion of a permanent Yap state employee is effective for any purpose until the management official transmits to the employee, by the most practical means, a written notice setting forth the specific reasons for the dismissal or demotion and the employee's rights of appeal. The rights of appeal that the employee should be informed of include: 1) an appeal through the Chief of Division of Personnel, 2) a hearing before an ad hoc committee where the plaintiff has a right to be heard and evidence is taken and recorded, and 3) a full written report of findings and recommendations to the highest management official at the agency. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 436 (Yap 2006).

When the termination letter sent to the plaintiff stated the reason for his termination, but did not set forth his appeal rights, the plaintiff's dismissal from state employment was not effective. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 436 (Yap 2006).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination to the date he is reinstated are remedies are generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge. But the amount awarded in back pay should be reduced to the extent the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 436-37 (Yap 2006).

When a plaintiff suing for wrongful discharge has introduced no evidence of his efforts to mitigate his damages by attempting to secure a job during his periods of unemployment, the plaintiff is precluded from recovery of damages for these periods. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 437 (Yap 2006).

PUBLIC UTILITIES

Only the PUC Board of Directors can terminate PUC's general manager. The Governor has no such power under any circumstance. If the PUC Board lacks a quorum, the Governor's power extends only to nominating new Board members who, if confirmed, would allow the Board to have a quorum and thus to transact business. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 438 (Pon. 2012).

The Pohnpei Governor has neither the power nor the authority to exercise any of the powers vested exclusively in the PUC Board. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 438 (Pon. 2012).

Pohnpei Utility Corporation is not part of the executive branch of the Pohnpei state government or part of either of the other two branches. It is an independent agency not subject to or under any of the three branches of government. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 440 (Pon. 2012).

By Chuuk state law, a public utility may enter on any private land to dig out and replace or redistribute at the landowner's instruction earth or soil for the maintenance of any pipe or line, but the landowner's instruction is required only if the soil is to be redistributed. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 422 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

No trespass was committed when the public utility already had an easement over the pipes that it replaced on the plaintiff's land, and the law did not require instruction from the land owner since the soil that the utility dug up to replace the pipes was never redistributed – it was placed over the pipes again. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

No trespass was committed when the public utility placed primary utility poles to connect the general public in that area to electricity because the landowner's right to possessory interest remains subject to the public utility's right to use the soil above and below the land for public utility purposes. Thus, no interference with the land owner's possessory interest occurred. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

A public utility did not create a nuisance when it installed primary electric poles and replaced pipes because neither qualify as unreasonable conduct nor an abnormally dangerous activity. Public utilities often engage in the installation and replacement of utilities to provide the entire community with a higher standard of living. Neither create any realistic danger to the landowner or surrounding landowners and they provide benefits to the community. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423-24 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Chuuk Public Utilities Corporation is a semi-public entity where the governor of Chuuk appoints its board of directors; it is thus a government actor whose actions are subject to the mandates found within the Chuuk Constitution – including the declaration of rights clause. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Chuuk state law requires a public utility to consult with the land owner and announce entry before it works on public utilities – but provides no relief for failure to consult. Due process requires consultation with the landowner before installing a new structure on the land (or extending another easement through that land), but the replacement of existing pipes falls outside that due process requirement since that easement already existed. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The respect for real property, as implicitly recognized under the Chuuk Constitution, requires that if the real property owner is known, a public utility must consult with the landowner before creating a new easement over a land – in part to alleviate the landowner's concerns and to create a practical easement which limits the easement's effect on the owner. But consultation with the real landowner may sometimes be impossible; so when the real property owner is absent or unknown, a public utility company may broadcast two radio announcements about its intent to place a new structure on a particular parcel of land and invite any parties who might have an ownership claim to attend a consultation meeting. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 424 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

REMEDIES

Although retroactive application of a decision holding a state tax unconstitutional would impose hardship on a state where funds collected under the tax have already been committed, such a result is not inequitable where the state legislature pushed on with the tax act despite the strong resistance of business people to the tax in the form of petition and establishment of an escrow account to hold contested payments, and a veto message by the governor of the state, and there is no indication that the legislature seriously considered the constitutionality of the legislation. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 186 (App. 1986).

A promissory note executed by a governor, not authorized by law, and for which no appropriation of funds was made, and which failed to meet the requirements of the state financial management act is unenforceable against the state. Truk v. Maeda Constr. Co. (I), 3 FSM R. 485, 487 (Truk 1988).

A promissory note executed by the governor which is unenforceable against the state is not ratified although the legislature appropriated funds for a state debt committee which included the amount of the note, since the committee is not required to pay the promisee of the note, and since the promisee is not the allottee of the appropriation. Truk v. Maeda Constr. Co. (I), 3 FSM R. 485, 487 (Truk 1988).

Although the court is powerless to compel Chuuk State to honor its lease agreement it has full power to restore unlawfully held property to its rightful owner as a remedy for forcible entry and unlawful detainer. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 136-37 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Under Civil Rule 54(c) the court has full authority except in default judgments, to award the party granted judgment any relief to which it is entitled whether that party prayed for it or not. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where the court cannot compel the state to honor an illegal and/or unconstitutional lease it can order the state to restore the illegally held land, with any and all public improvements removed, to its rightful owner who may also be entitled to damages. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The equitable remedy of specific performance is one where the court orders a breaching party to do that which he has agreed to do, thereby rendering the non-breaching party the exact benefit which he expected. The remedy is available when money damages are inadequate compensation for the plaintiff – when damages cannot be computed or when a substitute cannot be purchased. Ponape Constr. Co. v. Pohnpei, 6 FSM R. 114, 126 (Pon. 1993).

Where entitlement to customary relief has been proven and the means to execute such a remedy are within the trial court's authority and discretion, the trial court should as a matter of equity and constitutional duty grant the relief. Wito Clan v. United Church of Christ, 6 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1993).

Where a remedy exists, the FSM Supreme Court has general power under the Judiciary Act of 1979 to effect that remedy. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 433, 435 (Pon. 2001).

It is an elemental canon of statutory construction that where a statute expressly provides a particular remedy or remedies, a court must be chary of reading others into it. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 122 (Pon. 2003).

There is no property right that is recognized by the law of the FSM as "damages." Damages is a legal term of art that refers generally to a remedy which may be granted by the court to a party in a civil action. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2009).

Injunctive relief is a remedy available in proper cases. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 486 (Pon. 2009).

A court cannot order as relief a de facto practice that is actually contrary to law, even if it has been the usual practice. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 176, 179 (Pon. 2010).

An improper sale by a fiduciary (estate administrator) that has already taken place can be vacated, but not if the buyer was a bona-fide purchaser because, when property of an estate has been transferred to a bona-fide purchaser for value, the latter is protected even if the fiduciary was acting improperly. The beneficiaries' remedy is not to void the transaction but to seek damages for the personal representative's breach of his fiduciary duty. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 22 (Chk. 2013).

Someone who has wrongfully sold property to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice can be compelled to buy a replacement if this is reasonably possible. Sometimes damages are the only appropriate remedy. Either way, the rightful heir's remedy is against estate administrator. If it were any other way, then anyone who ever bought property after it had been inherited and distributed by a Pohnpei probate court final order could never be certain that his or her title would not be taken away by a future final probate court order that the distributee seller was not the proper distributee. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 16, 23 (Chk. 2013).

A wrongfully discharged employee is entitled to the equitable remedy of reinstatement to his former position. Reinstatement is appropriate even if the position has been filled by another employee since, if a replacement's existence constituted a complete defense against reinstatement, then reinstatement could be effectively blocked in every case simply by immediately hiring an innocent third-party after the unlawful discharge has occurred, thus rendering the reinstatement remedy's deterrent effect a nullity. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 392 (Pon. 2014).

Since the plaintiff formed a series of valid and enforceable contracts with the defendant, the plaintiff cannot find relief in equity. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2014).

Under a trespass cause of action, the trespasser is liable for his intentional failure to remove from the land a thing he has a duty to remove. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 78 (Pon. 2015).

When no valid contract exists between the parties because of a lack of definite terms, a party may recover for the benefit conferred upon another pursuant to other legal remedies under the law of contracts. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

When the plaintiffs' basic claim is that the state defendants deprived them of their property (the land on which an embassy sits) without just compensation, they would have a viable remedy of monetary damages assessed against the Pohnpei state defendants if they prove that claim, but no remedy against the embassy since it is immune. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 462 (Pon. 2018).

– Election of Remedies

Under the doctrine of election of remedies, a plaintiff cannot pursue two or more remedies which are inconsistent with each other, i.e. the assertion of one remedy directly contradicts or repudiates the other. The test is whether the assertion of one remedy involves the negation or repudiation of the other at a time when full knowledge of the facts would indicate a choice between the forms of redress. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (II), 6 FSM R. 180, 183 (Pon. 1993).

Election of remedies as a bar to a plaintiff's action does not apply in a case where plaintiff had no knowledge or reason to know of fraud affecting his choice of action or where his original choice was based unknowingly on false information. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (II), 6 FSM R. 180, 184 (Pon. 1993).

– Quantum Meruit

In an action by a party who performed work for the benefit of the state and who seeks quantum meruit relief because no valid obligation of state funds existed, that relief by summary judgment cannot be granted when the party's own authorities show that the party must overcome the presumption of knowledge of the requirements of government contracting to demonstrate good faith, and no evidence on this issue was included in the motion for summary judgment, even though the work done and the charges made were reasonable, and even though there was no evidence of bad faith, collusion or fraud. Truk v. Maeda Constr. Co. (II), 3 FSM R. 487, 489 (Truk 1988).

A party completing projects is not entitled to quantum meruit recovery against the state when the contracts were done at the instance of the governor who had no authority to obligate the funds of the state, when the contracts did not purport to obligate the funds of the state, in which the governor promised to use his best efforts to find funds to pay for work performed, when the party accepted the risk that the governor might not be able to find funds, and when the governor promised payment when and if funds were available, even though the work performed was satisfactory, the charges were reasonable, and the work benefitted the state. Truk v. Maeda Constr. Co. (III), 3 FSM R. 489, 493-94 (Truk 1988).

The amount of compensation a public employee receives is not based on quasi-contract doctrines such as quantum meruit or unjust enrichment, but instead is set by law, even if the actual value of the services rendered by a public officer is greater than the compensation set by law. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 192 (Pon. 1990).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies where there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or another reason and requires a party to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 392 (Pon. 1994).

A claim for unjust enrichment will not lie where a party's efforts to reclaim the family's land were necessary in order for him to preserve any claim he personally had to that land and there is no evidence that he expended additional efforts or expense for the rest of the family beyond what he had to do to protect his own interests. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 392 (Pon. 1994).

Quantum meruit is an equitable doctrine, based upon the concept that no one who benefits by the labor and materials of another should be unjustly enriched thereby. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

The essential elements of recovery under quantum meruit include: 1) valuable services rendered or materials furnished; 2) to a person sought to be charged; 3) which services or material were used and enjoyed by the person sought to be charged; and 4) under such circumstances as reasonably notified the person sought to be charged that the person performing the services expected payment. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

As a matter of law, the presence of an express written contract, which clearly sets forth the obligations of the parties, precludes a party from bringing a claim under quantum meruit. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

The settled rule that the statute of limitations begins to run upon the accrual of a cause of action applies in actions on implied and quasi contracts. When compensation for services is to be made on a certain date, the statute of limitations on an implied or quasi contract begins to run at that time. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 559 (Pon. 2000).

Quantum meruit is an equitable doctrine, based on the concept that no one who benefits by the labor and materials of another should be unjustly enriched thereby; under those circumstances, the law implies a promise to pay a reasonable amount for the labor and materials furnished, even absent a specific contract therefor. The doctrine of unjust enrichment has been recognized in the FSM. Adams v. Island Homes

Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 232 (Pon. 2002).

A motion to amend a complaint to add an unjust enrichment claim will be denied when it is based upon a defendant's failure to abide by the alleged agreements' terms because these are express agreements, and unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 232 (Pon. 2002).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment only applies where there is no enforceable contract; the doctrine of restitution may not be applied where there is a contract; and the doctrines of implied contract and quantum meruit do not apply where there is an enforceable written contract. Esau v. Malem Mun. Gov't, 12 FSM R. 433, 436 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

If a defendant had had capabilities and resources equal to the transaction it undertook – then when it did not perform its contract, the plaintiff may well have had an adequate remedy in suing it on its contract to supply outboard motors, but when it was never a viable business entity, but a shell enterprise the purpose of which was to funnel the money to the other defendant, under all the case's facts and circumstances, the plaintiff should be permitted to "follow the money." Precluding the plaintiff from doing so would result in the other defendant's unjust enrichment at the plaintiff's expense. Ponape Island Transp. Co. v. Fonoton Municipality, 13 FSM R. 510, 516 (App. 2005).

Quantum meruit, or unjust enrichment, is the equitable doctrine that in the absence of an enforceable contract, someone who receives something from another at the expense of the one conferring the benefit should either pay for it or return it. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 651 (Pon. 2008).

Unjust enrichment relates to the doctrine of implied contracts, which is to say that the court will, in the absence of a legally enforceable contract, imply a contract in law in the absence of a contract in fact in order to avoid unjust enrichment. Neither the concept of unjust enrichment or the closely associated idea of an implied contract apply where there is an enforceable written contract, since an express contract and implied contract for the same thing cannot govern a legal relationship at the same time. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 651-52 (Pon. 2008).

The elements of a cause of action for quantum meruit are that 1) valuable goods or services are provided 2) to someone against whom recovery is sought 3) when the goods or services are enjoyed or used by the one against whom recovery is sought 4) under such circumstances that notified the person that the one performing the services or providing the goods expected payment. The fact that Chuuk did not know that its insurance broker had paid the premiums relates to the quantum meruit claim's fourth element, which is whether the benefit conferred by the in-force policies was enjoyed by Chuuk under circumstances such that Chuuk knew that the insurance broker expected payment. Since it is beyond question that Chuuk knew that the broker expected payment because Chuuk acknowledged in writing that the premiums were owed, the notice requirement to Chuuk is met by Chuuk's express acknowledgment that it owed the premiums pursuant to its enforceable contract with the broker. Accordingly, Chuuk's contention that it is not liable because it did not know that the broker had advanced the premiums on its behalf is without merit. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 654 (Pon. 2008).

As the vessels' owner, and as a named insured under the policies along with the four states, the FSM received a benefit as a result of the fleet insurance coverage, but in order to establish a claim for quantum meruit, the insurance broker must demonstrate that the FSM was unjustly enriched by the benefit of the broker paying the premium for Chuuk. But the agreement between Chuuk and the FSM was that FSM would permit Chuuk to use vessels that the FSM owned and Chuuk, in return, would pay for insurance coverage for those vessels; so by advancing the insurance premium, the broker met Chuuk's obligation to the FSM in this regard. The primary benefit conferred by the insurance premium payments went to Chuuk, and not to the FSM, since Chuuk was also an insured along with the FSM under the policies and it was Chuuk's, not the FSM's, obligation to provide coverage for the vessels. To suggest that when Chuuk failed to meet its obligation to the FSM to insure the vessels, the FSM became liable for the premiums on the vessels is to lose sight of the fact that the vessels were being operated by Chuuk and for Chuuk's benefit on the condition that Chuuk provide the insurance. The broker's remedy for the premium nonpayment is against Chuuk, who breached its agreement with the FSM by failing to pay for the premiums. The broker's remedy does not extend to the FSM. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 642, 655 (Pon. 2008).

6 F.S.M.C. 702(3) waives the FSM's sovereign immunity only for claims, whether liquidated or unliquidated, upon an express or implied contract with the FSM. But, although the equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment operates in the absence of an enforceable contract when a party has received something of value and neither paid for it or returned it, unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. Thus, depending upon the facts of a case, 6 F.S.M.C. 702(3) does not bar an unjust enrichment claim since it does waive the FSM's sovereign immunity for implied (as well as express) contract claims. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 2009).

If there was a valid contact, a court cannot use an implied contract and an unjust enrichment analysis because the doctrines of unjust enrichment and implied contract do not apply when there is a valid, enforceable written contract. The unjust enrichment doctrine applies only when there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or other reason and is based on the idea one person should not be permitted to unjustly enrich himself at another's expense. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

Unjust enrichment is an equitable doctrine that relates to the doctrine of implied contracts in that the court will, in the absence of a legally enforceable contract, imply a contract in law in the absence of a contract in fact in order to avoid unjust enrichment. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

When the trial court concluded that Kosrae was liable because there was an implied contract and because Kosrae was unjustly enriched, it must necessarily have also concluded that there was no valid enforceable contract since if there were an express contract, the implied contract and unjust enrichment doctrines would not apply. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 514 (App. 2013).

When the appellees did not officiously thrust their services as vice-principals on Kosrae but had applied for the vice-principal position; thought they had been hired for the position (and did not know their contracts were invalid); and then performed the duties required by that position and as they were instructed by their superiors, Kosrae was unjustly enriched and therefore should compensate the appellees. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 515 (App. 2013).

As a matter of law, the presence of an express written contract, which clearly sets forth the parties' obligations, precludes a party from bringing a claim under quantum meruit. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 12 (Pon. 2013).

When there are two express written contracts in which the parties' obligations are clearly set out: 1) the salvage contract between the vessel owner and the salvor and 2) the contract between insurer and the salvor that the insurer would pay the salvor the amounts due under the salvage contract on the presentation of an invoice and when there are additional, probably oral contracts for the $26,607.50 preparation work the salvor agreed to do that was outside the salvage contract's scope of work, the defendants are, with the exception of the $26,607.50 preparation work, entitled to summary judgment on the salvor's quantum meruit claims. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 12 (Pon. 2013).

As a matter of law, the presence of an express written contract, which clearly sets forth the parties' obligations, precludes a party from bringing a claim in equity under quantum meruit. Smith v. Nimea, 19 FSM R. 163, 172 (App. 2013).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to fashion a remedy under the restitution doctrine. The unjust enrichment doctrine also applies when there is an unenforceable contract. It is based upon the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at another's expense. The generally accepted elements of an unjust enrichment cause of action are: 1) the plaintiff conferred a benefit on the defendant, who has knowledge of the benefit, 2) the defendant accepted and retained the conferred benefit, and 3) under the circumstances it would be inequitable for the defendant to retain the benefit without paying for it. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

The "unjust enrichment" doctrine generally refers to the situation where someone takes part performance under contract that is void for impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or some other reason. The, even though there is no enforceable contract, the doctrine requires the individual to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. 2018).

To maintain an action for unjust enrichment or for money had and received or for restitution, the recipient of the money had and received must be shown to be unjustly enriched. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. 2018).

When there is no proof of a contract or part performance based on impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or some other reason, an unjust enrichment or restitution claim is without merit. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. 2018).

– Restitution

Where no contract existed for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Jim v. Alik, 4 FSM R. 198, 200 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received by a party to the party who gave them where the court can find no contract. Jim v. Alik, 4 FSM R. 198, 201 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment has been expanded to cover cases where there is an implied contract, but a benefit officiously thrust upon one is not considered an unjust enrichment and restitution is denied in such cases. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 392 (Pon. 1994).

The purpose of the remedy of restitution is not to compensate the non-breaching party for reliance expenditures, but rather to prevent unjust enrichment of the breaching parties by forcing them to give up what they have received under the contract. Therefore defendants who breached an enforceable option agreement must return the $12,500 consideration, not because it is a loss attributable to the breach, but because the defendants would be unjustly enriched if they were allowed to keep the consideration after failing to live up to their end of the option agreement. Kihara Real Estate, Inc. v. Estate of Nanpei (III), 6 FSM R. 502, 507 (Pon. 1994).

As a general rule, where money is paid under a mistake of fact, and payment would not have been made had the facts been known to the payor, such money may be recovered even though the person to whom the money was paid under a mistake of fact was not guilty of deceit or unfairness, and acted in good faith, nor does the payor's negligence preclude recovery. The fact that money paid by mistake has been spent by the payee is generally insufficient to bar restitution to the payor. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

Restitution is a quasi-contract action based on a tort that is an alternative remedy to a tort action for damages. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

Refund of taxes paid pursuant to an unconstitutional ordinance is an action for restitution, not damages. The principles governing recovery of payment which preclude recovery of voluntary payments are applicable to the recovery of tax payments. The "voluntary payment rule" has barred recovery in restitution. The general rule is that money paid voluntarily under a claim of right to the payment, and with knowledge of the facts by the person making the payment, cannot be recovered back on the ground that the claim was illegal. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 125 (Chk. 1997).

The reason the voluntary payment rule bars recovery in restitution of unlawful taxes is that litigation should precede payment. It thus does not apply to payments made after the commencement of litigation because the rule ceases with the reason on which it is founded. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 125-26 (Chk. 1997).

A person who has discharged more than his proportionate share of a duty owed by himself and another, as to which neither had a prior duty of performance, and who is entitled to contribution from the other is entitled to reimbursement, limited to the proportionate amount of his net outlay properly expended. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 495 (Pon. 1998).

Contribution is an equitable doctrine based on principles of fundamental justice. When any burden ought, from the relationship of the parties to be equally borne and each party is in aequali jure, contribution is due if one has been compelled to pay more than his share. The right to contribution is not dependent on contract, joint action, or original relationship between the parties; it is based on principles of fundamental justice and equity. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 495 (Pon. 1998).

The right to sue for contribution does not depend upon a prior determination that the defendants are liable. Whether they are liable is the matter to be decided in the suit. To recover a plaintiff must prove both that there was common burden of debt and that he has, as between himself and the defendant, paid more than his fair share of the common obligations. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 496 (Pon. 1998).

In a civil case where defendants seeks to advance Pohnpeian customary practice as a defense to a claim of equitable contribution, the burden is on the defendants to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the relevant custom and tradition. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 497 (Pon. 1998).

Allowing a contribution claim between parties who are relatives, and who are equally liable under a duly promulgated regulation for a corporation's debts, is consistent with the customary principle that relatives should assist one another. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

A contention that custom and tradition as a procedural device may prevent an equitable claim for contribution based on violation of a regulation governing the formation of corporations is an insufficient defense as a matter of law. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 499 (Pon. 1998).

The date of accrual for a contribution cause of action is the day the judgment was entered. Obviously a prerequisite to any successful contribution action based on a judgment is the judgment itself. The limitations period for a contribution action is six years. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 500-01 (Pon. 1998).

In the case of indemnity the defendant is liable for the whole damage springing from contract, while in contribution the defendant is chargeable only with a ratable proportion founded not on contract but upon equitable factors measured by equality of burden. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 505 (Pon. 1998).

A party jointly and severally liable for a corporation's debts is not liable for contribution for a subsidiary's debt paid by a guarantor when the corporation was not a coguarantor of the subsidiary's loan. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 506 (Pon. 1998).

Equity does not dictate that a setoff for the amount of a defendant's stock subscription be allowed against a contribution claim when the person claiming the setoff received by far the greatest benefit from the failed corporation while it was operating. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 507 (Pon. 1998).

When C.P.A. Reg. 2.7 imposes the same degree of liability on all incorporators, and the parties' plan from the beginning was to share profits equally, balancing the equities favors a three-way, equal split of the debt burden on a contribution claim. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 507-08 (Pon. 1998).

A person who has discharged more than his proportionate share of a duty owed by himself and another and who is entitled to contribution from the other is entitled to reimbursement limited to the proportionate amount of his net outlay properly expended. When incurred interest expense is part of his net outlay properly expended, the other should contribute toward the interest expense. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 508 (Pon. 1998).

Where no contract existed, a court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies where there is an unenforceable contract. It requires a party to either return what has been received or pay the other party for it. The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received by a party to the party who gave them where the court can find no contract. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Evidence that, sometime before defendant's marriage, the plaintiff did have some limited intimate contact on one occasion with the woman who later became the defendant's wife, does not serve as a defense to the plaintiff's claim of unjust enrichment and to recover restitution for the defendant's stopping construction of the plaintiff's house. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in contract and quasi-contract cases involving equitable doctrines, such as promissory estoppel and restitution. The plaintiff may be compensated for the injuries by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the promise. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Claimed expenditures for food and beverages will not be awarded when the purchase and consumption of these items was not dependent upon the defendant's promise, and labor costs will not be allowed as damages when there was no evidence presented at trial that the plaintiff paid any person a specific sum for labor. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Pre-judgment interest is not appropriate and a claim for it will be denied when there was no agreement involving a promise to pay money, when the plaintiff was not deprived of funds that he was entitled to because there was no contract made between the parties to pay money, and when the plaintiff was awarded damages based upon the equitable doctrine of promissory estoppel for the plaintiff's expenditures made in reliance on a promise. Kilafwakun v. Kilafwakun, 10 FSM R. 189, 197 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Where no contract existed for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 554 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The court has wide discretion in the award of damages in restitution cases to achieve fairness. Once a claimant's entitlement to damages is established, the amount of damages is an issue for the finder of fact. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 555 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the plaintiff has already paid the full amount of costs for which both the plaintiff and defendant are equally responsible, the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for half of those costs. Youngstrom v. Mongkeya, 11 FSM R. 550, 555 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the parties have failed to make an enforceable contract due to the lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to grant a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received to the party who gave those benefits. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 11 FSM R. 644, 648 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Restitution is a doctrine by which the court returns the benefits received by one party. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 11 FSM R. 644, 648 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When the plaintiff is entitled to restitution for the value of landfill hauled from his property, he will be paid at the market value per cubic yard. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 11 FSM R. 644, 648 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at another's expense. The generally accepted elements of an unjust enrichment cause of action are: 1) the plaintiff conferred a benefit on the defendant, who has knowledge of the benefit, 2) the defendant accepted and retained the conferred benefit, and 3) under the circumstances it would be inequitable for the defendant to retain the benefit without paying for it. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 345 (Pon. 2004).

Unjust enrichment is an equitable remedy, and generally requires that the party who accepted and retained a benefit pay that benefit back to the party who conferred it. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 346 (Pon. 2004).

While the doctrine of unjust enrichment has not been explicitly discussed or adopted, Pohnpei state law and Micronesian custom and tradition dictate that a party who has benefitted unjustly from another should, under certain circumstances, be made to repay that benefit. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 346 (Pon. 2004).

There is no impediment to a plaintiff recovering for unjust enrichment, when the plaintiff has proven that one or more defendant knowingly accepted a benefit from the plaintiff and was unjustly enriched at plaintiff's expense. The plaintiff was undoubtedly wronged when it paid $54,000 for 27 outboard motors, and only received 13 of the motors, and since the defendants received this money and converted it to other purposes, it would be unjust to permit them to retain that benefit. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 346 (Pon. 2004).

Even though there is evidence of a contract between the plaintiff and a defendant, the equitable remedy of unjust enrichment will be applied to permit the plaintiff to recover from another defendant, when it is apparent that the first defendant was created only to circumvent second's obligations under its distributorship agreement and the second defendant ultimately was the party that received the bulk of the money. It would be unjust indeed to permit it to retain a benefit it received, merely because it received the benefit through a shell company that was created merely so that the plaintiff's check could be cashed and the money paid over to it. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 346 (Pon. 2004).

When individuals were unjustly enriched by the plaintiff in the amount of $3,500, and the plaintiff elected to sue on an equitable claim of unjust enrichment, rather than for breach of contract, and when, by their own testimony, the individuals personally made money on the transaction, and the plaintiff received only one-half of the motors it purchased, it would be inappropriate to not hold the defendants responsible, as individuals and as the company's principals, for their dealings with the plaintiff which damaged the plaintiff. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 346-47 (Pon. 2004).

When a defendant admitted that it had been "paid in full" for the 27 outboard motors the plaintiff purchased, but it only delivered 13 of the motors, the defendant has been unjustly enriched in the amount the plaintiff paid for 14 of the 27 motors, minus the amount that was converted by others. Fonoton Municipality v. Ponape Island Transp. Co., 12 FSM R. 337, 347 (Pon. 2004).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment only applies where there is no enforceable contract; the doctrine of restitution may not be applied where there is a contract; and the doctrines of implied contract and quantum meruit do not apply where there is an enforceable written contract. Esau v. Malem Mun. Gov't, 12 FSM R. 433, 436 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies where there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or another reason and requires a party to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 130 (Chk. 2005).

The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at another's expense and this doctrine has been expanded to cover cases where there is an implied contract. The generally accepted elements of an unjust enrichment cause of action are: 1) the plaintiff conferred a benefit on the defendant, who has knowledge of the benefit, 2) the defendant accepted and retained the conferred benefit, and 3) under the circumstances it would be inequitable for the defendant to retain the benefit without paying for it. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 130 (Chk. 2005).

The classic situation to which the unjust enrichment doctrine is applied is where there is an unenforceable contract due to impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or another reason and the doctrine requires a party to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 130 (Chk. 2005).

There was no classic unjust enrichment situation when there was no contract, unenforceable or otherwise, between the plaintiff and the bank and no implied contract between the two and when the plaintiff did not confer a benefit on the bank that the bank had knowledge of, accepted and retained, because not only was there no contract between the plaintiff and the bank, but also because the plaintiff had no contact with the bank at all and was not in privity with the bank. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 130 (Chk. 2005).

When a borrower did not pay the money to the bank under the mistaken belief that it owed the bank money because it actually did owe the bank money and when it did not mistakenly pay to the bank money that it owed to another, the money was not paid to the bank by mistake as that term is used in unjust enrichment cases – often referred to as an action for money had and received. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 130 (Chk. 2005).

There is a certain limited instance where a plaintiff may recover under an unjust enrichment theory from a third party with which he has had no contact, either directly or through its agents. The requisite "privity" does exist between a plaintiff and such a defendant when that defendant has received money from another fraudulently obtained by the latter only when the recipient was aware of the fraud. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 130-31 (Chk. 2005).

Money received in the regular course of business from one who fraudulently or feloniously obtained it from another may not be recovered by the true owner from the recipient, even though the latter received it in payment of an antecedent debt and parted with no new consideration for the same, if he had no knowledge of the fraud or of the felony. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 131 (Chk. 2005).

A defendant bank, having received money from a debtor to it in the regular course of business to pay an antecedent debt which the debtor unquestionably owed to it and having no reason to believe or knowledge that the money might have been fraudulently obtained, is not liable to pay restitution to the plaintiff under the unjust enrichment doctrine. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 131 (Chk. 2005).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Restitution is the proper remedy when no enforceable contract exists. It requires the benefitted party to return what was received or to pay the other party for it. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 139, 143 (App. 2005).

When the Plaintiff seeks as a component of restitution, ground rent for his quarry and argues that ground rent is "normally compensated in similar contracts," but did not present any evidence during the June 2003 trial nor at the April 14, 2005 hearing in support of his claim for ground rent and did not offer any "similar contracts" to establish that ground rent is "normally compensated" for the use of land for a quarry, the plaintiff's request for restitution for ground rent must be denied. Livaie v. Weilbacher, 13 FSM R. 206, 208 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution and where no contract exists for lack of an agreed sale price, restitution is applicable. The doctrine of unjust enrichment generally applies when there is an unenforceable contract. It is based on the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 85 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the defendant took the cement mixer in April 2001 and has maintained continuous possession and use for nearly five years without any payment to the plaintiff, the defendant has unjustly enriched himself through continued possession and use of the cement mixer, especially in his construction business, which has generated income for defendant. The defendant is thus liable to the plaintiff for restitution of the cement mixer's value. DJ Store v. Joe, 14 FSM R. 83, 85-86 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. The doctrine of unjust enrichment also applies where there is an unenforceable contract. It is based upon the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Heirs of Nena v. Sigrah, 14 FSM R. 283, 285 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the defendant's expenses are equivalent to the defendant's rental income, the defendant has not been unjustly enriched and is therefore not liable to the plaintiffs under the doctrines of restitution and unjust enrichment. Heirs of Nena v. Sigrah, 14 FSM R. 283, 286 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When the parties have failed to make an enforceable contract due to the lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to grant a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. Restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received to the party who gave those benefits. Once a claimant's entitlement to damages is established, the amount of damages is an issue of fact for the finder of fact. The trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in quasi-contract and contract cases involving equitable doctrines, such as restitution. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 531 (Chk. 2007).

When a plaintiff makes a claim for damages, he has a duty to mitigate those damages, which means that a plaintiff who has taken reasonable steps to minimize the amount of his damages may recover the amount of those expenses. A court will not compensate an injured party for a loss that he could have avoided by making appropriate efforts, in the eyes of the court, to the circumstances. Under the general principle of mitigation of damages, a plaintiff is not encouraged to maximize his recovery by siting on his rights. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 531 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendant is responsible for returning a cement mixer to the plaintiffs in a similar condition as when he took it, but it would be too difficult to have the cement mixer fixed, the court must look at an alternative and award the plaintiffs an amount for the replacement of their used cement mixer. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 531 (Chk. 2007).

When there is no enforceable contract, a court may use its inherent equity power to fashion a remedy under doctrines such as unjust enrichment or detrimental reliance. The doctrine of unjust enrichment is based on the idea that one person should not be unjustly enriched at the expense of another. It usually applies when a party has partly performed under a contract that is later void for mistake, fraud, illegality, impossibility, or some other reason, or where there is an implied contract. Generally, the person must either return what has been received under the contract or pay for it. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 195 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the plaintiff performed his part of the agreement by providing goods and cash to the a defendant believing the boundary of his land would be extended and he timely filed a subdivision request with the Land Commission and completed building a house on the land, in expectation of receiving title; when the defendant accepted the goods and cash and another defendant received title to the land from that defendant and others, including the portion the plaintiff was to receive; and when the other defendant accepted title to both parcels, but knew that the plaintiff was entitled to a portion of the land and had requested the subdivision, applying the doctrine of unjust enrichment, the other defendant has been unjustly enriched at the plaintiff's expense. To end the other defendant's unjust enrichment, the remedy is to issue title to the plaintiff for the portion of the land he was to receive in 1987 and leave title to the remaining land with the other defendant. An application of the doctrine of detrimental reliance affords the same remedy. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the court concludes that there was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, it will do not address the plaintiff's alternative claims under unjust enrichment and promissory estoppel. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 273 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the court concludes that there was a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, it will do not address the plaintiff's alternative claims under unjust enrichment and promissory estoppel. George v. Albert, 15 FSM R. 323, 326 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

An unjust enrichment or restitution claim cannot be maintained until money has been paid to or received by the person alleged to be unjustly enriched or has been paid in error to someone who should not retain it. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 6 (Pon. 2011).

A plaintiff seeking to maintain an action for unjust enrichment as the result of having paid money on a judgment must first have that judgment vacated or reversed before that plaintiff can pursue an unjust enrichment or restitution claim. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 2011).

If, when a judgment that a party has paid is reversed on appeal or otherwise set aside, that party then has a restitution or unjust enrichment cause of action, then it follows that when a judgment has been affirmed on appeal and not otherwise set aside, that party does not have cause of action for restitution or unjust enrichment for sums paid on the judgment. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 2011).

If a plaintiff has not had the judgment set aside or reversed, then the plaintiff's unjust enrichment claim fails to state a claim on which relief can be granted since the plaintiff cannot allege that it would be inequitable for the defendant to retain the benefit without paying for it because the plaintiff cannot truthfully allege that the judgment has been set aside. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 2011).

To maintain an action for unjust enrichment or for money had and received or for restitution, the recipient of the money had and received must be shown to be unjustly enriched. Unless and until a judgment on which the plaintiffs have paid the money is vacated or reversed that is something the plaintiffs are manifestly unable to do. They thus fail to state a claim for unjust enrichment or restitution when the judgment has not been set aside and remains valid and enforceable. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 2011).

Plaintiffs who did not make any payments of their own cannot seek the restitution of any funds or allege unjust enrichment since they have not paid any funds. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 7-8 (Pon. 2011).

A constructive trust is a remedy for an unjust enrichment or restitution cause of action and when the plaintiffs fail to state a claim for unjust enrichment or restitution, there can be no basis to employ a constructive trust remedy. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 8 (Pon. 2011).

Although the plaintiffs' argument for restitution which asserts that an earlier judgment should not be enforced does not explicitly say so, the court must consider the case to be an independent action for relief from judgment joined with, and thus presuming success on the independent action for relief, an action for unjust enrichment and restitution with the necessary element of the prior judgment having been set aside to be accomplished in the same action. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 8 (Pon. 2011).

Some authorities indicate that after a judgment is reversed a timely demand for restitution of the judgment payment must first be made and that its refusal is a prerequisite for an unjust enrichment suit. This is sensible because the courts should not be burdened with an unjust enrichment lawsuit if the former judgment holder will return the payment after a demand for it. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 8 n.3 (Pon. 2011).

An unjust enrichment claim has not accrued (and may never accrue) when the prerequisite for the unjust enrichment claim – having an earlier judgment set aside – still has not occurred and may never occur. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2011).

A trial court has wide discretion in determining the amount of damages in contract and quasi-contract cases involving equitable doctrines, such as promissory estoppel and restitution and the plaintiff may be compensated for the injuries by awarding compensation for the expenditures made in reliance on the promise. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

When the equities involved include that the plaintiff falsely informed Chuuk that the marine insurance policy was not in effect when, in fact, it was in effect because the net premium had been paid to the insurer, promissory estoppel may instead be a better measure of the damages than implied contract or unjust enrichment. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

Lawyers are accustomed to seeing the word "restitution" in connection with the "rescission" or cancellation of a contract because when a contract is rescinded, each party is entitled to be restored what he gave the other, or in other words, is entitled to restitution. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Rescission will normally be accompanied by restitution on both sides. It is the general rule that rescission will be granted only on the condition that the party asking it restore to the other party, substantially, the consideration received. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When rescinding a contract, ordering substitutionary restitution is possible – the defendant can often be made to return the money value of the property he obtained because, on rescission, a plaintiff is entitled to the return of her property or to its value if its reconveyance cannot be had. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 385-86 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the defendant built family residences on part of the land and has occupied them at least since sometime in the early 1990s, requiring such longtime occupants to change residence and rebuild elsewhere and take compensation for the houses is burdensome. Equity would not favor giving the plaintiff the choice of paying the defendant for his houses instead of the defendant paying for the land. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

When the parties had agreed to a land exchange and the defendant has built houses on the land he received but the plaintiff did not receive any land because the defendant did not have the land to exchange, instead of returning the land to the plaintiff and having the plaintiff pay the defendant the value of the houses the defendant built the most equitable remedy (and the easiest for the court to fashion) is monetary compensation to the plaintiff for the value of the land that he did not receive in an exchange agreement that provided that he was to receive in exchange land of an equal amount to the land transferred to the defendants. To effectuate justice, the defendants should pay the plaintiff the value of the land the defendants received. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 386 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. The unjust enrichment doctrine covers cases where there is an implied contract. But if a benefit is officiously thrust upon another, it is not considered an unjust enrichment and restitution is denied in such cases. Kosrae v. Edwin, 18 FSM R. 507, 515 (App. 2013).

The equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment operates in the absence of an enforceable contract. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

Unjust enrichment relates to the doctrine of implied contracts, which is to say that in order to avoid unjust enrichment the court will, in the absence of a legally enforceable contract, imply a contract in law in the absence of a contract in fact. Neither the concept of unjust enrichment or the closely associated idea of an implied contract apply when there is an enforceable written contract, since an express contract and implied contract for the same thing cannot govern a legal relationship at the same time. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

The doctrine of unjust enrichment does not apply when there is a legally binding agreement in the form of life and cancer insurance policies that the parties agreed to and executed. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 2014).

Money withheld from wages for social security and income taxes does not count as restitution to the FSM of funds fraudulently converted from Compact sector grant money. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 461 (Chk. 2014).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to fashion a remedy under the restitution doctrine. The unjust enrichment doctrine also applies when there is an unenforceable contract. It is based upon the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

The unjust enrichment doctrine is based on the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at another's expense. The generally accepted elements of an unjust enrichment cause of action are: 1) the plaintiff conferred a benefit on the defendant, who has knowledge of the benefit, 2) the defendant accepted and retained the conferred benefit, and 3) under the circumstances it would be inequitable for the defendant to retain the benefit without paying for it. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

When the court can find no contract, restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received by a party to the party who gave them. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

When the parties have failed to make an enforceable contract due to the lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to grant a remedy under the restitution doctrine. Restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received to the party who gave those benefits. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 18 (Pon. 2016).

When a court finds a lack of an enforceable contract, and no evidence was submitted to support the plaintiff's request for interest, the plaintiff may not recover on a claim for 1.5% interest per month based on the parties' unenforceable agreement. Pohnpei Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Shoniber, 21 FSM R. 14, 19 (Pon. 2016).

When no contract exists for lack of definite terms, the court may use its equity power to fashion a remedy under the doctrine of restitution. The doctrine of unjust enrichment also applies where there is an unenforceable contract. It is based upon the idea that one person should not be permitted unjustly to enrich himself at the expense of another. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 191 (Pon. 2017).

When the court can find no contract, restitution is a remedy which returns the benefits already received by a party to the party who gave them. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 191 (Pon. 2017).

The unjust enrichment doctrine cannot be applied when there is an enforceable contract between the parties. Gallen v. Moylan's Ins. Underwriters (FSM) Inc., 21 FSM R. 380, 386 (App. 2017).

The "unjust enrichment" doctrine generally refers to the situation where someone takes part performance under contract that is void for impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or some other reason. The, even though there is no enforceable contract, the doctrine requires the individual to either return what has been received under the contract or pay the other party for it. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. 2018).

To maintain an action for unjust enrichment or for money had and received or for restitution, the recipient of the money had and received must be shown to be unjustly enriched. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. 2018).

When there is no proof of a contract or part performance based on impossibility, illegality, mistake, fraud, or some other reason, an unjust enrichment or restitution claim is without merit. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. 2018).

When the insureds received refunds through their employer, as what should occur only for group insurance policies, not individual insurance policies, and when the insurer instructed the employer to stop all employee payroll deductions for supplemental group life insurance, the insurer did not convert the insureds' money and was not unjustly enriched. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 257 (Pon. 2019).

When a debtor has paid a creditor's invoice that included usurious interest, the debtor is entitled to restitution of all the usurious interest "late fees" paid. Yoruw v. FSM Dep't of Educ., 22 FSM R. 596, 599 (Yap 2020).

Money paid under a mistake of fact may be recovered as restitution to the payor. Yoruw v. FSM Dep't of Educ., 22 FSM R. 596, 599 (Yap 2020).

SEARCH AND SEIZURE

The article IV, section 5 right to be secure against searches is not absolute. The Constitution only protects against unreasonable searches. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 82 (Pon. 1982).

No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded by the common law than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, free from all restraint or interference of others, unless by clear and unquestionable authority of law. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 86 (Pon. 1982).

The constitutional protection of the individual against unreasonable searches and limitation of powers of the police apply wherever an individual may harbor a reasonable expectation of privacy. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 86 (Pon. 1982).

Constitutional protection against unreasonable searches extends to the contents of closed containers within one's possession and to those items one carries on one's person. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 86 (Pon. 1982).

A citizen is entitled to protection of the privacy which he seeks to maintain even in a public place. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 86 (Pon. 1982).

The burden is on the government to justify a search without a warrant. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 87 (Pon. 1982).

The legality of a search must be tested on the basis of the information known to the police officer immediately before the search began. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 88 (Pon. 1982).

When investigating officers have reason to believe that somebody on private premises may have information pertaining to their investigation, they may enter those private premises, without a warrant or prior judicial authorization, to make reasonably nonintrusive efforts to determine if anybody is willing to discuss the substance of their investigations. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 288 (Pon. 1983).

It is generally agreed that for actions to constitute a search, there must be: 1) an examination of premises or a person; 2) in a manner encroaching upon one's reasonable expectation of privacy; 3) with an intention, or at least a hope, to discover contraband or evidence of guilt to be used in prosecution of a criminal action. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 298 (Pon. 1983).

Mere observation does not constitute a search. The term "search" implies exploratory investigation or quest. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 289 (Pon. 1983).

Police officers who in the performance of their duty enter upon private property without an intention to look for evidence but merely to ask preliminary questions of the occupants cannot be said to be conducting a search within the meaning of the Constitution. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 289 (Pon. 1983).

Wide ranging and unwarranted movement of police officers on private land may constitute an unreasonable invasion of privacy, or establish that the investigation had evolved into a search. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 290 (Pon. 1983).

The starting point and primary focus of legal analysis for a claim of unreasonable search and seizure should normally be the Constitution's Declaration of Rights, not the statutory "Bill of Rights." FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 455 (Kos. 1984).

The principal difference between FSM Constitution article IV, section 5 and 1 F.S.M.C. 103 is that the Constitution, in addition to prohibiting unreasonable searches and seizures also contains a prohibition against invasions of privacy. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 455 n.1 (Kos. 1984).

While the existence of probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that a particular person has committed it is not in itself sufficient to justify a warrantless search, the establishment of probable cause is nevertheless critical to any unconsented search. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 460-61 (Kos. 1984).

Without probable cause, no search warrant may be obtained and no unconsented search may be conducted. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 461 (Kos. 1984).

Constitutional prohibitions against unreasonable searches, seizures or invasions of privacy must be applied with full vigor when a dwelling place is the object of the search. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 461 (Kos. 1984).

Article IV, section 5 of the FSM Constitution, based upon the fourth amendment of the United States Constitution, permits reasonable, statutorily authorized inspections of a fishing vessel in FSM ports, under various theories upheld under the United States Constitution, when the vessel is reasonably suspected of having engaged in fishing activities. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 74 (Pon. 1985).

It is extraordinarily difficult for law enforcement authorities to police the vast waters of the Federated States of Micronesia. Yet, effective law enforcement to prevent fishing violations is crucial to the economic interests of this new nation. Accordingly, the historical doctrines applied under the United States Constitution which expand the right to search based upon border search, administrative inspection and exigent circumstances theories, appear suitable for application to fishing vessels within the Federated States of Micronesia. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 74 (Pon. 1985).

Searches and seizures both constitute a substantial intrusion upon the privacy of an individual whose person or property is affected, but a seizure often imposes more onerous burdens. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 1985).

A temporary seizure is itself a significant taking of property, depriving the owner of possession, an important attribute of property. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 1985).

While the power to seize a vessel is crucial to the interests of the Federated States of Micronesia and its states, there are also compelling factors demanding that seizures take place only where fully justified and that procedures be established and scrupulously followed to assure that the power to seize is not abused. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 75 (Pon. 1985).

It is normally required that a hearing be held prior to seizure of a property. In extraordinary situations a seizure may take place prior to hearing, but the owner must be afforded a prompt post-seizure hearing at which the person seizing the property must at least make a showing of probable cause. Unreasonable delay in providing a post-seizure hearing may require that an otherwise valid seizure be set aside. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

Where a seizure is for forfeiture rather than evidentiary purposes, the constitutional prohibitions against taking property without due process come into play. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

The general requirement under article IV, section 5 of the Constitution is that before a search or seizure may occur there must exist "probable cause," that is, a reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that a crime has been committed and that the item to be seized has been used in the crime. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

Any attempt to grant statutory authority to permit seizure of a fishing vessel upon a lesser standard than probable cause would raise serious questions of compatibility with article IV, sections 3 and 4 of the Constitution. Such an interpretation should be avoided unless clearly mandated by statute. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

Where defendants accompanied police officers, then defendants entered their homes and obtained the stolen goods and turned them over to the police, the question of whether there has been an unreasonable seizure in violation of article IV, section 5 of the Constitution turns on whether the defendants' actions were voluntary. FSM v. Jonathan, 2 FSM R. 189, 198-99 (Kos. 1986).

The prohibition in article II, section 1(d) of the Constitution of Kosrae against any unreasonable search and seizure is to assure the individual of his fundamental right to the possession of and control over his own person and property. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Because the Kosrae State Constitution does not provide an exact standard for determining whether a search is "reasonable," this court will first turn to the framers' intent. In the absence of an official journal of the First Constitutional Convention, this court will then look to FSM and U.S. judicial decisions interpreting the search and seizure provision in their respective constitutions. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Few rights are more important than the freedom from unreasonable governmental intrusion into a citizen's privacy and courts must protect this right from well-intentioned, but unauthorized, governmental action. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 44 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

An individual's home, even one located on public land, qualifies for constitutional protection against warrantless searches. FSM v. Rodriquez, 3 FSM R. 385, 386 (Pon. 1988).

The protection in article IV, section 5 of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia against unreasonable search and seizure is based upon the comparable provision in the fourth amendment of the United States Constitution. FSM v. Rodriquez, 3 FSM R. 385, 386 (Pon. 1988).

Although an individual acting without state authorization has constructed a sleeping hut and has planted crops on state-owned public land, state police officers may nevertheless enter the land without a search warrant to make reasonable inspections of it and may observe and seize illegally possessed plants in open view and plainly visible from outside the sleeping hut. FSM v. Rodriquez, 3 FSM R. 385, 386 (Pon. 1988).

When investigators, acting without a search warrant on advance information, conduct searches in privately owned areas beyond the immediate area of a dwelling house, and seize contraband, they do not thereby violate the prohibitions in article IV, section 5 of the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia against unreasonable search and seizure. FSM v. Rosario, 3 FSM R. 387, 388-89 (Pon. 1988).

The standard for engaging in a search of private property is less exacting than the standard required for seizing such property. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584, 588 n.4 (Pon. 1994).

For purposes of article IV, section 5 protection, a search is any governmental intrusion into an area where a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy. Thus, the constitutional protections do not attach unless the search or seizure can be attributed to governmental conduct and the defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the items searched. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 142 (Pon. 1995).

Administrative searches designed to aid in the collection of taxes rightly owing to the government must be conducted according to the same requirements laid down for other searches and seizures. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 142 (Pon. 1995).

An administrative agency may either request certain records be provided or formally subpoena the desired information, rather than obtain a court-ordered search warrant. In either situation, the subject of the inspection may decide whether to refuse or cooperate with the government's request. Only when a person refuses to permit the requested search does the Constitution prohibit the administrative agency from coercing that person to turn over records without first obtaining a valid search warrant. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 143 (Pon. 1995).

Where a person refuses to cooperate with the inspection requests of the administrative agency, the government will be required to demonstrate to a neutral and detached magistrate that the requested material is reasonable to the enforcement of the administrative agency's statutory responsibilities and that the inspection is being conducted pursuant to a general and neutral enforcement plan in order to obtain the required search warrant. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 143 (Pon. 1995).

Where a vessel has been arrested pursuant to a warrant, a post-seizure hearing is required by the constitutional guarantee of due process. FSM v. M.T. HL Achiever (II), 7 FSM R. 256, 257 (Chk. 1995).

An owner of seized property cannot challenge the statute it was seized under as unconstitutional because the statute fails to provide for notice and a hearing, if procedural due process, notice and a right to a hearing, are provided. FSM v. M.T. HL Achiever (II), 7 FSM R. 256, 258 (Chk. 1995).

The Chuuk Constitution protects persons from an unreasonable invasion of privacy. The right to privacy depends upon whether a person has a reasonable expectation that the thing, paper or place should remain free from governmental intrusion. A person's right to privacy is strongest when the government is acting in its law enforcement capacity. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

It is unreasonable for a public official, required by law to cooperate with legislative investigating committees, to have an expectation of privacy in matters that are linked to his performance in office, and it is unreasonable for a public official, such as the Governor, who is a trustee of the state's finances and who owes a fiduciary duty to the state to expect that his personal finances will be kept private if there is some reason to believe he has violated his trust. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 267 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Persons are secure in their persons, houses, and possessions against an unreasonable invasion of privacy. An invasion of privacy occurs when the government intrudes into any place where the individual harbors a reasonable expectation of privacy. A claim to privacy must be viewed in the specific context in which it arises. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 334 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

An person's expectation that his bank records will remain private is not reasonable because bank records are not the person's private papers, but are the bank's business records. This does not mean that such records are open to unrestrained production and inspection. For such records to be produced or inspected, the purpose of the intrusion must not be unreasonable. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 335 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Apprehension of a person suspected of committing a crime by use of deadly force is a seizure, but the shooting of a bystander, who is not a suspect, by the police is not. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 547 (Chk. 1996).

A person can only complain of an unlawful search or seizure if it is his own rights which have been violated, such as when the person had ownership or a possessory right to the place searched, or was the owner of the items seized. A person also has standing to challenge a search and seizure of items as illegal when possession is an element of the crime charged, or when the person is legitimately on the premises searched and fruits of the search are to be used against him. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (I), 7 FSM R. 550, 553 (Chk. 1996).

A vessel arrested pursuant to a warrant has, upon request, a right to a post-seizure hearing to contest the warrant and any deficiency in the arrest proceeding. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 556 (Chk. 1996).

The Due Process Clause does not require an immediate post-seizure probable cause hearing in advance of a civil forfeiture trial. It only requires that the government begin the forfeiture action within a reasonable time of the seizure. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 557 (Chk. 1996).

A civil forfeiture statute is not unconstitutional in failing to set out a requirement for a post-seizure hearing and a notice of that right nor is the government constitutionally required to inform the defendant of such notice and a right to a hearing. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 557 (Chk. 1996).

A court may suppress evidence obtained by an unlawful search and seizure. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 268 (Chk. 1998).

When a warrantless search or seizure is conducted the burden is on the government to justify the search or seizure, but when the search or seizure is conducted pursuant to a judicially-issued warrant the burden rests with the defendant to prove the illegality of the search or seizure. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 69 (Chk. 1999).

When no search or arrest warrant had been issued or sought and the defendant moves to suppress the evidence seized, although it is the defendant's suppression motion, it is the government's burden to prove that the searches were reasonable and therefore lawful under section 5 of article IV of the FSM Constitution. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 69 (Chk. 1999).

The border search doctrine is suitable for application to fishing vessels in the FSM. The principle should be the same for aircraft. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 n.2 (Chk. 1999).

All aircraft entering FSM ports of entry are subject to immigration inspection, customs inspections, agricultural inspections and quarantines, and other administrative inspections authorized by law. In Chuuk, the Chuuk International Airport is the only port of entry for aircraft. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 (Chk. 1999).

An agriculture quarantine inspector's duty is to enforce the provisions of plant and animal quarantine controls, quarantines, and regulations, the purpose of which is to protect the agricultural and general well-being of the people of the FSM from injurious insects, pests, and diseases. Goods entering or transported within the FSM can be inspected. Those goods known to be, or suspected of being, infected or infested with disease or pests may be refused entry into or movement within the FSM, and anything attempted to be brought into or transported within the FSM in contravention of the agricultural inspection scheme shall be seized and may be destroyed. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 (Chk. 1999).

Customs officers have the right to examine all goods subject to customs control, and it is unlawful to import into the FSM any goods whose use, possession or import is prohibited or contrary to restrictions imposed by the FSM or the state into which the goods are imported. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 (Chk. 1999).

Border searches and searches at the functional equivalent of a border are an exception to the warrant requirement of section 5 of the FSM Declaration of Rights. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70 (Chk. 1999).

Passing through security screening and boarding a foreign-registered airplane in Pohnpei that has arrived from a foreign country without it and its cargo having cleared customs in the FSM and whose passengers have not cleared immigration in the FSM, unless they deplaned, is passing out of and across a functional border of the FSM. The same passenger landing in Chuuk and entering the customs inspection area is crossing a functional equivalent of a border back into the FSM. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 70-71 (Chk. 1999).

Because entering the Chuuk International Airport customs inspection area after deplaning from a through flight is crossing the functional equivalent of a border a warrantless search there is reasonable under section 5 of the FSM Declaration of Rights. This analysis is consistent with the geographical configuration of Micronesia, with the statutory schemes of agricultural inspection, and customs inspection. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 71 (Chk. 1999).

An airport inspection of arriving passengers and their luggage does not violate an FSM citizen's right to travel within the FSM and the right to privacy. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 71 (Chk. 1999).

A search and seizure at the police station of an arrestee's possessions is not the unlawful fruit of the poisonous tree when the arrest was lawful. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

The protection in article IV, section 5 of the FSM Constitution against unreasonable search and seizure is based upon the comparable provision in the U.S. Constitution's fourth amendment. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 265 (Chk. 2001).

When no search or arrest warrant had been issued or sought and the defendant moves to suppress the evidence seized, although it is the defendant's suppression motion, it is the government's burden to prove that the searches were reasonable and therefore lawful under section 5 of article IV of the FSM Constitution. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 265 (Chk. 2001).

Once the police have a reasonable suspicion that a person may be armed and dangerous they may do a patdown search of or frisk that person for weapons in order to protect themselves and others from possible danger. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 266 (Chk. 2001).

When the police received the information from a known independent source that a person was carrying a handgun, the police not only had a reasonable suspicion that he was armed and carrying a handgun, they also had probable cause to believe that he was, and it was constitutionally permissible for the police to conduct a patdown search of or to frisk him for weapons. Such a warrantless search is reasonable. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 266 (Chk. 2001).

In order for a warrant or a criminal summons to issue, the affidavits, or affidavits and exhibits, attached to a criminal information should make a prima facie showing of probable cause, not proof beyond a reasonable doubt. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

The search and seizure provision of the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights is similar to and drawn from a provision in the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights, and when a provision of the FSM Declaration of Rights is patterned after a provision of the U.S. Constitution, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 434 (Chk. 2003).

Few rights are more important than the freedom from unreasonable governmental intrusion into a citizen's privacy. The FSM Supreme Court, mindful of these principles, must protect these rights from well-intentioned, but unauthorized, government action. In re FSM Nat'l Police Case No. NP 10-04-03, 12 FSM R. 248, 250 (Pon. 2003).

Article IV, section 5 of the FSM Constitution states that "[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and other possessions against unreasonable search, seizure or invasion of privacy may not be violated." For article IV, section 5 purposes, a search is any governmental intrusion into an area where a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy. In re FSM Nat'l Police Case No. NP 10-04-03, 12 FSM R. 248, 250 (Pon. 2003).

When an officer has made a warrantless arrest by relying upon a tip from an informant, the reviewing court will evaluate the tip based upon the totality of the circumstances, including the informant's truthfulness and reliability, and the basis of his or her knowledge. Deficiency in one prong may be compensated for by a strong showing of the other. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The remedy for a victim of an illegal search is not the self-help of resistance. Resistance to such authority to search and seize by self-help is not recognized in courts of law. Whoever suffers the imposition of an unlawful police search has the assurance that any evidence so acquired is rendered inadmissible in a subsequent criminal trial by the exclusionary rule. And in any event damage remedies are available in the courts for violations of constitutional rights stemming from either an unlawful search or arrest. These remedies are present in the FSM. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

When a criminal offense has been committed, and a policeman has reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested has committed it, such policeman may arrest the person without a warrant, but there may be one exception to this rule, however, and that is when a routine felony arrest takes place inside the suspect's home and there are no exigent circumstances (an emergency or a dangerous situation) to overcome the warrant requirement. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 496 n.4 (Pon. 2005).

The prohibition in Article II, Section 1(d) of the Kosrae State Constitution against any unreasonable search and seizure is to assure the individual of his fundamental right to the possession of and control over his own person and property. Kosrae v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 37, 40 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

It is generally agreed that for actions to constitute a search, there must be: 1) an examination of premises or a person; 2) in a manner encroaching upon one's reasonable expectation of privacy; 3) with an intention, or at least a hope, to discover contraband or evidence of guilt to be used in prosecution of a criminal action. Kosrae v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 37, 40 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The constitutional protection against unreasonable searches and limitation of powers of the police apply wherever an individual may harbor a reasonable expectation of privacy. The burden is on the government to justify a search without a warrant and the search's legality must be tested on the basis of the information known to the police officer immediately before the search began. Kosrae v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 37, 40 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When all warrants, monitoring orders, and subpoenas duces tecum were served or executed on either the Bank of Guam or the Bank of the Federated States of Micronesia, a defendant's motion to suppress those warrants, monitoring orders, and subpoenas duces tecum and any evidence seized pursuant to those search warrants as the fruits of illegal searches will be denied since the defendant lacks standing to challenge the searches of those bank records because he lacks an expectation of privacy therein. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

The protection in article IV, section 5 of the FSM Constitution against unreasonable search and seizure is based upon and drawn from the comparable provision in the U.S. Constitution's fourth amendment. The addition of the phrase "invasion of privacy" to the FSM version was not intended to expand the search and seizure protections in the FSM any further. It was intended to more adequately express its meaning. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

Evidence obtained as the result of violations of Title 12 is not admissible against an accused. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

The Declaration of Rights protects persons from acts of the governments, and those acting under them, established or recognized by the Constitution. The constitutional provision barring the invasion of a person's privacy only protects persons from governmental intrusion into their affairs, not from intrusions by private persons. FSM Dev. Bank v. Adams, 14 FSM R. 234, 247 (App. 2006).

For actions to constitute a search, there must be: 1) an examination of premises or a person; 2) in a manner encroaching upon one's reasonable expectation of privacy; and 3) with an intention, or at least a hope, to discover contraband or evidence of guilt to be used in prosecution of a criminal action. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 351 (Pon. 2007).

In order for a search to take place the police officers' intention to discover contraband or evidence is not enough. There also must be 1) an examination of premises or a person and 2) in a manner encroaching upon one's reasonable expectation of privacy. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 352 (Pon. 2007).

When the evidence before the court plainly shows that the officers did not conduct an examination of any premises or person but approached the funeral at a neighbor's house, asked for Louis, and Louis came out and then Louis directed the officers to his office in Palikir and upon arrival in Palikir, the police remained in the vehicle, while Louis went to his office and returned with the handgun. Under these facts, a search cannot be said to have taken place. It also cannot be said that the officers encroached upon Louis's reasonable expectation of privacy. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 352 (Pon. 2007).

Various arguments concerning a lack of probable cause, including the discrepancy in the dates cited for his arrest – either January 5, 2005, as cited in the accompanying affidavit, or January 6, 2005, as cited in the police reporter introduced as evidence during the hearing are simply misplaced at this point. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 463, 465-66 (Chk. 2008).

Where the court finds that an accused's statement was voluntarily made after he had been informed of, and understood his rights, and chose to waive those rights, that will not end the analysis if the accused has established a relationship between unlawful police activity and the evidence sought to be suppressed, because the burden is on the prosecution to show that the evidence is still admissible. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

When the defendant's advice of rights form waiving his rights was dated the day after his arrest and when the government presented no evidence as to the time of day on that the defendant made his statement on the day following his arrest or as to whether the statement was made within 24 hours of his arrest, the statement will be suppressed because once the defendant has established the government's unlawful act, it is the government's burden to show that the challenged evidence was not the result of that unlawful act. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 491, 493 (Chk. 2008).

When no search or arrest warrant had been issued or sought and the defendant moves to suppress the evidence seized, although it is the defendant's suppression motion, it is the government's burden to prove that the seizures were reasonable and therefore lawful under section 5 of article IV of the FSM Constitution. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 29 (Chk. 2008).

When a search or seizure is conducted without a warrant the burden is on the government to justify the search or seizure, but when the search or seizure is conducted pursuant to a judicially-issued warrant the burden rests with the defendant to prove the illegality of the search or seizure. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

A motion to suppress the evidence against an accused on the ground that the evidence was obtained as the result of "an arrest that was not in compliance with the law" is not sufficiently particular since it does not indicate the reason(s) why the accused asserts that the arrest was illegal. A suppression movant must articulate in his motion with sufficient particularity the specific reason on which he bases his claim that the seizure was illegal, and a written motion to suppress evidence must specify with particularity the grounds upon which the motion is based. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

Grounds for relief in broad and literal conclusory terms, such as a conclusory statement in an accused's suppression motion that his arrest was not in compliance with the law, are, without more, insufficient to raise a suppression question. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

A motion to suppress is, in effect, a pleading to the extent that it frames the issues to be determined in a pretrial hearing on the motion. The fundamental role of a pleading is to give an opposing party notice of the pleader's position concerning the facts and law so that the opposing party can begin to prepare his defense. A pleading thus both defines and limits the areas of consideration at a trial or other evidentiary hearing. Furthermore, the pleading assists the court in the conduct of the hearing. For example, by enabling the court to determine the relevance of the offered evidence. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 184 (Chk. 2008).

At least as much specificity should be required in a pretrial objection to the admissibility of evidence, i.e., a motion to suppress, as is required in an oral objection made during the course of a trial. In fact, even more specificity could reasonably be required because the pretrial objection can be researched and written under relatively calm circumstances, as distinguished from an extemporaneous objection made in the heat of trial. Broadly worded and vague objections are inappropriate in either context. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 185 (Chk. 2008).

When, after the accused had been questioned for some time without being informed of his rights, the accused went into his residence, retrieved a handgun and five shells, and came out and turned the gun and ammunition over to the officer, the firearm was not seized as the result of an illegal search because the police officer did not conduct a search of the residence or even enter it, but since the accused's surrender of the handgun and ammunition was the result of the officer's questioning and the incriminating statements made when the accused was interrogated without having been informed of his rights, the handgun and ammunition are thus inadmissible as they are the fruit of the poisonous tree. FSM v. Sippa, 16 FSM R. 247, 249 (Chk. 2009).

An individual's constitutional protection against unreasonable searches and the limitation of police powers apply wherever an individual may harbor a reasonable expectation of privacy. For actions to constitute a search, there must be: 1) an examination of premises or a person; 2) in a manner encroaching upon one's reasonable expectation of privacy; 3) with an intention, or at least a hope, to discover contraband or evidence of guilt to be used in prosecution of a criminal action. FSM v. Sapusi, 16 FSM R. 315, 317 (Chk. 2009).

When the police officer did not enter the accused's home or any house in which he was staying; when there was no evidence that the accused had an expectation of privacy in anything present in another's house that was entered; when there was no evidence that the accused resided there, or that he stayed there intermittently, or that he had permission to leave any personal items there, or that he had permission or authority to enter and use the house, or even that the bag seized was his; when there is also no evidence about how the other came to have possession of the pistol and ammunition; when the accused does not claim a property interest in the pistol and ammunition or the bag; and when the accused also was not present in the house when the police officer entered it, the accused lacks standing to object to the entry of the house and the seizure of the pistol and ammunition after the other gave the bag it was in the the officer. FSM v. Sapusi, 16 FSM R. 315, 317 (Chk. 2009).

Exigent circumstances may make it necessary or constitutionally reasonable to proceed with a search without first obtaining a warrant. Exigent circumstances are present when a police officer has heard three gunshots fired in a residential area since people's lives could have been in danger if more shots were fired and when the officer did not know who was firing and had no reason to know whether more would be fired. Thus, exigent circumstances existed that required the officer to investigate the possible sources of the gunfire. FSM v. Sapusi, 16 FSM R. 315, 318 (Chk. 2009).

Since the FSM Constitution's Declaration of Rights protection against unreasonable search and seizure is similar to and drawn from a provision in the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights, U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 527 n.2 (Chk. 2009).

For the purposes of FSM Constitution article IV, § 5, a search is any governmental intrusion into an area where a person has a reasonable expectation of privacy. For actions to constitute a search, there must be: 1) an examination of a premises or a person; 2) in a manner encroaching upon one's reasonable expectation of privacy; 3) with an intention, or at least a hope, to discover contraband or evidence of guilt to be used in the prosecution of a criminal action. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 421 (Pon. 2011).

The FSM Constitution guarantees that the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and other possessions against unreasonable search, seizure, or invasion of privacy may not be violated. This protection prohibits the police from making a warrantless and nonconsenual entry into a suspect's home in order to make a routine felony arrest. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

When an FSM Declaration of Rights provision is patterned after a U.S. Constitution provision (such as Section Five of the Declaration of Rights which is patterned after the U.S. Constitution's Fourth Amendment), U.S. authority may be consulted to understand its meaning. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 n.4 (Pon. 2012).

Merely entering a person's property is often not enough to violate a person's right to be secure in her house. For instance, if the police do not enter the home but wait for the occupant to emerge from the house before effecting an arrest, the right is not violated. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

A test for whether a particular area is constitutionally protected from unreasonable searches and seizures is whether the area is included within an enclosure surrounding the home, the nature of the uses to which the area is put, and the steps taken by the resident to protect the area from observation by people passing by. Under this test, section five certainly protects a person's shower house area as the nature of its use is one in which there is a high expectation of privacy. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 n.5 (Pon. 2012).

When the officers told the plaintiff, while she was still in her shower house, that they were there to arrest her and once the officers told her that that was what they were there for, she was not free to leave except in their custody. In other words, the police arrested her while she was in her shower house even though they were outside. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398 (Pon. 2012).

It is the location of the arrested person, and not the arresting agents, that determines whether an arrest occurs within a home. When the plaintiff was arrested while she was in an area protected by Section five of the Declaration of Rights (her shower house) and when the police did not have a warrant, her arrest was illegal because the police needed a warrant to arrest her where they did and they did not have one. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 398-99 (Pon. 2012).

When the government had not complied with 12 F.S.M.C. 218 by releasing or charging the defendant within 24 hours of his arrest, the statements made and evidence retrieved thereafter until he was released will be suppressed because evidence obtained as a result of a violation of 12 F.S.M.C. 218 is not admissible against an accused. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2012).

Although evidence and statements lawfully obtained from an accused before he has been detained over 24 hours will be admissible, the accused is entitled to the suppression of any evidence of statements obtained from him after the first 24 hours of his detention. FSM v. Edward, 18 FSM R. 444, 451 (Pon. 2012).

Due process would seem to require a prompt post-seizure hearing before the administrative agency that has administratively levied execution of unpaid taxes. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

The Chuuk Legislature can grant a state administrative agency the power to levy in the manner of a levy of an execution for statutory liens held by the state so long as due process concerns are addressed by such mechanisms as a prompt post-levy (or post-execution) hearing being available. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

A Customs officer has the right to examine all goods subject to Customs control, and among the goods subject to Customs control are all goods for export, from the time such goods are brought to any port, airport, or other place for export until their exportation to any country outside of the FSM. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

A facility that is not itself a port or airport, but is in close proximity to both the port and airport, can be considered an "other place for export" to the extent that it is a container yard – it stores packed containers ready for shipment abroad. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

That an examination was not done by a customs officer, but by the national police, a different FSM law enforcement agency, but one that is tasked with the general enforcement of all FSM national law, instead of the narrow specialized area that customs officers are restricted to, should not invalidate the examination when it was one that was permissible for Customs officers to do. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

Ports, airports, and other places for export such as a container yard are functional equivalents of a border. Border searches and searches at the functional equivalent of a border are an exception to the warrant requirement of section 5 of the FSM Declaration of Rights. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

– By Consent

The Ponape state consent statute does not authorize the search of a nonconsenting bar or restaurant customer. Pon. Code. ch. 3, §§ 3-13. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 81 (Pon. 1982).

Under Ponape state law, a bar or restaurant patron's denial of an authorized person's request to search the person of the patron merely subjects the patron to exclusion from the establishment. Pon. Code ch. 3, §§ 3-13. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 81 (Pon. 1982).

The government bears the burden of proving the existence of voluntary consent. Acquiescence in the desire of law enforcement personnel to search will not be presumed but must be affirmatively demonstrated. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 456 (Kos. 1984).

A demand, even if courteously expressed, is different from a request, and a citizen's compliance with a police officer's demand, backed by apparent force of law, is perhaps subtly, but nonetheless significantly, different from voluntary consent to a request. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 458 (Kos. 1984).

On matters relating to a warrantless search, it is for the court to decide whether voluntary consent, as opposed to passive submission to legal authority, occurred. The government must put before the court facts, not mere conclusions of police officers, which will permit the judge to decide whether consent was given. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 458 (Kos. 1984).

The unconsented and warrantless entry into defendant's house, without any subsequent action on the officer's part to impress upon the defendant that they could be influenced by his wishes as to whether a search might be conducted, erases any possibility of finding any aspect of the search in the house or the resultant seizure of evidence, to be either consented to or untainted. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 459 (Kos. 1984).

Officers entering a house by consent for purposes of a search must keep in mind the eventual likelihood that they will need to establish that consent was voluntary. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 463 (Kos. 1984).

Only under rare circumstances would the FSM Supreme Court likely find that a homeowner who neither says nor does anything to indicate affirmative consent has consented to a warrantless search of his house. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 463 (Pon. 1984).

To determine whether a search is reasonable, the Kosrae State Court will be guided by the principle that, with the exception of a few carefully defined types of cases, any search of private property without proper consent is unreasonable, unless previously authorized by a valid search warrant. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 43 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

The Kosrae State Court, consistent with U.S. and FSM precedent, recognizes consent as a valid exception to the need for a search warrant. However, consent is understood to be an informed and voluntary relinquishment of a known right and the burden will be on the government to show that there was consent. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 43 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

To protect the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, this court requires clear proof, not merely that consent was given, but also that a right was knowingly and voluntarily waived. It is fundamental that a citizen be aware of the right he is giving up in order for consent to be found. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 44 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Consent, given in the face of a police request to search without the consenting person having been informed of his right to refuse consent, and without any written evidence that consent was voluntarily and knowingly given, renders such consent inadequate to permit a warrantless search absent probable cause. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 44 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

In an administrative agency inspection, as in any other governmental search and seizure, a warrant is unnecessary where the government obtains the voluntary consent of the party to be searched. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 143 (Pon. 1995).

If a police officer had permission to search a home, then no warrant was necessary; if he needed a warrant, then he did not have permission to enter the house. Consent to conduct a search must be proven by a preponderance of the evidence. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 497 (Pon. 2005).

When no search took place, it is unnecessary for the court to decide whether the defendant gave his consent. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 348, 352 (Pon. 2007).

The FSM Constitution's prohibition against "unreasonable searches and seizures" generally requires the police to obtain a search warrant by showing probable cause to believe that a search will uncover evidence of contraband or a crime. However, there are certain well delineated exceptions to having a valid warrant prior to commencing a search under FSM Const. art. IV, § 5. One such exception arises when a person authorized to give consent does so prior to the initiation of the search. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 421 (Pon. 2011).

FSM Constitution article IV, § 5 requires the police to prove that consent to perform a search was given voluntarily and was not the product of duress or coercion. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 423 (Pon. 2011).

FSM Constitution article IV, § 5 protects FSM citizens against unreasonable searches and seizures. There is a legitimate need, under certain circumstances, for FSM law enforcement officers to perform searches based on an individual's voluntary consent since such searches are often the only means available to obtain important and reliable evidence, and may result in considerably less inconvenience for the subject of the search than other means by which to obtain the sought-after evidence. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 423 (Pon. 2011).

A search pursuant to consent often occurs under informal conditions in which the due process considerations inherent in a custodial interrogation or criminal trials do not apply. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 423 (Pon. 2011).

FSM Constitution article IV, § 5 contains no requirement that law enforcement officers inform a consenting individual that he has the right to refuse to give consent. Instead, to ensure that consent not be coerced, by explicit or implicit means, by implied threat or covert force, the court will consider the "totality of the circumstances" to determine whether a criminal defendant's consent was voluntarily given. In doing so, any searches that are the product of law enforcement coercion can be filtered out without undermining the continuing validity of consent searches. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 423-24 (Pon. 2011).

When, of foremost importance, an officer asked the defendant whether they could look inside the backpack, he said, "Yes"; when there was insufficient evidence showing that the officers involved intimidated or harassed the defendant into making his response; when the officers did not brandish weapons, threaten him, or make any intimidating movements; when they were dressed in street clothes, not public safety uniforms, and were not carrying weapons; when the officers were also known to the defendant; and when, while the officers did not advise the defendant that he could refuse consent, that knowledge of the right to refuse consent is not mandatory for a valid consent search to occur, the court will find, based on its examination of the totality of the circumstances, that the defendant voluntarily consented to the search of the backpack. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 424 (Pon. 2011).

In situations where law enforcement have some evidence of illegal activity but lack probable cause to arrest or search, a search authorized by a valid consent may be the only means of obtaining important and reliable evidence. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 424 (Pon. 2011).

When, under the circumstances, it was objectively reasonable for the officers to believe that the scope of the suspect's consent permitted them to remove items from the his backpack and open closed containers because a reasonable person would have believed that to "look inside" a backpack may well necessitate the removal of certain items from the backpack; when the defendant gave his consent to also search the Tupperware container and there was no evidence to suggest that he attempted to limit the scope of the officers' search when they began removing items from the backpack; when the defendant was present when the search was conducted; and when the officers were searching for marijuana, and a reasonable person may be expected to know that marijuana is generally transported in some form of container, the officers' search of the Tupperware container within the defendant's backpack was reasonable because the defendant gave his consent to search the Tupperware container and failed to place any limitation on the scope of the search. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 425 (Pon. 2011).

When it is determined that the searches were conducted with the defendant's voluntary consent, the defendant's claims of a violation of his right not to incriminate himself pursuant to FSM Const. art. IV, § 7 also fail because a confession's voluntariness is determined by reference to the totality of surrounding circumstances. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 425 (Pon. 2011).

The possibility that Micronesians may be more apt to acquiesce when asked to give their consent by an authority figure may be one of the factors that a court may consider in evaluating the "totality of the circumstances" to determine whether consent was voluntarily given. Such an assessment must be performed on a case-by-case basis, and the court would be overly presumptive to assume that all Micronesians would respond to police questioning in the same manner. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 600 (Pon. 2011).

While the court may be sensitive to the possibility of a Micronesian suspect's simple submission to what is considered the authority or the power of the state to search, a tendency by individuals to accede to the demands of authority figures is not unique to Micronesia. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 600 (Pon. 2011).

A consent search simply does not rise to the level of a custodial interrogation or trial, both situations in which a defendant must be specifically informed of his rights. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 600 (Pon. 2011).

A warning is required when a custodial interrogation takes place and a suspect has been deprived of his freedom in a significant way. This differs from the situation where there was some evidence of illegal activity prior to the search, but it did not meet the probable cause standard necessary to arrest or search. In this type of situation, a search authorized by valid consent may be the only method by which evidence may be obtained. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 600 (Pon. 2011).

If the court were to impose an explicit proof of knowledge requirement in determining the reasonableness of consent searches, it would seriously limit police officers' ability to use consent searches at all, as it would be very difficult for the prosecution to ever show that a suspect affirmatively knew of his right to refuse consent. Under such a standard, defendants could simply fail to admit that they knew of their right to refuse consent, creating an unrealistically high burden for prosecutors seeking to introduce evidence obtained as a result of a consent search. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 600 (Pon. 2011).

Explicit knowledge of the right to refuse consent is not mandatory for a valid consent search to occur. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 601 (Pon. 2011).

When, based on the totality of the circumstances, the court finds that the defendant voluntarily consented to the search of his backpack, his motion to suppress evidence will be denied. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 601 (Pon. 2011).

– Exclusionary Rule

The FSM Supreme Court is vested, by statute, with authority to suppress or exclude, evidence obtained by unlawful search and seizure. 12 F.S.M.C. 312. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 92 (Pon. 1982).

This court will apply the exclusionary rule on a case-by-case basis. The exclusionary rule has been devised as a necessary device to protect the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 44 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Under the exclusionary rule, any evidence obtained through an illegal search and seizure, whether physical or verbal, is a fruit of the illegal search and seizure, is tainted by illegality, and must be excluded. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 44 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Generally, whatever evidence is obtained pursuant to an unlawful arrest may be suppressed. One exception to the general rule is when the government obtains the evidence based on an independent source. If knowledge of such facts is gained from an independent source they may be proved like any others. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 265 (Chk. 2001).

Exclusion of evidence obtained as a result of a violation of one's constitutional rights has no applicability to evidence obtained by the prosecution from sources factually unrelated to violations of a defendant's rights. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 266 (Chk. 2001).

Society's interest in deterring unlawful police conduct and the public interest in having factfinders receive all probative evidence of a crime are properly balanced by putting the police in the same, not a worse, position than they would have been if no police error or misconduct had occurred. When the challenged evidence has an independent source, exclusion of such evidence would put the police in a worse position than they would have been in absent any error or violation. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 266 (Chk. 2001).

When the police received information that the defendant was carrying a handgun from a known informant with whom they knew the defendant had lived for three years while he was in Nema, and when their conduct of the ensuing search was based on that and not on the prior unlawful arrest, that independent tip makes the search reasonable because the information given the police while the defendant was detained was a source independent from the unlawful arrest. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 266 (Chk. 2001).

Whoever suffers the imposition of an unlawful police search has the assurance that any evidence so acquired is rendered inadmissible in a subsequent criminal trial by the exclusionary rule and that damage remedies are available for violations of constitutional rights stemming from either an unlawful search or arrest. Both these remedies are present in the FSM. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 435 (Chk. 2003).

The remedy for a victim of an illegal search is not the self-help of resistance. Resistance to such authority to search and seize by self-help is not recognized in courts of law. Whoever suffers the imposition of an unlawful police search has the assurance that any evidence so acquired is rendered inadmissible in a subsequent criminal trial by the exclusionary rule. And in any event damage remedies are available in the courts for violations of constitutional rights stemming from either an unlawful search or arrest. These remedies are present in the FSM. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

The exclusionary rule is well established in the FSM. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 348 (Pon. 2014).

The court will apply the exclusionary rule on a case-by-case basis. The exclusionary rule has been devised as a necessary device to protect right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 348 (Pon. 2014).

Under the exclusionary rule, any evidence obtained through an illegal search and seizure, whether physical or verbal, is a fruit of the illegal search and seizure and is tainted by illegality, and must be excluded. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 348 (Pon. 2014).

When admissions have been obtained in the course of questioning that violated 12 F.S.M.C. 218, statutory policy calls for a presumption that subsequent admissions were obtained as a result of the violation. Statements made by a person being questioned by police without being advised of all his rights violates 12 F.S.M.C. 218. A statement so obtained is rendered inadmissible by 12 F.S.M.C. 220. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 348-49 (Pon. 2014).

When some evidence was obtained by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of the primary taint, it will not be suppressed, and therefore the court will not quash the information. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 350 (Pon. 2014).

The usual remedy for a person's failure to be informed of his rights is the suppression of any evidence against him that resulted from that failure. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 97 (Pon. 2015).

– Incident to an Arrest

A constitutional search may be conducted without a warrant if the search is incidental to a lawful arrest. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 32 (App. 1985).

A police officer making an arrest has a limited right to conduct a search incident to that arrest. This right to search is for the limited purposes of preventing the arrested person from reaching concealed weapons to injure the officer or others, and from destroying evidence. Although the right to search is of limited scope, it plainly authorizes a reasonable search of the person being arrested. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 34 (App. 1985).

An officer making an arrest has a limited right to conduct a warrantless search incident to that arrest. This right to search is for the limited purposes of preventing the arrested person from reaching concealed weapons to injure the officer or others, and from destroying evidence. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 100 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

A search incident to valid arrest must be confined to the person and the area from within which he or she might have reached weapons or destructible evidence and be done on the spot or later at the place of detention. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 100 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

When the police, after arresting the accused and while he was being escorted away, returned to seize items that had been lying next to him when arrested did make the seizure, they did no more than they were entitled to do incident to the usual custodial arrest, and the accused was no more imposed upon than he would have been had the seizure taken place simultaneously with his arrest. The seizure was thus valid under the search incident to lawful arrest exception to the warrant rule. Yinmed v. Yap, 8 FSM R. 95, 100-01 (Yap S. Ct. App. 1997).

A search that was not done at the place of the arrest and at the time of the arrest or immediately thereafter is not a valid search incident to a lawful arrest. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 348 (Chk. 2000).

The most basic principle underlying a warrantless search incident to a lawful arrest is that the arrest itself must be justified, and when the arrest is invalid, the search is invalid. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 496-97 (Pon. 2005).

When the police had probable cause to arrest the defendant because he was intoxicated and in a public place, a bag seized from the defendant was therefore seized pursuant to a lawful arrest. The search of the bag was thus not unreasonable because a constitutional search may be conducted without a warrant if the search is incidental to a lawful arrest. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

A police officer making an arrest has a limited right to conduct a search incident to that arrest. This right to search is for the limited purposes of preventing the arrested person from reaching concealed weapons to injure the officer or others, and from destroying evidence. Although the right to search is of limited scope, it plainly authorizes a reasonable search of the person being arrested. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

Searches incidental to a lawful arrest, and inventory searches, are exceptions to the Constitution's warrant requirement, and, as such, do not violate the Constitution's prohibition of unreasonable searches. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

Generally, a constitutional search may be conducted without a warrant if the search is incidental to a lawful arrest. This right to search is for the limited purposes of preventing the arrested person from reaching concealed weapons to injure the officer or others, and from destroying evidence. With respect to dwellings, an officer may conduct a warrantless search with validly obtained consent and, if evidence is discovered, the officer may seize it pursuant to the plain view doctrine. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 265-66 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

It is not unreasonable for the police, as part of the routine incident to an arrest, to search any container or article in the arrestee's possession or in his vicinity. The justification for such searches does not rest on probable cause, and hence the absence of a warrant is immaterial to the reasonableness of the search. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2008).

Where a taxi driver was arrested and taken into custody and the zippered waist bag that he had was searched incident to his arrest because the bag was in close proximity to him when he was arrested and the officers discovered the bag and searched it, the search of that bag was not only reasonable, but lawful and the accused's assertion that the police lacked probable cause to search the bag is simply immaterial to the reason that such a search was even conducted and the accused's motion to suppress the weapon and ammunition that were found in the bag will be denied. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2008).

Persons are constitutionally protected from unreasonable searches and seizures. But when a policeman has made a lawful custodial arrest of the occupant of an automobile, he may, as a contemporaneous incident of that arrest, search that automobile's passenger compartment. It follows from this conclusion that the police may also examine the contents of any containers found within the passenger compartment for if the passenger compartment is within reach of the arrestee, so also will the containers in it be within his reach. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2009).

An officer making an arrest has a limited right to conduct a warrantless search incident to that arrest and this right to search is for the limited purposes of preventing the arrested person from reaching concealed weapons to injure the officer or others, and from destroying evidence. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM

R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2009).

A search incident to valid arrest is confined to the person and the area from within which he or she might have reached weapons or destructible evidence and may be done on the spot or even later at the place of detention. Such incidental searches include a vehicle's passenger compartment, even after the occupants have been ordered out and are standing nearby. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2009).

When the police had a reasonable belief that there was a firearm in the vehicle, a search of the vehicle incident to an arrest might also be viewed as reasonable if it were done for the purpose of protecting the general public from a firearm that was believed to be in the vehicle and that might fall into the wrong hands. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 528 (Chk. 2009).

– Inventory Search

It is not unreasonable for police, as part of the routine procedure incident to incarcerating an arrested person, to search any container or article in his possession, in accordance with established inventory procedures. The justification for such searches does not rest on probable cause, and hence the absence of a warrant is immaterial to the reasonableness of the search. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

A standardized procedure for inventorying an arrestee's possessions at the stationhouse is an entirely reasonable administrative procedure that not only deters an arrestee's false claims of missing or damaged property but also inhibits theft or careless handling of the arrestee's property and protects people from any dangerous instrumentalities that may be found. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

An inventory search is reasonable when police follow standardized procedures and are not acting in bad faith or for the sole purpose of investigation. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

Standardized or established routine must govern inventory searches because an inventory search must not be a ruse for a general rummaging in order to discover incriminating evidence. The policy or practice governing inventory searches should be designed to produce an inventory. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

Because the police also looked for contraband while doing an inventory that does not mean that the search was done in bad faith or for the sole purpose of investigation. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

To be valid, an inventory search must be governed by a standardized or established routine and not be a general rummaging to discover incriminating evidence. The policy or practice governing inventory searches should be designed to produce an inventory. The purpose of a standardized inventory procedure is to deter an arrestee's false claims of missing or damaged property, to inhibit theft or careless handling of an arrestee's property, and to protect against any dangerous instrumentalities that may be found. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 348-49 (Chk. 2000).

When the police did not follow their own standard procedure for an inventory search of a vehicle and no inventory of the sedan's contents was made, and no listing of the sedan's description and owner made, it can only be described as a warrantless search for evidence, and as such was an illegal search. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 349 (Chk. 2000).

It is not unreasonable for police, as part of the routine procedure incident to incarcerating an arrested person, to search any container or article in his possession, in accordance with established inventory procedures. The justification for such searches does not rest on probable cause, and hence the absence of a warrant is immaterial to the reasonableness of the search. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk.

2006).

Searches incidental to a lawful arrest, and inventory searches, are exceptions to the Constitution's warrant requirement, and, as such, do not violate the Constitution's prohibition of unreasonable searches. FSM v. Menisio, 14 FSM R. 316, 319 (Chk. 2006).

– Investigatory Stop

Under Kosrae statute, following commission of an offense a police officer who has reasonable grounds to believe that a particular person has committed the offense may arrest the person. This establishes the standard for the arrest of a person, but it does not establish the standard for the police to conduct an investigatory stop of a vehicle. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Reasonable suspicion is required for police officers to make an investigatory stop of a vehicle. "Reasonable suspicion" is a particularized and objective basis for suspecting that a person is engaged in a criminal activity. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Generally, an anonymous tip is not sufficient justification for a stop by the police. Police need sufficient reasonable articulated suspicion. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Once the police have reasonable suspicion that the defendant has committed a criminal offense, they may conduct an investigatory stop, which is a temporary stop to confirm or dispel the suspicion which initially induced the investigatory stop. Investigatory stops are based upon less than probable cause and are temporary in nature. The information gained at the investigatory stop is then used to confirm or dispel the initial suspicion, and then either arrest or release the defendant. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A criminal prosecution for driving under the influence will not be dismissed when the police officers had sufficient reasonable suspicion to conduct an investigatory stop of the defendant because the reasonable suspicion was supplied by an informant, whose identity, credibility, reputation and reliability were known. When at the investigatory stop, the police observed signs of the defendant's alcohol impairment, these signs provided grounds for the police to administer the field sobriety tests to the defendant, and when the defendant failed two field sobriety tests, it gave the police reasonable grounds and probable cause for defendant's commission of driving under the influence and probable cause to arrest the defendant. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Warrantless arrests are, under certain situations, lawful and authorized by statute. Arrest by police without a warrant is authorized when a criminal offense has been committed, and a policeman has reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested has committed it, or a policeman, even when it is not certain that a criminal offense has been committed, may detain for examination persons who may be found under such circumstances as justify a reasonable suspicion that they have committed or intend to commit a felony. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2009).

When the police knew that a crime had been committed and had either reasonable grounds to believe that the vehicle's occupants had committed the offense or reasonable suspicion that one or more of the vehicle's occupants had committed a felony and when the police knew that someone in that vehicle had fired a handgun from that vehicle, a search of the vehicle's passenger compartment is reasonable under such circumstances. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 527 (Chk. 2009).

Once the police have reasonable suspicion that a suspect has committed a criminal offense, they may conduct an investigatory stop. An investigatory stop is a temporary stop of a car and its passengers that is used to confirm or dispel the suspicion that caused the investigatory stop. These stops are based on less than probable cause. Information gathered at the stop can be used to arrest or release the suspects. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 573-74 (Pon. 2009).

Reasonable suspicion, not probable cause, is all that is required for police officers to make an investigatory stop of a vehicle. "Reasonable suspicion" is a particularized and objective basis for suspecting that a person is engaged in a criminal activity. Investigatory stops are based upon less than probable cause and are temporary in nature, and the information gained at the investigatory stop is used to confirm or dispel the initial suspicion, and then either arrest or release the person stopped. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 369-70 (App. 2011).

A law enforcement officer may perform an investigatory stop, also known as a field interrogation, if he has reasonable suspicion, based on specific facts, that the suspect has committed or is about to commit a crime. The officers may perform an investigatory stop when swift action is necessary based upon the law enforcement officer's observations. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 419 (Pon. 2011).

The question of whether an investigatory stop is a reasonable exception to the prohibition in FSM Const. art. IV, § 5 against unreasonable seizures is whether the facts available to the officers at the moment of the seizure would lead a person of reasonable caution to believe that the action was appropriate. When such situations arise, a warrant is not necessary because there is an element of urgency or speed requiring action while the suspect is present and engaged in suspicious activity. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 419 (Pon. 2011).

When officers received a tip that someone was planning to transport marijuana to Pohnpei's outer islands in late December, 2009 and the informant provided the description of a vehicle and a vehicle check revealed that the defendant owned it; when, on arrival at the dock, investigating officers observed the defendant board the Voyager with a backpack and disembark a short time later without the backpack; when, at first the defendant denied having a backpack, but after being told that he had been seen carrying a backpack on board, he admitted to having a backpack and told officers that he had given the backpack to another person; and when a check of that person revealed that he had never encountered the defendant on the Voyager, these specific facts and the rational inferences drawn from them justified the officers' reasonable suspicion that the defendant had deposited a backpack possibly containing contraband on board the Voyager. Under these circumstances, with the Voyager scheduled to disembark, there was an element of urgency or speed requiring the officers' immediate action. The officers were entitled to perform an investigatory stop of the defendant to determine whether he had or was about to commit a crime because the officers had reasonable suspicion, based on specific facts, that the defendant had committed or was about to commit a crime. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 419-20 (Pon. 2011).

When the officers' investigatory stop of the defendant and their questioning him about suspicious circumstances did not constitute an arrest, the officers were not required to advise the defendant of his right to remain silent when they first approached him on the dock. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 420 (Pon. 2011).

A law enforcement officer may perform an investigatory stop, also known as a field interrogation, if he has reasonable suspicion that the suspect has committed or is about to commit a crime. The reasonable suspicion standard requires police officers to identify "specific and articulable facts" justifying the stop, rather than a mere hunch. Reasonable suspicion must exist before the investigatory stop occurs for the stop to be valid. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 598 (Pon. 2011).

An anonymous tip received regarding the defendant's possible actions to transport contraband to Pingelap, the defendant's appearance at the dock with a backpack, and the defendant's disembarkation from the vessel without the backpack, were sufficient specific and articulable facts that supported the officers' reasonable suspicion that a crime had occurred or was about to occur. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 598 (Pon. 2011).

A valid investigatory stop requires only reasonable suspicion, based on specific and articulable facts, that the suspect has committed or is about to commit a crime. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 598 (Pon.

When the specific facts available to the police officers, namely, the informant's tip; that this tip was corroborated when the defendant, who was known to the officers, arrived at the dock carrying a backpack and boarded the vessel; and that some of the officers witnessed the defendant disembark from the ship without his backpack, were more than sufficient to establish reasonable suspicion, the officers were entitled to perform an investigatory stop of the defendant to determine whether he had or was about to commit a crime. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 598-99 (Pon. 2011).

The police did not go beyond the scope of an investigatory stop and compel incriminating testimonial evidence because the defendant voluntarily consented to a police request that he assist them in locating a backpack when the officers that approached the defendant were dressed in street clothes, not in uniform; when the police officers were unarmed; when the questioning occurred in a public location; when there was no evidence of any coercion or forceful language being used; and when some of the police officers and the defendant had met each other before and were acquainted with each other. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 599 (Pon. 2011).

When the officers had reasonable suspicion, based on specific and articulable facts, to perform an investigatory stop of the defendant after he disembarked from the Voyager on December 27, 2009, and when the defendant was not compelled to make an explicit or implicit disclosure of incriminating testimonial information since he volunteered to help the officers locate his backpack, he was not at that time, entitled to a privilege against self-incrimination under FSM Const. art. IV, § 7. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 595, 599 (Pon. 2011).

– Plain View

A warrant is not necessary to authorize seizure when marijuana is in plain view of a police officer who has a right to be in the position to have that view. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 294 (Pon. 1983).

An officer who, while standing on a road, sees a marijuana plant in plain view on top of a nearby house has not thereby engaged in an unlawful search. Kosrae v. Paulino, 3 FSM R. 273, 276 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Even on public premises a person may retain an expectation of privacy, but where a person residing on public land makes no effort to preserve the privacy of marijuana plants and seedings, entry of police on the premises and seizure of contraband that is plainly visible from outside the residence is not an unconstitutional search and seizure. FSM v. Rodriquez, 3 FSM R. 368, 370 (Pon. 1988).

The "open fields" exception requires the evidence to be in plain view from a public place. But when the police viewed the open can of beer in the defendant's hand solely as the result of an illegal roadblock at which the car was stopped and would not have viewed the can of beer if the car had not been stopped at the roadblock, the can of beer was not in plain view from a public place and the "open fields" exception is not applicable. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 177 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Under the plain view exception to the warrant requirement, if a police officer has a right to be in a specific place, and has a plain view of items subject to seizure, then he may seize those objects and they may be introduced into evidence in a subsequent criminal proceeding, but when the officer could not have seen the gun from his position on the porch and only obtained the rifle only after he had entered the house and conducted a search lasting 5 to 6 minutes, the search violated the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 498 (Pon. 2005).

A warrant is not necessary to authorize seizure when marijuana is in plain view of a police officer who has a right to be in the position to have that view. Kosrae v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 37, 40 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The plain view doctrine has been recognized as an exception to the search warrant requirement, and the application of the plain view doctrine and the legality of the search must be analyzed upon the information known to the police immediately before the search began. Kosrae v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 37, 40 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The analysis of warrantless seizure and application of the plain view doctrine proceeds with three requirements: First, the police officer must lawfully make the initial intrusion or lawfully be in a position to view a particular area. Second, the officer must discover the incriminating evidence inadvertently (not know in advance the location of certain evidence). Third, it must be immediately apparent to the police that the items they observe are either evidence of a crime or contraband. Kosrae v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 37, 40-41 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When a police officer conducted a routine investigation of a vehicle involved in an accident and, since the vehicle had been abandoned and the driver had voluntarily left the scene of the accident with a bystander, was looking for the registration card to determine the vehicle's ownership (a proper action within the state's governmental authority and police power); when the officer discovered the marijuana roaches in the ashtray inadvertently while looking for the vehicle's registration card; and when the officer, upon viewing the marijuana cigarette roaches in the ashtray, immediately recognized those items as contraband, the requirements for the application of the plain view doctrine have been satisfied and the warrantless search conducted of the defendant's vehicle was within the state's governmental authority and police power and was not unreasonable and the marijuana evidence will not be suppressed. Kosrae v. Noda, 14 FSM R. 37, 41-42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Generally, a constitutional search may be conducted without a warrant if the search is incidental to a lawful arrest. This right to search is for the limited purposes of preventing the arrested person from reaching concealed weapons to injure the officer or others, and from destroying evidence. With respect to dwellings, an officer may conduct a warrantless search with validly obtained consent and, if evidence is discovered, the officer may seize it pursuant to the plain view doctrine. Chuuk v. Sipenuk, 15 FSM R. 262, 265-66 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A warrant is not necessary to authorize seizure and the seizure is therefore reasonable when the contraband or the instrument of a crime is in plain view of a police officer who has a right to be in the position to have that view so that when the handgun, and the bag the officer saw the accused put the gun into, were in the officers' plain view because they were responding to an emergency call and were thus in a place where they had a right to be the motion to suppress the seizure of the handgun will be denied. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 29-30 (Chk. 2008).

Despite the fact that the defendant and the backpack was in a public place, it is clear that the defendant had a reasonable expectation of privacy in the backpack's contents. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 421 (Pon. 2011).

There is no protected privacy interest in items exposed to public view. It is not a "search" if police observe what may be seen by any member of the general public. Thus, when a backpack was in a public location, in public view, the police were entitled to locate the backpack on the Voyager even without the defendant's consent. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 421 n.1 (Pon. 2011).

– Probable Cause

While the existence of probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed and that a particular person has committed it is not in itself sufficient to justify a warrantless search, the establishment of probable cause is nevertheless critical to any unconsented search. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 460-61 (Kos. 1984).

Without probable cause, no search warrant may be obtained and no unconsented search may be conducted. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 461 (Kos. 1984).

The standard announced in the second sentence of FSM Constitution article IV, section 5 for issuance of a warrant must be employed in determining the reasonableness of a search or seizure. Imposition of a standard of probable cause for issuance of a warrant in article IV, section 5 implies that no search or seizure may be considered reasonable unless justified by probable cause. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 32 (App. 1985).

It is normally required that a hearing be held prior to seizure of a property. In extraordinary situations a seizure may take place prior to hearing, but the owner must be afforded a prompt post-seizure hearing at which the person seizing the property must at least make a showing of probable cause. Unreasonable delay in providing a post-seizure hearing may require that an otherwise valid seizure be set aside. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

The general requirement under article IV, section 5 of the Constitution is that before a search or seizure may occur there must exist "probable cause," that is, a reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that a crime has been committed and that the item to be seized has been used in the crime. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

Any attempt to grant statutory authority to permit seizure of a fishing vessel upon a lesser standard than probable cause would raise serious questions of compatibility with article IV, sections 3 and 4 of the Constitution. Such an interpretation should be avoided unless clearly mandated by statute. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

In probable cause determinations the court must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience, would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 77 (Pon. 1985).

Consent, given in the face of a police request to search without the consenting person having been informed of his right to refuse consent, and without any written evidence that consent was voluntarily and knowingly given, renders such consent inadequate to permit a warrantless search absent probable cause. Kosrae v. Alanso, 3 FSM R. 39, 44 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Probable cause is not proof of guilt, but shows that a reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious man to believe that the accused is guilty of the offense, exists. Kosrae v. Paulino, 3 FSM R. 273, 276 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Because the purpose of article IV, section 5 of the Constitution is to protect the privacy rights of individuals against unreasonable and unauthorized searches and seizures by government officials it has been interpreted to require that an individual suspected of a crime be released from detention unless the government can establish "probable cause" to hold that individual. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584, 588 (Pon. 1994).

The standard for determining probable cause is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. The probable cause determination must be made by the deliberate, impartial, judgment of a judicial officer. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584, 588-89 (Pon. 1994).

Often the determination of probable cause is made by a competent judicial officer upon the issuance of an arrest warrant, but where an arrest is not made pursuant to a warrant the arrested is entitled to a judicial determination as to whether there is probable cause to detain the accused. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No.

621, 6 FSM R. 584, 589 (Pon. 1994).

A probable cause hearing is an informal, non-adversarial proceeding in which the formal rules of evidence and the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt do not apply. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584, 589 (Pon. 1994).

An individual whose property has been seized pursuant to a civil forfeiture proceeding is entitled to a post-seizure hearing in order to determine whether there is probable cause to seize and detain that property. The probable cause standard in a civil forfeiture case is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation has occurred and that the property was used in that violation. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584, 589-90 (Pon. 1994).

The government has probable cause to detain a fishing vessel for illegal fishing when the evidence and information indicate that the vessel was conducting fishing operations within the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone, there was freshly caught fish aboard, and the permit provided to the officers contained a name different from the actual name of the vessel. FSM v. Zhong Yuan Yu No. 621, 6 FSM R. 584, 590-91 (Pon. 1994).

In a post-seizure probable cause hearing in a civil forfeiture case the standard for finding that the FSM has probable cause to seize a fishing vessel is defined by reference to 24 F.S.M.C. 513(2). FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 302 n.1 (Kos. 1995).

A court may rely on hearsay evidence for the purpose of finding probable cause at a post-seizure hearing. FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 303 (Kos. 1995).

Although procedural and evidentiary rules are relaxed at a probable cause hearing a prosecutor may not rely solely on hearsay evidence when other, more competent testimony is available. FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 304 (Kos. 1995).

Representations of counsel in a probable cause hearing are not a substitute for competent, reliable evidence in the form of testimony or appropriately detailed affidavits. FSM v. Yue Yuan Yu No. 708, 7 FSM R. 300, 305 (Kos. 1995).

The Due Process Clause does not require an immediate post-seizure probable cause hearing in advance of a civil forfeiture trial. It only requires that the government begin the forfeiture action within a reasonable time of the seizure. FSM v. Skico, Ltd. (II), 7 FSM R. 555, 557 (Chk. 1996).

A search warrant may not issue except on probable cause, supported by affidavit particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 268 (Chk. 1998).

To determine probable cause, the question is whether a substantial probability exists in the mind of a cautious person which leads him or her to conclude that the items to be seized that are the evidence of a crime are in a particular place at the time the warrant is issued – probable cause upon which a valid search warrant must be based must exist at the time at which the warrant is issued, not at some earlier time. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 269 (Chk. 1998).

Although crucial, the time lapse is not considered in isolation from other factors when determining probable cause. The passage of time is not necessarily a controlling factor in determining the existence of probable cause because a court should also evaluate the nature of the criminal activity and the kind of property for which authorization is sought. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 269 (Chk. 1998).

First-hand information from a reliable informant that firearms were left in a particular building and other firearms were packed and shipped to that address months earlier will establish probable cause of illegal possession of firearms because firearms are something that do not deteriorate or pass away just through the passage of time and are usually left in just one position where kept and rarely, if ever, used, and delivery and then continued possession after receipt as a continuing matter may be inferred. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 269 (Chk. 1998).

It is not unreasonable for police, as part of the routine procedure incident to incarcerating an arrested person, to search any container or article in his possession, in accordance with established inventory procedures. The justification for such searches does not rest on probable cause, and hence the absence of a warrant is immaterial to the reasonableness of the search. FSM v. Joseph, 9 FSM R. 66, 72 (Chk. 1999).

The police had probable cause to stop a sedan and detain its driver when they found it headed northbound a short time after it almost collided with a police car while it was speeding southbound and passing another southbound vehicle because the sedan had tinted windows and the police had no reason to believe that the sedan had switched drivers in the short time since they had last seen it. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 348 (Chk. 2000).

When the police received the information from a known independent source that a person was carrying a handgun, the police not only had a reasonable suspicion that he was armed and carrying a handgun, they also had probable cause to believe that he was, and it was constitutionally permissible for the police to conduct a patdown search of or to frisk him for weapons. Such a warrantless search is reasonable. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 266 (Chk. 2001).

Probable cause is a higher standard than reasonable suspicion. FSM v. Inek, 10 FSM R. 263, 266 (Chk. 2001).

Probable cause exists when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

The finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 621 (Chk. 2002).

A probable cause determination must be made by the deliberate, impartial, judgment of a judicial officer. FSM v. Wainit, 10 FSM R. 618, 622 (Chk. 2002).

The statute of limitations is no part of any definition of probable cause. Probable cause is present when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. That the violation of law occurred within the statute of limitations is not an element that must be shown for probable cause to exist. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 108 (Chk. 2003).

Before a search or seizure may occur, there must exist "probable cause," that is, a reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that a crime has been committed and that the item to be seized has been used in the crime. In re FSM Nat'l Police Case No. NP 10-04-03, 12 FSM R. 248, 251 (Pon. 2003).

Probable cause has not been provided that a crime has been committed and an application for a search warrant will be denied when the criminal law cited requires a showing that an individual threaten harm to a public official "with purpose to influence" a public official in a decision making capacity and the e-mails' language is ambiguous, and does not necessarily threaten harm to any public official and do not reference any decision, opinion, recommendation, vote, or other exercise of discretion by any FSM Immigration personnel and even if the court were to read the e-mails as serious threats to do harm, there is no connection between the threatened harm and any action by Immigration officials that could possibly be influenced. In re FSM Nat'l Police Case No. NP 10-04-03, 12 FSM R. 248, 251 (Pon. 2003).

A police officer may, as a general rule, consider any evidence in determining whether reasonable suspicion or probable cause exists. The information may be provided by an informer. Police should consider the underlying circumstances from which the informer drew his conclusion. Some of the underlying circumstances must show that the informant was reliable. However, evidence to establish reasonable suspicion or probable cause may be entirely based upon hearsay. The general rule is that virtually any evidence may be considered. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 299 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Reasonable grounds or probable cause exist when factors and circumstance within the arresting officer's knowledge are sufficient to warrant a man of reasonable caution to believe an offense has been committed. For the offense of driving under the influence, these circumstances include odor of alcohol, results of the field sobriety tests, appearance and mannerism of intoxication, slurring of speech, and unsteady movement. Kosrae v. Tosie, 12 FSM R. 296, 300 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

An extradition hearing's purpose is not to hold a trial on the merits to determine guilt or innocence, but to determine whether probable cause exists to believe that the person whose surrender is sought has committed the crime for which extradition is requested. The probable cause standard applicable in extradition proceedings is described as sufficient evidence to cause a person of ordinary prudence and caution to conscientiously entertain a reasonable belief of the accused's guilt. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 373 (Yap 2005).

An illegal search cannot justify a later arrest, and an arrest cannot be justified by a subsequent search. A search's legality must be tested on the basis of the information known to the police officer immediately before the search began. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 497 (Pon. 2005).

In accordance with the Chuuk Constitution provision against unreasonable searches, seizures, and invasions of privacy, no warrant may be issued but upon probable cause, supported by affidavit, specifically describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized. An individual suspected of a crime must be released from detention unless the government can establish probable cause to hold that individual. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 97 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The standard for determining probable cause is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. As a general rule, any evidence may be considered in determining whether reasonable suspicion or probable cause exists, and the finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 97-98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A probable cause determination must be made by a deliberate, impartial judicial officer. Often the determination of probable cause is made by a judicial officer upon the issuance of an arrest warrant, but when an arrest is not made pursuant to a warrant, an arrested person is entitled to a judicial determination as to whether there is probable cause to detain him. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When informants are used to establish probable cause, the investigating officers should consider the underlying circumstances from which the informer drew his conclusion. Some of the underlying circumstances must show that the informant was reliable. When the court makes its determination as to whether probable cause was proven, it must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene, but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience, would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. Chuuk v.

Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although the strict guidelines against the admission of hearsay evidence do not apply in a probable cause determination, a prosecutor may not rely solely on hearsay testimony when other, more competent testimony is available. The court may therefore discount unreliable hearsay or other evidence that is inherently untrustworthy or suspicious, unless additional measures are taken to ensure reliability or to explain those exigent circumstances that make it impossible to produce more reliable or competent evidence. A prosecutor's own representations are not a substitute for competent, reliable evidence in the form of first-hand testimony or appropriately detailed affidavits from investigating officers who obtained first-hand accounts. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 98 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the affiant's belief that probable cause existed was based solely on affiant's review of a police report, which presumably was prepared by an officer who investigated the crime scene; when the affiant does not state whether the affiant spoke with the reporting officer, or even identify the reporting officer; when there is no explanation of how the information contained in the police report was obtained; when there is no evidence that the affiant or the unknown reporting officer interviewed witnesses or investigated the incident and there is no way to determine the extent to which the report itself was based on hearsay or any assurance that it was based on the investigating officer's reasonable belief rather than on pure speculation, then the "affidavit of probable cause" is deficient because the affidavit suffers from multiple layers of hearsay, and multiple levels of hearsay become less reliable as the number of levels of hearsay increase and because the affidavit fails to adequately identify the information's source or sources and may be based on unattributed hearsay statements of one or more declarants. As the number of included hearsay statements increases, the guarantees of reliability that justify admission become attenuated. Hearsay that is otherwise admissible may be excluded where it primarily reiterates statements of other, unidentified persons. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 98-99 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A counsel's affidavit used to establish probable cause places counsel in the position of being called as a witness in the case and detracts from the evidence's reliability because it merely adds another layer of hearsay. In that instance, counsel would be in apparent violation of Model Rule of Professional Conduct 3.7 (1983), which, subject to limited exceptions, prohibits counsel from being an advocate at a trial in which counsel is likely to be called as a witness. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Although, there may be cases when an affidavit containing multiple layers of hearsay is deemed sufficiently reliable to prove probable cause, when the affidavit fails even a minimal level of reliability that might be justified by exigent circumstances, which, in any case, were not present, the affidavit filed with the information was not reliable enough to prove probable cause and the defendant's motion to suppress the affidavit of probable cause and for dismissal was therefore granted, and the case was dismissed. Chuuk v. Chosa, 16 FSM R. 95, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Once the police have reasonable suspicion that a suspect has committed a criminal offense, they may conduct an investigatory stop. An investigatory stop is a temporary stop of a car and its passengers that is used to confirm or dispel the suspicion that caused the investigatory stop. These stops are based on less than probable cause. Information gathered at the stop can be used to arrest or release the suspects. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 573-74 (Pon. 2009).

The police have a right to conduct a routine traffic stop, and when they, in order to investigate and confirm or refute their suspicions, stopped a car in which there was a passenger who they suspected had abandoned his Honda after driving it off the road while intoxicated, they did not conduct any unlawful search or seizure. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

Typically, before an arrest can be made, a warrant must be issued for that arrest. A warrant requires a showing of probable cause, and probable cause exists when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive such that a cautious person would believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon.

Pohnpei state law authorizes policemen to make an arrest without a warrant when 1) a breach of the peace or other criminal offense has been committed, and the offender is shall endeavoring to escape, he may be arrested by virtue of an oral order of any official authorized to issue a warrant, or without such order if no such official be present; 2) anyone is in the act of committing a criminal offense; 3) a criminal offense has been committed, and a policeman has reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested has committed it; and 4) even in cases where it is not certain that a criminal offense has been committed, arrest and detain for examination persons who may be found under such circumstances as justify a reasonable suspicion that they have committed or intend to commit a felony. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

A person arrested for obstructing justice because she refused to give the police officers access to her car and interfered with their peaceful attempts to talk with her husband, whom she locked inside the car, is arrested for an offense committed in the police officers' presence, and, that being the case, a warrant did not need to be issued prior to the arrest. Since the officers correctly determined that they had probable cause to arrest without a warrant because her conduct fell within the Pohnpei state law definition of obstruction of justice, they did not conduct an unlawful or false arrest of her. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

A traffic stop, no matter how brief, is a seizure. But this seizure is not a warrantless arrest such that probable cause is needed and the person stopped must immediately be advised of his or her rights. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 370 (App. 2011).

When the police had information from an off-duty police officer that gave them reason to suspect that a person had been involved in a car accident and that he was intoxicated, these facts equate to reasonable suspicion to stop him and investigate. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 370 (App. 2011).

Probable cause exists when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. In probable cause determinations, a court must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience, would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 371 (App. 2011).

Since the police may arrest without a warrant persons who are in the process of committing an offense in their presence, when the trial court found as fact that a person had, in the presence of the police, been argumentative; had prevented them from gaining access to her husband, who they had reasonable suspicion to stop and to whom they wanted to talk about a car abandonment; and that when a sergeant arrested her it was for obstructing justice and for pushing him in the chest and when these facts remain the facts on appeal, the facts, viewed from the law enforcement officers' vantage point, would constitute probable cause for an arrest on an obstructing justice charge. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 371 (App. 2011).

That the police had probable cause for an arrest on an obstructing justice charge does not mean that the arrestee was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of that charge or that there was sufficient evidence to convict her on that charge; it only means that the police had enough to arrest her. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 371 (App. 2011).

A finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay since the general rule is that virtually any evidence may be considered. A police officer may consider any evidence in determining whether reasonable suspicion or probable cause exists. The information may be provided by an informer. Police should consider the underlying circumstances from which the informer drew his conclusion and some of the underlying circumstances must show that the informant was reliable. However, evidence to establish reasonable suspicion or probable cause may be based entirely upon hearsay. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Probable cause exists when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive such that a cautious person would believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the affidavit in support of the information is simply too vague, it does not contain any evidence or factual information that might lead a cautious person to believe it likely that defendant committed a crime prior to being arrested and searched. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the nature of the complaint that law enforcement received and responded to is unspecified either by hearsay or any other kind of evidence; when the accused is said to have been arrested and brought to DPS for processing as a result of police action triggered by the complaint but that arrest's details and circumstances are also unsubstantiated; and when the affidavit reads as a cursory afterthought to the arrest, incarceration, search, and ultimate seizure perpetrated by law enforcement on the accused, it could not, in and of itself, have supported a finding of probable cause prior to the arrest. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When a factually-sufficient information is unsupported by an affidavit showing probable cause but at the motion hearing the State, although neither was the affiant, elicited testimony from an officer involved in the actual arrest and another involved in defendant's search and booking and the arresting officer provided sufficient detail to remedy the affidavit's defects; when the accused was given the opportunity, and in fact did, cross-examine both witnesses; when the court finds their testimony credible and is satisfied that ample probable cause existed for accused's arrest; and when there is nothing before the court to indicate that the accused would in any way be prejudiced if the sworn testimony elicited at the hearing were admitted for the purposes of demonstrating that law enforcement had probable cause to arrest and subsequently search the accused incident to his arrest, at the time he was arrested, the information's charging portion remains unaffected and the accused's motion to suppress will be denied. Chuuk v. Alluki, 17 FSM R. 385, 388 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A probable cause finding may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. FSM v. Esefan, 17 FSM R. 389, 395 (Chk. 2011).

Because the FSM Supreme Court has previously looked to the principles underlying the U.S. Constitution's Fourth Amendment when analyzing the requirements necessary to establish consent sufficient to justify a warrantless search in the FSM, the court may engage in that analysis again. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 423 (Pon. 2011).

When the three officers' affidavits are sufficient to establish facts which, if proven, may support the defendant's conviction on the charges brought; when the connection between a customs officer and an informant, to the extent that it exists, is not necessary to show probable cause to arrest the defendant; and when the affidavits support the discovery of significant quantities of a leafy substance resembling marijuana in the defendant's backpack, as well as further tests of that substance which revealed that it was marijuana, these affidavits provide probable cause to believe that a crime was committed, and the defendant's motion to dismiss the information will be denied. FSM v. Phillip, 17 FSM R. 413, 426 (Pon. 2011).

If it appears from the complaint, or from affidavit or affidavit filed with the complaint, that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant has committed it, a warrant for the defendant's arrest will issue to any officer authorized by law to execute it. The probable cause finding may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

A police officer may, as a general rule, consider any evidence in determining whether reasonable suspicion or probable cause exists. An informer may provide the information. Police should consider the underlying circumstances from which the informer drew his conclusion. Some of the underlying circumstances must show that the informant was reliable. However, evidence to establish reasonable suspicion or probable cause may be entirely based upon hearsay since the general rule is that virtually any evidence may be considered. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

As the levels of hearsay included in the affidavit increase, the guarantees of reliability that justify admission become attenuated. Hearsay that is otherwise admissible may be excluded where it primarily reiterates statements of other, unidentified persons. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the court makes its determination as to whether probable cause was proven, it must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience, would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 512-13 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the affidavit identifies its author as a Chuuk State Public Safety Department police detective and indicates that the detective was assigned to investigate the offenses alleged in the information; when the affidavit does not identify informants but describes facts uncovered during the course of the investigation; and when the defendant admits that the affiant formed his conclusions based upon the alleged victim's representations, the affiant's failure to name sources of information does not render the affidavit defective, in part because the defendant admits that the affiant gathered information directly from the victim. The affidavit does not suffer from multiple layers of hearsay because the affiant identifies himself and attests to personally investigating the criminal violations alleged. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 513 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

It is difficult to imagine how the vast majority of criminal prosecutions might proceed without using hearsay: it is the exception rather than the norm that court testimony underpins probable cause determinations. Any statements made to the affiant by the alleged victim are by definition hearsay and hearsay may, in whole or in part, form the basis of probable cause determinations, as may virtually any kind of evidence. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 513 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Generally speaking, a prudent and thorough investigation likely would involve questioning the defendant before a probable cause determination is made, but the court is not in the business of investigating criminal allegations; law enforcement officials are and whether and to what extent the officer determined that such questioning was unnecessary and whether the omission somehow weakens the State's case is a factual issue to be determined at trial. Nothing in FSM or Chuuk state law provides that every investigating officer in every criminal case must question all or any criminal suspects before making a probable cause determination. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 513-14 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Although there are civil remedies for the wrongs alleged, the possible existence of civil remedies in no way negates the fact that the legislature has criminalized the behavior alleged. The court's task in a probable cause determination is to determine whether the criminal allegations have merit, not to contemplate the propriety of the legal venue. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the court finds nothing to indicate that information obtained from the alleged victim is unreliable; when it does not seem reasonable or realistic to expect an alleged victim to remain neutral and unbiased regarding his claims about being victimized; and when the defendant admits that there was a financial arrangement of some sort between himself and the complainant and that the agreement itself is part of the nexus of facts leading up to this prosecution, the defendant has failed to demonstrate that from the investigating officer's perspective, information obtained during the course of the investigation is insufficient to justify a probable cause finding. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The time to raise issues regarding probable cause is immediately after arrest, preferably at the initial appearance, arraignment, or, upon motion, at a probable cause hearing. It is not approximately one month before trial is scheduled to begin. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When the information alleges that the accused presented checks to merchants knowing that those checks were false documents, those factual allegations, supported by affidavit, establish probable cause that the accused violated 11 F.S.M.C. 529(1)(b). FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 522 (Chk. 2011).

Since the existence of an agreement forming a conspiracy may be proven entirely by circumstantial evidence, circumstantial evidence can be sufficient to establish probable cause that such an agreement existed. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 524 (Chk. 2011).

Redaction is not required for a defendant's statement when it is used to help establish probable cause since hearsay may be used to establish probable cause. FSM v. Sorim, 17 FSM R. 515, 524 n.2 (Chk. 2011).

An arrest warrant or summons may issue if it appears from the complaint, or from affidavit or affidavit filed with the complaint, that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant has committed it. The probable cause finding may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. Chuuk v. Mitipok, 17 FSM R. 552, 553 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Since the general rule is that virtually any evidence may be considered, a police officer may consider any evidence in determining whether reasonable suspicion or probable cause exists and the evidence to establish reasonable suspicion or probable cause may be entirely based upon hearsay. The police officers' determination of reasonable grounds and probable cause is based upon their training and understanding of conduct which forms the basis of criminal offenses. Chuuk v. Mitipok, 17 FSM R. 552, 553-54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

Probable cause exists when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive such that a cautious person would believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. Chuuk v. Mitipok, 17 FSM R. 552, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

When, although the affiant does not identify sources of information in his affidavit, the court finds that the description he includes regarding the results of his investigation are enough to enable a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the laws charged in the information occurred; when if the affiant obtained information from the statements of any witnesses, as hearsay it is permissible in making the probable cause determination; when it appears from the affidavit that the officer was able to observe damage to a vehicle that the defendant caused, the court will find that probable cause existed to support the information's charges and that defendant's motion to dismiss the information is without merit and will be denied. Chuuk v. Mitipok, 17 FSM R. 552, 554 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The government must make a probable cause showing at a hearing before pretrial restraints on a defendant's liberty can be granted. This is because a fair and reliable determination of probable cause is a condition for any significant pretrial restraint of liberty, and this determination must be made by a judicial officer either before or promptly after arrest. Affidavits can be used, if properly introduced, as evidence at that hearing to make the probable cause showing. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 320 n.7 (Kos. 2012).

Probable cause is a constitutional requirement for a warrant. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 320 (Kos. 2012).

An individual suspected of a crime must be released from detention unless the government can establish "probable cause" to hold that individual. The standard for determining "probable cause" is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 324 (Kos. 2012).

A finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. In re Anzures, 18 FSM R. 316, 324 n.12 (Kos. 2012).

Probable cause is present when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. A court must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. Chuuk v. Akapito, 19 FSM R. 13, 15 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Probable cause existed when the affidavit of probable cause includes such facts that the court can find that the detective had sufficient information to believe that it was more likely than not a violation of the law had occurred involving the defendant. Chuuk v. Akapito, 19 FSM R. 13, 15 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2013).

Article IV, § V protects individuals against illegal search and seizures, which can only be done based on probable cause. The standard for determining probable cause is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. The probable cause determination must be made by the deliberate, impartial judgment of a judicial officer. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 346-47 (Pon. 2014).

The protection in article IV, § 5 of the FSM Constitution against unreasonable search and seizure is based on a comparable provision in the fourth amendment of the U.S. Constitution. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 347 n.4 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendant was found in the area after hours and his answers to the officer's questions were inconsistent, that and the surrounding circumstances rise to the level of reasonable suspicion, but not the higher standard of probable cause, which is needed for a lawful arrest. "Reasonable suspicion" is formed by specific, articulable facts which, together with objective and reasonable inferences, form the basis for suspecting that the particular person detained is engaged in criminal activity. FSM v. Benjamin, 19 FSM R. 342, 347 & n.5 (Pon. 2014).

In adopting the Declaration of Rights as part of the FSM Constitution and therefore the supreme law of the land, the people of Micronesia subscribed to various principles which place upon the judiciary the obligation, among others, to assure that arrests are based upon probable cause. Probable cause has been defined as a reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that a crime has been committed. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 514 (Pon. 2014).

In probable cause determinations, the court must regard evidence from vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience, would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. Thus, an officer's prior training and experience is a valid source of consideration when making a probable cause determination. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 515 n.13 (Pon. 2014).

The finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. As a general rule, a police officer may consider virtually any evidence in determining whether reasonable suspicion or probable cause exists. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 515 (Pon. 2014).

Probable cause existed when the police knew a crime had occurred because they received a call reporting a break-in at the Chinese Embassy; when there was reason to believe that a crime had occurred inside the Chinese Embassy compound; when based partly on the victim's statement and the Chinese

Embassy's video surveillance, the police brought in two suspects whose statements implicated another; and when even though some of the evidence used by the police in determining that the other was a suspect to that crime was hearsay, a cautious person, based on the evidence the police already had in their possession, would have had reason to bring him in for questioning or to make an arrest without further questioning. The police have the discretion to formally arrest someone or to gather more information as they deem necessary. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 497, 516 (Pon. 2014).

Probable cause is a reasonable ground for suspicion, sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that a crime has been committed. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 634 (Pon. 2015).

In probable cause determinations, a court must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience, would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 634 (Pon. 2015).

Under the collective knowledge doctrine is a specific application called the "Fellow-Officer Rule," which expresses the principle that an investigative stop or an arrest is valid even if the law-enforcement officer lacks personal knowledge to establish reasonable suspicion or probable cause as long as the officer is acting on the knowledge of another officer and the collective knowledge of the law-enforcement office. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 635 (Pon. 2015).

A probable cause hearing is an informal, non-adversarial proceeding in which the formal rules of evidence do not apply. Thus, the finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. This is not however, an open invitation to completely ignore the FSM Rules of Evidence, and the court must discount evidence that is inherently untrustworthy or suspicious. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 635 (Pon. 2015).

In a criminal case, a prosecutor may not, at a probable cause hearing, rely solely on hearsay testimony when competent evidence is readily available from perceiving witnesses. A probable cause hearing is a matter of limited purpose, and procedural and evidentiary rules are relaxed. But hearsay evidence alone will not suffice when other, more competent testimony is available. Thus, although the strict guidelines against the admission of hearsay evidence do not apply in a probable cause hearing, the court may discount unreliable hearsay. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 635 (Pon. 2015).

Establishing probable cause on the basis of hearsay alone should only be resorted to when the testimony of a perceiving witness is unavailable or when it is demonstrably inconvenient to summon witnesses able to testify to facts from personal knowledge. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 636 (Pon. 2015).

Hearsay provided by other law enforcement officers is often reliable without requiring any additional showing. Ultimately, hearsay from the police, or other government agencies involved in law enforcement, should not be treated the same as hearsay from an unknown informant or an anonymous tip. In short, who the informant is affects how the court weighs credibility behind the allegations supporting probable cause. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 636 (Pon. 2015).

Even though admiralty and maritime cases arrests are often made without an arrest warrant, the defendant is nonetheless entitled to a judicial determination as to whether there is probable cause to detain the accused. In this hearing, the government bears the burden of proving it had probable cause to seize the vessel. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 636 (Pon. 2015).

There is a substantial difference between the quantum of proof necessary to constitute sufficient evidence to establish probable cause and that necessary to support a conviction. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 636, 638 (Pon. 2015).

When, although no one officer had all of the information, collectively the agency did; when one or more government officers had the actual knowledge of each fact necessary to support the belief; when government officers are entitled to rely on representations from fellow officers if those representations are corroborated upon investigation and do not show the indicia of error; when similarly, the government may rely on hearsay derived from other investigative agencies, specifically NORMA observers; and when, regardless of the number of hearsay layers, these intermediaries should all be presumed reliable, the information and evidence was sufficient to support probable cause by the government at the time of the arrest. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 638 (Pon. 2015).

Probable cause must be made from a reasonable person's perspective, using the fellow-officer rule, to include all of the information that collectively the government had in its possession at the time of the arrest, and not merely any one particular officer's actual knowledge. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 638 (Pon. 2015).

Hearsay can be used to support a probable cause finding, if it has the indicia of reliability. Assessments on the reliability of hearsay should include a consideration for the integrity, training, and the experience of police officers, or other law enforcement agents, from whom it comes. If, after a reasonable investigation under the circumstances, which includes the knowledge of the source, this hearsay is corroborated, it should be considered by the court and weighed accordingly. FSM v. Kimura, 19 FSM R. 630, 638 (Pon. 2015).

An arrest based upon probable cause does not violate the constitutional right to due process. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

An individual suspected of a crime must be released from detention unless the government can establish "probable cause" to hold that individual. The standard for determining probable cause is whether there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

The police had probable cause to arrest a person and that arrest was lawful when they knew that he had someone else's pigs and that he would not release them to their owner. Since his arrest was lawful, the resulting overnight detention was lawful and was not false imprisonment. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

Probable cause exists when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

In probable cause determinations, a court must regard the evidence from the vantage point of law enforcement officers acting on the scene but must make its own independent determination as to whether, considering all the facts at hand, a prudent and cautious law enforcement officer, guided by reasonable training and experience, would consider it more likely than not that a violation has occurred. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

The report of a trained and experienced fisheries observer on the scene and his later deposition testimony is more than sufficient to show probable cause – that it was more likely than not that a violation occurred – when, although the observer never actually saw a crew member throw the trash overboard, the court can infer from the circumstantial evidence that it is more likely than not that that is what occurred. Whether the government will be able to prove that beyond a reasonable doubt, a higher standard, is a matter left for trial. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 302 (Pon. 2016).

Police officers had probable cause to arrest a person, whose fingerprints were found at the crime scene, when he turned over the alleged stolen goods because probable cause is present when there is evidence and information sufficiently persuasive to warrant a cautious person to believe it is more likely than not that a violation of the law has occurred and that the accused committed that violation. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 (Pon. 2017).

The police have a reasonable suspicion about someone's involvement in the crime when they have a particularized and objective basis, supported by specific and articulable facts, for suspecting that person of criminal activity. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 & n.5 (Pon. 2017).

Even if the police officers have probable cause to make an arrest, nothing precludes them from further investigating someone before arresting him because questioning of witnesses and suspects is a necessary tool for the effective enforcement of criminal laws, and without such investigation, those who were innocent might be falsely accused, those who were guilty might wholly escape prosecution, and many crimes would go unsolved. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 (Pon. 2017).

Once someone voluntarily led the investigating officers to and surrendered the alleged stolen items, probable cause existed to arrest him and no warrant was necessary. FSM v. Isaac, 21 FSM R. 370, 374 (Pon. 2017).

Redaction is not required for a co-defendant's statement when it is used to help establish probable cause since hearsay may be used to establish probable cause. FSM v. Jappan, 22 FSM R. 81, 83 n.1 (Chk. 2018).

Article III of the Chuuk Constitution prohibits the court from issuing a warrant unless there is probable cause, supported by affidavit, specifically describing the person to be seized. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When the FSM has applied for a search warrant after granting a foreign request for mutual assistance, the warrant application must satisfy the court that there is probable cause to believe that a serious offense has been or may have been committed against the laws of the foreign state. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 455 (Pon. 2020).

It is well-established that hearsay may be used to establish probable cause. The finding of probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 456 (Pon. 2020).

For the purpose of establishing probable cause that a serious offense has been or may have been committed against the laws of a foreign state, a statement contained in the foreign request to the effect that a serious offense has been or may have been committed against the laws of a foreign state is prima facie evidence of that fact. The statute does not require that the foreign request's statement be under oath. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 456 (Pon. 2020).

An affidavit supporting probable cause is not deficient when the signature line says "notary public" below it, but the signature is that of an FSM Supreme Court court clerk and her signature is sealed by the court's seal. Nor is the inadvertent omission of the date on the line is provided for entry of the date above the clerk's signature, which the court clerk apparently neglected to fill it in before she signed, fatal to the warrant application or the warrant itself. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 456 (Pon. 2020).

While a U.S. court should, and probably will at some point, have the final say whether a helicopter's supposedly invalid U.S. registration conferred extraterritorial jurisdiction on the U.S., for the purpose of establishing probable cause that U.S. laws were violated, the helicopter's U.S. registration is sufficient. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 458 (Pon. 2020).

An FSM search warrant application established that there was probable cause to believe that a serious offense had been committed against the laws of a foreign state (the U.S.) when it showed that a U.S. registered helicopter was no longer in a flyable condition – no longer airworthy – because the helicopter had had either an "aircraft accident" as there was substantial damage to it, or because there had been a "serious incident" caused by "ground damage," to the helicopter's tail and U.S. law required that U.S. registered aircraft immediately report such events and the helicopter owner did not. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 460 (Pon. 2020).

If there is information received from a known independent source, that information may be used to establish probable cause even if the same information was also obtained through an illegal search. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

The border search exception to the constitutional search warrant requirement applies equally to persons and goods leaving the country as it does to persons and goods entering the country. A border search, or a search at the functional equivalent of a border, of outgoing passengers or goods requires neither a warrant nor probable cause. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

A warrant may not issue except on probable cause, supported by affidavit particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized. The search warrant application must particularly identify the specific property to be seized and name or describe the place to be searched. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 462 (Pon. 2020).

Article III of the Chuuk Constitution prohibits the court from issuing a warrant unless there is probable cause, supported by affidavit, specifically describing the person to be seized. Chuuk v. Hebwer, 22 FSM R. 542, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2020).

Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule 4 only allows an arrest warrant or summons to issue when it appears from the complaint, or from affidavit or affidavit filed with the complaint, that there is probable cause to believe that an offense has been committed and that the defendant has committed it, and a warrant for the defendant's arrest will issue to any officer authorized by law to execute it. It further provides that a probable cause finding may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. Chuuk v. Hebwer, 22 FSM R. 542, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2020).

When the supporting affidavit fails to allege any involvement by the two co-defendants in a conspiracy with the lead defendant, no probable cause exists to pursue the matter against the co-defendants, and, since no other counts are alleged against them, the two co-defendants will be dismissed. Chuuk v. Hebwer, 22 FSM R. 542, 543 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2020).

FSM law provides that a statement contained in the foreign request to the effect that a serious offense has been or may have been committed against the foreign state's laws is prima facie evidence of that fact. When the appellant has presented nothing that overcomes that prima facie evidence, the true real party in interest, will, of course, be able to contest whether a serious offense was committed against the laws of a foreign state – the U.S. – in the courts of that foreign state and argue there about whether the evidence seized by the FSM for shipment to Guam is evidence of the commission of that alleged serious offense. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 580, 585 (Pon. 2020).

– Traffic Stop

Stopping motorists on a public road is reasonable, even if there is no particularized suspicion of crime, but police roadblocks must be designed to advance a specific purpose, such as eradication of drunken driving, and the court must determine whether the roadblock was reasonable, through consideration of several factors: the importance of the state's interest served by the roadblock; the effectiveness of the roadblock in advancing the public interest, and the degree to which the roadblock interferes with the motorist. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 254 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a roadblock's purpose was to check motorists for valid driver's licenses and vehicle registrations, the roadblock was designed to advance a specific state and public interest of assuring that drivers are properly licensed to drive, and to assure that the vehicle being driven meets minimum safety standards by being registered, and it addressed problems which were associated with the persons stopped. When a roadblock was designed to advance a specific public interest and was effective in advancing that public interest because motorists were detained for a temporary and brief period of time, interfering with them only to a minimal degree, the roadblock was reasonable under the Kosrae Constitution and a warrant was not required to conduct it nor was a warrant required for the police to stop a person at the roadblock. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 254 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a motorist, detained at routine traffic stop for a temporary and brief period, was not arrested and was not in custody at the time he was questioned regarding his driver's license, the police questioning at the roadblock was routine questioning, conducted by government agents as part of their roadblock procedure and did not require Miranda warnings. Therefore, based upon the totality of the circumstances, that motorist was not compelled into giving incriminating evidence against himself, his right against self-incrimination was not violated by the roadblock, and the evidence thus obtained will not be suppressed. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 255 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The requirements that a person's driver's license be in the immediate possession of the operator, and that the operator display his license to a police officer upon demand do not violate the Kosrae Constitution. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 257 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A roadblock stop where all oncoming traffic was stopped is not an arrest. Just as indubitably, such a stop is a "seizure" within the meaning of the proscription against unreasonable search and seizures. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 328 (App. 2004).

The standard by which the actions of law enforcement personnel is to be measured in conducting a traffic stop is one of reasonableness. To ensure against the arbitrary invasion of an individual motorist's security and privacy interests, the stop may not involve the discretionary exercise of authority by the officers who are actually on the scene and making the stops. The stops may not be made on an ad hoc basis, but must be implemented by public safety administrative personnel as part of a legitimate, rational program intended to make the state's roads safer, and not as a means of circumventing either the probable cause or reasonable, articulable suspicion, standards that would otherwise apply to the stop of an individual motorist. The manner of stopping must be in a rational, predetermined way. Either all motorists must be stopped, or the stops must occur in a specified incremental manner, such as every second, every fifth, etc., motorist. To insure the arbitrary, discretionary conduct is not merely shifted from the officer in the field to the public safety administrator responsible for the planning and implementation of the stops, the public must be given advance notice by means of radio announcement that the stops will be held. With these safeguards in place, the state's interest in promoting roadway safety more than outweighs the intrusion upon the privacy of and momentary inconvenience to the stopped motorists. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 329 (App. 2004).

A checkpoint stop constitutes a mechanism for enforcing applicable laws. The roadblock itself, together with its prior announcement, is a means of causing people to take action to comply with applicable laws. When the stop is conducted in such a way that the rights conferred upon citizens under both Article II, § 1(d) of the Kosrae Constitution and Article IV, § 5 of the FSM Constitution are afforded adequate protection, the roadblock stop is not an unreasonable seizure. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 330 (App. 2004).

It is sufficiently plain that automobiles by their intrinsic nature implicate safety concerns. Thus it does not take a statistical analysis to make the point that they are powerful mechanical devices that must be operated in a responsible manner, and that the operation of an automobile that is not roadworthy creates a hazard for other motorists and pedestrians, and a statistical analysis, however useful it might prove, is not a critical predicate to a finding that Kosrae's program of roadway safety roadblocks is constitutional. Sigrah

v. Kosrae, 12 FSM R. 320, 330 (App. 2004).

A roadblock traffic stop may not involve the discretionary exercise of authority by the officers who are actually on the scene and making the stops. The stops may not be made on an ad hoc basis, but must be implemented by public safety administrative personnel as part of a legitimate rational program. To insure the arbitrary, discretionary conduct is not merely shifted from the officer in the field to the public safety administrator responsible for the planning and implementation of the stops, the public must be given advance notice by means of radio announcement that the stops will be held. Kosrae v. Robert, 13 FSM R. 109, 111 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The purpose of a roadblock, with proper advance notice, is a means to cause people to take action to comply with applicable laws. Kosrae v. Robert, 13 FSM R. 109, 111 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The state's radio announcements made from October 11 through 19, 2004, which stated that roadblocks would be implemented "throughout the year" without specifying the dates of the roadblocks, constituted a failure to announce the date or dates of the scheduled roadblocks necessarily and did not provide adequate advance notice to the public thus resulting in discretionary conduct by giving the public safety administrator and the police officers unfettered discretion to determine the dates of the roadblocks. This arbitrary and discretionary exercise of authority is not permissible. The advance notice and the roadblock held on October 22, 2004 did not provide the necessary constitutional protections and therefore all evidence obtained by the state against the defendant as a result of the roadblock is suppressed and not admissible at trial. Kosrae v. Robert, 13 FSM R. 109, 112 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A roadblock stop may not involve the discretionary exercise of authority by the officers who are actually on the scene and making the stops. To insure the arbitrary, discretionary conduct is not merely shifted from the officer in the field to the public safety administrator responsible for the planning and implementation of the stops, the public must be given advance notice by means of radio announcement that the stops will be held. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The purpose of a roadblock, with proper advance notice is a means to cause people to take action to comply with applicable laws. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 176 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

There are two purposes for requiring advance notice of a roadblock to the public: first, to eliminate arbitrary and discretionary conduct by the officers, and second, to cause people to take action to comply with applicable law. Accordingly, the general public, including passengers, and not just drivers, must be given advance notice. Kosrae v. Sikain, 13 FSM R. 174, 176-77 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

– Return of Seized Property

For a court to order property seized pursuant to a search warrant to be returned, the defendants' burden is to show both that there has been an illegal seizure by the state and that they have a claim of lawful possession to the property. Chuuk v. Mijares, 7 FSM R. 149, 150 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A party who denies ownership of the seized items has no standing to ask for return of the property. Chuuk v. Mijares, 7 FSM R. 149, 150 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

For a party to have a valid claim of lawful possession of alcohol seized by the state that party must have paid the possession tax on the seized items. Chuuk v. Mijares, 7 FSM R. 149, 150 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Where a defendant's motion is one for the return of seized property and he has failed to meet his burden to show a right to lawful possession, a court need not reach the issue of the illegal seizure and suppression of the evidence. Chuuk v. Mijares, 7 FSM R. 149, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Because a Rule 41(e) motion for return of seized property is predicated on the seizure's illegality and the showing of a right to possession, return of unregistered firearms is improper because possession of unregistered firearms is unlawful there is thus no right to possession. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 268 (Chk. 1998).

A criminal defendant has the right to move for the return of his property pursuant to Rule 41(e). This offers prompt and adequate relief for his grievance. FSM v. Joseph, 8 FSM R. 469, 470 (Chk. 1998).

The government may retain property seized from a criminal defendant that is not contraband or subject to forfeiture when it intends to offer the items in evidence at trial, and has a plausible reason for so intending. FSM v. Joseph, 8 FSM R. 469, 470 (Chk. 1998).

The court shall receive evidence on any issue of fact necessary to decide a motion for return of property. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 349 (Chk. 2000).

A Rule 41(e) motion to return seized property the government claims it never had will be treated as a civil proceeding and may be entertained post-judgment or prejudgment. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 349-50 (Chk. 2000).

To prevail in his motion the defendant must show that the seizure of the property was illegal, and that he is entitled to lawful possession. The burden of persuasion as to the possession is by a preponderance of the evidence. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 350 (Chk. 2000).

When the defendant has established by a preponderance of the evidence that the $900 existed, that it was in his briefcase, that it was taken from his briefcase sometime after the police obtained the briefcase and before it was returned, and that he is entitled to lawful possession of the $900.00, a motion to return will be granted and since that money is not in the possession of the government, the defendant shall have judgment against the state for $900.00. FSM v. Aki, 9 FSM R. 345, 350 (Chk. 2000).

– Warrants

Police must, whenever practicable, obtain advance judicial approval of searches and seizures through the warrant procedure. FSM v. Tipen, 1 FSM R. 79, 85 (Pon. 1982).

Without probable cause, no search warrant may be obtained and no unconsented search may be conducted. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 461 (Kos. 1984).

Police officers desiring to conduct a search should normally obtain a search warrant. This requirement serves to motivate officers to assess their case and to obtain perspective from the very start. FSM v. George, 1 FSM R. 449, 461-62 (Kos. 1984).

The standard announced in the second sentence of FSM Constitution article IV, section 5 for issuance of a warrant must be employed in determining the reasonableness of a search or seizure. Imposition of a standard of probable cause for issuance of a warrant in article IV, section 5 implies that no search or seizure may be considered reasonable unless justified by probable cause. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 32 (App. 1985).

The Constitution does not protect a person against a "reasonable" search and/or seizure and a search is reasonable where a search warrant has been obtained prior to the search. Kosrae v. Paulino, 3 FSM R. 273, 275 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Issuance of a search warrant is indisputedly within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 392 (Pon. 1992).

When a search or seizure is conducted without a warrant the burden is on the government to justify the search or seizure, but when the search or seizure is conducted pursuant to a judicially-issued warrant the burden rests with the defendant to prove the illegality of the search or seizure. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 268 (Chk. 1998).

One reason for limiting the government's right to discovery is the many other means the government has for obtaining needed information, such as the search warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10 (Chk. 2002).

Frequently, a search warrant is used at the start of an investigation before charges are brought. But no statute, rule, legal principle, or constitutional provision bars its use at a later stage in the proceeding. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10 (Chk. 2002).

Rule 16(b) only concerns the limited amount of information that the government may, in very limited circumstances, seek by discovery. It is not concerned with what the government may seek to obtain through the use of a search warrant – search warrants are not "discovery." FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10 (Chk. 2002).

Persons executing search warrants are required to promptly file a return with an inventory of the property seized. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10 (Chk. 2002).

In light of the prompt filing requirement for search warrant inventories, it would be unreasonable to expect the government's inventory to list every document when there are numerous documents. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 10-11 (Chk. 2002).

Generally, the failure to promptly file a return with an inventory is a ministerial violation which does not void an otherwise valid search in the absence of a showing of prejudice. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 11 (Chk. 2002).

The ostensible purpose of the inventory requirement is to enable the court to determine, on the face of the warrant, return and inventory, whether the seizure was properly limited to the property identified in the warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 11 (Chk. 2002).

An inventory which lists four file folders and how each folder is labeled, but which does not individually list each document in the 600 pages of documents in the folders, does not show the prejudice that would void an otherwise valid search. If the inventory were found to be inadequate, the most likely remedy would be an order for the government to file a more detailed inventory, not suppression. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 11 (Chk. 2002).

The inadvertent omission of a document from the search warrant inventory would, in itself, not be grounds to suppress that document. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 11 (Chk. 2002).

Rule 41 only requires that a return be made promptly and be accompanied by a written inventory, not that the seized property itself be brought before the court. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 12 (Chk. 2002).

A defendant is entitled to a protective order barring the admission of any of the seized items that were outside the search warrant's scope. But when there is no indication that the government intends to offer any of them in evidence, the court will not inspect each item seized and rule on its relevance and whether it was outside the warrant's scope. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 1, 12 (Chk. 2002).

As long as probable cause still exists, it is generally accepted that a warrant need only be executed within a reasonable time after its issuance, notwithstanding the presence of "forthwith" language in the warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 432 (Chk. 2003).

To "execute" a search warrant does not mean a fully completed search but to "execute" is in that instance synonymous with to serve a search warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 433 (Chk. 2003).

Even if a search warrant was valid for execution only until 4 p.m., on September 5, 2002, the government having executed, that is served, the search warrant and begun its search before 4 p.m. on September 5th, could have continued its search after 4 p.m. on the 5th until done, even if it ran over onto the 6th. The court does not see much difference between that and securing the site with police present inside to resume physically searching the next morning. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 433 (Chk. 2003).

The historical reason for restricting searches to daytime hours was that invasion of private premises in the small hours of the night and abrupt intrusion upon sleeping residents in the dark was more likely to create terror that precipitated violence. That reason does not apply to a search started in daytime that continues after dark. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 433 (Chk. 2003).

Normally, a search warrant's validity is brought into question by a motion to suppress the evidence seized as a result of the questioned warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 434 (Chk. 2003).

The reasoning behind the principle barring physical resistance to an invalid search warrant is that while society has an interest in securing for its members the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, society also has an interest in the orderly settlement of disputes between citizens and their government and it has an especially strong interest in minimizing the use of violent self-help in the resolution of those disputes particularly when a proper accommodation of those interests requires that a person claiming to be aggrieved by a search conducted pursuant to an allegedly invalid warrant test that claim in a court of law and not forcibly resist the warrant's execution at the place of search. This reasoning resonates even more strongly in Micronesia, where society has customarily prized peaceful and orderly resolution of disputes much higher than in the United States. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

At the time the FSM Constitution was framed and adopted, the prevailing U.S. constitutional analysis of its constitutional search and seizure provision, which the FSM constitutional provision was modeled after, was that persons had no right to resist a search warrant even if that warrant was invalid. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

Two old (1937 and 1924) cases that do not reflect U.S. constitutional analysis and practice at the time the FSM Constitution was drafted and adopted in the last half of the 1970's cannot be a basis for an FSM constitutional analysis of provisions adopted from and similar to a provision in the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights when those cases differ significantly from the constitutional analysis current in the 1970's. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

Process "void on its face" usually means process that the court did not have jurisdiction to issue or that was in excess of its jurisdiction. Since the FSM Supreme Court has the jurisdiction to issue search warrants anywhere in the FSM, and the island of Udot is within the FSM's territorial jurisdiction, and on September 4, 2002, the court had jurisdiction to issue a search warrant that would be valid on September 6, 2002, a search warrant used on Udot on September 6, 2002 was not void on its face. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

A defective search warrant is not a defense to a prosecution for resisting the defective warrant. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436 (Chk. 2003).

Under FSM constitutional jurisprudence, a person has no right, with some possible narrow exception, to resist a court-issued search warrant even if that search warrant turns out to be invalid. A person's remedies for being subjected to a search with an invalid search warrant are the suppression of any evidence seized, and, in the proper case, a civil suit for damages. The self-help of resistance is not a remedy and because of the Micronesian customary preference for the peaceful resolution of disputes, this conclusion is consistent not only with the FSM Constitution, but also with the social configuration of Micronesia as is required by the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 436-37 (Chk. 2003).

The issue of a search warrant's validity is not a central, or even major issue in a case of resisting a search. It is not an available defense. FSM v. Wainit, 11 FSM R. 424, 437 (Chk. 2003).

A subscriber to an internet service in the FSM may have a reasonable expectation of privacy in the content of e-mails that are stored on the server at the FSM Telecom's offices. Even though e-mails are computer generated, digital images, they are "papers and possessions" that a person reasonably expects will be kept private, and they should not be subject to unchecked governmental intrusion or seizure. Thus, before the court can issue a warrant, it must find that there is evidence sufficiently strong to warrant a cautious person to believe that a crime has been committed. In re FSM Nat'l Police Case No. NP 10-04-03, 12 FSM R. 248, 251 (Pon. 2003).

The reasoning behind the principle barring physical resistance to an invalid search warrant is that society has an interest in securing for its members the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Society also has an interest, however, in the orderly settlement of disputes between citizens and their government; it has an especially strong interest in minimizing the use of violent self-help in the resolution of those disputes. A proper accommodation of those interests requires that a person claiming to be aggrieved by a search conducted by a peace officer pursuant to an allegedly invalid warrant test that claim in a court of law and not forcibly resist the execution of the warrant at the place of search. This reasoning resonates even more strongly in Micronesia, where society has customarily prized peaceful and orderly resolution of disputes much higher than in the United States. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

At the time the FSM Constitution was framed and adopted, the prevailing U.S. constitutional analysis of its constitutional search and seizure provision, which the FSM constitutional provision was modeled after, was that persons had no right to resist a search warrant even if that warrant was invalid. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

In the FSM, a person has no right to resist the execution of a search warrant by police or government agents even if the search warrant is later shown to be invalid. Consequently, a defendant may not assert as a defense that he has no liability and may resist a search warrant if he believes it is, or if it is, an invalid warrant. The law does not permit this. The search warrant's validity is irrelevant to the case and the court will refuse to hear testimony concerning it. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

As a matter of law, a search warrant's invalidity is not a defense under 11 F.S.M.C. 107(1) because it is not a fact or set of facts which removes or mitigates penal liability. Even a belief that a search warrant is invalid does not remove or mitigate penal liability. If a person believes that he has a legal right to resist an invalid search warrant that is a mistake or ignorance of law, not a mistake (or ignorance) of fact, and that is not a defense under section 301A(3). FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 446 (Chk. 2005).

A search warrant's invalidity, or a belief it is invalid, is not a defense to charges stemming from resistance to the search warrant's execution. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 447 (Chk. 2005).

Under FSM constitutional jurisprudence, a person has no right, with some possible narrow exception which the court has not decided whether it is a viable defense, to resist a court-issued search warrant even if that search warrant turns out to be invalid. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 433, 448 (Chk. 2005).

If the building to be searched is closed, the person executing the search warrant shall first demand entrance in a loud voice and state that he desires to execute a search warrant, and if the doors, gates, or other bars to the entrance are not immediately opened, he may force an entrance, by breaking them if necessary. Thus, since the defendant's residence was completely vacant at the time with no one there to grant them entry, the national police had every right to force an entry into the residence. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 56-57 (Chk. 2006).

Once a search has been completed, the policeman taking property under a search warrant shall give to the person from whom or from whose premises the property was taken a copy of the warrant and a receipt for the property taken, or shall leave the copy and receipt at the place from which the property was taken. But, although termed "caretakers" of the property, when the municipal police did not occupy the property and could they provide entry to the residence, they were thus not persons from whom or from whose premises the property was taken and upon whom a copy of the search warrant had to be served, and since the search was not finished on September 5, 2002, whether a copy of the search warrant was left with the municipal police on September 5, 2002 is irrelevant. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 57 (Chk. 2006).

The mere presence of prosecutors during a search is not per se improper. A prosecutor may assist in a search to provide legal advice. The reason a prosecutor might not want to participate in investigative matters such as executing a search warrant is that prosecutors only enjoy a limited immunity from civil liability when participating in investigative acts, unlike the absolute immunity from civil liability that prosecutors enjoy for their actions connected with their role in judicial proceedings. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 57 (Chk. 2006).

Although a person has a right to be present while his residence is searched as long as he does not interfere with the search, members of the public and others who entered the residence after the owner had no right to be present during the residence's search. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 59 (Chk. 2006).

Although the remedy of self-help or resistance to a search thought to be unlawful is barred, the court has not decided whether there are some unlawful searches, with or without warrant, the circumstances of which would be so provocative to a reasonable man that the seriousness of the offense of resistance ought to be mitigated as a result of such provocation, and when the defendant had the opportunity to put on such evidence at trial but no such showing (by a preponderance of the evidence), was made, the court did not need to decide whether such an exception could be permitted since the search warrant execution attempt was neither provocative nor was the force used unreasonable. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 59-60 (Chk. 2006).

A person whose residence is being searched would, of course, be within his rights to tell the search party that if it insisted upon continuing its search it could do so over his protest, but that, in his view, the search warrant was invalid or expired and he would pursue every available civil remedy and suppression motion available to him so that the search party might want to reconsider whether it wanted to continue. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 60 n.8 (Chk. 2006).

A search warrant should be issued in the state where the property sought to be seized was alleged to be located. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

A return of the items seized pursuant to a search warrant must be made even if nothing is found or seized. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 (Chk. 2006).

When the defendant's arrest was by warrant, the burden of showing its supposed illegality rested with the defendant. When the defendant failed to meet that burden and when the motion's other ground that witnesses were not given required legal warnings is legally unsound, the government's failure to produce evidence at the hearing was not fatal and the motion to suppress is accordingly denied. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 185 (Chk. 2008).

The FSM Supreme Court has the authority to issue a search warrant only upon probable cause supported by affidavit and the search warrant application must particularly identify the specific property or persons to be seized and naming or describing the person or place to be searched. In re Search Warrant Application, 19 FSM R. 399, 400 (Pon. 2014).

The search warrant's particularity requirement prohibits general searches and exploratory rummaging while looking for evidence of a crime. The constitutional protection of the individual against unreasonable searches and the limitations of powers of the police apply wherever an individual may harbor a reasonable expectation of privacy. In re Search Warrant Application, 19 FSM R. 399, 400 (Pon. 2014).

When the search warrant application adequately establishes probable cause as required but is unreasonably broad in its request to search the suspect's dwelling, an adjacent house owned by his mother-in-law but believed to be used as an alternative residence, and his vehicle, the court will grant the warrant to search the suspect's dwelling and his vehicle but deny the request to search the mother-in-law's home. The breadth of the application is not supported by the facts therein because the mere belief that the suspect uses the other home as a residence is not sufficient, nor is it reason to believe that the evidence sought will be found there. The Department of Justice may file another application, or applications, supported by additional evidence, if that location is determined to be necessary to the investigation. In re Search Warrant Application, 19 FSM R. 399, 400 (Pon. 2014).

A warrant cannot stand if it is too broad or vague. The warrant must be particularly specific in designating the place to be searched or the things to be seized. In re Search of All Electronically Stored Information, 21 FSM R. 192, 193 (Pon. 2017).

To avoid turning a limited search for particular information into a general search of electronic databases, the courts have established special particularity requirements for searching electronic databases. In re Search of All Electronically Stored Information, 21 FSM R. 192, 193-94 (Pon. 2017).

Although on rare occasions, the police may have reason to believe that all of the digital information in a particular device contains evidence of a crime, judges must be vigilant in observing the FSM Constitution's particularity requirement. In re Search of All Electronically Stored Information, 21 FSM R. 192, 194 (Pon. 2017).

When, due to the lack of particularity required by the FSM Constitution, the court is not satisfied that the search warrant application and affidavit are sufficient to grant a warrant for electronically stored information, the application will be denied. The court must tread carefully because the law in this area is still developing and expanding dramatically as the digital age matures. In re Search of All Electronically Stored Information, 21 FSM R. 192, 194 (Pon. 2017).

A search warrant application may be resubmitted in order to conform to the customary practice and constitutional limitations for electronic searches. In re Search of All Electronically Stored Information, 21 FSM R. 192, 194 (Pon. 2017).

The collateral bar rule applies to the execution of search warrants. The reasoning behind the principle barring physical resistance to an invalid search warrant is that while society has an interest in securing for its members the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, society also has an interest in the orderly settlement of disputes between citizens and their government, and it has an especially strong interest in minimizing the use of violent self-help to resolve those disputes particularly when a proper accommodation of those interests requires that a person, claiming to be aggrieved by a search conducted pursuant to an allegedly invalid warrant, test that claim in a court of law and not forcibly resist the warrant's execution at the place of search. Governor v. Chuuk House of Senate, 21 FSM R. 428, 435 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Article III of the Chuuk Constitution prohibits the court from issuing a warrant unless there is probable cause, supported by affidavit, specifically describing the person to be seized. Chuuk v. Kincho, 22 FSM R. 411, 413 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

An affidavit supporting probable cause is not deficient when the signature line says "notary public" below it, but the signature is that of an FSM Supreme Court court clerk and her signature is sealed by the court's seal. Nor is the inadvertent omission of the date on the line is provided for entry of the date above the clerk's signature, which the court clerk apparently neglected to fill it in before she signed, fatal to the warrant application or the warrant itself. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 456 (Pon. 2020).

The border search exception to the constitutional search warrant requirement applies equally to persons and goods leaving the country as it does to persons and goods entering the country. A border search, or a search at the functional equivalent of a border, of outgoing passengers or goods requires neither a warrant nor probable cause. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 461 (Pon. 2020).

A warrant may not issue except on probable cause, supported by affidavit particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized. The search warrant application must particularly identify the specific property to be seized and name or describe the place to be searched. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 462 (Pon. 2020).

Courts should not invalidate the warrant by interpreting the affidavit in a hypertechnical, rather than a commonsense, manner. A technical error in description is not automatically fatal to a search warrant's validity. Absolute precision is not required in identifying the things to be seized. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 462 (Pon. 2020).

A search warrant application's misidentification of a helicopter's corporate owner is not fatal to the search warrant application or to the issued warrant because that a person owned the helicopter through one corporation and not through the another corporation, is a technical defect when it was that person being investigated and the helicopter was described with sufficient particularity that the officers conducting the search had no trouble identifying it as the thing sought when they found it. That the application misstated how that person controlled the helicopter is a mere technical defect which cannot invalidate the search warrant. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 463 (Pon. 2020).

When the Secretary of Justice has granted a foreign state's request to obtain evidence, the FSM may apply to the Supreme Court for a search warrant; or an evidence-gathering order. The statute is disjunctive. The FSM may apply for, and the court may issue, one or the other – either a search warrant or an evidence-gathering order. Or, the FSM could apply for, and be granted, both. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 463 (Pon. 2020).

A search warrant specifies the property to be searched for, and after the search warrant's execution, a receipt is left for the property taken and a return is made with the inventory of the property taken. A search warrant, by its nature, always anticipates the seizure, if found, of the property sought in the warrant. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 463 (Pon. 2020).

Evidence-gathering orders, under 12 F.S.M.C. 1709(1)(b), involve the gathering of evidence by methods other than by a search warrant, under 12 F.S.M.C. 1709(1)(a), commanding the search for, and seizure of, particular things. An evidence-gathering order may involve taking testimony, the collecting or recording of data, or producing things, documents, or copies. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 463 (Pon. 2020).

An FSM search warrant issued in response to a foreign mutual assistance request, is not a confiscation order, foreign or otherwise. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 464 (Pon. 2020).

No bond is required in order to seize property pursuant to a search warrant, but when property has been seized pursuant to a foreign state's request for mutual assistance, the Secretary of Justice, not the real party in interest, has the power to assure the foreign state's compliance with any terms or conditions that are imposed in respect of the sending abroad of the thing. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 464 (Pon. 2020).

A party generally cannot assert the rights of a third party as its own when challenging a search warrant. In re Wrecked/Damaged Helicopter, 22 FSM R. 447, 464 (Pon. 2020).

SEPARATION OF POWERS

When Congress has passed a statute, executive branch and judiciary branch members may not decide among themselves to reassign the decision-making responsibilities set forth in the statute. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 205 (Pon. 1982).

While the Judiciary must resolve disputes legitimately placed before it, it may not usurp legislative functions by making declarations of policy or law beyond those necessary to resolve disputes nor undertake administrative functions of the kind normally consigned to the Executive Branch where this is not necessary to carry out the judicial function. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 4 (Pon. 1985).

One reason the judicial power is limited to cases or disputes is to prevent the Judiciary from intruding into areas committed to other branches of government. In re Sproat, 2 FSM R. 1, 7 (Pon. 1985).

Although the internal management of a jail or prison is, subject to compliance with constitutional requirements, a function of the executive branch, the legislature controls the overall sentencing scheme through statute. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 82 (App. 1989).

In the absence of legislative action saying otherwise, it is the sentencing order, not the jailer or any member of the executive branch, which determines whether the prisoner is to be confined, and for how long. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 82 (App. 1989).

A national senator has no power to release national prisoners confined for violation of laws enacted by the national Congress. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 83 (App. 1989).

The Joint Law Enforcement Agreement between the State of Truk and the national government in no way affects the ability of a national court to require a jailer who has accepted custody of a prisoner to act in conformity with the sentencing order governing the confinement of the prisoner. Soares v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 78, 84 (App. 1989).

To the extent that Secretarial Order 3039 can be read as permitting the Trust Territory High Court to continue, after the FSM Supreme Court had begun functioning, to control cases assigned by the FSM Constitution to the FSM Supreme Court, that exercise by Congress of the transitional power under the Constitution could run counter to other specific provisions of the Constitution, especially the judiciary article, and to fundamental principles of the separation of powers; any extension by the Trust Territory High Court of the powers assigned to it under Secretarial Order 3039 would violate those same constitutional provisions and principles. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 106 (App. 1989).

The power of the President to appoint executive branch officers is not absolute, but is subject to check by the advice and consent of Congress. Sohl v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 186, 197 (Pon. 1990).

The determination of whether stockholders and directors should be protected at the expense of the general public and the employees of the corporation is, at the bottom, a policy choice of the kind that legislatures are better equipped than courts to make. Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 376, 385 (Pon. 1990).

Where the record fails to reflect that the functions of the judiciary have been prevented or substantially impaired by the financial management and fiscal powers exercised by the Secretary of Finance, the judiciary has not been deprived of its essential role and constitutional independence. Mackenzie v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 78, 84 (Pon. 1991).

The Constitution mandates that the Chief Justice by rule may govern the admission to practice of attorneys, but a rule which differentiates between FSM citizens and noncitizens inherently relates to the regulation of immigration and foreign relations which are powers expressly delegated to the other two branches of government. Berman v. Pohnpei, 5 FSM R. 303, 305 (Pon. 1992).

The Chief Justice has the constitutional authority to make rules for the appointment of special judges, and Congress has the constitutional authority to amend them. Congress has provided the Chief Justice with the statutory authority to appoint temporary justices. Where Congress has acted pursuant to its constitutional authority to provide statutory authority to the court, the court need not have exercised its concurrent rule-making authority. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 326, 331 (App. 1992).

Congress and the President respectively have the power to regulate immigration and conduct foreign affairs while the Chief Justice may make rules governing the admission of attorneys. Therefore a rule of admission that treats aliens unequally promulgated by the Chief Justice implicates powers expressly delegated to other branches. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 366 (Pon. 1992).

Without a rational valid basis for the rule limiting the number of times an alien may take the bar exam it will be held unconstitutional even if it would be constitutional if the regulation were made by Congress or the President. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (I), 5 FSM R. 364, 367 (Pon. 1992).

Conduct of foreign affairs and the implementation of international agreements are properly left to the non-judicial branches of government. The judicial branch has the power to interpret treaties. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 103 (App. 1993).

Where there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of the issue to a coordinate branch of government, such as Congress being the sole judge of the elections of its members, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 (App. 1993).

In order for a Congressional statute to give the court valid authority in those areas which the Constitution grants the Chief Justice rule-making powers the Chief Justice does not first have to promulgate a rule before Congress may legislate on the same subject. Hartman v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 293, 297 (App. 1993).

Congress, not the FSM Supreme Court, has the constitutional power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress. The court cannot exercise a power reserved to Congress. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

Courts and administrative agencies alike may not encroach upon the lawmaking responsibility reserved to the legislature. Klavasru v. Kosrae, 7 FSM R. 86, 91 (Kos. 1995).

Congress has not unconstitutionally delegated its authority to define crimes by delegating to an executive agency the power to enter into fishing agreements because congressional approval is needed for these agreements to take effect. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 127 (Pon. 1995).

When Congress has specifically given Social Security, not the courts, the discretion to levy a penalty and limited that discretion to $1,000 a quarter and Social Security has exercised its discretion by levying a penalty less than that allowed by the statute, the court is generally bound to enforce it. The courts cannot usurp the power Congress granted to another governmental body. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1997).

The determination of whether Tonga and its agents are immune from suit is a decision that is better made by the FSM government's executive branch because the FSM Constitution expressly delegates the power to conduct foreign affairs to the President and because whether a party claiming immunity from suit has the status of a foreign sovereign is a matter for the executive branch's determination and is outside the competence of the courts. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 373 (Kos. 2000).

When a Senator tells a public agency what projects are approved and the agency then carries out his decisions, it is Congress, not the executive, that is executing and implementing the public law. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 418, 420 (Chk. 2000).

Specific powers are given to each branch of the government. When Congress is executing and implementing a national law, a power expressly delegated to the executive branch, it abridges the executive's power to execute and implement national laws. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 418, 420 (Chk. 2000).

While FSM Supreme Court may determine the constitutionality under the FSM Constitution of a specific legislative act, there is no authority where a court has either ordered a legislative body to perform a specified legislative function, or held such a body in contempt for not performing that function. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 98, 99 (Chk. 2001).

One of the rationales for limiting a court's power to deciding the cases before it is to prevent the court from intruding into areas committed to the executive or legislative branches. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 98, 99 (Chk. 2001).

A court has the power to issue an order to a state official to perform a purely ministerial act – the issuance of a check – in order to cause the state to conform its conduct to the requirements of both the FSM Constitution and the national statute at issue, 11 F.S.M.C. 701. Davis v. Kutta, 10 FSM R. 98, 99 (Chk. 2001).

Specific powers are given to each branch of the government and a public law that abridges the executive's power to execute and implement national laws may be enjoined. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 357 (Chk. 2001).

Because Congress has the statutory authority to name allottees other than the President or his designee, the court will deny a request for an order prohibiting defendants from ever again being allottees of FSM money. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 359 (Chk. 2001).

The constitutional principle of separation of powers is still violated when the public law only requires that those seeking funds for improvement projects must consult with the relevant congressman before the funds are obligated instead of requiring consultation and approval by the congressman. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 359 (Chk. 2001).

Congress can give as much guidance as it wishes in the appropriation legislation about which projects will be funded, and much of this guidance will, no doubt, be the product of individual congressmen's consultation with their constituents. But this consultation takes place before the appropriation bill becomes law, not afterwards. After the appropriation bill has become law, it is the duty of those who execute the law and administer the funds to follow the guidance Congress has given them by consulting the language Congress put in the public law, and any applicable regulations, not by consulting individual congressmen. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 359-60 (Chk. 2001).

Fund categories that were formulated as the result of an unconstitutional "consultation" process with congressmen may effectively be disregarded whenever a new process is implemented to determine in a constitutionally proper manner where, how, and what to spend the improvement project money on. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 360 (Chk. 2001).

As a matter of law, some official government action is required before a violation of the doctrine of separation of powers can occur. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 630 (Pon. 2002).

The concept of separation of powers is inherent in the FSM Constitution's structure. Each branch of the FSM government has specific powers and duties enumerated in the Constitution's text. Thus, each branch should restrain itself to exercise only those powers which the people of the FSM have granted to it in the Constitution: any power exercised by a branch of the government that is beyond that which the Constitution granted to that branch violates the Constitution and is null and void. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 630 (Pon. 2002).

Any attempt by one branch to usurp the powers that the FSM Constitution explicitly grants to another branch violates the FSM Constitution and is invalid. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 631 (Pon. 2002).

The essence of the separation of powers concept is that each branch, acting within the sphere of its defined powers and subject to the distinct institutional responsibilities of the others, is essential to the liberty and security of the people. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 631 (Pon. 2002).

The separation of powers among the three branches is intended to be a self-executing safeguard against the encroachment or aggrandizement of one branch at the expense of another. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 631 (Pon. 2002).

Acts of individual senators can result in a public law being declared unconstitutional in its application. However, at a minimum, the acts of individual senators must be acts done in their official capacities as senators to establish any constitutional violation. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 631 (Pon. 2002).

The doctrine of separation of powers is not violated every time a person, who happens to be a senator, allegedly misuses property that is traceable to an appropriation made under national law. If a senator takes a car, boat, desk, computer, or pen that rightfully is in the possession of another person or entity, he should bear the same responsibility and consequences as any other person: he could be charged criminally, or sued in a civil action by the rightful owner for conversion of that property. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 632 (Pon. 2002).

The separation of powers doctrine provides that in the tripartite government structure – i.e., the legislative, executive, and judiciary branches – that prevails at the state and national levels in the FSM, each branch may exercise only the particular powers with which it has been constitutionally endowed. Through history and practice, this has meant that the legislature enacts the laws, the executive executes or enforces the laws, and the judiciary, by resolving disputes that come before it in specific cases, interprets the laws. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 260 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The separation of powers doctrine fortifies the government's constitutional makeup by requiring that each government branch exercise its assigned powers independently of the other two branches. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 260 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

While the naked right to legislate may not be delegated, the power to enforce legislation and to enlarge on standards defined in a statute can be delegated if the statute contains reasonable guidance and reasonable definition of the standards to be employed and the matter that is to be regulated. In order for the delegation of legislative authority to pass constitutional muster, there must be a delineation of policy, a designation of the agency to implement it, and a statement of the outer boundaries of the authority delegated. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 261 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Our Constitution commits to the executive branch the conduct of foreign affairs, just as it vests the judicial power in the Supreme Court and such other courts as may be established by statute. Although these powers are categorically assigned, they are not in their exercise subject to the same degree of precision. Foreign sovereign immunity is inescapably a part of foreign affairs, but it can be offered as a defense in a lawsuit. Inter-branch comity is the means by which these parallel, if not competing, concerns are recognized and integrated. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 506 (App. 2003).

Interbranch comity may manifest itself in the judicial branch's deference to the executive branch on the issue of foreign sovereign immunity. Some mechanism must be available to implement this procedure. The appellate division is disinclined to view the trial court's language that "ordered" the Department of Foreign Affairs to file the amicus curiae brief as transforming comity into a coercion that divested the Department of its discretion. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 506-07 (App. 2003).

When all that the order required was that the Department of Foreign Affairs file an amicus curiae brief, it did not require the Department to decide the issue one way or another, or for any opinion at all. But what it did do was elicit a minimal degree of interaction between the two branches involved so that the executive branch's position, or even lack of one, would become known to the judicial branch. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 507 (App. 2003).

Inter-branch comity is a two-way street. Just as the trial court's order recognized that the question of the foreign sovereign immunity putatively enjoyed by the defendants in the underlying case was appropriately decided by the executive branch's Department of Foreign Affairs, so the executive branch should participate in this process by giving its opinion on the matter, even if this means stating that it has no opinion. McIlrath v. Amaraich, 11 FSM R. 502, 507 (App. 2003).

The doctrine of separation of powers among the three branches of the national government is built into the Constitution by its very structure and the explicit language in Articles IX, X, and XI. These articles provide each branch its own specific powers and this structure provides for the independence of each branch in a system of checks and balances wherein no one branch of government may encroach upon another's domain. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 48 (App. 2003).

On its most fundamental plane, the separation of powers doctrine protects the whole constitutional structure by requiring that each branch retain its essential powers and independence. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 48 (App. 2003).

The standard for determining whether there is an improper interference with or delegation of the independent power of a branch is whether the alteration prevents or substantially impairs performance by the branch of its essential role in the constitutional system. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 48 (App. 2003).

Once a public law is enacted, the responsibility for the execution and implementation of the law rests with those who have a duty to execute and administer the law, and Senators can have no further role in its execution. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 49 (App. 2003).

The execution and implementation of the laws is an executive rather than a legislative function. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 50 (App. 2003).

A public law that specifically provides that a Congressional delegation must be consulted on the most appropriate usage of the funds before an obligation could occur runs afoul of the Constitution because it empowers the Congressional delegation to engage in an executive function by formally involving itself in executing and implementing the appropriation. Congress cannot pass laws and vest in itself or its members the power to control how that law is executed. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 50 (App. 2003).

The constitutional demarcation of powers to the three branches of the national government was established with deliberate design and purpose. The intended effect was to create a system of checks and balances between the national government's branches such that no one branch could encroach upon the power of another branch and thereby dominate the others. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 51 (App. 2003).

The standard for determining whether there is an improper interference with the independent power of a branch of government is whether the action of one branch substantially impairs another branch's performance of its essential role in the constitutional system. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 51 (App. 2003).

Congress's enactment preventing obligation of funds unless and until the allottees engaged in "consultation" with the relevant Congressional delegation, substantially impaired the allottees' performance in executing and implementing the law, which is the executive's essential and exclusive role under our Constitution. By legislating "consultation" before obligation requirement into the law, the Congress encroached upon an executive function and assumed more power than it is allowed in our constitutional system of checks and balances, thus violating the separation of powers doctrine. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 51 (App. 2003).

A President's reason for vetoing the bills passed during the Fourteenth Congress's Second Special Session is a non-justiciable issue because when the Constitution has a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Christian v. Urusemal, 14 FSM R. 291, 294 (App. 2006).

The Constitution does not limit the grounds upon which the President can veto bills. The President can veto any bill for any reason he chooses. The Constitution requires the President to return to Congress, within ten days, a bill he has vetoed along with his objections. Congress then makes its own determination of whether those objections will stand by either overriding or sustaining the veto. Invalidation or nullification of a Presidential veto is textually committed by the Constitution to Congress because the power to override a Presidential veto is expressly delegated to Congress. Christian v. Urusemal, 14 FSM R. 291, 294 (App. 2006).

The President's reasons for vetoing a bill cannot be questioned in the judicial branch. The court has no jurisdiction to grant the relief of declaring the President's vetoes void regardless of what the President's objections were. Christian v. Urusemal, 14 FSM R. 291, 294 (App. 2006).

The Constitution permits the Chief Justice to promulgate civil procedure rules, which Congress may amend by statute. Since Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute, when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. The Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Tipingeni v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 539, 542 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

Presentment to, that is transmittal to, the mayor is a prerequisite for a bill to become an ordinance, either by the mayor then signing it, or vetoing it and having his veto overridden, or by the mayor's failure to act within the prescribed time period. Thus, no bill can become law without first being transmitted to the mayor for his possible action. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 203 n.2 (Chk. 2007).

The Tolensom Constitution does not grant the Tolensom Legislature the power to create a method to "appoint" persons to the offices of mayor and assistant mayor. Those offices can be filled in only one way – by vote of the Tolensom electorate, that is, by the people of Tolensom. The only exception to that is when the mayoral office becomes vacant with less than a year left in the mayor's term, the assistant mayor assumes the office for the rest of the term. It was the Tolensom Constitution's framers' clearly expressed will that the mayor and assistant mayor be elected by the voters and not appointed by someone else. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 204 (Chk. 2007).

When the Tolensom Legislature elected in 2004 would have been the sole judge of the election of its members elected in that year and that Legislature already judged the four-year members elected, the Legislature elected in 2006 cannot be the judge of the members elected in 2004. The Legislature elected in 2006 can only be the judge of the election of the members elected in 2006. It cannot be otherwise. A later legislature cannot re-examine a four-year member's election at its whim after the mid-term election because that would make a nullity and a mockery of the provision that four at-large seats would have four year terms, not two year terms. The framers' intent is obvious. They wanted the four year seat holders to be held over throughout the term of the Legislature elected at the mid-term election, to provide a certain continuity. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 204 (Chk. 2007).

A court exercising only its inherent power would need a very extraordinary and compelling case to expunge or seal not only the judicial branch's conviction records but also the arrest records maintained by the executive branch since that would implicate separation of powers concerns. FSM v. Erwin, 16 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2008).

The legal principles of justiciability, separation of powers, the political question doctrine do not apply to a case that, at its core, is one in which each party alleges the other breached a contract, and in which the defendant also counterclaims for civil rights violation, abuse of process, civil conspiracy, intentional interference with contractual relations, libel, and slander. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 484 (Pon. 2009).

The concept of separation of powers is inherent in the FSM Constitution's structure. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM Constitution's separation-of-powers structure is derived from that in the U.S. Constitution. The similarities of the FSM and the U.S. Constitutions mandate that the FSM Supreme Court will give particular consideration to U.S. constitutional analysis, especially at the time of the Micronesian Constitutional Convention and of the Constitution's adoption. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 n.1 (Pon. 2009).

State policy-making and legislating are functions of the political branches of state government. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 558, 563 (Chk. 2009).

When the Constitution contains a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the Constitution's requirements for the separation of powers. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 186 (Pon. 2010).

The separation-of-powers concept is inherent in the FSM Constitution's structure and any power exercised by a government branch that is beyond that which the Constitution grants to that branch violates the Constitution and is null and void. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

The concept of separation of powers is inherent in the FSM Constitution's structure, and any power exercised by a government branch that is beyond that which the Constitution grants to that branch violates the Constitution and is null and void. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 548 (App. 2011).

Articles IX, X, and XI of the Constitution provide each branch of the national government with its own specific powers and this structure provides for each branch's independence in a system of checks and balances wherein no one branch may encroach upon another's domain. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161 n.2 (App. 2013).

If the trial court had taken the large step of making U.S. military retirement and U.S. social security benefits paid to FSM citizens in the FSM exempt from all legal process, that would be a judicial encroachment on Congress's power to enact laws and set public policy because those recipients would then (along with U.S. veterans) have greater judicial protection than Congress has legislated for persons (regardless of citizenship) who receive FSM social security benefits. Whether foreign retirement benefits should carry equal or greater protection from legal process than FSM social security benefits is a public policy decision to be made by the people's elected representatives in Congress, not by the unelected court. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161-62 (App. 2013).

When the legislature, by enacting a statute, declares the public policy, the judicial branch must defer to that pronouncement. Thus, when the legislature has declared, by law, the public policy, the judicial department must remain silent, and if a modification or change in such policy is desired the law-making department must be applied to, not the judiciary whose function is to declare the law but not to make it. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App. 2014).

– Chuuk

A Chuuk state statute authorizing Chuuk state senators to designate the particular projects to be financed from state funds for their own election districts was violative of the separation of powers between the executive and legislative branches of the state government, and of the right of municipalities to select their own development projects, all as provided in the Chuuk Constitution. Akapito v. Doone, 4 FSM R. 285, 286 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The ultimate interpretation of any provisions of the Chuuk State Constitution is within the sole authority of the Chuuk State Supreme Court, as the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution, and that includes the authority to interpret the meaning of whether a matter has been committed by the Constitution to another branch of government, or whether the action of that branch exceeds its authority. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 264 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The constitutional provision making the House the sole judge of the qualification of its members does not automatically preclude the Chuuk State Supreme Court from having jurisdiction to decide if a member-elect of the legislature has been excluded from membership on unconstitutional grounds; nor is the court's jurisdiction over alleged unconstitutional applications of the Legislature's powers necessarily precluded by the political question doctrine. The court ultimately has the power to determine if the Legislature has exercised its powers in an unconstitutional and invalid manner. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 264-65 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Policy determinations by other branches of the government are always to be given wide latitude when under judicial review, and policy determinations within the constitution itself must therefore receive the widest possible latitude when under review. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 269 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Courts will not attempt to interfere with or control the exercise of discretionary powers, in the absence of any controlling provisions in the law conferring the power. The fact that the exercise of a power may be abused is not a sufficient reason for denying its existence. Thus, it is a firmly established rule that the judiciary will not interfere with executive officers in the performance of duties which are discretionary in their nature or involve the exercise of judgment. Chipen v. Reynold, 9 FSM R. 148, 150 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The principle of avoiding constitutional questions was conceived out of considerations of sound judicial administration and is in accord with the principle of separation of powers of government. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Neither the Director of Treasury nor the Governor may use or direct the use of monies appropriated to pay judgments against the state for any purpose other than to pay judgments. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM

R. 48, 54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Money appropriated to pay judgments against the state may not be used to pay "settlements" or "claims" against the state which have not been reduced to judgment. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The separation of powers doctrine precludes the Chuuk State Supreme Court from exercising jurisdiction over the claims that the plaintiff should be speaker of a municipal legislature and will dismiss the action. Anopad v. Eko, 11 FSM R. 287, 290 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Whether sufficient funds are already appropriated to conduct a runoff election is not a ground to deny the petition. The lack of funds to perform a required duty is a problem to be solved by the political branches of government, not the court. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The political authority of Chuuk is divided into legislative, executive, and judicial powers. The powers delegated to the three branches are functionally identifiable, distinct, and definable. These three powers must be separate and acting independently with the intent being to prevent the concentration of power and provide for checks and balances. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The legislative branch is responsible for enacting the laws of the state and appropriating the money necessary to operate the government; the executive branch is responsible for implementing and administering the public policy enacted and funded by the legislative branch while the judicial branch is responsible for interpreting the constitution and laws and applying those interpretations to controversies brought before it. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Since the court, adhering to the authority vested in the judicial branch, should only interpret the laws regarding property in Chuuk and should not take over the legislative branch's role, when there has been no legislative intent shown of a specific desire to ascribe a property right to judgments, therefore, absent a specific Chuuk State legislation creating a specific property right, such a right cannot be ascribed to judgments. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The Legislature raises funds by enacting tax legislation and the executive collects those funds. Under the Chuuk Constitution's separation of powers scheme, the executive branch, the Governor, proposes the state's budget and how to spend the state's money, and the Legislature appropriates the funds that were or will be raised and directs the executive how to spend the appropriated funds. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 530 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Since the principle that funds appropriated for other purposes cannot be redirected to pay judgments is inherent in the separation-of-powers scheme in the Chuuk Constitution, the Chuuk State Supreme Court cannot levy any writs on Chuuk state funds because those writs would be levied on money that the Chuuk Legislature has already appropriated for another purpose. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Chuuk State Law No. 190-08, § 4 does not bar the issuance of an order in aid of judgment addressed to the state, but does bar the issuance of any order in aid of judgment that acts as an attachment, execution, or garnishment of public property. The general rule is that statutes (and case law) barring the issuance of such writs against public property are a constitutionally valid expression of the separation of powers doctrine recognizing the legislative branch's power to appropriate funds and the judicial branch's lack of power to appropriate funds. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The judicial branch can, consistent with the state's waiver of sovereign immunity, declare the amount of the state's liability, but while the Chuuk State Supreme Court is empowered to declare the rights as between a judgment creditor and the government, it cannot enforce payment of the judgment absent legislative appropriation. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Even when a state consents to be sued, its waiver of sovereign immunity does not allow its courts to force it to make an appropriation to satisfy a judgment in the absence of consent to the appropriation. When a money judgment has been rendered, the state's liability has been ascertained, but then the court's power ends. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531-32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

When Chuuk not only has not expressly waived its sovereign immunity to writs of attachment, execution, and garnishment, but has also gone further and affirmatively enacted legislation emphatically notifying the public and potential litigants that it has not waived its immunity to those writs, that statute is a valid expression of the separation of powers doctrine enshrined in the Chuuk Constitution. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 532 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

– Chuuk – Executive Powers

The governor does not have free rein to use the Attorney General's Office to litigate private matters outside the scope of his duties as governor, but until such time as he ceases to be able to act as governor pursuant to a bill of impeachment or other constitutional process he may utilize that office's services to litigate such matters as concern his acts as governor. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 259, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

For the Chuuk Governor to veto a bill he must both disapprove it and return it to the house in the legislature in which it originated within ten days of it being presented to him. Otherwise it becomes law in like manner as if he had signed it. Chuuk State Supreme Court v. Umwech (I), 7 FSM R. 600, 601 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

The Chuuk Governor's constitutional power to declare an emergency is discretionary. Whether an abuse exists is determined by an "arbitrary and capricious" standard. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 275, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The validity of the action taken following the declaration of emergency is determined by whether it was taken in good faith and in the honest belief of its necessity. Aizawa v. Chuuk State Election Comm'r, 8 FSM R. 275, 280 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Executive orders must meet constitutional standards the same as acts of legislative bodies. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

While the principal officers and advisors serve during the current term of the appointing Governor unless sooner removed by the Governor, the dismissal of non-policy making employees from public employment solely on the ground of political affiliation is not permissible. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The executive policy requiring resignation before running for a seat in the Chuuk Legislature adds a qualification prohibited by the Chuuk Constitution and is void, and therefore, the plaintiffs' forced resignation pursuant to the Governor's Executive Order or policy is unconstitutional and beyond his power. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 306 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The executive power is the power to execute, or carry the laws into effect, as distinguished from the power to make the laws and the power to judge them. All executive power is granted by the constitution, and the executive branch can exercise no power not derived from it. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 307 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A governor has only a delegated power and a limited sphere of action, and the Chuuk Constitution does not give the Governor the power to add qualifications, that a person must not be a state employee, to be a candidate for a seat in the Chuuk Legislature. Lokopwe v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 303, 307 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Neither the Director of Treasury nor the Governor may use or direct the use of monies appropriated to pay judgments against the state for any purpose other than to pay judgments. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Money appropriated to pay judgments against the state may not be used to pay "settlements" or "claims" against the state which have not been reduced to judgment. Narruhn v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 48, 54 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Neither the Legislature, nor the Governor, may add qualifications for public office beyond those qualifications provided in the Chuuk Constitution. It matters not whether the employee in question is an "exempt" employee, or one covered by the Public Service Act. All government employees, with the express exception of the Governor's principal officers and advisors (who serve at the Governor's pleasure), are protected in their political activities from the Governor's interference with their employment. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 271 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Neither the constitutional nor the statutory provision directs the Governor to implement the provisions that each municipality adopt its own constitution. The direction is aimed at the others – the municipalities and the Legislature. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 294 (Chk. 2004).

No authority, constitutional or statutory, grants the Governor the power to appoint (or to remove) municipal officials. Executive orders must meet constitutional standards, the same as acts of legislative bodies. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 294 (Chk. 2004).

The Chuuk Governor's constitutional power to declare an emergency is discretionary. Whether an abuse of discretion exists is determined by the arbitrary and capricious standard. The validity of an action taken following the declaration of emergency is determined by whether it was taken in good faith and in the honest belief of its necessity. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 294 (Chk. 2004).

A Governor's proclamation that finds that it was the intentional failure of the incumbent mayor and council that caused the lack of a municipal constitution and funding for the 2003 municipal election, but which continues those officials in office indefinitely until a constitution is adopted and an election is held but with no incentive to do either of those things and with every incentive not to, can only be termed arbitrary and capricious. Since the proclamation is arbitrary and capricious and exercises powers for which the Governor has no apparent authority, it is void. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 294 (Chk. 2004).

A Governor's proclamation that continues municipal officials in office indefinitely, violates the people's rights to substantive due process, in that they have no say in their municipal government since all of its officials are now appointed by and now hold office due to the Governor; and to equal protection of the laws, in that the municipal citizens are treated differently based on their ancestry (they and their ancestors are from Romalum) from citizens of other Chuuk municipalities in not being allowed an elected municipal government. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 295 (Chk. 2004).

The Governor's constitutional power to declare an emergency may be exercised only at a time of extreme emergency caused by civil disturbance, natural disaster, or immediate threat of war or insurrection and to issue appropriate decrees. This power is discretionary and whether the Governor (or the Lieutenant Governor acting as Governor) abused his discretion is determined by an "arbitrary and capricious" standard. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 265 (Chk. 2006).

The court cannot conclude that the Lieutenant Governor's declaration of an emergency was invalid in itself. It is within the Governor's constitutional power to determine whether there is a civil disturbance creating an extreme emergency. The court cannot question that. It is his, not a court's, power to determine. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 265 (Chk. 2006).

The second aspect of the issue is the propriety of the actions which the Lieutenant Governor's proclamation directed to be taken, or, stated another way, whether the Lieutenant Governor issued appropriate decrees. The validity of the action taken following the declaration of emergency is determined by whether it was taken in good faith and in the honest belief of its necessity. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 265 (Chk. 2006).

The Lieutenant Governor's proclamation was not an appropriate decree because it could not have been taken in good faith and with the honest belief of its necessity since, having determined that an emergency existed because of civil disturbances caused by disputes "between the Party of Kisauo Esa and the Party of Amando [sic] Marsolo," the proclamation then removed Esa from office and installed Marsolo. If civil disturbances between the two parties was causing an extreme emergency, this was an arbitrary and capricious method to address the emergency and cannot be an act taken in good faith that it would prevent further civil disturbance. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 265-66 (Chk. 2006).

An emergency proclamation that orders the Chuuk Division of Finance to identify and locate funds to fund an election and to obligate those funds for that purpose would have been an inappropriate decree if it involved the expenditure of unappropriated funds and was not approved by the Chuuk Legislature because the Chuuk Constitution provides that a gubernatorial emergency decree may not involve the expenditure of unappropriated public funds unless approved by the Legislature. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 266 (Chk. 2006).

Within 15 days after the gubernatorial declaration of emergency, the Legislature must convene at the call of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate or at the Governor's call to consider the declaration's revocation, amendment, or extension. Unless it expires by its own terms or is revoked or extended, a declaration of emergency is effective for 15 days. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 266 (Chk. 2006).

When an emergency declaration was never extended and the Chuuk Legislature never met to consider the emergency declaration's revocation, amendment, or extension, although the Governor (and presumably the Lieutenant Governor if he was still Acting Governor) had the power to call the Legislature into session to consider the emergency declaration and to approve the expenditure of funds, the failure to call the Legislature into session raises further doubts that the declaration was made in the honest belief of its necessity. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 266 (Chk. 2006).

The Chuuk Constitution is clear and unambiguous that when referring to the Governor's office, a Governor's "term" is a fixed four-year period. Thus, the phrase "current term" clearly means that if a governor is re-elected for a second four-year term, new nominations (or re-nominations) must be submitted to the Senate but otherwise a cabinet official may remain in office for a full four years unless the Governor earlier removes him (or he is impeached or he resigns). But when a new governor fills out the remainder of his predecessor's unexpired term, the new governor may retain the existing cabinet officials and special assistants without submitting their names for reconfirmation. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 137, 139-40 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Since, by statute, a governor must send a nomination to the Senate within 45 days of a vacancy in an office requiring the Senate's advice and consent and since a resignation is an act or an instance of surrendering or relinquishing of an office or a formal notification of relinquishing an office or position, when cabinet officers and special assistants have submitted "courtesy resignations," those offices are vacant and new nominations (or renominations) must be submitted. The court cannot discern any difference (in result) between a "courtesy resignation" and a resignation for other reasons since a resignation is a resignation. Senate v. Elimo, 18 FSM R. 137, 140 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

– Chuuk – Judicial Powers

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has constitutional jurisdiction to review the actions of any state administrative agency, and decide all relevant questions of law, interpret constitutional and statutory provisions and determine the meaning or applicability of the terms of an agency action. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 178, 179 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The ultimate interpretation of any provisions of the Chuuk State Constitution is within the sole authority of the Chuuk State Supreme Court, as the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution, and that includes the authority to interpret the meaning of whether a matter has been committed by the Constitution to another branch of government, or whether the action of that branch exceeds its authority. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 264 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The constitutional provision making the House the sole judge of the qualification of its members does not automatically preclude the Chuuk State Supreme Court from having jurisdiction to decide if a member-elect of the legislature has been excluded from membership on unconstitutional grounds; nor is the court's jurisdiction over alleged unconstitutional applications of the Legislature's powers necessarily precluded by the political question doctrine. The court ultimately has the power to determine if the Legislature has exercised its powers in an unconstitutional and invalid manner. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 264-65 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court has the subject matter jurisdiction to hear suits alleging that the legislature has exercised its power to be the sole judge of the qualifications of its members in an unconstitutional manner in violation of the constitutional prohibitions against ex post facto laws. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

A court should not order a traditional apology, compensation, and settlement when none has been offered voluntarily because traditional settlements are customarily non-adversarial and arrived at without outside coercion and court decisions must be consistent with custom. Alafonso v. Sarep, 7 FSM R. 288, 290-91 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A party may seek declaratory relief from the Chuuk State Supreme Court even though it may have another available remedy, but there must be an actual controversy between the parties and the matter must be within the court's jurisdiction. The court has discretion to entertain such actions if appropriate. Truk Shipping Co. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 337, 339, 342 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

It is the duty of the court in the proper case to determine whether an act of the government, including acts of the Legislature, is in conformance with the supreme law of the state. Any such act that violates the Chuuk Constitution violates the supreme law of Chuuk and must be treated as null and void. Sauder v. Chuuk State Legislature, 7 FSM R. 358, 361 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

At least three justices hear all appeals in the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division with the decision by a concurrence of a majority of the justices sitting on the appellate panel, but a single justice may make necessary orders concerning failure to take or prosecute the appeal in accordance with applicable law and procedure. Wainit v. Weno, 9 FSM R. 160, 162 (App. 1999).

In the Chuuk Constitution there is a distinction between a "decision," which must be by a majority of the appellate justices assigned to hear the case, and "orders," which a single appellate justice may make. A "decision" means the final determination of the appeal. Wainit v. Weno, 9 FSM R. 160, 162 (App. 1999).

An action of a Chuuk State Supreme Court single appellate justice may be reviewed by the court. This provides a means whereby a single justice "order" may become the appellate panel's dispositive "decision." Wainit v. Weno, 9 FSM R. 160, 162-63 (App. 1999).

The court lacks jurisdiction over the subject matter or the complaint does not state a claim or cause of action upon which relief can be granted when it asks the court to hold the removal of the Speaker and Vice-Speaker null and void. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 506-07 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

No branch of the Chuuk state government is supreme, but it is the duty of the court in each case to determine if the powers of any branch of the government have been exercised in conformity with the constitution, and if they have not, to treat their acts as null and void. Udot Municipality v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 586, 588 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Because the constitutional provision states that only one Chuuk State Supreme Court justice may hear or decide an appeal, and because "may" is permissive, not mandatory language, the Constitution contemplates that there may be an occasion when no Chuuk State Supreme Court justice would hear an appeal. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 151 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

In determining the extent of the powers of the judiciary under a state constitution, the rule is that the state constitution confers on the judicial department all the authority necessary to exercise powers as a co-ordinate department of the government. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

With regard to grants of legislative and judicial power by state constitutions, and especially regarding the principle barring implied limitations on such powers, the whole of such legislative and judicial power reposing in the sovereignty is granted to those bodies, except as it may be restricted in the same instrument. Thus the state courts have and should maintain vigorously all the inherent and implied powers necessary to function properly and effectively as a separate department in the scheme of government. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 262-63 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the constitution must be interpreted in such a way as to carry out is purposes and since the purpose of the unified judiciary must be to ensure that fair and impartial justice be provided to every citizen of Chuuk, in a case where all sitting justices are disqualified, unavailable, or have recused themselves, fair and impartial justice will be unavailable unless the Chief Justice has some method available to ensure a fair and impartial hearing. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 263 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Since the constitution must be liberally, not restrictively, construed, any attempt to place limitations on the Chief Justice's power, where no words of limitation appear, would require a restrictive interpretation of the constitution, and would violate the rules of interpretation as applied to judiciaries. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 263 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Interpreting the Chief Justice's rule-making authority and his authority to "appoint and prescribe duties of other officers and employees, as prohibiting the appointment of a special trial justice unless the appointee meets the Article VII, § 9 qualifications of associate justices, would invite invalidity and chaos. Instead, the principle of acquiescence controls. Kupenes v. Ungeni, 12 FSM R. 252, 263-64 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

A gubernatorial emergency declaration is free from judicial interference for fifteen days after it is made. Esa v. Elimo, 14 FSM R. 262, 266 n.3 (Chk. 2006).

The Legislature is a co-equal branch of government and the court does not have the authority or power to order it to take a discretionary act of appropriating funds. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The judiciary cannot usurp the other branches' powers by appropriating and spending the state's money without any regard to the Chuuk Constitution's separation of powers. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 530 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The Chuuk State Supreme Court cannot issue an order directing the payment of money by Chuuk State absent an appropriation therefor. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 530 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

The judicial branch does not have the power to appropriate money. The judicial branch cannot enact statutes or prescribe by statute. The Legislature is a co-equal branch of government and the court does not have the authority or power to order it to appropriate funds. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

For a money judgment against the state to be paid there must be an appropriation by the Legislature and the courts have no power to compel an appropriation. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 532 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

– Chuuk – Legislative Powers

The Chuuk State Legislature is limited to judging only those qualifications of its elected members that are explicitly listed within the Chuuk State Constitution. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 264 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Each house of the Chuuk State Legislature may exercise its power as the sole judge of the qualifications of its members so long as it is done in a manner that is rationally and reasonably related to the plain ordinary meaning of the text in order to comply with the state and federal requirements of due process, and not in any arbitrary or capricious manner, or in any other manner that would otherwise violate the state or national constitutions. This power may be exercised only in regard to the qualifications that explicitly appear in the constitution itself. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

No house of the legislature is bound by the decisions or determinations of a previous house. One duly elected legislature's determination of a member-elect's constitutional qualifications or disqualification to sit is not binding as legal precedent on any subsequently and duly elected legislatures, and each newly elected legislature is free to determine the meaning of constitutional qualifications and apply it in a manner that is different from that of previous legislatures, so long as its application is in conformity with the state and national constitutions. Robert v. Chuuk State House of Representatives, 6 FSM R. 260, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The power to investigate and issue subpoenas is expressly granted the legislature by the constitution. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

In determining whether the Legislature has the power to subpoena personal financial records of a public official in a legislative investigation, a court must consider the right to privacy as it specifically applies to a public official. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The power to investigate has historically been found to be an inherent power of the legislative process and a power that is very broad. It comprehends probes into departments of the government to expose corruption, inefficiency or waste, and may not be unduly hampered. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The legislative power to investigate is not unlimited. There is no general authority to expose the private affairs of individuals without justification in terms of the functions of the legislature, and the right to privacy embodied in Article III, section 3 of the Chuuk Constitution is a restraint on the investigative power of the legislature. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The legislature's investigative powers are greatest when it is inquiring into and publicizing corruption, maladministration or inefficiency in the agencies or branches of government. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 265 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The Chuuk House of Representatives possesses the sole authority and power to pass a Bill of Impeachment seeking to remove those state officials responsible for misfeasance or malfeasance. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The Chuuk House of Representatives has no criminal prosecution function. It is limited to passing laws and under the proper circumstance bringing bills of impeachment, which are not criminal in nature. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 261, 266 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The Chuuk State Legislature has the express constitutional power to conduct investigations and to issue subpoenas in aid of an investigation. Each house has all the authority and attributes inherent in legislative assemblies. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Constitutional protections are a restraint on legislative investigations. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 331 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Any committee formed by a house of the legislature is restricted to the missions delegated to it, i.e., to acquire certain data to be used in coping with a problem that falls within the house's legislative sphere. This jurisdictional concept requires that material sought by the committee be pertinent or relevant to this function in order to compel disclosure from an unwilling witness. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 332 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

A court must presume that an action of a legislative body was taken with a legitimate object if it is capable of being so construed, and has no right to assume that the contrary was intended. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 332-33 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

A committee of the legislative house constitutionally charged with the function of impeachment whose authorizing resolution empowered it to investigate the state's insolvency and the executive branch officers' misfeasance, malfeasance, or failure to carry out their duties and responsibilities, presented with evidence that the governor has illegal sources of income that may involve state funds is seeking relevant material related to its function when it seeks to subpoena the governor's bank records. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 333 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

All citizens generally have the duty to, and state officials are obligated by statute to, cooperate with legislative investigations. These obligations of citizenship and public office are linked with the assumption that the legislature will respect individuals' constitutional rights, including the right of privacy. In re Legislative Subpoena, 7 FSM R. 328, 333-34 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Once the First Chuuk Legislature has set the salaries of it members by statute, no increase in their salaries is effective until after approval by the voters in a referendum. Sauder v. Chuuk State Legislature, 7 FSM R. 358, 361 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Expense allowances for a member of the Chuuk Legislature may not exceed 20% of his salary. Sauder v. Chuuk State Legislature, 7 FSM R. 358, 362 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Salary and expense allowances for members of the Chuuk Legislature cannot exceed ¾ of the equivalent the Governor is entitled to. Sauder v. Chuuk State Legislature, 7 FSM R. 358, 362-63 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Any form of legislative remuneration, compensation or reimbursement for Chuuk legislators is limited to 1/5 of a legislator's salary. An unrestricted "representation allowance" is an unconstitutional form of compensation. Sauder v. Chuuk State Legislature, 7 FSM R. 358, 364 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Even in the absence of a general reduction of the pay of all state employees which would allow the Chuuk Legislature to reduce the pay of judges, the legislature has authority to reduce the pay of other judiciary employees. When there is no general reduction of salaries, a law reducing the Chuuk State Supreme Court justices' salaries is invalid. Chuuk State Supreme Court v. Umwech (II), 7 FSM R. 630, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

Reading the constitutional provision barring impairment of contracts in harmony with the provision allowing general reduction of salaries, the exclusion of contract employees does not preclude the Chuuk Legislature from enacting a general reduction of salaries. Chuuk State Supreme Court v. Umwech (II), 7 FSM R. 630, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

Because the provision permitting an automatic increase back to their former salaries by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and the members of the legislature, is severable, it thus may be ruled unconstitutional without affecting the validity of the rest of the statute. Chuuk State Supreme Court v. Umwech (II), 7 FSM R. 630, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

A state legislative body has the power to choose its own speaker from its own members and to appoint its own officers. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 505 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A state legislative body, having the power to choose its own speaker from its own members, also has the inherent power to remove such officer at its will or pleasure. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 506 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Chuuk Constitution requires that every 2 years when a new Legislature convenes, each house shall organize by the election of one of its members as presiding officer, but it does not require that he remain in office throughout his term. Christlib v. House of Representatives, 9 FSM R. 503, 507 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a constitution establishes specific eligibility requirements for a particular constitutional office, the legislature is without power to require different qualifications and when there is no direct authority in the constitution for the legislature to establish qualifications for office in excess of those imposed by the constitution, such extra qualifications are unconstitutional. Olap v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 531, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The Chuuk Constitution does not, either expressly or by implication, give the Legislature any authority whatsoever, to add qualifications for persons seeking a legislative office beyond those in the Constitution. Olap v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 531, 533 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

It is beyond the power of the Legislature to enact a law to prohibit government employees from becoming candidates for legislative service. Olap v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 9 FSM R. 531, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Even if the purported enactment of the education qualifications for mayor and assistant mayor were unquestionably enacted, the municipal council is without authority to add qualifications to those set out in the municipal constitution unless the constitution so authorizes the council. Chipen v. Election Comm'r of Losap, 10 FSM R. 15, 17-18 (Chk. 2001).

Temporary Chuuk State Supreme Court justices, appointed for the limited purpose of hearing the appeal, may be a justice of the FSM Supreme Court, a judge of a court of another FSM state, or a qualified attorney in the State of Chuuk. FSM citizenship is not a constitutional requirement to be a temporary Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate justice and the Legislature cannot add it by statute. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

When the Constitution sets forth the requirements for office and does not authorize the Legislature to add further requirements, it is barred from doing so. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 152 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

Legislative houses are the final judges of their memberships and under the Chuuk Constitution each house is the sole judge of the election and qualification of its members. This does not make an election case about a member-elect non-justiciable until such time as the house has taken its final action. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The Legislature has, under its power to prescribe by statute for the regulation of the certification of elections and under its power to provide by law for review of administrative agency decisions, the power to place the jurisdiction to review Election Commission decisions in the Chuuk State Supreme Court appellate division rather than in the trial division. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 155 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

An order to show cause to the entire Chuuk Legislature requiring it to demonstrate why it should not be held in contempt for failing to pay the judgment will not be issued because it is not for the court to intrude in this manner into areas committed to the province of the state legislature. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 540 (Chk. 2003).

The Chuuk state government's legislative power is vested in the Legislature, and extends to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Chuuk or FSM Constitutions. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 357 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

All public expenditures are required to be for a defined public purpose and the procedures for demonstrating entitlement to public expenditures are implemented through the Financial Management Act. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 79 & n.5 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Funds appropriated under the Speaker and Staff Travel Fund Act provide for the official travel of the Speaker and Legislature employees and enable members to attend various public functions, as specified in the act. The Speaker administers the fund and authorizes selected persons to receive monies, subject to the act's limitations and appropriations to carry out the purposes of the act are authorized from the General Fund. Chuuk v. Robert, 16 FSM R. 73, 79 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The Legislature is a co-equal branch of government and the court does not have the authority or power to order it to take a discretionary act of appropriating funds. Narruhn v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 18 FSM R. 16, 20 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

The legislative branch's filing of a lawsuit is not an attempt to execute a statute when the lawsuit attempts to obtain a judicial interpretation of the statute's effect or meaning. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 505 (Chk. 2013).

The judicial branch does not have the power to appropriate money. The judicial branch cannot enact statutes or prescribe by statute. The Legislature is a co-equal branch of government and the court does not have the authority or power to order it to appropriate funds. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

– Executive Powers

Under our Constitution the Executive Branch is expressly delegated the power to faithfully execute and implement all national laws. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 418, 420 (Chk. 2000).

Specific powers are given to each branch of the government. When Congress is executing and implementing a national law, a power expressly delegated to the executive branch, it abridges the executive's power to execute and implement national laws. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 418, 420 (Chk. 2000).

The Constitution gives Congress the authority to appropriate public funds, but the Executive Branch is expressly delegated the power to faithfully execute and implement all national laws and a public law that appropriates public funds is a national law. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 357 (Chk. 2001).

The national government's executive power is vested in the President of the Federated States of Micronesia and expressly includes the power to faithfully execute and implement the provisions of the Constitution and all national laws. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 48 (App. 2003).

Congress has its constitutional role of carrying out its legislative power by enacting national laws. Once national laws are enacted, the Executive Branch then has its constitutional role of carrying out its executive power by seeing to the execution and implementation of these laws. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 51 (App. 2003).

Allottees, either specifically designated in an appropriations law or in the Financial Management Act, have their role in administering the law. Allottees' role in the execution, implementation, and administration of the law is executive in nature and must be considered as such. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 51 (App. 2003).

The power to faithfully execute and implement the Constitution's provisions and all national laws is expressly delegated to the President. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 583 (App. 2004).

Although it may be true in the general case that when the FSM is claiming executive privilege it has an initial duty to provide a sworn declaration demonstrating that the discovery at issue is privileged, but when discovery is sought from a president, no such declaration will be required since presidential communications are "presumptively privileged." This is because a court is not required to proceed against the president as against an ordinary individual. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM president is not only the head of a co-equal branch of government, but is also both the FSM's head of state and head of government. The vice president functions either as an acting president or as one in waiting, who is keeping himself informed and prepared should some unfortunate event occur that would require him to act as president. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

Although a former president may not retain the capacity to either assert or waive an executive privilege, an incumbent president can claim the privilege on his predecessor's behalf. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 511 (Pon. 2009).

The presidential executive privilege is rooted in the separation of powers doctrine and in the principle that confidentiality in communications between the president and his advisors should enhance the quality of discussion and government decisions. However, this presumptive privilege is not absolute and must be considered in the light of the rule of law. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

A party seeking discovery, who is confronted with an executive privilege claim, may overcome that claim if the discovery would 1) lead to admissible evidence; 2) is essential to the party's case; 3) is not available through any alternative source or less burdensome means; and 4) will not significantly interfere with the official's ability to perform his governmental duties. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff contends that the depositions of the president, vice president, and former president would yield admissible evidence about the discussions during high-level national-state government meetings on replacing the plaintiff as the Project Management Unit since the presidents and vice president were the only persons present at all of those meetings and should thus have unique, relevant testimony, the plaintiff has not met its burden to show that information about those meetings cannot be obtained through alternative sources or less burdensome means since a number of other persons were present at each of those meetings. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 508, 512 (Pon. 2009).

Once a public law is enacted, the responsibility for the execution and implementation of the law rests with those who have a duty to execute and administer the law. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 188 (Pon. 2010).

Once a public law is enacted, the responsibility for the execution and implementation of the law rests with those who have a duty to execute and administer the law, and Senators can have no further role in its execution. The basic constitutional principle involved is that the execution and implementation of the laws is an executive rather than a legislative function. The Constitution affords the Congress great latitude in making policy decisions through the process of enacting legislation, but once Congress enacts legislation, its role ends: Congress can thereafter formally affect the execution of its enactment only by enacting appropriate new legislation. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 548 (App. 2011).

Because an access agreement does not give exclusive rights either to negotiate permits on behalf of all foreign vessels or to exploit the FSM's EEZ, it is more properly a permit or license. Administration of a permit or license scheme is, by its nature, administrative, and thus an executive branch function. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 549 (App. 2011).

The power to appoint and confirm members of the Social Security Board is vested in the national government's Executive and Legislative branches. To halt the Board's function when all vacancies are not filled would adversely affect the Social Security's function as a whole, and would be detrimental to the livelihood of social security benefit recipients. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

– Judicial Powers

The FSM Supreme Court has broad rule-making powers under the Constitution. FSM Const. art. XI, § 9. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 17 (Pon. 1981).

The Constitution unmistakably places upon the judicial branch ultimate responsibility for interpretation of the Constitution. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 343 (Pon. 1983).

By using the United States Constitution as a blueprint, the framers created a presumption that they were adopting such a fundamental American Constitutional principle as judicial review, found to be inherent in the language and very idea of the United States Constitution. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 348 (Pon. 1983).

The power to issue declaratory judgments is within the judicial power vested in the FSM Supreme Court by article XI, section 1 of the Constitution and confirmed by the Judiciary Act of 1979. The FSM Supreme Court may exercise jurisdiction over an action seeking a declaratory judgment so long as there is a "case" within the meaning of article XI, section 6(b). Ponape Chamber of Commerce v. Nett Mun. Gov't, 1 FSM R. 389, 400 (Pon. 1984).

An attorney's professional activities are individually subject to regulation by the judiciary, not by the administrators of the Foreign Investment Act. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 427 (Pon. 1988).

The Constitution places control over admission of attorneys to practice before the national courts, and regulation of the professional conduct of the attorneys, in the Chief Justice, as the chief administrator of the national judiciary. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 27 (App. 1989).

While the FSM Constitution provides initial access to the FSM Supreme Court for any party in article XI, section 6(b) litigation, the court may, having familiarized itself with the issues, invoke the doctrine of abstention and permit the case to proceed in a state court, since the power to grant abstention is inherent in the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court, and nothing in the FSM Constitution precludes the court from abstaining in cases which fall within its jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b). Ponape Transfer & Storage, Inc. v. Federated Shipping Co., 4 FSM R. 37, 42-43 (Pon. 1989).

The FSM Constitution provides no authority for any courts to act within the Federated States of Micronesia, other than the FSM Supreme Court, inferior courts to be established by statute, and state or local courts. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 105 (App. 1989).

The provisions of the FSM Constitution spelling out jurisdiction and vesting the entire judicial power of the national government in the FSM Supreme Court are self-executing, and the judicial power of the FSM Supreme Court is not dependent upon congressional action. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 105-06 (App. 1989).

The Supreme Court of the FSM has the constitutional power and obligation to review legislative enactments of Congress and to set aside national statutes to the extent they violate the Constitution. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 324 (App. 1990).

Although judiciaries are vested with power to require or authorize initiation of criminal contempt proceedings, and may appoint private counsel to prosecute those proceedings, judiciaries typically attempt to appoint for that purpose government attorneys who are already responsible for public prosecutions. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Transp. Auth., 5 FSM R. 62, 66 (Pon. 1991).

The legislative enactment of the Financial Management Act does not conflict with the constitutional provision stating the Chief Justice is the chief administrator of the national judiciary. Mackenzie v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 78, 80 (Pon. 1991).

The constitutional provision making the Chief Justice the chief administrator of the national judiciary was not intended to establish a separate administration of funds allotted to the judiciary; it is not so specific as to overcome the presumption of the constitutionality of the Financial Management Act as it relates to the judiciary. Mackenzie v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 78, 82-83 (Pon. 1991).

It is the duty of the FSM Supreme Court to review any national law, including a treaty such as the Compact of Free Association, in response to a claim that the law or treaty violates constitutional rights, and if any provision of the Compact is contrary to the constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, then that provision must be set aside as without effect. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 98 (Pon. 1991).

The Chief Justice has the constitutional authority to make rules for the appointment of special judges, and Congress has the constitutional authority to amend them. Congress has provided the Chief Justice with the statutory authority to appoint temporary justices. Where Congress has acted pursuant to its constitutional authority to provide statutory authority to the court, the court need not have exercised its concurrent rule-making authority. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 326, 331 (App. 1992).

The Chief Justice may appoint an acting chief justice if he is unable to perform his duties. "Unable to perform his duties" refers to a physical or mental disability of some duration, not to the legal inability to act on one particular case. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 326, 331 (App. 1992).

The FSM Supreme Court is immune from an award of damages, pursuant to 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), arising from the performance by the Chief Justice of his constitutionally granted rule-making powers. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

The Chief Justice, in making rules, is performing a legislative function and is immune from an action for damages. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

The grant of immunity to the Chief Justice while performing his rule-making authority is to protect the independence of one exercising a constitutionally granted legislative power. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

Where there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of the issue to a coordinate branch of government, such as Congress being the sole judge of the elections of its members, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 (App. 1993).

A judge cannot adopt a procedure not provided for by the rules because the Constitution grants the Chief Justice, and Congress, the power to establish rules of procedure. FSM v. M.T. HL Achiever (II), 7 FSM R. 256, 258 (Chk. 1995).

No court, municipal, state, or otherwise, has the jurisdiction to question the internal workings of a legislative body. Anopad v. Eko, 11 FSM R. 287, 290 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Supreme Court has the power to review Congress's legislative enactments and the implementation of those enactments, and it has the responsibility to set aside any national statute to the extent that it violates the Constitution. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 47 (App. 2003).

When a party before the court insists that a particular national law contains provisions contrary to the Constitution, the court is required by the Constitution to consider that assertion. If it determines that the statutory provision is indeed repugnant to the Constitution, it may not enforce the statutory provision nor permit its enforcement by others. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 47 (App. 2003).

The national government's judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court and inferior courts established by statute. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 48 (App. 2003).

The Constitution permits the Chief Justice to promulgate rules, including criminal procedure rules, which Congress may amend by statute. Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute, and when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. The Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 383 (Chk. 2004).

The Constitution contemplates that administrative duties are an integral part of the Chief Justice's role, and in this regard they are manifestly judicial. He may delegate those duties pursuant to express constitutional authority, and they do not become nonjudicial because they are performed by the Chief Justice's designee. The contrary is the case, especially in light of the fact that the office of court administrator is one of only a handful of public offices specifically referred to in the Constitution. The administration of the court is an essential activity without which the court cannot function. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 585 (App. 2004).

If there is a conflict between the Supplemental Admiralty and Maritime Rules and Title 24, then Title 24 must prevail because the Constitution permits the Chief Justice to promulgate procedural rules, which Congress may amend by statute and since Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute (and when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid) and the Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 365, 367 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

The Constitution unmistakably places upon the judicial branch the ultimate responsibility for interpretation of the Constitution and for determining the constitutionality of statutes. It is the special province and duty of the courts, and the courts alone, to say what the law is and to determine whether a statute is constitutional. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 187 (Pon. 2010).

While all public officials are sworn to uphold the Constitution, the Constitution places upon the courts the ultimate responsibility for interpreting the Constitution. The court is forsworn by the Supremacy Clause from enforcing national laws or treaties contrary to the Constitution itself. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v.

National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 187 (Pon. 2010).

The question of a statute's constitutionality is not a nonjusticiable political question textually reserved to Congress. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 187 (Pon. 2010).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because while the chief justice has the power to promulgate procedural rules, the rules may be amended by statute, and since the chief justice does not have the power to amend a statute, when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/V Mell Sentosa, 17 FSM R. 478, 479 (Yap 2011).

The court may hold the political branches to account for violations of the Constitution, but it cannot force them to choose one constitutional method over another. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 18 FSM R. 177, 180 (Pon. 2012).

It is the special province and duty of the courts, and of the courts alone, to say what the law is and to determine whether a statute is constitutional. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 505 (Chk. 2013).

It is within the FSM Supreme Court's province to determine whether a Chuuk statute, as applied, runs afoul of the FSM Constitution. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 505 (Chk. 2013).

Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute (and when Congress enacts a procedural rule, it is valid) but the Chief Justice does not have the power to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Thus, if a statute applies and the statute and the admiralty rule conflict, the statute must prevail. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 532, 539 (Yap 2013).

While Congress has the authority to amend rules by statute, the Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend statutes by creating rules. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 595 (Kos. 2013).

The separation-of-powers doctrine enshrined in the Constitution bars the FSM Supreme Court from legislating. The court has the ultimate responsibility in interpreting the law and in deciding what the law is and it has the ability to set aside any statute to the extent that the statute violates the Constitution. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161 (App. 2013).

The FSM Supreme Court lacks the power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress because the Constitution reserves that power to Congress, and the court cannot exercise a power that only Congress has. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 296 (Pon. 2016).

The Supreme Court has the power to review legislative enactments of the Congress, and the implementation of those enactments, and it has the responsibility to set aside any national statute to the extent that it violates the Constitution. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 560 (Pon. 2016).

The court should not and cannot make choices that the Constitution assigns to Congress. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because, while the Chief Justice can promulgate procedural rules, the rules may be amended by statute, and because the Chief Justice does not have the power to amend a statute, a Congressionally enacted procedural rule is valid. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 550 (App. 2018).

A court cannot strike down or enjoin statutes merely because they might be unwise and some other course of action is better. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 267 (Chk. 2019).

Courts have no responsibility for the justice or wisdom of legislation, and no duty except to enforce the law as it is written, unless it is clearly beyond the lawmaking body's constitutional power. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 526 (App. 2020).

– Kosrae

The doctrine of separation of powers does not prevent courts from modifying sentences even though the effect of modification may be the same as commuting the sentence. Kosrae v. Mongkeya, 3 FSM R. 262, 263-64 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The executive authority to grant clemency is a function of the separation of powers between the executive and the judiciary to check sometimes mechanical jurisprudence which might work harsh results in individual cases. Kosrae v. Mongkeya, 3 FSM R. 262, 264 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

It is an inconsistency and a conflict with the legislative role in the Kosrae government when a member of the Legislature is made an allottee of funds for a purpose other than the operation of the legislature. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 339 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The legislature has some discretion as to who it may make an allottee and complete discretion as to the purpose and policies behind the allotment, but the function of the allottee is definitely not legislative in character. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 340 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The Legislature may make a delegation of power to specified officials, or administrative agencies within the executive branch. This necessarily includes the Governor, and such a delegation is appropriate because a proper, limited delegation of power confers on the delegatee the power to bring about a result that has already been legislated. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 261 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A delegation of power that passes constitutional muster confers specified powers on the executive to execute and enforce the law. This is the executive branch's acknowledged role, and the governor's inclusion on a board that promulgates Public Service System rules and regulations confers on him specific powers to facilitate what is already the Governor's province to do, i.e., to execute and enforce state laws. Thus the governor's inclusion as a member of the board does not, per se, give rise to a constitutional infirmity. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 261 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Legislature may not by legislative act create a board to implement the Kosrae Public Service System and at the same time retain a degree of control over the board by appointing the Speaker as one of its members. Delegation of legislative authority may not proceed by half measures. To do so is to violate the separation of powers doctrine. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 261-62 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The inclusion of the Kosrae State Court Chief Justice and the Kosrae Legislature Speaker on the Kosrae Public Service System Oversight Board is an impermissible delegation of legislative authority, violating the separation of powers doctrine. The Governor's inclusion on the board does not per se contravene that same principle. Sigrah v. Speaker, 11 FSM R. 258, 262 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

– Kosrae – Executive Powers

If required to preserve the public peace, health, or safety, at a time of extreme emergency caused by civil disturbance, natural disaster, or immediate threat of war or insurrection, the Governor may declare a state of emergency and issue appropriate decrees. Although a declaration of emergency may not impair the power of the judiciary, it may impair a civil right to the extent actually required for the preservation of peace, health, or safety. Unless it expires by its own terms, is revoked or extended, a declaration of emergency is effective for thirty days. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 66 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

– Kosrae – Judicial Powers

A fundamental precept of judicial independence is that the judiciary must not be dependent upon other branches of government in order to carry out judicial responsibilities. Article VI, section 8 of the Kosrae Constitution expressly confirms that the judicial branch is to control its own administration. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 92, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The Kosrae Constitution contemplates that justices of the FSM Supreme Court may decide cases which arise within Kosrae and fall under the original jurisdiction of the Kosrae State Court. In addition, the Kosrae Constitution vests in the Kosrae Chief Justice the power to include the resources and justices of the FSM Supreme Court as resources of the Kosrae State Court, insofar as that is consistent with the duties of the FSM Supreme Court under the FSM Constitution. Heirs of Mongkeya v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 3 FSM R. 92, 97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

– Kosrae – Legislative Powers

The power of the legislature is to decide what the law shall be, to determine public policy and to frame the laws to reflect that public policy. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 336 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

It is an inconsistency and a conflict with the legislative role in the Kosrae government when a member of the Legislature is made an allottee of funds for a purpose other than the operation of the legislature. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 339 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The legislature has some discretion as to who it may make an allottee and complete discretion as to the purpose and policies behind the allotment, but the function of the allottee is definitely not legislative in character. Siba v. Sigrah, 4 FSM R. 329, 340 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Kosrae state legislators are, in all cases except felony or breach of peace, privileged from arrest during their attendance at sessions or committee meetings of the Legislature, and in going to and returning from the same. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 253 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A practice which has been engaged in by a government for a significant period of time is entitled to great weight in establishing the constitutionality of that practice. Thus, when the licensing of vehicle operators and that the license be in the immediate possession of the driver has been required for at nearly forty years, this significant period of time and therefore the licensing and possession requirement is entitled to great weight in establishing the constitutionality of that practice. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 256 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Passage of a legislative resolution that submits a request to the Governor which the Governor may or may not carry out at his discretion creates no legally enforceable rights by which the Kosrae Legislature may compel the Governor's compliance, especially when the Governor is not a party to the action. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 499 (Kos. 2003).

A law enacted by the Kosrae Legislature is the highest form of setting forth the legislature's policy decisions and such laws can create legal rights that may be enforceable in the courts. But when the subject bill is not yet law, having been vetoed by the Governor, and the bill requires action by the Governor who is not a party to the action, there is no injury to the plaintiff created from noncompliance with the bill's provisions. Eighth Kosrae Legislature v. FSM Dev. Bank, 11 FSM R. 491, 499 (Kos. 2003).

Within thirty days after the declaration of emergency, the Legislature must convene at the call of the Speaker or the Governor to consider revocation, amendment or extension of the declaration. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 66 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A declaration of a state of emergency requires a time of "extreme emergency" caused by civil disturbance, natural disaster or immediate threat of war or insurrection. The word "emergency" is a sudden unexpected happening or an unforeseen occurrence or condition. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 66 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A civil disturbance or civil disorder is a public disturbance involving acts of violence by a group of three or more persons, which causes an immediate danger of or results in damage or injury to the property or person of any other individual. Suicides and suicide attempts, as they have occurred in Kosrae State during 2003 and 2004, do not rise to the level of a civil disturbance or civil disorder. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 66 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A nuisance is an activity which arises from unreasonable or unlawful use by a person of his own property, and that disturbs another in possession of his property, or an offensive, unpleasant, or obnoxious thing or practice, especially a continuing or repeated invasion or disturbance of another's right. While it is undisputed that suicides and suicide attempts are events which disturb others, particularly family members and friends, and possibly a large number of persons in the community on a small island such as Kosrae, these events cannot be classified as public nuisances. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 66-67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The issuance of an Executive Decree, pursuant to Kosrae Constitution, Article V, section 13, is an extraordinary power which may be applied only in extreme emergency situations. The issuance of an Executive Decree may not be utilized as a tool to remedy a state of affairs which does not meet the definition of extreme emergency, and which may be addressed by legislation. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The Governor's issuance of Declaration of Temporary State of Emergency and the Executive Decree, which prohibited the issuance of drinking permits, possession and consumption of alcoholic drinks by persons under the age of 35 and revoked drinking permits which had been issued to persons under the age of 35, exceeded the authority granted to him by the Kosrae Constitution, Article V, Section 13 because there was no civil disturbance, riot, typhoon, natural disaster or immediate threat of war or insurrection which constituted an "extreme emergency" and the Decree was therefore unconstitutional and void. Any criminal charges which have been based upon violation of the Executive Decree must be dismissed. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

– Legislative Powers

It is doubtful that Congress would have the power to require that all criminal prosecutions be in the name of the Federated States of Micronesia. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 31 (Pon. 1981).

The Seaman's Protection Act, originally enacted for the entire Trust Territory by the Congress of Micronesia, relates to matters that now fall within the legislative powers of the national government under article IX, section 2 of the Constitution, and has therefore become a national law of the Federated States of Micronesia under article XV. That being so, a claim asserting rights under the Act falls within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution as a case arising under national law. 19 F.S.M.C. 401-437. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 72 (Kos. 1982).

The tax on gross revenues falls squarely within the constitutional authorization given to Congress by article IX, section 2(e) to tax income. Ponape Federation of Coop. Ass'ns v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 124, 126 (Pon. 1985).

That Congress may tax "gross income" is plainly and unmistakably provided for in the words of article IX, section 2(e) of the Constitution. Ponape Federation of Coop. Ass'ns v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 124, 127 (Pon. 1985).

Congress enacted Public Law No. 1-72 and confirmed the legislative power of state governments to supersede Trust Territory statutes within the scope of their exclusive powers. Pohnpei v. Mack, 3 FSM R. 45, 54 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

While Congress may have the power to prohibit the taking of and killing of turtles within the twelve mile area as a matter of national law, it should lie with Congress, and not the court, to determine whether the power should be exercised. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 480 (Pon. 1988).

Once Congress has set a policy direction, barring constitutional violation, it is the duty of this court to ascertain and follow that guidance. In re Cantero, 3 FSM R. 481, 484 (Pon. 1988).

Primary responsibility, perhaps even sole responsibility, for affirmative implementation of the Professional Services Clause, FSM Const. art. XIII, § 1, must lie with Congress. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 29 (App. 1989).

The fixing of voting requirements is a uniquely political task and falls within the purview of the political arms of the government, so long as no legal rights are violated by a particular method selected. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 324 (App. 1990).

The nature of a constitutional convention as authorized by the FSM Constitution, with direct control of the people over the identity of convention delegates, and ultimate acceptance of the products of the convention's efforts, and the fact that the framers views a constitutional convention as a standard and preferred amendment mechanism, preclude congressional control over the convention's decision-making. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 327 (App. 1990).

Congress has no power to specify voting requirements for the Constitutional Convention and therefore any attempt to exercise this power so as to uphold tradition is also outside the powers of Congress under article V, section 2 of the Constitution, which is not an independent source of congressional power but which merely confirms the power of Congress, in exercising national legislative powers, to make special provisions for Micronesian tradition. Constitutional Convention 1990 v. President, 4 FSM R. 320, 328 (App. 1990).

The legislative enactment of the Financial Management Act does not conflict with the constitutional provision stating the Chief Justice is the chief administrator of the national judiciary. Mackenzie v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 78, 80 (Pon. 1991).

The legislative passage of the Financial Management Act rests upon the provisions of the Constitution, pursuant to which the Department of Finance and the General Fund were established to oversee the national administration and management of public money. Mackenzie v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 78, 81 (Pon. 1991).

Historically the concept of a single, general fund administered by one person is found in laws enacted by the Congress of Micronesia. The enactment of the Financial Management Act reflects a continuity of purpose and statutory consistency. Mackenzie v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 78, 82 (Pon. 1991).

Where there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of the issue to a coordinate branch of government, such as Congress being the sole judge of the elections of its members, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by the court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution. Aten v. National Election Comm'r (III), 6 FSM R. 143, 145 (App. 1993).

While the Constitution makes ineligible for election to Congress persons convicted of felonies in FSM courts, the Constitution gives to Congress the power to modify that ineligibility by statute. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 398 (App. 1994).

Congress has the Constitutional power to prescribe, by statute, additional qualifications for eligibility for election to Congress beyond those found in the Constitution. Such additional qualifications must be consistent with the rest of the Constitution. Knowledge of English may not be a qualification. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 399 (App. 1994).

Congress, not the FSM Supreme Court, has the constitutional power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress. The court cannot exercise a power reserved to Congress. Robert v. Mori, 6 FSM R. 394, 401 (App. 1994).

In the absence of any authority or compelling policy arguments the court cannot conclude that a law, the enforcement of which entails a harsh result, is unconstitutional, and can only note that the creation of potentially harsh results is well within the province of the nation's constitutionally empowered legislators. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes, 7 FSM R. 102, 104 (Pon. 1995).

Congress has not unconstitutionally delegated its authority to define crimes by delegating to an executive agency the power to enter into fishing agreements because congressional approval is needed for these agreements to take effect. FSM v. Cheng Chia-W (I), 7 FSM R. 124, 127 (Pon. 1995).

Congress has the sole power to legislate the regulation of natural resources in the marine space of the Federated States of Micronesia beyond 12 miles from island baselines, and the states have the constitutional power to legislate the regulation of natural resources within that twelve miles of sea. Congress may also legislate concerning navigation and shipping within the twelve-mile limit except within lagoons, lakes, and rivers. M/V Hai Hsiang #36 v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 456, 459 (App. 1996).

The Constitution gives Congress the authority to appropriate public funds. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 418, 420 (Chk. 2000).

The national government is free to distribute or disburse its fishing fee revenues through its normal legislative process. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 436 (App. 2000).

The Constitution gives Congress the authority to appropriate public funds, but the Executive Branch is expressly delegated the power to faithfully execute and implement all national laws and a public law that appropriates public funds is a national law. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 357 (Chk. 2001).

Congress can give as much guidance as it wishes in the appropriation legislation about which projects will be funded, and much of this guidance will, no doubt, be the product of individual congressmen's consultation with their constituents. But this consultation takes place before the appropriation bill becomes law, not afterwards. After the appropriation bill has become law, it is the duty of those who execute the law and administer the funds to follow the guidance Congress has given them by consulting the language Congress put in the public law, and any applicable regulations, not by consulting individual congressmen. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 359-60 (Chk. 2001).

A lawmaker engages in many activities which are not covered by the legislative privilege, such as a wide range of legitimate errands performed for constituents, making of appointments with government agencies, assistance in securing government contracts, preparing news letters to constituents, news releases, and outside speeches. Such activities, though entirely legitimate, are political in nature rather than legislative, and such political matters do not have speech or debate clause protection. But when a legislator is acting within the legitimate legislative sphere, the speech or debate clause is an absolute bar to interference. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 424-25 (Pon. 2001).

Legislative privilege should be read broadly to include anything generally done in a session of the legislature by one of its members in relation to the business before it. The ambit of the privilege extends beyond speech and debate per se to cover voting, circulation of information to other legislators, participation in the work of legislative committees, and a host of kindred activities. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420,

425 (Pon. 2001).

The legislative privilege doctrine has both substantive and evidentiary aspects. In substance, the doctrine renders legislators immune from civil and criminal liability based on either speech or debate in the course of proceedings in the legislature. From an evidentiary standpoint, a legislator may claim the privilege in declining to answer any questions outside the legislature itself where those questions concern how a legislator voted, acted, or decided on matters within the sphere of legitimate legislative activity. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 425 (Pon. 2001).

Once the Congress has enacted a law appropriating money for certain purposes, the Congress cannot retain, for itself or for individual senators, the power to determine how that appropriated money is spent, beyond what is spelled out in the law itself, and Congress also does not have the authority to dictate the voting requirements for a Constitutional Convention. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 631 (Pon. 2002).

The power to organize is inherent in each legislature or general assembly. This includes the power of selecting its own presiding officer. Observance of a legislative body's rules which regulate the passage of statutes is a matter entirely within legislative control and discretion, not subject to review by the courts. Anopad v. Eko, 11 FSM R. 287, 290 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Only the legislature has authority over its organization. Its acts in this regard are not subject to review by the courts. Anopad v. Eko, 11 FSM R. 287, 290 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The remedy for one who believes he was improperly removed as speaker of a municipal legislature is to attend the legislature's next regular session and seek to reorganize the legislature again, and reclaim his position as speaker. Anopad v. Eko, 11 FSM R. 287, 290 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Just as a legislature has the power to elect its leaders from among the members, it has an equal power to remove its leaders, and to select new leadership, at any time it so chooses. Anopad v. Eko, 11 FSM R. 287, 290 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

It is Congress that determines the qualifications for candidates for membership in that legislative body. Trust Territory v. Edgar, 11 FSM R. 303, 308 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Constitution assigns Congress the authority to enact bankruptcy laws and thus to determine when a judgment against an insolvent person should be discharged without either full payment or the parties' agreement. In re Engichy, 11 FSM R. 520, 525-26 (Chk. 2003).

The national government's legislative power is vested in the Congress of the Federated States of Micronesia. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 48 (App. 2003).

Once a public law is enacted, the responsibility for the execution and implementation of the law rests with those who have a duty to execute and administer the law, and Senators can have no further role in its execution. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 49 (App. 2003).

A public law that specifically provides that a Congressional delegation must be consulted on the most appropriate usage of the funds before an obligation could occur runs afoul of the Constitution because it empowers the Congressional delegation to engage in an executive function by formally involving itself in executing and implementing the appropriation. Congress cannot pass laws and vest in itself or its members the power to control how that law is executed. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 50 (App. 2003).

The Constitution affords the Congress great latitude in making policy decisions through the process of enacting legislation. However, once Congress enacts legislation, its role ends: Congress can thereafter formally affect the execution of its enactment only by enacting appropriate new legislation. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 50 (App. 2003).

While Congress may inform itself on how legislation is being implemented through the normal means of legislative oversight, public hearing, and investigation, it cannot directly insert a Congressional delegation into the process of executing and implementing the law. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 50 (App. 2003).

Making obligation of appropriated funds contingent upon consultation with members of Congress presented some of the same dangers that arose with permitting Congressional member(s) to control the approval of specific projects and the break down of the funding amounts under the line-item involved without going through the constitutional legislative process. The formal legislative process set forth in the Constitution's text requires formulating and introducing an appropriations bill, passing that bill in two separate readings, and then transmitting that bill to the President for approval or veto. To permit congressmen to effectively legislate without following constitutionally mandated procedures eliminates any transparency in the governmental process, and reduces the accountability of the congressmen to those whom they represent. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 50-51 (App. 2003).

Congress has its constitutional role of carrying out its legislative power by enacting national laws. Once national laws are enacted, the Executive Branch then has its constitutional role of carrying out its executive power by seeing to the execution and implementation of these laws. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 51 (App. 2003).

Congress's enactment preventing obligation of funds unless and until the allottees engaged in "consultation" with the relevant Congressional delegation, substantially impaired the allottees' performance in executing and implementing the law, which is the executive's essential and exclusive role under our Constitution. By legislating "consultation" before obligation requirement into the law, the Congress encroached upon an executive function and assumed more power than it is allowed in our constitutional system of checks and balances, thus violating the separation of powers doctrine. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 51 (App. 2003).

The Constitution permits the Chief Justice to promulgate rules, including criminal procedure rules, which Congress may amend by statute. Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute, and when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. The Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 376, 383 (Chk. 2004).

If a specially assigned justice may be removed for any reason at Congress's discretion after serving 90 days of service in a case, then the justice is not independent. His rulings are subject to the legislative branch's supervision. The Constitution's framers intended to prevent this result by providing that a justice may only be removed for cause under the procedures set out in Article IX, Section 7. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 587 (App. 2004).

Congress may not remove at its discretion a justice temporarily assigned to a case any time after that justice has served 90 days because any such resolution and the statute upon which it is based, 4 F.S.M.C. 104(2) violate Article IX, Section 7 of the Constitution. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 587 (App. 2004).

If a congressman has a conflict of interest and did not take steps to avoid that conflict, that is an ethical lapse that Congress, not the court, has the authority to consider and, if proper, impose sanctions or discipline on the congressman. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 186 n.2 (Pon. 2010).

When Congress enacted Title 24 and engaged in an executive function by formally inserting itself into the execution and implementation of a portion of that act by vesting in itself the power to control how the law regarding fishing access agreements is executed when more than nine vessels are involved, this was impermissible under the separation of powers doctrine since negotiated access agreements are not approved and licenses are not issued until Congress acts (and the parties to the negotiations presumably know this and adjust their behavior accordingly) and since negotiation and approval of commercial transactions is ordinarily an Executive power. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

When, if the section of Title 24 requiring congressional approval of access agreements for more than nine vessels is struck down, that section is easily severed from the rest of Title 24, which would function perfectly well without it; that is, it would function just as it already does for access agreements for nine or fewer vessels, then that section is not so vital to the whole Title 24 regulatory scheme that it cannot be severed from the rest of Title 24. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

If Congress feels that the current Title 24 statutory requirements for access agreements are too loose or are not in the nation's best interests and should be tightened, it can enact further and stricter requirements or it can provide for that review by creating a mechanism for further review in the executive branch, since Congress, through its investigatory powers, can always keep itself informed on the Executive's execution of the laws, and enact remedial legislation when it feels that the Executive needs further guidance in executing national policy that Congress has enacted. But Congress may not execute the laws itself. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

Since the Constitution specifically delegates to Congress the power to ratify treaties but does not grant Congress the power to approve or reject fishing access agreements, ruling unconstitutional the statute that requires congressional approval for fishing access agreements for more than nine vessels would not impair Congress's ability to ratify treaties and to advise and consent to presidential appointments. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

The court's conclusion that requiring Congress to approve or reject fishing access agreements is unconstitutional has no effect on Congress's constitutional treaty-ratification and advice and consent powers. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because while the chief justice has the power to promulgate procedural rules, the rules may be amended by statute, and since the chief justice does not have the power to amend a statute, when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/V Mell Sentosa, 17 FSM R. 478, 479 (Yap 2011).

A statute that purports to allow Congress to step around the bill-making process and approve fishing access agreements by resolution, is surely unconstitutional because under the Constitution, Congress may make law only by statute, and may enact statutes only by bill. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 546 (App. 2011).

Congress's decision to approve or disapprove fishing access agreements is legislation that must be enacted by the bill-making process. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 547 (App. 2011).

Once a public law is enacted, the responsibility for the execution and implementation of the law rests with those who have a duty to execute and administer the law, and Senators can have no further role in its execution. The basic constitutional principle involved is that the execution and implementation of the laws is an executive rather than a legislative function. The Constitution affords the Congress great latitude in making policy decisions through the process of enacting legislation, but once Congress enacts legislation, its role ends: Congress can thereafter formally affect the execution of its enactment only by enacting appropriate new legislation. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 548 (App. 2011).

If Congress is truly concerned by the amount of debt carried by proposed agents, it may be more specific by creating new minimum requirements for eligibility. But once Congress delegates power to the executive, it cannot have it both ways – it cannot then take back that power or modify the extent of that delegation without amending the statute through the bill-making process. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 550 (App. 2011).

Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute (and when Congress enacts a procedural rule, it is valid) but the Chief Justice does not have the power to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Thus, if a statute applies and the statute and the admiralty rule conflict, the statute must prevail. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 532, 539 (Yap 2013).

While Congress has the authority to amend rules by statute, the Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend statutes by creating rules. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 595 (Kos. 2013).

By its nature, a statute is a declaration of public policy. Congress determines and declares public policy by enacting statues. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App. 2014).

A majority of the Congress members constitutes a quorum for the transaction of business. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 642 (Pon. 2015).

The power to appoint and confirm members of the Social Security Board is vested in the national government's Executive and Legislative branches. To halt the Board's function when all vacancies are not filled would adversely affect the Social Security's function as a whole, and would be detrimental to the livelihood of social security benefit recipients. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

The FSM Supreme Court lacks the power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress because the Constitution reserves that power to Congress, and the court cannot exercise a power that only Congress has. FSM v. Innocenti, 20 FSM R. 293, 296 (Pon. 2016).

The formal involvement by Congress in the implementation and execution of the laws is unconstitutional. Linter v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 553, 561 (Pon. 2016).

The court does not have the constitutional power to make persons granted a pardon of a felony conviction eligible for election to Congress because the Constitution reserves that power to Congress, and the court cannot exercise a power that only Congress has. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

The Constitution permits Congress, and only Congress, to change, by statute, the constitutional provision disqualifying a person convicted of a felony from membership in Congress, and Congress so far has not seen fit to alter this qualification. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

The court should not and cannot make choices that the Constitution assigns to Congress. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600 (Chk. 2016).

Congress itself always has the final say over the election and qualification of its members, and, unless Congress acts to change the qualifications, a person convicted of a felony and later pardoned is still ineligible for Congress membership. FSM v. Fritz, 20 FSM R. 596, 600-01 (Chk. 2016).

A legislature has furnished a nonpunitive legislative purpose for the statute's enactment when it has relied on its responsibility to control the state's finances and expenditures and to align those expenditures with the state's available revenues. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 265 (Chk. 2019).

The Chuuk Legislature may amend any of its earlier statutes that created a governmental agency, in order to alter, or vary, or eliminate any of that agency's powers or duties. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

The power to amend statutes belongs exclusively to the legislature. Existing legislation is subject to amendment in any manner consistent with constitutional limitations. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

A state agency has only such rights, powers, and duties as the state legislature sees fit to bestow upon it through a duly enacted statute. Thus the legislature may, through another duly enacted statute, alter or may revoke any of those rights, powers, and duties. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

A state legislature that has created a commission by statute can abolish that commission by statute, just as it could, by statute, abolish most any governmental agency that it has created by statute, except those agencies which the state's constitution requires it to create. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 & n.8 (Chk. 2019).

The power to legislate is the power to repeal. A legislature may not bind itself or a future legislature by enacting an irrepealable law. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

If a legislature has the power to abolish an agency, it certainly has the power to exercise a less drastic regulation of the agency's affairs by suspending it. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 267 (Chk. 2019).

A court cannot strike down or enjoin statutes merely because they might be unwise and some other course of action is better. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 267 (Chk. 2019).

Congress may discipline, suspend, or expel a member. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 510-11 (Pon. 2020).

Whether Congress should discipline, or should have disciplined, a member is nonjusticiable – it is a political question that is beyond the court's power or authority. This is because when there is in the Constitution a textually demonstrable commitment of an issue to a coordinate branch of government, it is a nonjusticiable political question not to be decided by a court because of the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution, and the question of disciplining Congress members is textually and demonstrably committed to a coordinate branch of government – Congress itself. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 511 (Pon. 2020).

Congress may discipline a member, and may suspend or expel a member. Since "may" is a term that usually denotes discretion, the Constitution thus gives Congress the discretion to decide when, or if, and under what circumstances, it will discipline a member. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 511 (Pon. 2020).

The decision whether to discipline a member is a nonjusticiable political question left to Congress's discretion. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 511 (Pon. 2020).

Lawmakers have wide latitude to declare an offense and to exclude elements of knowledge and diligence from its definition. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 525 (App. 2020).

Congress may enact a strict liability statute that penalizes multiple violations without any finding of overt acts to justify continuing violations. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 526 (App. 2020).

– Pohnpei

After the executive branch has declared a candidate to have won an election, that winner has the right to hold office, subject only to the legislative branch's power to judge the qualifications of its members. Daniel v. Moses, 3 FSM R. 1, 4 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

A characteristic feature, and one of the cardinal and fundamental principles of the Pohnpei State Constitutional system, is that the governmental powers are divided among the three departments of this government, the legislative, executive, and judicial, and that each of these is separate from the others. People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 9 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Pohnpei Utility Corporation is not part of the executive branch of the Pohnpei state government or part of either of the other two branches. It is an independent agency not subject to or under any of the three branches of government. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 440 (Pon. 2012).

– Pohnpei – Executive Powers

When the Pohnpei Legislature, exercising its power under Pohnpei Constitution Article 13, § 9(3), revoked Emergency Executive Order 01-12 in its entirety and retroactive to September 3, 2012, because the situation stated in the Emergency Executive Order did not rise to the level of an emergency as defined in the Pohnpei Constitution Article 13, § 9(1), Emergency Executive Order 01-12 and all later acts done pursuant to it became nullities. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 436 (Pon. 2012).

Only the PUC Board of Directors can terminate PUC's general manager. The Governor has no such power under any circumstance. If the PUC Board lacks a quorum, the Governor's power extends only to nominating new Board members who, if confirmed, would allow the Board to have a quorum and thus to transact business. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 438 (Pon. 2012).

The Pohnpei Governor has neither the power nor the authority to exercise any of the powers vested exclusively in the PUC Board. Perman v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 432, 438 (Pon. 2012).

– Pohnpei – Judicial Powers

Under the system of constitutional government of the State of Pohnpei, among the most important functions entrusted to the judiciary are the duty to interpret the State's Constitution and the closely connected duty to determine whether or not laws and acts of the state legislature are contrary to the State Constitution. People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 10 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

When called on to review and control the acts of an officer or a coordinate branch of the government, the court should proceed with extreme caution, and the right to exercise the power must be manifestly clear. People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 10 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

It is within the special province and duty of the courts, and the courts alone, to say what the law is and to determine whether a statute or ordinance is constitutional. People of Kapingamarangi v. Pohnpei Legislature, 3 FSM R. 5, 8-9 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

The Pohnpei Constitution provides that single appellate justice orders are subject to review by a full appellate panel of justices hearing the appeal. This constitutional provision is self-executing. Damarlane v. Pohnpei, 9 FSM R. 114, 118 (App. 1999).

A single justice order in the Pohnpei Supreme Court appellate division is not a final decision of the Pohnpei Supreme Court because it is subject to review by a full appellate panel of the Pohnpei Supreme Court. Damarlane v. Pohnpei, 9 FSM R. 114, 118 (App. 1999).

A motion to reconsider a single justice appellate order in the Pohnpei Supreme Court is an application for review by a full appellate panel. Damarlane v. Pohnpei, 9 FSM R. 114, 118 (App. 1999).

SETTLEMENT

Customary settlements do not require court dismissal of criminal proceedings if no exceptional circumstances are shown. FSM v. Mudong, 1 FSM R. 135, 140 (Pon. 1982).

In an action brought to enforce an agreement among three parties to "meet and divide up" land which is the subject of an ownership dispute, the court will enforce the agreement and, where there is no evidence to establish that any party is entitled to a larger share than the others, the court will presume that they intended to divide the land equally. Tauleng v. Palik, 3 FSM R. 434, 436 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Conflicting affidavits show that the circumstances surrounding the execution of a document allegedly reflecting plaintiffs acceptance of a settlement and her release of defendant and others from liability for the death of her late husband are not sufficiently clear to permit summary judgment either as to the efficacy of that document or as to the application to the plaintiff's claims of the statute of limitations found at 6 F.S.M.C. 503(2). Sarapio v. Maeda Road Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 463, 464 (Pon. 1988).

Kosrae Evidence Rule 408, which renders evidence of settlement negotiations inadmissible in the trial, is based upon the court's commitment to encourage out of court settlements and includes offers made in the early stages of a dispute. Nena v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 502, 505-06 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Pursuant to Kosrae Evidence Rule 408, all statements, including factual assertions, made during the settlement process are protected and inadmissible in court to prove liability or invalidity of a claim. Nena v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 502, 506 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The discretion vested in the office of the Attorney General to settle a civil action brought against Truk State is provided for by law, which does not require consent of the Governor before the Attorney General may settle a civil suit against Truk State. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 561-63 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

The discretion vested in the office of the Attorney General to settle a civil action brought against Truk State is provided for by law, which does not require consent of the Governor before the Attorney General may settle a civil suit against Truk State. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 561-63 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

A valid compromise and settlement is as final, conclusive and binding upon the parties and upon those who knowingly accept its benefit as if its terms were embodied in a judgment and, regardless of what the actual merits of the antecedent claim may have been, they will not afterward be inquired into and examined. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 564 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

Judgment entered pursuant to compromise and settlement is treated as a judgment on the merits barring any other action for the same cause. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 564 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

Since the judicial system and customary settlement in Truk are fundamentally different and serve different goals, the primary concern of customary settlement being community harmony rather than compensation for loss, the use of one should not prevent the use of the other. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 128 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Offers or acceptances of customary settlement should neither be used in court to prove liability on the part of the wrongdoer, nor be deemed the same as a legal release on the part of the plaintiff. Suka v.

Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 129 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

To the extent that customary settlements are given any binding effect at all, they should be only binding as to those persons that are part of custom; state agencies and non-Trukese persons are not part of that system. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 129 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

The parties, not their attorneys, have ultimate responsibility to determine the purposes to be served by legal representation. Thus, clients always have the right, if acting in good faith, to agree to settle their own case, with or without the consultation or approval of counsel, even when their attorneys have failed to settle. Iriarte v. Micronesian Developers, Inc., 6 FSM R. 332, 334 & n.1 (Pon. 1994).

Counsel's own dissatisfaction with the settlement agreement reached by his clients without counsel's consultation or approval does not take precedence over the clients' rights to settle their claims themselves. Iriarte v. Micronesian Developers, Inc., 6 FSM R. 332, 334-35 (Pon. 1994).

It is settled doctrine that the power vested in the office of the Attorney General empowers settlement of litigation in which the Attorney General has supervision and control. Ham v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 300i, 300k (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

The court will not enforce a written settlement agreement as a verbal contract against a defendant who has not signed it when because of conflicting affidavits the court finds that the settlement terms were not sufficiently definite to constitute an enforceable contract and when there are questions as to whether the settlement was freely and fairly negotiated by the parties thereto. Bank of Hawaii v. Helgenberger, 9 FSM R. 260, 262 (Pon. 1999).

Default judgments and stipulated or agreed judgments against the State of Chuuk are to be subjected to close scrutiny by the court. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 499 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Settlement negotiations are not adequate grounds for dismissal of a matter. Generally when parties do settle a matter, they jointly request the court for dismissal. Talley v. Talley, 10 FSM R. 570, 573 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the defendants did not sign the settlement agreement between the other parties, they are not bound by it or by the court's confirmation of it because the defendants were not parties to the settlement agreement. A settlement agreement will not bind those not a party to it. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 42 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When an order confirming a settlement agreement did not adjudicate the rights and liabilities of all parties, but only of the tideland claimants against each other, it may be revised because in the absence of a properly entered partial final judgment, any order or other form of decision, however designated, which adjudicates fewer than all the claims or the rights and liabilities of fewer than all the parties does not terminate the action as to any of the claims or parties, and is subject to revision at any time before the entry of judgment. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The grant or denial of a motion to set aside a settlement agreement lies within the sound discretion of the court and will not be disturbed on appeal except for a clear abuse of discretion. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

As a contract, a valid settlement agreement requires offer and acceptance, consideration, and parties who have the capacity and authority to settle. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In order for a settlement to be fully binding, a person signing a settlement agreement must have the capacity and the authority to do so. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When affidavits show that the one person who purportedly signed the settlement on the affiants' behalf did not have the authority to do so and there is no admissible evidence to the contrary, only the unsupported assertion of counsel that the signer said she had the authority to sign for her older sisters, and when there is no basis to conclude that they ratified the settlement or that they should now be estopped from claiming that they are not bound by it, the movants have shown good cause that the settlement agreement must be held invalid. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 43 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Even if there was no authority to bind a party to a compromise, he may nevertheless be bound on the basis of ratification or estoppel if he retains benefits derived from the compromise. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 43-44 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The usual effect of the invalidation of a settlement is to restore the parties to where they were before the defective settlement or compromise was made, or at least to prevent the defective settlement from being enforced. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 44 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Trial judges are expected to suggest the desirability of possible settlement. That is a normal part of their job. Bualuay v. Rano, 11 FSM R. 139, 148 (App. 2002).

The filing of the appeal over land was not a breach of the defendant's condition and was not a breach of a customary settlement when the appeal was filed before the customary settlement and condition were made; and when the appeal was not decided in the defendant's favor, the defendant's condition regarding his promised grant of a portion of land was satisfied and the customary settlement and the defendant's promise were therefore enforceable. Robert v. Semuda, 11 FSM R. 165, 168 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the parties settled rather than go to trial on damages a contract was formed between the parties – the defendant offered specific performance to fill land and in exchange, the plaintiff accepted the offer and agreed to not go to trial on the issue of damages. There was thus an offer and acceptance, consideration, and mutual assent by both parties. James v. Lelu Town, 11 FSM R. 337, 339 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

When a settlement contract for landfill of Muraka was formed between the parties that was not dependent on the case's active status, the contract is still enforceable because the case's status (pending or dismissed) was not part of the agreement. Therefore, the defendant is still liable to the plaintiff because the case's dismissal did not affect the parties' contract or the court's order when the court's order was based upon the parties' agreement and not upon any trial on damages. James v. Lelu Town, 11 FSM R. 337, 339-40 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

While the prosecution has broad discretion in determining whether to initiate litigation, once that litigation is instituted in court, the court also has responsibility for assuring that actions thereafter taken are in the public interest; therefore criminal litigation can be dismissed only by obtaining leave of the court. In a fishing case where criminal and civil cases are filed together, and the dismissal of the criminal proceeding(s) is obviously "integral" to the settlement agreement for which court approval is sought, the same policy considerations apply to the settlement of the civil proceeding(s) as apply to the criminal dismissal. FSM v. Ching Feng 767, 12 FSM R. 498, 502, 504 (Pon. 2004).

When there is no authorization for compound interest in the settlement agreement and when it is apparent that the parties, in settling their prior lawsuit, intended to apply the legal or judgment rate of interest to any unpaid settlement balances, the plaintiff's damages must therefore be calculated on a simple interest basis. Lee v. Lee, 13 FSM R. 68, 71 (Chk. 2004).

A plaintiff's claim based upon defendant's breach of the settlement agreement reached in an earlier court case, is not based upon the merits of the claim presented in that case because that case's merits were resolved by settlement between the parties, and based upon that settlement, that case was dismissed. George v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 520, 521 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When a settlement agreement was reached by the parties in a case, it represents a new agreement between the parties. The failure to comply with the settlement agreement is a new claim, separate and independent of the original claim. Settlement agreements are contracts which are enforceable by a court. Therefore, the doctrine of res judicata does not apply to a settlement agreement and accordingly a motion for dismissal must be denied. George v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 520, 521 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the parties, by their settlement agreement, have liquidated all damages and compensation claims between them including the respondent's lost profits claim, the issue of whether the respondent in an eminent domain action can obtain damages for lost profits is moot. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 460 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

While the court encourages settlement whenever possible and is always willing, if necessary, to allow time for settlement to occur, a request by only one party that is too amorphous to determine even whether a settlement attempt can or will be made must be denied when insufficient grounds have been shown to suspend the litigation in a vague hope that settlement may occur. The parties are still encouraged to pursue all settlement possibilities. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 293 (Chk. 2014).

In order for a settlement agreement to be binding, it must be definite and certain as to the terms and requirements, as well as identify the subject matter and spell out each party's essential commitments. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 223 (Pon. 2015).

A court should endeavor to determine the meaning of a contractor's words, rather than rely on what a signatory later says was intended. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 223-24 (Pon. 2015).

When the parties to a proposed contract have agreed that the contract is not to be effective or binding until certain conditions are performed or occur, no binding contract will arise until the conditions specified have occurred or been performed. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 224 (Pon. 2015).

A settlement agreement that was subject to the President's approval and Congress's appropriation of funds, was not enforceable when the President rejected it. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 220, 224 (Pon. 2015).

Since settlement through a more informal alternative dispute resolution than arbitration would be most consistent with Micronesian custom and practice and likely to lead to a lasting solution, the court will order that the parties attempt that before resorting to the mandatory arbitration. Pacific Int'l, Inc. v. FSM, 21 FSM R. 662, 664 (Pon. 2018).

Rule 68 provides that the defendant may serve an offer to allow judgment to be taken against the defendant for the money with costs then accrued. If within 10 days after the offer's service, the plaintiff serves written notice that the offer is accepted, either party may then file the offer and notice of acceptance together with proof of service thereof. If the plaintiff rejects this offer, and the judgment finally obtained by plaintiff is not more favorable than the offer, the plaintiff must pay the costs incurred after the offer was made. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 436 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When the defendant made a Rule 68 offer of judgment for $1,000 and when, after trial, the plaintiff was awarded nothing, the plaintiff is liable for the defendant's costs after the offer date. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 436 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

A Rule 68 settlement offer may only be filed if accepted by the other party. When the plaintiff rejects an offer, there is no need to file the rejected offer of judgment with the court before the court issues a judgment in the matter. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 436 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Rule 68 exists to encourage compromise when a case lacks merit. When a plaintiff fails to see the lack of merit within his case, Rule 68 sanctions such failure by awarding costs to the party that made the settlement offer. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 434, 437 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

SIGNATURES

"Forgery" is a signature of a person that is made without the person's consent and without the person otherwise authorizing it. Signing another's signature with authorization is not forgery. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM Intrm. 423, 440 (Pon. 2009).

When the appellants do not contend that the checks are not authentic but contend that the signature endorsements are all forgeries, and when the trial court found as fact that, except for one or two or a few that she had signed herself, Lilly Iriarte had authorized Santos to sign her name on the premium checks, the appellate court cannot conclude that the finding was clearly erroneous since substantial evidence in the record supports that finding. Since a forgery is a signature of a person that is made without the person's consent and without the person otherwise authorizing it, Lilly Iriarte's signatures are not forgeries even if made by Santos and having the original checks could not have altered the finding that Lilly Iriarte were authorized. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM Intrm. 340, 352 (App. 2012).

A signature affixed by a judge by rubber stamp is valid because a signature is a person's name or mark written by that person or at the person's direction, or any name, mark, or writing used with the intent of authenticating a document – also termed a legal signature. George v. Palsis, 20 FSM R. 157, 159 (Kos. 2015).

In the absence of any provision in the FSM Code, Rules of Civil Procedure, or General Court Order, mandating a handwritten signature on an order issued by a justice, an argument that a judge's signature is deficient because it appears to be "rubber-stamped," is devoid of merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Christopher Corp., 20 FSM R. 225, 228 (Chk. 2015).

In the absence of any provision in the FSM Code, Civil Procedure Rules, or General Court Order, mandating a handwritten signature on an order issued by a justice, arguments that a judge's signature is deficient because it is "rubber-stamped," are devoid of merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 21 FSM R. 148, 149 (Pon. 2017).

A signature is a person's name or mark written by that person or at the person's direction, or any name, mark, or writing used with the intent of authenticating a document – also termed legal signature. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 21 FSM R. 148, 149 (Pon. 2017).

A judge's rubber-stamped signatures are marks used to authenticate the judge's written orders, and are thus valid, original signatures. Contentions that they are fake, or invalid, or not legal signatures, are without merit. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 21 FSM R. 148, 150 (Pon. 2017).

SOCIAL SECURITY

The FSM social security program's purpose is to provide a means whereby employees may be ensured a measure of financial security in their old age and be given an opportunity for leisure without hardship and complete loss of income, and, further, to provide survivors' insurance for wage earners and their dependents. 53 F.S.M.C. 602. The program is funded by joint contributions from employers and employees. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 137, 141 (Pon. 1995).

The FSM Social Security Administration has the power to sue and be sued, and since its power to hold hearings is discretionary it may file suit without having held a hearing. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (I), 7 FSM R. 280, 282-83 (Yap 1995).

Social Security's lofty public purpose is to provide for retirees, their dependents, and their surviving spouses and dependants. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

Any person aggrieved by a Social Security Board final order may obtain a review of the order in the FSM Supreme Court trial division by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 78, 79-80 (Kos. 2003).

While section 204 of Title 53 provides that the Social Security Board shall receive and maintain files and records of all employers and all employees subject to this Title, no specific Social Security rule or regulation requires that the Board's final decision take the form of an "order," or that it be "entered" in some specifically defined way. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 101, 103 (Kos. 2003).

Section 203(2) of Title 53 provides that the Social Security Board may hold hearings or make decisions upon hearings delegated to others for the purpose of determining any question involving any right, benefit, or obligations of any person subject to Title 53. Thus Social Security has in part a quasi-judicial function. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 101, 103 (Kos. 2003).

Since "enter" means to place anything before a court, or upon or among the records, in a formal and regular manner, and usually in writing, and since common sense must play a part in the way that an agency's statutorily mandated procedures are interpreted, a letter from the Social Security Board stating that it is a final decision by the Board, and that the petitioner has the option of appealing to the FSM Supreme Court, is a final, entered order within the meaning of 53 F.S.M.C. 208. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 101, 103-04 (Kos. 2003).

Since the Social Security Board has the power to delegate duties and responsibilities to such employees as it deems feasible and desirable to carry out the provisions of Title 53, a letter that begins with "[o]n behalf of the FSMSSA Board of Trustees . . . ." and continues with "the Board has denied your client's appeal," and which is signed by the Administrator, is properly signed. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 101, 104 (Kos. 2003).

The court will not add additional time for a petitioner to seek judicial review when the social security statute gives 60 days and this is a considerable amount of time, and when even given the exigencies of mail service in Micronesia, equitable considerations do not require that additional time be given. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 101, 104 (Kos. 2003).

An appeal from a Social Security Board decision will be determined on the record below and not on a trial de novo because, under 53 F.S.M.C. 708, the Board must certify and file in court a copy of the record. The Board's findings as to the facts, if supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence, will be conclusive. If either party applies for leave to adduce additional material evidence, and shows to the court's satisfaction that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence in the hearing before the Board or its authorized representatives and that such evidence is competent, material, and substantial, the court may order the Board to take the additional evidence to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such conditions as the court considers proper. Clarence v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 635, 636 (Kos. 2004).

By failing to respond to Social Security's motion in limine that seeks to preclude the plaintiff from adducing any further evidence on appeal beyond that which is part of the record of proceedings before the Social Security Board, the plaintiff has not shown that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce competent, material, and substantial evidence before the Board and that this evidence should be (but is not) part of the record of the proceedings, and thus the motion will be granted. Clarence v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 635, 637 (Kos. 2004).

Although preserving the integrity of the FSM social security system is a matter of concern to all FSM citizens, when Social Security has offered no argument why the court should depart from the general rule that municipal entities are immune from garnishment, a motion for issuance of a writ of garnishment directed toward the assets of a municipality will be denied. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Lelu Town, 13 FSM R. 60, 62 (Kos. 2004).

An appeal under 53 F.S.M.C. 708 to the FSM Supreme Court trial division from a Social Security Board final order is on the record except when a person aggrieved by such an order makes a showing that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence in the hearing before the Board or its authorized representatives. In that event, the party may apply to the court for leave to adduce additional material evidence. When no such showing is made of a reasonable failure to elicit evidence, the question that remains is whether the Board's final order rests on findings of fact that are supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence. If the court so concludes, then the findings of fact are conclusive. The trial court's disposition of the appeal on the record is final, subject to review by the Supreme Court appellate division. Clarence v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 13 FSM R. 150, 152 (Kos. 2005).

Although, it would have been desirable for the claimant to have undergone vision testing as contemplated by the Board, the question under 53 F.S.M.C. 708 is whether there are now facts of record, supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence, sufficient for the findings of the Board to be deemed conclusive and when on a review of the record, the court finds that there is sufficient evidence in the record to deny the disability claim, it will affirm the Board's final decision in its entirety. Clarence v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 13 FSM R. 150, 153 (Kos. 2005).

The existence of employees without social security numbers cannot relieve an employer of liability for social security contributions for those employees. Ensuring that all employees have, or acquire, properly issued social security numbers, is the employer's responsibility. An employer cannot avoid liability for social security contributions by not reporting an employee's social security number or by employing someone without a social security number. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Fefan Municipality, 14 FSM R. 544, 547 (Chk. 2007).

When the court reviews appeals from Social Security decisions, the findings of the Social Security Board as to the facts will be conclusive if supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence. Alokoa v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 16 FSM R. 271, 276 (Kos. 2009).

On an appeal from an FSM administrative agency, the court, under the Administrative Procedures Act, must hold unlawful and set aside agency actions and decisions found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law; or contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity; or without substantial compliance with the procedures required by law. These Administrative Procedures Act provisions apply to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise and it applies to the Social Security Administration appeals because no part of the Social Security Act provides otherwise. Alokoa v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 16 FSM R. 271, 276 (Kos. 2009).

A claims denial made before the due date to submit supporting documents is arbitrary and capricious and will be vacated by the court and remanded for further proceedings. Alokoa v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 16 FSM R. 271, 277 (Kos. 2009).

The timeframe in which to appeal a decision of the FSMSSA Board is governed by 53 F.S.M.C. 708, which provides that any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board may obtain a review of the order in the FSM Supreme Court trial division by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part. Palikkun v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 314, 316 (Kos. 2014).

When the Social Security Board's decision was entered on August 27, 2013, and was received by the plaintiff on September 17, 2013, the 60-day deadline would fall on October 26, 2013, which would have given the plaintiff 39 days to file her claim after service of the Board's decision. She thus had adequate time to file her claim, and when she failed to file her claim in time pursuant to 53 F.S.M.C. 708, the court is unwilling to extend the timeframe to file a claim when the statute's language is clear, and the complaint will dismissed based on its filing being untimely under 53 F.S.M.C. 708. Palikkun v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 314, 317 (Kos. 2014).

When three of the five appointed Social Security Board members are present this constitutes a valid quorum or a simple majority, and when, in adding the ex officio administrator, four out of the six total members are in attendance, it gives the Board valid authority to transact business. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

The Social Security Board is competent to execute its duties and responsibilities with the absence of two of the total five members. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

The FSM social security program's purpose is to provide a means whereby employees may be ensured a measure of financial security in their old age and be given an opportunity for leisure without hardship and complete loss of income, and, further, to provide survivors' insurance for wage earners and their dependents. It is funded by joint contributions from employers and employees. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

Social Security's public purpose is to provide for retirees, their dependents, and their surviving spouses and dependents. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

The power to appoint and confirm members of the Social Security Board is vested in the national government's Executive and Legislative branches. To halt the Board's function when all vacancies are not filled would adversely affect the Social Security's function as a whole, and would be detrimental to the livelihood of social security benefit recipients. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

When three members are present along with the Administrator, the Social Security Board is competent to transact business. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 639, 643 (Pon. 2015).

Under 53 F.S.M.C. 708, an appeal to the FSM Supreme Court trial division from a Social Security Board final order is on the record except when a person aggrieved by the order makes a showing that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence in the hearing before the Board or its authorized representatives. In that event, the party may apply to the court for leave to adduce additional material evidence. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 197, 199 (Pon. 2015).

When no showing is made of a reasonable failure to elicit evidence before the Social Security Board, the question that remains is whether the Board's final order rests on findings of fact that are supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence. If the court so concludes, then the findings of fact are conclusive. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 197, 199 (Pon. 2015).

The trial court's disposition of a Social Security appeal on the record is final, subject to review by the appellate division. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 197, 199 (Pon. 2015).

When the court reviews appeals from Social Security decisions, the Social Security Board's findings as to the facts are conclusive if supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 197, 200 (Pon. 2015).

Under 53 F.S.M.C. 708, an appeal to the FSM Supreme Court trial division from a Social Security Board final order is on the record except when the person aggrieved by the order makes a showing that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence in the hearing before the Board or its authorized representatives. In that event, the party may apply to the court for leave to adduce additional material evidence. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 271 (Pon. 2015).

When no showing is made of a reasonable failure to elicit evidence before the Social Security Board, the question that remains is whether the Board's final order rests on findings of fact that are supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence, and if the court so concludes, then the findings are conclusive. The trial court's disposition of the appeal on the record is final, subject to review by the appellate division. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 271 (Pon. 2015).

On an appeal from an FSM administrative agency, the court, under the Administrative Procedures Act, must hold unlawful and set aside agency actions and decisions found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law; or contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity; or without substantial compliance with the procedures required by law. These APA provisions apply to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise and they apply to the Social Security Administration appeals because no part of the Social Security Act provides otherwise. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 271 (Pon. 2015).

When the court reviews appeals from Social Security decisions, the Social Security Board's findings as to the facts are conclusive if supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 272 (Pon. 2015).

Social Security regulations allow wage earners to adopt after their 55th birthday under extremely limited circumstances. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 365 n.1 (Pon. 2016).

Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Social Security Board may obtain a review of the order in the FSM Supreme Court trial division by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part. A copy of the petition must be served on the Board, by service on its secretary or other designated agent, and thereupon the Board must certify and file in court a copy of the record upon which the order was entered. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 366 (Pon. 2016).

The Social Security Board's findings as to the facts, if supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence, is conclusive. If either party applies to the court for leave to adduce additional material evidence and shows to the court's satisfaction that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence in the hearing before the Board or its authorized representatives, and that such evidence is competent, material, and substantial, the court may order the Board to take additional evidence to be adduced in the hearing in such manner and upon such conditions as the court considers proper. The Board may modify its findings and order after receipt of further evidence together with any modified or new findings or order. The court's judgment on the record shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court appellate division on any aggrieved party's petition, including the Board's, within 60 days from judgment. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 366, 372 (Pon. 2016).

On an appeal from an FSM administrative agency, the court, under the Administrative Procedures Act, must hold unlawful and set aside agency actions and decisions found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law; or contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity; or without substantial compliance with the procedures required by law. These Administrative Procedures Act provisions apply to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise and it applies to Social Security Administration appeals because no part of the Social Security Act provides otherwise. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 366 (Pon. 2016).

In a matter of first impression, the court may look to case law of other jurisdictions, particularly the United States, for comparison and guidance. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 367 (Pon. 2016).

Regulations may be promulgated to assure efficiency, accuracy, and proficiency in carrying out the objectives of Title 53. These regulations also provide restrictions to prevent abuse and to regulate violations in order to protect the Social Security system. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 368 (Pon. 2016).

FSM Social Security's statutory scheme is not unconstitutional. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 369 (Pon. 2016).

Parties who appeal decisions of the Social Security Board may enter additional evidence for the court's consideration. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 370 (Pon. 2016).

The Social Security Administrator is responsible for the general administration of the Social Security System, and has a wide range of discretion as part of his or her administrative powers. Decisions made pursuant to the Administrator's discretionary power are also subject to the Social Security Board's review. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 371-72 (Pon. 2016).

Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Social Security Board may obtain a review of the order in the FSM Supreme Court trial division by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 478 (Pon. 2016).

On an appeal from an FSM administrative agency, the court, under the Administrative Procedures Act, must hold unlawful and set aside agency actions and decisions found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law; or contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity; or without substantial compliance with the procedures required by law. This applies to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise and it applies to the Social Security Administration appeals since no part of the Social Security Act provides otherwise. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 478 (Pon. 2016).

Social Security's statutory scheme is not unconstitutional, and the exercise of its investigatory functions, which would include the request for evidence of dependency in adoption matters, is lawful as long as it is authorized by law. Thus, Social Security regulations are not ultra vires. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 479 (Pon. 2016).

Parties who appeal Social Security Board decisions are allowed to enter additional evidence for the court's consideration. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 480 (Pon. 2016).

The Social Security Administrator is given a wide range of discretion as part of his or her administrative powers. Decisions made under the Administrator's discretionary power are also subject to the review by the Board, as well as the FSM Supreme Court. In addition to this discretionary authority, the regulations detail different criteria that the Administrator may follow in forming a decision. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 481 (Pon. 2016).

An appeal from a Social Security Board decision will be determined based on the administrative hearing record, other documents as submitted by the parties, and the oral arguments as presented before the court and not on a trial de novo. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 482 (Pon. 2016).

Uunder 53 F.S.M.C. 708, the court's review of Social Security decisions is limited to issues determined on the record at the administrative level. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 482 (Pon. 2016).

Since, by statute, the findings of the Social Security Board as to the facts, if supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence, are conclusive, the statute thus requires that the court use the "substantial evidence" or "reasonableness" standard of review. Thalman v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 625, 628 (Yap 2016).

The Administrative Procedures Act provisions apply to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise, and it applies to the Social Security Administration appeals because no part of the Social Security Act provides otherwise. Seiola v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 205, 209 (Pon.

2017).

Summary judgment will be denied when there is a genuine issue of material fact to be determined through trial on the issue of light work available to the disability applicant, and because of the conflicting findings in the reports, abstracts, and testimonies on the applicant's disability. Seiola v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 205, 213 (Pon. 2017).

Anyone aggrieved by a Social Security Board final order may obtain a review of the order in the FSM Supreme Court trial division by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part. Celestine v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 263, 266 (Pon. 2017).

Under the Administrative Procedures Act, the court must, on an appeal from an FSM administrative agency, hold unlawful and set aside agency actions and decisions found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law; or contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity; or without substantial compliance with the procedures required by law. These provisions apply to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise, and it applies to Social Security Administration appeals because the Social Security Act does not provide otherwise. Celestine v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 263, 266 (Pon. 2017).

Since the Administrative Procedures Act applies to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise, it applies to the Social Security Administration because no part of the Social Security Act provides otherwise. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 415 (App. 2018).

Statutory authority for judicial review of a Social Security Board decision provides that the Board's findings as to the facts, if supported by competent, material and substantial evidence, are conclusive. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 415-16 (App. 2018).

Generally there are three possible standards of review for administrative decisions: 1) arbitrary and capricious or abuse of discretion; 2) reasonableness or substantial evidence; and 3) de novo or agreement review. Judicial review of social security law cases, because the statute expressly uses the words "reasonableness" and "substantial," uses the intermediate standard. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 416 (App. 2018).

Since 53 F.S.M.C. 703 expressly grants Social Security rule-making power, judicial review is limited to determining whether the promulgated regulations exceed the statutory authority, which is an issue of law reviewed de novo on appeal. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 416 (App. 2018).

53 F.S.M.C. 703 delegates to the Social Security Administration authority to promulgate regulations and provides that the Board may, pursuant to the Administrative Procedures Act, adopt, amend, or rescind regulations for the administration of the Social Security law. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 416 (App. 2018).

The FSM Social Security Act is patterned after United States statutes, and it is well settled rule of statutory construction that a statute adopted from another jurisdiction is presumed to have been adopted as construed by that jurisdiction's courts. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 417 (App. 2018).

An appeal under 53 F.S.M.C. 708 to the FSM Supreme Court trial division from a Social Security Board final order is on the record except if the aggrieved person shows that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence in the Board hearing. When no showing is made of a reasonable failure to elicit evidence, the question that remains is whether the Board's final order rests on findings of fact that are supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence. If so, then the findings of fact are conclusive, and the trial court's disposition of the appeal on the record is final, subject to review by the Supreme Court appellate division. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 492 (Kos. 2018).

On an appeal from an FSM administrative agency, the court, under the Administrative Procedures Act, must hold unlawful and set aside agency actions and decisions found to be arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law; or contrary to constitutional right, power, privilege, or immunity; or without substantial compliance with the procedures required by law. This applies to all agency action unless Congress by law provides otherwise, and it applies to the Social Security Administration appeals because the Social Security Act does not provide otherwise. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 492-93 (Kos. 2018).

Businesses are required by law to maintain both gross revenue and wage and salary information records. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 182 (Pon. 2019).

Although the Social Security Administrator is required to receive and maintain files and records of all employers and all employees, such records shall not be disclosed to any person except as may be required to administer the FSM Social Security laws. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 183 (Pon. 2019).

– Claims and Benefits

Social Security benefits are not subject to execution, attachment, or garnishment and are not assignable except as provided in the FSM Social Security Act. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 377 (App. 2003).

When the judgment-debtor's Social Security retirement benefits are received by him and have not been subjected to any sort of direct levy, allotment or garnishment or any execution, attachment, or assignment of these benefits and when these benefits may be commingled with any other income the debtor may have available to him, and from these funds he meets his living expenses and his other obligations, the trial court's order in aid of judgment does not require that the payment come from any particular source of income. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 379 (App. 2003).

When 53 F.S.M.C. 604 does not contain the broader language of, "or other legal processes," it cannot be interpreted in a manner identical to the U.S. statute that does. The FSM provision is more restrictive than the U.S. provision, as it protects Social Security benefits only from execution, attachment, garnishment, and assignment and not from other legal processes. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 379 (App. 2003).

There is no violation of the 53 F.S.M.C. 604 susceptibility of benefits rule, when there has been no execution, attachment, garnishment, or assignment of the judgment-debtor's Social Security retirement benefits and when the trial court's order in aid of judgment specifically found that the judgment-debtor would have sufficient funds for his and his dependents' basic support. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 380 (App. 2003).

Social security benefits are not subject to probate, as the Social Security Board, not the court, has initial jurisdiction over applications for social security benefits, whether by a surviving spouse or surviving children. The procedure for such applications is set forth in the Social Security Act. In re Estate of Manas, 15 FSM R. 609, 611 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for the adopted minor to receive surviving child Social Security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Alokoa v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 16 FSM R. 271, 276 n.2 (Kos. 2009).

Social Security does not have to wait 2½ years for claimants to supply supporting documentation for a benefits claim before it may rule on an application. Nor is Social Security to be at the mercy of claimants who promise supporting documents at some indefinite future date but fail to provide them with reasonable promptness. Alokoa v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 16 FSM R. 271, 277 (Kos. 2009).

If it is determined that the father and mother lived in the same household as the grandfather and grandmother and that the father's income was greater than the grandfather's and the father contributed to the support of the household, Social Security would be completely justified in finding that there was no dependency by the grandsons upon the grandfather. Alokoa v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 16 FSM R. 271, 277 (Kos. 2009).

The FSM social security non-assignment of benefits statute, 53 F.S.M.C. 604, does not bar legal process such as orders in aid of judgment from reaching FSM social security benefits. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161 (App. 2013).

If the trial court had taken the large step of making U.S. military retirement and U.S. social security benefits paid to FSM citizens in the FSM exempt from all legal process, that would be a judicial encroachment on Congress's power to enact laws and set public policy because those recipients would then (along with U.S. veterans) have greater judicial protection than Congress has legislated for persons (regardless of citizenship) who receive FSM social security benefits. Whether foreign retirement benefits should carry equal or greater protection from legal process than FSM social security benefits is a public policy decision to be made by the people's elected representatives in Congress, not by the unelected court. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161-62 (App. 2013).

Surviving spouse benefit payments are paid for each month starting with the month of death of the fully insured spouse and ending with the month preceding the month in which the surviving spouse dies or remarries. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 197, 199 (Pon. 2015).

When a woman, living together with a man for three years, has a title that is taken from the man's Pohnpeian title and that is derived from being his wife, the Social Security Board's decision to cease spousal survival benefit payments to her because she has remarried will be upheld when the evidence submitted on record, taken in its entirety, is competent, material, and substantial and supports the Board's findings in denying benefits to her based on her remarriage. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 197, 200-01 (Pon. 2015).

When the Social Security Board's final order denying the plaintiff benefits because of remarriage rests on findings of fact that are supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence and does not violate 17 F.S.M.C. 111(3)(b), its decision will be affirmed. Louis v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 268, 274 (Pon. 2015).

A Social Security benefit is any retirement (old age), disability, dependent's, survivor's, or other insurance benefit prescribed in the Act. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 367 n.2 (Pon. 2016).

Social Security benefits are not vested in a property sense, in that they are subject to defeasance by act of Congress so long as that action is not arbitrary. Changing economic conditions may require that the program be modified. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 367 (Pon. 2016).

The current Social Security scheme does not automatically disburse benefits to a dependent of a wage earner who has been contributing to Social Security once a claim is made. A claimant becomes "entitled" to benefits once he or she has applied and has provided convincing evidence of entitlement. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 367 (Pon. 2016).

Because a claimant must go through the process of applying for benefits and meet certain requirements to be deemed eligible, Social Security benefits are not a property right. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 367 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Social Security program's purpose is to provide a means whereby employees may be ensured a measure of financial security in their old age and be given an opportunity for leisure without hardship and complete loss of income, and, further, to provide survivors' insurance for wage earners and their dependents. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 368 (Pon. 2016).

A valid claim for Social Security benefits as an adopted child requires proof of adoption and of dependency of the adopted child on the wage earner. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 368 (Pon. 2016).

Changed circumstances may require the adopted child to move away and to no longer be dependent on the adopted parent. In these situations, the child no longer depends on the wage earner for support, and the child would fall outside of Social Security's statutory scheme. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 368 (Pon. 2016).

Since, if benefits are distributed by virtue of only an adoption decree, not only will this affect the financial stability and well-being of the Social Security program, Social Security would be vulnerable to abuse, exploitation, and misconduct. Therefore, the Social Security regulations that limit when benefits can be paid to adoptees are not ultra vires. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 368 (Pon. 2016).

A claimant who alleges that he has a child in his care who is living with him must provide the Social Security Administration with a signed statement to that effect when applying for benefits. If the child is under 16 or mentally incompetent, Social Security will need no more information, unless it doubts the truth of the statement. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 370 (Pon. 2016).

Social Security has the regulatory authority to request additional proof of dependency and the claimant is required to submit such proof. Actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for an adopted minor to receive surviving child Social Security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Neth v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 362, 370-71 (Pon. 2016).

Social Security benefits are not a property right and do not disburse automatically once a claim is filed. A potential beneficiary must fulfill the requirements as set forth in Title 53 of the FSM Code and Social Security regulations before being deemed eligible to receive benefits. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 479 (Pon. 2016).

FSM Social Security benefits are not a property right that automatically vests upon the wage earner's death and upon the filing of a claim. The proper procedure under Title 53 and the FSM Social Security Regulations must be adhered to before a claimant may be deemed eligible for benefits. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 479 (Pon. 2016).

A valid claim for adopted child benefits requires proof of adoption and of the adopted child's dependency on the wage earner. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 479 (Pon. 2016).

Social Security has the regulatory authority to request additional proof of dependency and the claimant is required to submit such proof. Miguel v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 475, 480 (Pon. 2016).

For Social Security benefit purposes, a disability is the inability to engage in any substantial gainful employment by reason of any medically determinable physical or mental impairment which can be expected to result in death or which has lasted or can be expected to last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months. Substantial gainful employment is not only an inability to engage in the applicant's previous occupation or work, but also means that based on the applicant's education, experience, and limitations, there are no other occupations that the applicant could perform. Thalman v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 625, 628 (Yap 2016).

Persons are entitled to Social Security disability benefits if they are currently and fully insured, are disabled and have been so for at least three full calendar months, and have filed a complete application with the Social Security Administrator for disability insurance. Thalman v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 625, 628 (Yap 2016).

A Social Security claimant becomes entitled to benefits once he or she has applied and has provided convincing evidence of entitlement. A Social Security benefit applicant is responsible for providing the evidence needed to prove his or her entitlement to Social Security benefits. Thalman v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 625, 628 (Yap 2016).

When a Social Security decision was supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence that the applicant was not disabled because he was capable of engaging in his former occupation or a similar occupation, that finding is conclusive as to the fact that, when Social Security and later the Social Security Board made their determinations, the applicant was not sufficiently impaired to qualify as disabled for Social Security disability benefits. Thalman v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 20 FSM R. 625, 628 (Yap 2016).

Anyone aggrieved by a Social Security Board final order may obtain a review of that order in the FSM Supreme Court trial division by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part. The court may order the Board to take additional evidence in such manner and upon such conditions as the court considers proper, and the Board may thereafter modify its findings and order. The court's judgment on the record is final, subject to review by the FSM Supreme Court appellate division upon petition of any aggrieved party, including the Board, filed within 60 days from judgment. Seiola v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 205, 209 (Pon. 2017).

Under 53 F.S.M.C. 603(6) and FSM Social Security Regulation § 100.2 as amended in 2012, disability is defined as the inability to engage in any substantial gainful employment by reason of any physical or mental impairment that can be expected to last for a continuous period of not less than 12 months. Seiola v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 205, 209 (Pon. 2017).

A five-step sequential evaluation process is used to determine an applicant's eligibility for disability benefits. Seiola v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 205, 210 (Pon. 2017).

Social Security may deny a disability benefits application when the applicant is able to perform light and sedentary work. Seiola v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 205, 211-12 (Pon. 2017).

Once a disability applicant meets the burden of proof under the first four requirements of the five-step sequential evaluation process, the burden shifts to Social Security to show that the applicant can perform other jobs – Social Security must show that employment positions are available in the FSM that suit the applicant's experience and education before the denial of benefits can be upheld. Seiola v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 205, 212 (Pon. 2017).

FSM Social Security benefits are not a property right, and all the proper steps and requirements must be fulfilled before an individual is eligible for benefits. Celestine v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 263, 266 (Pon. 2017).

The process by which spousal benefits cease is governed under § 100.16 of the Social Security regulations. Celestine v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 263, 267 (Pon. 2017).

If Social Security receives convincing evidence from any credible source that a surviving spouse who is receiving social security benefits has re-married, the surviving spouse benefits will cease unless the surviving spouse proves that he or she has not remarried. Celestine v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 263, 268 (Pon. 2017).

When, based on the administrative hearing and the evidence on the record, the Social Security Board's decision to cease spousal benefits was supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence, it was therefore conclusive, and even though the plaintiff produced additional evidence to support her claim that she had not remarried, Social Security's discontinuance of spousal benefits will be affirmed. Celestine v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 263, 268 (Pon. 2017).

When a plaintiff, since she lacks standing to sue, cannot identify any specific interests that her son would assert if her interest was transferred to him, the matter will be dismissed without prejudice to allow the son to assert any claims he may have against the FSM Social Security Administration. Welson v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 348, 351 (Pon. 2017).

The statutory delegation of rule-making authority to Social Security implicitly recognizes its relative competence and expertise to ensure an efficient and equitable means to evaluate whether a claimant qualifies for benefits. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 416 (App. 2018).

Social security regulations are entitled to great deference because Congress has given Social Security full power and authority to promulgate regulations necessary or appropriate to carry out the agency's function and therefore Social Security regulations are not ultra vires. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 417 (App. 2018).

A child who is dependent upon a person entitled to old age benefits or who was dependent upon an individual who died fully insured or currently insured, is entitled, upon filing an application, to a child's insurance benefit, but actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for an adopted minor to receive surviving social security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 417 (App. 2018).

Social Security's list of "preferred evidence" is not too restrictive because "preferred" does not connote exclusive and because it allows an applicant, at the Administrator's discretion, to adduce supplementary evidence – any other documents or evidence that will prove the child's dependency on the insured. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 419 (App. 2018).

The list of preferred evidence set forth in the Social Security regulations streamlines the decision-making process by providing a means to efficiently and equitably evaluate dependency and makes it easier for applicants to know what evidence they need to produce for a successful application. As such, pursuant to the statutory authority to implement the social security program, the promulgated regulations are consistent with the legislature's intent. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 419 (App. 2018).

When an applicant was notified that evidence of dependency was lacking and did not apply to adduce additional evidence, the Board's findings as to the facts, if supported by competent, material and substantial evidence, are conclusive since there was no further evidence of dependency proffered. Thus, the trial court's grant of summary judgment in Social Security's favor was proper, since the applicant failed to adduce sufficient evidence of dependency, as required by statute. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 419 (App. 2018).

The standard of review for social security cases is highly deferential. The appellate court must presume the trial court's finding that the Board's action was valid and affirm the decision if a reasonable basis, or substantial evidence, exists for it. The appellate court's role is to determine whether the trial court was correct in upholding the Board's decision. In doing so, it reviews the Board's decision to make sure that it applied the correct legal standards and reviews the entire administrative record to ascertain whether its findings are supported by substantial evidence. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 424 (App. 2018).

A court will consider additional evidence at the aggrieved party's motion only when supported by reasonable grounds for failure to adduce the evidence in the hearing before the Social Security Board, and when the claimant made no such showing of a reasonable failure to elicit evidence, the remaining question is whether the Board's final order rests on findings of fact that are supported by competent, material, and substantial evidence, and if the court so concludes, then the Board's findings of fact are conclusive. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 424-25 (App. 2018).

When the applicant testified at the administrative level that the marriage was accepted by members of her community; that she and her partner had been living together for three years; that she has a sacred Pohnpeian title exclusively given to the wife of the second in chief, which is her partner's title; that her title is derived from being her partner's customary wife; and that she serves as her partner's wife at traditional feasts, Social Security's determination that she had remarried was valid since there was a reasonable basis, or substantial evidence, for its decision. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 427-28 (App. 2018).

In reviewing the evidence in the record below, the court must recognize that it is primarily Social Security's task to assess the witnesses' credibility, the admissibility of evidence, and to resolve factual disputes since substantial evidence is a deferential standard, which is more than a scintilla or some evidence, but less than a preponderance of evidence. The court does not assume the fact-finder's role, since the issue is purely one of law. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 428 (App. 2018).

When the court finds substantial evidence in the record supporting Social Security Board's findings, it must affirm the Board's decision that the applicant remarried and is thus not entitled to further social security survivor benefits as a result thereof. Hadley v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 420, 428 (App. 2018).

An adopted child applying for benefits under the FSM Social Security system must complete an application and show dependency on the insured. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 493 (Kos. 2018).

A valid claim for Social Security benefits as an adopted child requires proof of adoption and of the adopted child's dependency on the wage earner. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 493 (Kos. 2018).

Social Security has the regulatory authority to request additional proof of dependency and the claimant is required to submit such proof since actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for an adopted minor to receive surviving child Social Security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 493-94 (Kos. 2018).

When the immunization records that listed the children's natural mothers did not support the benefits claim because it did not show the children's dependency on the adoptive parents; when no additional evidence was submitted after the hearing for the court to consider; and when the census records show the adopted children in the same household as the wage-earner adoptive parent and his daughters, the natural mothers, the court will remand the matter to the Board to determine whether the children were dependent on the wage-earner's disability payments; whether the children's mothers were employed at the time; and whether dependency would be presumed if the child lived with the adoptive parents. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 490, 494-95 (Kos. 2018).

That the adoptive father is not identified as the children's parent on official forms may be of little significance in determining dependency. Some forms are necessarily confusing because the question of "parent" can be ambiguous, especially with respect to medical records. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. 2019).

A child is deemed dependent upon his proven natural parent or adoptive parent unless such parent was not living in the same household with or contributing to the child's support. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 393 (Kos. 2019).

Regardless of arguments about the application of presumptions, case law requires a determination of the adoptive children's "actual dependency" on the deceased adoptive parent. This does not regard a presumption. It is a factual inquiry and primarily focused on documentary evidence. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 394 (Kos. 2019).

A valid claim for adopted child benefits requires proof of adoption and of the adopted child's dependency on the wage earner. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 394 (Kos. 2019).

Social Security has the regulatory authority to request additional proof of dependency and the claimant is required to submit such proof. Actual dependency upon the adoptive parent is a prerequisite for an adopted minor to receive surviving child Social Security benefits after the adoptive parent's death. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 394 (Kos. 2019).

A Social Security claimant becomes "entitled" to benefits once he or she has applied and has provided convincing evidence of entitlement. A Social Security benefit applicant is responsible for providing the evidence needed to prove his or her entitlement to Social Security benefits. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 394 (Kos. 2019).

Regulations provide Social Security with wide discretion in obtaining evidence that it considers determinative on the issue of an adopted child's dependency. The Social Security Administrator has the discretion to request any documents or evidence that will prove the child's dependency on the insured person. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 394-95 (Kos. 2019).

Based on the wide discretion granted to Social Security under regulation § 100.22 to determine dependency, a request for evidence of the adopted child's "economic dependency" is within the scope of the Board's authority. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 395 n.7 (Kos. 2019).

While the court recognizes the difficulties a Social Security claimant may have in substantiating her claim, the burden of proof remains with the applicant as a matter of law and does not shift to the Social Security Administration. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 396 (Kos. 2019).

– Taxes, Liens, and Penalties

For Social Security purposes, wages means payment, salary, or compensation for employment, whether received in cash or a medium other than cash, such as meals. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (I), 7 FSM R. 280, 284 (Yap 1995).

Social Security contributions are taxed from both employer and employee, and the employer is responsible for assessing the employee's contribution and withholding it from wages as and when paid. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (I), 7 FSM R. 280, 285 (Yap 1995).

The cash value of meals provided by the employer, even if provided for the convenience of the employer, constitute wages subject to the social security tax. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (I), 7 FSM R. 280, 288 (Yap 1995).

Both employer and employee must pay a tax or contribution to the social security trust fund. It is the employer's responsibility to deduct the employee's contribution from the wages it pays. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 367 (Yap 1996).

Social security taxes are a percentage calculated from the wages actually received by the employee not from the amount in the employment contract. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 367 (Yap 1996).

The maximum statutory penalty that may be assessed for failure to pay social security taxes is $1000. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 368 (Yap 1996).

Interest on unpaid social security taxes is assessed at 12% from date due until paid even if part of a court judgment and even though court judgments normally bear a 9% interest rate. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 370 (Yap 1996).

The Social Security Administration is entitled to its reasonable attorney's fees and costs when a court determines that a contribution is due. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 370 (Yap 1996).

Under 53 F.S.M.C. 605(3) an employer is delinquent each quarter that it fails to both file a report and pay within ten days after the end of the quarter. Therefore an employer may be subject to the maximum penalty of $1,000 each time (quarter) it is delinquent. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 132 (App. 1997).

Both interest, 53 F.S.M.C. 605(4), and penalties, 53 F.S.M.C. 605(3), may be applied to an employer who is delinquent, as was intended by Congress. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 132-33 (App. 1997).

When Congress has specifically given Social Security, not the courts, the discretion to levy a penalty and limited that discretion to $1,000 a quarter and Social Security has exercised its discretion by levying a penalty less than that allowed by the statute, the court is generally bound to enforce it. The courts cannot usurp the power Congress granted to another governmental body. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1997).

A trial court may, pursuant to 53 F.S.M.C. 605(4), award attorney's fees and collection costs, including fees for a successful appeal, to the Social Security Administration. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 134 (App. 1997).

Social security taxes, although imposed on actual earned income, are levied pursuant to a constitutional authority other than that to impose taxes on income. Thus, although social security taxes are an "income" tax, they are not "national taxes" that the national government must pay half of to the state where collected. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434-35 (App. 2000).

Although income-related, neither the fishing fees levied under Article IX, section 2(m) nor the social security taxes levied under Article IX, section 3(d) are income taxes within the meaning of Article IX, section 2(e) or national taxes within the meaning of section 5. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

The social security tax lien arises by operation of law whenever social security taxes become due and are not paid. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 64 (Chk. 2003).

Under 53 F.S.M.C. 607, Social Security taxes specifically take priority over other tax liens. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

As Congress clearly intended, social security tax liens must be given priority over all other claims and liens and paid first. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 66 (Chk. 2003).

Interest on unpaid social security taxes continues to accrue at 12% until paid, even though a judgment normally bears interest at 9%. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Lelu Town, 13 FSM R. 60, 62 (Kos. 2004).

Social Security taxes do have a priority over all other claims and liens. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Yamada, 18 FSM R. 88, 89 (Pon. 2011).

Even when the court is reluctant to refer the dispute for prosecution on contempt and social security tax evasion charges, Social Security itself may direct the matter to the FSM Department of Justice's attention for investigation and further action, including possible prosecution. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 128, 130 (Pon. 2015).

SOVEREIGN IMMUNITY

The Trust Territory Government is not immune from suit in the Truk State Court because the High Court has overturned the doctrine of sovereign immunity accepted by that court in the past. Suda v. Trust Territory, 3 FSM R. 12, 14 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

The Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands is a political entity possessing many of the attributes of an independent nation, and is to be regarded as a sovereign for the purpose of the statute of limitations. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yap Shipping Coop., 3 FSM R. 84, 86 (Yap 1987).

No clause in the FSM Constitution is equivalent to the eleventh amendment of the United States Constitution, which generally bars citizens from using United States federal courts to seek monetary damages against states. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 361 (Pon. 1988).

Courts lack authority to establish sovereign immunity to general tort claims through judicial action. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 1988).

Since the Constitution's Professional Services Clause is a promise that the national government will take every step "reasonable and necessary" to provide health care to its citizens, a court should not lightly accept a contention that 6 F.S.M.C. 702(4), which creates a $20,000 ceiling of governmental liability, shields the government against a claim that FSM government negligence prevented a person from receiving necessary health care. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 362 (Yap 1990).

The Federated States of Micronesia, as a sovereign nation, may bestow immunity upon civilian employees of another nation in order to obtain benefits for this nation's citizens. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 98 (Pon. 1991).

The Compact of Free Association provides to the United States immunity from the jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court for claims arising from the activities of United States agencies or from the acts or omissions of the employees of such agencies. Samuel v. United States, 5 FSM R. 108, 111 (Pon. 1991).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction over a suit against the national government by the states alleging that under the Constitution the states are entitled to 50% of all revenues from the EEZ because the FSM has waived its sovereign immunity in cases to recover illegally collected taxes and for claims arising out of improper administration of FSM statutory law. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 7 FSM R. 563, 568 (Pon. 1996).

The government has no sovereign immunity from suits seeking to prevent the improper administration of FSM statutes and regulations. Dorval Tankship Pty, Ltd. v. Department of Finance, 8 FSM R. 111, 115 (Chk. 1997).

Courts lack the authority to establish sovereign immunity to general tort claims through judicial action. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 194 (Pon. 1997).

The purpose of 6 F.S.M.C. 701 et seq. is to permit and define certain specific causes of action against the FSM. The statute creates specified causes of action, not sovereign immunity. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 312, 321 n.6 (Chk. 1998).

Creation of a doctrine of sovereign immunity of the FSM from garnishment should be left to the specific, unambiguous, and explicit action of Congress. The court will not create such a doctrine by judicial action. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 312, 321 (Chk. 1998).

The question of proper service is different from the question of the validity of an immunity defense. The issue of sovereign immunity does not involve a jurisdictional defect in the same sense as does improper service of process. Rather, the sovereign immunity defense technically comes into consideration only after jurisdiction is acquired and simply provides a ground for relinquishing jurisdiction previously acquired. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 372 n.2 (Kos. 2000).

The determination of whether Tonga and its agents are immune from suit is a decision that is better made by the FSM government's executive branch because the FSM Constitution expressly delegates the power to conduct foreign affairs to the President and because whether a party claiming immunity from suit has the status of a foreign sovereign is a matter for the executive branch's determination and is outside the competence of the courts. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 373 (Kos. 2000).

International organizations, their property, and their assets wherever located, and by whomsoever held, are accorded the same immunity from suit and every form of judicial process by the Federated States of Micronesia government that it accords to foreign governments, but the nature of the immunity the FSM affords foreign governments is still an open question. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 373 n.5 (Kos. 2000).

Proceedings in a suit against a foreign government may be postponed in order to give the FSM Department of Foreign Affairs the opportunity to decide whether the court should recognize the foreign government's sovereign state immunity from suit. Kosrae v. M/V Voea Lomipeau, 9 FSM R. 366, 373-74 (Kos. 2000).

When other trial division cases recognize the principle of sovereign immunity and the trial court decision appealed from only observed that in the absence of a specific expression by the legislature, sovereign immunity would not prevent the court from garnishing property held by the FSM for a state, when the constitutionality of the FSM's sovereign immunity statute was not before the court, and when the FSM served only as a mere garnishee in a situation which Congress has prevented from recurring by the enactment of 6 F.S.M.C. 707, the trial court decision will not effect future litigation involving the FSM and the FSM's appeal is thus moot. FSM v. Louis, 9 FSM R. 474, 483-84 (App. 2000).

A suit over an incident involving a foreign vessel, will not be dismissed when the vessel was engaged in commercial activity, and not in sovereign acts. Kosrae v. Kingdom of Tonga, 9 FSM R. 522, 523 (Kos. 2000).

National government sovereign immunity is waived for claims for injunction arising out of alleged improper administration of FSM statutory laws, or any regulations issued pursuant to such statutory laws. Udot Municipality v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 354, 359 (Chk. 2001).

The FSM has waived sovereign immunity for claims for damages, injunction, or mandamus arising out of alleged improper administration of Federated States of Micronesia statutory laws, or any regulations issued pursuant to those laws. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 53 (App. 2003).

When the claims advanced fall within the FSM's statutory waiver of sovereign immunity, the court need not decide whether defendant allottees are part of the national government and cloaked with sovereign immunity. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 54 (App. 2003).

On a motion to dismiss brought by the FSM Development Bank, the bank's claim of sovereign immunity will be considered first since, if the bank prevails on this ground, the merits of the bank's other claims need not be considered. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 125 (Chk. 2005).

Generally, sue-and-be-sued clauses in statutes creating or empowering a governmental corporation or agency are waivers of immunity, and waivers by Congress of governmental immunity in case of such instrumentalities should be liberally construed. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 126 (Chk. 2005).

The sue-and-be-sued language in 30 F.S.M.C. 105(3) is a general waiver of sovereign immunity so that when Congress launched the FSM Development Bank into the commercial world and endowed it with the power "to sue and be sued," the bank was as amenable to a civil suit as a private enterprise would be under like circumstances. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 126 (Chk. 2005).

Even under national law, sovereigns, any sovereign, have sovereign immunity. But sovereigns are generally considered to have waived that immunity when the sovereign has acted as a participant in commerce instead of as a sovereign. It would seem unfair if a state, as a competitor in a commercial enterprise, could not be held liable and assessed the same damages that another commercial competitor, who committed the same acts, would be assessed. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 n.5 (App. 2006).

When whether 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2), which does not limit the FSM's liability to a certain dollar amount, or 6 F.S.M.C. 702(4), which limits recovery on an individual claim in that subsection to $20,000, applies, must await the presentation of facts not yet in evidence and requires that certain facts be proven and certain rulings of law made before it can be resolved, the claims against the FSM of over $20,000 will not be dismissed for failure to state a claim. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 368, 373 (Chk. 2006).

Chapter six of Title Six is the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands sovereign immunity statute. If it ever had any application to the FSM, it would have been supplanted or repealed by implication when the FSM Congress enacted a sovereign immunity statute, FSM Pub. L. No. 1-141, specifically applicable to the FSM national government. It remained part of the FSM Code because, at the time the FSM laws were codified, the Trust Territory government retained vestigial functions and authority in the FSM. By its terms, chapter six relates only to the Trust Territory government's liability and not to the liability of any of the FSM constitutional governments. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 604 (Pon. 2009).

Although the FSM Constitution's framers initially intended that there be no sovereign immunity in the FSM, they decided that that policy was too absolute and that the Constitution should remain silent on the subject so that the FSM Congress could decide which actions should be permitted against the government. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 604 (Pon. 2009).

From the wording of the chapter seven policy statement, 6 F.S.M.C. 701, it is clear that Congress's intent was that chapter seven contained the FSM national government's entire assertion of, and limited waiver of, its sovereign immunity, and that Title Six, chapter six does not grant any, and has no effect on, the FSM national government's sovereign immunity. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 604 (Pon. 2009).

6 F.S.M.C. 702(3) waives the FSM's sovereign immunity only for claims, whether liquidated or unliquidated, upon an express or implied contract with the FSM. But, although the equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment operates in the absence of an enforceable contract when a party has received something of value and neither paid for it or returned it, unjust enrichment is a theory applicable to implied contracts. Thus, depending upon the facts of a case, 6 F.S.M.C. 702(3) does not bar an unjust enrichment claim since it does waive the FSM's sovereign immunity for implied (as well as express) contract claims. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM has waived its sovereign immunity for suits seeking to prevent the improper administration of FSM statutes and for injunctions to prevent that improper administration. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 64 (Chk. 2011).

Sovereign immunity should not be confused with official immunity for public officers. Government officials who are performing their official duties are generally shielded from civil damages, and the court has previously recognized that some government workers have been held partially or completely immune from tort liability on grounds that they are public officers. This immunity, intended to serve the purpose of encouraging fearless and independent public service, has been bestowed upon prosecutors as well as other public officials. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 64 (Chk. 2011).

The FSM cannot raise a sovereign immunity defense when it has statutorily waived its sovereign immunity for damages arising out of the improper administration of FSM statutory laws and when a sound basis for the FSM's waiver of sovereign immunity may be the waiver for claims, whether liquidated or unliquidated, upon an express or implied contract with the FSM because the Memorandum of Understanding between Chuuk and the FSM provides that the FSM handles, processes, and pays the Chuuk Special Education Program payroll. Since that express contract obligates the FSM to make all properly obligated withholdings from the employees' pay, the Chuuk Health Care Plan is, by statute, an intended third-party beneficiary of the contract between the FSM and Chuuk so that the Plan's claim is therefore a claim based on Chuuk's contract with the FSM. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 18 FSM R. 491, 497 (Chk. 2013).

Since the Federated States of Micronesia has waived its sovereign immunity only to the extent of the first $20,000 in damages, when a plaintiff's actual damages exceed that amount, judgment shall be entered in her favor for $20,000. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 83, 86 (Pon. 2013).

The court will not recharacterize damages as a part of the uninjured spouse's loss-of-consortium claim and alter the nature of the damages claim solely to circumvent the FSM's statutory limited waiver of its sovereign immunity that prevents the injured spouse from being awarded the full amount of the damages she suffered. The court will comply with Congress's policy choice and its intent in enacting the limited waiver. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 85 (Pon. 2013).

Since 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2) specifically waives the FSM's sovereign immunity for claims for damages, injunction, or mandamus arising out of alleged improper administration of FSM laws, the FSM has waived its sovereign immunity for a suit by a state alleging that the FSM failed to comply with the FSM Constitution's mandate that not less than 50% of the national tax revenues be paid into the treasury of the state where collected. Chuuk v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 373, 375 (Chk. 2016).

Even when a state consents to be sued, its waiver of sovereign immunity does not allow its courts to force it to make an appropriation to satisfy a judgment in the absence of consent to the appropriation. When a money judgment has been rendered, the state's liability has been ascertained, but then the court's power ends. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531-32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

A sovereign's judicial power does not extend to lawsuits against the sovereign unless the sovereign has waived its immunity to suit and then only to the extent that it has waived its immunity. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 532 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

– Chuuk

The court will not judicially create the right of sovereign immunity from suit for Chuuk State. This is a legislative function. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 166-67 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

A plaintiff may not as a matter of law recover punitive damages from the State of Chuuk. Kaminaga v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 272, 274 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The State of Chuuk is immune from civil suits for damages arising out of malicious prosecution. Kaminaga v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 272, 274-75 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The Trust Territory Code provisions for orders in aid of judgment are not available as against Chuuk because, when it barred the courts' power of attachment, execution and garnishment of public property, the clear legislative intent was to supersede or repeal all provisions of the Trust Territory Code, Title 8 insofar as they allowed seizure of Chuuk state property. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Proceedings in aid of a judgment are supplementary proceedings to enforce a judgment, the same as attachment, execution and garnishment, and as against Chuuk State public property, are prohibited by § 4 of the Chuuk Judiciary Act. Kama v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 496, 498 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

When state law clearly provides that no action shall be brought against the state for any actions or omissions of the Chuuk Coconut Authority and that the Authority's debts or obligations shall not be debts or obligations of the Legislature or state government, and neither will be responsible for the same, the state and the governor will be dismissed as defendants from a suit against the Authority because as a matter of law no action lies against the state and no liability attaches. Konman v. Adobad, 11 FSM R. 34, 35 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A plaintiff may not as a matter of law recover punitive damages from the State of Chuuk. This principle has been modified somewhat by the enactment section 6 of the Chuuk State Sovereign Immunity Act of 2000, but that Act did not become law until January 25, 2001, and it does not apply to damage claims before that time. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 314 (Chk. 2005).

Although a compelling state interest exists in protecting the state from garnishment and execution of its funds as governments cannot effectively administrate essential public services with litigants constantly raiding their coffers, but since Congress has created a statutorily-based action for civil rights violations as these violations are particularly egregious in that they infringe upon what we commonly recognize as unalienable human rights, what must be struck is an adequate balance between protecting a government's ability to maintain sufficient funds to operate and the ability to hold the government accountable for violating its citizens' most basic rights. Barrett v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 229, 234 (App. 2009).

None of the FSM Code statutory exemptions to garnishment and execution provide an exception to execution or garnishment when the debtor is a state government. Barrett v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 229, 234 (App. 2009).

The FSM Constitution's supremacy clause does not permit a state law to prevent the enforcement of a national statute which gives a private cause of action for rights guaranteed by the FSM Constitution, especially when it is the solemn obligation of state governments to uphold the principles of the FSM Constitution and to advance the principles of unity upon which the Constitution is founded. Barrett v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 229, 234-35 (App. 2009).

A cause of action against the State of Chuuk accrues or arises and the limitations period starts running from the date on which the event triggering the cause of action occurred. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

Since sovereign immunity implicates a court's subject matter jurisdiction, the defense of sovereign immunity can be raised at any time, either by a party or by the court. The law is well established that counsel for the State or one of its agencies may not by failure to plead the defense, waive the defense of governmental immunity in the absence of express statutory authorization. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 7, 10-11 (Chk. 2015).

Even when there is no provision in the state's constitution or its statutes expressing the immunity of the state from liability for interest payments not assented to, such immunity is an attribute of sovereignty and is implied by law for the state's benefit. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 7, 11 (Chk. 2015).

Statutes, 6 F.S.M.C. 1401; 8 TTC 1, that read: "Every judgment for the payment of money shall bear interest at the rate of nine percent a year from the date it is entered" are statutes of general application to money judgments and not statutes that specifically address judgments against sovereign defendants. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 7, 11 (Chk. 2015).

Logically, when the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas also has an identically-worded statute derived from the same source as the FSM Code and Chuuk state law – the Trust Territory Code, the statutes would be interpreted and applied against their respective sovereigns in the same manner. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 7, 11 (Chk. 2015).

In the absence of an express statutory waiver of immunity against post-judgment interest, the Chuuk government is not liable for such interest even though there is a statute of general application imposing 9% post-judgment interest on money judgments, but Chuuk is liable for the 5% interest it agreed to on a loan. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 7, 11-12 (Chk. 2015).

Since the Chuuk Sovereign Immunity Act permits suits against the state government for claims, whether liquidated or unliquidated, that are made upon an express or implied agreement with the State of Chuuk or with any of its political subdivisions, it does not bar a suit to recover funds that, by agreement, were to be passed on by the state government to the municipal governments. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

Sovereign immunity does bar the imposition of interest as part of or on a judgment against the State of Chuuk. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

The judicial branch can, consistent with the state's waiver of sovereign immunity, declare the amount of the state's liability, but while the Chuuk State Supreme Court is empowered to declare the rights as between a judgment creditor and the government, it cannot enforce payment of the judgment absent legislative appropriation. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

Even when a state consents to be sued, its waiver of sovereign immunity does not allow its courts to force it to make an appropriation to satisfy a judgment in the absence of consent to the appropriation. When a money judgment has been rendered, the state's liability has been ascertained, but then the court's power ends. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 531-32 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

When Chuuk not only has not expressly waived its sovereign immunity to writs of attachment, execution, and garnishment, but has also gone further and affirmatively enacted legislation emphatically notifying the public and potential litigants that it has not waived its immunity to those writs, that statute is a valid expression of the separation of powers doctrine enshrined in the Chuuk Constitution. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 532 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

– Kosrae

The phrase "may assume liability is incurred by the chartered State Government," Kos. Const. art. XVI, § 7, is ambiguous because there are no guidelines for when the state is supposed to consent to being sued and when it is not. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 537, 541 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Article VI, section 9 of the Kosrae State Constitution provides no basis for assuming that sovereign immunity is inherent in the Kosrae State Constitution because sovereign immunity was a creation of Trust Territory common law. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 537, 541 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Determinations as to whether claims of citizens against the previous Kosrae state chartered government may now be upheld against the constitutional state government are to be made by the judiciary on the basis of: 1) when the cause of action arose; 2) the identity of the officer or person whose action created the liability; and 3) the place where the original action creating the liability occurred. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 539, 542-43 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

– Pohnpei

Customary and traditional practices within a state should be considered in determining whether the people of that state would expect their state government to be immune from court action. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 159 (Pon. 1986).

Neither the Pohnpei Constitution, laws, custom nor tradition, nor the common law, grant the Pohnpei State Government sovereign immunity from all unconsented suits against the state. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 161 (Pon. 1986).

The Pohnpei Government Liability Act immunizes the State of Pohnpei and its employees from suit unless the claim underlying the suit is specifically authorized by the Act or some other state law, and even with respect to those claims, the Act imposes a variety of restrictions and limitations on the maintenance of those suits. The Act's definition of State of Pohnpei includes all branches of government, any corporation, and other person or entity primarily acting as instrumentalities or agencies of the government, and all boards, commissions, public corporations, authorities, departments, divisions or offices of the government and this definition is more than broad enough to encompass the Pohnpei Port Authority. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 226 & n.2 (Pon. 2005).

Tort claims, tax claims, contract claims, breach of fundamental rights, claims for damages, injunctive relief or writ of mandamus arising from the alleged unconstitutionality or improper administration of Pohnpei statutes or regulations, any other civil action or claim against the state founded upon any law or any regulation, or upon any express or implied contract with the Pohnpei government or for liquidated or unliquidated damages in cases not sounding in tort, and actions for collection of judgments based on claims allowed against the State of Pohnpei can be sued upon within two years of the date on which they accrue. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 226-27 (Pon. 2005).

Since, by its own terms, the Pohnpei Government Liability Act statute of limitations is applicable only to those claims identified in Section 4 of that Act, which identifies a number of different claims, including claims based on violation of Pohnpei state law such as the Pohnpei Constitution, but does not expressly identify claims that are based upon national law or the National Constitution, the plaintiff's claim for declaratory judgment based on violation of the National Constitution and its claim for damages for civil rights violations under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) are not subject to the Act's statute of limitations and will not be dismissed on the ground that they are time barred by that statute of limitations. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 227-28 (Pon. 2005).

Pohnpei state government and its agencies are statutorily immune from punitive damages. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 377, 382 (Pon. 2019).

– Yap

Yap has specifically extended its sovereign immunity waiver to include set-offs. Pt. Alorinda Shipping v. Alorinda 251, 21 FSM R. 318, 325 n.6 (Yap 2017).

STATUTES

A statute which either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law. FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 304 (Truk 1983).

An unconstitutional statute may not be redeemed by voluntary administrative action. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 357 (Pon. 1983).

A criminal statute must not be so vague and indefinite as to fail to give fair notice of what acts will be punished but the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation does not require absolute precision of perfection of criminal statutory language. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 1984).

The right to be informed of the nature of accusation requires that a statute be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that persons of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 507 (App. 1984).

The required degree of precision under the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation may be affected by considerations such as limits upon the capacity for human expression and difficulties inherent in attempts to employ alternative methods of stating the concept. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 508 (App. 1984).

Some generality may be inescapable in proscribing conduct but the standard of precision required under the right to be informed of the nature of the accusation is greater in criminal statutes than in civil statutes. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 508 (App. 1984).

Since the Trust Territory High Court and District Courts were still active at the time of codification, provisions in the FSM Code referring only to them quite likely were intended only to regulate those courts. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 14 (Pon. 1985).

Public Law No. 2-48, promulgating the codification of the FSM statutes and speaking only of "All enacted law of the Interim Congress of Micronesia . . . and all enacted law of the Congress of the Federated States of Micronesia" as "readopted and reenacted as positive law of the Federated States of Micronesia," may not be interpreted as an attempt to repeal or purge the Trust Territory law from the law of the Federated States of Micronesia. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 43 (App. 1985).

In approving the current codification of laws, the Congress "readopted and reenacted as positive law" those portions of the Code relating to laws enacted by the FSM Congress or the Interim Congress of the Federated States of Micronesia. For such laws then the Code itself indisputably is the official version. In the event of conflict between the Code and the language of the statute as reported in other sources, including congressional journals, the Code would be deemed accurate and would prevail. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 91 (Kos. 1985).

In declining to "reenact" in Public Law No. 2-48 provisions originating with High Commissioners or Congress of Micronesia, Congress seems to have been motivated by transitional considerations rather than a desire to withhold official status from those laws. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 92 (Kos. 1985).

The FSM Code was adopted by Congress to facilitate "law making and legal research," since Congress recognized that a "single body of laws" was "needed to organize all applicable statutes into one source." FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 92 (Kos. 1985).

The Code of the Federated States of Micronesia is intended by Congress to be regarded as the official and controlling version of the language of any legislation reported in the Code. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 92 (Kos. 1985).

Where the legislature has a rational basis for a statutorily non-suspect classification, the court will not inquire into the wisdom of that statute. Paulus v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 208, 218 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Determination as to whether a statute is a state or national law must be made on a statute-by-statute or a section-by-section basis. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 355 (Pon. 1988).

The fact that Congress included a particular law in the FSM Code does not indicate conclusively whether the law is to be applied by this court as part of national law, for some parts of the Code were intended to apply only to the Trust Territory High Court in its transitional role until state courts were established. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 356 (Pon. 1988).

When there is no statement in an act or implication in its regulative history that Congress intended court deference to administrative interpretations of the statute, courts make their own independent determination as to the meaning of the statute. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 421 (Pon. 1988).

It may not simply be assumed that a reference in a carryover statute to the district administrator always translates directly to governor, or that high commissioner always means president. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 475 (Pon. 1988).

Unchartered and unincorporated municipalities in Truk State have authority to enact curfew ordinances as long as they do not conflict with Truk State laws. David v. Fanapanges Municipality, 3 FSM R. 495, 497 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

Although FSM Public Law 2-33, regarding usury, did not appear in the 1982 codification of FSM statutes, it remained effective as did every other law which took effect after October 1, 1981 and it is currently in effect as codified in the 1987 supplement to the FSM Code at 34 F.S.M.C. 201-207. Bernard's Retail Store & Wholesale v. Johnny, 4 FSM R. 33, 36 (App. 1989).

A claim that the FSM liaison office did not fulfill its medical referral obligations as required by law falls within the embrace of 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2), which authorizes damage claims against the government for alleged improper administration of statutory laws or regulations. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 363 (Yap 1990).

Under national law, the governor of a state is the allottee for all Compact of Free Association funds unless he delegates in writing his right to be allottee, so where a state statute allots such funds to the legislative branch without written delegation from the governor, the statute violates national law. Gouland v. Joseph, 5 FSM R. 263, 265 (Chk. 1992).

Where a statute creates a cause of action and then places exclusive, original jurisdiction over all controversies arising from that cause of action in a particular court, another court will have no jurisdiction to entertain claims under that statute. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 360 (Pon. 1994).

Criminal statutes in effect on the effective date of the State of Chuuk Constitution (Oct. 1, 1989) that are consistent with the Constitution continue in effect. Chuuk v. Arnish, 6 FSM R. 611, 613 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1994).

When an ordinance is not void upon its face, but its invalidity is dependent upon facts, it is incumbent upon the party relying upon the invalidity to aver and prove the facts which make it so. It is also the rule that one who seeks to overthrow an ordinance on the ground that it was not regularly or properly enacted has the burden of proving that fact. Esechu v. Mariano, 8 FSM R. 555, 556 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Trust Territory statutes continue in effect except to the extent they are inconsistent with the Constitution, or are amended or repealed. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 62 (Pon. 2001).

When a state has not enacted laws in an area within its jurisdiction such as child support, national law is applicable to the state court proceeding, because the Trust Territory Code reciprocal support enforcement provisions, now codified at 6 F.S.M.C. 1711, are imputed to be state law under the FSM Constitution's Transition Clause. Under that clause, Trust Territory statutes that were applicable to the states became part of the states' laws regardless of whether they were published thereby. They stand as the laws of the states until amended, superseded or repealed. Anson v. Rutmag, 11 FSM R. 570, 572 (Pon. 2003).

Foreign law is a fact which must be pled and proven. But state law does not need to be expressly pled, because the court may take judicial notice of any state law. Berman v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 15 FSM R. 582, 595 (App. 2008).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because while the chief justice has the power to promulgate procedural rules, the rules may be amended by statute, and since the chief justice does not have the power to amend a statute, when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/V Mell Sentosa, 17 FSM R. 478, 479 (Yap 2011).

A statute that purports to allow Congress to step around the bill-making process and approve fishing access agreements by resolution, is surely unconstitutional because under the Constitution, Congress may make law only by statute, and may enact statutes only by bill. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 546 (App. 2011).

Under the FSM Constitution's Supremacy Clause, a national statute must control over a conflicting state statute. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 619 (Chk. 2011).

By its terms, a statute enacted by the U.S. Congress that permits declarations in place of affidavits affects only U.S. rules and regulations. When the FSM Congress has not enacted an equivalent statute and no procedural rule has been promulgated to bring about the same result, an unsworn declaration, even when the declarant avers or asserts that it is made "under the penalty of perjury," is not the equivalent of an affidavit required by the FSM rules. This is not a matter of interpreting an FSM procedural rule similar to a U.S. rule, but is rather a matter of not applying a foreign statute that has no FSM counterpart. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 297, 300 & n.1 (Yap 2012).

A statute in force in Chuuk on the Chuuk Constitution's effective date continues in effect to the extent it is consistent with the Chuuk Constitution or until it is amended or repealed. Thus 1TTC 103 is still effective statutory law in Chuuk. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

Custom does not divest Congress of its power to regulate shipping and commerce or render the limitation of liability statute, 19 F.S.M.C. 1101-1108, unconstitutional. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 532, 538 (Yap 2013).

While foreign law is a fact which must be pled and proven, national (or state law) does not need to be expressly pled since the court may take judicial notice of any national (or state) law. Thus, the FSM salvage contract statute's application cannot be avoided by trying to characterize a salvage contract as some other kind of contract. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 8 (Pon. 2013).

While rights are often freely assignable, duties are not freely delegated. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 227, 232 (Yap 2013).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because, while the Chief Justice has the power to promulgate procedural rules, those rules may be amended by statute, and because the Chief Justice does not have the power to amend a statute, a Congressionally enacted procedural rule is valid. Setik v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 505, 517 (App. 2018).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because, while the Chief Justice can promulgate procedural rules, the rules may be amended by statute, and because the Chief Justice does not have the power to amend a statute, a Congressionally enacted procedural rule is valid. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 550 (App. 2018).

Courts have no responsibility for the justice or wisdom of legislation, and no duty except to enforce the law as it is written, unless it is clearly beyond the lawmaking body's constitutional power. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 526 (App. 2020).

Chuuk State Constitution's transition clause provides that statutes in force at the time the Constitution took effect remain in effect to the extent they comply with the Constitution, or until amended or repealed.

Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Amendment

The Constitution permits the Chief Justice to promulgate civil procedure rules, which Congress may amend by statute. Since Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute, when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. The Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Tipingeni v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 539, 542 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

A statute takes precedence over the procedural rules because while the chief justice has the power to promulgate procedural rules, the rules may be amended by statute, and since the chief justice does not have the power to amend a statute, when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. People of Tomil ex rel. Mar v. M/V Mell Sentosa, 17 FSM R. 478, 479 (Yap 2011).

Congress enacted an exemption statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 1415, and courts cannot broaden statutes beyond their original meaning. Nor do courts have the power to amend a statute. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161 (App. 2013).

The Chuuk Legislature may amend any of its earlier statutes that created a governmental agency, in order to alter, or vary, or eliminate any of that agency's powers or duties. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

The power to amend statutes belongs exclusively to the legislature. Existing legislation is subject to amendment in any manner consistent with constitutional limitations. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

A state agency has only such rights, powers, and duties as the state legislature sees fit to bestow upon it through a duly enacted statute. Thus the legislature may, through another duly enacted statute, alter or may revoke any of those rights, powers, and duties. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

– Construction

A fundamental principle of statutory interpretation is that when a statute can be read in two ways, one raising constitutional issues and the other interpreting the language as affecting matters clearly within the constitutional reach of Congress, the latter interpretation should prevail so that the constitutional issue is avoided. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 32 (Pon. 1981).

When interpreting a statute, courts should try to avoid interpretations which may bring the constitutionality of the statute into doubt. Tosie v. Tosie, 1 FSM R. 149, 157 (Kos. 1982).

While courts will not refuse to pass on the constitutionality of statutes in a proceeding in which such a determination is involved, needless consideration of attacks on their validity and unnecessary decisions striking down statutes will be avoided. Legislative acts are presumed to be constitutional; where fairly possible a construction of a statute will be made that avoids constitutional questions. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 180-81 (Truk 1982).

Courts should avoid, where possible, selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt the constitutionality of that statute. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 190 (App. 1982).

Constitutional issues should not be decided if the statute in question may be interpreted in such a way as clearly to conform with constitutional requirements. Suldan v. FSM (I), 1 FSM R. 201, 205 (Pon. 1982).

If construction of a statute by which a serious doubt of constitutionality may be avoided is fairly possible, a court should adopt that construction. Suldan v. FSM (II), 1 FSM R. 339, 357-58 (Pon. 1983).

It is a settled rule of statutory construction that a statute adopted from another jurisdiction is presumed to have been adopted as construed by the courts of that jurisdiction. Andohn v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 433, 441 (App. 1984).

Commonly accepted meanings arising out of prior court interpretations in the jurisdictions from which statutes are borrowed may be considered in testing claim that the statute is unconstitutionally vague. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 509-10 (App. 1984).

Interpretations by other jurisdictions may be considered in determining the meaning of language borrowed from those other jurisdictions. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 517 n.7 (App. 1984).

The statutory construction rule of lenity reflects the reluctance of courts to increase or multiply punishments absent a clear and definite legislative direction. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 528 (App. 1984).

Where possible, statutory provisions should be interpreted in such a way as to avoid any potential conflicts between the statute and the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia. Ishizawa v. Pohnpei, 2 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 1985).

The Code will determine the content of statutory language to be enforced, although other sources such as congressional journals and even the original version of the statute might be consulted to indicate legislative intent when the language in the Code is ambiguous. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 92 (Kos. 1985).

Interpretations which strip clauses of substance and effect run against the norms of interpretation and are greatly disfavored. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 94 (Kos. 1985).

Where there is a conflict between a statute of general application to numerous agencies or situations, such as the APA, and a statute specifically aimed at a particular agency or procedure, such as the National Election Code, the more particularized provision will prevail. This rule is based upon recognition that the legislative body, in enacting the law of specific application, is better focused and speaks more directly to the affected agency and procedure. Olter v. National Election Comm'r, 3 FSM R. 123, 129 (App. 1987).

If a dispute properly may be resolved on statutory grounds without reaching potential constitutional issues and without discussing constitutional principles, the court should do so. FSM v. Edward, 3 FSM R. 224, 230 (Pon. 1987).

A cardinal principle of statutory interpretation is to avoid interpretations which might bring into question the constitutionality of the statute. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 359 (Pon. 1988).

When dealing with statutes, before discussing constitutional issues a court must first address any threshold issues of statutory interpretation which may obviate the need for a constitutional ruling. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 419 (Pon. 1988).

Where legislative history does not conclusively establish which meaning Congress intended, the statutory provision must be considered against the background of the entire act to arrive at an interpretation consistent with other provisions and with the general design of the act. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 422 (Pon. 1988).

Unreasonableness of the result produced by one among alternative possible interpretations of a statute is reason for rejecting that interpretation in favor of another which would produce a reasonable result. Michelsen v. FSM, 3 FSM R. 416, 426 (Pon. 1988).

Statutory provisions designed to enhance the capacity of the government to enforce penalties for failure to pay taxes are penal, not remedial, and should be strictly construed. In re Island Hardware, Inc., 3 FSM R. 428, 432 (Pon. 1988).

Courts should not broaden statutes beyond the meaning of the law as written, even if it means that gambling devices just as harmful socially as slot machines, such as poker machines, will be excluded from statutory prohibition of slot machines. In re Slot Machines, 3 FSM R. 498, 500-01 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

Courts may not speculate as to the powers and duties of the office of the Attorney General, but must look to the wording of the relevant law, and further, may not speculate as to the probable intent of the legislature apart from the words. Truk v. Robi, 3 FSM R. 556, 562 (Truk S. Ct. App. 1988).

Since Congress used the Trust Territory Investment Act as the overall model in drafting the FSM Foreign Investment Act and adopted language similar to that employed in the Trust Territory statute for describing the activities to be covered in the FSM law, analysis of the new Act must begin with a presumption that Congress intended that the FSM Foreign Investment Act would regulate essentially the same activities as those covered by the Trust Territory Investment Act. Carlos v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 17, 26 (App. 1989).

Statutory changes overruling previous judicial rulings may fundamentally alter the general law in the area newly governed by statute. Federal Business Dev. Bank v. S.S. Thorfinn, 4 FSM R. 367, 372 (App. 1990).

Because the FSM statute is based upon the United States model, the FSM Supreme Court should look to United States' court decisions under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 for assistance in determining the liability of a governmental body under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 204 (Pon. 1991).

In providing for civil liability under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), Congress intended that the word person would include governmental bodies. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 204-05 (Pon. 1991).

The plain meaning of a statutory provision must be given effect whenever possible. Setik v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 407, 410 (App. 1992).

Where a statute of general application conflicts with a statute of more particular application concerning the same subject matter, the more particularized provision prevails. However, remedial provisions that are merely cumulative and not duplicative apply equally. Setik v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 407, 410 (App. 1992).

That certain provisions of a general statute are overridden by a more specific statute does not imply that the general statute in its entirety is superseded. Setik v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 407, 411 (App. 1992).

When the language in the Code is ambiguous, other sources such as congressional journals may be consulted. Bank of the FSM v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 5, 7 (Pon. 1993).

Statutes should be interpreted so that they are internally consistent. Provisions should be considered against the background of the entire act so as to arrive at a reasonable interpretation consistent with other specific provisions and the general design of the act. Bank of the FSM v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 5, 8 (Pon. 1993).

Where licenses are to be issued to each bank branch, and each bank branch must be scrutinized as to its qualifications for a license, it is a reasonable statutory interpretation that the regulatory license fee must be paid for each bank branch. Bank of the FSM v. FSM, 6 FSM R. 5, 8 (Pon. 1993).

Where the FSM statute governing extradition proceeding is silent on the appealability of extradition proceedings and where the statute has been borrowed from another jurisdiction where extradition proceedings are not appealable it is presumed that the meaning and application of the statute is as it was interpreted by the courts of the source. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 23, 25 (App. 1993).

A long-standing norm of statutory construction holds that provisions of law must be read so as to be internally consistent and sensible. McCaffrey v. FSM Supreme Court, 6 FSM R. 279, 281 (App. 1993).

Pronouncements by a later legislature concerning the meaning of actions taken by an earlier legislature are generally unreliable, especially when the later legislative body is a part of an entirely different government. Etscheit v. Adams, 6 FSM R. 365, 381 (Pon. 1994).

Courts prefer to read different sections of the same statute in a manner that permits them to be consistent with each other rather than to be inconsistent or at cross purposes. FSM v. Moroni, 6 FSM R. 575, 579 (App. 1994).

The intention of the legislature as to whether a provision is mandatory or not is determined from the language used. The use of the word shall is the language of command and considered mandatory. In re Failure of Justice to Resign, 7 FSM R. 105, 109 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1995).

Statutes and constitutional provisions must be read together when the statutes are pre-constitution and because they are only effective to the extent they are not in conflict with the Chuuk Constitution. Sana v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 252, 254-55 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Provisions of a law must be read so as to be internally consistent and sensible, and where a term in a statute is unambiguous and dispositive, a court should not examine other materials that might indicate legislative intent. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (I), 7 FSM R. 280, 284 (Yap 1995).

When the statute is not ambiguous there is no need to examine legislative intent, but when the language of the Code is ambiguous, other sources, such as Congressional journals or the original version of the statute may be consulted to give an indication of Congressional intent. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (I), 7 FSM R. 280, 286 (Yap 1995).

Where FSM Code provisions are based on U.S. law FSM courts may, in order to shed light on legislative intent, consider statutory interpretations by U.S. courts without being bound by those cases, but cases interpreting sections of the U.S. Code that were not enacted into the FSM Code are not relevant as an indication of the intent of the FSM Congress. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (I), 7 FSM R. 280, 286 (Yap 1995).

A statute that imposes a penalty is subject to strict construction, particularly where a penalty may be imposed without requiring a finding of a culpable state of mind. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM), Inc. (II), 7 FSM R. 365, 368 (Yap 1996).

The unambiguous words of a statute which imposes criminal penalties cannot be altered by judicial construction to punish someone not otherwise within its reach, no matter how much he deserves punishment. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

A general section in a statute cannot expand the class of principals to whom the more specific sections are directed. FSM v. Webster George & Co., 7 FSM R. 437, 440 (Kos. 1996).

Because the provision permitting an automatic increase back to their former salaries by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and the members of the legislature, is severable, it thus may be ruled unconstitutional without affecting the validity of the rest of the statute. Chuuk State Supreme Court v. Umwech (II), 7 FSM R. 630, 632 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

Statutes authorizing attachment must be construed strictly. In general, attachment is available only in certain kinds of actions and then only upon a showing of special grounds. Bank of Hawaii v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n, 7 FSM R. 659, 662 (Pon. 1996).

The legislature's intention as to whether a provision is mandatory is determined from the language used. The use of the word shall is the language of command and considered mandatory. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 670 (App. 1996).

When the fishing statute sets forth a list of prohibited acts in the disjunctive, commission of any one of the listed acts is unlawful, and the government may pursue separate civil penalties for each. FSM v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 79, 90 (Pon. 1997).

A court should construe a statute as the legislature intended. Legislative intent is determined by the wording of the statute. What a legislature says in the text of a statute is considered the best evidence of the legislative intent or will. Thus a court must give effect to the plain meaning of a statutory provision whenever possible. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 131 (App. 1997).

A provision of law must be read so as to be internally consistent and sensible. Courts should read different sections of the same statute, or even the two sentences that form one subsection, in a manner that permits them to be consistent with each other rather than to be inconsistent or at cross purposes. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 131-32 (App. 1997).

Basing legal analysis on dictionary definitions can be an uncertain proposition. This is particularly so where Congress has explicitly defined the term in the statute. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 132 n.2 (App. 1997).

When Congress has determined that the application of two subsections together would deter tax delinquencies, it is not a court's function to make a contrary determination. A court's function is to apply the statute as Congress intended unless doing so would violate the Constitution. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 133 (App. 1997).

The Supreme Court may exercise personal jurisdiction in civil cases only over persons residing or found in the Federated States of Micronesia or who have been duly summoned and voluntarily appear, except as provided in the long arm statute. The terms "resides in," "is a resident of," and "residence is in" are roughly synonymous. Alik v. Moses, 8 FSM R. 148, 149-50 (Pon. 1997).

Because of the verbs in the statute, only "carry" is defined in the Weapons Control Act, "possess" is given its usual meaning of taking into one's possession, and possession means to have in one's control. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 155 (Yap 1997).

An obligation of the state to pay a litigant a sum in exchange for dismissal of claims sought that arises from the judgment of dismissal of that case is not contrary to the legislative intent expressed in any provision of the Financial Management Act. Otherwise, no settlement of litigation requiring payment by the state could ever be made. Ham v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 300i, 300k (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

It is the purpose of the Financial Management Act to ensure that public funds are only used or promised in a manner provided by law and a judgment of the Chuuk State Supreme Court trial division is a manner provided by law. Ham v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 300i, 300k (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

When interpreting a statute, the plain meaning of the statutory provision must be given meaning whenever possible. Courts should not broaden statutes beyond the meaning of the law as written. Joy Enterprises, Inc. v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 8 FSM R. 306, 310 (Pon. 1998).

A court should avoid unnecessary constitutional adjudications. When interpreting a statute, courts should, where possible, avoid selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt the constitutionality of that statute. If construction of a statute by which a serious doubt of constitutionality may be avoided is fairly possible, a court should adopt that construction. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 348 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Acts of Congress are presumed to be constitutional. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 374, 387 (Pon. 1998).

The statutory and regulatory authorities in effect during the time the employees' grievances took place will be applied to the decision. Langu v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 427, 432 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

It is a well settled rule of law that an ordinance will be presumed to be valid, unless the contrary appears on its face. Esechu v. Mariano, 8 FSM R. 555, 556 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Via the analogy implicated by the Transition Clause, under a statute carried over from the Trust Territory which speaks in terms of the Trust Territory and any of its political subdivisions as being persons, Pohnpei is also a person to the same extent that a Trust Territory political subdivision was a person under the statute's prior incarnation. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 301, 305 (Pon. 2000).

When an ordinance has a savings clause and its provision for election filing fees is found unconstitutional, the filing fee provision of the previous ordinance it superseded will be reinstated. Nameta v. Cheipot, 9 FSM R. 510, 512 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a case's disposition and the plaintiffs' sought relief do not require construction of statute as to its constitutionality, courts will not undertake a decision based upon a constitutional issue. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The court will not rule on a statute's constitutionality when it can limit the case's disposition to interpretation of the statute's language as it applies to the question. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 545 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When an act lists 23 different and distinct prohibited gaming devices, including "slot machines," but makes no mention of "poker machines" whatsoever, by its failing to list "poker machines" in an extended list of prohibited items, the legislature excluded such machines from the application of the law, and the court will not include the machines into the proscription of the statute something which the Legislature intended to exclude. Pacific Coast Enterprises v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 543, 547 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Without a separate statute of limitations in the act creating a public corporation, the state legislature obviously intended for suit to be brought against the corporation within the same time period that suit must be brought against the state and its various related entities even though the corporation may act on its own and sue and be sued in its own name. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

The generally recognized rule is that interest should not bear interest, but compound interest may be awarded if authorized by statute. When the statute reads "nine percent a year" it is not an express authorization to compound interest annually, but is instead, without more, merely a statement of the rate of simple interest. Aggregate Sys., Inc. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 9 FSM R. 569, 570 (Chk. 2000).

Title 6, chapter 10, subchapter 1 of the FSM Code is replete with references to officials who either do not exist now or who no longer carry out the functions with which they are identified in the statute, and when confronted with such language in a section thereof, the FSM Supreme Court has generally ruled that the section applies only to the Trust Territory High Court. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. 2000).

Because the FSM statute is based upon the United States model, the FSM Supreme Court should consider United States court decisions under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and § 1988 for assistance in determining the intended meaning of, and governmental liability under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10

FSM R. 6, 13 (Chk. 2001).

If a statutory provision is unconstitutional and can be severed from the rest of the legislative act, only that provision will be struck down. MGM Import-Export Co. v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2001).

A savings clause that merely states that private parties who could previously seek civil remedies for what are now violations of the Chuuk State Environmental Protection Act still retain that right even if the Chuuk Environmental Protection Agency decides to act, does not create any new rights for those persons. Nor does it entitle them to collect any of the penalties created which may be asserted only by the Chuuk Environmental Protection Agency and only to its credit. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 51 (Chk. 2001).

The plain meaning of a statutory provision must be given effect whenever possible. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 62 n.7 (Pon. 2001).

When statutes are pre-constitution, the statutes and constitutional provisions must be read together because the statutes are only effective to the extent they are not in conflict with the constitution. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 63 (Pon. 2001).

The assertion that municipalities own submerged reef areas is not sound because 67 TTC 2(1) expressly states that the law established by the Japanese administration was that all marine areas below the ordinary high watermark belong to the government and because a finding that the municipalities were the underlying owners of all submerged reef areas, would render the statute granting them the right to use marine resources there superfluous and inconsistent with the rest of the statute. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 64 (Pon. 2001).

A long-standing norm of statutory construction states that provisions of law must be read so as to be internally consistent and sensible. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 64 (Pon. 2001).

Generally, statutes and enactments in derogation of the common law – existing law – are to be strictly construed. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 122 (Pon. 2001).

Although it is generally agreed that a statute in the derogation of the common law must be strictly construed, this rule of statutory construction cannot be used to defeat the obvious purpose of the legislature, nor to lessen the scope plainly intended to be given the statute. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 122 (Pon. 2001).

When a Pohnpei statute does not show any legislative intent to abolish the well-established principle of absolute judicial immunity for the judicial act of timing the issuance of court decisions and to allow a private suit for damages in such cases, a court can only conclude that the Pohnpei Legislature did not intend to abolish absolute judicial immunity in this instance and did not intend to create a right for damage suits against judges if their decisions were not timely. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 122 (Pon. 2001).

When the statute requires that a statement of contest must be filed within five days "after declaration of the result of the election by the body canvassing the returns" and also provides that upon "tabulation of each of the precinct votes, the Commission shall tabulate or cause to be tabulated the cumulative results, including the total of election results for each nominee, and make these results known to the public," the declaration is when the results are made known to the public. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 153 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

If a current law is unconstitutional, the previous law generally applies. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 145, 154 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

Generally, statutes and enactments in derogation of the common law, or existing law, are to be strictly construed. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 223 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

The court's task is to apply the law in the manner the Legislature intended as evidenced by the language it used in the statute. If this is unfair, it is a matter for the Legislature to correct, not the court. Cholymay v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 10 FSM R. 220, 223 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2001).

FSM Code provisions must be construed with a view to effect their object. Bank of the FSM v. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc., 10 FSM R. 327, 334 (Pon. 2001).

Generally, a provision is directory and not mandatory if it requires that certain actions be completed, but does not prescribe the result which should follow if those actions are not completed. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 453, 459 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The over-obligation of funds statute, 55 F.S.M.C. 220(3), was not intended to create a basis for private parties to sue government officials, but for the government to be able to punish employees and officials who are found to be misusing public funds. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 634 (Pon. 2002).

Statutes which do not, by their terms, provide private citizens with a cause of action for money damages cannot be the basis for private damages claims. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 634 (Pon. 2002).

The court will not infer the existence of a private cause of action in the absence of a clear intent expressed in the statute that such a private cause of action be created. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 634 (Pon. 2002).

The court must begin with the presumption that acts of Congress are constitutional. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

Acts of the Kosrae Legislature are presumed to be constitutional. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 256 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Courts should avoid, where possible, selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt the constitutionality of that statute. Accordingly, a defendant is burdened with a high standard of proof in establishing the unconstitutionality of a state law. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 249, 256 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The word "demand" means "ask as by right." When a police officer did request and ask as by right for the defendant's driver's license, even though the officer did not use the word "demand," the officer's request to the defendant for his driver's license satisfies the statute's "demand" requirement. Kosrae v. Sigrah, 11 FSM R. 263, 264 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The plain meaning of a statutory provision must be given effect whenever possible. Courts should not broaden statutes beyond the meaning of the law as written. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 378 (App. 2003).

The court's role is to construe the relevant statute as the legislature intended. Legislative intent is determined, first and foremost, by the statute's wording. The statute's text is considered the best evidence of legislative intent or will. The court must give effect to the plain meaning of a statutory provision whenever possible. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 379 (App. 2003).

When 53 F.S.M.C. 604 does not contain the broader language of, "or other legal processes," it cannot be interpreted in a manner identical to the U.S. statute that does. The FSM provision is more restrictive than the U.S. provision, as it protects Social Security benefits only from execution, attachment, garnishment, and assignment and not from other legal processes. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 379 (App. 2003).

The nation's laws are presumed to be constitutional, and when possible, statutory provisions should be interpreted in such a way as to avoid any potential conflicts between the statute and the Constitution. Rodriguez v. Bank of the FSM, 11 FSM R. 367, 382 (App. 2003).

Statutes are presumed constitutional until challenged, and the burden is on the challenger to clearly demonstrate that a statute is unconstitutional. Parkinson v. Island Dev. Co., 11 FSM R. 451, 453 (Yap 2003).

A court should construe a statute as the legislature intended. Legislative intent is determined by the statute's wording. What a legislature says in the statute's text is considered the best evidence of the legislative intent or will. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

The Legislature has granted the appellate division "all powers necessary to make the determination" of the contested election. The Legislature's intent when it said "all powers" was that the court could consider all relevant and admissible evidence properly offered. In re Mid-Mortlocks Interim Election, 11 FSM R. 470, 477 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2003).

All statutes are presumed to be constitutional and if there is any other way of disposing of an issue other than on a constitutional ground, then the court should decide the issue in that manner. Thus the court addresses a statute's constitutionality only with reluctance. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 535, 541 (Chk. 2003).

The conclusion that the statute is unconstitutional to the extent that it denies payment of judgments based on civil rights violations at least implies that the statute may be judicially tailored in application to make the statute otherwise workable. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 3, 12 (Chk. 2003).

A statutory provision repugnant to the Constitution, would be invalid to the extent of the conflict. FSM v. Udot Municipality, 12 FSM R. 29, 47 (App. 2003).

One principle of statutory construction is that the specific provision prevails over the more general. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 64 (Chk. 2003).

If two statutes conflict, the more recent expression of the legislature's will (that is, the most recently enacted statute) prevails over the earlier to the extent of the conflict. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 64 (Chk. 2003).

Generally, a specific statutory provision will control rather than a general statute to the extent that they conflict. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 (Chk. 2003).

Since "enter" means to place anything before a court, or upon or among the records, in a formal and regular manner, and usually in writing, and since common sense must play a part in the way that an agency's statutorily mandated procedures are interpreted, a letter from the Social Security Board stating that it is a final decision by the Board, and that the petitioner has the option of appealing to the FSM Supreme Court, is a final, entered order within the meaning of 53 F.S.M.C. 208. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 101, 103-04 (Kos. 2003).

When there is an apparent, or even putative, conflict between a statute of general application like the Administrative Procedures Act, and a statute directed toward a particular agency, the more specific provisions will apply. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 101, 104 (Kos. 2003).

Although statutes of limitation on criminal prosecutions must be accorded a rational meaning in harmony with the obvious intent and purpose of the law, such statutes must be liberally construed in favor of the accused, and exceptions from the benefits of such statutes must be construed narrowly or strictly against the government. The rule of strict construction will not justify an unreasonable interpretation – one contrary to the law's intent. The rule of strict construction simply means that ordinary words are to be given their ordinary meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 109-10 (Chk. 2003).

By deliberately using a different term in 11 F.S.M.C. 105(3)(b) from the one defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(11), the drafters can only have intended that the meaning be different, and, by not defining it, that the term's meaning should be the common, ordinary English language meaning of the term because words and phrases as used in the code must be read with their context and be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 110 (Chk. 2003).

The common and approved usage in the English language of the term "public officer" is a person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. "Public officer" is not a legal term of art but carries only its common, ordinary, and unambiguous English language meaning as found in the dictionary. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 110-11 (Chk. 2003).

Strictly construing the term "public officer" by using only its plain, ordinary, and unambiguous meaning (or in the code's terms "its common and approved usage"), a mayor falls within the public officer exception to the criminal statute of limitations. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

A statute's policy is to be found in the legislative intent, and it is the cardinal rule in the construction of statutes that such intent is, itself, to be found solely in the statute's words if they are free from ambiguity and express a sensible meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

A court should construe a statute as the legislature intended. Legislative intent is determined by the statute's wording. What a legislature says in a statute's text is considered the best evidence of the legislative intent or will. Thus a court must give effect to the plain meaning of a statutory provision whenever possible. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

When the statute's language is plain and unambiguous, it declares its own meaning and there is no room for construction. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

When the statute's drafters deliberately chose the term "public officer" in an exception to the criminal statute of limitations instead of using the term "public servant," as they did in so many other criminal code sections, the statute's object and the drafters' intent was to apply this exception to all public officers, not just to those the criminal code defined as "public servants." This is the statute's plain and unambiguous meaning. If the drafters had intended to restrict the exception to just those persons that had been defined as "public servants," they could easily have inserted that term instead. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

FSM Code provisions are to be construed according to the fair construction of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

A national statute whose term "public officer" refers to state and municipal public officials as well as national officials does not raise a constitutional issue involving the allocation of powers between the two sovereigns – state and national – and the three levels of government – national, state, and local because it applies to persons based upon their status as public officers – persons holding posts and exercising governmental functions. It does not matter whether that status is defined and bestowed upon a person by the national government or by another level of government in the FSM. It only matters that the person holds that status. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 105, 111 (Chk. 2003).

It is an elemental canon of statutory construction that where a statute expressly provides a particular remedy or remedies, a court must be chary of reading others into it. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114,

122 (Pon. 2003).

The question of whether a statute acts retrospectively or only prospectively is one of legislative intent. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. 2003).

An Act was not intended to be retroactive when it provided that the Act's "revision" should "not be construed to extinguish any rights or remedies of any party which may have arisen prior to such revision, unless specifically provided otherwise." Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. 2003).

When the statute does not provide for an alternative, the court may not read into a statute words which do not exist therein. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 160 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Basing legal analysis on dictionary definitions can be an uncertain proposition. Not the least of such concerns is that a comprehensive dictionary aims at setting out all meanings of a word, while a court must determine the precise intended meaning of a word or phrase in a specified context. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 166 (Pon. 2003).

Even where a litigant may have concerns over its ability to realize on a judgment against the state defendant, that concern alone does not serve to enlarge the scope of a statute to create liability for the national government, against which a judgment may be more collectible. Such issues are for the legislature. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167 (Pon. 2003).

There is no meaningful distinction between the terms "compulsory acquisition" and "expropriation." AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167 (Pon. 2003).

The court cannot read words into a statute that are not there. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167-68 (Pon. 2003).

National laws are often applied to persons based on their status, even when that status is defined solely by another government. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. 2003).

Words and phrases as used in the FSM code shall be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. FSM v. Wainit, 12 FSM R. 201, 205 (Chk. 2003).

The legislature's intention as to whether a statutory provision is mandatory is determined from the language used. Generally, a provision is directory and not mandatory if it requires that certain actions be completed, but does not prescribe the result which should follow if those actions are not completed. Buruta v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 289, 293 (Chk. 2004).

A cardinal principle of statutory construction is to avoid an interpretation which may call into question the statute's, or the rule's, constitutionality. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 12 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2004).

"Competition" means the effort of two or more parties, acting independently, to secure the business of a third party by the offer of the most favorable terms. "Merchandise" and "commodity" are similar enough in meaning to be interchangeable: "merchandise" is defined as each commodity bought and sold by merchants, while "commodity" is defined as any movable or tangible thing used in commerce as the subject of trade or barter. "Produce" as a noun means articles produced or grown from or on the soil. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 551 (Pon. 2004).

The nation's laws are presumed to be constitutional. A fundamental principle of statutory interpretation is that where a statute can be read in two ways, one raising constitutional issues and the other interpreting the language as affecting matters clearly within Congress's constitutional reach, the latter interpretation should prevail so that the constitutional issue is avoided. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 572-73 (App. 2004).

Courts should, where possible, avoid selecting interpretations of a statute which may bring into doubt that statute's constitutionality. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 573 (App. 2004).

Statutes are presumptively constitutional. Urusemal v. Capelle, 12 FSM R. 577, 586 (App. 2004).

Decisions of the United States courts have been consulted by our nation's courts when the language of the FSM Constitution or statute is comparable to language of the United State Constitution, but when there has been no showing that the Kosrae statutory language is comparable to the language addressed by the United States Supreme Court, those decisions will not be considered, especially when the FSM Supreme Court appellate division has addressed the issue. Melander v. Heirs of Tilfas, 13 FSM R. 25, 27 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When a state law makes a specific reference to a national statute, any interpretation of that state law must simultaneously present a question of national law. The FSM Supreme Court would have subject matter jurisdiction over such a case. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 32 (Kos. 2004).

When under the plain language of 30 F.S.M.C. 202(1), only unobligated funds are subject to the Governor's request for distribution and while Kosrae State Law No. 8-17 does not make reference to obligated funds, it makes a specific reference to 30 F.S.M.C. 202(1), there is no conflict between the two laws, because the Kosrae statute, by reference to the national statute, incorporates the qualification for distribution contained in the national statute that only unobligated funds are subject to distribution. A statute must be given its plain meaning wherever possible, and when that plain meaning is derived by looking to the national statute specifically referred to in the state statute, the Governor has an obligation to request the distribution of only unobligated funds. Shrew v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 30, 33 (Kos. 2004).

An otherwise valid national statute must control over a state statute. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 13 FSM R. 36, 43 (Pon. 2004).

In considering a challenge to a statute's constitutionality, the initial premise upon which the court must begin is that acts of the Kosrae State Legislature and the state's laws are presumed to be constitutional. The court should avoid selecting an interpretation of a statute which may bring into doubt that statute's constitutionality. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 288 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

A practice which has been followed by a government for a significant period of time is entitled to great weight in establishing that practice's constitutionality. The party that raises the issue has the burden of proof as to the statute's unconstitutionality. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 288 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The standard for consideration whether a statute is unconstitutionally vague is that a criminal statute must give fair notice of what acts are criminal conduct and subject to punishment; and the statute must be sufficiently explicit to prescribe the offense with reasonable certainty and not be so vague that person of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning. However, it is accepted that some generality may be necessary in describing the prohibited conduct. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 289 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the language of the Kosrae statute and the United States statute are similar, it is appropriate to look to interpretations by United States courts. Kosrae v. Phillip, 13 FSM R. 285, 289 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When interpreting the FSM Code, words and phrases must be read with their context and must be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 537, 538, 540 (Chk. 2005).

By deliberately using a different term, "public officer," in 11 F.S.M.C. 105(3)(b) from the ones defined in 11 F.S.M.C. 104(11) and in 11 F.S.M.C. 1301(2), the drafters can only have intended that the meaning be different, and, by not defining it, that the term's meaning should be its common, ordinary English language meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 538 (Chk. 2005).

A statute's policy is to be found in the legislative intent. And it is the cardinal rule in the construction of statutes that such intent is, itself, to be found solely in the statute's words, if they are free from ambiguity and express a sensible meaning. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 539 (Chk. 2005).

A court should construe a statute as the legislature intended. Legislative intent is determined by the statute's wording. What a legislature says in a statute's text is considered the best evidence of the legislative intent or will. Thus a court must give effect to a statutory provision's plain meaning whenever possible. In other words, when the statute's language is plain and unambiguous, it declares its own meaning and there is no room for construction. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 539 (Chk. 2005).

The views of a later Congress about what an earlier Congress intended carry little or no weight. As a matter of law, such evidence can only be given little or no weight. FSM v. Wainit, 13 FSM R. 532, 540 (Chk. 2005).

Since by statute, the classification of the titles, chapters, subchapters, and sections of the FSM Code, and the headings thereto, are made for the purpose of convenient reference and orderly arrangement, and since Congress has specifically prohibited that any implication, inference, or presumption of a legislative construction be drawn therefrom, the court can give no weight or credence to and must reject any argument, implication, inference, or presumption to be draw from a subchapter's heading or from a subsection's arrangement in that subchapter. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2006).

Since a statutory provision's plain meaning must be given effect whenever possible and courts should not broaden statutes beyond the meaning of the law as written, when there is no requirement in Section 13.201's express language that the accused be absent at the time the offense was committed, absence is thus not an essential element of the offense of accessory. Nena v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 73, 82 (App. 2006).

Generally, when the word "district" appears in an FSM Code provision carried over from the Trust Territory Code by virtue of the Constitution's Transition Clause, "state" will be read in its place. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

An FSM Code provision is to be construed according to the fair construction of its terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 n.1 (Pon. 2006).

When the plaintiff has a claim de jure that the power conferred (on the court to treble damages) should be exercised because it had proved its right to damages under 32 F.S.M.C. 301 et seq. and when, considering the whole anticompetitive practices statute and its nature and object, Congress's intent was to impose a positive duty to treble damages, not a discretionary power to do so, the court will therefore award treble damages. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

When the defendant's anticompetitive acts did not just harm the plaintiff's business, but those acts put it out of business, even if treble damages were discretionary, there would be no more appropriate a case to exercise the discretion to treble damages than one where the anticompetitive acts put the plaintiff out of business. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

The court's obligation is to construe the statute to implement the legislature's intent and the best evidence of its intent is the words used (or not used) in the statute. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 257, 260 (Chk. 2006).

By deliberately using a different term in 11 F.S.M.C. 105(3)(b) from the one defined in 11 F.S.M.C.

104(11), the drafters must have intended that the meaning be different, and, by not defining it, that the term's meaning should be its common, ordinary English language meaning because words and phrases as used in the FSM Code must be read with their context and be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 313 (Chk. 2006).

The common and approved English language usage of the term "public officer" is a person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. Strictly construing the term "public officer" by using only its plain, ordinary, and unambiguous meaning (or in the code's terms "its common and approved usage"), a mayor falls within the public officer tolling provision to the criminal statute of limitations, since the plain, unambiguous, and ordinary meaning of "public officer" (an ordinary term for which no construction is required) is that the term includes any person holding a post to which he has been legally elected or appointed and exercising governmental functions. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 313 (Chk. 2006).

Words and phrases, as used in the FSM Code or in any act of the Congress or in any regulation issued pursuant thereto must be read with their context and must be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 313 (Chk. 2006).

Under the English language's common and approved usage, words and phrases that modify other words or phrases are positioned as closely as possible to the word or phrase they modify because referential and qualifying words and phrases, where no contrary intention appears, refer solely to the last antecedent. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 313 (Chk. 2006).

When the maximum possible penalty for an alleged offense is ten years and the limitations period for offenses "punishable by imprisonment for ten years or more" is six years, the applicable limitations period is six years. The phrase, "ten years or more" does not mean that the maximum possible sentence must be more than ten years. The disjunctive "or" clearly means that, for subsection 105(2) to apply, a maximum possible sentence of only ten years is enough. FSM v. Nifon, 14 FSM R. 309, 314 (Chk. 2006).

Words and phrases, as used in the FSM Code or in any act of the Congress must be read with their context and shall be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 334 n.2 (Chk. 2006).

Court-promulgated rules are interpreted using the principles of statutory construction. FSM v. Petewon, 14 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2006).

The Constitution permits the Chief Justice to promulgate civil procedure rules, which Congress may amend by statute. Since Congress has the authority to amend or create procedural rules by statute, when Congress has enacted a procedural rule, it is valid. The Chief Justice does not have the authority to amend Congressionally-enacted statutes. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Tipingeni v. Chuuk, 14 FSM R. 539, 542 n.1 (Chk. 2007).

If the current law is unconstitutional, the previous law generally applies. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 588 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

A specific statutory provision prevails over a general provision. Samuel v. Chuuk State Election Comm'n, 14 FSM R. 586, 590 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The legislature's intention as to whether a statutory provision is mandatory is determined from the language used. Generally, a provision is directory and not mandatory if it requires that certain actions be completed, but does not prescribe the result which should follow if those actions are not completed. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 611 (Pon. 2007).

Although Section 1306 of Title 19 of the FSM Code authorizes the Secretary of the Department of Transportation, Communication and Infrastructure to investigate violations, there is no provision in Title 19 that prescribes what action shall be taken if an investigation is not undertaken. As such, the requirement that an investigation be undertaken prior to the filing of an information is not mandatory. FSM v. Zhang Xiaohui, 14 FSM R. 602, 611 (Pon. 2007).

When the Legislature has altered the statutory framework only to increase, and not decrease, Kosrae's hiring discretion for contract employees by removing the single qualification that it had placed on the contract employees exemption, the court cannot limit the hiring discretion thus conferred by the Kosrae Legislature in the absence of a statutory basis for doing so since it is the Kosrae Legislature's role to consider and determine the public policy that supports a statute, and to enact legislation that reflects that public policy. Allen v. Kosrae, 15 FSM R. 18, 22 (App. 2007).

When the Bankruptcy Act states the debtor's estate consists of "all property owned by the debtor on the date of the application," the Act should not be interpreted to mean something other than what it says. "All" means "all." Since statutes are to be interpreted according to their plain meaning, and when a statute's language is plain and unambiguous, it declares its own meaning and there is no room for construction. The meaning of "all" is plain and unambiguous." In re Panuelo, 15 FSM R. 23, 27 (Pon. 2007).

Words and phrases used in the FSM Code (of which the Bankruptcy Act is a part) must be read with their context and must be construed according to their common and approved English language usage. In re Panuelo, 15 FSM R. 23, 27 n.1 (Pon. 2007).

Since the FSM Code provisions are construed according to the fair construction of their terms with a view to effect its object and to promote justice, to construe the phrase "all property," to include the debtor's property outside the FSM would construe the Bankruptcy Act and 31 F.S.M.C. 203(1)(a) according to the fair construction of their terms or with a view to effect the Bankruptcy Act's object and to promote justice. In re Panuelo, 15 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2007).

Statutes are presumed to be constitutional. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 175 (Chk. 2007).

Courts observe a strict rule of construction against a retrospective operation, and indulge in the presumption that the legislature intended statutes, or amendments thereof, enacted by it, to operate prospectively only, and not retroactively. A contrary determination will be made only when the legislature's intention to make a statute retroactive is stated in express terms, or is clearly, explicitly, positively, unequivocally, unmistakably, and unambiguously shown. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 204-05 (Chk. 2007).

It is generally considered violative of the constitutional right to due process to apply a law retroactively that would divest someone of a vested right or property interest. Esa v. Elimo, 15 FSM R. 198, 205 (Chk. 2007).

Since the courts are the final authority on issues of statutory construction, when, based on the undisputed record and reasonable inferences drawn therefrom, the court concludes that the plaintiff is not selling imported items, the case is ripe for summary judgment on the issue of whether the tax statute applies to locally produced aggregate. K&I Enterprises v. Francis, 15 FSM R. 414, 418 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When "first sale" is defined as "the sale first made after the date of receipt in Chuuk State of taxable tangible items, a tax on first sale in the State of Chuuk of all tangible items, except gasoline and unprocessed and unpackaged items, means that in order for an item to be taxable, there must be "receipt of the item" in Chuuk. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from the definition of "first sale" is that items which have never left Chuuk, that is, locally produced goods are not subject to the statute because they have no "date of receipt" in Chuuk. K&I Enterprises v. Francis, 15 FSM R. 414, 418 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr.

2007).

The time periods running from "discovery" of the offense and the date the offense was committed are subject to the qualifier, "whichever is longer." The court will not read into the statute a qualifier of "whichever is shorter" because this would be directly contrary to the statute's plain meaning. The longer of the two possible calculations of the statutory limitations period applies. FSM v. Narruhn, 15 FSM R. 530, 533 (Chk. 2008).

Although it is a settled rule of statutory construction that a statute adopted from another jurisdiction is presumed to have been adopted as construed by the courts of that jurisdiction, when the statute's substance departs from the other jurisdiction's statute, the result will also differ. In re Panuelo, 15 FSM R. 640, 641 (Pon. 2008).

While there is no statutory definition of exploitation of an economic resource, these words' plain meaning leads to the conclusion that it includes fishing because the FSM's fisheries are undoubtedly a natural resource, marine in character, that are subject to economic exploitation as a result of the market demand for fish. It follows that fishing in the FSM EEZ constitutes the exploitation of a natural resource that subjects a party to the personal jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. FSM v. Fu Yuan Yu 096, 16 FSM R. 1, 3 (Pon. 2008).

When criminal liability is explicitly imposed for the use of a firearm "in connection with or in aid of the commission of any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," the use of the term "laws of the Federated States of Micronesia" does not make the statute unconstitutionally vague. This term refers to any or all criminal laws in the Federated States of Micronesia, national, state, or local because if it were otherwise, it would not be possible for the statute to have its obviously intended purpose and effect – to discourage the use of, and to punish the use of, firearms during the commission of other crimes. The plural form of the word "laws" further compels this conclusion. FSM v. Aiken, 16 FSM R. 178, 183 (Chk. 2008).

The appellate division should avoid unnecessary constitutional adjudication, and when interpreting statutes should try to avoid interpretations which may bring the constitutionality of the statute into doubt. Barrett v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 229, 234 (App. 2009).

Statutes setting salaries of public officials, like any other statutes, are presumed constitutional, and it is the court's duty to determine whether statutes conform to the Constitution, and if they do not, they will be treated as null and void. Doone v. Simina, 16 FSM R. 487, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2009).

A statutory construction that ends in an absurd result must be rejected. This is because a provision of law must be read so as to be internally consistent and sensible. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2009).

Congress has mandated that words and phrases in the FSM Code must be read with their context, and that statutory provisions must be construed according to the fair construction of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2009).

Statutes are to be construed as Congress intended, which is first and foremost determined by the statute's language. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 604 (Pon. 2009).

Because issues of statutory construction and constitutional construction are issues of law, courts have final authority over them, and the issues are ripe for summary judgment, which will be granted to the party that is entitled to it as a matter of law. In ruling on these issues of law, the language of the statutory and constitutional provisions is controlling and the court will construe and give effect to the provisions' plain meaning. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 60 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

The Board of Education Act should be read so that its provisions are internally consistent and sensible and each provision should be considered against the entire Act's background so as to arrive at a reasonable interpretation consistent with other specific provisions and the Act's general design. Since the Board's statutorily-mandated purpose is to provide control and direction and to formulate policy for the Chuuk educational system, if the Act were construed so as to render the Board unable to perform its duties each time members' terms expired without replacements having been confirmed, the Board's ability to discharge its duties would be severely handicapped and its purpose to act towards the betterment of education in Chuuk would be undermined and since the Act contemplates an independent board with the power to perform its functions without interruption, construing the provisions for filling vacancies and appointments, and taking into account the Board's statutory purpose and the Act's overall intent, holdover incumbents continue to hold their seat until there are new incumbents. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ. v. Sony, 17 FSM R. 56, 61 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), which prohibits firearms use in connection with or in aid of the commission of "any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," does not restrict liability for firearms use to only those crimes defined in the FSM Code because the term "any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," when read in context must refer to any or all criminal laws in the Federated States of Micronesia, national, state, or local, since, if it were otherwise, it would not be possible for the statute to have its obviously intended purpose and effect – to discourage the use of, and to punish the use of, firearms during the commission of other crimes. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

The Constitution unmistakably places upon the judicial branch the ultimate responsibility for interpretation of the Constitution and for determining the constitutionality of statutes. It is the special province and duty of the courts, and the courts alone, to say what the law is and to determine whether a statute is constitutional. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 187 (Pon. 2010).

The question of a statute's constitutionality is not a nonjusticiable political question textually reserved to Congress. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 187 (Pon. 2010).

While the court is mindful that a practice which has been engaged in by a branch of the government for a long period of time is entitled to great weight in establishing the constitutionality of that practice, the passage of time does not automatically make a practice (or a statute) constitutional. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

The Chuuk wrongful death statute phrases the class of persons entitled to recovery in the conjunctive ("and"), not the disjunctive ("or"). Generally the use of the conjunctive "and" instead of the disjunctive "or" would mean that all three named beneficiaries – surviving spouse, children, and next of kin – are within the class of persons for whose benefit a wrongful death action may be brought and construing "and" according to its common and approved English usage would mean that all three groups, spouse, children, and next of kin, compose a single class of beneficiaries in a wrongful death action. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

Words and phrases as used in the Trust Territory Code must be read with their context and must be construed according to the common and approved usage of the English language. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

There is no evidence that the Trust Territory Congress of Micronesia's legislative intent in the wrongful death statute was that "other next of kin" meant only those who would inherit under intestate succession acts, especially since, at the time the Trust Territory wrongful death statute was enacted, there were no intestate succession acts. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

Trust Territory Code provisions must be construed according to the fair construction of their terms, with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

When there is a conflict between a statute of general application and a statute specifically aimed, the more particularized provision will prevail. FSM Dev. Bank v. Jonah, 17 FSM R. 318, 324 (Kos. 2011).

Because "display" means a fixed display such as being posted on a bulkhead, not being produced and displayed on demand, the FSM has proven a violation of the requirement to prominently display a fishing permit in the vessel's wheelhouse when the displayed permit had expired and was thus invalid, and the captain, only when asked for a current permit, promptly displayed one. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 17 FSM R. 399, 405-06 (Chk. 2011).

Before starting an analysis of arguments concerning a statute's constitutionality, it is necessary to review any issues of statutory interpretation which may obviate the need for a constitutional ruling. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 446 (App. 2011).

Although parties may stipulate to factual matters, they may not stipulate to interpretations of law. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 446, 450-51 (App. 2011).

It is not competent for the parties or their attorneys to determine by stipulation questions as to the existence or proper construction or application of a statute. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 446 (App. 2011).

When comparing the terms from different parts of the code, the court must presume that by using different terms, in this case "legal residents" and "residents," the drafters could have only intended that the meaning would also be different. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2011).

Statutes must be interpreted to remain internally sensible and consistent. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2011).

A cardinal rule of statutory construction is that, where possible, courts avoid interpreting a law which may bring its constitutionality into doubt. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2011).

In interpreting a statute, the statutory provision's plain meaning must be given full effect whenever possible. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

If the legislature wanted the statute to provide a hiring and promotion preference to Pohnpeian or FSM citizens, then the legislature would have used "citizen" rather than "legal resident." By not defining the term "legal residents" the term's meaning must be the term's common, recognized definition. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

A court should not interpret a statute in a way that would cause a question as to the statute's constitutionality. Berman v. Lambert, 17 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2011).

If a statutory provision is unconstitutional and can be severed from the rest of the legislative act, only that provision will be struck down. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 551 (App. 2011).

A legal conclusion that a statute is unconstitutional implies that it may be judicially tailored to make the statute otherwise workable. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 551 (App. 2011).

Under 24 F.S.M.C. 121, all of the Marine Resources Act's components are severable. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 551 (App. 2011).

The question of whether a statute acts retrospectively or only prospectively is one of legislative intent. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 592 (Pon. 2011).

Courts observe a strict rule of construction against a statute's retrospective operation, and indulge in the presumption that a legislature intends the statutes it enacts, or amendments thereto, to operate prospectively only, and not retroactively. A contrary determination can be made only when the legislature's intention to make a statute retroactive is stated in express terms, or is clearly, explicitly, positively, unequivocally, unmistakably, and unambiguously shown. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 592 (Pon. 2011).

It generally violates the constitutional right to due process to apply a law retroactively that would divest someone of a vested right or property interest. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 592 (Pon. 2011).

When a public law's statutory language seems to speak only in prospective terms and certainly does not expressly state or clearly, explicitly, positively, unequivocally, unmistakably, and unambiguously show legislative intent to make the statute retroactive or for it to be applied retrospectively to previously-awarded public contracts, the movant is entitled to summary judgment and a declaration that the public law does not apply to the parties' earlier contract. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 592 (Pon. 2011).

The term "Trust Territory" in statutes carried over from the Trust Territory Code should generally be read as meaning "Federated States of Micronesia" when the power involved is a national power. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 619 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

When, by its own terms, the 51 F.S.M.C. 112(7) definition of a "nonresident worker" applies only to FSM Code Title 51, chapter 1, and not even to the rest of the FSM Code, it certainly does not apply to the Chuuk Health Care Act, which contains its own definition for the term "resident." Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 619-20 (Chk. 2011).

A central principle of statutory interpretation is that, when a statute lends itself to two or more readings, a court shall choose the interpretation that is clearly constitutional. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 31 (Pon. 2011).

Generally, when the word "district" appears in an FSM Code provision carried over from the Trust Territory Code by virtue of the Constitution's Transition Clause, "state" will be read in its place. Likewise, "Trust Territory" should be read as "Federated States of Micronesia." Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 66 n.5 (Chk. 2011).

Because the FSM civil rights statute is based on the United States model, the FSM Supreme Court should consider United States court decisions under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and § 1988 for guidance in determining 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3)'s intended meaning and governmental liability thereunder. Kaminanga v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 216, 219 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

Under a plain reading of the statute, the FSM Development Bank is not required to obtain permission on a case-by-case basis before starting collection actions for Federated Development Authority loans, and the court will not broaden the statute beyond the meaning of the law as written. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 378, 380 (Kos. 2012).

Statutes are not to be construed by singling out a particular phrase, because the court must construe the words and terms at issue in the context of the other language used in the statute. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 378, 380 (Kos. 2012).

A common maxim of statutory construction is that the expression of one thing means the exclusion of others. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 378, 380 (Kos. 2012).

When both general and specific statutes address a matter, the specific controls the subject. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 378, 380 (Kos. 2012).

A plain reading of the statutes, in context, includes a case-by-case requirement for refinancing FDA loans and by its specific inclusion excludes that requirement from collection efforts. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 378, 380 (Kos. 2012).

When the FSM civil rights statute is not as expansive as 42 U.S.C. § 1988 because it allows an attorney's fee award only in an action brought under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) and when an "action" is a court case while a "proceeding" includes both administrative and judicial proceedings, 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) does not authorize the award of attorney's fees for administrative proceedings, even for administrative proceedings that were a prerequisite to a later court action (the exhaustion of administrative remedies requirement). It authorizes an attorney's fee award only for actions (court cases) brought under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 402, 405 (Pon. 2012).

Statutes are presumed constitutional. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 458 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Since, under the Transition Clause, a statute in force in the State of Chuuk on the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution continues in effect to the extent it is consistent with the Chuuk Constitution or until it is amended or repealed, both 67 TTC 453 and 454 remain as Chuuk state law until amended or repealed since both are consistent with the Chuuk Constitution which requires "just compensation," and since they have not been repealed by implication because they occupy gaps in the recently enacted Chuuk eminent domain statute. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

A statute that provides only that the Plan's Board "may prescribe" or "may establish" differing premium amounts based on the number of the enrollee's dependants, or on their risk factors, does not appear to require that differing premium amounts be set. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 506 (Chk. 2013).

When an FSM secured transactions statute mirrors and appears to have been drawn from a U.S. statute, U.S. caselaw construing the U.S. statute may be consulted for guidance in construing the FSM statute. FSM Dev. Bank v. Tropical Waters Kosrae, Inc., 18 FSM R. 590, 596 & n.6 (Kos. 2013).

The FSM Development Bank is not defunct because if the public law that restructured it were unconstitutional, then the previous FSM Development Bank statute would apply. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 618 (Pon. 2013).

Congressionally-enacted statutes are presumed to be constitutional. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 18 FSM R. 608, 619 (Pon. 2013).

Wording in the FSM Code or in statutes enacted by Congress must be construed according to the English language's common and approved usage. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

When the people's intent as voiced through its duly elected Congress is expressed in a statute, a court must give effect to the statutory provision's plain meaning whenever possible. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

It is a canon of construction that statutes that are in pari materia may be construed together, so that inconsistencies in one statute may be resolved by looking at another statute on the same subject. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 72, 77 (Pon. 2013).

The court will not recharacterize damages as a part of the uninjured spouse's loss-of-consortium claim and alter the nature of the damages claim solely to circumvent the FSM's statutory limited waiver of its sovereign immunity that prevents the injured spouse from being awarded the full amount of the damages she suffered. The court will comply with Congress's policy choice and its intent in enacting the limited waiver. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 85 (Pon. 2013).

Congress enacted an exemption statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 1415, and courts cannot broaden statutes beyond their original meaning. Nor do courts have the power to amend a statute. Dison v. Bank of Hawaii, 19 FSM R. 157, 161 (App. 2013).

Generally, a statutory provision is directory and not mandatory if it requires that certain actions be completed, but does not prescribe the result which should follow if those actions are not completed. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 188 (Chk. 2013).

When the statute is silent about what result should follow if the Health Care Board does not submit draft legislation for the selection of its members by citizen enrolles and when that statute only directs the submission of draft legislation but does not require (nor could it) its enactment, the Board's failure to comply does not render the Board's composition illegal or its acts ultra vires. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 188 (Chk. 2013).

When the statute provides only that the Chuuk Health Care Plan's Board "may prescribe" or "may establish" differing premium amounts based on the number of the enrollee's dependants or on their "risk" factors, the statute does not require it, but leaves it to the Board's discretion, the Board may choose to assess premiums in a different manner. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 189 (Chk. 2013).

When the word "district" appears in an FSM Code provision carried over from the Trust Territory Code by virtue of the Constitution's Transition Clause, "state" will be read in its place. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 222, 224 (Chk. 2013).

The statute's use of the indefinite article "a" before the word "court" instead of the definite article "the" indicates that in this particular instance no specific court is referred to and thus other tribunals are included in § 11.612(6)'s reference to "a court." Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 301-02 (App. 2014).

The phrase "whether or not acting under color of law" in the civil rights criminal statute plainly means that Congress, by enacting the statute, made it a crime for a private person to willfully deprive another of, or injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate the other in the free exercise of his or her rights under the FSM Constitution or laws. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 445 (Chk. 2014).

By its nature, a statute is a declaration of public policy. Congress determines and declares public policy by enacting statues. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App. 2014).

A statute declares public policy. If that statute is constitutional it can never be declared to be against public policy. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App. 2014).

When the legislature, by enacting a statute, declares the public policy, the judicial branch must defer to that pronouncement. Thus, when the legislature has declared, by law, the public policy, the judicial department must remain silent, and if a modification or change in such policy is desired the law-making department must be applied to, not the judiciary whose function is to declare the law but not to make it. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App. 2014).

When Congress enacted unambiguous statutes it chose what the public policy is – that the FSM national government be paid in full for its expenses in clearing the ships and planes after hours and that those ships and planes pay for actual overtime work. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App.

If the appellants believe that their arguments reflect a public policy better than the one Congress adopted by statute, they can apply to Congress for a modification or change in the statutes. Esiel v. FSM Dep't of Fin., 19 FSM R. 590, 594 (App. 2014).

When there is a conflict between a statute of general application to numerous agencies or situations, such as an Administrative Procedures Act, and a statute specifically aimed at a particular agency or procedure the more particularized provision will prevail. This rule is based upon recognition that the legislative body, in enacting the law of specific application, is better focused and speaks more directly to the affected agency and procedure. Macayon v. Chuuk State Bd. of Educ., 19 FSM R. 644, 648 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2015).

Generally, a statutory provision is directory and not mandatory if it requires that certain actions be completed, but does not prescribe the result which should follow if those actions are not completed. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 25 (App. 2015).

The legislature's intention as to whether a statutory provision is mandatory is determined from the language used. Generally, a provision is directory and not mandatory if it requires that certain actions be completed, but does not prescribe the result that should follow if those actions are not completed. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 25 n.6 (App. 2015).

Whether cumulative statutory penalties are permissible is properly determined by seeking out the legislative intent as expressed in the statute's language. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

A statute imposing a penalty is to be strictly construed against the government and in favor of one against whom penalties are sought to be imposed. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

When a penalty provision's statutory language is ambiguous, this ambiguity should be resolved against punishing the same action under two different statutes. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

Read in proper context, 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1)(b) and (c) are aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and uphold a public interest of the same nature. Thus, a vessel's failure to maintain its transponder in good working order, and its consequent failure to ensure transmission of required information from the transponder, is a solitary act that caused only one injury and therefore 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) should not be construed to authorize cumulative penalties. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 32 (Yap 2015).

Since Subsection (1) allows NORMA to require that operators perform an integrated act which, when completed in its entirety, ensures transmission of required information from a vessel's transponder and this is reflected in the use of the word "and" between 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1)(b) and (c); since the failure to perform any one part of the integrated act required under subsection 611(1) is sufficient to frustrate entirely the purpose of the subsection; and since a failure to perform multiple component parts of the act required under the subsection is no more frustrating to the statute's purpose than failure to perform only one part, the court will, in the absence of clear legislative intent to impose cumulative penalties, construe 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) to impose only a single penalty for the failure to comply with the integrated requirements imposed on them under 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1). FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 33 (Yap 2015).

To prove a violation of section 611(1), the government has to show that a defendant: 1) entered into an access agreement or secured a fishing permit; 2) that the access agreement or permit required the defendant to conform to the requirements that NORMA is authorized to impose under section 611(1), and 3) that the defendant failed to comply with these requirements. It follows that a defendant's failure to comply with section 611(1), will, ipso facto, constitute a violation of a permit or access agreement as proscribed by section 906(1)(a),(c). FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 34 (Yap 2015).

In the absence of clear legislative intent to impose cumulative penalties against a single violative act, the court will construe 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5), 906(1) and 920 to impose only one penalty for failure to comply with the integrated requirements imposed as a condition of a permit or access agreement pursuant to 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1). But since 24 F.S.M.C. 901(2) evinces clear legislative intent for the imposition of cumulative penalties by making each day of a continuing violation a separate offense for violations of subtitle I and since the entire Marine Resources Act of 2002 constitutes FSM Code Title 24, Subtitle I, it is proper to impose a separate penalty for each of the four days between April 27, 2013 and April 30, 2013, inclusive, during which the vessel violated a provision of that Act. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 34-35 (Yap 2015).

That the criminal offense of contempt of court statute is in Title 4, instead of Title 11, is meaningless and no inference that it is not a crime can be drawn from it. This is because the classification of the titles, chapters, subchapters, and sections of the FSM Code, and the headings thereto, are made for the purpose of convenient reference and orderly arrangement, and no implication, inference, or presumption of a legislative construction can be drawn therefrom. FSM v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 106, 110 (Pon. 2015).

The addition of the language "in the same manner as the levy of an execution" in 54 F.S.M.C. 153 shows that a different meaning was intended than if the statute had read "by writ of execution." Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125 (Pon. 2015).

Statutes are to be interpreted as the legislature intended and a statute's words are the best indication of what the legislature intended. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125 (Pon. 2015).

It is presumed that words included in a statute are not meaningless surplusage because it is an elementary rule of construction that effect must be given, if possible, to every word, clause and sentence of a statute. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125 (Pon. 2015).

Since the nation's statutes are presumed to be constitutional, a bank is not required to challenge, on a depositor's behalf, the tax lien statute's constitutionality. The bank may rely on the statute. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

Since, in interpreting Kosrae State Code sections, the singular can mean the plural, therefore "permit" can mean permits if the law otherwise requires more than one permit. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165 (App. 2015).

The court should construe a statute as the legislature intended. Lee v. Kosrae, 20 FSM R. 160, 165 (App. 2015).

Since 4 F.S.M.C. 124(1) is based on the United States model and its statutory language is verbatim thereto, the court should consider United States legal authority under 28 U.S.C. § 455 for guidance in determining 4 F.S.M.C. 124's meaning concerning recusal as a result of a financial relationship with a lending institution. Christopher Corp. v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 42, 46 (App. 2016).

Generally, when the word "district" appears in an FSM Code provision carried over from the Trust Territory Code by virtue of the Constitution's Transition Clause, the word "state" will be read in its place. Pt. Alorinda Shipping v. Alorinda 251, 21 FSM R. 129, 131 (Pon. 2017).

Since the human trafficking statute does not define recruiting, transporting, harboring, transferring, or receiving, these words' plain meaning will be used to determine whether the actions alleged in each count of the criminal information are included within the statute. FSM v. Shiro, 21 FSM R. 195, 203 (Chk. 2017).

Generally statements made by others [that is, by persons other than congressmen or the bill's draftsman] at the committee hearings concerning the nature and effect of a bill are not accorded much or any weight. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 296 (Chk. 2017).

When a statute sets forth a list in the disjunctive (using the word "or"), the existence of any one of the listed conditions makes the statute applicable. FSM v. Siega, 21 FSM R. 291, 298 (Chk. 2017).

In the interpretation of statutes, the legislative will is the all-important or controlling factor. The primary rule of construction of statutes is to ascertain and declare the legislature's intention, and to carry such intention into effect to the fullest degree. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 305 (Chk. 2017).

A statutory provision's plain meaning must be given effect whenever possible. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 305 (Chk. 2017).

A court should construe a statute as the legislature intended as determined by the statute's wording. What a legislature says in the statute's text is considered the best evidence of the legislative intent or will. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 305 (Chk. 2017).

A long-standing norm of statutory construction holds that provisions of law must be read so as to be internally consistent and sensible. Interpretations which strip clauses of substance and effect go against the norms of interpretation and are greatly disfavored. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 305 (Chk. 2017).

Unreasonableness of the result produced by one among alternative possible interpretations of a statute is reason for rejecting that interpretation in favor of another which would produce a reasonable result. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 305 (Chk. 2017).

Chuuk State Law No. 2-94-06 contemplates a comprehensive health insurance system whereby premium payments were required on behalf of eligible enrollees employed by the national government. The statute's language contemplates a system of "universal" coverage automatically extending to all eligible enrollees, which includes all employed Chuuk residents regardless of their employer. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. FSM Dev. Bank, 21 FSM R. 300, 306 (Chk. 2017).

When the issue of a bank releasing funds under 54 F.S.M.C. 153 is a matter of first impression, the court may look to case law of other jurisdictions, particularly the United States, for comparison and guidance. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 361 (App. 2017).

Statutes are to be interpreted as the legislature intended and a statute's words are the best indication of that intent. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 361-62 (App. 2017).

A court should construe a statute as the legislature intended. Legislative intent is determined by the statute's wording because what a legislature says in the statute's text is considered the best evidence of the legislative intent or will. Thus, a court must give effect to the plain meaning of a statutory provision whenever possible. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398 (Kos. 2017).

A long-standing norm of statutory construction holds that provisions of law must be read to be internally consistent and sensible. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398 (Kos. 2017).

The FSM Social Security Act is patterned after United States statutes, and it is well settled rule of statutory construction that a statute adopted from another jurisdiction is presumed to have been adopted as construed by that jurisdiction's courts. Eliam v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 21 FSM R. 412, 417 (App. 2018).

A statutory provision's plain meaning must be given effect whenever possible. Because issues of statutory construction are issues of law, courts have final authority over them and the court will construe and give effect to the provisions' plain meaning. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 569 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A court should construe a statute as the legislature intended. Legislative intent is determined by the statute's wording – what a legislature says in a statute's text is considered the best evidence of the legislative intent or will. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 569 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A court must give effect to a statutory provision's plain meaning whenever possible. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 569 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When the statute never defines imprisonment, the plain meaning of the term governs, which could leave the possibility of defining imprisonment to include house arrest, but the statute's context narrows the definition of imprisonment to refer only to confinement in jail. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 570 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

Only those sections that contain a provision which mandates that defendant shall serve a mandatory x year jail sentence supersede § 1110 and thereby actually remove the court's equitable power to suspend such jail sentence. Chuuk v. Jose, 21 FSM R. 566, 572 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

It is a well-established canon of statutory construction that statutes are presumed to be constitutional. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

When a statute's language is plain and unambiguous, it declares its own meaning and there is no room for construction. However, a statute that either forbids or requires the doing of an act in terms so vague that men of common intelligence must necessarily guess at its meaning and differ as to its application violates the first essential of due process of law. A statute that is so vague and ill-defined that the acts prohibited cannot be understood by people of ordinary intelligence, cannot serve as a basis for criminal prosecution. Chuuk v. Silluk, 21 FSM R. 649, 652 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2018).

A court cannot strike down or enjoin statutes merely because they might be unwise and some other course of action is better. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 267 (Chk. 2019).

When a Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule conflicts with a Chuuk statute, the statute's language prevails because the Chuuk Constitution vests the Chief Justice with the authority to promulgate Criminal Procedure Rules, which the legislature may amend by statute, but the Chief Justice has no authority to amend a statute enacted by the legislature. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Chuuk v. Phillip, 22 FSM R. 425, 428 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

When a Chuuk Criminal Procedure Rule conflicts with a Chuuk statute, the statute's language prevails because the Chuuk Constitution vests the Chief Justice with the authority to promulgate Procedure Rules, which the legislature may amend by statute, but the Chief Justice has no authority to amend a statute enacted by the legislature. Therefore, if the statute applies and the statute and the rule conflict, the statute must prevail. Chuuk v. Fred, 22 FSM R. 429, 432 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

The only relevant question when evaluating a strict liability statute is whether there was compliance. A finding of discreet or overt acts in violation of the Marine Resources Act need not be established in order to find continuing violations under 24 F.M.S.C. 901(2). Thus, when the lack of compliance continued for four days, the court will impose penalties for each day of noncompliance. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 526-27 (App. 2020).

FSM law does not recognize retroactive application of statutes without specific legislative instructions. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 528 (App. 2020).

Courts observe a strict rule of construction against a statute's retrospective operation, and indulge in the presumption that a legislature intends the statutes it enacts, or amendments thereto, to operate prospectively only, and not retroactively. A contrary determination can be made only when the legislature's intention to make a statute retroactive is stated in express terms, or is clearly, explicitly, positively, unequivocally, unmistakably, and unambiguously shown. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 528 (App. 2020).

When the later enacted public law is silent about whether sections 611(4) and 611(5) were retroactively repealed, the law in effect at the time of the violations will control the imposition of the penalty. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 22 FSM R. 515, 528 (App. 2020).

That one section follows another in the FSM Criminal Code is not particularly relevant because the classification of the titles, chapters, subchapters, and sections in the code, and the headings thereto, are made for the purpose of convenient reference and orderly arrangement, and no implication, inference, or presumption of a legislative construction can be drawn therefrom. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 535-36 & n.5 (Yap 2020).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(2) statutory presumption about who possesses a firearm or ammunition found in a vehicle or a vessel applies generally to any charge based on the possession of firearms or ammunition found in a vehicle or vessel, and would apply to a prosecution under 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1). FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 (Yap 2020).

The statute that authorizes the President to delegate his authority to issue entry permits and to permit entry into the FSM of persons, vessels, and aircraft under the provisions of this chapter and regulations promulgated thereto also authorizes the President to delegate his authority to deny issuance of an entry permit and his authority to deny entry of persons, vessels, and aircraft into the FSM because if an official has the delegated authority to issue an entry permit, then that official must also have the authority not to issue the entry permit – that is, to deny an entry permit application or renewal. Macayon v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 544, 553 (Chk. 2020).

– Construction – Adoption by Reference

Under general rules of statutory construction, when a statute adopts a provision by reference, it adopts that provision as it was at the time of adoption and any later changes to the referred provision will have no effect on the statute unless the statute specifically so provides or strongly implies. A statutory provision adopted by reference thus cannot be altered except by further action of the adopting legislature. That is because once the legislature has adopted a provision by reference, it makes that referenced provision its own law just as if it had entirely enacted the provision itself. No other rule would furnish any certainty as to what is the law. Anton v. Cornelius, 12 FSM R. 280, 285 n.1 (App. 2003).

Under the principles of statutory construction, when a statute adopts a provision by reference, it adopts that provision as it was at the time of adoption and any later changes to the referred provision will have no effect on the statute unless the statute specifically so provides or strongly implies. Otherwise, a statutory provision adopted by reference cannot be altered except by further action of the adopting legislature. That is because once the legislature has adopted a provision by reference, it makes that referenced provision its own law just as if it had entirely enacted the provision itself and because no other rule would furnish any certainty as to what is the law. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 623, 629 & n.4 (Yap 2013).

When the FSM statute specifically defines the "Limitation of Liability Convention" as "the Convention on Limitation of Liability for Maritime Claims done at London on November 19, 1976 as modified by its protocols and as amended from time to time, " 19 F.S.M.C. 106(11), the statute specifically provides that later changes to the Liability Convention will be part of FSM law without further action by Congress. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 18 FSM R. 623, 629 (Yap 2013).

– Construction – "May" and "Shall"

The use of the word shall in a statute is the language of command and considered mandatory. Ting

Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Supreme Court, 8 FSM R. 1, 5 (App. 1997).

While it is true in construction of statutes and rules that the word "may" as opposed to "shall" is indicative of discretion or a choice between two or more alternatives, the context in which the word appears must be the controlling factor. Kama v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 593, 599 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

While it is true in construction of statutes that the word "may" as opposed to "shall" is indicative of discretion or a choice between two or more alternatives, the context in which the word appears must be the controlling factor. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20-21 (App. 2006).

In construction of statutes the word "may" as opposed to "shall" is indicative of discretion or a choice between two or more alternatives, but the context in which the word appears must be the controlling factor. The fact that the word "may" was used is not conclusive, since it is well settled that permissive words may be interpreted as mandatory where such construction is necessary to effectuate the legislative intent. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 190 (Pon. 2006).

Treble damages were proper when the discretion denoted by the word "may" in the statute lies with the injured party and not the court – the injured party "may" sue and recover treble damages – and when Congress's intent was to give the injured party treble damages if it sues and proves its case. The statute's context compels this conclusion. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 190-91 (Pon. 2006).

When, from the consideration of the whole statute, and its nature and object, it appears that the legislature's intent was to impose a positive duty rather than a discretionary power, the word "may" will be held to be mandatory. A mandatory construction will usually be given to the word "may" when public interests are concerned, and the public or third persons have a claim de jure that the power conferred should be exercised, or whenever something is directed to be done for the sake of justice or for the public good; but never for the purpose of creating a right. In a proper case the word "may" will be construed as "must" or "shall." AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

In construing statutes, the word "may" as opposed to "shall" is indicative of discretion or a choice between two or more alternatives, but the context in which the word appears must be the controlling factor. When, from the consideration of the whole statute, and its nature and object, it appears that the legislature's intent was to impose a positive duty rather than a discretionary power, the word "may" will be held to be mandatory. A mandatory construction will usually be given to the word "may" when public interests are concerned, and the public or third persons have a claim de jure that the power conferred should be exercised, or whenever something is directed to be done for the sake of justice or for the public good; but never for the purpose of creating a right. Accordingly, in a proper case the word "may" will be construed as "must" or "shall." Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 621, 628 (App. 2011).

Despite the usage of the word "shall," FSM case law dictates that if the statute does not advise what will happen if the action is not carried out, then the statutory provision is directory rather than mandatory. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 25 (App. 2015).

When discretionary language "may" is used, which indicates that the insurance board has the power to consider these factors when assessing the insurance premiums and may exercise the power of applying these factors in the future, the discretion to do so is left with the board, and not with the court. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 26 (App. 2015).

– Presumptions

Since by statute, the classification of the titles, chapters, subchapters, and sections of the FSM Code, and the headings thereto, are made for the purpose of convenient reference and orderly arrangement, and since Congress has specifically prohibited that any implication, inference, or presumption of a legislative construction be drawn therefrom, the court can give no weight or credence to and must reject any argument, implication, inference, or presumption to be draw from a subchapter's heading or from a subsection's arrangement in that subchapter. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2006).

A "mini bag," which is an easily-transportable article similar in that nature to a purse, handbag, brief case, attache case, or backpack, is not an "enclosed customary depository" within the meaning of the statutory exception to the statutory presumption that a firearm, dangerous device, or ammunition found in a vehicle or vessel, is prima facie evidence that such firearm, dangerous device, or ammunition is in the possession of all persons in the vehicle or vessel. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2009).

Statutory presumptions come in three types: permissive inference, mandatory rebuttable presumption, and conclusive mandatory presumption. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2009).

Under the permissive inference type of criminal statutory presumptions, the prosecution is not relieved of the burden of persuasion since the presumption is effective only so long as there is no substantial evidence contradicting the conclusion flowing from the presumption, and the factfinder is left free to accept or reject the inference. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2009).

A presumption in a criminal statute creates a permissive inference. Because this permissive presumption leaves the trier of fact free to credit or reject the inference and does not shift the burden of proof, it affects the application of the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard only if, under the facts of the case, there is no rational way the trier could make the connection permitted by the inference. This is the manner in which the FSM Supreme Court should and will handle a criminal presumption that is "prima facie evidence." FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533-34 (Chk. 2009).

The 6 F.S.M.C. 801 provision that: "[a] judgment of any court shall be presumed to be paid and satisfied at the expiration of twenty years after it is rendered" reflects the common-law rebuttable presumption of payment after a lapse of twenty years. It can therefore be implied that the 20-year statute of limitations for enforcing a judgment is a rule that creates a rebuttable presumption of payment. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 336 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The doctrine of prescription or presumption of payment of a judgment does not apply when 20 years has not yet elapsed. Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 336 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Statutory presumptions come in three types: permissive inference, mandatory rebuttable presumption, and conclusive mandatory presumption. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

Under a mandatory rebuttable presumption, once the predicate facts have been proven, the burden of persuasion shifts to the defense to rebut the presumption, although the burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt remains with the prosecution, or in a civil case, liability by the preponderance of the evidence. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

Under the permissive inference type of statutory presumptions, the state is not relieved of the burden of persuasion since the presumption is effective only so long as there is no substantial evidence contradicting the conclusion flowing from the presumption, and the fact-finder is left free to accept or reject the inference. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

Unless a cigarette importer produces evidence to overcome the Chuuk tax act's presumption that the cigarettes were sold after importation, the statutory presumption that he sold the cigarettes he brought into Chuuk would stand and he therefore would be liable to the state for the sales tax he should have collected from the buyers when the cigarettes were sold. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

The statutory presumption that judgments over twenty years old have been satisfied is a rebuttable presumption. Kama v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 522, 534 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2016).

A statutory rebuttable presumption that an FSM passport-holder that has had his or her passport renewed twice in a row, has renounced the citizenship of another nation and that he or she is solely an FSM citizen, has been overcome when a person has conceded that he has not formally renounced any claim he may have to U.S. citizenship and does not wish to do so now. Hartmann v. Department of Justice, 20 FSM R. 619, 623 (Chk. 2016).

The argument that the presumptions "cancel each other out" is not viable. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 393 (Kos. 2019).

When a plaintiff successfully creates a presumption, he not only satisfies his burden of going forward but also shifts that burden to the defendant. The defendant then must rebut the presumption to satisfy his burden of going forward. The burden of persuasion normally remains on the plaintiff for his claim throughout the trial. Robert v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 22 FSM R. 388, 393 (Kos. 2019).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(2) statutory presumption about who possesses a firearm or ammunition found in a vehicle or a vessel applies generally to any charge based on the possession of firearms or ammunition found in a vehicle or vessel, and would apply to a prosecution under 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1). FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 (Yap 2020).

– Repeal

Amendment or repeal of a Trust Territory statute by Congress need not be explicit to be effective. If a Trust Territory statutory provision is inconsistent or in conflict with a statutory provision enacted by Congress, that provision is repealed by implication. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 15-16 (Pon. 1981).

Under article XV, section 1 of the Constitution, a Trust Territory Code provision is repealed by a subsequent statutory provision enacted by the Congress only if the statutory provisions in question are inconsistent or in conflict. Even if certain provisions are repealed, other provisions of that same statute may remain intact if the statute, without the deleted provision, is self-sustaining and capable of separate enforcement. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 29 (Pon. 1981).

The fact that Congress repealed many provisions of Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code by implication does not lead to the conclusion that all provisions of Title 11 are repealed. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 29 (Pon. 1981).

Since the national government does not have major crimes jurisdiction over Title 11 Trust Territory Code assaults calling for imprisonment of no more than six months, the repealer clause of the National Criminal Code would not appear to repeal those sections. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 30 (Pon. 1981).

The repealer clause of the National Criminal Code repealed those provisions of Title 11 of the Trust Territory code above the monetary minimum of $1,000 set for major crimes. Where the value is below $1,000, section 2 does not apply because it is not within the national court jurisdiction. FSM v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 43, 46 (Truk 1981).

At common law, repeal of a criminal statute abated all criminal prosecutions which had not reached final disposition in the highest court authorized to review them. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 189-90 n.4 (App. 1982).

A statute is repealed by implication by a constitutional provision when the legislature, under the new constitutional provision, no longer has the present right to enact statutes substantially similar to the statute in question. FSM v. Jano, 6 FSM R. 9, 11 (Pon. 1993).

The test to determine whether the 1991 constitutional amendment repealed a statute by implication is: Does Congress, under the current constitutional provision, have the present right to enact a statute substantially like the statute in question? FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

Because the repeal of a statutory prohibition against usury releases any penalties imposed and permits enforcement of the debtor's obligation in accordance with the parties' agreement, it follows that as to a usury defense, the parties' agreement is governed by the law existing when the agreement is enforced. Bank of the FSM v. Mori, 11 FSM R. 13, 15 (Chk. 2002).

When the constitutional amendment to article IX, § 2(p) was ratified, it eliminated Congress's power to define major crimes and repealed by implication Title 11's major crimes provisions. FSM v. Anson, 11 FSM R. 69, 74 (Pon. 2002).

Chuuk municipalities once had the delegated right to regulate alcoholic beverage sales, but in 2001 the state legislature made major revisions to the law pertaining to intoxicating liquors and placed exclusive jurisdiction over the regulation of alcoholic beverages in the state. The Chuuk Legislature's enactment removed any prior municipal authority to regulate the possession and sale of alcoholic beverages – a municipality may not by imposition of licensing fees or taxes regulate the possession or sale of such substances. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the state statute authorizing municipal tax powers reserved the state's right to enact legislation to assess, levy and collect taxes on any subject for which a tax has been assessed and levied by municipal ordinance and provided that in the event that the state enacted legislation on that same subject, the enactment would repeal the ordinance on the same subject, and when the state has in fact enacted legislation imposing fees on businesses engaged in alcoholic beverage sales, any municipal ordinance imposing business license fees on businesses engaged in alcoholic beverage sales is repealed and a municipality does not have the authority to impose business license fees or taxes on alcoholic beverage sellers. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 358-59 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The final test in determining whether a statute is repealed by implication by a new constitutional provision is: Has the legislature, under the new constitutional provision, the present right to enact statutes substantially like the statutes in question? Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 574 (App. 2004).

When the Trust Territory Code Title 67, chapter three, which includes 67 TTC 115, was repealed and replaced by a similar Chuuk state law in 2004, and since the Land Commission acts complained of took place in 1998, and the trial division case was filed in 2000, the Trust Territory Code, Title 67, chapter 3 is the applicable law, but the 2004 Chuuk state statute enacted will apply to the further proceedings on remand. Aritos v. Muller, 19 FSM R. 533, 537 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2014).

A state legislature that has created a commission by statute can abolish that commission by statute, just as it could, by statute, abolish most any governmental agency that it has created by statute, except those agencies which the state's constitution requires it to create. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 & n.8 (Chk. 2019).

The power to legislate is the power to repeal. A legislature may not bind itself or a future legislature by enacting an irrepealable law. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 266 (Chk. 2019).

If a legislature has the power to abolish an agency, it certainly has the power to exercise a less drastic regulation of the agency's affairs by suspending it. In re Constitutionality of Chuuk State Law No. 14-18-23, 22 FSM R. 258, 267 (Chk. 2019).

If the viability of a statutory provision is questioned because it was meant to be codified but was omitted from the statute books when the FSM laws were codified in 2014 and might thus have been repealed by implication, the court can still rely on the part of the public law that was not meant to be codified and which will thus remain a viable statute until expressly repealed. Basu v. Amor, 22 FSM R. 557, 565 n.9 (Pon. 2020).

STATUTES OF LIMITATION

It is inappropriate to deny a defendant the right to assert a statute of limitations defense by way of punishment for tardiness in filing its answer. Lonno v. Trust Territory (III), 1 FSM R. 279, 280 (Kos. 1983).

When there are significant issues of fact which may affect the defendant's statute of limitations defense in a civil action, a motion to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds must be denied. Lonno v. Trust Territory (III), 1 FSM R. 279, 281-82 (Kos. 1983).

There is no provision in the Public Service Act nor in the Public Service System Regulation that establishes a time limit for seeking judicial review of agency action. For this reason, the court adopts the six-year statute of limitations established in 6 TTC 305 and holds that the petition for judicial review was filed in a timely manner. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 28, 33 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The general rule is that statutes of limitations do not run against the sovereign. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yap Shipping Coop., 3 FSM R. 84, 86 (Yap 1987).

Laches is a tool courts use to limit a party's rights when they have not been timely asserted, such that it is unfair for the court to now redress them. The period of time may be less than the statutory limitations period and each case must be judged on a case by case basis for fundamental fairness. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 155 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The twenty year statute of limitation to contest land title did not take effect until 1951 so that it could not be asserted as a defense until 1971. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 194 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

In order for an action over an interest in land to be barred by the statute of limitations, the cause of action must arise more than twenty years before the action is brought. If the claim could have been made over twenty years before it was actually made, then the action can no longer be maintained, no matter how meritorious. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 194 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

When 38 years have elapsed since the determination of ownership of a tract of land in the Wito Clan, when there have been public notices posted concerning the determination and concerning its later lease to the Trust Territory; two separate High Court decisions and three determinations of ownership concerning the land, and when construction activity on he land began 36 years ago; this constitutes both constructive and actual notice of the Wito Clan's claim to the land to another clan whose numerous members lived on the same small island. Chipuelong v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 188, 195 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

Under section 24(1) of the Pohnpei Government Liability Act of 1991, the statute of limitations on a cause of action brought pursuant to the Act is not suspended during the period of administrative review required by the statute. Abraham v. Lusangulira, 6 FSM R. 423, 425 (Pon. 1994).

Where government title to the tidelands reverted to the traditional owners in 1989, and because the right to bring an action for trespass or ejection must be available to the owner before the time period for adverse possession has run, whether the doctrine of adverse possession exists in Chuukese land law need not be decided because the twenty-year statute of limitations did not start to run until 1989. Cheni v. Ngusun, 6 FSM R. 544, 548 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1994).

Laches and the statute of limitations are two different defenses. The statue of limitations defense has only one element – the passage of a specific statutory amount of time while the equitable defense of laches has two elements – the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Laches is always applied separate from and irrespective of the statute of limitations. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 489 (App. 1996).

Any attempt to breathe new life into tort claims time barred by the relevant and analogous statutes should be approached with caution because they are the type of personal claims for money damages that become increasingly difficult of proof and difficult to defend with the passage of time. Ordinarily such claims are resolved by political and diplomatic efforts. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 498 (App. 1996).

The statute of limitations has run on claims of mismanagement of the Micronesian Claims Act unless there was continuing unlawful conduct that would create a basis for equitable tolling of the statute of limitations. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 499 (App. 1996).

An action for damages for loss of land is subject to a six-year statute of limitations unlike the twenty-year statute of limitations for recovery of an interest in land. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 590 (App. 1996).

As a general rule, the statute of limitations may be invoked by a successor in right. Thus a later transfer of land cannot resurrect a time-barred claim. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 590 (App. 1996).

In the Chuuk State Supreme Court, a hearing for judgment after a default is entered that is held to allow the plaintiff to present to the court further evidence to establish the plaintiff's right to a claim or relief, includes the court's determination of whether the action was brought within the limitation period provided by law. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 558, 560 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

For trespass the period of limitation begins to run when the project causing the damage is completed, if substantial damage has already occurred, or when the first substantial injury is sustained. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 559 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The cause of action arises, and the general statute of limitations begins to run on tort actions for injury to property at the time the injury is sustained. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 559 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the plaintiff claims the state trespassed on her property by installing poles, a road and pipes sometime before the end of 1987 but did not file suit until 1994, recovery will be barred by the six year statute of limitations. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 559-60 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A party's claim to land after a municipality has continued its open, notorious, exclusive and hostile occupation of the land for a period of 27 years before he files suit is barred by the twenty-year statute of limitations, and the municipality is the true and lawful owner of title to the land in dispute on the theory of adverse possession. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

A suit filed on March 18, 1997 for a cause of action with a six-year statute of limitation that accrued on March 18, 1991 was filed on the very last day for doing so because in computing any time period the day of the act, event, or default from which the designated time period begins to run is not included. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 78 (Kos. 1999).

All actions in Kosrae State Court must be commenced within the time period stated in Kosrae State Code, title 6, chapter 25. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 343 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Because a trespass claim has either a twenty-year or a six-year statute of limitations, the statute of limitations on a trespass starting November, 1999 will not run for many years. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 188 (Pon. 2001).

After a Trust Territory employee's cause of action accrued in 1980 when he completed the informal grievance procedure with his supervisor, he had two options: follow the formal grievance procedure for review by the Personnel Board; or file suit in court for judicial review of his grievance. Since his right to sue was complete then, a suit, filed in 2000, will be barred by the six-year statute of limitations and dismissed. Skilling v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 448, 452-53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When there is a two year statute of limitations for actions for injury to or for the death of one caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, when the plaintiff, who was an adult at the time she was injured, filed her complaint over seven years after the injury, and when the testimony yields no information why the statute of limitations had not run two years after the date of the accident, a motion to dismiss based on the statute of limitations will be granted. Adolip v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 587, 589 (Pon. 2002).

In Kosrae, actions on a judgment and actions for the recovery of land or an interest in land have a twenty year statute of limitations. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

An action on a judgment filed more than twenty years after the judgment was announced, but less than twenty years after the written judgment was served on the parties is timely filed and not barred by the statute of limitations. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The accrual of a cause of action for recovery of land begins when a suit may successfully be maintained upon. Where a cause of action for recovery of land accrued when the Determinations of Ownership were served and when the complaint was filed within twenty years of service, the cause of action for the recovery of land falls within the twenty year limitations period and is not barred by the statute of limitations. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which must be raised in the defendant's answer, and when it has not been, the defendant has waived its statute of limitations defense. Tolenoa v. Kosrae, 11 FSM R. 179, 185 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When the applicable statute of limitations is six years and the construction agreement between the Permans and Felix is dated January 10, 1997 and other operative events occurred in September and October 1997, a July 23, 2002 motion to amend the complaint to add Felix and claims against him is not time barred. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 218, 233 (Pon. 2002).

The review of legal errors is de novo. The questions of when a statute of limitations begins to run, and whether a claim is barred by the statute of limitations, are questions of law and to be reviewed de novo. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 315 (App. 2003).

Laches and the statute of limitations are two different defenses. The statute of limitations defense has only one element, which is the passage of a specific statutorily set amount of time. The equitable defense of laches has two elements. One element is the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and the other element is the resulting prejudice to the defendant. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

Unlike statutes of limitation, which bar an action after a fixed period of time, laches depends upon considerations of fairness, justice, and equity, and is invoked when the applicable statute of limitations has not yet passed. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 318 (App. 2003).

A statute of limitations defense is not one of the enumerated defenses that may be brought by motion under Rule 12(b), but rather is one of the specific defenses named in Rule 8(c) where a party must set forth affirmatively in the answer, the statute of limitations and any other matter constituting an avoidance or affirmative defense. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 342 (Kos. 2003).

When claims for food, lodging, and transportation costs could have been first sued upon as of March, 1996, the six year limitations period on those claims expired before the July 4, 2002 complaint was filed. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 343 (Kos. 2003).

That alleged contracts may have extended from June 5, 1995, to July 5, 1996, does not permit the plaintiffs to pursue all of their alleged claims in a complaint filed on July 4, 2002. The relevant inquiry is when the alleged contract breaches occurred and the consequent causes of action accrued, not when the alleged contracts expired. When all of the claims except those for wages first payable on or after July 4, 1996, accrued more than six years from the filing of the complaint, the complaint will be dismissed, but without prejudice to the filing of an amended complaint for any wage claims that accrued on or after July 4, 1996. Under Civil Rule 15(c), the filing of any such amended complaint will relate back to July 4, 2002, the original complaint's filing date. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 343 (Kos. 2003).

A statute of limitations is one of the expressly stated affirmative defenses to an action under Civil Rule 8(c). As such, it may be waived. On the other hand, a defect in subject matter jurisdiction may never be waived, and may be raised at any time, even after judgment. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 78, 80 (Kos. 2003).

To read the language that a petitioner shall by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part, to mean that the 60 day time period is absolute, which is to say jurisdictional, would be to read the statute as limiting the trial division's jurisdiction to hear such appeals. Statutes which limit a court's jurisdiction are to be construed narrowly. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 78, 81 (Kos. 2003).

Given the absence in the statute of any express language limiting the court's jurisdiction, the 60-day period for filing a petition in the FSM Supreme Court trial division to appeal a final order of the Social Security Administration is a statute of limitations. As such, it is one of the specifically enumerated defenses under FSM Civil Rule 8(c) that may be raised in the answer. The time limit does not affect the court's subject matter jurisdiction. Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 78, 81 (Kos. 2003).

A denial of a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction is without prejudice to Social Security's right to raise the statute of limitations defense by motion pursuant to FSM Civil Rule 12(c). Andrew v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 12 FSM R. 78, 81 (Kos. 2003).

A statute of limitations defense is an issue for trial when questions of fact exist. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 114, 123-24 (Pon. 2003).

When the Pohnpei Foreign Investment Board's letter states that the plaintiff is ordered to cease and desist from engaging in business and must surrender her Foreign Investment Permit, the clear implication of the Board's letter is that its revocation decision is effective immediately with no indication that those "orders" would take effect only at the expiration of a 20-day period. Thus, having failed to inform plaintiff of the 20-day waiting period, and having improperly indicated that its revocation decision was immediately effective, the Board cannot rely on the 20-day statutory period to appeal as a basis for dismissing this appeal. To the extent that it functions as a statute of limitation, it begins to run when a permit holder is notified of a Board decision and informed that the decision will become effective in 20 days if not appealed. Cuipan v. Pohnpei Foreign Inv. Bd., 12 FSM R. 184, 186 (Pon. 2003).

The continuing tort doctrine is well-settled law, and dictates that when there is an ongoing pattern of tortious activity where no single incident may be fairly identified as the cause of the harm suffered, then it is appropriate to regard the total effect of the conduct as actionable, and the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the conduct has ceased. In order to invoke the continuing tort doctrine, there must be continuing unlawful acts, and not merely continuing effects from a single original act. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 553 (Pon. 2004).

The rationale behind the principle that the statute of limitations does not begin to run on a continuing wrong until the wrong is over and done with is that the principle strikes a balance between the plaintiff's interest in being spared having to bring successive suits, and the two distinct interests, that statutes of limitations serve. One is evidentiary – to reduce the error rate in legal proceedings by barring litigation over claims relating to the distant past. The other is repose – to give people the assurance that after a fixed time they can go about their business without fear of having their liberty or property taken through the legal process. When an unlawful course of conduct's final act occurs within the statutory period, these purposes are adequately served, in balance with the plaintiff's interest in not having to bring successive suits, by requiring the plaintiff to sue within the statutory period but letting him reach back and get damages for the entire duration of the alleged violation. Some of the evidence, at least, will be fresh. And the defendant's uncertainty as to whether be will be sued at all will be confined to the statutory period. His uncertainty about the extent of his liability may be greater, but that is often true in litigation. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 553 (Pon. 2004).

Kosrae State Code, Title 6, Chapter 25 establishes the statutes of limitations which are applicable to specific types of civil actions. All actions in Kosrae State Court must be commenced within the time period stated therein. Skilling v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 16, 19 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which must be raised in either the answer or in a motion to dismiss. Kinere v. Kosrae Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 78, 80 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the allegations made in the complaint are for causes of action that accrued more than seven years ago, and when claims against the Kosrae State Land Commission for violation of statute and violation of due process are subject to a limitations period of six years, the claims based upon Land Commission actions which took place in 1997 are therefore barred by the statute of limitations and defendants Kosrae State Land Commission and Kosrae state government will be dismissed from the action. Kinere v. Kosrae Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 78, 81 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The six-year statute of limitations cannot bar an action when all the payments that the plaintiff seeks to recover appear to have taken place within the six years before the complaint was filed. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127 (Chk. 2005).

Because the allegations of the plaintiff's own complaint demonstrate that certain of its claims are subject to the defense of statute of limitations, the court may chose to dismiss those claims on the statute of limitations, although it is an affirmative defense. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 228 (Pon. 2005).

The continuing tort principle dictates that when there is an ongoing pattern of tortious activity where no single incident may be fairly identified as the cause of the harm suffered, then it is appropriate to regard the total effect of the conduct as actionable, and the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the conduct has ceased. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 17 (App. 2006).

Laches has two elements – the passage of a nonspecific amount of time during which the plaintiff engages in inexcusable delay or lack of diligence in bringing suit, and resulting prejudice to the defendant. Laches is always applied separate from and irrespective of the statute of limitations. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 18 (App. 2006).

Actions for the recovery of land or any interest therein must be started within twenty years after the cause of action accrues. A claim to land clearly cannot be renewed when the statute of limitations on an action to recover an interest in land is twenty years and more than twenty years have passed since the certificate of title in another's favor was issued. Any subsequent attempt to litigate the land's ownership is barred by the statute of limitations. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

If an action accrued to a predecessor in interest, the twenty years statute of limitations is computed when the action first accrued to the predecessor. The statute of limitations does not start to run all over again each time there is a new successor in interest. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which must be raised in a responsive pleading, such as an answer. It is an expressly stated affirmative defense to an action under Civil Rule 8(c), and as such, it is waived if it is not pled, or if it is not raised in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion for failure to state a claim. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Fefan Municipality, 14 FSM R. 544, 546 (Chk. 2007).

When the defendant has waived any statute of limitations defense, the limitations statute will not, as a matter of law, bar a summary judgment for the plaintiff. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Fefan Municipality, 14 FSM R. 544, 547(Chk. 2007).

The statute of limitations foreclosed the intervenor's claim, no matter how meritorious it might have been, in 2001 because the statute of limitations started to run in 1981 when the plaintiff was issued his certificate of title and that certificate of title constituted notice to the world of the plaintiff's claim to ownership of Lot No. 029-A-23, especially since the intervenor and the defendant both knew in 1991 that the plaintiff claimed to own the lot, or as the intervenor put it, that the certificate of title in the plaintiff's favor was not correct. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 139 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the twenty-year statute of limitations for the recovery of land or an interest therein did not expire until 2001 and since during the ten years from 1991, the latest date by which the intervenor and the defendant knew of the plaintiff's certificate of title, neither ever sued the plaintiff, that statute has now become a bar to any claim to Lot No. 029-A-23 by either the defendant or the intervenor. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 139 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Once a claim is filed in court, the time set under a statute of limitations stops running. This means that a claim for adverse possession does not include the time after an action has been filed in a court. Therefore, the 20-year period for the claimants to occupy land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously, and under a claim of right must run prior to the time claims were filed. Heirs of Obet v. Heirs of Wakap, 15 FSM R. 141, 145 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The statute of limitations is generally an affirmative defense that may be pled in the answer. A statute of limitations defense is not one of the enumerated defenses under Rule 12(b), but rather is one of the specific defenses named in Rule 8(c), where a party must set forth affirmatively in the answer, the statute of limitations and any other matter constituting an avoidance or affirmative defense. The statute of limitations defense may, however, be raised by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, or, if affidavits are filed with the motion, by a Rule 56 summary judgment motion, as well as by answer, but if there is a question of fact about the defense's existence, the issue then cannot be determined on affidavits, and must be raised in the answer. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171-72 (Chk. 2007).

If a statutory remedy provides as a condition precedent to enforce the remedy that it must be started within a prescribed time, it is jurisdictional and the statute of limitations may be raised in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 172 (Chk. 2007).

The affirmative defense of statute of limitations is to be raised affirmatively in the responsive pleading; it is not a defense that may be brought by a Rule 12(b) motion. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 273 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The statute of limitations for filing an action is different and distinct from the time limits for filing an appeal from a Land Court or Land Commission decision. An appeal from a Land Court or Land Commission decision is a statutorily-created right. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A statute of limitations is an independent bar to an action, separate from any opportunity to appeal that might be granted by a statute. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When the statute of limitations has expired on all loan instalment payments that became due before July 20, 2001 and when only two instalment payments were due after that date, the lender is, as a matter of law, entitled to judgment for only those two payments. FSM Dev. Bank v. Chuuk Fresh Tuna, Inc., 16 FSM R. 335, 338 (Chk. 2009).

A statute of limitation establishes a time limit for suing in a civil case, based on the date when the claim accrued. The purpose of such a statute is to require diligent prosecution of known claims, thereby providing finality and predictability in legal affairs and ensuring that claims will be resolved while evidence is reasonably available and fresh. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 39 (App. 2010).

A statute of limitation will bar the maintenance of a cause of action, no matter how meritorious the claim, when it is brought too long after the cause of action arose. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 39 (App. 2010).

When none of a plaintiff's causes of action are covered by the two-year statutes of limitation and when a complaint against the Land Commission cannot be a claim for the recovery of land from the Land Commission because the Land Commission does not own an interest in the claimed land, any negligence or due process claim against the Land Commission is subject to a six-year limitations period and will be time-barred and dismissed when the Land Commission actions or omissions are all over six years old. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 39-40 (App. 2010).

When the plaintiff's causes of action arose or accrued in 1986 since, assuming he proved his case, he could have sued successfully for the recovery of the land then, and since no fraud is alleged or apparent, the plaintiff had twenty years within which to seek recovery of the land. Since that time period expired in 2006, the plaintiff's February 2007 complaint is thus time-barred. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 40-41 (App. 2010).

When the six-year statute of limitations started in December 2002, and expired in December 2008, a case filed on March 23, 2009, was filed too late. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

If it were clear that the allegations in the plaintiff's own complaint demonstrate that his claims are subject to the defense of statute of limitations, the court may dismiss those claims as time-barred even though the statute of limitations is an affirmative defense. But when there are significant factual issues that may affect the defendant's statute of limitations defense, a motion to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds must be denied. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 48, 50-51 (Chk. 2011).

When the original loan documents were executed over fourteen years ago, the statute of limitations has run on a cause of action based on deception in their execution. Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 157-58 (Pon. 2012).

Leave to amend a complaint must be freely given if justice so requires, but the court must deny leave to amend when the amendment would be futile. One reason an amendment would be futile is if the claims are barred by the relevant statute of limitations. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 252, 254 (Chk. 2012).

While a statute of limitations bars a claim after the passage of a specified time, the common-law rebuttable presumption of payment is, on the other hand, used as evidence, based on the lapse of time, to create a rebuttable inference that the debt has been paid or otherwise satisfied. The presumption is based on the assumption that a person, before the passage of twenty years, would have recovered what belonged to that person unless prevented by some impediment. The persuasiveness of the presumption may be strengthened or diminished by evidence supporting or contradicting the significance of the lapse of time.

Kama v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 326, 335 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

The purpose of a statute of limitations is to require diligent prosecution of known claims, thereby providing finality and predictability in legal affairs and ensuring that claims will be resolved while evidence is reasonably available and fresh. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 467, 469 n.2 (Chk. 2012).

The most frequent attorney error that may be the subject of a successful legal malpractice action is the attorney's failure to comply with a statute of limitation. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 467, 469 n.2 (Chk. 2012).

When by the time the case was filed on January 14, 2010, the six-year statute of limitations would, even though it had been tolled by the filing of an earlier case, bar any claims arising before September 6, 2003, and when it is undisputed that all of the plaintiff's overtime claims were for 2002, the state has good grounds for and is entitled to summary judgment on its statute of limitations defense. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 467, 470 (Chk. 2012).

The statute of limitations is an affirmative defense which, if not pled, is waived. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 69 n.2 (Pon. 2013).

When, since the State of Chuuk and its Governor cannot prevail on their limitations defense, the plaintiffs' motion for partial summary judgment will be granted against the defendant state because Chuuk was the borrower on the airport renovation loan but since the Governor is not liable on the loan partial summary judgment will not be granted against him. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295-96 (Chk. 2014).

When the Social Security Board's decision was entered on August 27, 2013, and was received by the plaintiff on September 17, 2013, the 60-day deadline would fall on October 26, 2013, which would have given the plaintiff 39 days to file her claim after service of the Board's decision. She thus had adequate time to file her claim, and when she failed to file her claim in time pursuant to 53 F.S.M.C. 708, the court is unwilling to extend the timeframe to file a claim when the statute's language is clear, and the complaint will dismissed based on its filing being untimely under 53 F.S.M.C. 708. Palikkun v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 314, 317 (Kos. 2014).

When the allegations of the plaintiff's own complaint demonstrate that its claims are subject to the statute of limitations defense, the court may dismiss those claims on the statute of limitations ground, even though it is an affirmative defense. Palikkun v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 314, 317 (Kos. 2014).

Under Rule 15(c), whenever the claim or defense asserted in an amended pleading arose out of the conduct, transaction, or occurrence set forth or attempted to be set forth in the original pleading, the amendment relates back to the date of the original pleading. Rule 15(c) is based on the notion that once litigation involving particular conduct or a given transaction or occurrence has been instituted, the parties are not entitled to the protection of the statute of limitations against the later assertion by amendment of defenses or claims that arise out of the same conduct, transaction, or occurrence as set forth in the original pleading. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 19 FSM R. 435, 438-39 (Chk. 2014).

When, if claims for health insurance premium contributions due before March 16, 2006, had been included in the original complaint and if the FSM had asserted the six-year statute of limitations defense, the statutory defense would have barred their recovery, the proposed amended complaint's relation back to the original filing date of March 16, 2012, cannot revive those claims. The court will therefore permit the proposed amended complaint but bar the plaintiff from seeking any health insurance premium contributions due before March 16, 2006. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Department of Educ., 19 FSM R. 435, 439 (Chk. 2014).

The general rule is that statutes of limitations do not run against the sovereign. The policy behind the rule is that the public interest should not be prejudiced by the negligence of public officials. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460 (Chk. 2014).

When the complaint was filed on November 26, 2014, the six-year statute of limitations would bar the plaintiffs' claims unless their cause of action accrued on or after November 26, 2008, or some event or action tolled the running of the limitations period so that the six years did not end until November 26, 2014 or later. Thus, events that took place in 2007, cannot successfully overcome a statute of limitations affirmative defense. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 545 (Chk. 2016).

Even though it is an affirmative defense, a court may choose to dismiss claims based on the statute of limitations, when the allegations of the plaintiff's own complaint demonstrate that certain of its claims are subject to the defense. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 87 (App. 2016).

When it is clear that the allegations in the plaintiff's own complaint demonstrate that his claims are subject to the statute of limitations defense, the court may dismiss those claims as time-barred even though the statute of limitations is an affirmative defense. But when there are significant factual issues that may affect the defendant's statute of limitations defense, a motion to dismiss on statute of limitations grounds must be denied. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 91 (App. 2016).

When a complaint's allegations are subject to the defense that the statute of limitation has lapsed, a court may choose to dismiss the action, even though it is an affirmative defense. Lonno v. Heirs of Palik, 21 FSM R. 103, 107 (App. 2016).

A statue of limitation generally is not jurisdictional unless it is a limitations period for claims against the government. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

Raising a statute of limitation as a bar to a remedy does not deprive a court of jurisdiction to hear the cause in the first instance; the court could not adjudicate the question of proper application of the statute if it did not have subject matter jurisdiction. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

The statute of limitations does not affect a court's jurisdiction because generally a statute of limitation is not jurisdictional unless it is a limitations period for claims against the government. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

Raising a statute of limitation as a bar to a remedy does not deprive a court of jurisdiction to hear the cause in the first instance; the court could not adjudicate the question of proper application of the statute if it did not have subject matter jurisdiction. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

When the allegations of the plaintiff's own complaint demonstrate that its claims are subject to the statute of limitations defense, the court may dismiss those claims on the statute of limitations ground, even though it is an affirmative defense. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

Even though it is an affirmative defense, a court may dismiss claims (or grant summary judgment thereon) based on the statute of limitations, when the allegations in the plaintiff's complaint demonstrate that its claims are subject to that defense. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 357 (Pon. 2019).

A judgment for the plaintiff awarding him a sum of money creates a debt in that amount in his favor. The plaintiff may maintain proceedings by way of execution for enforcement of the judgment, the plaintiff may also be able to maintain an action upon the judgment. Ordinarily no useful purpose is served by bringing an action in the same state upon the judgment instead of executing upon it, but if the statute of limitations period has almost run, the plaintiff can bring an action upon the judgment and obtain a new judgment upon which the limitations period will run again. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

While ordinarily no advantage is gained by bringing an action in the same court upon a judgment, if the statute of limitation period has almost run upon the judgment, the judgment creditor can start the limitation period anew by bringing an action upon the judgment and obtaining a new judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

– Accrual of Action

A statute of limitation begins to run when the cause of action accrues. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 159 (Pon. 1989).

In an action to enforce an unpaid stock subscription, the statute of limitations begins to run against the creditors when it runs against the corporation. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 159 (Pon. 1989).

When a stock subscription specifies the date of payment, including payment in installments at specified times, the corporation has no cause of action until the date specified and at that time the statute of limitations begins to run. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 159 (Pon. 1989).

Stock subscriptions which are silent as to the date and terms of payment do not become due until a call has been issued by the corporation or, if the corporation becomes insolvent without ever issuing such a call, then the cause of action to collect unpaid subscriptions accrues when the creditors, by authority of the court, first demand payment. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 161 (Pon. 1989).

A cause of action accrues, and the statute of limitations begins to run, when a suit may be successfully maintained thereon. Where a note is payable in instalments, each instalment is a distinct cause of action and the statute of limitations begins to run against each instalment from the time it becomes due, that is, from the time when an action might be brought to recover it. Waguk v. Kosrae Island Credit Union, 6 FSM R. 14, 17 (App. 1993).

Since the statute of limitations does not commence running until after the cause of action accrues a prerequisite to determining the when the cause of action accrues is a precise clarification of the cause of action. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (I), 6 FSM R. 171, 174 (Pon. 1993).

In general, a cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete – the true test in determining when a cause of action arises or accrues is to establish the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (I), 6 FSM R. 171, 176 (Pon. 1993).

In cases where a cause of action is contingent on a condition precedent, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the condition has occurred, and as to a continuing injury until damages are actually sustained. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (I), 6 FSM R. 171, 176 (Pon. 1993).

A cause of action based on violation of Corporations, Partnerships, and Associations Regulation 2.7 accrues from the point of insolvency of the corporation. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (I), 6 FSM R. 165, 176-77 (Pon. 1993).

In general, the statute of limitations in an action for fraud begins to run from the time of discovery of the fraud, or when reasonable diligence should have led to discovery of the fraud. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (I), 6 FSM R. 171, 177 (Pon. 1993).

Claims for torts that took place before 1951 accrued, at the latest, when the applicable Trust Territory statute took effect in 1951. Unless tolled, the statutes of limitation bar the FSM courts from adjudicating such claims. Alep v. United States, 6 FSM R. 214, 219-20 (Chk. 1993).

For actions for the recovery of land or any interest therein the statute of limitations is twenty years after the cause of action accrues, which is when a suit may first be successfully maintained thereon. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 488-89 & n.1 (App. 1996).

The date of accrual for a contribution cause of action is the day the judgment was entered. Obviously a prerequisite to any successful contribution action based on a judgment is the judgment itself. The limitations period for a contribution action is six years. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 500-01 (Pon. 1998).

In an action brought to recover the balance due upon a mutual and open account, or upon a cause of action on which partial payments have been made, the cause of action shall be considered to have accrued at the time of the last item proved in the account. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 78 (Kos. 1999).

A statute of limitations begins to run when the cause of action accrues. When a complaint alleges that a defendant's anticompetitive actions forced the plaintiff out of business the cause of actions accrues when the plaintiff went out of business. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 301, 304 (Pon. 2000).

A cause of action accrues, and the statute of limitations begins to run, when a suit may be successfully maintained thereon. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 344 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The statute of limitations does not begin to run as to a continuing injury until damages are sustained. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 344 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The general rule applicable to negligence actions is that the statue of limitations runs from the time of the negligent act or omission, even though the total damage cannot be ascertained until a later date. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 344 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When the original cause of injury is permanent in nature, and the damages may be recovered in one action, then the statute of limitations generally attaches at the time the act complained of is done. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 344 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A plaintiff's claim for payment arises at the time that the payment became due because a cause of action arises when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete: the true test in determining when a claim arose is based upon when the plaintiff first could have maintained the action. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 556-57 (Pon. 2000).

When under the parties' contract, the defendant was to pay plaintiff within one year from the time that the defendant accepted the plaintiff's Master Plan and the Master Plan was accepted on October 3, 1994, the plaintiff's claim against defendant arose one year later on October 4, 1995. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 557 (Pon. 2000).

The settled rule that the statute of limitations begins to run upon the accrual of a cause of action applies in actions on implied and quasi contracts. When compensation for services is to be made on a certain date, the statute of limitations on an implied or quasi contract begins to run at that time. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 559 (Pon. 2000).

In general, a cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete. The true test in determining when a cause of action arises or accrues is to establish the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 611 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

While the plaintiff was a state employee, he was subject to the administrative procedures specified for grievances, but when his administrative action was still pending when he retired in 1997, because his grievance had never been ruled on, he was no longer an employee required to comply with the administrative procedures. His right to bring suit on his claim did not become complete and his cause of action therefore did not accrue his early retirement resulted in termination from state government employment. Skilling v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 608, 613 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

For purposes of determining when the statute of limitations ran, a plaintiff's claim for payment arose at the time that the payment became due. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 10 FSM R. 400, 405 (Pon. 2001).

When payment became due on October 4, 1995 and the statute of limitations would run on October 4, 1997, a March, 1997 letter demanding arbitration in accordance with the contract was within the statute of limitations. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 10 FSM R. 400, 407 (Pon. 2001).

The accrual of a cause of action for recovery of land begins when a suit may successfully be maintained upon. Where a cause of action for recovery of land accrued when the Determinations of Ownership were served and when the complaint was filed within twenty years of service, the cause of action for the recovery of land falls within the twenty year limitations period and is not barred by the statute of limitations. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 174 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit to a claim is complete. This is established at the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 315 (App. 2003).

When, despite several tries by counsel, a state employee's 1987 written grievance was never acted upon due to the state's inaction throughout the administrative process although the applicable statutes entitled him to a written response, the employee's cause of action accrued and the statute of limitations began to run only when he left state employment in 1997. The state's own inaction cannot be used to run against the six-year statute of limitations. Kosrae v. Skilling, 11 FSM R. 311, 316-17 (App. 2003).

The statute of limitations begins to run from the time that the cause of action accrues, which is to say from the time that a plaintiff first could have initiated a lawsuit on the cause of action alleged. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 342 (Kos. 2003).

In an installment contract setting, the statute of limitations begins to run from the time that each installment is due. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 342 (Kos. 2003).

A cause of action to collect salary or wages accrues when an employee has a right to collect the money allegedly owed to him. Thus the statute of limitations began to run from the time that each plaintiff's pay for any specific pay period was due. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 342 (Kos. 2003).

When, if the plaintiffs' March, 1996 termination of employment was permitted by the terms of their respective contracts, then no wage claims accrued after their; if the terminations violated the contracts, then wage claims would have continued to accrue from then until the contracts ended by their terms on July 5, 1996, but any wage claims that had accrued – i.e., claims for wages that had become due and payable – before the July 4, 1996 complaint was filed, are time barred. Segal v. National Fisheries Corp., 11 FSM R. 340, 342-43 (Kos. 2003).

Given that a cause of action accrues when a suit can be successfully maintained thereon, it is indisputable that if the construction was in fact defective, a suit could have been maintained from the date that construction was completed. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

Under the Pohnpei statute of limitations, if anyone who is liable to any action fraudulently conceals the cause of action from the knowledge of the person entitled to bring it, the action may be commenced at any time within the times limited within the statute after the person who is entitled to bring the same shall discover or shall have had reasonable opportunity to discover that he has such cause of action, and not afterwards. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

If a plaintiff fraudulently conceals allegedly defective construction methods, the six-year limitations period does not begin to run until the date on which the defendant discovered or had a reasonable opportunity to discover the alleged defect. It is not appropriate for the court, at the juncture of a motion to dismiss, to rule on an essentially factual matter. The trial's purpose will be to determine whether the construction methods that are alleged were, in fact, utilized; whether those methods were improper; and if they were, at what point the defendant knew or should have known of them. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77-78 (Pon. 2003).

A cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete. The true test in determining when a cause of action arises or accrues is to establish the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Skilling v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 16, 19 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete. The true test in determining when a cause of action arises or accrues is to establish the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Kinere v. Kosrae Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 78, 81 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A claim against Pohnpei has accrued when all of the facts comprising said claim exist, regardless of whether said facts are known or have been discovered by the claimant. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 227 (Pon. 2005).

Applying the Pohnpei Government Liability Act statue of limitations, as well as its test for determining when a claim accrues, Mobil's cause of action for contract reformation accrued on September 30, 1997 when it signed the lease agreement underlying this lawsuit since all facts comprising its cause of action for reformation existed at that time whether Mobil knew it or not. Accordingly, Mobil was required to file its claim for reformation by no later than September 30, 1999. Because it did not do so, the claim will be dismissed. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 227 (Pon. 2005).

If an action accrued to a predecessor in interest, the twenty years statute of limitations is computed when the action first accrued to the predecessor. The statute of limitations does not start to run all over again each time there is a new successor in interest. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The statute of limitations for claiming a violation of due process by the government is covered by the six-year period found in Kosrae Code section 6.2506. Thus, claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process and for failing to apply statutes are governed by the six year statute of limitations. Since the statute of limitations begins to run when a cause of action accrues, when, if there was a violation of due process, the latest time it accrued was when the certificate of title was issued in 1997, and since more than six years passed before the plaintiff asserted his claim, any claim based on a violation of his right to due process fails because it was not filed within the six-year period and will be dismissed. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 320 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Whether a plaintiff's cause of action for slander is time-barred depends on when that cause of action accrued. In general, a cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete – the true test in determining when a cause of action arises or accrues is to establish the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

As a general rule, a cause of action for libel or slander accrues, so as to start the running of limitations, at the time of publication, and not on the date of discovery of the wrong, or when the alleged injury occurred. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

A cause of action for libel accrues, so as to start the running of limitations, at the time of publication, and not on the date of discovery of the wrong, or when the alleged injury occurred. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 497 (Pon. 2008).

The statute of limitations begins to run when a cause of action accrues. When claims against the Land Commission of negligence, violations of due process and for failing to apply statutes accrued either at the time the determination of ownership was issued or when the certificate of title was issued in February 1986, more than six years has passed since those claims accrued and therefore, the statute of limitations has run and those claims must be dismissed. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 619-20 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The time for filing an appeal from a Land Commission determination of ownership is not the starting point for the statute of limitations. The starting point for the statutes of limitation set out in Kosrae State Code §§ 6.2503-2306 is the time the action accrued. An action accrues for recovery of land at the time a suit may have been successfully maintained upon, which is when the determination of ownership was issued. It is not related to the service of the determination of ownership. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

When a promissory note is payable in instalments, each instalment is a distinct cause of action and the statute of limitations begins to run against each instalment from the time it becomes due, that is, from the time when an action might be brought to recover it. FSM Dev. Bank v. Chuuk Fresh Tuna, Inc., 16 FSM R. 335, 338 (Chk. 2009).

A cause of action arises or accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete; that is, when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 39 (App. 2010).

A cause of action does not accrue for the purposes of a statute of limitations until all elements are present, including damages. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 39 (App. 2010).

When a plaintiff's claims against the Land Commission are all based on either allegations that he had not received notice of the 1983 and 1984 Land Commission hearings or on the allegation that the Land Commission failed to serve him the February 1986 determination of ownership, his cause of action accrued in February 1986 (or within a reasonable time thereafter to allow for the service he alleges was required) and any claims about lack of notice for the earlier hearings also accrued then because that is when the last element of his several causes of action – damages – occurred. Up until then he could not allege that he had suffered any damages because no one had yet been determined the owner of the parcel. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 40 (App. 2010).

Although service of a determination of ownership was a necessary condition precedent to start the statutory 120-day time period within which a Land Commission determination can be appealed, this does not have a bearing on a plaintiff's cause of action when he asserts that he was never a party in the Land Commission proceedings and he was not served notice of the hearing or of the determination of ownership since the plaintiff could have sued the named owner anytime after February 25, 1986 determination of ownership, or at the latest, after the March 4, 1986 service on the family representative, because all of the elements of his alleged causes of action were present by then. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 40 (App. 2010).

Courts have characterized the date from which a limitations period starts running as from when the cause of action accrues and that a cause of action accrues when a suit may first be successfully maintained thereon. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

A cause of action against the State of Chuuk accrues or arises and the limitations period starts running from the date on which the event triggering the cause of action occurred. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

When a state employee was forced to leave state employment in December 2002, the six-year statute of limitations for claims against the state started running then because it was the date on which the event triggering the cause of action occurred and it was also the time when he could have first successfully maintained a suit on his claim he should not have been forced to resign. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

An unjust enrichment claim has not accrued (and may never accrue) when the prerequisite for the unjust enrichment claim – having an earlier judgment set aside – still has not occurred and may never occur. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2011).

A cause of action arises or accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete; that is, when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 252, 254 (Chk. 2012).

A cause of action on a salvage contract accrues and the statute of limitations period starts to run on the day on which the salvage operations are terminated or the vessel and any part of the cargo is delivered to a safe port. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2013).

By Pohnpei statute, in an action brought to recover the balance due upon a mutual and open account, or upon a cause of action upon which partial payments have been made, the cause of action is considered to have accrued at the time of the last item proved in the account. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 70 n.3 (Pon. 2013).

A cause of action accrues and the statute of limitations begins to run, when a suit may be successfully maintained thereon. When a note is payable in installments, each installment is a distinct cause of action and the statute of limitations begins to run against each installment from the time it becomes due, that is, from the time when an action might be brought to recover it. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 70 (Pon. 2013).

In an action brought to recover the balance due upon a mutual and open account, or upon a cause of action on which partial payments have been made, the cause of action shall be considered to have accrued at the time of the last item proved in the account. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 294-95 (Chk. 2014).

When it is unclear from what the court has before it exactly when Chuuk made a loan repayment but it must have been some time after April 2005, otherwise that payment would have reduced the loan principal by some degree and since that partial loan repayment was also an acknowledgment of the debt Chuuk owed the municipalities for the airport renovation loan, the plaintiffs' cause of action could not have first accrued and the statute of limitations could not have started to run in 1999 when the loan was made or in 2002 when the loans, as per the memorandum of understanding between Chuuk and its municipalities, started to earn interest. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

Since a partial payment constitutes an acknowledgment of the debt, it is implicitly treated as a new promise to pay, and a new promise to pay has the effect of starting any limitations period all over again. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

When repayment of the airport renovation loan was due a reasonable time after the $500,104.65 partial payment and when, without identifying the exact date that would constitute a reasonable time after the partial payment that the repayment should be complete, the court is confident that, based on the attendant circumstances, that time frame would be within the six-year period before suit was filed on January 24, 2012. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 295 (Chk. 2014).

In general, the statute of limitations in an action for fraud begins to run from the time of discovery of the fraud or when reasonable diligence should have led to discovery of the fraud. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460-61 (Chk. 2014).

The true test in determining when a claim arose, is based upon when the plaintiff first could have maintained the action. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 243 (Pon. 2015).

For purposes of determining when the statute of limitations ran, it is well established, that the plaintiffs' claim for payment arose at the time the relevant payment became due. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 243 (Pon. 2015).

A cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit is complete. This is established at the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 236, 243 (Pon. 2015).

The true test in determining when a claim arose, is based upon when the plaintiff first could have maintained the action. Setik v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 320, 326 (Pon. 2016).

The applicable statute provides that in an action brought upon a cause of action on which partial payments have been made, the cause of action is considered to have accrued at the time of the last item proved in the account. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 418 (App. 2016).

A cause of action does not accrue for the purposes of a statute of limitations until all elements are present, including damages. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 490 (Chk. 2016).

In a cause of action on which partial payments have been made, the cause of action is considered to have accrued at the time of the last item proved in the account. Pacific Fin. Corp. v. David, 21 FSM R. 5, 6 (Chk. 2016).

When no admissible evidence is submitted to prove the last item alleged in the defendant's account – an alleged October 21, 2011 payment – and when the plaintiff has submitted affidavits by its attorney and by its vice-president, that interest of 23.75% has accrued on the June 15, 2000 principal balance of $1,075.17 equaling $4,164.70 between then and October 6, 2016, the reasonable inference can be drawn that there were no payments on the defendant's promissory note after June 15, 2000. The plaintiff has thus failed to show that there are no genuine issues as to any material fact on the defendant's affirmative defense of statute of limitations. Pacific Fin. Corp. v. David, 21 FSM R. 5, 6 (Chk. 2016).

The questions of when a statute of limitations begins to run, whether and when the statute is tolled, and whether a claim is barred by the statute of limitations are questions of law to be reviewed de novo. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 86 (App. 2016).

A cause of action accrues, and the statute of limitations begins to run, when a suit may be successfully maintained thereon – when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 87, 89 (App. 2016).

A cause of action to collect salary or wages accrues when an employee has a right to collect the money allegedly owed to him. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 89 (App. 2016).

A school teacher could not have successfully maintained a cause of action for improper salary classification as of the date of his initial hiring when he had not submitted documentation to the government proving his educational background, thereby giving him a right to collect the higher salary allegedly owed to him. His cause of action began to accrue when, if ever, he submitted the relevant documents necessary to prove he should have been placed at the higher pay level. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 89 (App. 2016).

When a state employee's claim for wrongful probation status accrued, at the very latest, on August 26, 1989, because that was when the event triggering the cause of action occurred and when he could have first successfully maintained a suit on his claim since he remained classified as a probationary employee despite working, as of then, one day longer than one year. Thus, when that employee first exercised his administrative remedies and filed a grievance on April 30, 1997, his action for wrongful probationary status is time-barred because his grievance and the initiation of this lawsuit clearly fall outside the six-year statute of limitations. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 92 (App. 2016).

When the borrowers made numerous payments and substantially reduced the principal from $17,831.33 to $6,468.20 (as of October 21, 2019), all of the earlier installments have been paid off, leaving only the later installments unpaid and very clearly within the statute of limitations period. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 606 (Pon. 2020).

– Tolling

The Federated States of Micronesia tolling statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 806, applies to persons "entitled to a cause of action," including minors for whom wrongful death actions may be brought. Luda v. Maeda Road Constr. Co., 2 FSM R. 107, 113-14 (Pon. 1985).

The two-year period proclaimed in 6 F.S.M.C. 503(2) is subject to the tolling provisions of 6 F.S.M.C. 806. Accordingly, the statute of limitations has not run against the minor children in this case. Sarapio v. Maeda Road Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 463, 464 (Pon. 1988).

Nothing in the Compact suspends or tolls the statute of limitations. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 499 (App. 1996).

The statute of limitations has run on claims of mismanagement of the Micronesian Claims Act unless there was continuing unlawful conduct that would create a basis for equitable tolling of the statute of limitations. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 499 (App. 1996).

Because leave to amend a pleading shall be freely given when justice so requires, a plaintiff may be granted leave to amend its complaint to present its argument that the statute of limitations may have been tolled based upon its request that the parties submit their dispute to arbitration when the defendant has not presented any arguments that would show any injustice if the plaintiff amended its complaint. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 559 (Pon. 2000).

Adverse possession is not a claim that can be made against registered land, or land that has been one step (determination of boundaries) away from being registered land since 1981, and the filing of a trespass suit tolls (suspends) any running of the time period needed to assert an adverse possession claim. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 13 FSM R. 99a, 99e (Chk. 2004).

When the plaintiffs have not put forward any grounds that could toll the running of the statute of limitations although they have had an adequate opportunity to do so since the defendants' answer put them on notice that the statute of limitations defense would be asserted and when the plaintiffs were thus not prejudiced by the defendants' failure to bring a separate motion asserting the defense because they had been on notice that they would be required to show why or which of their claims would not be barred by the statute of limitations, summary judgment for the defendants will be granted on the issue of statute of limitations. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 314 (Chk. 2005).

A defendant's wrongful conduct may toll or suspend the running of the statute of limitations as a form of estoppel – a defendant is estopped from raising the defense of statute of limitations because by his wrongful conduct he induced the plaintiff not to sue until the statute of limitations had run out. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 18 n.3 (App. 2006).

A statue of limitation may be tolled (suspended) if the person who is liable to any action fraudulently conceals the cause of action from the knowledge of a person entitled to bring the action. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 457-58 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Generally, filing a lawsuit tolls a statute of limitations. However, for a lawsuit to toll a statute of limitation, that lawsuit must be against the proper party. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 139 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A suit against one person does not arrest the running of the statute of limitations period against another. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 139 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A suit begun against a stranger, or one who sustains no such relation to the proper defendant that a judgment against him would bind such defendant, can have no effect on the operation of the statute of limitations in favor of the party against whom the cause of action properly exists. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 139 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When neither a 1996 lawsuit nor a 2002 lawsuit included any party, that if a judgment were rendered against that party, the judgment would bind the non-movant, and when the non-movant was not a party to either lawsuit, those 1996 and 2002 lawsuits could not have tolled the operation of the statute of limitations in non-movant's favor. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 135, 139 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

There are circumstances where a statute of limitations may be tolled, or temporarily suspended. For example, statutory language may include such an exception by stating that an action accrues when a person has knowledge of or discovered the action that caused the injury. This kind of exception is commonly called the "discovery rule." The Kosrae statutes do not include exceptions, but in some jurisdictions, courts apply this exception even though it is not specifically included in the statute of limitations. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The service of a notice or the failure to serve a notice does not suspend the operation of a statute of limitation. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

If the Kosrae State Court were to allow a plaintiff to initiate an action beyond the statute of limitations deadline, a plaintiff would have to demonstrate extraordinary circumstances and would carry the burden of proving the plaintiff was entitled to an exception to the statute. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Chuuk's inaction in responding to a former state employee's February 17, 2006 request for payment of lost wages does not toll statute of limitation on the former employee's cause of action for wrongful termination in December 2002. Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

Generally, pending litigation will toll the running of any statutory limitations periods. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 48, 51 (Chk. 2011).

The running of a statute of limitations can be tolled – suspended – by certain events. A defendant's wrongful conduct can, as a form of estoppel, toll or suspend the running of a statute of limitations – for instance, a defendant would be estopped from raising a statute of limitations defense when, by his wrongful conduct, he induced the plaintiff not to sue until the statute of limitations had run out. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 252, 254 (Chk. 2012).

When a defendant's alleged promise of compensation and its alleged subsequent repudiation of that promise may have tolled the running of the statute of limitations are undated, the plaintiff's cause of action might not, depending on the circumstances, be time-barred, and thus his proposed amended complaint is not futile on its face. Iwo v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 252, 255 (Chk. 2012).

A statute of limitations runs against the claims of infants in the absence of a contrary statute or provision. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273 (Chk. 2012).

A two-year statute of limitations will tolled by statute in favor of a minor for whose benefit the action has been brought. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273 (Chk. 2012).

When the original lawsuit was filed on August 7, 2008, the statute of limitations would have barred recovery for any claims for overtime hours worked before August 7, 2002, but while that lawsuit was pending, any further running of the statute of limitations would have been tolled (suspended) for any overtime claims after August 7, 2002. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 467, 469 (Chk. 2012).

For a lawsuit to toll a statute of limitation, that lawsuit must be against the proper party. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 467, 470 (Chk. 2012).

A contention that if a creditor, which was receiving partial payments, had wanted to recover the entire debt it would have to sue on each of the missed installment payments before the installment was six years old, makes no sense. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 418 (App. 2016).

Under the partial payment rule – that partial payment on the whole debt will toll the running of the statute of limitations – an acknowledgment or promise to perform a previously defaulted contract obligation is effectual, whether oral or in writing, at least in certain types of cases, to start the statute of limitations running anew. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 418 (App. 2016).

Whether a partial payment constitutes unequivocal acknowledgment of the whole debt from which an unconditional promise to pay can be implied thereby tolling the statute of limitations is a question for the trier of fact. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 418 (App. 2016).

When a letter signed by both parties clearly states that the partial payments were a "repayment plan for the outstanding balance of the loan," it cannot be interpreted in any way other than as an acknowledgment of the whole debt and that the agreed $100 payments were partial payments on the whole debt. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 418 (App. 2016).

When a debtor had made partial payments within the limitations period, under both the common law and statutory law (Pohnpei statutory law taking precedence), the statute of limitations will not bar the creditor from proceeding against the debtor for the entire outstanding balance. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

There is substantial authority for the proposition that partial payments by a principal debtor do not toll the statute of limitations as to the note's guarantors. The rationale behind this general rule is that a guarantor's consent to the debtor's future conduct may not be presumed merely on the basis of the original guarantee. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

The general rule is that a payment by the principal before the action is time-barred, operates as a renewal as to the principal, and to a surety, but not to a guarantor. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

A payment by the principal debtor will not operate to toll the statute of limitations as to a guarantor of the debt, even though it might do so as to a surety. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

When the trial court correctly decided that the statute of limitations was tolled by the debtor's partial payments, but did not separately determine whether those partial payments also tolled the statute of limitations with respect to the guarantor mortgagors, the appellate court will vacate the trial court judgment against the mortgagors and remand the matter for the trial court to conduct further proceedings to make that determination since that determination may need factual findings about whether the mortgagors were aware that the debtor was making partial payments and whether they acquiesced to the acknowledgment of the debt, and the trial court is the place to address those factual issues. Sam v. FSM Dev. Bank, 20 FSM R. 409, 419 (App. 2016).

The statutory sixty-day period to appeal a Kosrae Land Court decision is tolled until proper service is made. Serving notice of a Land Court adjudication or decision, is required in order to give the party a chance to appeal, and if a party is not properly served the Land Court's written determination of ownership, the statutory sixty-day appeals period does not run against that party. Esau v. Penrose, 21 FSM R. 75, 81 (App. 2016).

The questions of when a statute of limitations begins to run, whether and when the statute is tolled, and whether a claim is barred by the statute of limitations are questions of law to be reviewed de novo. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 86 (App. 2016).

If a public employee does not prevail on his grievance, then he could have sought judicial review of the decision within the applicable six-year statute of limitations, but when the employee received a decision in his favor, the statute of limitations was immediately suspended and the State's own inaction thereafter cannot be used to run the six-year statute of limitations. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 90 (App. 2016).

The statute of limitations cannot be said to have continued to run as against a public employee's claim when the administrative decision was issued in his favor and the administrative grievance process was still pending as to a determination of damages. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 90 (App. 2016).

The running of a statute of limitations can be tolled – suspended – by certain events. A defendant's wrongful conduct can, as a form of estoppel, toll or suspend the running of a statute of limitations. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 90 (App. 2016).

The statute of limitations does not to continue to run against a state employee when a favorable decision was rendered to him. To come to such a conclusion would mean any agency could immunize itself from judicial review simply by extending delay for six years or until the statute of limitations has run. Therefore, the statute of limitations was suspended when the favorable decision was rendered on December 12, 2001 until the January 22, 2015 decision to overturn the first determination, and thus a petition for writ of mandamus filed in Kosrae State Court on April 1, 2015 was, as a result of the tolled period, well within the six-year limitations period. Tilfas v. Kosrae, 21 FSM R. 81, 91 (App. 2016).

The twenty-year statute of limitations would be an effective affirmative defense against an action on a February 11, 1999 judgment filed after February 11, 2019, but when the action on a judgment was filed January 8, 2019, it was begun within the statutory period, and is thus timely and may proceed to judgment. This is because once an action on a judgment has begun within the statutory period, the creditor's right to recover remains alive, even though the limitation period may subsequently expire. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

The institution of an action on a judgment within the statutory period tolls the statute although it is not followed by rendition of judgment, or even service of an answer, within such time. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

The institution of an action on a judgment within the twenty-year statutory period set by 6 F.S.M.C. 802(1)(a) tolls that limitation statute even though the court has not yet rendered a judgment and even despite that a defendant did not file and serve her answer within the statutory time period. Because the timely filing of the action tolled the statutory time period, the statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 801, that creates a presumption of satisfaction after the twenty years has passed, does not come into play. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 375 (Pon. 2019).

– Which Limitation Applies

The Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands is a political entity possessing many of the attributes of an independent nation, and is to be regarded as a sovereign for the purpose of the statute of limitations. FSM Dev. Bank v. Yap Shipping Coop., 3 FSM R. 84, 86 (Yap 1987).

In the absence of any law or regulation in the Federated States of Micronesia which provides a specific limitation on actions to collect unpaid stock subscriptions, the applicable period is six years. Creditors of Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 157, 159 (Pon. 1989).

The applicable period of limitations on actions arising under the Corporations, Partnerships and Associations Regulations is six years. 6 F.S.M.C. 805. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (I), 6 FSM R. 171, 174 (Pon. 1993).

An action for damages for negligent surveying is not an action for the recovery of an interest in land, for which the twenty year statute of limitation would apply, therefore it may be barred by the lesser statue of limitations. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 361 (Pon. 1994).

Subsequent to the effective date of the Compact the two-year statute of limitations applies to trespass and nuisance suits against the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands. Jurisdiction over claims for acts or omissions of the government of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands is limited to those arising prior to the effective date of the Compact of Free Association. Damarlane v. United States, 7 FSM R. 167, 168 (Pon. 1995).

The statute of limitation for a claim against the State of Chuuk based upon the act or omission of a policeman in connection with the performance of his official duties is two years after the cause of action accrues. Kaminaga v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 272, 274 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

For actions for the recovery of land or any interest therein the statute of limitations is twenty years after the cause of action accrues, which is when a suit may first be successfully maintained thereon. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 485, 488-89 & n.1 (App. 1996).

After November 25, 1986, a claim for recovery of taxes paid under an unconstitutional Yap statute is subject to a two-year statute of limitations. Gimnang v. Yap, 7 FSM R. 606, 607, 611 (Yap S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

An action on a judgment may be maintained up to twenty years after the date of entry of the judgment. Senda v. Creditors of Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 7 FSM R. 664, 672 (App. 1996).

The applicable statute of limitations period for adverse possession is twenty years. Iriarte v. Etscheit, 8 FSM R. 231, 239 (App. 1998).

The date of accrual for a contribution cause of action is the day the judgment was entered. Obviously a prerequisite to any successful contribution action based on a judgment is the judgment itself. The limitations period for a contribution action is six years. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 500-01 (Pon. 1998).

Actions for trespass shall be commenced within six years after the cause of action accrues. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 558 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Actions for the recovery of land or any interest therein must be commenced within twenty years after the cause of action accrues. Hartman v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 28, 31 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1999).

The statute of limitations for an action to collect the balance due on an open account is six years from the accrual date of the cause of action. Mid-Pacific Liquor Distrib. Corp. v. Edmond, 9 FSM R. 75, 78 (Kos.

1999).

A sewer overflow case filed within six years of the first overflow is not barred by the statute of limitations. David v. Bossy, 9 FSM R. 224, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The two year limitation applies to tort actions for both negligence and wilful conduct. David v. Bossy, 9 FSM R. 224, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An action for damages for loss of land is subject to a six-year statute of limitations. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 343 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Breach of contract claims against Pohnpei state have a two year statute of limitations. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 557 (Pon. 2000).

Without a separate statute of limitations in the act creating a public corporation, the state legislature obviously intended for suit to be brought against the corporation within the same time period that suit must be brought against the state and its various related entities even though the corporation may act on its own and sue and be sued in its own name. E.M. Chen & Assocs. (FSM), Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 9 FSM R. 551, 558 (Pon. 2000).

An action upon a judgment must be commenced within 20 years after the cause of action accrued. Walter v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 312, 316 (Chk. 2001).

The twenty year statute of limitation does not apply to claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process, violation of statute and for failure to apply an earlier judgment as they are not claims for the recovery of land. These claims are subject to a limitations period of six years and are barred by the statute of limitations and will be dismissed when the Land Commission actions all occurred more than six years ago. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 175 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

6 TTC 305 establishes a period of 6 years in which to bring an action for negligent damage to real property. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 650 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The creation of laws relating to contracts is not identified in the Constitution as falling within the national government's powers. Rather, it is generally presumed to be a power of the state. Accordingly, state law determines the statute of limitations in a contract case. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

Pohnpei state law specifies limitation periods of two and twenty years for certain delineated causes of action and provides that all other actions – including contracts – must be commenced within six years after the cause of action accrues. Youngstrom v. NIH Corp., 12 FSM R. 75, 77 (Pon. 2003).

A claim to land clearly could not be renewed when the statute of limitations on an action to recover land or an interest therein is twenty years and more than twenty years have passed since the Certificate of Title in another's favor was issued and since the court decision affirming ownership. Any subsequent attempt to litigate the land's ownership is barred by the statute of limitations. Hartman v. Chuuk, 12 FSM R. 388, 400 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When no applicable limitations period is specified in the national statute under which a plaintiff has proceeded, the court will apply the most closely analogous state law limitations period so long as doing so does not frustrate or interfere with national policy. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 553 (Pon. 2004).

When a determination of ownership by the Land Commission is subject to appeal to the Court within 120 days from the date of receipt of notice of the determination and when it is alleged that the plaintiff never received notice of the determination of ownership, accepting the alleged facts as true, then the appeal time limit of 120 days never began to run. Skilling v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 16, 19 (Kos. S. Ct.

Tr. 2004).

Claims against the Land Commission for violation of statute and violation of due process are subject to a limitations period of six years. When claims against the Land Commission based upon Land Commission actions which took place in 1984 and before occurred more than six years ago, they are barred by the statute of limitations and should be dismissed. Skilling v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 16, 19 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A complaint against the Land Commission does not assert a claim for the recovery of land or recovery of an interest in land against the defendants, as the defendants have not been granted ownership of the land. Therefore the twenty year statute of limitations for recovery of an interest in land does not apply to claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process and violation of statute. These claims are subject to a limitations period of six years. Skilling v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 16, 19 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A Land Commission determination of ownership is subject to appeal to the Kosrae State Court within 120 days from the date of receipt of notice of the determination. If the determination was not received, then the appeal time limit of 120 days never began to run. Kinere v. Kosrae Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 78, 80 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Kosrae State Code, Title 6, Chapter 25 establishes three different statutes of limitations which are applicable to specific types of actions: 2 years, 6 years, and 20 years. Most types of actions are subject to the 6 year statute of limitations established by Kosrae State Code § 6.2506. All actions in Kosrae State Court must be commenced within the time period stated in Title 6, Chapter 25. Kinere v. Kosrae Land Comm'n, 13 FSM R. 78, 80 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

The six-year statute of limitations applies and the twenty year statute of limitations for the recovery of an interest in land does not when no interest in land is at issue because the land title case is pending in state court, and since the real property mortgage has never been enforced, no foreclosure proceedings have ever taken place. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127 (Chk. 2005).

Tort claims, tax claims, contract claims, breach of fundamental rights, claims for damages, injunctive relief or writ of mandamus arising from the alleged unconstitutionality or improper administration of Pohnpei statutes or regulations, any other civil action or claim against the state founded upon any law or any regulation, or upon any express or implied contract with the Pohnpei government or for liquidated or unliquidated damages in cases not sounding in tort, and actions for collection of judgments based on claims allowed against the State of Pohnpei can be sued upon within two years of the date on which they accrue. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 226-27 (Pon. 2005).

Since, by its own terms, the Pohnpei Government Liability Act statute of limitations is applicable only to those claims identified in Section 4 of that Act, which identifies a number of different claims, including claims based on violation of Pohnpei state law such as the Pohnpei Constitution, but does not expressly identify claims that are based upon national law or the National Constitution, the plaintiff's claim for declaratory judgment based on violation of the National Constitution and its claim for damages for civil rights violations under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) are not subject to the Act's statute of limitations and will not be dismissed on the ground that they are time barred by that statute of limitations. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 13 FSM R. 223, 227-28 (Pon. 2005).

The statute of limitations on contract or unpaid wage claims is six years. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 314 (Chk. 2005).

A six years' statute of limitations applies to all claims to which neither the specific twenty-year, or two-year statutes, apply. Claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process, as they are not claims for the recovery of land (twenty-year statute of limitation), are subject to a six-year limitations period and are barred and will be dismissed when the Land Commission actions are all over six years old since a complaint against the Land Commission cannot assert a claim for the recovery of an interest in land against the defendant Land Commission because it does not own any interest in the land at issue. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 n.5 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The statute of limitations bars a claim to an interest in land if the cause of action arose more than twenty years before the action is brought – if the claim could have been made over twenty years before it was actually made, then the action can no longer be maintained, no matter how meritorious the claim. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 456 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The statute of limitations for an action by a decedent's estate does not apply when the plaintiff is not alleging that she represents the estate, but alleges that she is an insurance policy beneficiary. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

When the plaintiff alleges that she is the third-party beneficiary of an insurance contract, the six-year statute of limitations for breach of contract generally applies. John v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 15 FSM R. 169, 171 (Chk. 2007).

The statute of limitations for an action on an open account is six years and when the testimony at trial shows transactions on the open account within the six-year statutory period a motion to dismiss on statute of limitations will be denied. George v. George, 15 FSM R. 270, 273 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A claim for negligence against the Land Commission and its government employee has a six-year statute of limitations. When, if there was any negligence, the cause of action accrued at the time the certificate of title was issued in 1997 and more than six years have passed, the plaintiff's claim of negligence against the Land Commission and its employee fails. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 320 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

For claims relating to ownership of land, the twenty-year statute of limitations found in Kosrae Code section 6.2503 would apply. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 321 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The two-year statute of limitations applies to causes of action for slander. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

Because the causes of action for libel and interference with contract and prospective economic advantage are not covered in sections 801 to 804 of title 6, the six-year limitation period set forth in section 805 of Title 6 applies to those causes of action. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

State law, and not the national law, provides the controlling limitations period for the causes of action, such as libel and slander and the tort of interference with contract and prospective economic advantage, that arise under state law. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 496 (Pon. 2008).

The two-year statute of limitations applies to causes of action for libel. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 497 (Pon. 2008).

A cause of action for interference with contract and prospective economic advantage must be commenced within six years after the cause of action accrues. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 497 (Pon. 2008).

Kosrae State Code § 6.2506 provides that any action not governed by the limitations of actions stated in other sections is governed by a six-year statute of limitations. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 619 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

Claims against the Land Commission for negligence, violation of due process and failing to apply statutes are actions against the government which fall within the limitations period of six years. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 619 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The twenty-year statute of limitations under Kosrae State Code § 6.2503 covers actions for the recovery of land or an interest in land and the time period begins when the cause of action accrues. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 620 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

A conflict of interest claim is that the determination of ownership must be set aside because one of the team members, later became a Land Commission member and was one of the concurring commissioners on the parcel's determination is a claim against the government is an action covered by Kosrae State Code § 6.2601 and falls within the six-year statute of limitations. Allen v. Allen, 15 FSM R. 613, 621 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2008).

The statutory limitation period on the breach of contract claim for an unpaid bank loan is six years after the cause of action accrues since a breach of contract cause of action, or an unpaid bank loan, is not covered in the specific limitations periods set forth in FSM Code, Title 6, sections 801 to 804. FSM Dev. Bank v. Chuuk Fresh Tuna, Inc., 16 FSM R. 335, 338 (Chk. 2009).

The court will not apply the three-year statute of limitations found in the Uniform Commercial Code without a showing that this statute of limitations has been enacted into law in this jurisdiction. The court is at a loss as to what authority would permit it to do this. It cannot legislate. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

Under Kosrae law, a six-year statute of limitation applies to all civil suits not covered by the twenty-year statute of limitation (actions on a judgment or for recovery of land or an interest in land) or by the two-year statutes of limitation (actions for assault and battery, false imprisonment, defamation, against the police for wrongful acts or omissions, medical malpractice, injury or death caused by wrongful act, by a depositor against a bank for a forged or altered check, and wrongful death or an action by or against an estate). Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 39 (App. 2010).

When the plaintiff's causes of action arose or accrued in 1986 since, assuming he proved his case, he could have sued successfully for the recovery of the land then, and since no fraud is alleged or apparent, the plaintiff had twenty years within which to seek recovery of the land. Since that time period expired in 2006, the plaintiff's February 2007 complaint is thus time-barred. Allen v. Allen, 17 FSM R. 35, 40-41 (App. 2010).

When a statute of limitations provides a two-year limitation period for actions for injury to one caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, the applicable statute of limitations for a negligent infliction of emotional distress claim is two years negligent infliction of emotional distress requires a physical injury or manifestation. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

When a two-year limitations period applies to injuries caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, it applies to intentional infliction of emotional distress because intentional infliction of emotional distress is caused by a wrongful act – conduct that is extreme and outrageous. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

An emotional distress claim, whether inflicted intentionally or negligently, is barred by the two-year statute of limitations. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

The applicable limitations period for a wrongful termination suit against the State of Chuuk is six years (subject to statutory tolling provisions). Dungawin v. Simina, 17 FSM R. 51, 54 (Chk. 2010).

If Pohnpei had managed to breach contracts – the 1993 loan agreement and the guaranty – that it had never been a party to, it would have had to have done it well before 1999 when the plaintiff filed suit. In which case, the statute of limitations on that claim expired long before this action was filed in 2010 since, under Pohnpei state law, the limitations period on contract actions against the State of Pohnpei is two years. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2011).

Tort actions against Pohnpei are subject to a two-year limitations period. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 9 n.4 (Pon. 2011).

A breach of contract counterclaim by loan guarantors against the bank would have a six-year limitation period. But, as that would have been a Civil Rule 13(a) compulsory counterclaim, the guarantors had to raise it in their earlier lawsuit or that claim was waived. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 1, 9 (Pon. 2011).

The statute of limitation is 20 years for causes of action that impact land as such. Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 157 (Pon. 2012).

When no applicable limitations period is specified in the national statute under which the plaintiff has proceeded, the court will apply the most closely analogous state law limitations period so long as doing so does not frustrate or interfere with national policy. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 272-73 (Chk. 2012).

The applicable limitations period for a civil rights action based on mistreatment at Chuuk State Hospital would be two years since that is the limitations period for errors committed by medical practitioners employed by the state and for personal injury actions against the state. Tarauo v. Arsenal, 18 FSM R. 270, 273 (Chk. 2012).

Borrowing a foreign statute of limitations that bars judicial relief has no basis in law when the claim arose from acts on Pohnpei and Pohnpei state law sets a limitation period. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 354 (App. 2012).

When a breach of contract cause of action arose on Pohnpei, Pohnpei's statute of limitations should be used. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 354 (App. 2012).

The two-year limitation period for a depositor's action against a bank or similar institution for the payment of a forged or raised check which bears a forged or unauthorized endorsement does not apply when the defendant is a retail (and wholesale) store and not a bank or a similar financial institution and the plaintiff is not a "depositor" in the defendant "institution." Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 362 (App. 2012).

The limitations period for many types of civil rights lawsuits against Chuuk is two years, but for back pay claims it is six years. Aunu v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 467, 469 (Chk. 2012).

The applicable statute of limitations for a salvage contract bars any recovery after the two-year period statutory period. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2013).

The two-year statute of limitations in 19 F.S.M.C. 928 applies only to salvage contracts and does not apply to a contract between a salvor and the insurer that is not a salvage contract but is instead a contract of guaranty or a surety or to answer for the liability of another and which may be subject to the six-year statute of limitations for contracts in general. Adams Bros. Corp. v. SS Thorfinn, 19 FSM R. 1, 11 (Pon. 2013).

The applicable statute of limitation period for an installment contract is six years. Bank of Hawaii v. Susaia, 19 FSM R. 66, 70 (Pon. 2013).

The statute of limitations period for a breach of contract claim against the State of Chuuk is six years. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 19 FSM R. 290, 294 (Chk. 2014).

The timeframe in which to appeal a decision of the FSMSSA Board is governed by 53 F.S.M.C. 708, which provides that any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board may obtain a review of the order in the FSM Supreme Court trial division by filing in court, within 60 days after the entry of the order, a written petition praying that the order be modified or set aside in whole or in part. Palikkun v. FSM Social Sec. Admin., 19 FSM R. 314, 316 (Kos. 2014).

Conversion has a six-year statute of limitations. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460 (Chk. 2014).

Adverse possession is a doctrine under which one can acquire ownership of land if that individual, absent the owner's permission, uses the land openly, notoriously, exclusively, continuously and under claim of right, coupled with a requirement that the owner does not challenge such action until after the statute of limitation has run. The applicable statute of limitation period for adverse possession is twenty years. Tilfas v. Heirs of Lonno, 21 FSM R. 51, 58 (App. 2016).

When, using any of the three ways to analyze an action's nature for statute of limitations purposes, it could not be plainer that the action is one to recover an interest in land, the twenty-year statute of limitations to recover land or an interest in land applies. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 580 (App. 2018).

As a matter of policy, if there is a substantial question or reasonable dispute as to which of two or more statutes of limitation within the jurisdiction should be applied, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application of the statute containing the longest limitation period. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 580 n.2 (App. 2018).

When the type of interest allegedly harmed is land ownership; when the right that the plaintiffs sue upon is their right to own a certain land parcel; when the remedy sought is to recover registered title to that land parcel that the plaintiffs contend that was lost through the defendants' predecessor's wrongful act; and when the primary interest that the alleged wrongdoer invaded was the plaintiffs' predecessor's registered ownership of that parcel, the action is one for the recovery of title to land. The theory of recovery might be fraud, or due process violation, or negligence, or some other theory such as reformation of contract, but that theory does not change the action's nature for statute of limitations purposes. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 580 (App. 2018).

To determine which statute of limitation to apply, a court must look to the nature of the case. There are three ways to determine a case's nature for statute of limitations purposes: 1) the type of interest allegedly harmed, or 2) the right sued upon, or 3) the remedy sought, rather than the theory of recovery. What is significant for statute of limitations purposes is the primary interest that was invaded by the defendant's wrongful conduct. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

When, under any of the three ways to analyze an action's nature for limitations purposes, it could not be plainer that the case can only be an action to recover an interest in land, the twenty-year statute of limitations to recover land or an interest in land applies. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

When the type of interest allegedly harmed is land ownership; when the remedy that the plaintiffs seek is to recover ownership of, and title to, a parcel, which they contend they lost through another's wrongful acts; and, when the primary interest that the other allegedly invaded, by his alleged wrongful conduct, was his siblings' right to joint registered ownership, good against the world, of the parcel, the action's nature, for statute of limitations purposes, as one to recover interests in land and that does not change because the theory of recovery might be fraud, or due process violation, or negligence, or some other theory. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

As a matter of policy, if there is a substantial question or reasonable dispute about which of two or more statutes of limitation within the jurisdiction should be applied, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application of the statute containing the longest limitation period. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 622 (App. 2018).

When most of the plaintiffs' claims are for events that occurred in 2001, 2003, or 2004, and when none of the claims are for the recovery of an interest in land or are an action on a judgment, which are the only causes of action for which the statute of limitations is twenty years, then the statute of limitations for the plaintiffs' claims cannot exceed the six years of the catchall statute, which claims are thus barred by the statute of limitations. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

Any action by or against the executor, administrator, or other representative of a deceased person for a cause of action in favor of, or against, the deceased shall be brought only within two years after the executor, administrator, or other representative is appointed or first takes possession of the assets of the deceased. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 (Pon. 2019).

A "personal injury" is any harm caused to a person, such as a broken bone, a cut, or a bruise; bodily injury or any invasion of a personal right, including mental suffering and false imprisonment. This does not describe claimed damages that are all monetary losses. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 n.8 (Pon. 2019).

It seems likely that the six-year, catch-all statute of limitations would apply to purely monetary damages. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 & n.8 (Pon. 2019).

For an independent action for relief, no statute of limitations would apply because there is no time limit on when an independent action may be brought, but the doctrine of laches is applicable and undue delay can bar relief. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 (Pon. 2019).

FSM statutory law recognizes the existence of an action on a judgment because it provides a time limit – 20 years – within which one must be brought. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371 (Pon. 2019).

An action may be maintained up to twenty years after the date of entry of the judgment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Carl, 22 FSM R. 365, 371 (Pon. 2019).

The statutory limitation period for an unpaid bank loan is, under 6 F.S.M.C. 805, six years after the cause of action accrues since unpaid loans are not covered in the specific limitations periods set forth in Sections 801 to 804. Pacific Islands Dev. Bank v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 600, 606 (Pon. 2020).

TAXATION

There appears to be uniform acceptance by common law jurisdictions of the principle that government officials are considered employees for income tax purposes. This amounts to a common law rule of taxation and yields a result in harmony with the underlying principles of the taxation system established by the Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 12 (Pon. 1985).

A Pohnpei state government official is an employee for purposes of the Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 12 (Pon. 1985).

There is a common law of taxation which addresses the status of public officials as employees. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 17 (Pon. 1985).

The FSM Income Tax Law's distinction between employees and businesses obviously reflects congressional expectation that businesses and employees are generally distinguishable on the basis of whether generation of their income would require substantial expenditures by them. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 19 (Pon. 1985).

The Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law confirms that it is the nature of the services performed and the person performing the services, rather than the stated identity of the contracting party, which determines the tax treatment for the compensation under the contract. It is of no import that the "contractor" was identified as a corporation rather than as an individual when the contract makes clear that the primary services to be rendered were those of an individual and the corporation was merely a name under which the individual conducted business. Heston v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 61, 64 (Pon. 1985).

A taxpayer who held the high public office of Chief of Finance, whose contract gave him a wide degree of discretion in carrying out governmental powers; and who was not an outside consultant who could merely suggest or advise but was an integral part of the governmental operation is a governmental official, therefore an employee for purposes of the FSM Income Tax Law. Heston v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 61, 65 (Pon. 1985).

All government officials are employees of the government within the meaning of the Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law. Heston v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 61, 65 (Pon. 1985).

Although plaintiff incurred expense in carrying out his obligations under contract, they were well below ten percent of the amount he received under the contract. Such expenditures are insufficient to alter plaintiff's status from an "employee" to a "business" under the FSM Income Tax Law. Heston v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 61, 66 (Pon. 1985).

The statement in 54 F.S.M.C. 144(2) that penalties provided in chapter 1 will apply to the gross revenue tax law does not preclude the penalty specified in 54 F.S.M.C. 902 from applying. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 91 (Kos. 1985).

Public Law No. 3-32, the predecessor of 54 F.S.M.C. 902 is subject to the interpretation that it was to be a catch-all provision applicable to all taxes which subsequently might be established by Congress. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 94 (Kos. 1985).

The penalty provisions of 54 F.S.M.C. 902 apply to failure to make timely payment of the gross revenue tax imposed under 54 F.S.M.C. 141. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 94 (Kos. 1985).

The gross revenue tax levied by the national government under 51 F.S.M.C. §§ 141-44 is distinguishable from a sales tax in several ways. Ponape Federation of Coop. Ass'ns v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 124, 127 (Pon. 1985).

The power granted to Congress by FSM Constitution article IX, section 2(e) "to impose taxes on income" includes the power to tax gross revenue. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 264 (Truk 1986).

The gross revenue tax as enacted by the Congress of Micronesia continued in effect in the Federated States of Micronesia by virtue of the transition article of the FSM Constitution but, because it was subsequently amended by the FSM Congress and was included in the codification of FSM statutes, may now be considered a law enacted by Congress. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 264 (Truk 1986).

Statutory provisions designed to enhance the capacity of the government to enforce penalties for failure to pay taxes are penal, not remedial, and should be strictly construed. In re Island Hardware, Inc., 3 FSM R. 428, 432 (Pon. 1988).

On a claim for declaratory relief from an unconstitutional excise tax, the FSM Supreme Court trial division will not abstain, where the issue could later be certified to the FSM Supreme Court appellate division and result in delay, where the trial court has already retained the case longer than contemplated, where the issue is narrowly posed and not capable of varying resolutions, and where it appears that a greater service may be provided by deciding the issue. Gimnang v. Yap, 4 FSM R. 212, 214 (Yap 1990).

In the Federated States of Micronesia Income Tax Law, 54 F.S.M.C. 111 et seq., cooperatives are not singled out in any way within the definition of business and there is no indication in the tax law that cooperatives are to be treated differently than corporations or any other forms of businesses. KCCA v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 68, 70 (Pon. 1991).

Each exclusion from the definition of "gross revenue" in 54 F.S.M.C. 112(5) seems to represent one or another of three possible purposes: to prevent dual taxation of revenue of a single taxpayer, to make allowances for special situations, or to exclude funds received by the taxpayer on behalf of another such as refunds and rebates, moneys held in a fiduciary capacity, cash discounts taken on sales, or proceeds of sales of goods returned by customers when the sale price was refunded in cash or by credit. KCCA v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 68, 70-71 (Pon. 1991).

Patronage refunds paid by a cooperative to its members are not refunds within the meaning of 54 F.S.M.C. 112(5)(a) and are not excludable from gross revenue under the FSM Tax Law. KCCA v. Tuuth, 5 FSM R. 68, 71 (Pon. 1991).

A sales tax is oriented toward individual transactions, not total income, and is tied to the price of the goods sold, rather than to the overall success of the taxpayers. Youngstrom v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 73, 76 (Kos. 1991).

An income tax typically applies to practically all income, with rates payable based on the total income of the taxpayer, after giving allowance to certain exemptions, and normally extends to all forms of income, including wages and salaries, interest, royalties, fees and returns on capital, as well as income realized through the sale of goods. Youngstrom v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 73, 76 (Kos. 1991).

Limitation of the definition of "business" under the FSM income tax law to "all activities . . . carried on within the Federated States of Micronesia" strongly implies that activities carried on elsewhere by a business functioning within the Federated States of Micronesia are not subject to FSM income tax. 54 F.S.M.C. 112(1). Bank of the FSM v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 346, 348 (Pon. 1992).

While there is a presumption that all revenue of a business is derived from sources within the Federated States of Micronesia, the presumption may be rebutted and the tax "levied only on that portion which is earned or derived from sources or transactions within the Federated States of Micronesia." 54 F.S.M.C. 142. Bank of the FSM v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 346, 349 (Pon. 1992).

The statutory scheme emphasizes the location of the business activity which generates the revenue in question. Therefore revenue derived from banking investment transactions in Honolulu and Chicago are not taxable since they are not derived from sources or transactions within the Federated States of Micronesia. Bank of the FSM v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 346, 349 (Pon. 1992).

Where regulations existed referring to a patronage refund as a "bonus or refund" at the time Congress enacted the statute excluding refunds from the definition of gross revenue, the statute unambiguously excludes patronage refunds from gross revenue. KCCA v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 375, 379-80 (App. 1992).

Patronage refunds are not voluntarily paid refunds because the regulations compel the allocation of patronage refunds. Therefore they are properly excludable from gross revenue. KCCA v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 375, 380 (App. 1992).

Under 54 F.S.M.C. 902, a monthly penalty is imposed on delinquent payment of any tax specified in Title 54, including gross revenue tax. Setik v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 407, 409 (App. 1992).

54 F.S.M.C. 143(2) mandates that all businesses compute gross revenue tax liability using the accrual accounting method. NIH Corp. v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 1992).

By statute, a taxpayer is liable for penalties and interest on any underpayment of his gross revenue tax liability regardless of the reason for underpayment, unless some other principle of law applies to afford the taxpayer relief. NIH Corp. v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 411, 413-14 (Pon. 1992).

Where the government's prior audit methods had the effect of permitting gross revenue tax computation on the cash basis and where the government's attempts to advise businesses that they are required to use the accrual method have for many years been woefully inadequate, the government will be barred by equitable estoppel from assessing penalties and interest on any underpayment of taxes that was the result of being led to believe that the cash basis was an acceptable method of tax computation. NIH Corp. v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 411, 415 (Pon. 1992).

Moneys held in a fiduciary capacity are specifically excluded by statute from the definition of gross revenue. 54 F.S.M.C. 112(5)(b). The term "fiduciary capacity" is not restricted to technical or express trusts, but extends to money that is not the taxpayer's own, but which is handled for the benefit of another. NIH Corp. v. FSM, 5 FSM R. 411, 416 (Pon. 1992).

A taxpayer who owes social security taxes to the government as employer contributions under the FSM Social Security Act is liable for reasonable attorney's fees if the tax delinquency is referred to an attorney for collection; however, the court may exercise discretion in determining the reasonableness of the fees assessed in light of the particular circumstances of the case. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Mallarme, 6 FSM R. 230, 232 (Pon. 1993).

Among the factors which the court may consider in determining the amount of attorney's fees recoverable in an action brought under 53 F.S.M.C. 605 is the nature of the violation, the degree of cooperation by the taxpayer, and the extent to which the Social Security Administration prevails on its claims. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Mallarme, 6 FSM R. 230, 232-33 (Pon. 1993).

Rents are income taxable under the FSM Income Tax Statute, and a state tax on gross rental receipts combines to create vertical multiple taxation of a form of income. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 117, 119 (App. 1995).

The name given a tax by a taxing authority is not necessarily controlling as to the type of tax it is. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 117, 119 (App. 1995).

The interval in which a tax is reported and collected and whether it is imposed without regard to profit or loss does not alter whether it is an income tax. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 117, 119 (App. 1995).

The Social Security Administration is entitled to summary judgment for unpaid taxes when it supported its motion with an affidavit detailing the a taxpayer's audit and other evidence indicating the taxpayer's liability, and the taxpayer has provided no evidence to indicate otherwise. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 442, 445-46 (Pon. 1996).

The Social Security Administration is entitled to a penalty of not more than $1,000 and interest of 12% on unpaid taxes. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 442, 446-47 (Pon. 1996).

A taxpayer is liable to the Social Security Administration for reasonable attorney's fees and costs when unpaid taxes are referred to an attorney for collection to the extent which the Social Security Administration prevails on its claims. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Weilbacher, 7 FSM R. 442, 447 (Pon. 1996).

It is unavailing in tax cases, except in special circumstances, to seek a preliminary injunction against enforcement or to have the taxes escrowed pending the outcome. This is in order not to disrupt the financial stability of the governmental unit. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 127 (Chk. 1997).

Under 53 F.S.M.C. 605(3) an employer is delinquent each quarter that it fails to both file a report and pay within ten days after the end of the quarter. Therefore an employer may be subject to the maximum penalty of $1,000 each time (quarter) it is delinquent. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 132 (App. 1997).

Both interest, 53 F.S.M.C. 605(4), and penalties, 53 F.S.M.C. 605(3), may be applied to an employer who is delinquent, as was intended by Congress. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Kingtex (FSM) Inc., 8 FSM R. 129, 132-33 (App. 1997).

The following factors are relevant to determining whether fishing fees are taxes: 1) the source of the levy – whether the entity imposing the tax is legislative or administrative; 2) the effect of the levy on the general public – whether the assessment is imposed upon a broad or narrow class; 3) the means by which the levy is made – whether it is voluntary, and produces a benefit to the payor which is commensurate with the payment; and 4) the relationship between the levy and government costs – whether the revenue generated bears a relationship to the costs of the government in administering the particular program. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 382-83 (Pon. 1998).

Cases distinguishing between taxes and fees often examine the source of the levy as an indicator of whether the particular payment should be considered a tax or a fee. An assessment imposed directly by the legislature is more likely to be a tax than one imposed by an administrative agency. The classic tax is imposed by a legislature upon many, or all citizens; the classic regulatory fee is imposed by an agency on those subject to its regulation. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 383 (Pon. 1998).

Courts also consider whether a governmental levy is directed at the general public, or whether it is imposed on a discrete subsection of the public, in distinguishing between a tax and a fee. An assessment imposed on a broad class of parties is more likely to be a tax than one imposed on a narrow class. One distinguishing characteristic of a fee is that the public agency normally may exact a fee for a grant which, presumably, bestows a benefit on the applicant, not shared by other members of society. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 383 (Pon. 1998).

Another distinction between a tax and a fee is whether the levy is exacted voluntarily in exchange for a benefit to the payor. Taxation is a legislative function, and Congress, which is the sole organ for levying taxes, may act arbitrarily and disregard benefits bestowed by the Government on a taxpayer and go solely on ability to pay, based on property or income. A fee, however, is incident to a voluntary act, e.g., a request that a public agency permit an applicant to practice law or medicine or construct a house or run a broadcast station. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 384 (Pon. 1998).

A fee for use of property which is controlled by the government is not necessarily a tax, because the government is entitled to receive the benefits of its property just like any private landowner. As a sovereign, the government levies taxes, but as property owner it may charge fees for the use of its property. These fees are paid by choice and in exchange for a particular benefit, the use of government property, just as rents are freely paid for the use of private property. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 385 (Pon. 1998).

Revenues from natural resources are not taxes. The constitutional definition of tax was not meant to include amounts received by the national government from disposal of natural resources over which it has control. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386-87 (Pon. 1998).

Although the government is not precluded from charging and trying, in one information, violations of two or more separate provisions of the FSM codes which arise from the same course of conduct, but when the case involves conduct specifically addressed by the tax code (which has comprehensive civil and criminal penalties established for a clearly stated purpose) the government cannot also seek to charge the defendant with alternative violations of criminal code sections providing for criminal penalties up to ten times greater than those allowed under the tax code and which were not clearly intended to apply to tax crimes. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 546 (Pon. 1998).

The legislative history of Title 54 indicates that it was created as a system primarily aimed at recovering revenue rather than punishing wrongdoers with lengthy prison sentences and that the fines and criminal penalties adopted in it were thought to be commensurate with the specified wrongdoing. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 547 (Pon. 1998).

There is no clearly expressed Congressional intent for the criminal code to be used to prosecute tax crimes. Since the FSM had existing laws with comprehensive civil and criminal penalties applicable to tax crimes at the time the criminal code was adopted, the implication is that the criminal code was not intended for the purpose of prosecuting such crimes. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 549 (Pon. 1998).

The penalties applicable to criminal mischief pertain to deterring the commission of the crime not for the primary purpose of raising revenue as with the tax code which has comprehensive civil and criminal penalties designed specifically for that purpose. FSM v. Edwin, 8 FSM R. 543, 549 (Pon. 1998).

A four-part analysis is applied to determine whether fishing fees are taxes: 1) the source of the levy, 2) the effect of the levy on the general public, 3) the means by which the levy is made, and 4) the relationship between the levy and government costs. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

Whether fishing fees are uniform is immaterial to a finding that fishing fees do not constitute a tax. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

How Congress appropriates fishing fees is irrelevant to whether they are a tax. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

For tax purposes, the FSM Telecommunications Corp. is deemed part of the national government thereby making it exempt from a state use tax. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 292, 294 (Pon. 1999).

Because a Congressional statute set up Telecom to serve the public interest and foster economic development, because Telecom may seek appropriations from Congress and, to the extent approved by the President, grants from sources outside of the FSM, because Telecom's board of directors must submit an annual report reflecting its activities, including financial statements, to the government, and because Telecom has no independent shareholders and is fully owned by the national government, Telecom is deemed, for taxation purposes, to be a part of the national government, and its efforts to carry out its mission should not be hindered by any state's efforts to tax its business activities. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 385 (Pon. 2000).

By making the taxing powers allocated between the national and state governments of Micronesia exclusive and distinct and allocating the exclusive power to tax income and imports, the Constitution's framers sought to avoid vertical multiple taxation and ensure a consistent fiscal policy for Micronesia. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 387-89 (Pon. 2000).

A normal English language reading of the phrase "the revenues" in article IX, section 5's second sentence necessarily refers to those revenues mentioned in section 5's first sentence – national taxes. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

The Constitution delegates to the national government the power to impose only two types of taxes – that based on imports and that on income. Money collected through these forms of taxation are the revenues of which half must be paid into the treasury of the state where collected. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 434 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not income taxes because the national government's power to impose them does not derive from its power to tax income. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

Not less than half of the national taxes must be paid to the state where collected, but fishing fees are not national taxes because they are imposed, not under the national government's power to impose taxes, but under its power to regulate exploitation of natural resources within the FSM exclusive economic zone. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 435 (App. 2000).

Fishing fees are not an income tax because they are not a tax. The national government has the exclusive sovereign right to control access to and exploitation of the natural resources in the FSM's exclusive economic zone and when it imposes fishing fees, the national government is selling access to the exclusive economic zone's living resources to its fishing licensees and it is selling the licensees the opportunity to reduce some of those resources to the licensees' proprietary ownership. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 436 (App. 2000).

Gross revenue is defined as the gross receipts of the taxpayer derived from trade, business, commerce, or sales and business is defined to mean any undertaking carried on for pecuniary profit carried on within the FSM for economic benefit either direct or indirect. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Ehsa, 10 FSM R. 24, 29 (Pon. 2001).

Once the Secretary of Finance determines that a taxpayer has failed to pay the gross revenue tax it owes, he notifies the taxpayer and demands that the tax be paid. If the taxpayer fails within 30 days to make and file a return and pay the tax which has been assessed, it is appropriate for the Secretary to make a return for the taxpayer from the information available to the Secretary and to assess that amount against the taxpayer. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Ehsa, 10 FSM R. 24, 31 (Pon. 2001).

Pursuant to 54 F.S.M.C. 152(3), the Secretary's gross revenue tax assessment is be presumed to be correct unless and until it is proved incorrect by the person, business, or employer disputing the amount of the assessment. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Ehsa, 10 FSM R. 24, 31 (Pon. 2001).

When the taxpayer has failed to meet its the burden of showing that the Secretary's assessment was incorrect and has failed to put forth competent evidence in opposition to the Secretary's summary judgment motion and its lengthy opposition contained only legal argument, the taxpayer has failed to submit evidence establishing that the Secretary's assessment was incorrect and summary judgment in the Secretary's favor is appropriate. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises v. Ehsa, 10 FSM R. 24, 31 (Pon. 2001).

Import taxes are an exclusive national power, and as such it is a power that is prohibited to the states. MGM Import-Export Co. v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2001).

When a plaintiff is due what he should have been paid during the two-week notice period that was required by his contract, but was not paid, the court will award that as damages and the employee's share of taxes should be deducted from this amount and paid to the appropriate taxing agencies as required by law and the employer's share of applicable taxes should not be deducted from this amount, but should be paid to the appropriate taxing agencies as required by law. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 435 (Yap 2006).

When "first sale" is defined as "the sale first made after the date of receipt in Chuuk State of taxable tangible items, a tax on first sale in the State of Chuuk of all tangible items, except gasoline and unprocessed and unpackaged items, means that in order for an item to be taxable, there must be "receipt of the item" in Chuuk. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from the definition of "first sale" is that items which have never left Chuuk, that is, locally produced goods are not subject to the statute because they have no "date of receipt" in Chuuk. K&I Enterprises v. Francis, 15 FSM R. 414, 418 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The Chuuk service tax is to be paid by the customer, person, company, or entity obtaining the services, and must be collected by the person, company, or entity providing the services. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 156 (Chk. 2010).

When Chuuk has warned Continental that it is required to collect a service tax as set forth in a regulation implementing a tax statute and that criminal penalties may be imposed on Continental or its employees for failure to comply, the question of whether the Chuuk service tax on Continental passengers and freight shippers is lawful is sufficiently ripe to support a suit seeking declaratory judgment. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 157-58 (Chk. 2010).

It is inconceivable that a party could be made to suffer criminal or civil penalties for the failure to collect a tax but would not have standing to challenge the tax's constitutionality (and thus the requirement that the party must collect it). The inability of a party required by law to collect a tax to challenge that tax's validity would deprive that party of its property (compliance costs, tax collection costs, remittance costs, etc.) without any due process of law. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 158-59 (Chk. 2010).

The unconditional 50% transfer of national taxes to the state treasuries is part of the constitutional framework that, through mandatory revenue sharing, allows the states a high degree of fiscal autonomy while at the same time avoiding undesirable vertical multiple taxation. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 530 n.3 (Chk. 2011).

The Constitution expressly grants the national government, not the state governments, the power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, and taxation is a form of regulation. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 531 (Chk. 2011).

Pohnpei's first commercial sales tax is assessed against the seller on the first commercial sale within the state. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 31 (Pon. 2011).

The court cannot accept an interpretation that operating a business within Pohnpei is, in and of itself, sufficient to establish the applicability of Pohnpei state tax law due to minimum contact analysis because to accept it would be to accept that a business whose task it is to act as an intermediary or broker between two clients – a producer and a consumer – who are both based outside the FSM would be assessed the Pohnpei first commercial sales tax, even if the tangible personal property never entered Pohnpei since this is the very heart and soul of international commerce. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 32 (Pon. 2011).

When a procurement contract clearly contemplated that the transaction would not be complete until Chuuk had had a chance to inspect, certify, and verify the goods which were the subject of the contract, and thereby accept them; when the procurement contract secured this by withholding payment of the final 25% of the contract amount until acceptance; when the risk of loss remained with the Pohnpei seller until the goods were duly delivered and accepted in Chuuk; and when, although Chuuk eventually paid for the shipping, the seller took on the initial burden and risk by paying for it up front, the locus of performance of the contract was in Chuuk. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 33-34 (Pon. 2011).

Retailers pass on sales taxes to their customers at the cash register, which is commonly and appropriately known as the point of sale. In such retail operations, a customer takes delivery of the goods and perhaps even inspects them at the point of sale. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 34 (Pon. 2011).

Goods cannot properly be deemed to have been sold until both parties to the sale have performed. Performance by the buyer requires payment in full or execution of some sort of instrument of credit which the seller is willing to accept in lieu of payment in full. Performance by the seller requires delivery.

Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 34 (Pon. 2011).

When the buyer, did not pay in full until it had a chance to inspect the goods at one of two specified warehouses in Chuuk and the seller did not complete performance until it had delivered the goods there, the goods were not sold until both performances were completed. Since the locus of performance was Chuuk, the locus of the transaction was likewise in Chuuk – i.e., the goods were sold in Chuuk and because the goods were sold in Chuuk, the Pohnpei state sales tax could not attach to the transaction. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 34 (Pon. 2011).

The Chuuk cigarette tax is part of a tax on the first sale in Chuuk of all tangible items, except unprocessed and unpackaged items. Cigarettes are taxed at the rate of two dollars per pack of 20 cigarettes or at a rate of 10 cents per one cigarette. The statute requires that all sellers keep accurate sales records of taxable sales and that they are to compute their tax liability from those records, and cigarettes are presumed sold within four months of receipt in Chuuk unless the importer can prove the contrary. The importer has the burden of overcoming this statutory presumption and proving that there were no taxable sales. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 153-54 (Chk. 2013).

Unless a cigarette importer produces evidence to overcome the Chuuk tax act's presumption that the cigarettes were sold after importation, the statutory presumption that he sold the cigarettes he brought into Chuuk would stand and he therefore would be liable to the state for the sales tax he should have collected from the buyers when the cigarettes were sold. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

The Chuuk State Tax Act of 2012 provides that if the taxes it imposes are due and unpaid, including penalties charged, the taxes are debts to the state and will constitute liens in favor of the state on all property belonging to the person, business, association, or corporation liable for the tax, and such taxes and penalties may be collected by levy upon such property in the manner as the levy of an execution. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

The Chuuk Legislature can grant a state administrative agency the power to levy in the manner of a levy of an execution for statutory liens held by the state so long as due process concerns are addressed by such mechanisms as a prompt post-levy (or post-execution) hearing being available. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

The determination of whether an assessment is a tax or a fee involves a three-part test that looks to different factors: 1) what entity imposes the charge; 2) what population is subject to the charge; and 3) what purposes are served by the use of the monies obtained by the charge. The classic tax is imposed by a legislature upon many, or all, citizens. It raises money contributed to a general fund, and spent for the benefit of the entire community. The classic regulatory fee is imposed by an agency upon those subject to its regulation. It may serve regulatory purposes indirectly by, for example, raising money placed in a special fund to help defray the agency's regulation-related expenses. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

When the health care assessments or premiums are not imposed by the Chuuk Legislature but are imposed by a public corporation, the Chuuk Health Care Plan through its Board and when the assessments or premiums are not deposited in the Chuuk General Fund but into a special trust fund, these attributes of the premium assessments are characteristic of a classic fee and the opposite of a classic tax. Even though the funds raised will be spent, at least indirectly, for the benefit of the entire Chuuk community since the funds will be spent for the benefit of people needing or using health care services, which is nearly everyone in Chuuk at one time or another, the premium assessments lie nearer the fee end of the spectrum than the tax end. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

Courts facing cases that lie near the mid-point of the spectrum between the classic tax and the classic fee have tended to emphasize the revenue's ultimate use, asking whether it provides a general benefit to the public of a sort often financed by a general tax, or whether it provides more narrow benefits to regulated companies or defrays the agency's costs of regulation. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

When the health insurance premiums and assessments are not raised for general revenue purposes and cannot be used for any Chuuk state government activity and can only be used for the purposes of the Health Care Plan Act and when the premiums or assessments help defray the cost of providing medical care, the benefits they provide are not of the sort often financed by a general tax. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

Generally, an assessment may be a fee rather than a tax when it is not used for general purposes but is used to defray the expense of performing the duties imposed on the agency and for the general purposes and expense of carrying an act into effect. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

A "fee" is a charge fixed by law for services of public officers and is regarded as compensation for services rendered, but a charge having no relation to services rendered, assessed to provide general revenue rather than compensation, is a "tax." Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 22 (App. 2015).

Any payment exacted by the state or its municipal subdivisions as a contribution toward the cost of maintaining governmental functions, where special benefits derived from their performance are merged in general benefit, is a "tax," while a "fee" is generally regarded as a charge for some particular service. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 22 (App. 2015).

The primary purpose of a "tax" is to obtain revenue for the government, while the primary purpose of a "fee" is to cover expense of providing a service or of regulation and supervision of certain activities. In distinguishing fees from taxes, fees are collected not to raise revenues but to compensate the governmental entity providing the services for its expenses. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 22-23 (App. 2015).

There is a three-part test to determine whether an assessment is a tax or a fee: 1) what entity imposes the charge; 2) what population is subject to the charge; and 3) what purposes are served by the use of the monies obtained by the charge. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23 (App. 2015).

Fees that are paid into the general public treasury, and disbursable for general public expenses, are taxes. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23 (App. 2015).

If the premiums collected were a tax, the funds would be deposited into the Chuuk treasury, which can only be appropriated by law for a public purpose. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23 (App. 2015).

When all revenues received under a system of medical or health insurance, and all other revenues received by the Health Department as payment for medicine and medical services, must be separated from any general fund established by the Legislature and used only for medical purposes, this supports the position that premiums collected by the insurance plan do not fall under the characteristics of a tax because the funds collected are mandated to be separated from other funds collected. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23-24 (App. 2015).

When, although it is the employed residents of Chuuk who are making health insurance premium contributions, the benefit of medicines and medical services are applied to the general public this would favor considering the payments a tax instead of a fee. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 24 (App. 2015).

Generally, an assessment may be a fee rather than a tax when it is not used for a general purpose but is used to defray the expense of performing the duties imposed on the agency and for the general purpose and expense of carrying an act into effect. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 24 (App. 2015).

The statutory scheme grants the national government the authority to determine the amount of tax due and to collect those taxes. Under 54 F.S.M.C. 152(3), the Secretary of Finance's assessment of the tax amount is presumed correct unless and until it is proven incorrect. The statutory scheme also permits a tax levy on the lien created by 54 F.S.M.C. 153. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125-26 (Pon. 2015).

It is not a bank's duty to challenge the tax authorities' assessment of the amount of tax due from a taxpayer depositor. It is the taxpayer's responsibility to dispute any tax assessed that it disagrees with and for the taxpayer to resolve the issue with the FSM tax authorities. It also is not the bank's responsibility to challenge the constitutionality of 54 F.S.M.C. 153 or the FSM's interpretation of that statute. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

Usually, notice and an opportunity to be heard is given prior to deprivation, but a government does not need to follow this in the case of taxes. The government must, however, provide a post-deprivation opportunity to challenge the tax and a clear and certain remedy. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

Judicial review of an adverse Secretary of Finance decision may be had by an aggrieved taxpayer filing a petition naming the Secretary or his successor in office as the defendant and setting forth assignments of all errors alleged to have been committed by the Secretary in his determination of the tax assessment, the facts relied upon to sustain such assignments of errors, and a prayer for appropriate relief. It will not be dismissed merely because it was labeled a "Complaint" and not called a "Petition" because, regardless of what a party has chosen to call the papers they have filed, those papers are what they are based on their function or the relief they seek, and the court must treat them as such. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 279, 280 (Pon. 2015).

When a complaint meets 54 F.S.M.C. 156(1)'s procedural requirements for judicial review of a tax assessment and when the relief that is prayed for is permitted by 6 F.S.M.C. 702(1) (claims for recovery of taxes and penalties) and possibly 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2), (4), and (5) (claims for damages from governmental actions), the court cannot say that it fails to state a claim for which the court can grant relief. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 279, 281 (Pon. 2015).

Since 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2) specifically waives the FSM's sovereign immunity for claims for damages, injunction, or mandamus arising out of alleged improper administration of FSM laws, the FSM has waived its sovereign immunity for a suit by a state alleging that the FSM failed to comply with the FSM Constitution's mandate that not less than 50% of the national tax revenues be paid into the treasury of the state where collected. Chuuk v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 373, 375 (Chk. 2016).

Since the national government, and therefore Congress, has no discretion but must remit the first 50% of the national tax collected to the state treasury of the state it was collected in, a dispute about that first 50% would not be a nonjusticiable political question, although a dispute over a percentage higher than 50% would be a nonjusticiable political question textually committed to a discretionary Congressional decision. Chuuk v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 373, 376 (Chk. 2016).

Under 54 F.S.M.C. 152(3), the Secretary of Finance's assessment of taxes is presumed correct unless and until it is proven incorrect. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 362 (App. 2017).

Title 54, chapter 3, the Corporate Income Tax Act of 2004, is the FSM's tax regime for major corporations, which are defined as those corporations that are not principally engaged in business in the Federated States of Micronesia as a bank, that were formed after January 1, 2005, and whose shareholders' equity or paid in capital is $1 million or more, or whose control group has a shareholders' equity or paid in capital of $10 million or more, or that are Title 37 captive insurance companies. These, otherwise foreign, entities incorporate in, and pay income taxes to, the FSM on their world-wide taxable revenue. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 89 (Chk. 2018).

The Constitution expressly grants the FSM national government the power to tax income, and the further provides that not less than 50% of the tax revenues be paid into the treasury of the state where collected. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 90 (Chk. 2018).

The Constitution's framers intended that at least half of all income taxes and import taxes received by the national government would be paid to the states. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 90-91 (Chk. 2018).

The Constitution's framers contemplated and created a system wherein (at least) half of the income tax money received by the national government would go into one or another state treasury. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 91 (Chk. 2018).

The revenue collected under Title 54, chapter 3 is from an income tax. These Title 54, chapter 3 major corporations' income taxes are paid to the FSM national government because these business entities, although they earn their revenue elsewhere in the world, are incorporated in the FSM. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 91 (Chk. 2018).

While the FSM's gross revenue tax (Title 54, chapter 1, subchapter IV) is imposed on the gross income that a business derived, or was presumed to have derived, from sources within the FSM, and not on revenue from sources elsewhere in the world, the major corporations that pay Title 54, chapter 3 income taxes, are generally exempt from the gross revenue tax, 54 F.S.M.C. 323, since they do not conduct business within the FSM, but are subject to taxation on income regardless of the location of the business activity that generated that income. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 91 (Chk. 2018).

The state share of a major corporation's income tax should be paid into state treasury of the state of incorporation and this share is determined after the Micronesia Registrar Advisor has first taken its percentage of the corporate income taxes paid by the major corporations it induced to incorporate in the FSM – the state's 50% share should be calculated from the net amount "collected" by the national government, that is, 50% of the amount of tax levied after the Registration Advisor's percentage is deducted. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 92 (Chk. 2018).

National government revenues derived from constitutional provisions other than its authority to tax income and imports, are not (with one exception) constitutionally subjected to revenue-sharing. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 93 (Chk. 2018).

Businesses are required by law to maintain both gross revenue and wage and salary information records. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 182 (Pon. 2019).

Department of Finance and Administration personnel cannot be required to produce in any court any matter or thing relating to the income taxes imposed except when it is necessary to do so for the purpose of enforcing the FSM tax laws. FSM Dev. Bank v. Salomon, 22 FSM R. 175, 183 (Pon. 2019).

Wages and salaries do not include any wages and salaries received by an employee, who is not an FSM citizen, while employed by an international organization, foreign contractor, or other foreign entity performing services or otherwise conducting business in furtherance of a foreign aid agreement entered into by the FSM, the terms of which require that such wages and salaries will not be subject to taxation by the FSM government. Basu v. Amor, 22 FSM R. 557, 565 (Pon. 2020).

Generally, an employer is required to withhold the wages and salaries tax from its employees' pay, and the penalties and interest imposed for the failure to withhold the wages and salaries tax from an employee's pay are imposed upon the employer, not the taxpayer. Basu v. Amor, 22 FSM R. 557, 567 (Pon. 2020).

– Constitutionality

State excise tax which levies tax at the port of entry on items imported into a state and which must be paid prior to release of those items from the port of entry, is an import tax within the meaning of FSM Constitution article IX, section 2(d). Wainit v. Truk (II), 2 FSM R. 86, 87 (Truk 1985).

The tax on gross revenues falls squarely within the constitutional authorization given to Congress by article IX, section 2(e) to tax income. Ponape Federation of Coop. Ass'ns v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 124, 126 (Pon. 1985).

That Congress may tax "gross income" is plainly and unmistakably provided for in the words of article IX, section 2(e) of the Constitution. Ponape Federation of Coop. Ass'ns v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 124, 127 (Pon. 1985).

The national power to impose taxes based on imports is exclusive, and not shared by the states. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 182 (App. 1986).

Taxes imposed on goods because of their entry into a port of entry of the State of Truk, levied at the port of entry in amounts based upon the quality or value of imported goods, and which must be paid to the Division of Revenue prior to release of the items from the port of entry, are taxes based on imports. Such a tax represents an effort to exercise powers expressly delegated to the national government, is beyond the powers of the state, and is null and void. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 183-84 (App. 1986).

Although retroactive application of a decision holding a state tax unconstitutional would impose hardship upon a state, where funds collected under the tax have already been committed, such a result is not inequitable where the state legislature pushed on with the tax act despite the strong resistance of business people to the tax in the form of a petition and establishment of an escrow account to hold contested payments, and a veto message by the governor of the state, and there is no evidence that the legislature seriously considered the constitutionality of the legislation. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 186 (App. 1986).

Taxation of gross revenue of business at different amounts and rates depending upon the amount of each business's annual gross revenue is rationally related to the legitimate legislative purposes of requiring businesses who receive less to pay lower tax and of administrative simplicity and therefore does not violate the due process or equal protection provisions of the FSM Constitution. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 263 (Truk 1986).

The power granted to Congress by FSM Constitution article IX, section 2(e) "to impose taxes on income" includes the power to tax gross revenue. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 264 (Truk 1986).

There is no evidence in the journal of the Constitutional Convention that the phrase "to impose taxes on income" in FSM Constitution, article IX, section 2(e) was derived from the sixteenth amendment of the United States Constitution which permits the United States Congress to "lay and collect taxes on income" so in determining the meaning of the Federated States of Micronesia constitutional provision, no particular weight should be given to the United States cases. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 264 (Truk 1986).

A state excise tax imposed on imports is unconstitutional, regardless of the manner of tax payment. Gimnang v. Yap, 4 FSM R. 212, 215 (Yap 1990).

When the record is barren of any relationship between the license fee imposed and the business regulation or licensing objectives and the fee is exacted for the sole purpose of granting a business permission to do business and possesses no attributes of a licensing statute, a municipality's power and authority to impose tax on the income of a business are foreclosed. Bruton v. Moen, 5 FSM R. 9, 12 (Chk. 1991).

The power of the national government under article IX, section 2(e) of the Constitution, "to impose taxes on income," is an exclusive national power that may not be exercised by the states. Youngstrom v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 73, 74 (Kos. 1991).

The Kosrae transaction tax of KC 9.301 is a selective tax rather than an income tax and is not an encroachment upon the national government's exclusive power to tax income. Youngstrom v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 73, 76 (Kos. 1991).

A municipal license fee ordinance which separately defines banking and insurance businesses and specifically imposes a different rate upon those businesses than would be imposed upon other kinds of businesses on its face appears to be an effort to regulate banking and insurance and is unconstitutional and void. Actouka v. Kolonia Town, 5 FSM R. 121, 122 (Pon. 1991).

The national government has the exclusive power to tax income and imports. The power to levy other taxes, unless specifically barred by the Constitution, is an exclusive state power. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 168, 169-70 (App. 1993).

A transaction tax oriented toward individual transactions and not total income, and only triggered by the transactions it covers, even though paid by the vendor, is analogous to a selective sales tax and is not an unconstitutional encroachment on the national government's exclusive power to tax income. Sigrah v. Kosrae, 6 FSM R. 168, 170 (App. 1993).

A Chuuk state tax on a lessor or landowner who rents or leases land, building or housing unit, for residential, or office space, or other use is not an unconstitutional encroachment on the national government's exclusive power to tax income. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 6 FSM R. 310, 311 (Chk. 1994).

The Constitution prohibits state and local governments from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 312, 313 (Chk. 1994).

Since, given the social and geographic configuration of the State of Chuuk and the structure of the transportation services available, a travel agency would necessarily be essentially interstate commerce, a tax aimed solely at a travel agency restricts or is restrictive of interstate commerce and therefore may not be levied by a state or local government. Stinnett v. Weno, 6 FSM R. 312, 313-14 (Chk. 1994).

Only the national government may constitutionally tax income. The states' taxing power does not include the power to tax income. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 117, 119 (App. 1995).

If a state wishes to obtain funding from a consumption tax, it can avoid a constitutional confrontation by making the taxable incident the sale or rental transaction, and by expressing the requirement that the tax be paid by the consumer. Therefore a state tax on the gross rental receipts of a landlord is an unconstitutional tax on income. Truk Continental Hotel, Inc. v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 117, 120 (App. 1995).

The general grant of the taxing power to the state, which allows taxing power to be delegated to the municipalities, is not an exclusive grant preventing municipalities from levying taxes. Wainit v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 121, 123 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A municipality in Chuuk has the power to tax so long as the state has not preempted the area. Wainit v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 121, 123 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The power to tax is vested in the state which may delegate certain taxing powers to a municipality.

Without such delegation a municipality has no power to tax. Stinnett v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 560, 561 (Chk. 1996).

A municipal ordinance levying taxes did not continue in effect after the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution because it is inconsistent with that Constitution. Stinnett v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 560, 562 (Chk. 1996).

A litigant may seek a declaratory judgment without first exhausting its administrative remedies where the jurisdiction of the taxing authorities is challenged on the ground that the statute is unconstitutional or that the statute by its own terms does not apply in a given case. Dorval Tankship Pty, Ltd. v. Department of Finance, 8 FSM R. 111, 115 (Chk. 1997).

The language, "and may delegate certain taxing powers to the municipal governments by statute," contemplates that municipal governments are invested with the power to tax only insofar as they receive that power from the state government. Without express delegation to a municipality of the authority to tax, the municipality lacked this power. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

The Chuuk Constitution provides for the creation of the state taxing power and its delegation, as the state government may elect, to the municipal governments. Article XIII, section 1 of the Chuuk Constitution provides that the two levels of government are state and municipal. As between these two levels of government the one holding the right to delegate is superior. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

Because the express provision for delegation of the taxing authority is inconsistent with the notion that municipalities already had this power, in the absence of specific legislative action authorizing a municipality to impose taxes, the municipality does not have the authority to impose business license fees. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

When the Chuuk Constitution says the state "may delegate certain taxing powers to the municipal governments by statute," it is plain that "certain" in this context means nothing more, and nothing less, than that the state government may delegate such of its taxing powers as it sees fit – the point is that the option is the state government's. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 207 (App. 1999).

The only conclusion to be fairly drawn from the deletion of a sentence giving the municipal governments the exclusive power to levy head taxes and business license fees from the proposal as adopted is that the Chuuk Constitution's framers did not intend that the municipal governments should have the power to levy head taxes and business license fees. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 208 (App. 1999).

Because a man who denies the legality of a tax should have a clear and certain remedy, justice may require that he should be at liberty to pay promptly and bring suit on his side. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 212 (App. 1999).

The filing of a suit to contest the legality of a tax, which the trial court found to be the plaintiffs' only remedy, obviates the need for demonstrating duress and notice of protest, as required by the common law, for payments made after suit is instigated. The filing of suit is protest of the most emphatic sort, and allowing a claim for recovery for payments made thereafter without regard to duress recognizes the "implied duress" under which contested taxes are paid. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 212 (App. 1999).

Duress and protest need not be shown to state a claim for recovery of tax payments extracted under an unconstitutional enactment when the plaintiffs seek refund of payments made after instigation of suit in a court having jurisdiction over the parties, and when such a lawsuit is the plaintiff's only remedy. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 212 (App. 1999).

The taxing authority, if it opts not to provide predeprivation process, must by way of postdeprivation process provide a clear and certain remedy for any erroneous or unlawful tax collection to ensure that the opportunity to contest the tax is a meaningful one. A clear and certain remedy is one designed to render the opportunity to challenge a tax meaningful by preventing any permanent unlawful deprivation of property. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 213 (App. 1999).

When deciding the question of retroactivity of a decision declaring a tax unconstitutional, a court considers three factors: 1) whether a decision enunciates a new and unanticipated principle; 2) whether retroactive application to this case would promote implementation of the rule at issue, taking into consideration the rule's history; and 3) the equities of the case as they are associated with retroactive application. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 214 (App. 1999).

Because the Chuuk Constitution is clear that only the state government has the power to tax, it cannot be said that such a resolution could not be predicted. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 214 (App. 1999).

To permit taxes to be retained that were extracted under an unconstitutional statute would have the effect of prolonging the viability of an ordinance that runs afoul of the Chuuk Constitution, at the expense of establishing the correct rule. The better course is to permit recovery of the taxes. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 214 (App. 1999).

When litigation over the constitutionality of a municipality's taxes was pending for five years, the municipality was put on notice early on that the taxes collected under the ordinances were subject to a claim for refund, and nothing prevented the municipality from planning for this eventuality. Having failed to do so, it cannot now claim hardship. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 214 (App. 1999).

A state use tax is a tax on imports which impermissibly interferes with interstate commerce such that the use tax is in violation of the FSM Constitution, FSM Const. art. IX, §§ 2(d), 2(g); FSM Const. art. VIII, § 3. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 292, 294 (Pon. 1999).

For tax purposes, Telecom is deemed to be part of the national government and is exempt from any and all state tax liability because it functions are so closely intertwined with the national government that it is appropriate to view it as a national government agency for the purpose of taxation and because, although the FSM Constitution does not specifically delegate the power to establish a telecommunications network to the national government, the circumstances presently existing in the FSM support a conclusion that such a power is of an indisputably national character beyond the control of any state. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 384 (Pon. 2000).

Because the FSM Constitution expressly delegates to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce and because the existence, availability and quality of telecommunication services in the FSM clearly impacts on interstate commerce, the FSM government is constitutionally authorized to establish the FSM Telecommunications Corporation and may similarly exempt it from taxes or assessments. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 384 (Pon. 2000).

A state "use tax" that instead of collecting the tax at the port in order to release the goods, requires the taxpayer to fill out a form prior to release of the goods after which collection of the assessment is deferred for sixty days, is, despite its name, a tax on imports and an unauthorized action to usurp the national government's exclusive power to impose taxes, duties, and tariffs based on imports. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 386 (Pon. 2000).

A state "use tax" calculated on the value of items brought into the state plus the cost of shipping, handling, insurance, labor or service cost, transportation charges or any expenses whatsoever, has nothing to do with benefits provided by the state associated with the use of the item and cannot be justified as having a substantial nexus with the state. It only serves as an unauthorized burden on interstate commerce. FSM Telecomm. Corp. v. Department of Treasury, 9 FSM R. 380, 386 (Pon. 2000).

Imposing taxes, duties, and tariffs based on imports is a power expressly delegated to Congress. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 579 (App. 2000).

When "commencement of use or consumption" equals importation as it applies to the nonexempt merchandise subject to a use tax, any semantic distinction resulting from making the tax payable upon "commencement of use or consumption" does not render it any less a tax on imports because the name given a tax by a taxing authority is not controlling and because extending the time for payment to 60 days after importation does not change the nature of the tax. The Pohnpei use tax violates the constitutional reservation to Congress of the power to tax imports. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 581 (App. 2000).

As to interstate commerce, Article VIII, section 3 contains the negative counterpart to Article IX, section 2(g)'s positive grant of power by prohibiting state and local governments from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 582 (App. 2000).

Since the event triggering the Pohnpei use tax is the unqualified "use or consumption" in Pohnpei of nonexempt goods, the statute applies to goods brought into Pohnpei from Yap, Chuuk, and Kosrae, as well as from locations outside the FSM. It is thus clear that the statute directly regulates or restricts interstate commerce in the same way it does imports. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 582 (App. 2000).

As to goods making their way from any of the other three states into Pohnpei, the direct nexus between the simultaneous arrival of the goods and imposition of the Pohnpei use tax points to direct regulation of interstate commerce. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 582 (App. 2000).

Even assuming that the Pohnpei use tax apportionment clause could be interpreted to remedy concerns about discrimination against interstate commerce, the fact remains that the use tax is indissolubly linked to the event of importation, and no semantic calisthenics liberate the tax from this inherent defect. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 583 (App. 2000).

A state tax that is unconstitutional as an import tax, if applied to interstate commerce, is also restrictive of interstate commerce. The Constitution does not permit a state to erect tax barriers to the free movement of goods among the states. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 583 (App. 2000).

A state use tax that is a tax on imports in violation of Article IX, section 2(d); and that regulates and restricts interstate commerce in violation of Article IX, Section 2(g), and Article VIII, section 3, respectively of the FSM Constitution contravenes the Constitution. Department of Treasury v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 9 FSM R. 575, 583 (App. 2000).

A state alcoholic beverage possession tax for which liability is triggered by the act of importation although actual payment may be delayed five days, is an import tax, and as such unconstitutional. MGM Import-Export Co. v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 42, 44 (Chk. 2001).

The Chuuk Constitution bans taxes on real property. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 69 n.6 (Chk. 2003).

When Continental has alleged a sufficient stake in the action's outcome and is threatened not only with substantial costs if it complies but also with civil and criminal penalties if it does not and these threatened injuries are all traceable to the Chuuk service tax and would be addressed by a favorable decision, it may therefore challenge the legal requirement that it collect the tax (and remit it to the State) even if technically, only the statutorily defined taxpayer has the legal ability to challenge the tax's validity. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 159 (Chk. 2010).

When Chuuk made the taxable incident the purchase of a plane ticket or of freight service and made the tax payable by the purchaser, it avoided one constitutional confrontation – the service tax is not an income tax since the service tax is a tax on the buyer, not the seller. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2010).

A service tax on plane passengers does not have only an incidental effect on foreign commerce; its only effect is on foreign commerce. A tax on shipping cargo or freight affects only foreign commerce or interstate commerce since the airline does not fly to anywhere in Chuuk except Weno. Since state and local governments are prohibited from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce, to the extent that the tax is imposed on freight or cargo shipped from Chuuk to other FSM states, would appear to be specifically barred by the Constitution and to the extent it is imposed on cargo or freight shipped elsewhere, it would be regulation of foreign commerce – in effect, an export tax. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 160 (Chk. 2010).

When the FSM Supreme Court appellate division has held that if a state wishes to obtain funding from a consumption tax, it can avoid a constitutional confrontation by making the taxable incident the sale or rental transaction, and by expressing the requirement that the tax be paid by the consumer and when the Chuuk service tax makes the taxable incident the purchase of a plane ticket or the purchase of freight service and expresses the requirement that the tax be paid by the purchaser, the Chuuk service tax, as applied to Continental, is not an unconstitutional income tax. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 531 (Chk. 2011).

The Chuuk service tax on plane passengers does not have only an incidental effect on foreign commerce. Its main effect (and its sole intended effect) is on foreign commerce. By its terms, it is to be imposed only on those passengers whose "final destination" would be "outside of the FSM." The Chuuk service tax on outgoing paying airline passengers is thus an unconstitutional regulation of foreign commerce. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 531-32 (Chk. 2011).

The tax on shipping air cargo or air freight on Continental affects only foreign commerce or interstate commerce, and since state governments are prohibited from imposing taxes which restrict interstate commerce, to the extent that it is imposed on freight or cargo shipped from Chuuk to other FSM states, the Chuuk service tax would be specifically barred by the Constitution, and to the extent the tax is imposed on cargo or freight shipped elsewhere, it would be regulation of foreign commerce – an export regulation and tax. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 533 (Chk. 2011).

Even if the Chuuk service taxes on air passenger tickets and courier services were not unconstitutional taxes, they would still be invalid when the regulatory enforcement and interpretation of the service tax statute exceeded or limited that statute's reach. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 533 (Chk. 2011).

Even if Pohnpei cannot assess a first commercial sale tax against a business and that business benefits from the business environment which the State of Pohnpei has provided, Pohnpei may recoup the costs of providing infrastructure and business environment through the gross revenue tax. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 32 (Pon. 2011).

Since the term "within the state" in the Pohnpei tax statute modifies the term "sold commercially," the tax would attach only to those sales that are completed within the state. Under such an interpretation the tax would attach only to in-state commercial transactions and the impact on interstate commerce would be minimal and the statute therefore constitutional. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 33 (Pon. 2011).

Because sales taxes paid to Nett under protest depend on the validity of the Pohnpei state tax, Nett and Pohnpei are, jointly and severally, liable for the amount paid to Nett under protest, plus statutory interest. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 34 (Pon. 2011).

Generally, the court avoids unnecessary constitutional adjudication. Thus, when the court has resolved the underlying administrative appeal without the need to address the constitutionality of Pohnpei's tax statute, any declaratory relief as to the tax statute's constitutionality would be inappropriate. Genesis Pharmacy v. Department of Treasury & Admin., 18 FSM R. 27, 35 (Pon. 2011).

A tax computed as a percentage of any form of income is a tax on that income. Only the national government can impose a tax on income. A state cannot impose a tax on income. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 18 FSM R. 501, 506 (Chk. 2013).

When the State Tax Act provides that no person shall have a right of action to challenge the validity of any tax levied by the Act unless that person first pays to the state the tax in question, under protest, and when the state has seized by tax levy $2,931.29, and the state rightly considers that seizure to be a partial payment under protest, the court, without having to analyze it further, unquestionably has jurisdiction over a challenge to the cigarette tax because a cigarette tax payment was made under protest. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 152 (Chk. 2013).

Only the national government can impose taxes on imports and no state may impose taxes that restrict interstate commerce. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 153 (Chk. 2013).

Since imported cigarettes are not taxable unless sold (or presumed sold) and may be nontaxable if not, the Chuuk cigarette tax appears to be a sales tax and not an import tax because the taxable event is their sale not their importation. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

If the Chuuk cigarette tax is imposed on the buyer (customer) and collected by the seller from the buyer for remittance to the state, then the tax statute was carefully crafted to avoid constitutional infirmity. The hallmark of a constitutionally sound state sales tax is that the sale is the taxable incident and the tax is paid by the buyer – the customer or consumer – and not the seller; otherwise it is an unconstitutional income tax. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 154 (Chk. 2013).

Since the Chuuk health care premium assessments are used for the care of the ill and injured and for the general purpose and expense of carrying the Chuuk Health Care Plan Act into effect and since, weighing all the attributes of the Plan's current assessment of Chuuk health care premiums and looking at the totality of the circumstances, the Plan's payroll assessment, even though calculated as a percentage of wages and salaries, is a fee and not a tax. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 19 FSM R. 185, 190 (Chk. 2013).

When the purpose of the collected funds is specifically for health and medical services and the Chuuk Legislature cannot appropriate the funds collected as premiums and use those funds for other public purposes and when, although the medical services are applied to the general public, the insurance premiums collected are not a tax and thus the method used to calculate premiums is not an unconstitutional tax on income. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 24 (App. 2015).

Taxing income and taxing imports are both powers reserved exclusively to the national government, and therefore forbidden to municipal governments. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57 (Pon. 2015).

When a hotel owner with 10 rooms pays the same $50 business license fee annually regardless of how much or how little income is derived from that hotel; when a hotel owner with 31 rooms pays the same $300 regardless of how much or how little income those 31 rooms actually generate; and when, if the owner of a 31-room hotel adds five more rooms and generates even more income, the owner would still pay only $300 annually for a business license, the license fees, even though those license fees are actually taxes, are not taxes on income. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57 (Pon. 2015).

A municipal "road service" fee is not a tax on imports since it does not vary based on the amount or value of the goods brought into the municipality and since it does it vary based on the origin of those goods. It is a flat annual fee or a tax that does not violate the Constitution's prohibition of local taxes which restrict interstate commerce because the road service fee does not restrict or hinder interstate commerce or impose an import tax, but it does restrict or hinder intrastate or inter-municipal commerce, a type of commerce the FSM Constitution does not grant the national government the power to regulate. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57-58 (Pon. 2015).

The constitutional command that all national taxes be "imposed uniformly" is not a prerequisite for revenue-sharing only. It commands Congress impose all taxes uniformly. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 93 (Chk. 2018).

The major corporation income tax complies with the constitutional command that national taxes be "uniformly imposed." Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 93 (Chk. 2018).

The FSM major corporation income tax rate is a national tax – a tax imposed by the national government pursuant to the national government's constitutional power to tax income. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 93 (Chk. 2018).

The national government has the power to impose only two types of taxes – that based on imports and that on income. Chuuk v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 85, 93 (Chk. 2018).

– License and Permit Fees

A municipality may legislate and impose licensing fees to regulate activities within its jurisdiction subject to a requirement that the licensing fee at least tends to promote the public health, morals, safety or welfare. Bruton v. Moen, 5 FSM R. 9, 12 (Chk. 1991).

When the record is barren of any relationship between the license fee imposed and the business regulation or licensing objectives and the fee is exacted for the sole purpose of granting a business permission to do business and possesses no attributes of a licensing statute, a municipality's power and authority to impose tax on the income of a business are foreclosed. Bruton v. Moen, 5 FSM R. 9, 12 (Chk. 1991).

A municipal license fee ordinance which separately defines banking and insurance businesses and specifically imposes a different rate upon those businesses than would be imposed upon other kinds of businesses on its face appears to be an effort to regulate banking and insurance and is unconstitutional and void. Actouka v. Kolonia Town, 5 FSM R. 121, 122 (Pon. 1991).

The following factors are relevant to determining whether fishing fees are taxes: 1) the source of the levy – whether the entity imposing the tax is legislative or administrative; 2) the effect of the levy on the general public – whether the assessment is imposed upon a broad or narrow class; 3) the means by which the levy is made – whether it is voluntary, and produces a benefit to the payor which is commensurate with the payment; and 4) the relationship between the levy and government costs – whether the revenue generated bears a relationship to the costs of the government in administering the particular program. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 382-83 (Pon. 1998).

Cases distinguishing between taxes and fees often examine the source of the levy as an indicator of whether the particular payment should be considered a tax or a fee. An assessment imposed directly by the legislature is more likely to be a tax than one imposed by an administrative agency. The classic tax is imposed by a legislature upon many, or all citizens; the classic regulatory fee is imposed by an agency on those subject to its regulation. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 383 (Pon. 1998).

Courts also consider whether a governmental levy is directed at the general public, or whether it is imposed on a discrete subsection of the public, in distinguishing between a tax and a fee. An assessment imposed on a broad class of parties is more likely to be a tax than one imposed on a narrow class. One distinguishing characteristic of a fee is that the public agency normally may exact a fee for a grant which, presumably, bestows a benefit on the applicant, not shared by other members of society. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 383 (Pon. 1998).

Another distinction between a tax and a fee is whether the levy is exacted voluntarily in exchange for a benefit to the payor. Taxation is a legislative function, and Congress, which is the sole organ for levying taxes, may act arbitrarily and disregard benefits bestowed by the Government on a taxpayer and go solely on ability to pay, based on property or income. A fee, however, is incident to a voluntary act, e.g., a request that a public agency permit an applicant to practice law or medicine or construct a house or run a broadcast station. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 384 (Pon. 1998).

One characteristic of a fee is that it must be no greater than the government's costs, but in considering costs it is appropriate to consider the government's "real cost," which is not limited to the government's actual expenditures. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 384 (Pon. 1998).

A fee for use of property which is controlled by the government is not necessarily a tax, because the government is entitled to receive the benefits of its property just like any private landowner. As a sovereign, the government levies taxes, but as property owner it may charge fees for the use of its property. These fees are paid by choice and in exchange for a particular benefit, the use of government property, just as rents are freely paid for the use of private property. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 385 (Pon. 1998).

The level of fishing fees is set at a measure of the value of the asset to the payor, a percentage of the value of the estimated weighted catch. The measure of the value of the service to the payor can be an appropriate measure for a fee. That the value received by the government exceeds the cost of administration is not dispositive when a valuable resource is being removed from the government's control by fishing fees payors. The government is entitled to compensation for its asset like any private property owner. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 385-86 (Pon. 1998).

The FSM Constitution contains a provision by which the net revenues from offshore mineral resources are to be divided equally between the states and the national government, FSM Const. art. IX, § 6. There would be no need to specify the division of income from such resources if such revenues were taxes to be automatically divided under article IX, section 5. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386 (Pon. 1998).

Revenues from natural resources are not taxes. The constitutional definition of tax was not meant to include amounts received by the national government from disposal of natural resources over which it has control. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 8 FSM R. 353, 386-87 (Pon. 1998).

A four-part analysis is applied to determine whether fishing fees are taxes: 1) the source of the levy, 2) the effect of the levy on the general public, 3) the means by which the levy is made, and 4) the relationship between the levy and government costs. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

Whether fishing fees are uniform is immaterial to a finding that fishing fees do not constitute a tax. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

How Congress appropriates fishing fees is irrelevant to whether they are a tax. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

The FSM national government has the exclusive right to regulate and harvest living marine resources in the EEZ and is therefore entitled to a reasonable compensation from those whom it allows to share that right. A determination of ownership of the living marine resources does not affect the national government's right. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 99, 102 (Pon. 1999).

Chuuk municipalities are barred from imposing taxes except as specifically permitted by state statute. Municipalities have been delegated, by statute, the authority to require persons to obtain and pay for a business license before engaging or continuing in a business within the municipality in which the business is located. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 358 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the state statute authorizing municipal tax powers reserved the state's right to enact legislation to assess, levy and collect taxes on any subject for which a tax has been assessed and levied by municipal ordinance and provided that in the event that the state enacted legislation on that same subject, the enactment would repeal the ordinance on the same subject, and when the state has in fact enacted legislation imposing fees on businesses engaged in alcoholic beverage sales, any municipal ordinance imposing business license fees on businesses engaged in alcoholic beverage sales is repealed and a municipality does not have the authority to impose business license fees or taxes on alcoholic beverage sellers. Ceasar v. Uman Municipality, 12 FSM R. 354, 358-59 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A "fee" is a charge fixed by law for services of public officers and is regarded as compensation for services rendered, but a charge having no relation to services rendered, assessed to provide general revenue rather than compensation, is a "tax." Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 22 (App. 2015).

Any payment exacted by the state or its municipal subdivisions as a contribution toward the cost of maintaining governmental functions, where special benefits derived from their performance are merged in general benefit, is a "tax," while a "fee" is generally regarded as a charge for some particular service. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 22 (App. 2015).

The primary purpose of a "tax" is to obtain revenue for the government, while the primary purpose of a "fee" is to cover expense of providing a service or of regulation and supervision of certain activities. In distinguishing fees from taxes, fees are collected not to raise revenues but to compensate the governmental entity providing the services for its expenses. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 22-23 (App. 2015).

There is a three-part test to determine whether an assessment is a tax or a fee: 1) what entity imposes the charge; 2) what population is subject to the charge; and 3) what purposes are served by the use of the monies obtained by the charge. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23 (App. 2015).

Fees that are paid into the general public treasury, and disbursable for general public expenses, are taxes. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23 (App. 2015).

If the premiums collected were a tax, the funds would be deposited into the Chuuk treasury, which can only be appropriated by law for a public purpose. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23 (App. 2015).

When all revenues received under a system of medical or health insurance, and all other revenues received by the Health Department as payment for medicine and medical services, must be separated from any general fund established by the Legislature and used only for medical purposes, this supports the position that premiums collected by the insurance plan do not fall under the characteristics of a tax because the funds collected are mandated to be separated from other funds collected. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 23-24 (App. 2015).

When, although it is the employed residents of Chuuk who are making health insurance premium contributions, the benefit of medicines and medical services are applied to the general public this would favor considering the payments a tax instead of a fee. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 24 (App. 2015).

Generally, an assessment may be a fee rather than a tax when it is not used for a general purpose but is used to defray the expense of performing the duties imposed on the agency and for the general purpose and expense of carrying an act into effect. Mailo v. Chuuk Health Care Plan, 20 FSM R. 18, 24 (App. 2015).

Pohnpei state law provides that wholesalers and taxi services operating in more than one local government jurisdiction do not have to pay a fee in other than the local jurisdiction where their business establishment is located and that local governments cannot levy business license fees on businesses that do not have any business establishment located within their territory. A "business establishment" is a permanent physical structure operating as a business, and a vehicle does not constitute a business establishment unless such vehicle is fixed in a permanent location. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 56 (Pon. 2015).

A characteristic of a fee is that it must be no greater than the government's costs – the government's "real cost," which is not limited to the government's actual expenditures. Taxation is a legislative function generally to raise revenue, and the legislature may act arbitrarily and disregard benefits bestowed by the government on a taxpayer and go solely on the taxpayer's ability to pay. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57 (Pon. 2015).

When a municipality's business license fees are set arbitrarily at the municipal legislature's prerogative and go on the fee-payer's ability to pay, the license fees are revenue-raising taxes. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57 (Pon. 2015).

When a hotel owner with 10 rooms pays the same $50 business license fee annually regardless of how much or how little income is derived from that hotel; when a hotel owner with 31 rooms pays the same $300 regardless of how much or how little income those 31 rooms actually generate; and when, if the owner of a 31-room hotel adds five more rooms and generates even more income, the owner would still pay only $300 annually for a business license, the license fees, even though those license fees are actually taxes, are not taxes on income. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57 (Pon. 2015).

A municipal "road service" fee is not a tax on imports since it does not vary based on the amount or value of the goods brought into the municipality and since it does it vary based on the origin of those goods. It is a flat annual fee or a tax that does not violate the Constitution's prohibition of local taxes which restrict interstate commerce because the road service fee does not restrict or hinder interstate commerce or impose an import tax, but it does restrict or hinder intrastate or inter-municipal commerce, a type of commerce the FSM Constitution does not grant the national government the power to regulate. Isamu Nakasone Store v. David, 20 FSM R. 53, 57-58 (Pon. 2015).

– Recovery of Taxes

The question whether taxes paid by plaintiffs under a taxing statute subsequently found to be unconstitutional may be refunded to them turns upon whether the tax was voluntarily paid. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 187 (App. 1986).

Where taxpayers informed the government that they protested the tax as unconstitutional, and had to pay the tax in order to receive the taxed property, the payments are coerced, not voluntary, and taxpayers are entitled to the refund of all amounts paid. Innocenti v. Wainit, 2 FSM R. 173, 187 (App. 1986).

The FSM Supreme Court will abstain from a claim for recovery of taxes where the defendant state requests abstention, the claim is for monetary relief, and the state has endeavored to develop a body of law in the areas of excise taxes and sovereign immunity. Gimnang v. Yap, 4 FSM R. 212, 214 (Yap 1990).

Under traditional constitutional analysis, taxpayers' efforts to recover tax moneys unlawfully extracted from them by a state may be relegated to state procedures and decision-makers so long as there is a reasonable procedure under state law whereby the taxpayer may obtain meaningful relief. Gimnang v. Yap, 5 FSM R. 13, 23-24 (App. 1991).

Prior to November 25, 1986, a plaintiff had a common law right to recover taxes paid pursuant to an unconstitutional Yap statute if he could show payment was made under duress and under protest. Gimnang v. Yap, 7 FSM R. 606, 607, 610-11 (Yap S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

After November 25, 1986, a claim for recovery of taxes paid under an unconstitutional Yap statute is subject to a two-year statute of limitations. Gimnang v. Yap, 7 FSM R. 606, 607, 611 (Yap S. Ct. Tr. 1996).

The general rule is that to entitle a taxpayer to a refund of a tax paid pursuant to an unconstitutional law, the tax must have been paid under duress and protest. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 125 (Chk. 1997).

Refund of taxes paid pursuant to an unconstitutional ordinance is an action for restitution, not damages. The principles governing recovery of payment which preclude recovery of voluntary payments are applicable to the recovery of tax payments. The "voluntary payment rule" has barred recovery in restitution. The general rule is that money paid voluntarily under a claim of right to the payment, and with knowledge of the facts by the person making the payment, cannot be recovered back on the ground that the claim was illegal. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 125 (Chk. 1997).

The reason the voluntary payment rule bars recovery in restitution of unlawful taxes is that litigation should precede payment. It thus does not apply to payments made after the commencement of litigation because the rule ceases with the reason on which it is founded. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 125-26 (Chk. 1997).

Normally, notice and an opportunity to be heard is given prior to governmental deprivation of property, but governments need not follow this in the case of taxes. Governments must, however, provide a post-deprivation opportunity to challenge the tax and a clear and certain remedy. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 126 (Chk. 1997).

It is unavailing in tax cases, except in special circumstances, to seek a preliminary injunction against enforcement or to have the taxes escrowed pending the outcome. This is in order not to disrupt the financial stability of the governmental unit. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 127 (Chk. 1997).

Refund of taxes unlawfully paid after commencement of suit is favored by the Innocenti guidelines concerning retrospective application of court decisions where the court decision was clearly foreshadowed by the Chuuk Constitutional provision, where there was no merit to be found in preventing the taxpayers from recovering unlawful taxes paid after the institution of litigation, and where the equitable considerations favor the taxpayers. Chuuk Chamber of Commerce v. Weno, 8 FSM R. 122, 127-28 (Chk. 1997).

For a plaintiff to recover payments made under an unconstitutional tax statute, he must demonstrate that he made those payments under both duress and notice of protest. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 211 (App. 1999).

Because a man who denies the legality of a tax should have a clear and certain remedy, justice may require that he should be at liberty to pay promptly and bring suit on his side. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 212 (App. 1999).

The filing of a suit to contest the legality of a tax, which the trial court found to be the plaintiffs' only remedy, obviates the need for demonstrating duress and notice of protest, as required by the common law, for payments made after suit is instigated. The filing of suit is protest of the most emphatic sort, and allowing a claim for recovery for payments made thereafter without regard to duress recognizes the "implied duress" under which contested taxes are paid. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 212 (App. 1999).

Duress and protest need not be shown to state a claim for recovery of tax payments extracted under an unconstitutional enactment when the plaintiffs seek refund of payments made after instigation of suit in a court having jurisdiction over the parties, and when such a lawsuit is the plaintiff's only remedy. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 212 (App. 1999).

The taxing authority, if it opts not to provide predeprivation process, must by way of postdeprivation process provide a clear and certain remedy for any erroneous or unlawful tax collection to ensure that the opportunity to contest the tax is a meaningful one. A clear and certain remedy is one designed to render the opportunity to challenge a tax meaningful by preventing any permanent unlawful deprivation of property. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 213 (App. 1999).

Because the Chuuk Constitution is clear that only the state government has the power to tax, it cannot be said that such a resolution could not be predicted. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 214 (App. 1999).

To permit taxes to be retained that were extracted under an unconstitutional statute would have the effect of prolonging the viability of an ordinance that runs afoul of the Chuuk Constitution, at the expense of establishing the correct rule. The better course is to permit recovery of the taxes. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 214 (App. 1999).

When litigation over the constitutionality of a municipality's taxes was pending for five years, the municipality was put on notice early on that the taxes collected under the ordinances were subject to a claim for refund, and nothing prevented the municipality from planning for this eventuality. Having failed to do so, it cannot now claim hardship. Weno v. Stinnett, 9 FSM R. 200, 214 (App. 1999).

If a taxing authority chooses not to provide a pre-deprivation process, it must by way of a post-deprivation process provide a clear and certain remedy for any erroneous or unlawful tax collection to ensure that the opportunity to contest the tax is a meaningful one. A clear and certain remedy is one designed to render the opportunity to challenge a tax meaningful by preventing any permanent unlawful deprivation of property. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 158 (Chk. 2010).

There is no meaningful clear and certain post-deprivation remedy available to a Chuuk taxpayer when Chuuk's financial situation and its general inability to satisfy any court judgment make any purported post-deprivation remedy very unlikely. Thus any unlawful deprivation of a taxpayer's property would essentially be permanent and the opportunity to later contest the service tax would not be a meaningful one. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 152, 158 (Chk. 2010).

When, under the State Tax Act, amounts paid under protest must be kept and deposited in a separate and restricted account which must be returned to the taxpayer if he prevails and since any funds levied by the state to pay the movant's assessed tax liability are rightly considered partial payments under protest and are therefore deposited into "a separate and restricted account," it does not seem that the movant will be irreparably harmed if an injunction does not issue because the return of his money would seem to adequately compensate him. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 153 (Chk. 2013).

A statute that permits a taxpayer to file an action in court to recover any challenged taxes is likely an inadequate substitute for a prompt post-seizure hearing before the tax authorities that might resolve the matter without the need for court proceedings and from which a still aggrieved taxpayer may then resort to a court suit. It may be that such an administrative hearing is available through the statute governing administrative hearings although that is not entirely clear. Harper v. Chuuk State Dep't of Admin. Servs., 19 FSM R. 147, 155 (Chk. 2013).

Under the voluntary payment rule, illegal taxes cannot be recovered unless they were paid under duress and under protest. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 285, 289 (App. 2014).

Title 17, which codifies the Administrative Procedures Act, applies to challenges of administrative decisions raised under Title 54, which codifies the tax law. GMP Hawaii, Inc. v. Ikosia, 19 FSM R. 551, 554 (Pon. 2014).

– Tax Liens

Liens under 54 F.S.M.C. 135 have priority even over liens which arose earlier in time. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 1987).

The statute 54 F.S.M.C. 153 does not require the government to give notice of its lien claims to any other creditors or even to the taxpayer. This statute, then, authorizes a lien which may be kept secret from interested parties. The effect of such a lien would be determined against the background of the strong general policy against secret liens. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 1987).

A section 153 lien should be treated as an equitable lien, its effect to be determined on a case-by-case basis with a view toward equitable considerations, especially when the government has taken reasonable and timely action to notify such other parties to the government's claims based upon tax delinquency. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 105, 108 (Pon. 1987).

Any lien rights of the government under section 135(2) supersede even preexisting lien rights of any other party. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 105, 110 (Pon. 1987).

The priority lien rights provided for the government in section 135(2) relate only to wage and salary tax claims and not to gross revenue taxes or other taxes. Bank of Guam v. Island Hardware, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 105, 111 (Pon. 1987).

Under 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2), no other payment to creditors may be made from execution sale proceeds until all amounts owing for wage and salary taxes are paid in full to the government. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 1988).

Priority of national government's lien for unpaid business gross revenue taxes under 54 F.S.M.C. 153 is subject to requirement that government take reasonable and timely action to notify other parties of the government's claim, but filing of litigation is sufficient notification to all parties under 54 F.S.M.C. 153. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 1988).

53 F.S.M.C. 104 does not establish lien rights in the Trust Territory Social Security Board, and gives the board no lien or priority claim of any kind. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 299 (Pon. 1988).

Claims for wages asserted by low level employees and laborers are entitled to preference over all other claims, except wage and salary tax lien rights of the national government, which are given priority over all other claims and liens by 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2). In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 301 (Pon. 1988).

Attachment and seizure create statutory and possessory lien rights which will be unaffected by subsequent writs of execution, but will be subject to national government's wage and salary tax lien claims under 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2), to wage claims of low level employees and laborers, and to pre-existing national government lien rights under 54 F.S.M.C. 153. In re Mid-Pacific Constr. Co., 3 FSM R. 292, 303 (Pon. 1988).

Under 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2), the government's judgment for wages and salary taxes constitutes a lien that is entitled to highest priority. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 337 (Pon. 1988).

In order for the government's judgment for gross revenue taxes to have a highest priority lien, notice that the tax payments are overdue, not just that tax liability has accrued must be given. In re Island Hardware, 3 FSM R. 332, 338 (Pon. 1988).

Amounts owing for penalties and interest under the tax law, 54 F.S.M.C. 155 and 902, do not qualify for lien treatment under 54 F.S.M.C. 135 or 153. In re Island Hardware, Inc., 3 FSM R. 428, 433 (Pon. 1988).

Where the government is entitled to a lien on the debtor's assets as of the date it gave notice of its claim for those taxes the lien also becomes effective as of that date. In re Pacific Islands Distrib. Co., 3 FSM R. 575, 585 (Pon. 1988).

Language in 54 F.S.M.C. 135(2) that the amount of wage and salary taxes formed "a lien on the employer's entire assets, having priority over all other claims and liens" meant that this statutory lien superseded the general rule of first in time, first in right. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 64 (Chk. 2003).

All Social Security taxes, including penalties and interest, constitute a lien upon any property of the employer, having priority over all other claims and liens including liens for other taxes. This creates a lien for social security taxes that has priority over even other tax liens, such as the wage and salary tax liens given first priority in Island Hardware and Pacific Islands Distributing. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 64 (Chk. 2003).

The social security tax lien arises by operation of law whenever social security taxes become due and are not paid. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 64 (Chk. 2003).

Under 53 F.S.M.C. 607, Social Security taxes specifically take priority over other tax liens. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

A social security tax lien has priority over a mortgage because section 607 grants social security tax liens priority over all other liens regardless of whether the other liens arose earlier. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

Under the general rule a mortgage first in time has superior right in the absence of the applicability of a statutory provision to the contrary. Section 607 is a statutory provision to the contrary because it grants social security tax liens priority over all other liens regardless of whether the other liens arose earlier. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

Social Security's statutory priority tax lien is consistent with the general rule that acknowledges that the first-in-time priorities are also subject to legislative action that restructures the normal priorities. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

Social Security's tax lien priority is statutory, not equitable. Statutory law, as enacted by Congress, not equitable principles fashioned by the court, applies. The statute, 53 F.S.M.C. 607, expressly gives Social Security a tax lien superior to all other liens. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 65 (Chk. 2003).

As Congress clearly intended, social security tax liens must be given priority over all other claims and liens and paid first. In re Engichy, 12 FSM R. 58, 66 (Chk. 2003).

Social Security taxes do have a priority over all other claims and liens. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Yamada, 18 FSM R. 88, 89 (Pon. 2011).

Before garnishing tenants' rental payments to pay the lessor's tax liens, the court should be provided with information concerning the building, including current interests in the building, current leases, and any other facts that the court might require to rule on the garnishment request and any information on the defendant's dependence on the monthly rental income and other income at her disposal so that the court may order with particularity a writ of garnishment. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Yamada, 18 FSM R. 88, 89-90 (Pon. 2011).

Since, by statute, all taxes imposed or authorized under Title 54, chapter 1 are a lien upon any property of the person or business obligated to pay those taxes and since, by statute, those taxes may be collected by levy upon such property in the same manner as the levy of an execution, the statute does not require a court-issued writ of execution or a court judgment before issuance. Instead, it permits a levy in the same manner as the levy of an execution. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125 (Pon. 2015).

The addition of the language "in the same manner as the levy of an execution" in 54 F.S.M.C. 153 shows that a different meaning was intended than if the statute had read "by writ of execution." Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125 (Pon. 2015).

Since 54 F.S.M.C. 153 authorizes a tax levy to be made "in the same manner as the levy of an execution," it does not require a court-issued writ of execution. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125 (Pon. 2015).

The statutory scheme grants the national government the authority to determine the amount of tax due and to collect those taxes. Under 54 F.S.M.C. 152(3), the Secretary of Finance's assessment of the tax amount is presumed correct unless and until it is proven incorrect. The statutory scheme also permits a tax levy on the lien created by 54 F.S.M.C. 153. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 125-26 (Pon. 2015).

Since the nation's statutes are presumed to be constitutional, a bank is not required to challenge, on a depositor's behalf, the tax lien statute's constitutionality. The bank may rely on the statute. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

It is not a bank's duty to challenge the tax authorities' assessment of the amount of tax due from a taxpayer depositor. It is the taxpayer's responsibility to dispute any tax assessed that it disagrees with and for the taxpayer to resolve the issue with the FSM tax authorities. It also is not the bank's responsibility to challenge the constitutionality of 54 F.S.M.C. 153 or the FSM's interpretation of that statute. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

As long as the notice of levy and execution from the Division of Customs and Tax Administration is regular on its face, a bank is obligated to honor it. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

Usually, notice and an opportunity to be heard is given prior to deprivation, but a government does not need to follow this in the case of taxes. The government must, however, provide a post-deprivation opportunity to challenge the tax and a clear and certain remedy. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 20 FSM R. 121, 126 (Pon. 2015).

A writ of execution applies to all the judgment debtor's business assets and personal property under 53 F.S.M.C. 607. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 276, 278 (Pon. 2015).

When the tax lien on a sole proprietorship's property was effectuated under 53 F.S.M.C. 607, well before the business transformed and became incorporated, the court will not create an avenue where an individual operating as a business avoids debt by simply morphing into an entity with the same name, albeit a different structure and characteristics. For the court to allow this would be detrimental to statutorily created entities attempting to collect taxes owed. FSM Social Sec. Admin. v. Reyes, 20 FSM R. 276, 278 (Pon. 2015).

When the issue of a bank releasing funds under 54 F.S.M.C. 153 is a matter of first impression, the court may look to case law of other jurisdictions, particularly the United States, for comparison and guidance. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 361 (App. 2017).

Under 54 F.S.M.C. 153, a delinquent taxpayer will have a lien placed on his property, and the lien will be collected in the similar manner as an execution, meaning it may be seized and sold to satisfy the taxes owed. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 361 (App. 2017).

The statutory scheme of 54 F.S.M.C. 153, in using the language "in the same manner as a levy of an execution," does not mean that a court-issued writ of execution is required before a levy. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 361 (App. 2017).

A bank does not have a duty to dispute a depositor's tax assessment, nor to challenge the constitutionality of 54 F.S.M.C. 153, as these are the account holder's responsibilities, and the bank is obliged to comply with the statutory levy, or face penalties under the law. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 362 (App. 2017).

The levy for failure to pay a national tax reaches all non-exempt property of the taxpayer whether in his possession or in the possession of third parties or agencies. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 362 (App. 2017).

TORTS

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance for this court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. Review of decisions of courts of the United States, and any other jurisdictions, must proceed however against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 142 (Pon. 1985).

Roughly stated, the general principle is that one person may be liable in tort to another only if the first intentionally or negligently violates a duty owed to the other, and the other is injured as a result. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 142 (Pon. 1985).

According to the Pohnpeian view of civil wrongs, if one damages another's property, he must repair or replace it; if one injures another person, he must apologize and provide assistance to the injured person and his family; if one kills another person, he must provide the assistance that the victim would have provided and may have to offer another person to take the place of victim in his family. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 70-71 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

Primary lawmaking powers for the field of torts lie with the states, not with the national government, but the national government may have an implied power to regulate tort law as part of the exercise of other general powers. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 359 (Pon. 1988).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has often decided matters of tort law without stating explicitly that state rather than national law controls, there has been acknowledgment that state law controls in the resolution of contract and tort issues. When the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, decides a matter of state law, its goal should be to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 360 n.22 (Pon. 1989).

Chuuk State has adopted common law tort principles as the law of Chuuk State where no specific constitutional or traditional impediment to its adoption exists. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 165 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Claims for torts that took place before 1951 accrued, at the latest, when the applicable Trust Territory statute took effect in 1951. Unless tolled, the statutes of limitation bar the FSM courts from adjudicating such claims. Alep v. United States, 6 FSM R. 214, 219-20 (Chk. 1993).

Where a statute creates a cause of action and then places exclusive, original jurisdiction over all controversies arising from that cause of action in a particular court, another court will have no jurisdiction to entertain claims under that statute. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 360 (Pon. 1994).

Various environmental acts that do not provide for a private citizen's cause of action for monetary damages cannot be used to create a duty for the breach of which damages may be awarded. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 360-61 (Pon. 1994).

Since state law generally controls the resolution of tort issues the duty of the FSM Supreme Court in a diversity case involving tort law is to try to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 455 (Chk. 1994).

Common law tort principles from other jurisdictions have previously been adopted by the Chuuk State Supreme Court where there has been no constitutional or traditional impediment to doing so. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 455 (Chk. 1994).

A tort is a wrong for which the harm that resulted, or is about to result, is capable of being compensated in an action at law. The purpose is to afford compensation for injuries sustained by one person as the result of the unreasonable or socially harmful conduct of another. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 430 n.13 (Pon. 1996).

Any attempt to breathe new life into tort claims time barred by the relevant and analogous statutes should be approached with caution because they are the type of personal claims for money damages that become increasingly difficult of proof and difficult to defend with the passage of time. Ordinarily such claims are resolved by political and diplomatic efforts. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 498 (App. 1996).

The defenses of estoppel, unclean hands and laches are all equitable defenses which do not apply in actions sounding in personal injury. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 193 (Pon. 1997).

Should Pohnpeian custom and tradition not be determinative, the FSM Supreme Court will look to its earlier holding and decisions of United States courts for guidance as to relevant common law tort principles, and will evaluate the persuasiveness of the reasoning in these decisions against the background of pertinent aspects of Micronesian society and culture in Pohnpei. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 253 (Pon. 1998).

The general principle is that one person may be liable in tort to another only if the first intentionally or negligently violates a duty owed to the other, and the other is injured as a result. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293, 294 (Pon. 1998).

United States common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for this court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. United States courts have generally followed the provisions of the Restatement of Torts in situations where a plaintiff alleges that a defendant has negligently prevented a third party from rendering assistance. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293-94 (Pon. 1998).

State law controls in the resolution of contract and tort issues. When the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, decides a matter of state law, its goal should be to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. When no existing case law is found the FSM Supreme Court must decide issues of tort law by applying the law as it believes the state court would. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 294-95 (Pon. 1998).

A tort is a wrong for which the harm that resulted is capable of being compensated in an action at law. The purpose is to afford compensation for injuries sustained by one person as the result of the unreasonable or socially harmful conduct of another. Generally, one person may be liable in tort to another only if the first intentionally or negligently violates a duty owed to the other, and the other is injured as a result. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The states' role in tort law is predominant. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc. v. Mauricio, 9 FSM R. 155, 158 (App. 1999).

A Kosrae state regulation that covers all persons wanting to fill in and construct on or over land below the ordinary high water mark does not provide any private right of action and cannot be the basis of a claim against the state for violation of law or regulation even if it did not have a specific plan for the seawall that was part of a road-widening project for which it had an overall plan. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 342-43 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The purpose of tort law is to afford a victim compensation for injuries sustained as the result of the unreasonable or socially harmful conduct of another. This is true whether the tort is statutorily created, as are the civil rights claims under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), or is a creature of the common law, as is a battery cause of action. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 23 (Chk. 2001).

The statute, 30 F.S.M.C. 104, does not impose a duty upon the FSM Development Bank to provide technical assistance to debtors to whom it has already made a loan, nor to assignees of those debtors. Nor does it give rise to a private cause of action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 76-77 (Pon. 2001).

United States common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for the Kosrae State Court for tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 234, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

State law generally determines tort issues, and the FSM Supreme Court in diversity cases must attempt to apply the law in the manner that the highest state court would. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 253-54 (Pon. 2001).

A given for tort causes of action is that the alleged actor have some interest in or control over the instrumentality that brought about the tortious conduct. Kosrae v. Worswick, 10 FSM R. 288, 291 (Kos. 2001).

The legislature has the power to modify or abolish common law rights or remedies and may supersede the common law without an express directive to that effect, as by adoption of a system of statutes comprehensively dealing with a subject to which the common law rule related. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 416 (Pon. 2001).

The legislative privilege doctrine has both substantive and evidentiary aspects. In substance, the doctrine renders legislators immune from civil and criminal liability based on either speech or debate in the course of proceedings in the legislature. From an evidentiary standpoint, a legislator may claim the privilege in declining to answer any questions outside the legislature itself where those questions concern how a legislator voted, acted, or decided on matters within the sphere of legitimate legislative activity. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 10 FSM R. 420, 425 (Pon. 2001).

Statutes which do not, by their terms, provide private citizens with a cause of action for money damages cannot be the basis for private damages claims. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 634 (Pon. 2002).

The court will not infer the existence of a private cause of action in the absence of a clear intent expressed in the statute that such a private cause of action be created. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 634 (Pon. 2002).

The Pohnpei state criminal statutes were intended to provide for criminal penalties for those who commit certain acts which are prohibited by the Act. The Pohnpei Crimes Act is not intended to create a basis for private parties to sue other parties, but to enable the Pohnpei state government to be able to punish those persons who violate provisions of the Act. Statutes which do not by their terms provide citizens with a cause of action for money damages cannot be the basis for private damages claims. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 17, 25 (Pon. 2002).

The general purpose of tort law is to afford a victim compensation for the injuries or damages sustained as the result of another's unreasonable or socially harmful conduct. In other words, a purpose of tort law is to make the victim whole. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 469 (Pon. 2004).

The continuing tort doctrine is well-settled law, and dictates that when there is an ongoing pattern of tortious activity where no single incident may be fairly identified as the cause of the harm suffered, then it is appropriate to regard the total effect of the conduct as actionable, and the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the conduct has ceased. In order to invoke the continuing tort doctrine, there must be continuing unlawful acts, and not merely continuing effects from a single original act. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 553 (Pon. 2004).

The rationale behind the principle that the statute of limitations does not begin to run on a continuing wrong until the wrong is over and done with is that the principle strikes a balance between the plaintiff's interest in being spared having to bring successive suits, and the two distinct interests, that statutes of limitations serve. One is evidentiary – to reduce the error rate in legal proceedings by barring litigation over claims relating to the distant past. The other is repose – to give people the assurance that after a fixed time they can go about their business without fear of having their liberty or property taken through the legal process. When an unlawful course of conduct's final act occurs within the statutory period, these purposes are adequately served, in balance with the plaintiff's interest in not having to bring successive suits, by requiring the plaintiff to sue within the statutory period but letting him reach back and get damages for the entire duration of the alleged violation. Some of the evidence, at least, will be fresh. And the defendant's uncertainty as to whether be will be sued at all will be confined to the statutory period. His uncertainty about the extent of his liability may be greater, but that is often true in litigation. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 553 (Pon. 2004).

A plaintiff's tort claim will not be dismissed as duplicative of his civil rights claim without the benefit of trial because it would be premature to dismiss either claim since the plaintiff has yet to prove the necessary elements of one or both of his two distinct claims and because at this juncture the contention that the tort and civil rights claims are duplicative is without merit. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 154, 156 (Pon. 2005).

A plaintiff's state law claims will not be dismissed because he is seeking a large amount of damages. The amount of damages sought does not determine whether a claim is to be dismissed. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 154, 156 (Pon. 2005).

A tort is any civil cause of action not based on contract. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

While tort law, especially common law torts like negligence, is primarily a state responsibility, the national government may create tort law when legislating in an area that the Constitution has expressly delegated to Congress the power to legislate. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

General maritime law has long recognized causes of action in maritime tort for damages resulting from groundings and oil spills. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 415 (Yap 2006).

The general purpose of tort law is to afford a victim compensation for the injuries or damages sustained as the result of another's unreasonable or socially harmful conduct. In other words, tort law's purpose is to make the victim whole. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 418 (Yap 2006).

A cause of action based on tort will not be lost or abated because of the death of the tort-feasor or other person liable. An action thereon may be brought or continued against the deceased person's personal representative, but punitive or exemplary damages may not be awarded nor penalties adjudged in the action. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 448 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A tort cause of action survives the defendant's death and continues against his personal representative. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 448 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Chuuk has adopted common law tort principles as the law of Chuuk when no specific constitutional or traditional impediment to their adoption existed. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 448-49 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A claimed inability to pay is not a defense to liability. Weriey v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 329, 332 (Chk. 2009).

A plaintiff has not met her burden of showing that the state is liable to her for "summary punishment" when she did not disclose what specific conduct she believed constituted summary punishment and her complaint was silent on that point as well. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

Since, absent a showing of impairment, FSM law is currently silent as to how a court is to define and determine whether an injury is permanent, the court may consider decisions and reasoning of United States courts and other jurisdictions in arriving at its own decisions. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

Torts are primarily areas of state law, and should the FSM Supreme Court take up tort issues, it would apply state law. Ladore v. Panuel, 17 FSM R. 271, 275 (Pon. 2010).

Pohnpei generally follows the Restatement approach in its law concerning tort issues. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 485 (Pon. 2012).

Common law decisions from U.S. sources are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes or decisions of constitutional courts within the FSM. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 526 (Pon. 2013).

For either a trespass cause of action or a cause of action against a municipal government for due process violations, the plaintiffs did not have to prove title or ownership, just a greater right to possession. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 338 (App. 2014).

Criminal law and the law of torts (more than any other form of civil law) are related branches of the law; yet in a sense they are two quite different matters. Criminal law's aim is to protect the public against harm, by punishing harmful results of conduct or at least situations (not yet resulting in actual harm) which are likely to result in harm if allowed to proceed further. Tort law's function is to compensate someone who is injured for the harm he or she has suffered. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 446 (Chk. 2014).

Frequently a defendant's conduct makes him both civilly and criminally liable. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 446 (Chk. 2014).

The predatory lending tort is usually either created by statute or relies on an existing statute as a basis for the cause of action. Neither Pohnpei nor the FSM national government has enacted a statute that could make predatory lending a cause of action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 170 (Pon. 2017).

Title 30, which governs the FSM Development Bank, does not give rise to a private cause of action for borrowers or others. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 556 (App. 2018).

Since tort law is primarily state law, a tort action will be governed by the substantive law of the state where the injury occurred. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

Generally, "business destruction" cannot be a separate cause of action, but if the plaintiff can claim lost personal income that she derived from the business, it may be a measure of damages. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 157 (Chk. 2019).

In FSM case law, there is no tort or cause of action denominated as harassment although there are causes of action that include harassment as a significant component, and there is no tort of "intimidation" and the court will not create one. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 630 & n.2 (Pon. 2020).

– Abuse of Process

Whether interference with the efforts of a non-FSM citizen engaged in business within the Federated States of Micronesia is an abuse of process is not an issue which may be resolved by reference to traditional or customary principles. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 2 FSM R. 265, 268 (Pon. 1986).

Common law decisions of the United States are an appropriate source of guidance in addressing claims of abuse of process within the Federated States of Micronesia. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 2 FSM R. 265, 268 (Pon. 1986).

Abuse of process occurs where one uses legal process against another's person or property to accomplish an ulterior purpose for which the process was not designed. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 2 FSM R. 265, 268 (Pon. 1986).

The process contemplated for the tort of abuse of process is issuance by an official body of some legal document or order which affects the victim's person or property. Mailo v. Twum-Barimah, 2 FSM R. 265, 268 (Pon. 1986).

One of the elements of abuse of process is that the process be used for an improper, ulterior purpose. An ulterior purpose is one in which coercion is used to obtain a collateral advantage not properly involved in the proceeding. The tort typically involves some form of extortion. Some definite act not authorized by the process, or aimed at an objective not legitimate in the use of the process, is required. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 111 (Chk. 1999).

When an order and writ are manifestly improper, but their purpose was not collateral to the process used, one of the elements of the tort of abuse of process is not satisfied. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 111 (Chk. 1999).

The tort of abuse of process requires some legal process – the use of legal process emanating from an official body. An allegation, that the FSM used the audit process to wrongfully terminate a contract and that the memorandum issued by the U.S. Department of Interior was part of an official legal process authorized and instituted under the Compact, does not meet the requirements of legal process since, as a matter of law, the audit procedure and the memorandum cannot be the process on which an allegation of abuse of process rests. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 485 (Pon. 2009).

When each party vigorously pursues opposite sides of a legitimate dispute (who breached a contract), neither party can seriously argue that either the complaint or the counterclaim constitutes abuse of process. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 485 (Pon. 2009).

One against whom civil proceedings are initiated may recover in an action for the wrongful initiation of the proceedings, if the proceedings have terminated in his favor and were initiated for an improper purpose. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 n.5 (Pon. 2019).

– Alienation of Affections

The tort of criminal conversation's odd name comes about because the act is "criminal" in the sense that it was an ecclesiastical crime and it is "conversation" in the sense of intercourse. Generally, the term "criminal conversation," is synonymous with "adultery," but in its more limited and technical sense, it may be defined as adultery in the aspect of tort. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 506 n.2 (Pon. 2020).

Under Restatement (Second) of Torts § 683, one who purposely alienates one spouse's affections from the other spouse is subject to liability for the harm thus caused to any of the other spouse's legally protected marital interests, which applies only when the marriage relation exists between the parties at the time of the acts that cause the alienation of affections. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 507 (Pon. 2020).

Restatement (Second) of Torts § 684(2) encompasses what was known at common law as "enticement," and under it one who for the purpose of disrupting the marital relation induces one spouse to separate from the other spouse or not to return after being separated, is subject to the liability for the harm thus caused to any of the aggrieved spouse's legally protected marital interests. The tort of enticement is often considered a variety of the alienation of affections tort. The actor is liable only for a separation that results from the actor's conduct. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 507 (Pon. 2020).

Under Restatement (Second) of Torts § 685, one who has sexual intercourse with one spouse is subject to liability to the other spouse for the harm thus caused to any of the other spouse's legally protected marital interests. Under this rule, although knowledge or belief that a person is married is essential to liability for alienation of affections under the § 683 rule, neither knowledge nor belief is necessary to liability under § 685. One who has sexual relations with a married person takes the risk that he or she is married to another. The fact that the spouse misrepresents the marital status is not a defense. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 508 (Pon. 2020).

Some authorities consider these three common law torts – alienation of affections [Restatement § 683], enticement [Restatement § 684(2)], and criminal conversation [Restatement § 685] – to really be one tort – interference with marriage relation, and that they are just three means by which the interference with marriage relation tort may be accomplished. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 508 (Pon. 2020).

The alienation of affections, enticement, and criminal conversation torts are novel questions of Pohnpei state law, and these torts have been abolished in many common law jurisdictions, but are still viable in a number of common law jurisdictions. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 509 (Pon. 2020).

Alienation of affections, enticement, and criminal conversation do not appear to be torts that could be committed by an actor other than a natural person. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498,511-12 (Pon. 2020).

An action for the alienation of affections lies only against one who produced and brought about or caused an alienation of the affections of the plaintiff's spouse. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 512 (Pon. 2020).

– Anticompetitive Practices

Under 32 F.S.M.C. 302(3), it is illegal for one or more persons to create or use an existing combination of capital, skill, or acts the effect of which is to prevent competition in the manufacture, making, transportation, sale, or purchase of any merchandise, produce, or commodity. The State of Pohnpei is a "person" for purposes of this statute. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 551 (Pon. 2004).

"Competition" means the effort of two or more parties, acting independently, to secure the business of a third party by the offer of the most favorable terms. "Merchandise" and "commodity" are similar enough in meaning to be interchangeable: "merchandise" is defined as each commodity bought and sold by merchants, while "commodity" is defined as any movable or tangible thing used in commerce as the subject of trade or barter. "Produce" as a noun means articles produced or grown from or on the soil. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 551 (Pon. 2004).

When Pohnpei arbitrarily set the $1 a pound price for the purchase of pepper from the pepper farmers, a price that bore no relation to the world market price, it created a market condition with which Island Traders could not compete and was not able to purchase the raw pepper it required for its operations. Pohnpei thus prevented competition in the purchase of produce, and by preventing Island Traders from acquiring raw pepper for processing, Pohnpei also prevented competition in the manufacture of merchandise; the merchandise being the finished, processed pepper. Viewed in either light, Pohnpei violated 32 F.S.M.C. 302(3). AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 551-52 (Pon. 2004).

It is unlawful for a person to fix the price of a commodity. This prohibition against fixing the price charged for goods, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or commodities is directed toward sale, and not the purchase, of goods and does not apply when the facts do not involve selling of raw pepper, but conduct in purchasing raw pepper at an anticompetitive price. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 552 (Pon. 2004).

Under 32 F.S.M.C. 302(2), it is illegal for one or more persons to create or use an existing combination of capital, skill, or acts the effect of which is to limit or reduce the production, or increase the price of, merchandise or any commodity. "Production" means that which is made; i.e. goods, or the fruit of labor, as the productions of the earth, comprehending all vegetables and fruits. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 552 (Pon. 2004).

When Pohnpei's refusal to hold a trochus harvest allegedly stemmed from environmental concerns, but all of the reports addressing this issue recommended that a trochus harvest be held and the concern was not that there would be too little trochus, but that there would be too much, nothing stood in the way of reasonable limitations on the harvest that could have harmonized both Pohnpei's legitimate environmental concerns and the national law requirement that it not limit the production of any commodity. Failure to do so violated 32 F.S.M.C. 302(2). AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 552 (Pon. 2004).

Anticompetitive conduct is tortious in nature. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 553 (Pon. 2004).

Loss of future profits is a well-established basis for determining the measure of economic injury resulting from an anticompetitive act which forces the victim out of business. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 554, 555 (Pon. 2004).

In unfair trade practices cases, courts draw a distinction between the amount of proof necessary to show that some damages resulted from the wrong, and the amount of proof necessary to calculate the exact amount of the damages. A lower burden of proof applies because the most elementary conception of justice and public policy require that the wrongdoer shall bear the risk of the uncertainty which his own wrong has created. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 554 (Pon. 2004).

In anticompetitive practices cases where causation is established, the burden of proving damages is much less severe. This rule of leniency with regard to proof of damages is necessary because any other rule would enable the wrong-doer to profit by his wrongdoing at his victim's expense. It would be an inducement to make wrongdoing so effective and complete in every case as to preclude any recovery, by rendering the measure of damages uncertain. Once the fact of damage is established with reasonable certainty, the amount of damages need only be shown with as much certainty as the tort's nature and the case's circumstances permit. In such cases, if it is uncertain and speculative and whether damages have been incurred, then damages will be denied; however, if it is only the amount of the damages that presents the uncertainty, then the court will allow recovery so long as there is proof of a reasonable basis from which the amount can be approximated or inferred. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 554 (Pon. 2004).

When there is no doubt about the violation of 32 F.S.M.C. 302(2), but when there is nothing of record to establish that even if a trochus harvest had been held after 1994, the plaintiff would have been successful in purchasing enough trochus so that it would have had an adequate source of supply for its button operation, the plaintiff has failed to establish that it was damaged by the defendant's conduct as proscribed 32 F.S.M.C. 302(2). Since that conduct was tortious in nature, the plaintiff is entitled only to nominal damages. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555 (Pon. 2004).

Damages under 32 F.S.M.C. 306(2) are subject to trebling. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555, 556 (Pon. 2004).

Averaging three years of normal operations when the pepper supply was continuous when the manufacturing process was uninterrupted to arrive at an annual profit, is a projection that provides a reasonable basis from which a plaintiff's lost profits can be approximated or inferred under the lower burden of proof applicable for damages in anticompetitive practices cases. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555 (Pon. 2004).

When the conduct's nature was discrete and specific, and would have been amenable to injunctive relief had the plaintiff sought it, once that relief had been awarded there could have been no prospective damages since the conduct giving rise to those damages would necessarily have ceased. There should be no recovery for further diminution of a business's value, predicated on the defendant's continuing wrongdoing, after the defendant has been enjoined. The court will thus not award prospective damages from the time of the lawsuit's filing onward because injunctive relief, to which the claim would have been amenable, would have terminated the conduct complained of. But since under the continuing tort doctrine, a plaintiff is entitled to recover all of the damages that result from on-going tortious conduct, even though the inception of the conduct lies outside the limitations period, the court will award damages from the start of the anticompetitive pepper processing operation in mid-1995 until the plaintiff filed suit. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555-56 (Pon. 2004).

When claims of damages for sums the plaintiff owed to third parties on the theory that since its business operations were destroyed by the defendant's conduct, it cannot pay back those amounts, would have depended for their repayment on profits that the operation would have made but for the defendant's conduct. Since future profits are the measure of the business's damages, to allow a separate recovery for these sums would be to permit a double recovery. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 556 (Pon. 2004).

Any person who proves a violation of 32 F.S.M.C. 302 or 32 F.S.M.C. 303 may recover reasonable attorney's fees. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 13 FSM R. 36, 39 (Pon. 2004).

A state is a person under the FSM anticompetitive practices statute when it acts as a participant or competitor in commerce but not when it acts as a regulator of commerce. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 15 (App. 2006).

A Pohnpei state law exempting it from anticompetitive practices liability does not apply to a case brought under the national anticompetitive practices statute since the lawsuit is based on a cause of action created by the national, not the state, statute covering an activity – foreign and interstate commerce – over which the national government may legislate. It would, of course, apply to an action brought under the state anticompetitive practices statute. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 16 (App. 2006).

When the anticompetitive practices statute requires that one or more persons create or use an existing combination of capital, skill, or acts the effect of which is anticompetitive and when the trial court made findings that would show a combination, since the statute is clear that only one "person" can provide the needed "combination," a contention that the trial court had to, and failed to, find that the defendant acted in combination with someone else has no merit. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 19 (App. 2006).

Generally, statutes authorizing multiple damages are remedial and nonpunitive, particularly in anti-trust cases. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 (App. 2006).

The treble damages clause in the FSM Anti-competitive practices statute is remedial and not punitive. The multiple portion of the damages – that part in excess of the lost profits the trial court determined as actually proven – is imposed by a national statute enacted in an area in which the national government may legislate. Since this is not a state law tort case in which state law applies and this is a statutory tort created by a national statute, the national, not the state, statute therefore controls. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 (App. 2006).

Even under national law, sovereigns, any sovereign, have sovereign immunity. But sovereigns are generally considered to have waived that immunity when the sovereign has acted as a participant in commerce instead of as a sovereign. It would seem unfair if a state, as a competitor in a commercial enterprise, could not be held liable and assessed the same damages that another commercial competitor, who committed the same acts, would be assessed. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 n.5 (App. 2006).

The trial court should state some reason for trebling damages other than just stating the anticompetitive practices statute allows it. Compelling justification is not needed or required. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 21 (App. 2006).

The anticompetitive practices statute itself provides the basis for the plaintiff to recover damages together with reasonable attorneys' fees and the costs of suit. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 21 (App. 2006).

Fifteen years' worth of "damages" of lost profits is obviously too long for any reasonably certain future projections. Too many unexpected possible variables could occur. The trial court thus did not abuse its discretion by limiting the damage award to four years of lost profits. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 24-25 (App. 2006).

The anticompetitive practices statute authorizes treble damages. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 190 (Pon. 2006).

Treble damages were proper when the discretion denoted by the word "may" in the statute lies with the injured party and not the court – the injured party "may" sue and recover treble damages – and when Congress's intent was to give the injured party treble damages if it sues and proves its case. The statute's context compels this conclusion. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 190-91 (Pon. 2006).

When the plaintiff has a claim de jure that the power conferred (on the court to treble damages) should be exercised because it had proved its right to damages under 32 F.S.M.C. 301 et seq. and when, considering the whole anticompetitive practices statute and its nature and object, Congress's intent was to impose a positive duty to treble damages, not a discretionary power to do so, the court will therefore award treble damages. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

When the defendant's anticompetitive acts did not just harm the plaintiff's business, but those acts put it out of business, even if treble damages were discretionary, there would be no more appropriate a case to exercise the discretion to treble damages than one where the anticompetitive acts put the plaintiff out of business. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

– Assault

Battery is the harmful or offensive contact with a person, resulting from an act intended to cause that contact, while an assault refers to the apprehension of that offensive contact. Once the court is satisfied from the evidence that an actual injury has occurred then it need not consider the separate tort of assault. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 191 (Pon. 1997).

Battery is a harmful, offensive contact with a person resulting from an act intended to cause the contact, while an assault has to do with the apprehension of the offensive contact; when the court determines that a battery has occurred, it need not consider the separate tort of assault. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 458 (Pon. 2000).

When there was no evidence that any policemen had an intent to cause an arrestee physical or bodily harm, the state is not liable to her under either theory of assault or battery. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

A trial court errs as a matter of law by using, in a civil case, a criminal statute to determine the torts' elements and whether the plaintiff was an assault and battery victim. Because it was not a criminal prosecution, the trial court should have looked to Pohnpei tort law and used the elements of the torts of assault and of battery. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 372 (App. 2011).

Privilege is a legal defense to the torts of assault and battery and may be based upon the fact that the touching is a necessity to protect some private or public interest which is of such importance as to justify the threatened harm. A lawful arrest is just such a privilege and a valid defense to the assault claim and to the battery claim so long as excessive force is not used. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 372 (App. 2011).

– Battery

A battery or an assault is not determined by the presence or absence of injury; battery is a harmful or offensive contact with a person, resulting from an act intended to cause the plaintiff to suffer such contact, while assault refers to the apprehension of imminent contact. Paul v. Celestine, 4 FSM R. 205, 207 (App. 1990).

When the evidence clearly establishes that plaintiff suffered injuries as a result of intentional direct contact by the defendant the court need only consider the tort of battery, not the separate tort of assault. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 142 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Despite the finding of battery, defendant will not be found liable for damages if plaintiff consented to battery, of if defendant was in some way privileged to inflict harmful or offensive contact. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

A person is liable to another for battery if he acts intending to cause harmful contact with a third person or an imminent apprehension of such contact, and a harmful contact indirectly results. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 544 (Chk. 1996).

An actor is privileged to use reasonable force, not intended or likely to cause death or serious bodily harm, to defend himself against the unprivileged harmful or offensive contact or other bodily harm which he reasonably believes another is about to inflict intentionally upon him, but the means used must be proportionate to the danger threatened. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 544-45 (Chk. 1996).

Even though police may be privileged to use force to prevent the commission of a crime, the battery of an innocent bystander is not privileged. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 545 (Chk. 1996).

Civil liability for a battery is not limited to the direct perpetrator of the act charged, but extends to any person who by any means encourages or incites the battery, or aids and abets it. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 545 (Chk. 1996).

Where a number of people fired weapons and others encouraged them to fire or surrendered their weapon so another could fire it, all are jointly and severally liable for battery on an innocent bystander as the person who fired the bullet that struck her. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 545 (Chk. 1996).

The commission of the intentional tort of battery by police officers in the scope of their employment is a denial of due process of law. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 548 (Chk. 1996).

Battery is the harmful or offensive contact with a person, resulting from an act intended to cause that contact, while an assault refers to the apprehension of that offensive contact. Once the court is satisfied from the evidence that an actual injury has occurred then it need not consider the separate tort of assault. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 191 (Pon. 1997).

Civil liability for a battery is not limited to the direct perpetrator of the act charged. It extends to any person who by any means encourages or incites the battery, or aids and abets it. Each officer who encouraged any other officer to become involved in the fight with plaintiff, either by direct command, by statements or by providing the means for another officer to become involved, is as liable for the battery on plaintiff as the person who actually delivered the kick to his leg. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 192 (Pon. 1997).

The tort of battery is an intentional tort; therefore none of the defenses to negligence such as assumption of risk, comparative negligence, contributory negligence and last clear chance apply to intentional actions on the part of the defendants. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 193 (Pon. 1997).

Privilege is a legal defense to the tort of battery and may be based upon the consent of the person who is the one affected by the touching, or the fact that the touching is a necessity to protect some private or public interest which is of such importance as to justify the threatened harm or, that the touching is one which the actor must cause in the exercise of some action for which freedom of action is essential. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 193 (Pon. 1997).

The commission of the intentional tort of battery by the police officers in the scope of their employment is a denial of due process of law. Physical abuse committed by police officers may violate a prisoner's right to due process of law. The right to due process of law is violated when a police officer batters a person. The public at large has the right to be free of invasions of their person and personal security by any government agent and suspects have the right to be free from the use of excessive force during their arrest. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 195 (Pon. 1997).

A municipality is liable for battery by its police officers when it has ratified their actions by failing to charge them and the lack of any internal discipline whatsoever. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 195 (Pon. 1997).

It is not a manifest error of law or fact requiring a new trial that the court held police officers liable for battery without determining exactly which officer's action caused plaintiff's injury when the court found that each of the defendants had participated in plaintiff's arrest, the court discussed the issues of justifiable force and privilege throughout its decision, and found that defendants had acted with intent to bring about a harmful or offensive contact with plaintiff, which was not justified under the circumstances. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 215, 217-18 (Pon. 1997).

Although under Pohnpeian custom it is inappropriate for a parent, or an individual who stands in the place of a parent, to see his daughter come home late at night with a boyfriend, it is not a corollary that that person is justified under custom in inflicting a battery on the boyfriend, or damaging car he is driving. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2000).

When there was no evidence to suggest that a parent's customary privilege to discipline ran beyond the daughter to encompass her boyfriend as well, when there was no evidence to suggest that when the boyfriend dropped the daughter off he was threatening or in any other way posing a danger of physical harm to her such that the parent was entitled to inflict a battery upon the boyfriend in order to defend the daughter as he may have been obligated to do under custom, and when there was no evidence that under custom a parent could attack the car driven by the daughter's boyfriend with the baseball bat as a way of demonstrating his displeasure with the boyfriend for his role in keeping her out late, and in dropping her off under circumstances where he would see them together, Pohnpeian custom does not constitute a defense to either the battery or property damage claims. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2000).

Battery is a harmful, offensive contact with a person resulting from an act intended to cause the contact, while an assault has to do with the apprehension of the offensive contact; when the court determines that a battery has occurred, it need not consider the separate tort of assault. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 458 (Pon. 2000).

It is enough to constitute a battery that the defendant sets a force in motion which ultimately produces the result, such as striking a glass door so that the plaintiff is hit with the fragments. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 458 (Pon. 2000).

Punitive damages are awarded as a punishment to the defendant for his wrongful act and as a warning and example to deter him and others from committing similar acts in the future. As a general rule, punitive damages are allowed for an assault and battery committed wantonly, maliciously, or under circumstances of aggravation. Since battery usually is a matter of the worst kind of intentions, it frequently justifies punitive damages. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 459 (Pon. 2000).

A detainee has a civil right to be free of excessive force while detained in the custody. Use of excessive force may constitute a battery. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 22 (Chk. 2001).

The state, as employer of a police trainee, is responsible for the battery committed by the trainee while acting within the scope of that employment. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 22 (Chk. 2001).

A battery or wrongful death, by itself, does not constitute a civil rights violation. Harper v. William, 14 FSM R. 279, 282 (Chk. 2006).

Excessive force is defined as the use of unreasonable force by a person having the authority to arrest. A person who has been arrested has the right to be free of excessive force and use of excessive force may constitute battery. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

When there was no evidence that any policemen had an intent to cause an arrestee physical or bodily harm, the state is not liable to her under either theory of assault or battery. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

Defenses to negligence, such as comparative negligence, which might lessen an award of damages, do not apply to the intentional tort of battery. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

A trial court errs as a matter of law by using, in a civil case, a criminal statute to determine the torts' elements and whether the plaintiff was an assault and battery victim. Because it was not a criminal prosecution, the trial court should have looked to Pohnpei tort law and used the elements of the torts of assault and of battery. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 372 (App. 2011).

Under Pohnpei tort law, a battery is a harmful, offensive contact with a person resulting from an act intended to cause the contact, while an assault has to do with the apprehension of the offensive contact. When a court is satisfied from the evidence that an actual injury has occurred, that is, determined that a battery has occurred, it need not consider the separate tort of assault. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 372 (App. 2011).

Privilege is a legal defense to the torts of assault and battery and may be based upon the fact that the touching is a necessity to protect some private or public interest which is of such importance as to justify the threatened harm. A lawful arrest is just such a privilege and a valid defense to the assault claim and to the battery claim so long as excessive force is not used. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 372 (App. 2011).

Whether the Pohnpei police injured an arrestee through the use of excessive force and thus battered her is a question of fact. Thus, when the trial court found as fact that the arrestee had caused her own injuries by struggling with the handcuffs during the travel from the arrest site to the police station, which resulted in the handcuffs tightening further around her wrists and that the handcuffs' tightening was not the result of an officer's conduct, but rather was the result of her own movements, the police did not cause her injury and no use-of-excessive-force battery could have occurred. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 372 (App. 2011).

Battery is a harmful or offensive contact with a person, resulting from an act intended to cause the plaintiff to suffer such a contact. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 562, 564 (Pon. 2018).

According to Pohnpei law, battery is a harmful or offensive contact with a person, resulting from an act intended to cause the plaintiff to suffer such contact. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 31 (Pon. 2018).

Since an essential element for the tort of battery is that the act constituting the battery intended to cause the plaintiff to suffer such contact, a battery claim will be dismissed when there is no evidence to suggest that the forklift operator intended to batter the plaintiff and when this was a workplace accident, not an intentional act. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 31-32 (Pon. 2018).

Under Pohnpei law, battery is a harmful or offensive contact with a person, resulting from an act intended to cause that person to suffer such contact. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 486 (Pon. 2020).

An essential element to a claim for the tort of battery is that the act constituting the battery was intended to cause the plaintiff to suffer injury from such contact. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 487 (Pon. 2020).

The defense of voluntary intoxication is not applicable when the defendant's actions constituting a battery were harmful and intentional. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 487 (Pon. 2020).

Punitive damages are awarded to punish a defendant for his wrongful act and as a warning and example to deter him and others from committing similar acts in the future. As a general rule, punitive damages are allowed for an assault and battery committed wantonly, maliciously, or under circumstances of aggravation. Since battery usually is a matter of the worst kind of intentions, it frequently justifies punitive damages. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 490 (Pon. 2020).

– Breach of Fiduciary Duty

Where the defendant has breached her fiduciary duty, and converted to her own personal use funds of others, has made no claim of right to any of the funds or offered any defense, and blame thus lies wholly with the defendant, the plaintiff will be allowed to recover its attorney's fees in order to make the victim whole. This is a narrowly drawn exception to the general rule parties will bear their own attorney's fees. Bank of Guam v. Nukuto, 6 FSM R. 615, 617-18 (Chk. 1994).

A financial institution, such as a credit union, that holds money from depositors does have an on-going fiduciary duty to its depositors. Wakuk v. Kosrae Island Credit Union, 7 FSM R. 195, 197 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr.

A plaintiff's complaint, stating two causes of action for breach of fiduciary duty (both existing under common law), does not arise under the national laws of the FSM so as to confer original jurisdiction on the FSM Supreme Court or show on its face an issue of national law thereby creating removal jurisdiction. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

When a case has been removed from state court on the ground that it arose under national law but the plaintiff's complaint only relies upon common law principles of breach of fiduciary duty and as such does not arise under national law because no issue of national law appears on the face of the complaint and no substantial issue of national law is raised, the case will be remanded to the state court where it was initially filed. David v. San Nicolas, 8 FSM R. 597, 598 (Pon. 1998).

FSM case law has not acknowledged the existence of the tort of breach of fiduciary duty in the context of insurance or any other context except banking. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 308 (Pon. 2004).

In a narrowly drawn exception to the general rule that the parties will bear their own attorney's fees, attorney's fees have been awarded as part of costs when a defendant has breached her fiduciary duty to the plaintiff. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

An employee or agent is liable to a third person for injuries resulting from the breach of any duty which the employee or agent owes directly to such third person, and is not liable to a third person for injuries resulting from a breach of duty which the employee or agent owes only or solely to his employer. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438-39 (Pon. 2009).

Since insurance agents are required to exercise the utmost good faith, loyalty, and honesty toward the insurer during the times that they acted as the insurer's agents, by cashing the premium checks, and thereby failing to send the checks on to the insurer, they breached this duty. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 441 (Pon. 2009).

A defense that the plaintiff should have made a claim against its errors and omissions policy is without merit even if such a policy existed, because the contract expressly addresses what happens. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

Damages for an insurer's claim for breach of fiduciary duty are the same as those for its contract claim, since the breach of fiduciary duty claim is also based on the breach of the agency contracts that the insurer had with its agents. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 446 (Pon. 2009).

Generally, a party bears its own attorney's fees, and this rule is the proper foundation upon which the system in the FSM should be built. An exception to this general rule is that attorney's fees have been awarded for a breach of fiduciary duty. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 449 (Pon. 2009).

Agency is the fiduciary relation which results from one person's manifestation of consent to another that the other shall act on his behalf and subject to his control, and consent by the other to so act, and fiduciary is defined as relating to or founded upon a trust or confidence. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 355 (App. 2012).

An agent is a fiduciary with respect to the matters within the scope of his agency and the agent is bound to the exercise of the utmost good faith, loyalty, and honesty toward his principal. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 355 (App. 2012).

Since handling the principal's premium checks was within the scope of their agency and since the agents did not exercise the utmost good faith, loyalty, and honesty toward the principal when they were its agents because they did not immediately remit all premium checks to the principal, the agents breached the fiduciary duty they owed to the principal and were properly found liable under a breach of fiduciary duty theory. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 355 (App. 2012).

– Breach of Implied Covenant of Good Faith

Breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is a common law cause of action, which is a tort claim that arises out of a contractual relationship between the parties. The implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing rests on the premise that whenever a party's cooperation is necessary for the performance of a contractual promise, there is a condition implied that the cooperation will be given. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 307 (Pon. 2004).

Contracts impose on the parties thereto a duty to do everything necessary to carry them out, and there is an implied undertaking in every contract on each party's part that he will not intentionally and purposely do anything to prevent the other party from carrying out his part of the agreement, or do anything which will have the effect of destroying or injuring the right of the other party to receive the fruits of the contract, and the FSM Supreme Court will entertain such claims in the context of insurance contracts, where the insurer possesses greater sophistication, can be expected to assist local insureds in understanding the relevant legal terminology, and has a specialized role in processing claims. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 307 (Pon. 2004).

The court cannot say that an insurance claims process which consumed between 3 and 4 months from the filing of the claim to the issuance of a denial is so lengthy, so egregious, as to constitute bad faith as a matter of law. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 308 (Pon. 2004).

Courts have permitted attorney's fee awards under the vexatious conduct exception when the plaintiff has proven the defendant's breach of the implied covenant or implied duty of good faith and fair dealing (also called the bad faith tort). If a plaintiff were to prevail on a bad faith tort claim against an insurer, the insurer would be liable to him for reasonable attorney's fees that are proximately caused by the bad faith conduct. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

Since contracts impose upon the parties an implied undertaking that each party will not intentionally or purposefully do anything to prevent the other party from carrying out its part of the agreement, breach of an implied covenant of good faith is a common law tort claim that arises out of a contractual relationship between the parties. The court has not yet extended this doctrine's application to contracts beyond insurance contracts. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 2009).

Subject to proof at trial, a breach of an implied covenant of good faith claim may sound, at least in part, in contract rather than in tort. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 2009).

Breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is a common law cause of action, which is a tort claim that arises out of a contractual relationship between the parties. The implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing rests on the premise that whenever a party's cooperation is necessary for the performance of a contractual promise, there is a condition implied that the cooperation will be given. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 361 (Pon. 2014).

Contracts impose on the parties a duty to do everything necessary to carry them out, and there is an implied undertaking in every contract on each party's part that he will not intentionally and purposely do anything to prevent the other party from carrying out his part of the agreement, or do anything which will have the effect of destroying or injuring the right of the other party to receive the fruits of the contract. The FSM Supreme Court will entertain such claims in the context of insurance contracts, when the insurer possesses greater sophistication, provides the policy, can be expected to assist insureds in understanding the relevant terminology in the policy, and has a specialized role in processing claims. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 361-62 (Pon. 2014).

The duty of good faith and fair dealing is implied in the performance and enforcement of all contracts. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 362 (Pon. 2014).

Under the circumstances of an insurance case, there may be a duty to disclose information, based on a relationship of confidence or trust between the parties, or based on one party's superior knowledge or means of knowledge. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 362 (Pon. 2014).

As used in the insurance context, bad faith does not refer to misconduct of a malicious or immoral nature. Rather, the bad faith concept emphasizes unfaithfulness to an agreed common purpose or to the justifiable expectations of the other party to the contract. In short, a showing of bad faith requires that insurers not act unreasonably or arbitrarily when dealing with their insureds. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 362 (Pon. 2014).

The breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is a common law tort claim that arises out of a contractual relationship between the parties because contracts impose upon the parties an implied undertaking that each party will not intentionally or purposefully do anything to prevent the other party from carrying out its part of the agreement. FSM courts, however, have not yet extended this doctrine's application to contracts other than insurance contracts. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 568 (Kos. 2014).

When the court has ruled that the plaintiff's right to payment for accrued annual leave hours was contingent on him giving at least two weeks' written notice of his resignation and that since he was terminated involuntarily those events never occurred, the defendants are entitled to summary judgment on the plaintiff's breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing cause of action insofar as it applies to the plaintiff's accrued annual leave hours claim. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 568 (Kos. 2014).

When the court has not held that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing could never be applied to an employment contract, the court, at the summary judgment stage of the proceeding, will not dismiss this cause of action as it might apply to the plaintiff's claim for wrongful termination in violation of his employment contract. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 568 (Kos. 2014).

An injured claimant may not sue an insurer for breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing. The duty is a product of the fiduciary relationship created by the contract between the insurer and its insured. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 213 (Yap 2015).

An insured's cause of action for the insurer's breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing is assignable to the injured third-party claimant, and the assignee may sue on it. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. Osprey Underwriting Agency, Ltd., 20 FSM R. 205, 213 (Yap 2015).

The breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is a common law tort claim that arises out of a contractual relationship between the parties because contracts impose upon the parties an implied undertaking that each party will not intentionally or purposefully do anything to prevent the other party from carrying out its part of the agreement. This tort requires some sort of bad faith on the defendant's part. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 428 (App. 2016).

Not every mistake by an insurer or its agent rises to the level of bad faith – is automatically unreasonable or arbitrary. An insurance agent's misrepresentation, particularly an unintentional misrepresentation, may breach the agent's duty of care toward the insured rather than constitute bad faith and unreasonable and arbitrary conduct towards an insured. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 428 (App. 2016).

When the insurance agents' failure to differentiate between the insured's life and cancer policies was careless, but not arbitrary and unreasonable, and did not deprive the insured of her bargained-for benefit, the trial court's conclusion that the insurers breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing or that they engaged in bad faith conduct was reversible error. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 428-29 (App. 2016).

Breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is a common law cause of action. It is a tort claim that arises out of a contractual relationship between the parties, and it rests on the premise that whenever a party's cooperation is necessary for the performance of a contractual promise, there is a condition implied that the cooperation will be given. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

When, because of the insured's misconduct, the insurer was not obligated to cooperate by extending medical coverage to the insured, the insured's cause of action for breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is void. Donre v. FSM Nat'l Gov't Employees' Health Ins. Plan, 21 FSM R. 592, 598 (Pon. 2018).

– Causation

The excavation of large holes on the land of private citizens, in areas where children play, and near a public road, is inherently dangerous and calls for special precautions. One who causes such work to be undertaken may not escape liability simply by employing an independent contractor to do the work. Ray v. Electrical Contracting Corp., 2 FSM R. 21, 25 (App. 1985).

Medical malpractice by hospital staff does not relieve a tortfeasor of his responsibility for damages, because any injuries that might have been caused by the staff flowed naturally from his own acts. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 429 (Pon. 1996).

The proximate cause of an injury is the primary or moving cause which in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury, if the injury be one which might be reasonably anticipated or foreseen as a natural consequence of the wrongful act. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 429 (Pon. 1996).

Medical actions of a hospital staff do not constitute an efficient intervening cause that would break the causal link between a tortfeasor's attack and the plaintiff's injuries. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 429 (Pon. 1996).

The employment of a police officer with ten-year old charges and or convictions for violent behavior is insufficient to hold a municipality liable for negligent hiring because the charges and or convictions were too remote and attenuated to be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 194 (Pon. 1997).

Proximate cause is the primary or moving cause, or that which, in a natural and continuous sequence; unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury and without which the accident could not have happened, if the injury be one which might be reasonably anticipated or foreseen as a natural consequence of the wrongful act. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 194 (Pon. 1997).

Failure to use due care under the circumstances in maintaining a telephone pole guy wire is the proximate cause of an eye injury resulting from a collision with the defective wire because the injury was one that might be reasonably anticipated or foreseen as a natural consequence of the wrongful act. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450-51 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The plaintiff has not shown a causative link between the alleged contamination and her injury sufficient to withstand the defendants' summary judgment motion when, as between contaminated and uncontaminated kerosene, a reasonable trier of fact could not exclude the latter so as to conclude that it was the former that caused her injury. William v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 584, 586 (Pon. 2002).

Speculation, guess and surmise may not be substituted for competent evidence, and where there are several possible causes of one accident, one or more of which a defendant is not responsible for, a plaintiff cannot recover without proving that the injury was sustained wholly or in part by a cause for which the defendant was responsible. William v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 584, 587 (Pon. 2002).

When a reasonable trier of fact could not exclude the plaintiff's playing with matches and uncontaminated – as opposed to contaminated – kerosene as the cause of her injuries, it follows that the record taken as a whole could not lead a rational trier of fact to find for her and that the defendants' summary judgment motion must be granted. William v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 584, 587 (Pon. 2002).

When a plaintiff's determination of ownership is for a lot with one number and the bank holds mortgages on lots with other numbers, the bank does not have a mortgage for the plaintiff's lot and there is no proximate cause between the bank acquiring the mortgage and any later alleged damage to the plaintiff's lot. Whether the mortgage was properly recorded is immaterial. If the plaintiff was damaged, the mortgage did not cause it. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 (Chk. 2005).

Causation and damages can appropriately be proven on a class basis when the basis for each resident's claim is the same: a shared traditional ownership of the right to use the marine natural resources appertaining to the municipalities of which each is resident and each class member is seeking to recover for a trespass or nuisance injury to their shared use right interest and the type of injury is common to all class members, such as inability to use or consume marine resources from the inner lagoon because of the necessary government ban on these and injury to particular resources because of the grounding and oil spill, i.e., the reef and mangrove areas. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 417 (Yap 2006).

Causation in maritime tort law is similar to the common law causation principle. A defendant's act or omission must be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. An injury is proximately caused by an act, or failure to act, whenever it appears from the evidence that the act or omission played a substantial part in bringing about or actually causing the injury or damage, and that the injury or damage was either a direct result or a reasonably probable consequence of the act or omission. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 417 (Yap 2006).

Causation and damages can appropriately be proven on a class basis when the basis for each person's claim is the same. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 160 (Yap 2007).

The circumstantial evidence proves proximate cause even though exactly how the reef was damaged – whether anchors and/or chains were dragged on the reef; or whether a detached or slack cable or chain used to connect the barge to the tugboat struck the reef; or whether one or both of the vessels struck the reef; or whether some combination of these was responsible – is undetermined since the damages occurred while the two vessels were on the site (or while just the barge was there) and since no other vessels were present at the time and the damage was of the type that must have been caused by one or more of the methods described. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 174-75 (Yap 2012).

When it was the decedent's own actions that were the proximate cause of his death, the causation element of wrongful death cannot be proven. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

When the delay before a referral to an off-island medical facility, regardless of who caused it, did not proximately cause the patient's death, it cannot be the basis to hold anyone liable for her death. William v.

Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

When the insurance carrier approved the patient's off-island referral within two days and was ready to put her on the earliest possible flight but the patient did not leave until 20 days later and when this long delay was the proximate cause of the patient's death, the insurance carrier's actions were not the proximate cause of her death because the insurance carrier did not cause the delay. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

When the employer provided the employee with a short safety briefing prior to his beginning work, but failed to provide him with the proper safety equipment necessary to safely perform his work duties, namely proper protective work shoes which are standard to the industry, it is clear that but for the employer's breach in not providing for or otherwise requiring the proper working boots before allowing him to begin work, he would not have been injured. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 29 (Pon. 2018).

– Comparative Negligence

Comparative negligence, which has displaced contributory negligence in most jurisdictions in the United States, should be given careful consideration by courts even though the Restatement (Second) of Torts refers only to contributory negligence and is silent about comparative negligence. There is reason to doubt that the FSM Supreme Court is bound by 1 F.S.M.C. 203 pointing to the Restatements as a guide for determining and applying the common law. Ray v. Electrical Contracting Corp., 2 FSM R. 21, 23 n.1 (App. 1985).

Apportionment of fault among several defendants in a personal injury case must be based on the Pohnpeian concept of "kaidehn peid sipal ieu dihp," which requires each wrongdoer to bear the consequences of his or her own fault. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 75 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

In keeping with the spirit of Pohnpeian custom, when defendants are at fault, they should share in the payment of damages based upon their share of liability. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 182, 185 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

In apportioning damages among negligent parties, the Pohnpei Supreme Court will consider the following factors: the Pohnpei Constitution, custom and tradition, the degree of negligence of each party, other jurisdictions' efforts to abolish joint liability, the need to minimize the role of insurance companies given Pohnpei's stage of development, the example of the U.S. insurance crisis, other jurisdictions' efforts to modify the rules governing joint and several liability, and American judges' assessments of joint and several liability. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 182, 185 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

The "pure system" of comparative negligence is available as a defense to defendants in Chuuk State. The defendant is entitled to a proportional reduction in any damage award upon proof that the plaintiff's negligence was in part the cause of his injuries. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 167-68 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where an employee is commanded to take an action which creates a known risk of injury, his obedience to the command will not bar subsequent recovery for injuries suffered, even where the risk of injury is apparent, but this will not excuse clearly reckless conduct by the employee where he had full knowledge of reasonable means to limit or prevent the injury. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 169 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

As a loss of consortium claim is derivative from a spouse's claim for damages an award for loss of consortium is properly reduced by the percentage of fault attributable to the spouse. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 170 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The doctrine of comparative negligence is more consistent with life in Pohnpei in that the doctrine recognizes that injuries and damages are often caused through a combination of errors and misjudgments by more than one person. Nothing in Pohnpei custom absolves a party who caused injury to another from the customary obligations of apology and reconciliation because the injured party's negligence contributed to the injury. Alfons v. Edwin, 5 FSM R. 238, 242 (Pon. 1991).

Comparative negligence, unlike contributory negligence permits assessment of relative degrees of responsibility and allows awards on that basis. Alfons v. Edwin, 5 FSM R. 238, 242 (Pon. 1991).

Doctrine of comparative negligence is more consistent with custom and tradition on Pohnpei unless, and until the highest Pohnpei state court rules otherwise. Alfons v. Edwin, 5 FSM R. 238, 242-43 (Pon. 1991).

In order for a third party's negligent conduct to afford any relief to defendants by way of a contributory (comparative) negligence theory, it must be demonstrated that the negligent act or omission somehow caused or contributed to the injury sustained and that there was not an independent or superseding cause. Ludwig v. Mailo, 5 FSM R. 256, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

Under the "pure" form of comparative negligence, which is a defense available in Chuuk, a defendant is entitled to a proportional reduction in any damage award upon proof that the plaintiff's negligence was in part the cause of his injuries, but the plaintiff may still recover for all of the harm attributable to the defendant's wrongdoing even if plaintiff's negligence was greater than the defendant's. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 66 (Chk. 1997).

Comparative negligence, not assumption of risk, is the rule in Pohnpei. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

Comparative fault is a preferable doctrine to that of contributory negligence, and should be considered the law in Pohnpei until and unless the Pohnpei Supreme Court rules otherwise. Primo v. Semes, 11 FSM R. 324, 330 (Pon. 2003).

Under comparative fault principles, a defendant will only be held liable for the percentage of fault he is found responsible for, if any. Primo v. Semes, 11 FSM R. 324, 330 (Pon. 2003).

Comparative fault or comparative negligence is the rule in Chuuk. Under the "pure system" of comparative negligence, which has been recognized as an available defense in Chuuk, a defendant is entitled to a proportional reduction in any damage award upon proof that the plaintiff's negligence was in part the cause of the plaintiff's injuries. Kileto v. Chuuk, 15 FSM R. 16, 18 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Neither contributory negligence nor comparative negligence is a defense to a conversion action. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 444-45 & n.5 (Pon. 2009).

Chuuk is a comparative negligence or comparative fault jurisdiction. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 49 (Chk. 2010).

The "pure system" of comparative negligence is applicable in Chuuk; that is, a defendant is liable only for the portion of the harm attributable to the defendant's wrongdoing. To illustrate, if the damage caused by a defendant was 12% greater than what the damage would have been, the defendant would be liable for no more than 12% of whatever actual monetary damages the plaintiffs could prove. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 49 (Chk. 2010).

Defenses to negligence, such as comparative negligence, which might lessen an award of damages, do not apply to the intentional tort of battery. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

Neither contributory nor comparative negligence is a defense against a common law action for conversion. For comparative negligence to be a defense, the plaintiff's cause of action must be one based on negligence. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356 (App. 2012).

Conversion is an intentional tort and not a cause of action based on negligence and thus comparative negligence cannot be a defense to conversion. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356 (App. 2012).

Chuuk is a comparative fault or comparative negligence jurisdiction and follows the "pure system" of comparative negligence. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 624 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When the defendant had pled comparative negligence as an affirmative defense, and the issue of who was at fault was tried, the trial court should consider comparative negligence when weighing the evidence about fault. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 624 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Conspiracy

In a case in which the defendant proposes a standard of requiring clear and convincing evidence in civil conspiracy cases rather than a preponderance based upon conditions, customs and traditions in Micronesia, it is incumbent upon him to establish such conditions by evidence, because the court will not take judicial notice of such conditions, customs or traditions. Opet v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 3 FSM R. 159, 164 (App. 1987).

In a case of civil conspiracy, the burden of proof is a preponderance of the evidence, not a clear and convincing standard, in order to establish the conspiracy. Opet v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 3 FSM R. 159, 164 (App. 1987).

In a civil case, the plaintiff has the burden of proving each element of his cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if he fails to do so, judgment will be entered against him. The preponderance of the evidence standard also applies to a civil action for conspiracy. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2009).

Liability for civil conspiracy depends on performance of some underlying tortious act. The conspiracy is not independently actionable; rather, it is a means for establishing vicarious liability for the underlying tort. The mere common plan, design or even express agreement is not enough for liability in itself, and there must be acts of a tortious character in carrying it into execution. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff has not met his burden of showing that the defendant is liable on any underlying tort theory, his claim that the defendant conspired to commit such a tort must also fail. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457-58 (Pon. 2009).

Since civil conspiracy is not a cause of action unless an underlying civil wrong has been committed and caused damage, when certain tort counterclaims have survived dismissal motions, the civil conspiracy counterclaim, limited to those underlying torts, will survive a motion to dismiss. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 605 (Pon. 2009).

Liability for civil conspiracy depends on performance of some underlying tortious act and is not independently actionable; rather, it is a means for establishing vicarious liability for the underlying tort. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 19 FSM R. 222, 226 (Chk. 2013).

Civil conspiracy is not an independently actionable tort because it requires the performance of some underlying tortious act, and is a means for establishing vicarious liability for that underlying tort. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 504 (Pon. 2020).

A civil conspiracy cause of action will likely not be dismissed for the failure to state a claim if the complaint also states a claim for one or more of the alleged underlying torts. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 504 (Pon. 2020).

– Contribution

The right of contribution among tortfeasors, where two or more persons become jointly or severally liable in tort for the same injury to a person, is subject to certain limitations which are set out in the statute that creates the cause of action for contribution among joint tortfeasors. Joy Enterprises, Inc. v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 8 FSM R. 306, 309 (Pon. 1998).

When a defendant's and plaintiff's prejudgment settlement, by its terms, did not extinguish or discharge a third-party defendant's potential liability to the plaintiff, the defendant's contribution action against the third-party defendant is barred, even though, since the statute of limitations had run, the settlement had the effect of extinguishing the plaintiff's potential claims against the third-party defendant. Under 6 F.S.M.C. 1202(4), for the defendant to be allowed to maintain a contribution action the settlement itself must either have discharged the common liability or extinguished the third-party defendant's liability. Joy Enterprises, Inc. v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 8 FSM R. 306, 311 & n.4 (Pon. 1998).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has recognized claims for indemnity based on contractual provisions between two parties, and required precise clarity in the indemnification clause language, it is not prepared to create a common law indemnity claim. Joy Enterprises, Inc. v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 8 FSM R. 306, 311 (Pon. 1998).

By statute, when two or more persons become jointly or severally liable in tort there is a right of contribution among them. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 495 (Pon. 1998).

The date of accrual for a contribution cause of action is the day the judgment was entered. Obviously a prerequisite to any successful contribution action based on a judgment is the judgment itself. The limitations period for a contribution action is six years. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 500-01 (Pon. 1998).

A person who has discharged more than his proportionate share of a duty owed by himself and another and who is entitled to contribution from the other is entitled to reimbursement limited to the proportionate amount of his net outlay properly expended. When incurred interest expense is part of his net outlay properly expended, the other should contribute toward the interest expense. Senda v. Semes, 8 FSM R. 484, 508 (Pon. 1998).

By statute, a tort-feasor who enters into a settlement agreement is not entitled to recover contribution from another tort-feasor whose liability for the injury or wrongful death is not extinguished by the settlement. Tom v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 9 FSM R. 82, 88 (App. 1999).

By statute, a tort-feasor, against whom there is no judgment, and who has agreed while the action was pending against him to discharge the common liability, may sue for contribution within one year of the agreement if he has paid the liability. Tom v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 9 FSM R. 82, 88 (App. 1999).

6 F.S.M.C. 1202(4) bars a contribution claim when a settlement agreement does not extinguish another tort-feasor's liability because that liability had already been extinguished by the relevant statute of limitations. Tom v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 9 FSM R. 82, 89 (App. 1999).

A defendant is barred from seeking contribution from a joint-tortfeasor when its settlement agreement with the plaintiffs recites that the release does not affect either the plaintiffs' or the defendant's claims against the joint tort-feasor. Tom v. Pohnpei Utilities Corp., 9 FSM R. 82, 89 (App. 1999).

When a defendant is granted summary judgment on the complaint against him, that defendant's cross-claim for contribution and indemnification from another defendant in the event that he is found liable on the complaint will be dismissed since he has no basis to seek indemnification or contribution because the summary judgment order dismissed the complaint against him. Kosrae v. Worswick, 10 FSM R. 288, 292 (Kos. 2001).

No right of contribution exists when a party has not paid more than his pro rata share of the common liability because there has not yet been any finding of liability against any party. Primo v. Semes, 11 FSM R. 324, 330 (Pon. 2003).

An action for contribution may be enforced by a separate action, or by motion when a judgment has been entered against two or more tort-feasors for the same injury or wrongful death, but when no judgment has yet been entered, claims for contribution are premature, and may not be brought by way of a counterclaim. Primo v. Semes, 11 FSM R. 324, 330 (Pon. 2003).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has recognized indemnity claims based on the parties' contractual provisions and has required precise clarity in the indemnification clause language, it has not been prepared to create a common law indemnity claim. Thus, when, even assuming the court were to find a defendant liable, there is no contractual provision for the plaintiff's indemnification by a defendant, a plaintiff's indemnity claim fails. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

Statutorily the right of contribution exists only in favor of a tort-feasor who has paid more than his pro rata share of the common liability, and his total recovery is limited to the amount paid by him in excess of his pro rata share. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 364 (App. 2012).

When no party has paid any of the judgment, an appellate court cannot rule on whether parties would be liable for contribution to a co-defendant since there can be no actual case or dispute until the co-defendant has paid more than its pro rata share because anything the appellate court says now would be an advisory opinion and it does not have any jurisdiction to give advisory opinions. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 364 (App. 2012).

Although the double negative in the statute may make it difficult to quickly grasp the statute's plain meaning, 6 F.S.M.C. 1202(4) bars a tort-feasor's contribution claim against another tort-feasor when the tort-feasor's settlement agreement does not extinguish the other tort-feasor's liability. Win Sheng Marine S. de R.L. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 20 FSM R. 13, 15 (Pon. 2015).

The statute bars a party from seeking contribution from a joint-tortfeasor when its settlement agreement with the claimants does not extinguish the joint tort-feasor's liability. Win Sheng Marine S. de R.L. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 20 FSM R. 13, 16 (Pon. 2015).

When 12 F.S.M.C. 1202(4) would permit the plaintiff to seek contribution from the defendant only if the plaintiff's settlement with the claimant had extinguished the defendant's potential liability and when the plaintiff's complaint clearly states that it did not, the defendant is entitled to judgment in its favor on the plaintiff's contribution claim. Win Sheng Marine S. de R.L. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 20 FSM R. 13, 16 (Pon. 2015).

– Contributory Negligence and Assumption of the Risk

Comparative negligence, which has displaced contributory negligence in most jurisdictions in the United States, should be given careful consideration by courts even though the Restatement (Second) of Torts refers only to contributory negligence and is silent about comparative negligence. There is reason to doubt that the FSM Supreme Court is bound by 1 F.S.M.C. 203 pointing to the Restatements as a guide for determining and applying the common law. Ray v. Electrical Contracting Corp., 2 FSM R. 21, 22 n.1 (App.

1985).

An employee who is performing a difficult task in one way and is given contrary instructions by his employer and who must be mindful of his employer's instructions or face a possible reprimand is not guilty of contributory negligence. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 66 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

Conduct on an employee's part, contributing as a legal cause to the harm he has suffered, which falls below the standard to which he is required to conform for his own protection, constitutes contributory negligence. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 67 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

The common Pohnpeian custom of assisting a person in need should not be dispensed with in order to allow the defense of contributory negligence or assumption of risk to be raised. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 67 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

Assumption of risk typically involves one of the following situations: 1) plaintiff has given his consent in advance to relieve defendant of an obligation of conduct toward him, and to take his chances of injury from a known risk arising from what defendant is to do or leave undone; 2) plaintiff voluntarily enters into a relation with defendant, with knowledge that defendant will not protect him against the risk; 3) plaintiff is aware of a risk already created by defendant's negligence, but proceeds to encounter it by voluntarily taking part even after the danger is known to him. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 67-68 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

Contributory negligence of the owner of property is not a defense available to the wrongdoer in an action for conversion brought by the owner of the property. Opet v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 3 FSM R. 159, 166 (App. 1987).

The doctrine of contributory negligence should not be adopted in Truk State in the absence of a statute because it is not in conformity with traditional Trukese concepts of responsibility; in Trukese custom, the wrongdoer cannot excuse his obligations to the injured person or the injured family by arguing that the injury was in part caused by the negligence of the injured party, or that someone else was also responsible. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 127 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

The absolute defenses of Assumption of the Risk and Contributory Negligence are contrary to the traditional Chuukese concepts of responsibility and shall not be available in Chuuk State. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 167 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where an employee is commanded to take an action which creates a known risk of injury, his obedience to the command will not bar subsequent recovery for injuries suffered, even where the risk of injury is apparent, but this will not excuse clearly reckless conduct by the employee where he had full knowledge of reasonable means to limit or prevent the injury. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 169 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

A plaintiff employee is not barred from recovery for his failure to exercise due care because defendant employer's conduct amounted to a reckless disregard for the safety of its employees. Alfons v. Edwin, 5 FSM R. 238, 241 (Pon. 1991).

Comparative negligence, not assumption of risk, is the rule in Pohnpei. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

Comparative fault is a preferable doctrine to that of contributory negligence, and should be considered the law in Pohnpei until and unless the Pohnpei Supreme Court rules otherwise. Primo v. Semes, 11 FSM R. 324, 330 (Pon. 2003).

"Assumption of the risk" is a common law defense to negligence, which acts as a complete bar to the plaintiff's recovery because it relieves the defendant of any duty of care to the plaintiff. Kileto v. Chuuk, 15

FSM R. 16, 17-18 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The assumption of the risk defense is contrary to the traditional Chuukese concepts of responsibility and is generally not available in Chuuk. Kileto v. Chuuk, 15 FSM R. 16, 18 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Those who dash in to save their own property from a peril created by the defendant's negligence, do not assume the risk where the alternative is to allow the threatened harm to occur. Kileto v. Chuuk, 15 FSM R. 16, 18 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

"Assumption of the risk" usually describes a common law negligence or other tort defense that acts as a complete bar to the plaintiff's recovery because it relieves the defendant of any duty of care to the plaintiff. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 281, 286 (Chk. 2009).

Neither contributory negligence nor comparative negligence is a defense to a conversion action. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 444-45 & n.5 (Pon. 2009).

Neither contributory nor comparative negligence is a defense against a common law action for conversion. For comparative negligence to be a defense, the plaintiff's cause of action must be one based on negligence. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356 (App. 2012).

– Conversion

Contributory negligence of the owner of property is not a defense available to the wrongdoer in an action for conversion brought by the owner of the property. Opet v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 3 FSM R. 159, 166 (App. 1987).

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. Bank of Guam v. Nukuto, 6 FSM R. 615, 616 (Chk. 1994).

Where the defendant has breached her fiduciary duty, and converted to her own personal use funds of others, has made no claim of right to any of the funds or offered any defense, and blame thus lies wholly with the defendant, the plaintiff will be allowed to recover its attorney's fees in order to make the victim whole. This is a narrowly drawn exception to the general rule parties will bear their own attorney's fees. Bank of Guam v. Nukuto, 6 FSM R. 615, 617-18 (Chk. 1994).

The elements of an action for conversion are the plaintiffs' ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

The measure of damages in conversion is the property's market value at the time of conversion plus the legal rate of interest. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

When there has been no wrongful taking or disposal of the goods, and the defendant has merely come rightfully into possession and then refused to surrender them, demand and refusal are necessary to the existence of the tort of conversion. Continued silence and inaction can amount to a refusal. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

Punitive damages may be recoverable for conversion where the defendant's act was accompanied by fraud, ill will, malice, recklessness, wantonness, oppressiveness, willful disregard of the plaintiff's rights, or other circumstances tending to aggravate the injury, but defendant's mere failure to respond to an inquiry, or to answer a complaint is not a circumstance entitling a plaintiff to punitive damages. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

The elements of an action for conversion are the party's ownership and right to possession of the property, the other party's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 519, 521 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A party's claim for conversion must fail and be dismissed when the has no ownership and rights to possession of the property because title has been confirmed in another. Jonas v. Paulino, 9 FSM R. 519, 521 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

An action for conversion requires proof of the following elements: 1) plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the property, 2) defendant's wrongful or unauthorized action of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and 3) damages. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 235 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When, although there is no dispute that the plaintiff's property was removed from its designated location without his consent and has not been recovered to date, the plaintiff did not prove by a preponderance of the evidence that either defendant converted the property by a wrongful act, the plaintiff cannot recover on his conversion claim. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

The doctrine of separation of powers is not violated every time a person, who happens to be a senator, allegedly misuses property that is traceable to an appropriation made under national law. If a senator takes a car, boat, desk, computer, or pen that rightfully is in the possession of another person or entity, he should bear the same responsibility and consequences as any other person: he could be charged criminally, or sued in a civil action by the rightful owner for conversion of that property. Pohnpei Cmty. Action Agency v. Christian, 10 FSM R. 623, 632 (Pon. 2002).

A claim that some private party has taken or deprived someone of their property is, if it was personal property that was allegedly taken, a claim for conversion or for trespass to chattels, and, if it was real property that was allegedly taken by some private party, it is a claim for trespass (including actions for ejectment) or possibly for nuisance (interference with use and enjoyment of land). They are not due process or takings claims. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Prejudgment interest has been allowed on conversion claims. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

The elements of an action for conversion are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128-29 (Chk. 2005).

When, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and accepting his well-pled allegations (which remain to be proven) as true, a corporation (while under receivership) took dominion over the plaintiff's property; quarried it for rock; crushed the rock into aggregate; sold it; paid various expenses, including workers' wages, the operator's fees, and the receiver's fee; and then paid the royalties, to which the corporation was entitled, to the bank to reduce its indebtedness to the bank, the bank never took dominion over the property the plaintiff alleges is his and the bank is therefore entitled to summary judgment in its favor as a matter of law on the plaintiff's conversion and the "unauthorized sale of property" (the quarried aggregate) claims. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 129 (Chk. 2005).

The elements of a conversion cause of action are: 1) the plaintiffs' ownership and right to possession of the personal property in question; 2) the defendant's unauthorized or wrongful act of dominion over the property that is hostile or inconsistent with the right of the owner; and 3) damages resulting from such action. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438 (Pon. 2009).

Insurance agents took action inconsistent with and hostile to the insurer's ownership of premium checks when they cashed, or authorized the cashing of, the checks. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438 (Pon. 2009).

An employee is herself jointly and severally liable with her employers for the checks she converted by cashing them while she was their employee because, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, an agent's act within the scope of his or her agency is the act of the principal, and the result is that both the principal and the agent are jointly and severally liable to the person injured by the wrongful act. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438 (Pon. 2009).

Even as an insurance agency's employee, the employee had a duty not to cash premium checks without first confirming with the insurer that she had the authority to cash the checks. By failing to do so, the employee intentionally deprived the insurer of its property, and is thus liable for the conversion of the checks that she cashed while she was an the agency's employee. The employers and the employee are jointly and severally liable for the checks that the employee cashed during the time that the employers were acting as the insurer's general agents. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 439 (Pon. 2009).

"Forgery" is a signature of a person that is made without the person's consent and without the person otherwise authorizing it. Signing another's signature with authorization is not forgery. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 440 (Pon. 2009).

When a check is made out to a corporate payee; when the corporate payee's name was endorsed on the reverse side; when the defendant failed to take any steps to determine whether the endorsement was genuine and whether the purported "agent" seeking to cash the checks was authorized by the corporation to do so, the trust placed in the customer was misplaced. In cashing the checks without first verifying the authority of the one seeking to cash the checks, the defendant cashed the checks at its own peril and by depositing the checks into its bank account and receiving credits for those checks, the defendant exercised dominion and control over the checks and was therefore liable for conversion. The good faith of the one cashing the check does not enter into the picture. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 440 (Pon. 2009).

It is a corporation's usual practice to deposit checks payable to it in a bank account Given this consideration, when a person is asked to cash a check bearing a corporate endorsement he is put on his guard and should verify that the endorsement is authentic, and should take the necessary steps to make certain that the person attempting to cash the check is authorized to do so by the payee corporation. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 440 (Pon. 2009).

An actor may be liable for conversion when he has in fact exercised dominion or control and the actor's intention, good or bad faith, and his knowledge or mistake are immaterial. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 441 (Pon. 2009).

Punitive damages may be recovered for conversion when the defendant's acts were accompanied by fraud, malice, recklessness, oppressiveness, or willful disregard of the plaintiff's rights that aggravated the injury or loss inflicted by the defendant. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 441-42 (Pon. 2009).

Although conversion by its nature involves wrongful acts that are hostile to an owner's interest in property, and although the defendants' actions in cashing premium checks were wrongful and showed a disregard of the plaintiff's property rights, that disregard was not sufficient to impose punitive damages because, when the checks were converted, they were converted in material part in the course of the agents' efforts to expedite services to the insurer's policy holders Nor will the court award punitive damages against the business cashing the checks because, while the business's actions in cashing the checks was wrongful, its employees relied in good faith on the insurance agents' representations that they were authorized to cash the checks. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 442 (Pon. 2009).

Conversion is the civil equivalent of theft. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 443 (Pon. 2009).

An insurer has no duty to its agents to undertake an investigation for the agents' benefit in order to stop the agents from converting the insurer's property. When the insurer's property was converted by the agents' intentional actions, the agents cannot argue that the insurer should have known that they were converting – stealing – the insurer's property, and that since the insurer should have stopped them but did not stop them from doing what they had no right to do, the agents should not have to pay back what they took. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 443 (Pon. 2009).

Neither contributory negligence nor comparative negligence is a defense to a conversion action. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 444-45 & n.5 (Pon. 2009).

A defendant cannot turn the tables on a plaintiff and conclude that the plaintiff was negligent for failing to detect and prevent the conversion earlier than it did. Such a rule, which the court will not adopt, would serve to blame the tort victim. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

A business that was presented, over a period of approximately three-and-a-half years, with checks amounting to over $400,000 that were made payable to a corporate payee, but that cashed the checks at the request of the individual cashing those checks without ever making any efforts to obtain independent confirmation that the individual presenting the check had the corporate payee's authority to do so, cannot rely on defenses of mitigation of damages or apparent authority or good faith commercial standards since the business had a duty to determine whether the individuals had the authority to cash the checks. The business cannot be said to have used good faith commercial business standards. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

A defense that the plaintiff should have made a claim against its errors and omissions policy is without merit even if such a policy existed, because the contract expressly addresses what happens. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

When there is no way of determining what portion of an amount deposited into a bank account was also converted by another defendant and since the plaintiff has the burden of proof, that other defendant will receive the benefit of the doubt created by this question and will not be held liable for the deposited sums. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 447 (Pon. 2009).

One whose property is converted is entitled to recover interest at the legal rate from the time the property is converted. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 448 (Pon. 2009).

Attorney's fees will not be awarded to the plaintiff insurer when the conversion arose as part of the insurer's agents' efforts to address customer concerns about the time it took for policy holders to receive their checks for loans taken out on their policies or for their policies' partial or full surrender value when a substantial amount of the cash obtained from the premium checks was distributed to policy holders and when, once the problem was identified, the current agent was cooperative in helping the insurer determine what sums were missing. Nor will attorney's fees be awarded against the business that cashed the checks, since it acted in reliance on the insurer's agents' representations when its employees cashed the checks. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 449 (Pon. 2009).

Neither contributory nor comparative negligence is a defense against a common law action for conversion. For comparative negligence to be a defense, the plaintiff's cause of action must be one based on negligence. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356 (App. 2012).

Conversion is an intentional tort and not a cause of action based on negligence and thus comparative negligence cannot be a defense to conversion. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356

As a matter of law, no type of negligence is a defense to the intentional tort of conversion. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356 (App. 2012).

In common law jurisdictions, conversion is an intentional tort giving rise to strict liability. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356 (App. 2012).

Conversion is a strict liability tort. The tort-feasor's intent and knowledge are irrelevant to his liability. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356 (App. 2012).

Conversion is a strict liability tort whereby the foundation of the action rests neither in the knowledge nor the intent of the defendant. Specifically, a defendant can be liable for conversion even when he acted in good faith, lacked knowledge of the conversion, or lacked motive to commit the tort. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 356-57 (App. 2012).

A conversion action is a species of strict liability in which the defendant's good faith, due care, ignorance or mistake are irrelevant and may not be set up as a defense. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 357 (App. 2012).

In a conversion suit, it is no defense that the defendant was not negligent or that the defendant acquired the plaintiff's property through the plaintiff's unilateral mistake, or that the defendant acted in complete innocence and perfect good faith. That is not to say that there are no defenses to a conversion action. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 357 (App. 2012).

A defendant may successfully defend a conversion action by proving that the plaintiff consented to the defendant's taking, or that the defendant had rights in the property superior to the plaintiff's, or that the plaintiff has waived its cause of action, or that the plaintiff is estopped from asserting any right to the property. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 357 (App. 2012).

It is not logical that any individual would have apparent authority to cash a check with a corporate payee, especially a foreign corporation. The corporation's agents may have had apparent authority to perform a number of acts on the corporation's behalf, but cashing checks with the corporation as the payee was not one of them. One who pays out on such a check does so at his own peril. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 359 (App. 2012).

For a retail/wholesale store to cash checks with a corporate payee, particularly a large, off-island corporate payee with an off-island address printed on the check's face, with only an individual's personal endorsement and without written authorization from the corporate payee cannot possibly be considered a good faith commercial business standard. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 359 (App. 2012).

As a matter of law, no individual can ever have the apparent authority to cash a check that has a corporation as the payee, and, as a matter of law, any business that cashes such a check with a corporate payee is not engaged in a commercially reasonable business practice. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 359-60 (App. 2012).

When an insurer, by its acts, ratified only the unauthorized agreements between its agents and its eligible policy-holders – the distribution of cash advances to eligible policy-holders, it "recovered" those funds from its policy-holders and since the insurer is not entitled to a double recovery, it cannot hold others liable for those sums and must give them credit for those sums. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

Although good faith and mistake are not defenses to an action for conversion, a plaintiff's damages will be reduced if the defendant returns the property or the plaintiff otherwise recovers the property. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

Negligence is not a defense to conversion. This includes negligence in hiring the agent who stole or negligence in not discovering the losses sooner. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 361 (App. 2012).

Barring the plaintiff from recovery for losses after it learned that its agent was continuing to cash its premium checks despite its explicit instructions not to, may have a certain appeal to it, but is untenable when the agent had earlier admitted to her stepfather, the defendant's principal, that she had been doing something she should not have, cashing the plaintiff's checks, because the defendant was thus on notice that it should not cash the plaintiff's checks any more. Yet it did. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 362 (App. 2012).

Since conversion is an action at law, laches is not a defense that can be used against a conversion claim. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 362 (App. 2012).

A corporation is not required to warn businesses not to cash checks that have the corporation as the payee since those business should not be cashing checks payable to a large, off-island corporation, anyway. The check casher has the duty to determine whether the person seeking to cash a check with a corporate payee is authorized by the corporation to do so, if it is going to cash the check. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

When prejudgment interest is awarded in a conversion case, the interest starts running on the date of the conversion. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

When even if a petitioner had not signed any of the converted checks, that would not alter the trial court's finding that she had authorized another to sign her name and thus the result would not change and the petitioners would still be liable to the appellee. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 406, 408 (App. 2012).

The elements of an action for conversion are: 1) the plaintiffs' ownership and right to possession of the personalty, 2) the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and 3) resulting damages. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 529 (Pon. 2013).

When the employee's unauthorized issuance of one-way plane tickets resulted in a wrongful and unauthorized act of dominion over her employer's funds and was inconsistent with or hostile to its rights as owners of those funds since the employee's actions caused the employer to pay for the unauthorized tickets using company funds, all the elements for conversion are present and have been proven and that employee is liable to her employer under the tort of conversion for conversion for all of the tickets that were issued by her for her mother and sister from Pohnpei to Charleston, South Carolina and return because she is the person who converted the funds. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 530-31 (Pon. 2013).

Whatever arrangements regarding who would be responsible for the payment of the plane tickets that might have been made between an employee's mother and sister and an employee who charged plane tickets for her mother and her sister to her employer does not affect the employee's liability to her employer for all of the tickets because the employee cannot shift liability to another party without her employer's agreement although the employee will be credited for any payments she and her sister made since the employer is not entitled to double recovery. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 531 (Pon. 2013).

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 531 (Pon. 2013).

Conversion is the civil equivalent of theft. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 457 n.1 (Chk. 2014).

Conversion has a six-year statute of limitations. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460 (Chk. 2014).

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 462 (Chk. 2014).

When it has been established that the plaintiff was contractually obligated to pay the sum specified in the invoice, the plaintiff's claim that the defendant's refusal to return his vehicle to his possession until the invoice was paid in full amounted to conversion must fail. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2014).

The elements of an action for conversion are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 602 (App. 2014).

Although conversion has sometimes been called the civil equivalent of theft that is not an accurate description. It is not the same as theft. The crime of theft requires the intent to permanently deprive another of the property. Conversion only requires the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property be inconsistent with the owner's right. It does not require the intent to permanently deprive the owner of its property. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 602 (App. 2014).

A defendant's argument that she did not steal the property alleged converted and that no criminal case was filed is irrelevant. A conversion may occur even when the defendant has every intention of returning the property. Conversion is a strict liability tort whose foundation rests neither in the knowledge nor the intent of the defendant so a defendant can be liable for conversion even when he acted in good faith, lacked knowledge of the conversion, or lacked motive to commit the tort. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 602 (App. 2014).

When the factual finding that the employee took dominion over her employer's property (its money used to pay for tickets) without its permission is not clearly erroneous, and when the other elements of conversion are undisputed, the elements of conversion have been met. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 602 (App. 2014).

A defendant may successfully defend a conversion action by proving that the plaintiff consented to the defendant's taking, or that the defendant had rights in the property superior to the plaintiff's, or that the plaintiff has waived its cause of action, or that the plaintiff is estopped from asserting any right to the property. Ihara v. Vitt, 19 FSM R. 595, 603 (App. 2014).

Unlawful misappropriation of funds seems to be the same cause of action as conversion. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 488 (Chk. 2016).

The elements of an action for conversion are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 488 (Chk. 2016).

When, under prior precedent and the law of the case doctrine, the state government is immune from an interest award as a part of a judgment against the state unless the state has expressly consented to the imposition of interest and when the state government has not expressly consented, by statute or by contract, to the imposition of interest for claims or for a conversion claim, no interest will be permitted. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 489 (Chk. 2016).

The elements of an action for conversion are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 545 (Chk. 2016).

When the municipalities owned and had a right to possess, as their current account funds, the subject CI funds; when the state government's unauthorized use of those funds for its own purposes was an exercise of dominion over those funds inconsistent with the municipalities' right to them, and the municipalities were damaged, in the amount of their missing funds, by not being able to use those funds themselves, the municipalities have made out a prima facie case that they are entitled to summary judgment for the funds that the state government converted. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 545 (Chk. 2016).

The elements of a conversion action are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 37 (Pon. 2016).

When a parcel was pledged as collateral for a loan in an executed security instrument and when the borrowers defaulted on the loan and the lender bank instituted enforcement proceedings and was allowed to enforce the mortgage's terms, the borrowers surrendered their ownership interest in this parcel and the ultimate transfer of ownership, as approved by the FSM Supreme Court, cannot be categorized as "wrongful or unauthorized," or a "frozen asset," when the borrowers had earlier obtained a Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure determination of heirship for the parcel that named them as the legal heirs to the property. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 37-38 (Pon. 2016).

The elements of a conversion cause of action are: 1) the plaintiffs' ownership and right to possession of the personal property in question; 2) the defendant's unauthorized or wrongful act of dominion over the property that is hostile or inconsistent with the owner's right; and 3) damages resulting from such action. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 189 (Pon. 2017).

An owner consented to the taking of his property by instructing the defendant to remove the vehicle, and the consent was direct because the owner requested that the defendant take the vehicle from his home, and indirect through the person at his home who directed the defendant to take the vehicle. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 189 (Pon. 2017).

A defendant may successfully defend a conversion action by proving that the plaintiff consented to the defendant's taking, or that the defendant had rights in the property superior to the plaintiff's, or that the plaintiff has waived its cause of action, or that the plaintiff is estopped from asserting any right to the property. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 189 (Pon. 2017).

The elements of a conversion action are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. "Personalty" is personal property as distinguished from real property. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

Realty – real property cannot be "converted." Any such conversion claim is misconceived. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

A litigant's "conversion" claim over real estate can be conceived as a quiet title claim. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 555 (App. 2018).

The elements of an action for conversion are the plaintiffs' ownership and right to possession of the personalty, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 36

(Chk. 2018).

The national government, through Compact of Free Association funding, has an ownership right and a right to possess access to the Chuuk EPA overseas account, the account itself, and the minutes used to make these calls, but when it is unable to show that the calls were non-official, it has not met its burden of proof on its conversion claim that the defendant's actions were wrongful or that his action resulted in an unauthorized act of dominion over the government's right or control. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 36 (Chk. 2018).

Only personal property (personalty) can be subject to conversion; real property cannot. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 161 (Chk. 2019).

A defendant cannot plead, as a defense to a conversion claim, the alleged superior right of a third party (jus tertii – the right of a third party) to the property; a defendant can only plead its own defenses, not those of another. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 200 (Pon. 2019).

The right and title of a third party, the so-called jus tertii defense, is not in and of itself a good defense to an action for conversion. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 200 (Pon. 2019).

One who is otherwise liable to another for harm or interference with a chattel is not relieved of that liability because a third person has a legally protected interest in the chattel superior to that of the other. This general rule applies to actions for conversion. The common law name for the right of a third person was jus tertii. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 201 (Pon. 2019).

The application of jus tertii in conversion of chattels means that the modern tort of conversion subjects the wrongdoer to liability to the possessor for the chattel's entire value in addition to any special damages resulting from the conversion, and this liability does not depend on the existence of the possessor's responsibility to the owner for the chattel's loss. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 201 (Pon. 2019).

To maintain a common law action for conversion, a plaintiff must establish that he was in possession of the goods, or entitled to possession at the time of the conversion, and this rule has even been applied to permit recovery by one whose possession is wrongful, and in defiance of the owner, although in all such cases the plaintiff has been in possession under some colorable claim of right. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 201 (Pon. 2019).

The converter may also be liable to a person entitled to immediate possession of the chattel or to one entitled to future possession of the chattel. It is immaterial that the one in possession of the chattel is not entitled to retain possession as against some third person, or that he has obtained possession wrongfully. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 201 (Pon. 2019).

When the insureds received refunds through their employer, as what should occur only for group insurance policies, not individual insurance policies, and when the insurer instructed the employer to stop all employee payroll deductions for supplemental group life insurance, the insurer did not convert the insureds' money and was not unjustly enriched. Barnabas v. Individual Assurance Co., 22 FSM R. 252, 257 (Pon. 2019).

For a conversion claim, a prejudgment interest award under maritime law does not differ from a common law award for conversion, because, under the common law, one whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 314 n.4 (Pon. 2019).

Conversion can be a maritime tort, and, when it is, it gives rise to a maritime lien. Admiralty jurisdiction over a conversion claim depends on whether the chattel was on navigable waters when the alleged wrongful exercise of dominion occurred. Maritime conversion is an intentional tort that gives rise to a preferred maritime lien. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 314 (Pon. 2019).

In the admiralty context, as elsewhere, conversion is simply an intentional and wrongful exercise of dominion or control over a chattel, which seriously interferes with the owner's right in the chattel. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 314 (Pon. 2019).

The failure to return property, possession of which was acquired lawfully, when the owner is entitled to its return and makes demand therefor, is a tortious conversion. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 314 (Pon. 2019).

The measure of damages for conversion is the property's market value at the time and place of conversion plus the legal rate of interest from the date of the conversion. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

A conversion is complete when the defendant takes, detains, or disposes of the chattel. At that point, the plaintiff acquires the right to enforce a sale, and recover the property's full value. The defendant cannot undo his wrong by forcing the goods back upon their owner, either as a bar to the action, or in mitigation of damages. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Regardless of how accurate a May 9, 2019 appraisal was, it cannot be used to establish conversion damages where no evidence relates that appraised value to the chattels' value eight to ten months earlier when the chattels were allegedly converted. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Even if the conversion occurs in good faith, the plaintiff may nonetheless recover damages beyond the converted property's fair market value. Thus, damages for lost profits are allowed when, either from the article's nature or the case's peculiar circumstances, they might be reasonably supposed to follow from the conversion, even though this recovery of lost profits is above and beyond the chattels' market value. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

The general rule is that compensation for lost profits may be recovered in an action for conversion, when the loss is the proximate result of the defendant's act and the loss can be shown with reasonable certainty. Thus, although the usual measure for conversion damages is the property's value at the time and place of conversion, plus interest, and lost profits may also be recovered if they may reasonably be expected to follow from the conversion. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Lost profit damages can be awarded for conversion when the plaintiff shows that, but for the conversion, a profit would have been realized from the items converted and shows the extent thereof with reasonable certainty. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Awards for lost business profits are appropriate damages in a conversion case when proved with reasonable certainty. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315-16 (Pon. 2019).

It would be improper to allow lost business profit damages in every case involving conversion. The damages would only be proper when the person whose property has been converted shows that the conversion has resulted in lost business profits and shows with reasonable certainty the amount of these lost profits. Lost profits is the proper measure of damages, as opposed to lost gross receipts, and this damages amount need only be shown with as much certainty as the tort's nature and the case's circumstances permit. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 316 (Pon. 2019).

Recovery for lost rental income may be limited in time until when the plaintiff could have obtained a replacement for his rental business since, if a plaintiff could have avoided the loss by purchasing a substitute item, profits from that point on are not the measure of the plaintiff's recovery even if profits were in fact lost. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 316 (Pon. 2019).

Conversion, when committed on navigable waters, is a maritime tort that creates a maritime lien. The measure of damages in a maritime conversion is the property's market value at the time and place of its conversion plus the legal rate of interest from that date, and to these damages, the plaintiff's lost profits can be added when that loss can reasonably be expected to follow from the conversion, or is the proximate result of the defendant's conversion, and when the amount of that loss can be shown with reasonable certainty. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 316 (Pon. 2019).

The elements of a conversion action are the plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the personal property, the defendant's wrongful or unauthorized act of dominion over the plaintiff's property inconsistent with or hostile to the owner's right, and resulting damages. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361-62 (Pon. 2019).

– Damages

The Pohnpei Supreme Court will adhere to the common law rule followed by the former Trust Territory High Court that the wrongdoer in an automobile accident is not obliged to repair the damaged vehicle nor to pay its original cost; his only obligation is to pay the plaintiff-owner the amount of his loss. Phillip v. Aldis, 3 FSM R. 33, 37 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

To determine damages in a personal injury case, the Pohnpei Supreme Court will consider the victim's loss of income, as well as his inability to provide support through fishing and farming as a result of his disability. To determine the total loss of income, the court will assume that income would be earned until the age of sixty, which is the mandatory retirement age for government employees, though not for private employees. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 73 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

To determine a monetary value for loss of consortium, the Pohnpei Supreme Court will consider the social structure of the society and the extended family system, whereby other members of the family can be expected to provide some, albeit occasional, assistance. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 74 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court declines to adopt the "collateral source" rule, according to which alternative sources of income available to a victim are not allowed to be deducted from the amount the negligent party owes, because it does not want to discourage customary forms of family restitution. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 74 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

In apportioning damages among negligent parties, the Pohnpei Supreme Court will consider the following factors: the Pohnpei Constitution, custom and tradition, the degree of negligence of each party, other jurisdictions' efforts to abolish joint liability, the need to minimize the role of insurance companies given Pohnpei's stage of development, the example of the U.S. insurance crisis, other jurisdictions' efforts to modify the rules governing joint and several liability, and American judges' assessments of joint and several liability. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 182, 185 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

In a wrongful death claim in Truk State, where the total pecuniary estimated loss was $15,288 and where an infant child lost his mother, there should be a finding for the plaintiff in the maximum amount allowed by law, $50,000. Asan v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 51, 56-57 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

The mental anguish or grief aspect of a damage award reflects the loss of a broad range of mutual benefits each family member normally receives from others' continued existence, including love, affection, care, attention, companionship, comfort and protection. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 130 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

The term "pecuniary injury" as used in wrongful death statutes traditionally has been interpreted as including the probable support, services and other contributions that reasonably could have been expected by the beneficiaries had the decedent lived out her full life expectancy, all reduced to present worth. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 365 (Yap 1990).

Where the court cannot compel the state to honor an illegal and/or unconstitutional lease it can order the state to restore the illegally held land, with any and all public improvements removed, to its rightful owner who may also be entitled to damages. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 137 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Despite lack of evidence of medical expenses, either that medical treatment was necessary, or that medical treatment was obtained as a result of injuries the court is entitled to presume that some expenditures were made and finds that plaintiff should recover damages for those expenses, even in the absence of proof of purchase. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

An injured victim is entitled to recover for mental anguish, including humiliation, resulting from unlawful conduct in violation of the victim's civil rights. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 146 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

As a loss of consortium claim is derivative from a spouse's claim for damages an award for loss of consortium is properly reduced by the percentage of fault attributable to the spouse. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 170 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

A statutory cap on the amount and scope of recovery in a wrongful death action, lawfully enacted by the Kosrae legislature, does not interfere with traditional Kosraean or Micronesian compensation of a victim's family by the tortfeasor. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 361 (Kos. 1992).

Where a plaintiff makes damage claims in tort as well damage claims based on contract, contract clauses limiting the contract damages do not apply. McGillivray v. Bank of the FSM (I), 6 FSM R. 404, 409 (Pon. 1994).

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. Bank of Guam v. Nukuto, 6 FSM R. 615, 616 (Chk. 1994).

Where the defendant has breached her fiduciary duty, and converted to her own personal use funds of others, has made no claim of right to any of the funds or offered any defense, and blame thus lies wholly with the defendant, the plaintiff will be allowed to recover its attorney's fees in order to make the victim whole. This is a narrowly drawn exception to the general rule parties will bear their own attorney's fees. Bank of Guam v. Nukuto, 6 FSM R. 615, 617-18 (Chk. 1994).

Actual, not speculative, damages must be proven in order to award damages for wrongful restraint. Estimates of lost gross receipts are insufficient because a claimant is only entitled to lost profits. Sellem v. Maras, 7 FSM R. 1, 6 & n.10 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Normally, the measure of damages in case of the purchase of personal property induced by misrepresentation is the difference between the fair market value of the property if the true condition were known and what the plaintiff paid for the property. Eram v. Masaichy, 7 FSM R. 223, 226 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Failure of a creditor to notify the debtor of its failure to obtain insurance is negligence. As a consequence the creditor is liable to the debtor for the entire amount of the debtors' loss, otherwise the debtor is only entitled to return of full amount of insurance premiums paid. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

Where a defendant has trespassed on a plaintiff's land by constructing improvements thereon the measure of damages due the plaintiff is an amount equal to the fair market rental value of the land in the place located over the period of use, and also an amount for any damage to trees or food plants during the defendant's use of the property and for any conditions caused by the defendant's trespass and use such as the construction of a garbage dump. Ikanur v. Director of Educ., 7 FSM R. 275, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

In a trespass case, a defendant who made improvements to the plaintiff's property is entitled to offset the value of the improvements against damages caused to the plaintiff's property during the trespass, but all improvements made by the defendant on land without the plaintiff's permission become the plaintiff's property and the defendant has no right to any further use of the improvements without the plaintiff's permission. Ikanur v. Director of Educ., 7 FSM R. 275, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Where a defendant's negligence proximately caused plaintiffs' home to be unsanitary and uninhabitable the measure of damages is the replacement value of the personal property lost and the fair market value of a replacement rental house for the time that the plaintiff's house was uninhabitable. Sandy v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 316, 318 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

An entry of default does not relieve a plaintiff of the burden of proving the damages that flowed from the liability thus established. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 428 (Pon. 1996).

A tortfeasor is responsible for all damages flowing from his actions, including injuries related to medical care and treatment. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 430 (Pon. 1996).

Damages for lost future earnings are not awardable where they are duplicative and speculative, but damages may be awarded for financial and emotional loss, and for loss, at present value, of customary services that a child would have preformed if not for her wrongful death. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 433-34 (Pon. 1996).

Compensatory damages for personal injury may include medical expanses incurred, lost wages, impairment of future ability to earn, and other specific costs that accrued as a result of the injury. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 548 (Chk. 1996).

Compensatory damages awarded a party for the violation of civil rights includes reasonable attorney fees and costs of suit. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 549 (Chk. 1996).

The measure of damages in conversion is the property's market value at the time of conversion plus the legal rate of interest. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

A specific claim for lost wages that accrued as a result of an injury at the hands of the defendants may be recovered as part of compensatory damages. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 195 (Pon. 1997).

Compensatory damages may be awarded a party who is deprived of civil rights. This award of damages includes reasonable attorney fees and costs of suit. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 196 (Pon. 1997).

Damages for waste are normally the difference in value of the property before and after the act of waste. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

The damages for waste committed are usually measured by the injury actually sustained and if the value of the premises has been improved by the acts complained of, the complainants will only recover nominal damages, if any, at law. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

Damages for waste can also be determined by the cost of repairing or replacing what was wasted when the damage is small in comparison to property's total value and the amount is readily ascertainable. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 245 (Pon. 1998).

A lessor may not recover damages for waste when the removal of termite-infested lumber from uninhabitable houses while trying to turn the houses into a bar improved the value of the property, and because if the property had been abandoned without trying to turn the houses into a bar, the lessor would still have become the owner of two uninhabitable houses. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 245 (Pon. 1998).

Where is little guidance in the prior decided opinions of the FSM Supreme Court for damage awards in privacy cases, the court will look to the reasoning of courts in other jurisdictions for guidance in assessing damages. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

A party that has established a cause of action for invasion of privacy is entitled to recover damages for the harm to his or her interest in privacy resulting from the invasion; mental distress proved to have been suffered if it is of a kind that normally results from such an invasion; and special damage of which the invasion is a legal cause. Special damages are demonstrable, direct economic losses resulting from the invasion of privacy. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 & n.1 (Pon. 1998).

The gist of the cause of action for invasion of privacy is for direct wrongs of a personal character which result in injury to the plaintiff's feelings, mental and emotional suffering are proper elements of damages. Substantial damages may be recovered, even if the only damages suffered resulted from mental anguish. These damages may include compensation for the wounded feelings, embarrassment, humiliation, and mental pain which a person of ordinary sensibilities would suffer under the circumstances. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

The measure of compensatory damages in a case involving commercial appropriation of one's name or likeness is the value of the benefit derived by the person appropriating the other's name, or the pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiff whose name has been appropriated. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

In privacy cases in which a plaintiff also seeks damages for unjust enrichment, only one recovery is available because an invasion of another's right of privacy by a publication confers no right to share in the proceeds of such publication's sale of upon the ground that the author has thereby been unjustly enriched. It is inconsistent for the plaintiff to seek recovery for an invasion of the right of privacy, and in the same suit, to claim the right to participate in the profits of the publication. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

When there is little instruction in previously decided FSM cases for assessing damages in an invasion of privacy case, privacy cases in other jurisdictions may provide some useful guidance. FSM cases awarding damages for mental pain and suffering outside the privacy context are also instructive. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 418 (Pon. 1998).

When there is no direct evidence of the amount of damages sustained, nor the amount of money that can compensate for an injury, the court, as trier of fact, must assess an appropriate level of compensatory damages for that injury. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 418 (Pon. 1998).

Compensatory damages for unjust enrichment will be not awarded when this claim conflicts with plaintiff's claim for compensatory damages for invasion of privacy because it is inconsistent for a plaintiff who wishes to recover for invasion of privacy to also claim the right to participate in the profits of publication and because when a privacy cause of action is brought together with another cause of action based on the same objectionable behavior under another theory, generally only one recovery may be awarded. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 418-19 (Pon. 1998).

Damages for lost future earnings are not awardable when they are duplicative and speculative. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 454 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Plaintiffs' children are not entitled to recover damages when they are not named as plaintiffs to the action. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 542 (Pon. 1998).

The measure of damages for impairment of earning capacity is the difference between the amount which the plaintiff was capable of earning before the injury and the amount which he or she is capable of earning thereafter. Mathebei v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 9 FSM R. 23, 26 (Yap 1999).

Where the effect of an injury continues over time, earnings impairment will have two components: the loss sustained from the time of injury until time of trial, designated "loss of time" or lost wages, and the prospective loss that plaintiff will experience after trial due to the injury's on-going impact. The plaintiff has the burden of proof with respect to impairment, which must be demonstrated with a reasonable degree of certainty; however, proof of impairment of earning capacity does not require the specificity necessary to establish lost prospective wages. Mathebei v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 9 FSM R. 23, 26 (Yap 1999).

A plaintiff must introduce evidence of his or her earning capacity prior to the injury. Even if there is no evidence of the extent of future loss, evidence of prior earnings warrants recovery for the impairment of future earning capacity which the injury would generally cause. Mathebei v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 9 FSM R. 23, 27 (Yap 1999).

A plaintiff's education or lack of education may be considered in determining the amount of damages sustained by diminished earning capacity where the plaintiff has been engaged in manual labor and is incapacitated from doing that type of work. Mathebei v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 9 FSM R. 23, 27 (Yap 1999).

Damages for reduction of future earning capacity are not for the wages themselves, but for the loss of the ability to earn money. Mathebei v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 9 FSM R. 23, 27 (Yap 1999).

Limitation of employment opportunities resulting from lack of education is a specific factor which a court may consider in awarding damages for reduced earning capacity. Mathebei v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 9 FSM R. 23, 27 (Yap 1999).

Damages for a sawmill employee's lost wages will be awarded only for the time period that the sawmill remained in business. When there is no evidence regarding other type of work that the plaintiff did prior to his sawmill employment, the court will decline to award damages for other potential lost wages as being speculative. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A plaintiff who is proud to participate in a ceremony can suffer embarrassment and emotional upset over the commercialization of a photograph of his participation in the ceremony. Because the two findings are not inconsistent and there is evidence in the record to support this conclusion, the damages awarded the plaintiff for invasion of privacy will be affirmed as not clearly erroneous. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc. v. Mauricio, 9 FSM R. 155, 159 (App. 1999).

When a plaintiff has not been awarded damages, the question is not whether he made his case for damages with the requisite specificity, but whether he has shown entitlement to damages in the first instance. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 193 (App. 1999).

In an action for damage to personal property, the plaintiff may recover the cost of the repairs to the damaged property. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2000).

As a separate item of damages, and in addition to the cost of repairs, a plaintiff is entitled to be compensated for the loss of the use of the property. Customary rental charges are an adequate measure of damage for loss of use, and are awardable even when the plaintiff has not rented a substitute. The period for which the rental is allowed is the reasonable time that it would take to repair the damaged property. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2000).

If loss-of-use damages is measured by either rental or replacement value and if repairs take a considerable period of time, damages should be measured not on the basis of rental value or replacement cost for the entire period, and not by the aggregate of the charges by the day or week. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2000).

The damages for loss of use of property may not exceed the value of the property. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2000).

An award for a car's loss of use for a sum substantially more than the car's original price – not to mention its value at the time of the incident – would, in addition to the money necessary to effect the repairs, result in a windfall to the plaintiffs and is not appropriate. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2000).

When ten days is a reasonable time in which to obtain auto parts and two weeks is a reasonable time in which to make repairs once the parts have arrived, and when seven days is a reasonable time in which to arrange financing for the repairs, loss of use damages will be awarded for those days. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 457-58 & n.2 (Pon. 2000).

Since wrongful death actions are brought for the exclusive benefit of the deceased's "surviving spouse, the children and other next of kin," 6 TTC 202, when the deceased had no spouse or children, the damages are the next of kin's pecuniary injury. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 15 (Chk. 2001).

When the state took prompt steps in accordance with medical advice to refer the plaintiff for off-island care and treatment, but the plaintiff abandoned the care mid-treatment to return to Chuuk, no damages for lost earnings or pain and suffering after he abandoned the health care will be awarded because there is no evidence as to what the plaintiff's degree of disability would have been had the expected prosthesis been fitted, nor the length of recovery and therapy following the fitting, nor the residual disfigurement, nor the loss, if any, of his future earnings would have been once a prothesis is fitted. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 23 (Chk. 2001).

Although a civil rights violation claim and a battery claim are separate causes of action, when they arise from the same incident and they cause the same personal injury and when the damage award for the civil rights violation fully compensates the plaintiff for his personal injury, the court cannot award additional damages for the battery because such an award would constitute double recovery and would be a windfall and overcompensate the plaintiff. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 23 (Chk. 2001).

Compensatory damages are just that – compensation to make the victim whole again. Compensation for an injury is not doubled just because the plaintiff has two different causes of action on which to base that recovery. Only the injury itself is compensated. Moses v. M.V. Sea Chase, 10 FSM R. 45, 50 (Chk. 2001).

Regardless of the disposition of a punitive damages claim, plaintiffs are fully compensated by a damages award. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 166, 168 (Pon. 2001).

When there is no direct evidence of the amount of damages sustained, nor the amount of money that can compensate for an injury, the court, as trier of fact, must assess the proper level of compensatory damages for that injury. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 238 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Damages for harm to personal property is the difference between the value of the property before the tort and its value afterwards. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 238 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

In determining damages, the court may take judicial notice regarding the replacement costs for college transcripts and a college diploma, when they are easily ascertainable and available on the University of Guam Internet site and from the University of Guam Office of Admissions and Records. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

No additional damages will be awarded for the "sentimental value" of the lost items when the plaintiff's pain and suffering has already been compensated, because these damages already encompass the "sentimental value" of the lost items. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Past and future lost wages, medical expenses, and pain and suffering are all compensable. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2001).

A plaintiff totally disabled at age 42 can be compensated for the wages he would have earned until age 60. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2001).

When the injuries sustained are plainly evident, the court is entitled to presume that expenditures for medical expenses were made. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2001).

Travel and lodging are compensable as medical expenses when the expenditure results from defendant's fault; the charge is reasonable; and the expense serves a medical purposes. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2001).

Various approaches exist for monetary valuation of damages to reefs: commodity value, which is posited on a sale of the components of the damaged area; tourism value, which is based on what visitors spend to visit the site; and replacement value involves, which is the cost of replacing the damaged corals by reseeding. People of Satawal ex rel. Ramoloilug v. Mina Maru No. 3, 10 FSM R. 337, 339 (Yap 2001).

It is well established that medical expenses are properly a component of negligence damages and may be recovered from the tortfeasor. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 376 (Pon. 2001).

Pre-judgment interest is rarely awarded as an element of damages. Because tort claims are generally "unliquidated" in that the defendant does not know the precise amount he will be obligated to pay, most courts will not award interest on unliquidated monetary claims, which amount cannot be computed without a trial. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 441, 445 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

There is no Kosrae statute allowing or directing the court to award pre-judgment interest in public employment cases involving violation of law or regulations, and although pre-judgment interest has been allowed in certain contract and conversion cases, it has not been awarded in these type of cases and will be denied. Jonas v. Kosrae, 10 FSM R. 441, 445 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Absent any evidence of the cost of repair of a bushcutter, damages for its repair cannot be awarded. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 242 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Wrongful death actions are brought for the exclusive benefit of the deceased's surviving spouse, children and other next of kin. The pecuniary injury consists of funeral expenses (including a novena) and the earnings that the deceased would have used to support his family, had he lived. The future earnings calculation may be based on the victim's continued employment and earnings at the same rate until he reached the FSM retirement age of 60. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 138 (Chk. 2003).

No damages will be awarded for the cost of a loan to finish building a cement house started before the victim's death when the court has just awarded damages for lost earnings because any loan would have been repaid out of those earnings had the victim lived. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 138 (Chk. 2003).

Since a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress cannot be sustained without evidence of actual physical illness resulting from the mental and emotional distress, a plaintiff who failed to provide evidence of actual physical illness resulting from the defendants' actions cannot obtain any monetary recovery on this claim. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Prejudgment interest has been allowed on conversion claims. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

Prejudgment interest might rightfully be sought on what would appear to be a liquidated claim in the sense that it is capable of ascertainment by mathematical computation. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

The court is generally without authority to award attorney's fees in the absence of a specific statute or contractual provision allowing recovery of such fees. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

When no statute or contractual provision has been put forth to support an attorney's fees award to a prevailing party, the basis for an award must be found in some exception to the general rule that the parties must pay their own attorney's fees. Such an exception is where attorney's fees are awarded as an element of costs when it is shown that such fees were traceable to the opposing party's unreasonable or vexatious actions, or when a party acts vexatiously, or in bad faith, presses frivolous claims, or employs oppressive litigation practices. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

Courts have permitted attorney's fee awards under the vexatious conduct exception when the plaintiff has proven the defendant's breach of the implied covenant or implied duty of good faith and fair dealing (also called the bad faith tort). If a plaintiff were to prevail on a bad faith tort claim against an insurer, the insurer would be liable to him for reasonable attorney's fees that are proximately caused by the bad faith conduct. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 471 (Pon. 2004).

In a narrowly drawn exception to the general rule that the parties will bear their own attorney's fees, attorney's fees have been awarded as part of costs when a defendant has breached her fiduciary duty to the plaintiff. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

In order to prove lost rental damages, a business should be prepared to show that all other similar available vehicles were rented and that the had to turn away customers who would otherwise had rented the damaged pickup, and the number of days it would have been rented. A long-term, ongoing business might show this by comparing the average of the total rental days of all pickups combined for each month before the pickup was damaged with the average total rental days for each month after the accident. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

Under the traditional "new business rule," which applies to any business without a history of profits, it has been recognized that evidence of expected profits from a new business is too speculative, uncertain, and remote to be considered and does not meet the legal standard of reasonable certainty. But lost profits can be recovered by a new business when it is possible to show, by competent evidence and with reasonable certainty, that profits would have been made in the particular situation, and the amount of those profits. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

The proper measure of damages resulting from a business tort is lost profits as opposed to lost gross receipts. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

Any recovery for lost rental income may be limited in time until that point at which the plaintiff could have obtained a replacement for his rental business since if a plaintiff could have avoided the loss by purchasing a substitute item, profits are not the measure of the plaintiff's recovery even though profits were in fact lost. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

Consequential damages, of which economic loss such as lost profits may be an example, are available for negligent misrepresentation (deceit) claims if reasonably foreseeable. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

Loss of future profits is a well-established basis for determining the measure of economic injury resulting from an anticompetitive act which forces the victim out of business. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 554, 555 (Pon. 2004).

In unfair trade practices cases, courts draw a distinction between the amount of proof necessary to show that some damages resulted from the wrong, and the amount of proof necessary to calculate the exact amount of the damages. A lower burden of proof applies because the most elementary conception of justice and public policy require that the wrongdoer shall bear the risk of the uncertainty which his own wrong has created. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 554 (Pon. 2004).

In anticompetitive practices cases where causation is established, the burden of proving damages is much less severe. This rule of leniency with regard to proof of damages is necessary because any other rule would enable the wrong-doer to profit by his wrongdoing at his victim's expense. It would be an inducement to make wrongdoing so effective and complete in every case as to preclude any recovery, by rendering the measure of damages uncertain. Once the fact of damage is established with reasonable certainty, the amount of damages need only be shown with as much certainty as the tort's nature and the case's circumstances permit. In such cases, if it is uncertain and speculative and whether damages have been incurred, then damages will be denied; however, if it is only the amount of the damages that presents the uncertainty, then the court will allow recovery so long as there is proof of a reasonable basis from which the amount can be approximated or inferred. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 554 (Pon. 2004).

Damages under 32 F.S.M.C. 306(2) are subject to trebling. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555, 556 (Pon. 2004).

Averaging three years of normal operations when the pepper supply was continuous when the manufacturing process was uninterrupted to arrive at an annual profit, is a projection that provides a reasonable basis from which a plaintiff's lost profits can be approximated or inferred under the lower burden of proof applicable for damages in anticompetitive practices cases. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555 (Pon. 2004).

When the conduct's nature was discrete and specific, and would have been amenable to injunctive relief had the plaintiff sought it, once that relief had been awarded there could have been no prospective damages since the conduct giving rise to those damages would necessarily have ceased. There should be no recovery for further diminution of a business's value, predicated on the defendant's continuing wrongdoing, after the defendant has been enjoined. The court will thus not award prospective damages from the time of the lawsuit's filing onward because injunctive relief, to which the claim would have been amenable, would have terminated the conduct complained of. But since under the continuing tort doctrine, a plaintiff is entitled to recover all of the damages that result from on-going tortious conduct, even though the inception of the conduct lies outside the limitations period, the court will award damages from the start of the anticompetitive pepper processing operation in mid-1995 until the plaintiff filed suit. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555-56 (Pon. 2004).

When claims of damages for sums the plaintiff owed to third parties on the theory that since its business operations were destroyed by the defendant's conduct, it cannot pay back those amounts, would have depended for their repayment on profits that the operation would have made but for the defendant's conduct. Since future profits are the measure of the business's damages, to allow a separate recovery for these sums would be to permit a double recovery. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 556 (Pon. 2004).

When a statute provides for attorney's fees to the prevailing party, a plaintiff need not receive all of the relief that he seeks in order to be eligible for attorney's fees so long as he prevails on a significant issue. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 13 FSM R. 36, 40 (Pon. 2004).

When improvements were made by a plaintiff for his own benefit to what the trial court ruled was his own property, the defendants are not liable for the improvements. Narruhn v. Aisek, 13 FSM R. 97, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2004).

For an emotional distress award there must be a foreseeable physical manifestation of the distress. Narruhn v. Aisek, 13 FSM R. 97, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2004).

When the acts that comprise the false imprisonment tort are also the acts that constitute the civil rights violations, the court will not make a separate award of damages for this tort, since to do so would result in a double recovery. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 493 (Pon. 2005).

Generally, statutes authorizing multiple damages are remedial and nonpunitive, particularly in anti-trust cases. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 (App. 2006).

The treble damages clause in the FSM Anti-competitive practices statute is remedial and not punitive. The multiple portion of the damages – that part in excess of the lost profits the trial court determined as actually proven – is imposed by a national statute enacted in an area in which the national government may legislate. Since this is not a state law tort case in which state law applies and this is a statutory tort created by a national statute, the national, not the state, statute therefore controls. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 20 (App. 2006).

The trial court should state some reason for trebling damages other than just stating the anticompetitive practices statute allows it. Compelling justification is not needed or required. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 21 (App. 2006).

The anticompetitive practices statute itself provides the basis for the plaintiff to recover damages together with reasonable attorneys' fees and the costs of suit. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 21 (App. 2006).

Fifteen years' worth of "damages" of lost profits is obviously too long for any reasonably certain future projections. Too many unexpected possible variables could occur. The trial court thus did not abuse its discretion by limiting the damage award to four years of lost profits. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 24-25 (App. 2006).

The anticompetitive practices statute authorizes treble damages. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 190 (Pon. 2006).

Treble damages were proper when the discretion denoted by the word "may" in the statute lies with the injured party and not the court – the injured party "may" sue and recover treble damages – and when Congress's intent was to give the injured party treble damages if it sues and proves its case. The statute's context compels this conclusion. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 190-91 (Pon. 2006).

When the plaintiff has a claim de jure that the power conferred (on the court to treble damages) should be exercised because it had proved its right to damages under 32 F.S.M.C. 301 et seq. and when, considering the whole anticompetitive practices statute and its nature and object, Congress's intent was to impose a positive duty to treble damages, not a discretionary power to do so, the court will therefore award treble damages. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

When the defendant's anticompetitive acts did not just harm the plaintiff's business, but those acts put it out of business, even if treble damages were discretionary, there would be no more appropriate a case to exercise the discretion to treble damages than one where the anticompetitive acts put the plaintiff out of business. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 191 (Pon. 2006).

Detrimental reliance damages are the actual expenses incurred in reliance on the representation and do not include depreciation. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

Damages under the civil rights act generally include only compensatory damages. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 206 (Pon. 2006).

Wrongful death actions are brought for the exclusive benefit of the deceased's surviving spouse, the children and other next of kin. When the decedent had no spouse or children, the damages are the next of kin's pecuniary injury. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

The prevailing party in civil rights actions under 11 F.S.M.C. 701 is entitled to reasonable attorney fees and costs of suit as compensatory damages. So long as a party has prevailed in a civil rights suit as a whole, that party is entitled to fees for all time reasonably spent on the matter, including the time spent on pendent state law claims that would not otherwise be statutorily entitled to a fee award, if the pendent claims arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact as the civil rights claim. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 354 (Chk. 2006).

The prevailing party in civil rights actions under 11 F.S.M.C. 701 is entitled to reasonable attorney fees and costs of suit as compensatory damages. So long as a party has prevailed in a civil rights suit as a whole, that party is entitled to fees for all time reasonably spent on the matter, including the time spent on pendent state law claims that would not otherwise be statutorily entitled to a fee award, if the pendent claims arise out of a common nucleus of operative fact as the civil rights claim. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 354 (Chk. 2006).

To obtain damages in a nuisance action, a person pursuing a private cause of action must have suffered significant harm. To maintain a damage action for public nuisance, a person must have suffered damage different in kind from that suffered by the general public. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 417 (Yap 2006).

Compensatory damages are compensation to make the victim whole again. Compensation for an injury is not doubled just because the plaintiff has two different causes of action on which to base that recovery. Only the injury itself is compensated. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 418 (Yap 2006).

The plaintiffs must prove their damages to a reasonable certainty. Once the fact of damage is established with reasonable certainty, the amount of damages need only be shown with as much certainty as the tort's nature and the case's circumstances permit. In such cases, if it is uncertain and speculative whether damages have been incurred, then damages will be denied; however, if it is only the amount of the damages that presents the uncertainty, then the court will allow recovery so long as there is proof of a reasonable basis from which the amount can be approximated or inferred. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 418 (Yap 2006).

When there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by the plaintiff, there can be no award of damages for mental distress or mental anguish. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 418-19 (Yap 2006).

When there was no cultural damage caused by a delay in the transfer of intergenerational knowledge of swimming and other water skills, even if it were possible to obtain money damages for "cultural" damages, which the court does not so hold, there was no cultural injury for which recovery might be sought. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420 (Yap 2006).

Inability to access the inner lagoon for bathing and swimming has an economic effect and damages may be awarded for that economic loss. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420 (Yap 2006).

No offset for sums spent on cleanup can be given since the defendants had a duty to mitigate their damages and a legal duty imposed by Yap law to respond to the oil spill and clean up as much as possible. The oil spill cleanup protected them from greater liability. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420 (Yap 2006).

Setoff implies that both the plaintiff and defendant have independent causes of action maintainable against the other, while mitigation (of damages) does not involve facts which constitute a cause of action in favor of the defendant, but facts that show that the plaintiff is not entitled to as large an amount as the plaintiff's showing would otherwise justify. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420 (Yap 2006).

Injured parties in maritime tort cases are typically awarded prejudgment interest. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420 (Yap 2006).

In those few cases in which the court has awarded prejudgment interest when it was not provided for by contract or statute, the court has always awarded the legal interest rate – 9% simple interest. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 420-21 (Yap 2006).

The general rule is that when there is no statutory or contractual basis for a request for attorney fees, each party will normally bear its own attorney's fees. One exception to this rule is the private attorney general theory. A party seeking attorney's fees under the private attorney general theory must demonstrate that it has vindicated a right that benefits a large number of people, that the right sought to be enforced required private enforcement, and it must prove that the right is of societal importance. The private attorney general theory applies in the FSM, provided that these criteria are strictly met. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 421 (Yap 2006).

When a class action has vindicated rights that benefit a large number of people; when these rights required private enforcement since the State of Yap was not in the position to vindicate the private rights of the people of Rull and Gilman; when, considering Yapese society's heavy reliance on the inner lagoon's marine resources, the rights enforced were of great societal importance; and when Yapese society's dependence on the resources of the shoreline, inner reefs, and mangrove stands is a salient feature of Yap's social and geographical configuration; the use of the private attorney general theory conforms to the Constitution's Judicial Guidance Clause that court decisions are to be consistent with the social and geographical configuration of Micronesia. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 421 (Yap 2006).

The usual method of determining reasonable attorney's fees awards is based on the fair hourly rate in the locality where the case was tried. Since any attorney's fees award must be based upon a showing and a judicial finding, that the amount of fees is reasonable, the plaintiffs must therefore submit detailed supporting documentation showing the date, the work done, and the amount of time spent on each service for which a claim for compensation is made. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 421 (Yap 2006).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination to the date he is reinstated are remedies are generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge. But the amount awarded in back pay should be reduced to the extent the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 436-37 (Yap 2006).

An attorney's fees award under a private attorney general theory can only be made, if at all, at the litigation's conclusion. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 161-62 (Yap 2007).

Civil rights plaintiffs are entitled damages for pain and suffering from a police beating and the arrested plaintiff is also entitled to damages for not being advised at the time of his arrest of the reason for his arrest, and for the time that he spent in police custody from the time of his arrest until his release six hours later. Hauk v. Emilio, 15 FSM R. 476, 480 (Chk. 2008).

When a plaintiff presents no evidence about any wages lost from being off work for a week, or about any cost for the local massage, she is not entitled to those damages. Hauk v. Emilio, 15 FSM R. 476, 480 (Chk. 2008).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination to the date he is reinstated are remedies generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge with the amount awarded in back pay reduced to the extent the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. But the court cannot reinstate a terminated employee in his former position when he is past the mandatory retirement age. It can only award him back pay for time before his retirement date, and any income through alternative employment that was received for employment after he would have had to retire from his Public Service System employment will not be used to reduce the back pay award. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 666 (Chk. 2008).

When no evidence was introduced at trial of how much, if any, unused annual leave the plaintiff had accrued before he was wrongfully terminated, the court cannot make an award for unused accrued annual leave. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

In order to be eligible to be paid sick leave, an employee must be ill. The employee will not be paid sick leave when he was not sick. When a plaintiff was not sick when he was wrongfully terminated, he is not entitled to any sick leave. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

The law does not permit an injured party to recover double for the same damage. Compensatory damages are just that – compensation to make the victim whole again. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 62 (App. 2008).

Compensation for an injury is not doubled simply because the plaintiff has two different causes of action on which to base that recovery. Only the injury itself is compensated. However, if the specific damages in question are properly a component of the total damages resulting from negligence, then they be recovered from the tortfeasor, as a tortfeasor is responsible for all damages flowing from his actions. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 63 (App. 2008).

When the class plaintiffs successfully pursued two separate causes of action arising from the same incident, negligence and nuisance, and were awarded compensatory damages, including damages for the physical damage to the reef and marine area as well as their loss of use of this resource, their purported discomfort and annoyance does not generate an additional, separate award of damages since the compensatory damages that were awarded, which flowed from the negligence claim, addressed the loss related to the use of property including any discomfort or annoyance that may have been experienced. Any additional award of damages for their nuisance claim would have resulted in a double recovery. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 63 (App. 2008).

The private attorney-general doctrine makes no distinction in the award of attorney's fees based upon the overall amount of damages that are awarded, nor does it differentiate between an award of monetary damages from injunctive relief. Attorney's fees not otherwise awardable, may be awarded under the private attorney general doctrine only when the lawsuit has met certain requirements, including vindicating rights that benefit a large number of people, when the private parties were required to file suit to enforce those rights because a government authority was unable to do so, and when the rights enforced are of great social importance. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 65 (App. 2008).

When private citizens are pursuing purely civil claims – the tort of negligence – against other private citizens and the Yap government could not have undertaken any action to vindicate the plaintiffs' rights pursued, an award of attorney's fees under the private attorney-general doctrine is erroneous. It is thus an abuse of discretion for the trial court to award attorney's fees and costs under the private attorney-general doctrine in a case in which the government could not have taken any action to vindicate the rights of the people affected. M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 65 (App. 2008).

The private attorney general theory permits government reimbursement of a party's attorney fees when it must hire its own attorney to enforce a right shared by a large number of people, when it is in the public interest. The theory recognizes that the government does not always adequately protect the rights of citizens, and that people who successfully defend the rights of the public at their own cost deserve to have their attorney fees paid for, as if they had been provided the services of a "private attorney general." M/V Kyowa Violet v. People of Rull ex rel. Mafel, 16 FSM R. 49, 65 (App. 2008).

When the plaintiff's testimony on the element of damages is speculative, conclusory, and lacking in foundation, the plaintiff did not meet his burden of proof on the issue of damages and a judgment in the defendant's favor is therefore appropriate. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 328 (Pon. 2009).

When a person is unlawfully detained against his will, a civil wrong is committed for which he may seek redress. Such a claim is separate and distinct from a civil rights claim, but, at the same time, such a claim may serve as a basis for deprivation of liberty under the FSM civil rights statute. The relevant concern in this regard is that damages should not be awarded for both claims, since to do so would be to permit a double recovery. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 350, 355 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM is liable to a ship captain for the wrongful retention of his passport, and hence the wrongful detention of the captain himself, for the period that the captain was required to remain in Pohnpei after he had requested the release of his passport. While damages in such a case can be difficult to quantify, an award of damages in the amount of $120 per day is appropriate. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 350, 355 (Pon. 2009).

A ship captain will be awarded his attorney's fees and costs incurred in successfully bringing his counterclaim for civil rights violation and may submit his affidavit in support of his claim for fees and costs, which should meet the specificity standard. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 350, 355 (Pon. 2009).

An employee is herself jointly and severally liable with her employers for the checks she converted by cashing them while she was their employee because, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, an agent's act within the scope of his or her agency is the act of the principal, and the result is that both the principal and the agent are jointly and severally liable to the person injured by the wrongful act. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438 (Pon. 2009).

Damages for an insurer's claim for breach of fiduciary duty are the same as those for its contract claim, since the breach of fiduciary duty claim is also based on the breach of the agency contracts that the insurer had with its agents. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 446 (Pon. 2009).

Both principal and agent are jointly and severally liable for the torts that the agent commits in the course and scope of the work performed for the principal. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 446 (Pon. 2009).

When there is no way of determining what portion of an amount deposited into a bank account was also converted by another defendant and since the plaintiff has the burden of proof, that other defendant will receive the benefit of the doubt created by this question and will not be held liable for the deposited sums. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 447 (Pon. 2009).

One whose property is converted is entitled to recover interest at the legal rate from the time the property is converted. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 448 (Pon. 2009).

There is no property right that is recognized by the law of the FSM as "damages." Damages is a legal term of art that refers generally to a remedy which may be granted by the court to a party in a civil action. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 456 (Pon. 2009).

A private party cannot seek an award under a private attorney general theory when it is suing for purely civil claims involving money damages that only vindicate the rights of just one plaintiff. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 606 (Pon. 2009).

Back pay compensatory damages are the measure of compensatory damages for wrongful discharge. Compensation for an injury is not doubled just because the plaintiff has two different causes of action on which to base that recovery because only the injury itself is compensated. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 95-96 (Chk. 2010).

From awards of back pay damages the employer must deduct the applicable wage and salary taxes and social security taxes, which must then be remitted to the appropriate tax authorities. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 96 (Chk. 2010).

When a plaintiff did not submit any evidence about his damages and therefore could not have proven damages, his negligence claim fails. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 123 (Chk. 2010).

A plaintiff must prove his damages to a reasonable certainty. Once damage is factually established to a legal reasonable certainty, the amount of damages need only be shown with as much certainty as the tort's nature and the case's circumstances permit. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

Compensatory damages aim to make the victim whole again. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

When there is no direct evidence of the amount of damages sustained, the court must assess an appropriate level of compensatory damages for that injury. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

In awarding compensatory damages, a court may consider past and future lost wages, medical expenses, and a plaintiff's pain and suffering. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

Permanent injuries are analyzed by the level of impairment the injury has caused to the whole person. When an injury's effect continues over time, earnings impairment will have two components: the loss sustained from the time of injury until time of trial, designated "loss of time" or lost wages, and the prospective loss that plaintiff will experience after trial due to the injury's on-going impact. The plaintiff has the burden of proof with respect to impairment, which must be demonstrated with a reasonable degree of certainty; however, proof of impairment of earning capacity does not require the specificity necessary to establish lost prospective wages. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

Since, absent a showing of impairment, FSM law is currently silent as to how a court is to define and determine whether an injury is permanent, the court may consider decisions and reasoning of United States courts and other jurisdictions in arriving at its own decisions. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

An injured plaintiff is entitled to be reimbursed for any lost-wages he might have reasonably been able to earn had the injury not occurred, that is, as a whole person. To justify reimbursement, a plaintiff must also show that he was unable, because of the injury, to acquire the monies sought as compensatory damages. When he was physically able to perform light duty work for his employer six months after the injury, at a minimum, he is entitled to receive the wages he could have earned during his months of incapacity. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 262 (Pon. 2010).

When, once the plaintiff was physically able to work he did not inform his employer of his ability because his assailant remained employed there in a position of authority and he was afraid of being harmed again by his assailant who still would have been in close physical proximity to his victim and when Kolonia Town stopped paying his salary without any notice to him, the plaintiff's fear of returning to work was reasonable, and therefore, finds he is entitled to receive his back wages for the 36 weeks he was not paid his salary before returning to his job. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 262 (Pon. 2010).

When the majority of the plaintiff's weakness and inabilities arose from the atrophy of his muscles through their disuse; when at the time of the trial, he was employed and earning a higher wage than before; and when there was no persuasive evidence about the permanence of his injuries or the loss of function, range of motion or strength in his extremities, and despite the absence of professional physical therapy treatment on Pohnpei, the court is unable to determine a permanent damage award. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 262 (Pon. 2010).

When the court has received no persuasive evidence that the care provided to the plaintiff at the Pohnpei State Hospital was negligent or harmful, or that the care provided in the Philippines was unique or necessary to making him whole or that the Pohnpei State Hospital is not adequately equipped and staffed to provide a sufficient standard of care to safely and properly remove the metal plate, the court is unable to find that a return to the Philippines is a reasonable expense necessary to making the plaintiff whole and include this expense in the damage award, but he is entitled to be reimbursed for the costs he incurred traveling to the Philippines and having the metal plate installed in his leg. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 262-63 (Pon. 2010).

In a civil rights action, the court may award costs and reasonable attorney's fees to the prevailing party when a review of the relevant case law and the statute's permissive language indicate that such an award is merited. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 263 (Pon. 2010).

A trial court may award damages only for successful claims. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 437 (App. 2011).

Under detrimental reliance, damages are the actual expenses incurred in reliance on the representation. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 120 (App. 2011).

Injured parties in maritime tort cases are typically awarded prejudgment interest. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 175 (Yap 2012).

While the FSM statute, 6 F.S.M.C. 1401, by its terms, applies solely to judgments from the date of entry, the court has judicially adopted 9% simple interest per annum as the legal interest rate to be applied when prejudgment interest is awarded and the interest rate has not been otherwise designated by statute or contract. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 176 (Yap 2012).

It is error for a trial court to award $25,000 in compensatory damages without making any findings about actual damage or providing any reasoning on how it reached that figure or what evidence it relied on. Phillip v. Moses, 18 FSM R. 247, 251 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2012).

Courts often apportion liability on the party best able to prevent the loss. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 359 (App. 2012).

Once the insurer ratified its agents' unauthorized agreements with its eligible policy-holders, it was barred from recovering any of that money from others because that would be a double recovery since the insurer had already "recovered" those funds from its policy-holders. Plaintiffs are not permitted a double recovery. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

An insurer did not ratify its agents' check-cashing agreements with a business by giving the business credit for its agents' cash advances to its eligible policy-holders. It merely recognized that it was not entitled to double recovery. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 360 (App. 2012).

The court will not award the plaintiff the land's rental value as well as its sale price when there was no evidence before the court that the plaintiff would have or would have been able to rent that land to someone else if the defendant was not occupying it because to recover both the sale price and the rental value would be a double recovery. Double recovery is not permissible. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

Land does not "earn" interest. It may increase or appreciate in value, in which case, the current fair market value includes the increase or appreciation. Killion v. Nero, 18 FSM R. 381, 387 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

An essential element of any tort is damages. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

When no evidence of special or particular damages was introduced at trial, the court can rely on previous case law to assess damages for the wrongful arrest and detention. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 401 (Pon. 2012).

When, regardless of the number of grounds on which the plaintiff's arrest was illegal, it was still only one illegal arrest, the court will make one damage award of $500 for the illegal arrest. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 401 (Pon. 2012).

In a civil rights case, a prevailing plaintiff is entitled to an award of costs and reasonable attorney's fees as part of compensatory damages. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 401 (Pon. 2012).

The FSM civil rights statute's purpose is to allow a civil rights litigant to employ reasonably competent counsel to pursue civil rights litigation without cost to herself, particularly when the damages are small or uncertain and would not otherwise induce an attorney to pursue the matter. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 401 (Pon. 2012).

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. Ihara v. Vitt, 18 FSM R. 516, 531 (Pon. 2013).

When damages are calculated based on figures in statements made during closing argument, those damage amounts are not supported by evidence properly before the trial court, and, as such, any judgment based on them would be vacated and the court cannot take the "judicial notice" of the plaintiffs' requested figures. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582-83 (Kos. 2013).

The court cannot award any damages for someone who is no longer a party and for whom no one has been substituted, even if the damages were adequately proven and could be determined with satisfactory certainty. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 583 (Kos. 2013).

Determination of damages is an essential element of the plaintiffs' causes of action. Trial is the time for plaintiffs to present evidence about the amount of their damages since, in civil cases, the plaintiff has the burden of proving at trial each element of the plaintiff's cause of action by a preponderance of the evidence, and if the plaintiff fails to do so, judgment will be entered against the plaintiff. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 583 (Kos. 2013).

When a plaintiff does not submit any evidence about his damages and therefore cannot prove damages, the plaintiff's negligence claim fails. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 583 (Kos. 2013).

Since the Federated States of Micronesia has waived its sovereign immunity only to the extent of the first $20,000 in damages, when a plaintiff's actual damages exceed that amount, judgment shall be entered in her favor for $20,000. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 83, 86 (Pon. 2013).

The general rule is that the uninjured spouse who loses income when he or she provides nursing care or maid service for the injured spouse is not entitled to recover damages equal to his or her lost income as part of a loss-of-consortium claim. Instead the damages are recoverable by the injured spouse and the measure of damages for nursing services supplied by a relative who leaves his or her employment to render such services is not the amount of lost earnings but rather is the reasonable value of the nursing services supplied. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

A tortfeasor who caused an automobile accident would expect to pay the market rate for the care provided to the injured party, not the wages of a stockbroker. Thus, if there is to be recovery of lost income, it cannot be part of the uninjured spouse's claim for loss of consortium because a loss-of-consortium claim is not based on economic damages. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

The uninjured spouse's loss-of-consortium claim is based upon the loss of services provided by the injured spouse before his or her injury. The uninjured spouse's income from his own employment is not a service that the injured spouse once provided. Thus, any recovery of damages for care provided to an injured spouse must be part of the injured spouse's claim. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

The uninjured spouse's lost income or the nursing or maid services performed by the uninjured spouse, even when calculated at the reasonable maid or nursing services rate, are not part of the uninjured spouse's loss-of-consortium claim but are rather a measure of the injured spouse's damages. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

While the better view may be that the dollar value in the judgment reflect the amount the Japanese yen is valued at on the day the court enters judgment because that is the only way the plaintiff would receive the Japanese yen amount equal to the yen she spent on necessary medical bills and other services, the court will not decide this issue when the plaintiff's damages total between $28,454.13 and $30,310.37 depending on the conversion date, and the FSM has waived its sovereign immunity only to the extent of the first $20,000 in damages so only a $20,000 judgment can be entered. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 85-86 (Pon. 2013).

Damages for an automobile that was imported from Japan into Yap and destroyed on Yap, where the U.S. dollar is the medium of exchange and where the vehicle was valued in U.S. dollars when it was imported, will be computed in U.S. dollars, not Japanese yen. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 86 (Pon. 2013).

When the defendants are liable for trespass, but the plaintiff failed to present any evidence of damages at trial, the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages only, which will be set at one dollar. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

When the plaintiffs made two claims in their complaint – trespass and due process violation – and sought damages for both, but the trial court did not calculate any damages, neither claim has been fully adjudicated and therefore neither claim could be granted partial final judgment status under Rule 54(b). Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 338 (App. 2014).

Actual damages are an amount to compensate for a proven injury or loss; damages that repay actual losses and are also termed compensatory damages, or tangible damages, or real damages. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

An issue that is not part of the trial mandated by the appellate court and that may not be appropriate for trial since there may not be disputed material facts, might be resolved by a summary adjudication without the need of a trial so, rather than delay the mandated trial further, the court will separate the issue from the civil rights damages trial. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 379 (Pon. 2014).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay from the date of termination to the date of reinstatement are remedies generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge. However, the amount of back pay must be reduced to the extent that the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 391-92 (Pon. 2014).

Damages in defamation cases generally consider whether the allegedly defamatory statement: exposes the plaintiff to (public) hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy (shame or disgrace); causes people to shun or avoid the plaintiff; or has a tendency to injure the plaintiff in his occupation or adversely affect the plaintiff's trade or business. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

Damages for defamation are divided into three categories, 1) punitive damages or exemplary damages, where actual malice or recklessness is shown; 2) special damages such as the loss of business which are recoverable only on proof of loss of specific economic benefits; and 3) general damages which follow inevitably from the defamatory imputation. General damages can include loss of reputation, shame, mortification, and hurt feelings. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

Speculative injury is not enough, with regard to special injury, it must be demonstrably shown. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

One whose property is converted is entitled to interest at the legal rate from the time of conversion. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 462 (Chk. 2014).

Generally, statutes authorizing multiple damages are remedial and nonpunitive, particularly in anti-trust cases. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 462 n.4 (Chk. 2014).

A false imprisonment claim is separate and distinct from a civil rights claim, but, at the same time, it may serve as a basis for deprivation of liberty under the FSM civil rights statute. The relevant concern in this regard is that damages should not be awarded for both claims, since to do so would be to permit a double recovery. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466-67 (Chk. 2014).

Valuing the loss of a person's liberty interest because he was subjected to the cruel and unusual punishment of being forced to remain in jail for 161 days after his sentence had ended, is, like trying to calculate damages for pain and suffering, difficult because no fixed rules exist to aid in that determination, which lies in the court's sole discretion. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2014).

Whether cumulative statutory penalties are permissible is properly determined by seeking out the legislative intent as expressed in the statute's language. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

A statute imposing a penalty is to be strictly construed against the government and in favor of one against whom penalties are sought to be imposed. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

When a penalty provision's statutory language is ambiguous, this ambiguity should be resolved against punishing the same action under two different statutes. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

Clear legislative intent for cumulative penalties can be indicated by provisions providing for separate penalties for each day of a violation, as found section 901(2) of the Marine Resources Act, or where a separate penalty is expressly imposed for each violation. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 31 (Yap 2015).

Read in proper context, 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1)(b) and (c) are aimed at similar types of wrongdoing and uphold a public interest of the same nature. Thus, a vessel's failure to maintain its transponder in good working order, and its consequent failure to ensure transmission of required information from the transponder, is a solitary act that caused only one injury and therefore 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) should not be construed to authorize cumulative penalties. FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 32 (Yap 2015).

Since Subsection (1) allows NORMA to require that operators perform an integrated act which, when completed in its entirety, ensures transmission of required information from a vessel's transponder and this is reflected in the use of the word "and" between 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1)(b) and (c); since the failure to perform any one part of the integrated act required under subsection 611(1) is sufficient to frustrate entirely the purpose of the subsection; and since a failure to perform multiple component parts of the act required under the subsection is no more frustrating to the statute's purpose than failure to perform only one part, the court will, in the absence of clear legislative intent to impose cumulative penalties, construe 24 F.S.M.C. 611(5) to impose only a single penalty for the failure to comply with the integrated requirements imposed on them under 24 F.S.M.C. 611(1). FSM v. Kuo Rong 113, 20 FSM R. 27, 33 (Yap 2015).

The usual remedy for trespass to land (and when applicable nuisance and negligence claims are based on similar facts) is either a judgment for an amount equal to the diminution in the land's value or a judgment for an amount that would be needed to restore the land to its previous condition, whichever is the lesser amount. To award both would constitute an impermissible double recovery. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 78-79 (Pon. 2015).

To grant a judgment against the state government for funds that the national government admits that it still holds and is willing to pay would permit double recovery. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 489 n.2 (Chk. 2016).

When, under prior precedent and the law of the case doctrine, the state government is immune from an interest award as a part of a judgment against the state unless the state has expressly consented to the imposition of interest and when the state government has not expressly consented, by statute or by contract, to the imposition of interest for claims or for a conversion claim, no interest will be permitted. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 489 (Chk. 2016).

To grant a judgment against the state government for funds that the national government admits that it still holds and is willing to pay would permit double recovery. Onanu Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 535, 540 n.4 (Chk. 2016).

When a defendant is found negligent, the remedy is money damages, but if irreparable future harm is threatened, a court, by injunction, may also act to prevent future damage. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 620 & n.6 (App. 2018).

While it may be uncontested that the value of a reef on the main island of Yap is $600 per square meter, the court cannot presume, without evidence, that $600 a square meter is an accurate value for any particular Yap outer island reef, especially where on the outer island there may be more reef and fewer people who have the right to rely on or depend on the reef's resources. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 22 (Yap 2018).

An appropriate measure of damages for a damaged coral reef may be the cost of restoration without grossly disproportionate expense. Or if the cost of restoration would not be an appropriate measure because it would entail a grossly disproportionate expense, damages could be measured by the economic value of the marine resources lost or diminished by the reef damage. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 22 (Yap 2018).

When considering loss of enjoyment of life, the court takes into account the plaintiff's change of lifestyle. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 30 (Pon. 2018).

When the employer paid the employee's salary during the time he was attempting to recover from his workplace injury, even after his discharge from the hospital, until the termination of his employment, and when the employer also paid his medical bills, damages for lost wages during that time and for his medical bills is inappropriate. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 30 n.1 (Pon. 2018).

Since Pohnpei is a mixed subsistence and cash economy, people rely on a person's employability to bring in the cash necessary to help support himself and his family in addition to the farm and fish products which he could produce through farming on his lands and fishing. Thus, a workplace injury, may greatly impair both the person's employability and his ability to provide from farming and fishing. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 30 (Pon. 2018).

When an employer is liable to an employee for a workplace injury permanently disabling the employee, the court must in all fairness determine a reasonable time frame to aid in calculating the amount of lost wages damages to award the plaintiff. Wages up to age sixty is a reasonable time frame. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 30 (Pon. 2018).

Unlike other forms of trespass, trespass to chattels requires some actual damage to the chattel before the action can be maintained, and nominal damages will not be awarded, so that in the absence of any actual damage the action will not lie. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 154 (Chk. 2019).

Generally, "business destruction" cannot be a separate cause of action, but if the plaintiff can claim lost personal income that she derived from the business, it may be a measure of damages. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 157 (Chk. 2019).

Damages for waste are normally the difference in value of the property before and after the act of waste. Since the damages for waste committed are usually measured by the injury actually sustained, if the value of the premises has been improved by the acts complained of, the complainants will only recover nominal damages, if any, at law. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

Proof of diminution in value of property can be made by introducing the cost of repairs, and when the cost of repairs is submitted as evidence, the fact that repairs were not ultimately made does not prevent the property owner from securing recovery based on those estimated costs. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

The allowance of damages is to award just compensation without enrichment. There is thus no universal test for determining the value of property injured or destroyed. The mode and amount of proof must be adapted to the facts of each case. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

When the lessee did not have the obligation to restore the property to its original state, damages are recoverable only for the former lessee's acts which rendered the property unsafe and require remediation in order to make the lessor whole. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

When the lease did not require the lessee, at the lease's termination, to remove the structures and foundations, the lessor's requested damages will be reduced because the lessee should not have to pay for the removal of slabs and foundations that remain on the property. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

Damages for permissive waste is not recoverable, including any damages related to clearing trees and brushes or cutting and removing. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

When a bridge that was constructed on the property was, under the lease, a permissible structure that improved the property's value, the former lessee is not liable for its removal. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

Damages will be awarded for certain potentially dangerous materials including cut pipes, wires, rebar, certain other items left protruding from the ground and property that were a safety hazard and should have been removed because it resulted in the diminution of the properties' value. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 299 (Pon. 2019).

The measure of damages for conversion is the property's market value at the time and place of conversion plus the legal rate of interest from the date of the conversion. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

A conversion is complete when the defendant takes, detains, or disposes of the chattel. At that point, the plaintiff acquires the right to enforce a sale, and recover the property's full value. The defendant cannot undo his wrong by forcing the goods back upon their owner, either as a bar to the action, or in mitigation of damages. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Regardless of how accurate a May 9, 2019 appraisal was, it cannot be used to establish conversion damages where no evidence relates that appraised value to the chattels' value eight to ten months earlier when the chattels were allegedly converted. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Even if the conversion occurs in good faith, the plaintiff may nonetheless recover damages beyond the converted property's fair market value. Thus, damages for lost profits are allowed when, either from the article's nature or the case's peculiar circumstances, they might be reasonably supposed to follow from the conversion, even though this recovery of lost profits is above and beyond the chattels' market value. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

The general rule is that compensation for lost profits may be recovered in an action for conversion, when the loss is the proximate result of the defendant's act and the loss can be shown with reasonable certainty. Thus, although the usual measure for conversion damages is the property's value at the time and place of conversion, plus interest, and lost profits may also be recovered if they may reasonably be expected to follow from the conversion. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Lost profit damages can be awarded for conversion when the plaintiff shows that, but for the conversion, a profit would have been realized from the items converted and shows the extent thereof with reasonable certainty. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315 (Pon. 2019).

Awards for lost business profits are appropriate damages in a conversion case when proved with reasonable certainty. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 315-16 (Pon. 2019).

It would be improper to allow lost business profit damages in every case involving conversion. The damages would only be proper when the person whose property has been converted shows that the conversion has resulted in lost business profits and shows with reasonable certainty the amount of these lost profits. Lost profits is the proper measure of damages, as opposed to lost gross receipts, and this damages amount need only be shown with as much certainty as the tort's nature and the case's circumstances permit. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 316 (Pon. 2019).

Recovery for lost rental income may be limited in time until when the plaintiff could have obtained a replacement for his rental business since, if a plaintiff could have avoided the loss by purchasing a substitute item, profits from that point on are not the measure of the plaintiff's recovery even if profits were in fact lost. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 316 (Pon. 2019).

Conversion, when committed on navigable waters, is a maritime tort that creates a maritime lien. The measure of damages in a maritime conversion is the property's market value at the time and place of its conversion plus the legal rate of interest from that date, and to these damages, the plaintiff's lost profits can be added when that loss can reasonably be expected to follow from the conversion, or is the proximate result of the defendant's conversion, and when the amount of that loss can be shown with reasonable certainty. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 305, 316 (Pon. 2019).

A "personal injury" is any harm caused to a person, such as a broken bone, a cut, or a bruise; bodily injury or any invasion of a personal right, including mental suffering and false imprisonment. This does not describe claimed damages that are all monetary losses. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 358 n.8 (Pon. 2019).

In awarding compensatory damages, a court may consider past and future lost wages, medical expenses, and a plaintiff's pain and suffering. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 488 (Pon. 2020).

A plaintiff, who has proved that the defendant committed battery, is entitled to an award of compensatory damages when he has lost wages and his future ability to earn income is impaired because of the battery. The plaintiff is allowed to recover damages for loss of his capacity to earn wages even if he was unemployed at the time of the injuries, and therefore unable to prove actual lost wages or if the plaintiff was rendering gratuitous services without compensation when injured. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 489 & n.5 (Pon. 2020).

A trespass plaintiff's failure to proffer any evidence of monetary damages is not fatal to his trespass claim – monetary damages are not an essential element of the trespass tort because, if evidence of actual damages is lacking in a successful trespass action, the trial court will award nominal damages. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

Diminution of a property's value is not the sole measure of nuisance damages. Special damages may also be awarded for nuisance. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When the nuisance, or the injury arising from it, is not permanent and has been or can be abated, the plaintiff usually recovers the depreciation in the rental or use value of his or her property during the period in which the nuisance exists, plus any special damages, but rental and use value are not necessarily the same thing, and a plaintiff who actually occupies the premises may recover the "use value," or special value to him or her. Discomfort or inconvenience in the use of the property is, of course, relevant to both establish special damage and as evidence bearing on the loss of rental or use value. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

In a nuisance case, the land occupant may recover special damages in addition to the depreciation in market or use value. This commonly includes damages for personal discomfort or illness resulting from the nuisance, and the plaintiff may also recover the reasonable cost of his or her own efforts to abate the nuisance or prevent future injury. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 622 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Damages – Mitigation of

When a plaintiff makes a claim for damages, he has a duty to mitigate those damages, which means that a plaintiff who has taken reasonable steps to minimize the amount of his damages may recover the amount of those expenses. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2000).

Failure to mitigate damages will usually not bar a claim but rather reduce any damages awarded, although in some cases it may reduce the damages to zero. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127 (Chk. 2005).

Under the general principle of mitigation of damages, a plaintiff should not be encouraged to maximize his recovery by sitting on his rights. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 24 (App. 2006).

Reinstatement to his former position and back pay to the date of his termination to the date he is reinstated are remedies are generally available to an employee who has shown wrongful discharge. But the amount awarded in back pay should be reduced to the extent the plaintiff has mitigated his damages by securing other employment. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 436-37 (Yap 2006).

When a plaintiff suing for wrongful discharge has introduced no evidence of his efforts to mitigate his damages by attempting to secure a job during his periods of unemployment, the plaintiff is precluded from recovery of damages for these periods. Reg v. Falan, 14 FSM R. 426, 437 (Yap 2006).

When an employer has unlawfully discharged an employee in violation of his civil rights and the former employee obtains alternative employment, in calculating damages, the income from the alternative employment will be deducted from the back pay owed to the employee, since otherwise the plaintiff could recover a windfall, which would violate the principles of compensatory damages. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

That a plaintiff has a duty to mitigate his damages is clear. He must take reasonable steps to minimize those damages. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

A business that was presented, over a period of approximately three-and-a-half years, with checks amounting to over $400,000 that were made payable to a corporate payee, but that cashed the checks at the request of the individual cashing those checks without ever making any efforts to obtain independent confirmation that the individual presenting the check had the corporate payee's authority to do so, cannot rely on defenses of mitigation of damages or apparent authority or good faith commercial standards since the business had a duty to determine whether the individuals had the authority to cash the checks. The business cannot be said to have used good faith commercial business standards. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 445 (Pon. 2009).

A wrongfully discharged government employee has a duty to mitigate his damages by actively looking for and accepting any reasonable offer of employment; otherwise back pay damages cannot be awarded. If the former government employee obtains other employment, the amount he is awarded in back pay must be reduced by the amount he mitigated his damages – by the amount he received from the other employment – since otherwise he could recover a windfall, which would violate the principles of compensatory damages. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 94 (Chk. 2010).

When the discharged employee has not presented any evidence about whether and where he sought employment during a certain time period, he has introduced no evidence of his efforts to mitigate his damages by attempting to secure a job during his periods of unemployment, and he is thus precluded from recovery of damages for those periods since it is the plaintiff's burden to prove every element of his case, including all of his damages. Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 95 (Chk. 2010).

One sound reason for the mitigation principle is that it makes commercial sense to discourage a plaintiff from sitting back and letting damages get larger instead of stemming further losses. But an innocent party cannot be expected to take steps to mitigate damages before it was aware of the breach. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 361 (App. 2012).

Any inaction before the date the plaintiff became aware of the breach cannot be a failure to mitigate damages because the plaintiff did not know it had any to mitigate. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 361 (App. 2012).

It is well established that a plaintiff seeking an award of back pay as damages for wrongful termination has a duty to mitigate damages by actively seeking alternative employment. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 391 (Pon. 2014).

The failure to mitigate damages is an affirmative defense for which the defendant bears the burden of proof. The common law rule establishing failure to mitigate damages as an affirmative defense is sound because to hold otherwise would be to impose a burdensome requirement upon every plaintiff in a wrongful termination case and because a holding that failure to mitigate damages is an affirmative defense puts the burden of proof on defendants, who presumably would refrain from litigating this issue unless the question of failure to mitigate damages is actually in dispute. Manuel v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 382, 391 (Pon. 2014).

– Damages – Nominal

The damages for waste committed are usually measured by the injury actually sustained and if the value of the premises has been improved by the acts complained of, the complainants will only recover nominal damages, if any, at law. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

The amount of damages to be awarded in invasion of privacy cases rests with the sound discretion of the trier of fact. The fact that damages may be difficult to ascertain, or that they cannot be measured by a pecuniary standard, is not a basis for denying all recovery even though there is no direct evidence of the amount of damage sustained. However, to recover substantial compensatory damages, the plaintiff must prove these damages. If there has been no material injury to the plaintiff, or if there is no evidence that damage has been sustained, or no evidence to serve as a basis for the calculation of damage, plaintiff will be awarded nominal damages only. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

When a plaintiff is entitled to punitive damages against a defendant because he acted with malice, but that defendant has no net worth and there was a substantial damage, fee and cost award only a nominal punitive damage award is proper. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 113 (Chk. 1999).

Nominal damages, or none at all, are awarded for ameliorating waste. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 1999).

When a defendant with no net worth and no income is liable for punitive damages in addition to a substantial damage award, only a nominal punitive damage award of $1 is proper. When the net worth and income of defendants is not known, but it is known that they are employed and thus have an income, it is appropriate to award more than just nominal punitive damages. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 139 (Chk. 2003).

When there is no doubt about the violation of 32 F.S.M.C. 302(2), but when there is nothing of record to establish that even if a trochus harvest had been held after 1994, the plaintiff would have been successful in purchasing enough trochus so that it would have had an adequate source of supply for its button operation, the plaintiff has failed to establish that it was damaged by the defendant's conduct as proscribed 32 F.S.M.C. 302(2). Since that conduct was tortious in nature, the plaintiff is entitled only to nominal damages. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 544, 555 (Pon. 2004).

A court may award a plaintiff reasonable attorney's fees in litigating a statutory cause of action that provides for award of attorney's fees to the prevailing party even though the plaintiff obtains only nominal damages. The fact that only nominal damages are awarded however may be considered in determining the amount of the attorney's fees. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 13 FSM R. 36, 39-40 (Pon. 2004).

Nominal damages are usually $1. Pohnpei v. AHPW, Inc., 14 FSM R. 1, 25 n.8 (App. 2006).

Common-law courts traditionally have vindicated deprivations of certain "absolute" rights that are not shown to have caused actual injury through the award of a nominal sum of money. By making the deprivation of such rights actionable for nominal damages without proof of actual injury, the law recognizes the importance to organized society that those rights be scrupulously observed; but at the same time, it remains true to the principle that substantial damages should be awarded only to compensate actual injury or, in the case of exemplary or punitive damages, to deter or punish malicious deprivation of rights. Because the right to procedural due process is "absolute" in the sense that it does not depend upon the merits of a claimant's substantive assertions, and because of the importance to organized society that procedural due process be observed, the denial of due process should be actionable for nominal damages without proof of actual injury. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 444 (Chk. 2006).

Nominal damages are usually one dollar. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 444 n.3 (Chk. 2006).

Although an arrestee, who was not informed of her rights to access to counsel when she was handcuffed, was told her full rights at the police station, this does not excuse the police's failure to advise her of rights regarding to access to counsel on the scene when she was first placed in handcuffs. Since the arrestee was not harmed by the failure to advise her, when she was first placed in handcuffs, of rights regarding to access to counsel, the state is liable to her for nominal damages in the amount of one dollar. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 576 (Pon. 2009).

If a defendant's acts caused trespass on a plaintiff's land and chattels but no actual damages are proven, the plaintiff would be entitled to no more than nominal damages ($1). Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 50 (Chk. 2010).

If a defendant trespasses on a plaintiff's land but no actual damages can be proven, the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages ($1). Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

In a successful trespass claim where no evidence exists of actual damages, the trial court will award nominal damages. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 437 (App. 2011).

When the defendants are liable for trespass, but the plaintiff failed to present any evidence of damages at trial, the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages only, which will be set at one dollar. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

The lack of proof of actual damage amounts is not fatal to a trespass claim because, in a successful trespass claim when no evidence exists of actual damages, the trial court will award nominal ($1) damages. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 155 (Chk. 2019).

A plaintiff has the burden to prove the amount of any damages caused by the trespass. But a plaintiff's failure to proffer any evidence of monetary damages is, however, not fatal to his trespass claim because monetary damages are not an essential element of the trespass tort since, in a successful trespass action when evidence of actual damages is lacking, the trial court will award nominal ($1) damages. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

Damages for waste are normally the difference in value of the property before and after the act of waste. Since the damages for waste committed are usually measured by the injury actually sustained, if the value of the premises has been improved by the acts complained of, the complainants will only recover nominal damages, if any, at law. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

Failure to demonstrate actual damages often warrants only nominal damages for the trespass. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 421 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

– Damages – Pain and Suffering

The Pohnpei Supreme Court recognizes pain and suffering as a principal element of damages in personal injury cases, but because there is no fixed formula to determine the monetary amount, the court has to use its discretion. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 73 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

In a wrongful death claim, parents of the deceased child are entitled to claim pecuniary damages and damages for their own pain and suffering from the loss of their child. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 130 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Although in the usual case in Truk the damages for loss of income will be lower than, for instance, Guam or Hawaii because of the wage scale there, and medical expense damages will normally be greatly reduced because in the usual case the government absorbs the medical bills, there is no justification for reducing a mental pain and suffering award because of the citizenship of the parents or the geographic location of the accident causing the injury. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 131 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

To recover for pain and suffering a plaintiff need only show "suffering," not both "pain" and "suffering" as the term includes not only the physical pain but also fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, apprehension, terror or ordeal. Ludwig v. Mailo, 5 FSM R. 256, 262 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

Awarding damages for pain and suffering is one of the most difficult tasks of a court because the determination lies solely in the discretion of the trier of fact and no fixed rules exist to aid in the determination. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 434 (Pon. 1996).

Compensatory damages for personal injury also include pain and suffering, past as well as the reasonable value of future pain and suffering. An award for pain and suffering is not reduced merely because the injury took place in Chuuk. The court must use its discretion in awarding it. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 549 (Chk. 1996).

A person injured by the intentional tort of another is entitled to an award for pain and suffering, including mental anguish. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 549 (Chk. 1996).

Calculating damages for pain and suffering is a difficult task because no fixed rules exist to aid in that determination which lies in the sole discretion of the trier of fact, and in making the calculation, it is proper to consider not only past pain but future pain. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 66 (Chk. 1997).

A person injured through the negligent or intentional tort of another is entitled to an award of damages for pain and suffering. Calculating the amount is difficult because there are no fixed rules to help in that determination. The determination lies in the sole discretion of the trier of fact. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 453-54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Compensatory damages for personal injury include pain and suffering, past as well as the reasonable value of future pain and suffering. The court must use its discretion in awarding it. Pain and suffering includes mental anguish. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 454 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In determining pain and suffering, it is proper to consider not only past pain but future pain, and to consider the loss of enjoyment of life as an element of pain and suffering. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 454 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Awarding damages for pain and suffering does not present a facile endeavor, since this is a matter committed to the discretion of the court, and there are no established rules for making such an award. Mathebei v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 9 FSM R. 23, 26 (Yap 1999).

Calculating the damages for pain and suffering is a difficult task because there are no fixed rules to aid in that determination, which lies in the sole discretion of the trier of fact. In determining pain and suffering, it is proper to consider not only past pain but future pain. It is also appropriate to consider loss of enjoyment of life as an element of pain and suffering. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 54 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

"Pain and suffering" includes fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, apprehension, terror or ordeal. A plaintiff is entitled to such damages as will fully compensate him for the injuries directly flowing from the alleged tort, including physical pain and suffering as well as the mental suffering caused by the tortious act. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 458 (Pon. 2000).

Calculating the appropriate monetary award for pain and suffering is difficult, because such an award is not subject to precise calculation, and the matter is committed to the court's entire discretion. The court in making an award for pain and suffering is guided by other cases in the FSM which have addressed this issue. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 459 (Pon. 2000).

A deceased's parent (or her estate) is entitled to damages that include her mental pain and suffering for the loss of her child that resulted from her child's wrongful death, without regard to provable pecuniary damages. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 15 (Chk. 2001).

A person injured through the negligence of another is entitled to an award of damages for pain and suffering. Awarding damages for pain and suffering is one of a court's most difficult tasks because the determination lies solely in the discretion of the trier of fact and no fixed rules exist to aid in the determination. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 238 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A person who is injured through the negligence of another is entitled to an award of damages for pain and suffering. To recover for pain and suffering a plaintiff need only show "suffering," not both "pain" and "suffering" as the term includes not only the physical pain but also fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, apprehension, terror or ordeal. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 238 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Past and future lost wages, medical expenses, and pain and suffering are all compensable. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2001).

Pain and suffering serves as a convenient label under which a plaintiff may recover not only for physical pain but also for fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, terror, or ordeal. It covers disfigurement and deformity, impairment of ability to work or labor, anxiety or worry proximately attributable to an injury and mental distress caused by impairment of the enjoyment of life and it includes anxiety and embarrassment from disfigurement or limitations on activities. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2001).

Determining damages for pain and suffering is difficult because there are no precise rules for determining the amount, which lies within the sole discretion of the trier of fact. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2001).

Civil rights damages may include damages for the victim's pain and suffering before his death. Calculating damages for pain and suffering is difficult because no fixed rules exist to aid in that determination, which lies in the court's sole discretion. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 137 (Chk. 2003).

The rule is well settled that to authorize damages for pain and suffering, such must be the result of physical injury. Narruhn v. Aisek, 13 FSM R. 97, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2004).

When there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by the plaintiff, an award of damages for pain and suffering must be set aside. Narruhn v. Aisek, 13 FSM R. 97, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2004).

Calculating damages for pain and suffering is difficult because no fixed rules exist to aid in that determination, which lies in the court's sole discretion. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

A decedent's mother as the deceased's parent is entitled to damages that include her mental pain and suffering for the loss of her child, without regard to provable pecuniary damages. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

When the plaintiffs asked for $5,000 for the raising of plaintiff's blood pressure and $5,000 for physical, mental, and emotional distress and for $5,000 for pain and suffering, but no evidence was placed before the court regarding these damage claims and no manifestation of physical injury was placed into evidence, these damages cannot be awarded. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 532 (Chk. 2007).

Civil rights plaintiffs are entitled damages for pain and suffering from a police beating and the arrested plaintiff is also entitled to damages for not being advised at the time of his arrest of the reason for his arrest, and for the time that he spent in police custody from the time of his arrest until his release six hours later. Hauk v. Emilio, 15 FSM R. 476, 480 (Chk. 2008).

When, in a wrongful termination case, no evidence of physical pain or a physical manifestation of suffering was introduced, no damages can be awarded for pain and suffering because the rule is well settled that to award damages for pain and suffering, such must be the result of physical injury or of a physical manifestation of emotional distress. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

When a person is injured through the negligence of another, the victim is entitled to an award of damages for pain and suffering. Analyzing a damage request for pain and suffering is difficult, no fixed rules exist to aid in the determination, and it is solely within the trier of fact's discretion. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

In awarding compensatory damages, a court may consider past and future lost wages, medical expenses, and a plaintiff's pain and suffering. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

To recover for pain and suffering a plaintiff need only show "suffering." The term includes not only physical pain but: fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, apprehension, terror or ordeal. When analyzing a pain and suffering award, it is proper to consider not only past pain, but also future pain and the loss of enjoyment of life. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 261 (Pon. 2010).

When the plaintiff's injury being knocked unconscious had caused him to suffer; when he spent one week in the Pohnpei State Hospital and approximately four months in a cast; when he was then required to leave his wife and new child to travel to the Philippines to undergo surgery where a metal plate was attached to his right tibia; when because of this treatment, his muscles atrophied since the unavailability of professional physical therapy left him unable to perform regular tasks for an unspecified time; and when the manner that his injuries were incurred and his subsequent condition also left him with a reasonable fear of Kolonia Town's Chief of Police, the plaintiff will be awarded $21,000 for pain and suffering. Higgins v. Kolonia Town, 17 FSM R. 254, 263 (Pon. 2010).

Awarding damages for pain and suffering is one of the most difficult tasks for a court because the determination lies solely in the court's discretion with no fixed rules exist to aid in the determination. In making that calculation, it is proper to consider not only past pain but future pain. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 83 (Pon. 2013).

Pain and suffering serves as a convenient label under which a plaintiff may recover not only for physical pain but also for fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, terror, or ordeal and it covers disfigurement and deformity, impairment of ability to work or labor, anxiety or worry proximately attributable to an injury and mental distress caused by impairment of the enjoyment of life and it includes anxiety and embarrassment from disfigurement or limitations on activities, but to award damages for pain and suffering, such must be the result of physical injury. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 83 (Pon. 2013).

A plaintiff will be awarded damages for pain and suffering when she suffered grievous physical injury along with disfigurement and fright and anxiety in addition to the pain from the injury. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 83 (Pon. 2013).

"Pain and suffering" is a convenient label under which a plaintiff may recover not only for physical pain but also for fright, nervousness, grief, anxiety, worry, mortification, shock, humiliation, indignity, embarrassment, terror, or ordeal and it covers disfigurement and deformity, impairment of ability to work or labor, anxiety or worry proximately attributable to an injury and mental distress caused by impairment of the enjoyment of life, and it includes anxiety and embarrassment from disfigurement or limitations on activities. To award damages for pain and suffering, such must be the result of physical injury. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 489 (Pon. 2020).

A person, who is injured through another's negligent or intentional tort, is entitled to an award of damages for pain and suffering. Calculating the amount is difficult because there are no fixed rules to help in that determination. The determination lies in the sole discretion of the trier of fact. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 489 (Pon. 2020).

– Damages – Punitive

An employer generally may not be held liable for punitive damages for the tortious acts of its employees. However, an employer may be held liable for punitive damages if 1) the employer authorized the act, 2) the employer knew the employee was unfit for the position at the time of the hiring, or 3) the employer ratified the tortious act of the employee. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 146 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

There is no authority to award punitive damages against a foreign national government even when it is otherwise liable for damages. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 361 (Pon. 1994).

Punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. Elwise v. Bonneville Constr. Co., 6 FSM R. 570, 572 (Pon. 1994).

Punitive damages merely constitute an element of recovery in an underlying cause of action. Therefore no punitive damages may be recovered without an underpinning independent cause of action. Urban v. Salvador, 7 FSM R. 29, 33 (Pon. 1995).

Punitive damages are a derivative, not an independent cause of action, and must rest upon some other, underlying cause of action because it is merely an element of damages in that cause of action. Thus, if all other causes of action are dismissed then punitive damages must necessarily also be dismissed. Semwen v. Seaward Holdings, Micronesia, 7 FSM R. 111, 113 (Chk. 1995).

A plaintiff may not as a matter of law recover punitive damages from the State of Chuuk. Kaminaga v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 272, 274 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Punitive damages may be awarded when a tort was committed with actual malice, or deliberate violence, or the acts complained of were wanton, reckless, malicious and oppressive and are given to enhance compensatory damages. Punitive damages depend on the existence of compensatory damages and cannot be awarded in the absence of compensatory damages. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 435-36 & n.29 (Pon. 1996).

Punitive damages will not be awarded where the plaintiff has not claimed and proved that a defendant acted with actual malice or deliberate violence. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 546 (Chk. 1996).

Punitive damages may be recoverable for conversion where the defendant's act was accompanied by fraud, ill will, malice, recklessness, wantonness, oppressiveness, willful disregard of the plaintiff's rights, or other circumstances tending to aggravate the injury, but defendant's mere failure to respond to an inquiry, or to answer a complaint is not a circumstance entitling a plaintiff to punitive damages. Bank of Hawaii v. Air Nauru, 7 FSM R. 651, 653 (Chk. 1996).

Punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 67 (Chk. 1997).

Punitive damages are typically given as an enhancement of compensatory damages because of the wanton, reckless, malicious or oppressive character of defendant's conduct, but will not be given when compensatory damages will deter similar future actions and the excessive force used on a person resisting arrest was not of such a character. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 196 (Pon. 1997).

Punitive damages may also be awarded where it is shown that the defendant acted with malice or with a gross disregard for plaintiff's right to privacy, in order to punish the defendant for its conduct and to deter the defendant and others from engaging in like conduct in the future. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

When the evidence presented shows that the defendant relied on what he believed was appropriate consent and had acted in accordance with what he thought was appropriate custom and had not acted with malice, with an intent to violate plaintiff's rights, punitive damages will not be awarded. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 417 (Pon. 1998).

Punitive damages will be rejected when the defendant conducted its blasting and quarrying activities with an intentional, reckless or wanton disregard of the of the plaintiffs' rights and safety. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 541 (Pon. 1998).

When a plaintiff is entitled to punitive damages against a defendant because he acted with malice, but that defendant has no net worth and there was a substantial damage, fee and cost award only a nominal punitive damage award is proper. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 113 (Chk. 1999).

Judicial immunity protects from liability for punitive damages. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 113 (Chk. 1999).

A defendant's financial condition is relevant to a punitive damages claim and a proper subject of discovery, if, under the applicable law, the defendant's financial condition has a bearing on the amount of punitive damages to be awarded. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 251, 253 (Pon. 1999).

If a defendant is found liable for punitive damages, a court cannot make an award having a meaningfully deterrent effect unless the court knows the extent of the defendant's wealth. The greater or lesser the degree of defendant's wealth, the greater or lesser would be the amount of the punitive award, since a small award relative to overall wealth would not meaningfully deter, whereas a large award relative to overall wealth would be unduly onerous. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 251, 253 (Pon. 1999).

Punitive damages are recoverable for tortious acts which involve actual malice or deliberate violence, or where the conduct involved is shown to be wanton, reckless, malicious and oppressive. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 251, 254 (Pon. 1999).

A trial judge abuses his discretion when he denies a motion to compel production of financial information in a case where punitive damages are claimed, if the plaintiff submits factual support for the claim and the defendant fails to demonstrate good cause for a protective order preventing discovery; but the defendant is usually entitled to a protective order that the information only be revealed to the discovering party's counsel or representative, that demands be limited only to information needed to determine the defendant's present net worth, and that the information be sealed or otherwise restricted to use in the current proceeding only. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 251, 254 (Pon. 1999).

A defendant facing a claim for punitive damages may be required to answer discovery concerning current net worth, but cannot be compelled to reveal his financial status for the previous five years. The court may order plaintiffs' counsel not to divulge this information to anyone until such time as the court determines punitive damages liability, at which time the court will order what is to be done with the discovered information. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 251, 254 (Pon. 1999).

Punitive damages are awarded as a punishment to the defendant for his wrongful act and as a warning and example to deter him and others from committing similar acts in the future. As a general rule, punitive damages are allowed for an assault and battery committed wantonly, maliciously, or under circumstances of aggravation. Since battery usually is a matter of the worst kind of intentions, it frequently justifies punitive damages. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 459 (Pon. 2000).

Punitive damages may be awarded for tortious acts that are committed with deliberate violence, as when a defendant waits at night with a baseball bat and then repeatedly swings the bat at a car's windshield and sunroof although he never saw the driver or knew who it was and the driver never saw the defendant or got out of the car. In such circumstances, an award of punitive damages is appropriate and the defendant, having been offended by that which he had made overt efforts to see, can scarcely be heard to complain of the offense or that the offense otherwise mitigates his conduct's consequences. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 459 (Pon. 2000).

When an award of punitive damages is appropriate, materials relating to the defendant's financial status must be submitted to the court before it will enter a punitive damages award. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 460 (Pon. 2000).

Punitive damages are not permitted against the State of Chuuk, but punitive damages may be awarded against a police officer trainee assigned as a jailer and which are justified by the wanton, malicious, deliberate and violent nature of his battery of a detainee. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 24 (Chk. 2001).

When six months have elapsed since the plaintiffs first asked for time to find new counsel and a court order explicitly stated what the consequences would be if new counsel did not file a notice of appearance by March 30, 2001, the plaintiffs' remaining punitive damages claim, absent a showing of good cause and excusable neglect, will be dismissed, and, given the purpose of punitive damages, a final judgment entered. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 166, 168-69 (Pon. 2001).

The purpose of punitive damages is to punish the tortfeasor, not compensate the victim. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 166, 168 (Pon. 2001).

Punitive damages are a windfall to the plaintiff and not a matter of right. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 166, 168 (Pon. 2001).

Regardless of the disposition of a punitive damages claim, plaintiffs are fully compensated by a damages award. Elymore v. Walter, 10 FSM R. 166, 168 (Pon. 2001).

Punitive damages may be awarded when a tort was committed with actual malice, or deliberate violence, or the acts complained of were wanton, reckless, malicious and oppressive and are given to enhance compensatory damages. Punitive damages depend on the existence of compensatory damages and cannot be awarded in the absence of compensatory damages. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Ordinary negligence is not a basis for punitive damages. In order for negligence to constitute wantonness meriting imposition of punitive damages, the plaintiff must show that the one acting or failing to act realized the imminence of the danger and failed to take steps to prevent it because he was indifferent to whether the injury occurred. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

As a matter of public policy, governments are generally not liable for punitive damages. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 138 (Chk. 2003).

Under the Chuuk State Sovereign Immunity Act of 2000, punitive (or exemplary) damages not greater than the compensatory damages and of not more than $20,000 may be awarded against the state or a municipality only if the injury was as a result of a government employee or agent who, acting under color of authority, violated the individual rights secured by the Chuuk Constitution. But the Sovereign Immunity Act of 2000 is not retrospective – it does not apply to claims that arose before its enactment – and prior law bars any punitive damage awards against a municipal government. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 138 (Chk. 2003).

While punitive damages are not permitted against a municipality, they can be awarded and are justified against individuals for their wanton, malicious, and deliberately violent treatment of a victim in detention. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 139 (Chk. 2003).

Since the purpose of punitive damages is to punish the tortfeasor, not to compensate the victim, a defendant's financial condition is relevant to a punitive damages claim because the defendant's financial condition has a bearing on the amount of punitive damages to be awarded. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 139 (Chk. 2003).

When a defendant with no net worth and no income is liable for punitive damages in addition to a substantial damage award, only a nominal punitive damage award of $1 is proper. When the net worth and income of defendants is not known, but it is known that they are employed and thus have an income, it is appropriate to award more than just nominal punitive damages. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 139 (Chk. 2003).

Punitive damages may not be recovered from Chuuk State as a matter of law. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

While exceptions exist, the general rule is that punitive damages may not be awarded absent an award of monetary damages. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

In order to obtain an award of punitive damages, a plaintiff must establish that the defendant acted with actual malice or deliberate violence. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

No punitive damages can be awarded when the plaintiff has not sustained his burden of demonstrating that the defendant's actions were intentional, wilful, and malicious, rather than merely negligent. Punitive damages may not be awarded for ordinary negligence. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Continued disobedience of court judgments and orders or of any court decision, may be grounds for a finding in the future, that the disobedience of the court's orders and decisions is wilful, deliberate, and intended to cause harm to the victim. Punitive damages may be recoverable in the future against any government officer or employee who is found to have wilfully violated the court orders and judgments. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 273 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

It is well established that punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. Such damages also will not be awarded unless it has been claimed and proved that the defendant acted with actual malice or deliberate violence. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 309 (Pon. 2004).

Since tort law generally is an area governed by state law, exemplary or punitive damages are not awardable against the State of Pohnpei under Pohnpei state law and a claim for exemplary damages against it will e dismissed. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 154, 155 (Pon.

2005).

Punitive damages will be denied when the plaintiffs' complaint makes no allegations that the defendants' actions were willful, wanton, or malicious or alleges facts that could constitute willfulness, wantonness, or malice, and when the cause of action is contract. Punitive damages are not a contract remedy since only compensatory damages are allowed for breach. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 313 (Chk. 2005).

A plaintiff may not as a matter of law recover punitive damages from the State of Chuuk. This principle has been modified somewhat by the enactment section 6 of the Chuuk State Sovereign Immunity Act of 2000, but that Act did not become law until January 25, 2001, and it does not apply to damage claims before that time. Zion v. Nakayama, 13 FSM R. 310, 314 (Chk. 2005).

Punitive damages may be awarded when a tort was committed with actual malice, or deliberate violence, or the acts complained of were wanton, reckless, malicious and oppressive and are given to enhance compensatory damages. But when the plaintiff has failed to sustain his burden of proof against the defendant on his cause of action based in tort: fraud, and therefore has not prevailed upon his fraud claim, punitive damages may not be imposed. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 402 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The State of Pohnpei cannot be held liable for punitive damages. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 206 (Pon. 2006).

Although punitive damages claims against the state will be dismissed, when the state is not the only defendant, an unchallenged punitive damage claim against a police officer will not be stricken. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 206 (Pon. 2006).

Generally, punitive damages are not a contract remedy, because only compensatory damages are allowed for breach of contract. Nor can punitive damages be awarded under non-contract (i.e., tort) causes of action unless the defendant's actions were alleged and proven to be willful, wanton, and malicious or with deliberate violence. Hartman v. Krum, 14 FSM R. 526, 532 (Chk. 2007).

A cause of action based on tort will not be lost or abated because of the death of the tort-feasor or other person liable. An action thereon may be brought or continued against the deceased person's personal representative, but punitive or exemplary damages may not be awarded nor penalties adjudged in the action. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 448 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the defendants' counterclaim for wrongful arrest is dismissed and the defendants' claim for punitive damages is based on the claim for wrongful arrest, the punitive damages claim is likewise dismissed because punitive damages are derivative and must rest on another underlying cause of action. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 20 (Pon. 2008).

Although, for punitive damages to be awarded, there must be evidence of gross negligence, it is not necessary for such proof to be set forth in the complaint. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 268 (Chk. 2009).

Punitive damages are derivative, in the sense that they derive from and depend on a separate and independent cause of action. They may be awarded when the acts complained of are wanton, reckless, malicious, and oppressive, but punitive damages are not awardable for breach of contract, since only compensatory damages are allowed in contract cases. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 441 (Pon. 2009).

Punitive damages may be recovered for conversion when the defendant's acts were accompanied by fraud, malice, recklessness, oppressiveness, or willful disregard of the plaintiff's rights that aggravated the injury or loss inflicted by the defendant. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 441-42 (Pon.

Although conversion by its nature involves wrongful acts that are hostile to an owner's interest in property, and although the defendants' actions in cashing premium checks were wrongful and showed a disregard of the plaintiff's property rights, that disregard was not sufficient to impose punitive damages because, when the checks were converted, they were converted in material part in the course of the agents' efforts to expedite services to the insurer's policy holders Nor will the court award punitive damages against the business cashing the checks because, while the business's actions in cashing the checks was wrongful, its employees relied in good faith on the insurance agents' representations that they were authorized to cash the checks. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 442 (Pon. 2009).

The purpose of punitive damages is not to compensate the plaintiff (since they are not a matter of right and are a windfall to the plaintiff), but to punish the tortfeasor. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

Punitive damages may be recoverable for tortious acts when the tortfeasor's act is accompanied by fraud, or involves ill will, actual malice, recklessness, wantonness, oppressiveness, willful disregard of the plaintiff's rights, or other circumstances tending to aggravate the injury. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

Punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. For punitive damages to be awarded, there must be evidence of gross negligence. Gross negligence is the intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the consequences as affecting the life or property of another. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 49 (Chk. 2010).

When there was no evidence before the court from which it could find that the defendant's contractor intentionally failed to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the consequences or that its act was accompanied by fraud, ill will, actual malice, recklessness, wantonness, oppressiveness, or willful disregard of the plaintiffs' rights, a motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' punitive damages claim will be granted. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 49 (Chk. 2010).

When the court has dismissed the underlying causes of action for compensatory damages, the punitive damages claim must also be dismissed because punitive damages are not an independent cause of action but must rest upon some other, underlying cause of action as merely an element of damages in the underlying cause of action. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

Punitive damages cannot be imposed on the Board of Trustees of the Pohnpei State Public Lands Trust because the Pohnpei state government is statutorily immune from punitive damages and the Board is a Pohnpei government agency. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

Punitive damages are, by definition, not actual (compensatory) damages, but are a windfall. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

Punitive damages resulting from the alleged defamatory statement cannot, under the express malice standard, be shown by inferences. Inferences are not enough. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

Punitive damages may be recoverable for conversion when the defendant's act was accompanied by fraud, or when they are authorized by statute. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 462 (Chk. 2014).

Liability for punitive damages is determined by the fact-finder after an evidentiary proceeding. This is in part because the tortfeasor's finances must be examined. Since the purpose of punitive damages is to punish the tortfeasor, not to compensate the victim, a defendant's financial condition is relevant to a punitive damages claim because the defendant's financial condition has a bearing on the amount of punitive damages that can be awarded. Punitive damages will therefore not be granted on summary judgment.

FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 462 (Chk. 2014).

For punitive damages to be awarded, there must be evidence of gross negligence. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 363 n.8 (App. 2017).

Pohnpei state government and its agencies are statutorily immune from punitive damages. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 377, 382 (Pon. 2019).

Punitive damages may be awarded when a tort was committed with actual malice, or deliberate violence, or the acts complained of were wanton, reckless, malicious and oppressive and are given to enhance compensatory damages. Punitive damages depend on the existence of compensatory damages and cannot be awarded in the absence of compensatory damages. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 490 (Pon. 2020).

Punitive damages are awarded to punish a defendant for his wrongful act and as a warning and example to deter him and others from committing similar acts in the future. As a general rule, punitive damages are allowed for an assault and battery committed wantonly, maliciously, or under circumstances of aggravation. Since battery usually is a matter of the worst kind of intentions, it frequently justifies punitive damages. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 490 (Pon. 2020).

If a defendant is found liable for punitive damages, a court cannot make an award having a meaningfully deterrent effect unless the court knows the extent of the defendant's wealth. The greater or lesser the degree of defendant's wealth, the greater or lesser would be the punitive award's amount, since a small award relative to overall wealth would not meaningfully deter, whereas a large award relative to overall wealth would be unduly onerous. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 490 (Pon. 2020).

When a defendant with no net worth and no income is liable for punitive damages in addition to a substantial damage award, only a nominal punitive damage award of $1 is proper. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 490 (Pon. 2020).

When an award of punitive damages is appropriate, evidence of the defendant's financial status must be submitted to the court before it will enter a punitive damages award. The court cannot enter a punitive damages award when no testimony was adduced about the defendant's financial status and the court does not have any information about the defendant's income and expenses. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 490-91 (Pon. 2020).

– Defamation

Tort claims for tortious interference with contractual relationships, defamation, and interference with prospective business opportunities are causes of action that arise under state law. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 203 (Pon. 2001).

Until such time as the plaintiff demonstrates the allegedly defamatory nature of the publications at issue, either by way of trial or proper motion accompanied by admissible supporting evidence, a permanent injunction cannot lawfully issue against the publication of speech that the defendants contend is true and which involves matters of public concern. O'Sullivan v. Panuelo, 10 FSM R. 257, 262 (Pon. 2001).

The complainant's right to bring a civil suit against the defendant for the tort of defamation is not impaired by the court's dismissal of the criminal defamation charges against her. Kosrae v. Waguk, 11 FSM R. 388, 392 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Although no definition of libel has ever been formulated that is sufficiently comprehensive to cover all cases, libel may be defined as a false and unprivileged publication by writing or other fixed representation to the eye which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy or which cause him to be shunned or avoided or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 557 (Chk. 2005).

There are constitutional limitations on defamation actions when the action involves a public official, a public figure, or a matter of substantial public controversy. In such instances, knowledge that the defamatory statement was false, or malice, or a reckless disregard for the truth must be shown in addition to the other elements of libel or slander. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 557 (Chk. 2005).

When the plaintiff was the CEO of CPUC, an instrumentality of the State of Chuuk, he was a public figure, and he might also be considered a public official. The power situation on Weno is always a matter of substantial public controversy. Thus in a libel action, when a resolution and memorandum were part of the CPUC Board of Directors' and its Chairman's official duties, the higher public figure standard and the principle of absolute or qualified privilege would both apply to the Board's and Chairman's official communications as part of official duties. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 557 (Chk. 2005).

When the complaint did not plead that the defendant knew that its allegations were false, or that they were made with malice, or that they were made with a reckless disregard of the truth, and even taking the facts as pled in the complaint as true, the facts alleged are insufficient as a matter of law for the court to find the defendant liable for libel under the higher public figure standard, especially when the communications appear to be privileged. Liability for libel is not deemed established merely because the defendant defaulted. Pohl v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 13 FSM R. 550, 557 (Chk. 2005).

Mean-spirited, accusatory words designed to harm another person, without regard to their truth or falsity are the kind of words that may result in a civil suit for the tort of defamation. However, the current criminal statute, Kosrae State Code § 13.313, may not be used to pursue a criminal prosecution for defamation because it does not clearly specify what types of speech are prohibited. Kosrae v. Taulung, 14 FSM R. 578, 581 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The two-year statute of limitations applies to causes of action for slander. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

Whether a plaintiff's cause of action for slander is time-barred depends on when that cause of action accrued. In general, a cause of action accrues when the right to bring suit on a claim is complete – the true test in determining when a cause of action arises or accrues is to establish the time when the plaintiff could have first maintained the action to a successful conclusion. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

As a general rule, a cause of action for libel or slander accrues, so as to start the running of limitations, at the time of publication, and not on the date of discovery of the wrong, or when the alleged injury occurred. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 405, 408 (Pon. 2007).

State law, and not the national law, provides the controlling limitations period for the causes of action, such as libel and slander and the tort of interference with contract and prospective economic advantage, that arise under state law. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 496 (Pon. 2008).

The two-year statute of limitations applies to causes of action for libel. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 497 (Pon. 2008).

A cause of action for libel accrues, so as to start the running of limitations, at the time of publication, and not on the date of discovery of the wrong, or when the alleged injury occurred. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 497 (Pon. 2008).

Truth is a defense to libel. Smith v. Nimea, 16 FSM R. 186, 191 (Pon. 2008).

When the truth of the allegedly libelous letter is in dispute; when a factual dispute exists as to whether the allegedly libelous letter played a role in the denial of the plaintiff's application for a foreign investment permit, the business opportunity alleged to have been interfered with by the defendant; and when these factual disputes are material to the claim, both parties' summary judgment motions on the claim of libel and interference with business opportunity will be denied. Smith v. Nimea, 16 FSM R. 186, 191 (Pon. 2008).

When the plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts to support a defamation action and the defendants allege either that the statements were true, or for some defendants, that they did not make the statements, a factual dispute exists as to who said what about the plaintiff, and whether the statements were false. Under these circumstances, there are facts to be determined at trial and summary judgment motions will be denied. Yoruw v. Ira, 16 FSM R. 464, 465 (Yap 2009).

Defamatory statements would still qualify as slanderous if they were spoken but not committed to writing. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 485 (Pon. 2009).

When the truth of alleged defamatory statements is at issue, the parties may litigate the issue of truth or falsity at trial. Pre-trial dismissal is not warranted. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 479, 485-86 (Pon. 2009).

Tort claims, including claims for tortious interference with contractual relationships, defamation, and interference with prospective business opportunities, are causes of action which arise under state law. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 45 (Pon. 2011).

The history of the law of defamation defies brief restatement. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 45 (Pon. 2011).

Libel is a subset of defamation, and as a cause of action is not well defined but FSM case law has at least once defined libel as a false and unprivileged publication by writing or other fixed representation to the eye which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy or which causes him to be shunned or avoided or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 46 (Pon. 2011).

Considerations of constitutional law and free speech sometimes apply to defamation cases, as when the action involves a public official, a public figure, or a matter of substantial public controversy. In such cases, beyond the other elements of defamation, the plaintiff must show that the defendant knew that the defamatory statement was false, or acted with malice or a reckless disregard for the truth. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 46 (Pon. 2011).

Although falsity is included in the FSM's definition of defamation, falsity is not a traditional element of a plaintiff's prima facie case; rather, truth is an affirmative defense. Even so, a court must distinguish between statements of fact and assertions of opinion, because opinions, false or not, libelous or not, are constitutionally protected and may not be the subject of private damage actions, provided that the facts supporting the opinions are set forth. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 46 (Pon. 2011).

An allegedly defamatory statement was published when it was set forth in ink in the defendant's letter to the Foreign Investment Board. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 46 (Pon. 2011).

Libel and defamation in general consider whether the allegedly defamatory statement exposes the plaintiff to (public) hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy (shame or disgrace); causes people to shun or avoid the plaintiff; or has a tendency to injure the plaintiff in his occupation or adversely affect the plaintiff's trade or business. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 47 (Pon. 2011).

A letter to the Foreign Investment Board which was not released to the public did not expose the plaintiff to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, because if people could not learn of the letter, they could not derive from the letter a reason to shun or avoid him; nor could the letter have injured the plaintiff's occupation since he was no longer employed at the time of the defendant's letter; and nor did it harm his trade or business because his proposed software business was not in existence at the time of the letter and because the Foreign Investment Board's denial of his application was based not on the concerns raised in the letter, but on problems with capitalization. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 47 (Pon. 2011).

Opinions, even if objectionable, are not actionable as defamation. Were the court to recognize opinions as actionable defamation, the judiciary would be flooded with civil actions based on little more than the equivalent of schoolyard taunts. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 47 (Pon. 2011).

A court, in considering the context of the alleged defamatory statements, cannot ignore that the alleged defamatory letter came as a response to a public solicitation for comments initiated by the Foreign Investment Board and that the FIB's role as an administrative and investigatory agency strongly attenuates what minimal defamatory effect the letter may otherwise have had. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 47 (Pon. 2011).

A cause of action for business libel must fail when the defendant did no more than respond to a solicitation for public comment by a government agency in a matter of public interest. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 48 (Pon. 2011).

Free speech is not a limitless right. One limitation comes from defamation law. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 196 (Pon. 2012).

Libel is a subset of defamation, and is defined as a false and unprivileged publication by writing or other fixed representation to the eye which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy or which causes him to be shunned or avoided or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 197 (Pon. 2012).

A court considers whether the allegedly defamatory statement: exposes the plaintiff to (public) hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy (shame or disgrace); causes people to shun or avoid the plaintiff; or has a tendency to injure the plaintiff in his occupation or adversely affect the plaintiff's trade or business. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 197 (Pon. 2012).

Considerations of constitutional law and free speech sometimes apply in defamation cases, as when the action involves a public official, a public figure, or a matter of substantial public controversy. In such cases, beyond the other elements of defamation, the plaintiff must show that the defendant knew that the defamatory statement was false, or acted with malice or a reckless disregard for the truth. FSM Dev. Bank v. Abello, 18 FSM R. 192, 197 (Pon. 2012).

A communication is defamatory if it tends so to harm the reputation of another as to lower him in the estimation of the community or to deter third persons from associating or dealing with him. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 484 n.7 (Pon. 2012).

In order to establish a claim for defamation-republisher, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant republished: 1) defamatory statements; 2) a non-privileged communication to a third-party; 3) the falsity of that statement; 4) referencing the plaintiff; 5) at least negligence on the publisher's part; and 6) prove resulting injury. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 485 (Pon. 2012).

One who repeats or otherwise republishes a defamatory matter is subject to liability as if he had originally published it. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 485 (Pon. 2012).

Publication of a defamatory matter is its communication intentionally or by a negligent act to one other than the person defamed; and one who intentionally and unreasonably fails to remove defamatory matter that he knows to be exhibited on land or chattels in his possession or under his control is subject to liability for its continued publication. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 485 (Pon. 2012).

A republication of the defamatory matter to a third person is essential to liability for defamation-republisher – in order to establish liability, there must be evidence that the defendant republished defamatory matter either intentionally or negligently to a third party other than the plaintiff. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 485 (Pon. 2012).

In the case of slander, as opposed to libel, the act is usually the speaking of the words. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 485 (Pon. 2012).

In an action for defamation, the plaintiff has the burden of proving, when the issues are properly raised 1) the communication's defamatory character, 2) its publication by the defendant, 3) its application to the plaintiff, 4) the recipient's understanding of the defamatory meaning, 5) the recipient's understanding of it as intended to be applied to the plaintiff, 6) special harm resulting to the plaintiff from its publication, 7) the defendant's negligence, reckless disregard or knowledge regarding the truth or falsity and the communication's defamatory character, and 8) the abuse of a conditional privilege. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 485-86 n.9 (Pon. 2012).

In an action for defamation-republisher, a plaintiff's statement of facts are insufficient to show the essential element of republication by the defendant when the plaintiff does not name the defendant's employee(s) that made the republication of any defamatory communication, or state when, where, and how the communication(s) occurred or who were the communication's recipients. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 486 (Pon. 2012).

If a defendant repeats or otherwise republishes defamatory matter, it is subject to liability as if it had originally published the matter. A standard of proof similar to that which would be applied to the original publisher is required. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 486 (Pon. 2012).

The tort of defamation includes libel and slander and generally embodies the public policy that individuals should be free to enjoy their reputations unimpaired by false and defamatory attacks. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 411 (Pon. 2014).

The tort of libel may be defined as a false and unprivileged publication by writing or other fixed representation to the eye which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy or which causes him to be shunned or avoided or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. Libel is a smaller subset of defamation – libel is written or visual defamation; slander is oral or aural defamation. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 411 n.1 (Pon. 2014).

Defamation causes of action arise under state law. Pohnpei generally follows the Restatement approach in its law concerning tort issues. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 411 (Pon. 2014).

A communication is defamatory if it tends so to harm the reputation of another so to lower him in the estimation of the community or to deter third persons from associating or dealing with him. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 411 (Pon. 2014).

A threshold issue is whether a statement is objectively defamatory or merely subjectively offensive. The gravamen or gist of an action for defamation is it denigrates the opinion which others in the community have of the plaintiff and invades the plaintiff's interest in his reputation and good name. It is not based on any physical or emotional distress to the plaintiff that may result. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 411-12 n.3 (Pon. 2014).

Four elements must be proven in a defamation claim: 1) false and defamatory statement concerning another; 2) an unprivileged publication to a third party; 3) fault amounting at least to negligence on part of the publisher; and 4) either actionability of the statement irrespective of special harm or the existence of special harm caused by the publication. The plaintiff thus has the burden to show falsity, publication, fault, and injury. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 412 (Pon. 2014).

Since truth is an affirmative defense to a defamation action, the court must distinguish between statements of fact and assertions of opinion, because opinions, false or not, libelous or not, are constitutionally protected and may not be the subject of private damage actions, provided that the facts supporting the opinions are set forth. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 412 (Pon. 2014).

Opinions, even if objectionable, are not actionable as defamation. An opinion is a personal comment about another's conduct, qualifications, or character that has some basis in fact, and whether a statement is an opinion, must be determined by the totality of the circumstances, including the forum in which the statement is made, the medium in which the statement was disseminated, and the audience to which it is published. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 412 (Pon. 2014).

When, from the totality of the circumstances, it is clear that the nature of a job reference is to ask for an opinion about the employee's characteristics and conduct and the nature of the numerical scale for the opinion is not objective; when the defendant's oral answers were either true or non-verifiable opinions; when any undisclosed imputation was not necessarily and unequivocally false and therefore could not be the subject of an implied defamation claim; and when it is clear that the interview question is asking for an employer's opinion about what his previous employee's weaknesses were, those weaknesses are not verifiable as either right or wrong, and thus cannot be the subject of a defamation claim. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414-15 (Pon. 2014).

Truth is an absolute bar to a defamation claim. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 413 (Pon. 2014).

An inference of falsity cannot be extended to non-verifiable opinions. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 413 (Pon. 2014).

Publication is a term of art, meaning that there was a communication to a third party person other than the person defamed. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 413 (Pon. 2014).

Without communication to another person a statement is of no consequence, but a statement is published even if made only to one other person. Furthermore, the publication must also be "unprivileged." When the publication is invited, procured, or consented to by the plaintiff, the publication is generally not deemed sufficient. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 413 (Pon. 2014).

Generally, establishing that the alleged defamatory statements were made to just one other person is enough, but when the statements were made to an employee of a reporting service that the plaintiff had hired, the plaintiff both invited and consented to the publication of the job references by signing up for the reporting service, and in doing so, requested that an agent procure the statements on his behalf, and legally, therefore, it cannot be said that the job reference was published to a third party under this term of art. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 413-14 (Pon. 2014).

In the employment context, references are protected by a qualified privilege, also known as the "merchant's" privilege. Responses by past employers to inquiries from prospective employers raise a conditional privilege based on the performance of a private duty. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

A communication derogatory of an employee's character or attributes, or concerning the reasons for his discharge or circumstances surrounding the termination of his employment generally, may be qualified, or conditionally privileged if made in good faith, in a reasonable manner and for a proper purpose. To overcome the merchant's privilege the plaintiff must demonstrate "express malice," or in modern terms, actual malice. Actual malice means that statements were made with knowledge of its falsity or a reckless disregard for the truth by clear and convincing evidence. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

Damages in defamation cases generally consider whether the allegedly defamatory statement: exposes the plaintiff to (public) hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy (shame or disgrace); causes people to shun or avoid the plaintiff; or has a tendency to injure the plaintiff in his occupation or adversely affect the plaintiff's trade or business. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

Damages for defamation are divided into three categories, 1) punitive damages or exemplary damages, where actual malice or recklessness is shown; 2) special damages such as the loss of business which are recoverable only on proof of loss of specific economic benefits; and 3) general damages which follow inevitably from the defamatory imputation. General damages can include loss of reputation, shame, mortification, and hurt feelings. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

Punitive damages resulting from the alleged defamatory statement cannot, under the express malice standard, be shown by inferences. Inferences are not enough. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 414 (Pon. 2014).

Speculative injury is not enough, with regard to special injury, it must be demonstrably shown. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

When, even considered in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, only one of the elements of defamation can be met, the inability to prove the other elements of the claim, necessarily requires that summary judgment be granted for the defendants with regard to the defamation claim. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

Defamation is a false and unprivileged publication which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy or which causes him to be shunned or avoided or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 567 (Kos. 2014).

Defamation is a state law cause of action. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. 2019).

The right not to be defamed, libeled, or slandered is not a right guaranteed by the Constitution or by the civil rights statute. Apostol v. Maniquiz, 22 FSM R. 146, 149 (Chk. 2019).

Whether an allegedly defamatory pleading in a case filed in a national court is privileged or actionable should be decided as a matter of national law and is thus a matter arising under national law. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 249 (Pon. 2019).

A private litigant is absolutely privileged to publish defamatory matter concerning another in communications preliminary to a proposed judicial proceeding, or in the institution of or during the course and as a part of, a judicial proceeding in which he participates, if the matter has some relation to the proceeding. This privilege is based upon the public interest in according to all men the utmost freedom of access to the courts of justice for the settlement of their private disputes. Like the privilege of an attorney, it is absolute. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 249-50 (Pon. 2019).

The absolute privilege or immunity for litigants and their attorneys is necessary for them to be protected not only from civil liability but also from the danger of even an unsuccessful civil action. It is thus necessary that the court not inquire into the propriety of their conduct in civil proceedings brought against them for misconduct in their position. The privilege, or immunity, is absolute and the protection is complete, and is not conditioned upon the honest and reasonable belief that the defamatory matter is true or upon the absence of ill will on the actor's part, but is based upon a policy that treats the ends to be gained by permitting defamatory statements as outweighing the harm that may be done to the reputation of others. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

At common law, parties to judicial proceedings are granted an absolute privilege to use defamatory language because of the overriding public interest that persons should speak freely and fearlessly in litigation, uninfluenced by the possibility of being brought to account in an action for defamation. This common law principle is eminently suitable for the FSM because it is difficult to see how any court system could function otherwise. It is sound public policy. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

Statements contained in pleadings, affidavits, depositions and other documents directly related to the case partake of this privilege; they cannot serve as the basis for an action for defamation. Since this privilege is absolute and the immunity is complete, whether counsel made a reasonable inquiry into the facts before filing the complaint is irrelevant. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

Statements in pleadings, if relevant and pertinent to the issues, are absolutely privileged even if the statements are false and made maliciously. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

False, misleading, or defamatory communications, even if made with malicious intent, are not actionable if they are material to, and made in the course of, a judicial or quasi-judicial proceeding. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

Statements made by counsel and parties in the course of judicial proceedings are privileged as long as such statements are material and pertinent to the questions involved irrespective of the motive with which they are made. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2019).

Because the plaintiffs have an absolute privilege or complete immunity from defamation liability to the counterclaimant, the court must grant the plaintiffs summary judgment on the defamation counterclaims and the court must deny the counterclaimant's cross motion for summary judgment. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2019).

A litigant's absolute privilege applies not only to defamation actions, but to any tort action based on statements made in connection with a judicial proceeding. These include the intentional infliction of emotional distress, the invasion of privacy, and false light actions, including false light invasion of privacy claims that fail to meet the standards for defamation. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 n.7 (Pon. 2019).

Libel is a false and unprivileged publication by writing which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy or which causes him or her to be shunned or avoided or which has a tendency to injure him or her in his or her occupation. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 377, 381 (Pon. 2019).

The court will not grant the plaintiff summary judgment on her defamation claim when it has no basis to find as an undisputed fact that the inclusion of a false statement in a statement, the rest of which was true, caused any damage, especially because the court cannot find that that one false statement, and that false statement alone, caused damages. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 377, 381-82 (Pon. 2019).

Libel is written or visual defamation and slander is oral or aural defamation. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 510 (Pon. 2020).

When the movants seek to dismiss a slander cause of action for the failure to state a claim and their ground is a factual defense, the court, accepting the plaintiff's factual allegations as true and the inferences drawn therefrom in her favor, cannot dismiss that cause of action on that ground. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 510 (Pon. 2020).

– Defamation Per Se

Defamation per se follows the ordinary defamation analysis, except the requirement to show special injury is waived when the disparaging statements impute a 1) criminal offense; 2) a loathsome disease; 3) a matter incompatible with his business, trade, profession or office; 4) or sexual misconduct. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

Defamation per se is words which on their face and without the aid of extrinsic proof are recognized as injurious. It is words that are obviously harmful without innuendo, colloquium, or explanation. The words must be susceptible of but one meaning, and that an opprobrious one. When the defamatory character of the statements is apparent on its face – that is when the words used are so obviously and materially harmful to the plaintiff that the injury to his or her reputation may be presumed. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

Defamation per se follows the ordinary defamation analysis, except the requirement to show special injury is waived when the disparaging statements impute a 1) criminal offense; 2) a loathsome disease; 3) a matter incompatible with his business, trade, profession or office; 4) or sexual misconduct. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

Summary judgment must be granted for the defendants on the plaintiff's defamation per se claim when, although the alleged defamatory remarks relate to the plaintiff's professional reputation, the business imputation is not apparent on the face of the words and the disparagement is only made by reference to the context and to innuendo to explain why those words are opprobrious. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

The defendants must be granted summary judgment on the plaintiff's defamation per se claim when the plaintiff cannot meet the legal standards necessary to prove the four elements of defamation at trial. The inability to prove even one element bars the claim. Zacchini v. Hainrick, 19 FSM R. 403, 415 (Pon. 2014).

Defamation per se follows the ordinary defamation analysis, except the requirement to show special injury [that is, that the false statement caused compensatory damages] is waived when the disparaging statements impute 1) a criminal offense; 2) a loathsome disease; 3) a matter incompatible with his or her business, trade, profession or office; or 4) sexual misconduct. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 377, 381 (Pon. 2019).

A court cannot, as a matter of law, conclude that a false statement that an attorney had sued a particular government agency would impute a matter that would be incompatible with an attorney's profession and thus constitute defamation per se when, if an occasion had arisen where it seemed advisable, the attorney would have sued the agency and when suing that agency would be completely compatible not only with the attorney's profession but also with her particular practice. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 377, 382 (Pon. 2019).

Summary judgment for the defendants on a plaintiff's defamation per se claim leaves the regular libel or defamation claim unresolved. Berman v. Pohnpei, 22 FSM R. 377, 382 (Pon. 2019).

– Duty of Care

In a jurisdiction like Pohnpei, where individual and economic development is beginning to take place and people are not quite sophisticated about the uses or proper handling of certain machinery or equipment introduced into the community to support such development, the procurer, user, owner, or seller of such equipment or machinery must take precautionary measures to educate people, either through written or oral explanation, about the proper handling, operation or storing of such equipment or machinery, and to inform them about the harm that might result if such equipment or machinery is not properly handled, operated or stored. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 68 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

So long as a state retains its role as the primary provider of health care services in that state, it is legally obligated to make a reasonable effort to provide a health care system reasonably calculated to meet the needs of the people of the state, but the state may make decisions to limit the scope of medicines to be maintained, so long as the decisions are based upon sound medical judgment arrived at through consideration of the health needs and financial realities of the state. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 530-31 (Pon. 1988).

Once a state health services decision has been made that a particular medicine should be obtained for patients, the state health services staff and other responsible state officials are under a duty to take reasonable steps to obtain the medicine. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 531 (Pon. 1988).

The standard of care for doctors at the Truk State hospital is that they are to exercise professional judgment in the attempt to diagnose the illness of the patient, and then, consistent with available facilities and supplies, act on that diagnosis. Asan v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 51, 56 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

When a person elects to operate a vehicle on the public streets he owes a duty to pedestrians and others using the road and adjacent areas to operate the vehicle in a safe and prudent manner. When the breach of this duty by driving in a fast and careless manner is the proximate cause of an injury the driver will be held liable. Ludwig v. Mailo, 5 FSM R. 256, 259 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damage caused by the breach, and determination of the value of the damage can there be a liability for negligence. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Everyone has a duty of care to act in such a way that other people are not harmed. Duties of care differ according to the circumstances and the exact parameters of each person's responsibilities towards others will be defined through time by judicial decisions and statutes. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

The state, when building a road, has a duty of care to take precautions to avoid foreseeable harm, and it has a duty of care not to take undue advantage of a landowner's generosity and lack of understanding of his rights. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Generally, a breach of duty is proven by the testimony of witnesses who describe what a reasonable person, acting in compliance with the duty of care, would have done or not done in the same situation. In rare circumstances when the facts are indisputable and when they raise such a strong inference that all reasonable people agree on the duty of care, the court can decide, as a matter of law, the person has breached his duty of care. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 421 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

When the state fails to tell a landowner that he has the option to refuse to grant the state an easement for a road, it has breached its duty of care. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 421-22 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

In order to be liable for a breach of the duty of care the breach must cause damage. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 422 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

A defendant must exercise due care not to cause others emotional distress that leads in turn to a foreseeable physical result. Eram v. Masaichy, 7 FSM R. 223, 226-27 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Where there was no physical manifestation of the emotional distress that was foreseeable there can be no claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Eram v. Masaichy, 7 FSM R. 223, 227 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

To license police officers to carry firearms without adequate training breaches the duty of care of the state and the chief of police because the duty of care is heightened when the instrumentality given the police is a deadly one. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 547 (Chk. 1996).

An employer owes a duty of care toward its employee to see that the employee is properly educated about the operation of clearly dangerous machinery. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 65 (Chk. 1997).

Where the employer is aware that unsafe procedures are being used and safe procedures are possible, but the employer does not demand them, the employer breaches its duty of care toward its employees. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 65 (Chk. 1997).

Acts that do not provide for a private citizen's cause of action for monetary damages cannot be used to create a duty for the breach of which damages may be awarded. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 292 (Pon. 1998).

The common law "incomplete privilege" of one to enter onto the land of another in times of private necessity is essentially codified by 19 F.S.M.C. 805(3), which states that "no person, including the owner or occupier of land may hinder or impede a rescuer." But it cannot have been the intent of 19 F.S.M.C. 805(3) to prevent law enforcement officials from carrying out their official duties in the face of an emergency rescue situation. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 292 (Pon. 1998).

The general principle is that one person may be liable in tort to another only if the first intentionally or negligently violates a duty owed to the other, and the other is injured as a result. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293, 294 (Pon. 1998).

Everyone has a duty of care to act in such a way that other people are not harmed. Duties of care differ according to the circumstances. The exact parameters of each person's responsibilities towards others will be defined through time by judicial decisions and statutes. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

There is a duty to take precautions in installing a telephone pole and wires to avoid foreseeable harm, for example, a child or another person walking into the dangling wire and causing injury. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Generally, a breach of duty is proven by the testimony of a witness who describes what a reasonable person, acting in compliance with the duty of care, would have done or not done in the same situation. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In determining liability for negligent injuries generally, electricity providers are required to use reasonable care in the construction and maintenance of their lines and apparatus, and will be responsible for any conduct falling short of this standard. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Electricity providers transmitting or using electricity are required to guard against events which can be reasonably foreseen or anticipated. The extent of the duty or standard of care is measured in the terms of foreseeability of injury from the situation created. It is not necessary that a power provider anticipate the precise injury to someone who had a right to be in the vicinity. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 449-50 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

One in the business of generating and distributing electricity who engages to install electric equipment must exercise the care of a reasonably prudent person skilled in the practice and art of installing such equipment according to the state of the art or method generally used by persons engaged in a like business at the time the work is done. An electricity provider is also charged with the duty of maintaining their electrical equipment and appliances. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

It is the imperative duty of electricity providers to make reasonable and proper inspection of their wires and other equipment and to use due diligence to discover and repair defects. A failure to perform such duty constitutes negligence. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

An electricity provider must make reasonable and proper inspections of its appliances with such frequency as appears reasonably necessary, and use due diligence to discover and remedy defects so that injury will not result. The presence of a conspicuous defect or dangerous condition of the electrical appliance which has existed for a considerable length of time will create a presumption of constructive notice of the defect. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The provisions of the Kosrae State Code do not impose a duty upon the state to grant medical referrals to every person. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 451 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Although neither state law nor regulation imposes any duty upon the state to make a medical referral to every person, a volunteer who gratuitously offers to provide service or assistance to another, and causes that other to rely upon the offer rather then to seek alternative ways of responding to the need, owes a duty to perform the donated services with reasonable care. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 451 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the state volunteers to provide medical service or assistance and causes the someone to rely upon that offer, what constitutes reasonable action or assistance must be determined in light of the surrounding circumstances. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 451 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In order to impose a duty upon the state to return a patient to Pohnpei for treatment, the state must know about the need for further medical care. If the state was not informed, it cannot be charged with the knowledge or the duty to return a patient for further medical treatment. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 451 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

One who carries on a dangerous activity must use care commensurate with the risk or danger of injury involved or suffer liability for resulting injuries. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 535 (Pon. 1998).

It is a breach of a duty of care to fail to warn persons known to be on nearby land when blasting will occur. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 540 (Pon. 1998).

The common law definition of negligence includes the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent person would use in a similar situation. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

An employer owes a duty of care toward its employee to see that the employee is properly educated about the operation of clearly dangerous machinery. An employer who recognizes the potential danger of a work situation, but who fails to take steps to reduce the danger or warn his employees of the danger is negligent. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

30 F.S.M.C. 104 does not require the FSM Development Bank to provide technical assistance to persons the bank loans money to, but simply permits it to provide such assistance. The bank has no duty to provide technical assistance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 76 (Pon. 2001).

The statute, 30 F.S.M.C. 104, does not impose a duty upon the FSM Development Bank to provide technical assistance to debtors to whom it has already made a loan, nor to assignees of those debtors. Nor does it give rise to a private cause of action. FSM Dev. Bank v. Mudong, 10 FSM R. 67, 76-77 (Pon. 2001).

In order to be liable for a breach of duty of care, the breach must cause damage. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A general contractor in control of a structure or premises owes to the employees of any other contractor rightfully thereon a duty to exercise ordinary care to keep the structure or premises in a safe condition for their use. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

An employer has a duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care commensurate with the nature of the business to protect the employee from the hazards incident to it, and the employer is bound to exercise this degree of diligence in providing his employee with a safe working place. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

An owner/general contractor who actively supervises daily construction operations has a duty to keep the premises safe for all workers on the job and is ultimately liable for injuries occurring on the worksite when those injuries result from failure to perform that duty. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

When a general contractor had a duty to provide a safe work environment for the construction work to be done at the second story heights and his duty in this regard ran not only to the employees of subcontractors, but to those that he employed directly as well, which included the plaintiff, and when his failure to provide any kind of safety equipment, precautions, instructions or supervision resulted in the plaintiff's fall and consequent injury, he is therefore liable for the damages suffered as a result of that injury. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250-51 (Pon. 2001).

30 F.S.M.C. 104(b) does not create a duty for the FSM Development Bank to provide technical assistance, but rather authorizes the FSM Development Bank to provide such assistance as a part of its functions. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ifraim, 10 FSM R. 342, 345 (Chk. 2001).

Sellers of inflammable liquids owe a high duty toward consumers to exercise care in the sales of inflammable liquids to consumers. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2001).

When, according to the complaint's allegations, the defendants' medical malpractice led to the deceased's death, and when, attached to the defendants' summary judgment motion is an affidavit of a medical doctor who is board certified in the field of family practice and the affidavit recites that the doctor has reviewed the medical records and that his opinion is that her diagnosed illness, tuberculosis of the spine, was so serious that in order to avoid paralysis, it would have been acceptable practice to administer the medications in question even if the deceased's treating doctors had been aware of her hepatitis history, the doctor's affidavit is relevant evidence based on an adequate foundation, that tends to show that the defendants did not violate the applicable standard of care. This evidence is of sufficient weight that left unopposed, no genuine issue of material fact exists under FSM Civil Rule 56, and the defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Since the plaintiffs have offered nothing to meet the evidence offered by the defendants, no genuine issues of material fact therefore exist, and the defendants are entitled to summary judgment in their favor. Joe v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 45, 47 (Kos. 2004).

The bailee, having custody of the bailor's property, has the obligation to exercise due care to protect the property from loss, damage or destruction. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

While a mortgagee bank may have policies and rules it must follow that require it to inquire into the purported collateral or security and require ownership documents and certified maps of the property's location when land is used as collateral or security for its loans, it has not been shown that violation of these policies and rules creates a duty to a stranger to the mortgage. They may create a duty to the bank's shareholder, and failure to follow them may result in the bank holding worthless security, but the bank has not been shown to have a general duty to all landowners not to accept a mortgage to land one of them might later claim. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127-28 (Chk. 2005).

Since a bank owed no duty of care to a plaintiff when it took a mortgage to secure a loan to another, and that mortgage, even if it is unenforceable, was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's alleged damages, the bank is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law on the plaintiff's negligence and void mortgage causes of action. Additional reasons for this are that the bank has not attempted to foreclose its mortgage and that the mortgage does not cover the lot for which the plaintiff has a determination of ownership. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 (Chk. 2005).

A mortgagee, is not an insurer or guarantor of the mortgagor's actions. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 129 (Chk. 2005).

Duties of care differ according to the circumstances. The test is whether the injury, under all the circumstances, might reasonably been foreseen by a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence. Phillip v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 109, 113 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The municipality, chief, and jailer owed a prisoner a duty of care, had a duty to regularly observe his condition, breached that duty by failing to provide the required checks on his condition. These defendants are therefore liable under for the prisoner's death by neglect. The municipality, through its subsequent conduct, effectively ratified its agents' conduct. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

"Assumption of the risk" is a common law defense to negligence, which acts as a complete bar to the plaintiff's recovery because it relieves the defendant of any duty of care to the plaintiff. Kileto v. Chuuk, 15 FSM R. 16, 17-18 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

"Assumption of the risk" usually describes a common law negligence or other tort defense that acts as a complete bar to the plaintiff's recovery because it relieves the defendant of any duty of care to the plaintiff. Bank of the FSM v. Truk Trading Co., 16 FSM R. 281, 286 (Chk. 2009).

An insurer has no duty to its agents to undertake an investigation for the agents' benefit in order to stop the agents from converting the insurer's property. When the insurer's property was converted by the agents' intentional actions, the agents cannot argue that the insurer should have known that they were converting – stealing – the insurer's property, and that since the insurer should have stopped them but did not stop them from doing what they had no right to do, the agents should not have to pay back what they took. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 443 (Pon. 2009).

An employer has a duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care commensurate with the nature of the business to protect the employee from the hazards incident to it, and the employer is bound to exercise this degree of diligence in providing his employee with a safe working place. Duty of care is one of the four elements of a negligence cause of action. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 264, 265-66 (Chk. 2010).

Generally, one who undertakes to render professional service is under a duty to the person for whom the service is to be performed to exercise such care, skill, and diligence as men in that profession ordinarily exercise under like circumstances. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 579-80 (Pon. 2011).

The law imposes upon persons performing architectural, engineering, and other professional and skilled services the obligation to exercise a reasonable degree of care, skill and ability, which generally is taken and considered to be such a degree of care and skill as, under similar conditions and like surrounding circumstances, is ordinarily employed by their respective professions. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

Unless he represents that he has greater or less skill or knowledge, one who undertakes to render services in the practice of a profession or trade is required to exercise the skill and knowledge normally possessed by members of that profession or trade in good standing in similar communities. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

The circumstances to be considered in determining the standard of care, skill, and diligence to be required of a professional include the terms of the employment agreement, the nature of the problem which the supplier of the service represented himself as being competent to solve, and the effect reasonably to be anticipated from the proposed remedies. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

Although a professional's duty of care exists independent of and is not created by contract, a contract may furnish the conditions for that duty's fulfilment. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

The reasonable care standards apply similarly to architects, engineers, doctors, lawyers, and like professionals engaged in furnishing skilled services for compensation and general negligence principles apply. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

Ordinarily, a determination that the care, skill, and diligence exercised by a professional engaged in furnishing skilled services for compensation was less than that normally possessed and exercised by members of that profession in good standing and that the damage sustained resulted from the variance requires expert testimony to establish the prevailing standard and the consequences of departure from it in the case under consideration. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580-81 (Pon. 2011).

Because the fact-finder is not permitted to speculate as to the standard against which to measure the acts of the professional in determining whether he exercised a reasonable degree of care, expert testimony is required. Only in a few very clear and palpable cases can a court dispense with the expert testimony requirement to establish the parameters of professional conduct and find damages to have been caused by a professional's failure to exercise reasonable care, skill, and diligence. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 581 (Pon. 2011).

Vessels had a duty not to cause any damage to the reef and marine resources in Yap waters, which was breached by the vessels' failure to maintain a position off of Yap without causing damage to Yap's fringing reef and its attendant marine resources. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 174 (Yap 2012).

A corporation is not required to warn businesses not to cash checks that have the corporation as the payee since those business should not be cashing checks payable to a large, off-island corporation, anyway. The check casher has the duty to determine whether the person seeking to cash a check with a corporate payee is authorized by the corporation to do so, if it is going to cash the check. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 363 (App. 2012).

The police, as state officers, have no constitutional duty to rescue persons because due process considerations are not implicated when the state fails to help someone already in danger. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 429 (Chk. 2012).

As a general rule, a person has no legal duty to control the conduct of another. An affirmative duty to aid or protect arises only when a special relationship exists between the parties. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

A special relationship creating a duty of care exists when a person is in police custody, but when an officer pursues but does not have any actual contact with the person pursued, that person was never seized or in custody. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

When a person was never in police custody, the "deliberate indifference" duty of care standard for the liability of law enforcement officials towards prisoners does not apply. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

When a person is in police custody, a special duty arises because the police would have then assumed responsibility for the person as he would not be able to protect himself. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

The police, by giving up their search for him and leaving the area, did not breach any special duty they might have had toward a person they had seen running away. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

When a person has created the dangerous situation himself, other persons have no duty to rescue him unless they had a special relationship with him – a special duty towards him. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

The police are generally not liable to a plaintiff who injures himself fleeing the police. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

When there is no factual basis for the existence of a special duty, the defendants' summary judgment motion should be granted since one of the essential elements of negligence cannot be proven. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

A doctor and the state hospital did not breach their duty to render professional medical services when they exercised such care, skill, and diligence as someone in that profession ordinarily exercises under like circumstances when they correctly diagnosed the patient's ailment, when they recommended her for off-island referral to an appropriate medical facility since they were unable to do the tests to confirm their diagnosis and since they were unable to offer all of the treatment options that might be needed, and when they offered her appropriate medical care as an in-patient until she could go to an off-island medical facility for her follow-up, but she refused admission. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

Since the state did not have a statutorily-created duty under Kosrae Code § 12.1103 to assist in paying for the family attendant's airfare, it did not have a statutorily-created duty to inform the family attendant that he could ask the State for financial assistance for his own airfare. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582 (Kos. 2013).

The state cannot be said to have breached its duty when there was insufficient evidence before the court that it was state policy to pay for family attendant's airfare and to then seek repayment by wage or salary allotments; when there was no evidence about when this policy was implemented, by whom it was implemented, whether this policy was in existence in July 2001, the process used to apply for these funds, and whether there were any such funds available in late July 2001 that could have been used to immediately pay for the family attendant's ticket; when the statute barred the use of medical referral funds in a manner contrary to regulation; and when if no funds were available in July 2001, any request would have been futile and it would have been pointless to tell the family attendant that the State could assist. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582 (Kos. 2013).

A 1991 memorandum of understanding between the insurer and the Kosrae State Hospital that required that the hospital provide all necessary health care services within Kosrae to all covered persons and that these services would include the cost of a medical or other attendant to accompany a covered person to a health care facility is an agreement that allocates the cost of attendants between the parties to the memorandum and it does not, by itself, allocate costs or create duties between the state and the insureds ("covered persons") and their families. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582 (Kos. 2013).

While there may be no general duty to explain the type of insurance involved, insurance agents may be found to have additional duties when specifically questioned by the insured as to the appropriate level of insurance. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 358 (Pon. 2014).

When the plaintiff has not demonstrated that the defendant's actions reflect a standard of care that is unreasonable under the circumstances, the plaintiff's negligence claim must fail. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2014).

When the bank showed sufficient diligence in investigating the borrowers' financial condition and the borrowers' ability to repay the loan they sought, if the bank had a duty to the borrowers to investigate their ability to pay and to not lend them money if they did not have the ability to repay, it did not breach that duty. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 171 (Pon. 2017).

Although a party has a duty not to destroy another's property, that duty is not breached when the property's removal was authorized. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 187 (Pon. 2017).

When a reasonable person, in considering the totality of the circumstances, would find that the defendant did not breach its duty of care, the plaintiff's claim for negligence is not substantiated. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 188 (Pon. 2017).

An employer has a duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care commensurate with the nature of the business to protect the employee from hazards incident to it. The employer is bound to exercise this degree of diligence in providing its employee with a safe working place. Duty of care is one of the four elements of a negligence cause of action. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

An employer has a duty to provide its employee with proper training, equipment, and a safe work environment. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

In a place like Pohnpei, where industrial and economic development continues to take shape and the people are not quite sophisticated about the uses or proper handling of certain machinery or equipment, a procurer, user, owner, or seller of equipment or machinery must take extra precautionary measures in educating the people about the proper handling, operation, or storage of any such machinery or equipment and also inform the people about the potential harm if such machinery or equipment is not properly handled, operated, or stored. Failure to observe such extra precautionary measures may render the equipment's procurer, user, owner, operator, or the seller liable for any injury that might result from such failure. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

Education or information about dangerous machinery or equipment can be made in writing, or by oral explanation, through demonstration, or uses of signs easily understood and noticeable. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

When an employer is aware that unsafe procedures are being used and safe procedures are possible but the employer does not demand them, the employer breaches its duty of care toward its employees. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

An employer breaches its duty of care when it fails to provide its employee with proper footwear appropriate for the hazardous work site despite being aware of the importance of proper footwear on the work site and despite it being company policy to require proper work equipment. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 28 (Pon. 2018).

A public utility's duty of care extends beyond just a duty to landowners. It also has a duty to those persons who reside on, or who work on, or who otherwise occupy land. Thus, a plaintiff may seek relief under a negligence cause of action as a resident or an occupant of the affected land. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 154 (Chk. 2019).

– False Arrest

A person arrested for obstructing justice because she refused to give the police officers access to her car and interfered with their peaceful attempts to talk with her husband, whom she locked inside the car, is arrested for an offense committed in the police officers' presence, and, that being the case, a warrant did not need to be issued prior to the arrest. Since the officers correctly determined that they had probable cause to arrest without a warrant because her conduct fell within the Pohnpei state law definition of obstruction of justice, they did not conduct an unlawful or false arrest of her. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 574 (Pon. 2009).

Regardless of whether civil liability can be imposed for failing to inform an arrestee of her rights or for failing to inform her of the cause and authority of her arrest, civil liability will be imposed when it was illegal to arrest her without a warrant where she was arrested. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

When no evidence was presented at trial that the Director of Public Safety was personally involved in the plaintiff's arrest and jailing or that he directed its manner or timing, the court cannot presume that because his wife was the complainant that he ordered or directed that the plaintiff be arrested and jailed because, in the absence of evidence, an inference just as likely is that a zealous subordinate, believing it would curry favor with his superior, decided that a quick arrest and some jail time were in order. The court therefore will not hold the Director, in his personal capacity, liable to the plaintiff. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

When no evidence was presented that supports the liability of the Director of Public Safety in his official capacity, judgment for an illegal arrest by the Pohnpei state police will be entered solely against the Pohnpei state government. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

When no evidence of special or particular damages was introduced at trial, the court can rely on previous case law to assess damages for the wrongful arrest and detention. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 401 (Pon. 2012).

When, regardless of the number of grounds on which the plaintiff's arrest was illegal, it was still only one illegal arrest, the court will make one damage award of $500 for the illegal arrest. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 401 (Pon. 2012).

– False Imprisonment

A redressible civil wrong is committed when a person is unlawfully detained against his will. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 295 (Pon. 1998).

The elements of false imprisonment are 1) detention or restraint of one against his or her will, and 2) the unlawfulness of such detention or restraint. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 295 (Pon. 1998).

A false imprisonment claim is separate and distinct from a civil rights claim. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 154, 156 (Pon. 2005).

Corrections officers' actions in holding the plaintiff in jail for more than 24 hours constituted tortious conduct, specifically the tort of false imprisonment. Since these actions were carried out within the scope of their employment rather than for their own personal purposes and the acts complained of were perpetrated in government buildings devoted to law enforcement purposes, under these circumstances, the governmental employer should be held responsible for what was done and thus, Pohnpei and its Department of Public Safety are liable for this tort. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 491, 492-93 (Pon. 2005).

False imprisonment's elements are: 1) restraint or detention of one against his or her will and 2) unlawfulness of the restraint or detention. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483,

492 (Pon. 2005).

When a person is unlawfully detained against his will, a civil wrong is committed for which he may seek redress. Such a claim is separate and distinct from a civil rights claim, but, at the same time, such a claim may serve as a basis for deprivation of liberty under the FSM civil rights statute. The relevant concern in this regard is that damages should not be awarded for both claims, since to do so would be to permit a double recovery. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 350, 355 (Pon. 2009).

The FSM is liable to a ship captain for the wrongful retention of his passport, and hence the wrongful detention of the captain himself, for the period that the captain was required to remain in Pohnpei after he had requested the release of his passport. While damages in such a case can be difficult to quantify, an award of damages in the amount of $120 per day is appropriate. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 350, 355 (Pon. 2009).

When no evidence was presented at trial that the Director of Public Safety was personally involved in the plaintiff's arrest and jailing or that he directed its manner or timing, the court cannot presume that because his wife was the complainant that he ordered or directed that the plaintiff be arrested and jailed because, in the absence of evidence, an inference just as likely is that a zealous subordinate, believing it would curry favor with his superior, decided that a quick arrest and some jail time were in order. The court therefore will not hold the Director, in his personal capacity, liable to the plaintiff. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

False imprisonment's elements are: 1) restraint or detention of one against his or her will and 2) unlawfulness of the restraint or detention. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2014).

A false imprisonment claim is separate and distinct from a civil rights claim, but, at the same time, it may serve as a basis for deprivation of liberty under the FSM civil rights statute. The relevant concern in this regard is that damages should not be awarded for both claims, since to do so would be to permit a double recovery. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 466-67 (Chk. 2014).

The common law torts of false arrest and false imprisonment overlap a great deal and, in the usual case, a false arrest is followed by and becomes a part of a false imprisonment. However, there are those occasions where a lawfully executed initial arrest may be followed by an unlawful detention giving rise to liability for false imprisonment. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2014).

When there was an initial lawful arrest followed by lawful confinement in the Chuuk state jail pursuant to Chuuk State Supreme Court orders, but once the prisoner's release date passed his lawful detention became unlawful detention without an arrest and it thus became false imprisonment without a false arrest. Kon v. Chuuk, 19 FSM R. 463, 467 (Chk. 2014).

The police had probable cause to arrest a person and that arrest was lawful when they knew that he had someone else's pigs and that he would not release them to their owner. Since his arrest was lawful, the resulting overnight detention was lawful and was not false imprisonment. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 96 (Pon. 2015).

– Fraud

In general, the statute of limitations in an action for fraud begins to run from the time of discovery of the fraud, or when reasonable diligence should have led to discovery of the fraud. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (I), 6 FSM R. 171, 177 (Pon. 1993).

The elements of fraud are 1) misrepresentations, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiffs, 3) with reliance by the plaintiffs upon the misrepresentations, 4) to their detriment. Pohnpei v. Kailis, 6 FSM R. 460, 462 (Pon. 1994).

Rule 9(b) requires that in allegations of fraud that the circumstances constituting the fraud shall be stated with particularity. The extent of the particularity is guided by Civil Rule 8(a) which requires a short and plain statement of the claim. Pohnpei v. Kailis, 6 FSM R. 460, 462 (Pon. 1994).

In order to make a prima facie case of intentional misrepresentation a plaintiff must produce some evidence of: 1) a misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) scienter or the defendant's knowledge that the statements were untrue, 3) intent to cause the plaintiff to rely on the misrepresentations, 4) causation or actual reliance by the plaintiff, 5) justifiable reliance by the plaintiff and 6) damages. The misrepresentation must be a false and material representation of a past or present fact. Eram v. Masaichy, 7 FSM R. 223, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

A plaintiff is justified in relying on a defendant's representations of a vehicle's "good shape and operation" where the defendant is a mechanic with superior knowledge of vehicles and this particular vehicle's condition. Eram v. Masaichy, 7 FSM R. 223, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

When pleading fraud the pleader must state the time, place, and content of the false misrepresentation, the fact misrepresented and what was obtained as a consequence of the fraud. Pacific Agri-Products, Inc. v. Kolonia Consumer Coop. Ass'n, 7 FSM R. 291, 293 (Pon. 1995).

The extent of the particularity required when pleading fraud is guided by FSM Civil Rule 8(a), which requires a "short and plain statement of the claim." Chen Ho Fu v. Salvador, 7 FSM R. 306, 309 (Pon. 1995).

The elements of fraud are 1) a misrepresentation, 2) made to induce action by plaintiff, 3) reliance by plaintiff on the misrepresentation, 4) to plaintiff's detriment. Chen Ho Fu v. Salvador, 7 FSM R. 306, 309 (Pon. 1995).

Because the elements of fraud are 1) misrepresentations, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff, 3) with reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations, 4) to their detriment, a plaintiff must put on evidence that the misrepresentations were done to induce action by him, and that he relied on them to his detriment. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes, 7 FSM R. 522, 526 (Pon. 1996).

In Chuuk, the elements of fraud or intentional misrepresentation are: 1) a misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) scienter or the defendant's knowledge that the statements were untrue, 3) intent to cause the plaintiff to rely on the misrepresentations, 4) causation or actual reliance by the plaintiff, 5) justifiable reliance by the plaintiff and 6) damages. Kaminanga v. FSM College of Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 438, 442 (Chk. 1998).

Actions or conduct, as well as words, can constitute the necessary misrepresentation for fraud. In some cases, the misrepresentations may be made by a failure to disclose information. Kaminanga v. FSM College of Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 1998).

In all averments of fraud the circumstances constituting fraud must be stated with particularity. Medabalmi v. Island Imports Co., 10 FSM R. 32, 35 (Chk. 2001).

Any proposed amended complaint seeking to add a civil fraud charge against a defendant must state the circumstances constituting fraud with particularity. Bank of the FSM v. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc., 10 FSM R. 327, 333 (Pon. 2001).

When the plaintiff's complaint seems to plead fraud, and a defendant moves to dismiss for failure to state a claim but the argument is that this claim should be dismissed because it was not plead with particularity, the court may treat that as a request for a more definite statement, grant the request, and require the plaintiff to amend its complaint to state with greater clarity which facts it believes constitute fraud.

Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 92 (Pon. 2003).

In order to make a prima facie case of intentional misrepresentation, a plaintiff must produce some evidence of 1) a misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) scienter or the defendant's knowledge that the statements were untrue, 3) intent to cause the plaintiff to rely on the misrepresentations, 4) causation or actual reliance by the plaintiff, 5) justifiable reliance by the plaintiff and 6) damages. The misrepresentation must be a false and material representation of a past or present fact. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 401 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

In considering evidence relevant to misrepresentation, actions or conduct, as well as words, can constitute the necessary misrepresentation for fraud. In some cases, the misrepresentations may be made by a failure to disclose information. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 401 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the defendant, an elderly widow, unsophisticated in legal terminology and property transactions, in good faith believed that as owner of the two parcels, she had the authority to sell them to the plaintiff and also believed, in good faith, that execution and filing of the "quitclaim deed" would be adequate documentation to transfer title to the plaintiff, the defendant did not have knowledge that her representations regarding her authority to sell the subject parcels were untrue or incorrect, the plaintiff has failed to sustain his burden of proof as to all elements required for the tort of intentional misrepresentation or fraud. Isaac v. Palik, 13 FSM R. 396, 401 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The elements of the tort of fraud are: 1) misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) defendant's knowledge that the statements were untrue, 3) intent to cause the plaintiff to rely upon the misrepresentations, 4) actual reliance by the plaintiff, 5) justifiable reliance, and 6) damages. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 548 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the plaintiffs have not presented evidence of any misrepresentations made by the defendant to them, with intent to cause the plaintiffs to rely upon them, several elements of the tort of fraud have not been satisfied, the fraud causes of action must fail. Benjamin v. Youngstrom, 13 FSM R. 542, 549 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Rule 9(b) requires that in allegations of fraud, the circumstances constituting the fraud be stated with particularity. The extent of particularity requires a short and plain statement of the claim. When pleading fraud, the pleader must state the time, place, and content of the false misrepresentation, the fact misrepresented, and what was obtained as a consequence of the fraud. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the plaintiff has not satisfied the procedural requirements for pleading fraud because she has failed to state the time, place and content of the false misrepresentation made by the defendants, the fraud cause of action must fail due to the lack of pleading with particularity as required by Rule 9(b). Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The elements of the tort of fraud are: 1) misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) defendant's knowledge that the statements were untrue, 3) intent to cause the plaintiff to rely upon the misrepresentations, 4) actual reliance by the plaintiff, 5) justifiable reliance, and 6) damages. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 567 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When the plaintiff failed to present any evidence that the defendant knew his statements were untrue and when the defendant's statements were presented to the Kosrae State Land Commission for their consideration of evidence and determination of ownership for the subject parcels, there was no actual or justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon those statements and if there was any reliance, it was by the Land Commission in their consideration of the claims and evidence pertaining to ownership of the subject parcels. The plaintiff has thus failed to submit competent evidence in support of her fraud cause of action. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The tort of "fraud-act of mistake" has not been recognized in Kosrae, but since this cause of action appears to sound in negligent misrepresentation, therefore an analysis of the action as the tort of negligence is appropriate. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

The elements of fraud or intentional misrepresentation in Chuuk are: 1) a misrepresentation by party, 2) scienter or the party's knowledge that the statements were untrue, 3) intent to cause another to rely on the misrepresentations, 4) causation or actual reliance by the other, 5) justifiable reliance by the other, and 6) damages. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 457 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

In all averments of fraud or mistake, the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake must be stated with particularity, although a person's malice, intent, knowledge, or other condition of mind may be averred generally. Dereas v. Eas, 14 FSM R. 446, 458 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

The elements of a cause of action for fraudulent misrepresentation are: 1) misrepresentations 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff 3) with reliance by the plaintiffs upon the misrepresentation 4) to their detriment. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 442 (Pon. 2009).

An assurance that things were "going smooth – most of the time" is a type of generalized opinion that is not the sort of specific representation on which a hearer may reasonably rely. Reliance must be reasonable. Even when a fiduciary relationship existed between the parties, the parties to such a relationship may certainly communicate at times on a superficial, conventional level where the statements made do not give rise to reasonable reliance that could be the basis for a fraudulent misrepresentation cause of action. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 442-43 (Pon. 2009).

Because the elements of fraud are: 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff, 3) with justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations, 4) to the plaintiff's detriment, a plaintiff must show that the misrepresentations were done to induce action by him, and that he relied on them to his detriment. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 597 (Pon. 2009).

Rule 9(b) requires that in all averments of fraud or mistake, the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake shall be stated with particularity. The extent of the particularity is guided by Civil Rule 8(a) which requires a short and plain statement of the claim. When alleging fraud, a plaintiff must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud and must identify particular statements and actions and specify why they are fraudulent. Conclusory allegations do not satisfy Rule 9(b)'s requirements and subject the pleader to dismissal. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 597 (Pon. 2009).

When, taking the guarantors' factual allegations as true – that the bank misrepresented to plaintiffs that the documents were in accord with the loan, caused plaintiffs to rely upon said representations and knew plaintiffs would so rely – it is difficult to see how the guarantors were harmed thereby because, if the bank had prepared all the documents correctly, the documents would have shown that a corporation was the borrower and that the guarantors were guarantors with the result that the guarantors would be liable on their guaranty, and since this result is no different than that in the judgment rendered in the former litigation, any alleged reliance on the bank's representation could not have been to the guarantors' detriment since they were in no worse position than if the loan documents were accurately prepared. Arthur v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 581, 597-98 (Pon. 2009).

The elements of intentional misrepresentation are: 1) a misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) scienter or the defendant's knowledge that the statements were untrue, 3) intent to cause the plaintiff to rely on the misrepresentations, 4) causation or actual reliance by the plaintiff, 5) justifiable reliance by the plaintiff, and 6) damages; and since the elements of fraud are: 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff, 3) with justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations, 4) to the plaintiff's detriment, which means that a plaintiff must show that the misrepresentations were done to induce action by him, and that he relied on them to his detriment, a close reading indicates that the elements of fraud and of intentional misrepresentation are the same and they are the same cause of action. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 584-85 (Pon. 2011).

If the contractor had told the FSM that it done soil testing when it had not and if the FSM relied on that misrepresentation to its detriment, then that could have constituted an intentional material misrepresentation or fraud. But when the contractor informed the FSM that it had not done soil testing but had instead used the soil tests done elsewhere for its design preparations and the FSM then waived this requirement for these two projects; when the contractor included clauses in draft construction bid documents submitted to the FSM for its approval that the construction contractors conduct soil testing; and when, even if soil testing has been done in the design phase, soil testing is still necessary in the construction phase (and may have been particularly necessary here since the pre-design soil testing has been waived), there was thus no misrepresentation made to the FSM. The contractor is entitled to summary judgment on the FSM's fraud claim based on putting soil testing requirements in the bid documents. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 585 (Pon. 2011).

Since reliance upon a defendant's misrepresentation to one's detriment are essential elements of a plaintiff's case for fraud or intentional misrepresentation, when the plaintiff has not identified any misrepresentation by the defendant upon which the plaintiff relied to its detriment, the plaintiff has failed to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of elements essential to its case and summary judgment in the defendant's favor is appropriate. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 585 (Pon. 2011).

When the plaintiff does not identify any statement made during one incident that it detrimentally relied on or any damages caused by it and the other alleged incident is not properly before the court and was not pled with particularity, the defendant is entitled to summary judgment on the fraud or misrepresentation claim based on those allegations. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 585 (Pon. 2011).

A party cannot, by raising a new fraud claim in a summary judgment opposition, bypass the Rule 9(b) provision that the circumstances constituting fraud must be pled with particularity and effect a de facto amendment to its pleading. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 586 (Pon. 2011).

When a project was never put out to bid and its bid documents never used, the plaintiff cannot show elements essential to its claim – that it relied on those bid documents to its detriment. Accordingly, the defendant is entitled to summary judgment on the fraud or misrepresentation claim based on allegations that the bid documents prepared by the defendant contained terms that they should not have. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 586 (Pon. 2011).

When the plaintiff has not shown that it relied to its detriment on the exculpatory language in bid documents prepared by the defendant, elements essential to its fraud claim, the defendant will be granted summary judgment on the fraud or misrepresentation claim based on allegations that the defendant prepared bid documents with exculpatory language. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 586 (Pon. 2011).

Since the elements of fraud are: 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff, 3) with justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations, 4) to the plaintiff's detriment, a plaintiff must show that the misrepresentations were done to induce action by him, and that he relied on them to his detriment. Mori v. Hasiguchi, 17 FSM R. 630, 637 (Chk. 2011).

A party averring fraud or mistake must plead the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake with particularity. The extent of particularity is governed by Rule 8(a). Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 158 (Pon. 2012).

The elements of fraud are 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff 3) with justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations 4) to the plaintiff's detriment. Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 158 (Pon. 2012).

Collateral fraud, also known as extrinsic fraud, is a fraud that is collateral to the issues being considered in the case. Fraud is regarded as extrinsic when it prevents a party from having a trial or from presenting all of his case to the court, or when it operates upon matters pertaining not to the judgment itself but to the manner in which it is procured, so that there is not a fair submission of the controversy. Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 160 (Pon. 2012).

When, even assuming the plaintiffs' allegations are true, they do not state that a plaintiff relied upon the misrepresentations the plaintiffs allege to be the basis of the collateral fraud, much less that her reliance induced her to act to her detriment, and when they do not state that the defendant prevented her from having a trial or from presenting her case to the court, the court, viewing the facts and inferences in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, cannot but conclude that the defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Sorech v. FSM Dev. Bank, 18 FSM R. 151, 160 (Pon. 2012).

In general, the statute of limitations in an action for fraud begins to run from the time of discovery of the fraud or when reasonable diligence should have led to discovery of the fraud. FSM v. Muty, 19 FSM R. 453, 460-61 (Chk. 2014).

In order to make a prima facie case of intentional misrepresentation, a plaintiff must produce some evidence of: 1) a misrepresentation by the defendant; 2) scienter or the defendant's knowledge that the statements were untrue; 3) intent to cause the plaintiff to rely on the misrepresentations; 4) causation or actual reliance by the plaintiff; 5) justifiable reliance by the plaintiff; and 6) damages. The misrepresentation must be a false and material representation of a past or present fact. In some cases, the misrepresentations may be made by failure to disclose information. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 477 (Pon. 2014).

When the plaintiff proffered no evidence that would support a conclusion that the defendant knew the repairs suggested to the plaintiff were unnecessary or insufficient, the plaintiff failed to present evidence that would satisfy the scienter requirement for intentional misrepresentation and that claim must fail. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 477-78 (Pon. 2014).

Fraud in the inducement is a fraud occurring when a misrepresentation leads another to enter into a transaction with a false impression of the risks, duties, or obligations involved. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 291 (Pon. 2016).

The only type of fraud not subject to the one-year limitation for relief from judgment is fraud on the court. This is because Rule 60(b) does not limit the time in which the court may set aside a judgment for fraud on the court. Fraud on the court is a lawyer's or party's misconduct so serious that it undermines or is intended to undermine the integrity of the judicial proceeding. A finding of fraud on the court is justified only by the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or counsel's fabrication of evidence, and must be supported by clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence. FSM Dev. Bank v. Ehsa, 20 FSM R. 286, 291 (Pon. 2016).

The winning bidder at a court-ordered land sale auction and therefore the new owner of the property pursuant to a court order transferring title, did not commit fraud or misrepresentation when the bidder did not disclose, on the previous owners' behalf, an argument which had previously been rejected by the FSM Supreme Court. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 39 (Pon. 2016).

"Predatory lending" is a term generally used to characterize a range of abusive and aggressive lending practices, including deception or fraud, charging excessive fees or interest rates, making loans without regard to a borrower's ability to repay, or refinancing loans repeatedly over a short period of time to incur additional fees without any economic gain to the borrower. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 170 (Pon. 2017).

The elements of intentional misrepresentation or fraud (essentially the same cause of action) are: 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff 3) with justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations 4) to the plaintiff's detriment. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178 (Pon. 2017).

A plaintiff must show that the misrepresentations were done to induce action by him, and that he relied on them to his detriment. Thus, when there is no evidence that the employer, even if it made the alleged statement that it would employ him for the next 50 years (or its later employment verification statement to a bank), were statements made to induce him to borrow a large sum to build himself a house, the better view is that he (and the bank) relied on his improved financial condition and future prospects when he sought the loan. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178 (Pon. 2017).

Intentional misrepresentation, negligent misrepresentation, and promissory estoppel all contain elements of detrimental reliance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178 n.11 (Pon. 2017).

Even if substantial evidence were proffered to demonstrate the existence of fraud, that proffer was inadequate. Ordinarily, a proponent's burden to establish fraud is clear and convincing evidence, which is the highest burden of proof in civil cases. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 315 (App. 2017).

Since "substantial evidence" is "more than a scintilla, but less than a preponderance, substantial evidence would be insufficient to prove fraud, even if the usual, lower burden of proof – preponderance of the evidence – was applied. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 21 FSM R. 310, 315 (App. 2017).

The elements of fraud or intentional misrepresentation are: 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff, 3) with justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations, 4) to the plaintiff's detriment. Setik v. Mendiola, 21 FSM R. 537, 556 (App. 2018).

Fraud upon the court is the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or fabrication of evidence by counsel, which must be supported by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

An unsuccessful legal maneuver based on an incorrect, but colorable, legal argument cannot rise to the level of a fraud upon the court. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

A lawyer's incorrect legal argument does not, by itself, constitute a fraud upon the court since an attorney is to be expected to responsibly present his client's case in the light most favorable to his client. Helgenberger v. Ramp & Mida Law Firm, 22 FSM R. 4, 12 (Pon. 2018).

In a claim for fraud, the pleader must state the time, place, and content of the false misrepresentation, the fact misrepresented, and what was obtained or given up as a consequence of the fraud. FSM v. Mikel, 22 FSM R. 33, 37 (Chk. 2018).

Since the elements of fraud are: 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff, 3) with justifiable reliance by the plaintiff upon the misrepresentations, 4) to the plaintiff's detriment, a plaintiff must show that the misrepresentations were done to induce action by the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff relied on them to the plaintiff's detriment, and Rule 9(b) requires that when alleging fraud, the circumstances constituting the fraud must be stated with particularity. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 202 (Pon. 2019).

When alleging with the required particularity the circumstances constituting fraud, a plaintiff must identify particular statements and actions and specify why they are fraudulent. Conclusory allegations will not satisfy the requirement to plead with particularity and will subject the pleader to dismissal. Thus, someone pleading fraud should state the time, place, and content of the misrepresentation, the fact misrepresented, and what was obtained as a consequence of the fraud. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 202 (Pon. 2019).

A complaint does not plead a fraud cause of action with the requisite particularity when it does not identify any misrepresentation that a defendant made to the plaintiff with the intent to induce action (or non-action) by the plaintiff, and which then reasonably induced that action (or non-action) by the plaintiff, to the plaintiff's detriment and when, at most, it alleges misrepresentations made to government agencies with the intent to induce non-action by those agencies. Fishy Choppers, Inc. v. M/V Marita 88, 22 FSM R. 187, 202 (Pon. 2019).

The elements of fraud or intentional misrepresentation are: 1) a knowing or deliberate misrepresentation by the defendant, 2) made to induce action by the plaintiff, 3) with the plaintiff's justifiable reliance upon the misrepresentations, 4) to the plaintiff's detriment. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 360 (Pon. 2019).

Civil Procedure Rule 9(b) requires that in allegations of fraud that the circumstances constituting the fraud must be stated with particularity, and the extent of this particularity is guided by Rule 8(a), which requires a short and plain statement of the claim. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 360-61 (Pon. 2019).

When alleging fraud, a plaintiff must state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud and 'must identify particular statements and actions and specify why they are fraudulent. Conclusory allegations do not satisfy the requirements of Rule 9(b) and subject the pleader to dismissal. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

When, even assuming the plaintiff's allegations are true, she does not state that she relied upon the misrepresentations she alleges to be the basis of the fraud, much less that her reliance induced her to act to her detriment, and when she does not state that the defendant prevented her from presenting her case to the court, the court, viewing the facts and inferences in the light most favorable to the non-movant, cannot but conclude that the defendant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

If a fraud allegation, that failed to adequately plead a regular fraud cause of action, was meant to be an allegation of fraud on the court, which is a further ground to set aside a judgment that Bankruptcy Rule 9024 (by adopting Civil Procedure Rule 60) permits to be brought in an independent action, that allegation will also be wanting because the doctrine of fraud upon the court is narrow and limited in scope and not every allegation of fraud rises to the level of fraud upon the court. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

A finding of fraud on the court is justified only by the most egregious misconduct directed to the court itself, such as bribery of a judge or fabrication of evidence by counsel, and must be supported by clear, unequivocal and convincing evidence. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

A grant of relief for fraud on the court ordinarily requires that: 1) the fraud is directed to the judicial machinery itself and is not fraud between the parties or fraudulent documents, false statements or perjury; 2) the fraud involves the most egregious conduct, such as bribery of a judge or the fabrication of evidence in which an attorney is implicated; and 3) the party perpetrating the fraud acted with an intent to deceive or defraud the court. Further, the fraud must have actually deceived the court. These requirements are strictly applied because a finding of fraud on the court is exempt from time limits and because it permits the severe consequence of allowing a party to overturn the finality of a judgment. Panuelo v. Sigrah, 22 FSM R. 341, 361 (Pon. 2019).

– Governmental Liability

Given the Memorandum of Understanding of December 31, 1979 between the President and the Trust Territory High Commissioner, its accompanying Functions Agreement No. 3, and the State-National Leader's Conference resolution on health and education (Sept. 28, 1979), and given the absence of assumption of functions agreements entered into by the states, whether the national government is immune from liability arising out of operation of the hospitals within the FSM is a question of fact. Manahane v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 161, 168-73 (Pon. 1982).

The emphasis in governmental tort liability cases has been on the special status of government, its functions and its officials rather than on the degree of control tests commonly employed in nongovernmental cases. Even those commentators who specifically note that the respondeat superior doctrine applies to the government analyze governmental liability issues in terms of public policy considerations rather than through a degree of control analysis which distinguishes between closely supervised and high-ranking officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 16 (Pon. 1985).

The State of Pohnpei and its agencies may be held liable in tort subject to legislative restrictions that may be imposed and to certain other recognized common law exceptions. Panuelo v. Pohnpei (I), 2 FSM R. 150, 163 (Pon. 1986).

Courts lack authority to establish sovereign immunity to general tort claims through judicial action. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 363 (Pon. 1988).

Any liability of the state for suffering or death caused by defective health care provided by the state must be based upon theories of negligence, not strict liability. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 534 (Pon. 1988).

Whether the relationship between U.S. National Health Service Corps doctors and the State of Pohnpei is such that the doctrine of respondeat superior may be applicable in an action for medical malpractice so that the state may be made to respond in damages for any negligence of the doctor has not been determined. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 536 (Pon. 1988).

A claim that the FSM liaison office did not fulfill its medical referral obligations as required by law falls within the embrace of 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2), which authorizes damage claims against the government for alleged improper administration of statutory laws or regulations. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 363 (Yap 1990).

Under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement, civilian employees of the United States government have immunity from civil and criminal process for wrongful acts and omissions done within the scope and in performance of official duty, unless expressly waived by the U.S. government. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 95 (Pon. 1991).

When force is employed by a police officer in an apparent use of official authority, the governmental employer should be held responsible for what is done. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 201 (Pon. 1991).

A state's ratification and acceptance of its employee's torts through its subsequent conduct is an independent ground for holding the state jointly and severally liable for those torts. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 202-03 (Pon. 1991).

The doctrine of respondeat superior is not to be used to determine whether a governmental entity is liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) for civil rights violations inflicted by government employees. The government entity may be held liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) when violations are caused by officials who are responsible for final policy making with respect to the of action chosen from various alternatives. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 205-06 (Pon. 1991).

Confining a prisoner in dangerously unsanitary conditions, which represent a broader government-wide policy of deliberate indifference to the dignity and well-being of prisoners, is a failure to provide civilized treatment or punishment, in violation of prisoners' protection against cruel and unusual punishment, and renders the state liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 208 (Pon. 1991).

When a state government is acting on behalf of the national government by virtue of the joint administration of law enforcement act, the state's officers and employees are agents of the national government and are acting "under color of authority" within the meaning of 6 F.S.M.C. 702(5). Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 209-10 (Pon. 1991).

The national government is liable for violations of 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2) when it has abdicated its responsibility toward national prisoners. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 210-11 (Pon. 1991).

The national government is a person within the meaning of 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2) and will be held liable under that section when civil rights violations are in substantial part due to a governmental policy of deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of national prisoners and failure to attempt to assure civilized treatment to prisoners. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 211 (Pon. 1991).

Since by statute the Trust Territory government would be liable to private litigants only under circumstances where a private person would be liable to the claimant for similar acts and because declaring title to the property could only be accomplished by an administering governmental authority there is no tort for loss of property for declaring title because private persons have no authority to declare title. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 527 (Pon. 1994).

Any action of the Land Commission in excess of its statutory authority would be actionable only against the Commission itself, not the United States since it was not an agency of the U.S. government. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 528 (Pon. 1994).

The state, not the chief of police, is vicariously liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior for the torts of its police officers committed in the course and scope of their employment when force is employed in the use of even apparent official authority. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 545-46 (Chk. 1996).

The state is liable for injuries proximately caused by the employment of untrained or poorly trained police officers, and for the failure to adequately train them, and the chief of police is liable for any injury resulting from breach of duties connected with his office. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 546 (Chk. 1996).

Summary judgment will be granted on the issue of the state's liability for the its employee's act when there is no genuine issue of material fact that at the time of the accident the employee was negligent, that he was acting at the direction of his employer and within the scope of his employment, and that his conduct was not wanton or malicious. Glocke v. Pohnpei, 8 FSM R. 60, 61-62 (Pon. 1997).

Although a town government is not automatically liable for all the torts of its agents and employees, it is liable for those torts committed in the course and scope of employment under the doctrine of respondeat superior. When force is employed by police officers in use of even apparent official authority, the government employer should be held responsible for whatever results. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 192 (Pon. 1997).

The Pohnpei Governmental Liability Act, Pon. S.L. No. 2L-192-91, provides for no immunity for torts committed by governmental employees acting within the scope of their employment. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 194 (Pon. 1997).

Although a municipality would be liable for the injuries proximately caused by employment of poorly trained police officers, and for failure to adequately train them, there is no liability where the plaintiff has failed to prove by any competent evidence that the level of police training provided by the municipality was deficient, or that that level of training violated the proper standard of care in the community, or even what level of training would be appropriate giving due consideration to the social and geographical configuration of the Federated States of Micronesia. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 194 (Pon. 1997).

Persons liable for civil rights violations include government entities. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 195 (Pon. 1997).

A municipality is liable for battery by its police officers when it has ratified their actions by failing to charge them and the lack of any internal discipline whatsoever. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 195 (Pon. 1997).

A complaint's allegations that officials' knowing interference prevented two ships from refloating their ship after it had grounded on a reef, that the ship's crew were arrested by the officials without cause, and that this actively and unreasonably prevented rescue the vessel's by other boats, and that that interference was the direct cause of the boat's damage, set forth a claim in negligence and are sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 294 (Pon. 1998).

The state, as employer of a police trainee, is responsible for the battery committed by the trainee while acting within the scope of that employment. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 22 (Chk. 2001).

When force is employed by a police officer in an apparent use of official authority, the governmental employer should be held responsible for what is done. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. 2003).

As a matter of public policy, governments are generally not liable for punitive damages. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 138 (Chk. 2003).

Under the Chuuk State Sovereign Immunity Act of 2000, punitive (or exemplary) damages not greater than the compensatory damages and of not more than $20,000 may be awarded against the state or a municipality only if the injury was as a result of a government employee or agent who, acting under color of authority, violated the individual rights secured by the Chuuk Constitution. But the Sovereign Immunity Act of 2000 is not retrospective – it does not apply to claims that arose before its enactment – and prior law bars any punitive damage awards against a municipal government. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 138 (Chk. 2003).

While punitive damages are not permitted against a municipality, they can be awarded and are justified against individuals for their wanton, malicious, and deliberately violent treatment of a victim in detention. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 139 (Chk. 2003).

Even where a litigant may have concerns over its ability to realize on a judgment against the state defendant, that concern alone does not serve to enlarge the scope of a statute to create liability for the national government, against which a judgment may be more collectible. Such issues are for the legislature. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167 (Pon. 2003).

While § 219 of the Foreign Investment Laws admits of a cause of action for prospective, injunctive relief against the FSM, it does not permit an action for damages. Chapter 3 provides a remedy for damages, but notwithstanding the fact that the remedy is against Pohnpei, and not the FSM, it is nevertheless a remedy. If the plaintiff prevails, the conduct alleged will not go unsanctioned. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 164, 167 (Pon. 2003).

Since tort law generally is an area governed by state law, exemplary or punitive damages are not awardable against the State of Pohnpei under Pohnpei state law and a claim for exemplary damages against it will be dismissed. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 154, 155 (Pon. 2005).

Governmental entities, such as the State of Pohnpei and the Pohnpei Department of Public Safety, are "persons" within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 701 et seq. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 491 (Pon. 2005).

Corrections officers' actions in holding the plaintiff in jail for more than 24 hours constituted tortious conduct, specifically the tort of false imprisonment. Since these actions were carried out within the scope of their employment rather than for their own personal purposes and the acts complained of were perpetrated in government buildings devoted to law enforcement purposes, under these circumstances, the governmental employer should be held responsible for what was done and thus, Pohnpei and its Department of Public Safety are liable for this tort. Warren v. Pohnpei State Dep't of Public Safety, 13 FSM R. 483, 491, 492-93 (Pon. 2005).

Qualified immunity is not a defense to a criminal prosecution. "Qualified immunity" partially shields public officials performing discretionary functions from civil liability and damages. Public officials are not immune or exempt from criminal liability and prosecution. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 55 (Chk. 2006).

The mere presence of prosecutors during a search is not per se improper. A prosecutor may assist in a search to provide legal advice. The reason a prosecutor might not want to participate in investigative matters such as executing a search warrant is that prosecutors only enjoy a limited immunity from civil liability when participating in investigative acts, unlike the absolute immunity from civil liability that prosecutors enjoy for their actions connected with their role in judicial proceedings. FSM v. Wainit, 14 FSM R. 51, 57 (Chk. 2006).

Prison officials have a duty to protect the inmates' constitutional rights and the well-being. The protection of the inmates' well-being requires that civilized treatment be provided to inmates, including reasonably sanitary conditions and medical care. Phillip v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 109, 113 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Confining a prisoner in dangerously unsanitary conditions, which represent a broader government-wide policy of deliberate indifference to the prisoners' dignity and well-being, is a failure to provide civilized treatment, and renders the state liable to the injured inmate. Likewise, there is state liability by the arbitrary and purposeless denial of medical care to inmates, where such denial is based upon deliberate indifference to an inmate's medical needs. The standard of "deliberate indifference" is adopted to determine whether there is liability for the plaintiff's injuries which resulted from his fellow inmate's actions and the defendants' alleged failure to assure the plaintiff's well-being through civilized treatment. Phillip v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 109, 113 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Liability for failure to protect a prisoner against harm from other inmates is measured against the standard of deliberate indifference. Deliberate indifference occurs when a prison official causes an inmate unnecessary and wanton infliction of pain by deliberately disregarding a serious threat to the prisoner's safety after actually becoming aware of that threat. Mere negligence or inadvertence is not sufficient to hold prison officials liable. Government liability for failure to protect an inmate from harm caused by other inmates may be established by showing that the prison officials knew that there was an imminent danger and consciously refused to do anything about the danger. Phillip v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 109, 114 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

When there was no evidence that the government defendants knew of the risk or threat, or had reason to know of the risk or threat that a certain inmate would throw hot water at the plaintiff, the defendants were not aware and could not have been reasonably aware of a threat of hot water being thrown at the plaintiff and thus did not deliberately disregard a threat towards the plaintiff and did not consciously refuse to do anything about the danger that they did not know about. Accordingly, the defendants' conduct did not meet the standard of deliberate indifference towards the plaintiff, and therefore did not breach the duty of care towards the plaintiff. Consequently the defendants are not liable to the plaintiff for his injuries and damages sustained from the hot water thrown at him by another inmate. Phillip v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 109, 114 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Equitable estoppel is (and should be) applied to governments in the FSM when this is necessary to prevent manifest injustice and when the interests of the public will not be significantly prejudiced. But a party asserting equitable estoppel against the government must prove more than is required when it is asserted against a private entity. The government may not be estopped on the same terms as any other litigant. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

Another element must be established when a party asserts estoppel against the government – affirmative misconduct on the government's part. "Affirmative misconduct" has never been clearly defined by any court. This much, however, is clear. The misconduct complained of must be "affirmative," which indicates more than mere negligence is required. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

"Detrimental reliance" requires, at the very least, that a party has changed its position for the worse as a consequence of the government's purported misconduct. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

When the defendant affirmatively signed a Letter of Commitment that it would issue the plaintiff a permit to purchase the first 60 metric tons of shell from the Pohnpei reefs during each annual trochus harvest and made other promises or representations that there would be a trochus harvest and the plaintiff reasonably relied upon these representations that there would be a trochus harvest and, until it finally stopped business in 1998, kept employees on so that it would be ready to go back into the trochus button business, the defendant is liable. AHPW, Inc. v. Pohnpei, 14 FSM R. 188, 192 (Pon. 2006).

The doctrine of respondeat superior may be applied to impose liability upon a state for the negligent torts of its employees. The theory may also be applied to intentional torts when committed by a police officer or other official in an apparent use of official authority. In other words, a state may only be held liable for torts committed in the scope of employment. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 204 (Pon. 2006).

Generally, the question of whether a police officer acted within the scope of employment is a question of fact, rather than a legal question, although, if the facts are undisputed and can support only one conclusion, the inquiry becomes legal. Thus to survive a defendant's motion to dismiss, it is enough that the plaintiff has alleged assault and battery by a government employee cloaked with the authority of the state. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 204 & n.3 (Pon. 2006).

A state may be held liable if, through subsequent conduct, it ratifies the tort of an individual defendant. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 204 n.4 (Pon. 2006).

A state may be held liable for alleged civil rights violations when policymakers are involved in the challenged action and have made a deliberate choice to follow a particular course of action. This type of liability is not vicarious; it is direct, but when a plaintiff has not alleged that an individual with policymaking authority was involved in his injury, there is no basis upon which to impose liability on the state for a police officer's alleged civil rights violations. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 205 (Pon. 2006).

Although a state may not be held vicariously liable for the due process violations of its agents, it may be held liable in both tort and civil rights for failure to train. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 205 (Pon. 2006).

The State of Pohnpei cannot be held liable for punitive damages. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 206 (Pon. 2006).

A government entity may be held liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) when violations are caused by officials who are responsible for final policy making with respect to the action chosen from various alternatives. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 352 (Chk. 2006).

A motion to strike a punitive damages claim against the FSM on the ground that, under FSM law, punitive damages are not recoverable against the national government on any theory, although styled as a motion to strike under Rule 12(f), may more accurately be characterized as one (under Rule 12(b)(6)) to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. FSM v. Kana Maru No. 1, 14 FSM R. 368, 374 (Chk. 2006).

The elements of a negligence claim and a claim of violation of Constitutional rights against Kosrae and its employees are set out in Kosrae Code § 6.2601. Subsection (c) permits an action for loss of property caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission by a government employee acting within the scope of their employment and under circumstances where a private person would be liable. Subsection (d) permits an action for injury resulting from the conduct of a government employee acting under color of authority and in violation of a right specified under Article II of the Kosrae Constitution. The right to due process is one of the specified rights. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 320 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

The statute of limitations for claiming a violation of due process by the government is covered by the six-year period found in Kosrae Code section 6.2506. Thus, claims against the Land Commission for violation of due process and for failing to apply statutes are governed by the six year statute of limitations. Since the statute of limitations begins to run when a cause of action accrues, when, if there was a violation of due process, the latest time it accrued was when the certificate of title was issued in 1997, and since more than six years passed before the plaintiff asserted his claim, any claim based on a violation of his right to due process fails because it was not filed within the six-year period and will be dismissed. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 320 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A claim for negligence against the Land Commission and its government employee has a six-year statute of limitations. When, if there was any negligence, the cause of action accrued at the time the certificate of title was issued in 1997 and more than six years have passed, the plaintiff's claim of negligence against the Land Commission and its employee fails. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 320 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A governmental entity is liable for battery by its police officers when the entity ratified the battery by failing to charge the officers and by the lack of any internal discipline whatsoever and a governmental entity that employs untrained police officers and permits their use of excessive force will be held responsible for the officers' unlawful acts for violation of the plaintiffs' civil rights. Hauk v. Emilio, 15 FSM R. 476, 479 (Chk. 2008).

Where the plaintiffs were set upon and beaten by police officers and one plaintiff was arrested and no reason was provided to that plaintiff when the officers detained and arrested him, nor was any reason subsequently given although 12 F.S.M.C. 214(1) provides that any person making an arrest must, at or before the time of arrest, make every reasonable effort to advise the person arrested as to the cause and authority of the arrest, the plaintiff's detention for six hours was without any justification, precisely the sort of conduct that 11 F.S.M.C. 701 was meant to protect against. The assaulting police officers were acting under color of law and as agents of the defendant Chuuk Department of Public Safety, which is an agency of the defendant Chuuk state government. Thus these defendants are liable for the violation of the plaintiffs' civil rights under 11 F.S.M.C. 701. Hauk v. Emilio, 15 FSM R. 476, 479 (Chk. 2008).

A suit against an offender in his or her official capacity is treated as a claim against the entity that employs that officer, but a public official that leaves office may still be liable for money damages in his or her personal capacity. Thus, an official capacity claim against a former official is meaningless unless it continues as a claim against that person's successor in office in the successor's official capacity. The office continues and is responsible for, and is presumed to have knowledge of, its earlier acts. Herman v. Bisalen, 16 FSM R. 293, 296 (Chk. 2009).

A claimed inability to pay is not a defense to liability. Weriey v. Chuuk, 16 FSM R. 329, 332 (Chk. 2009).

Since the FSM civil rights statute is based on the U.S. model, the FSM Supreme Court should consider U.S. jurisprudence under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and § 1988 for assistance in determining the intended meaning of, and governmental liability under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Sandy v. Mori, 17 FSM R. 92, 96 n.3 (Chk. 2010).

When a tort claim – trespass – that the state occupied and continues to occupy the plaintiff's property to the exclusion of all others rises to the level of a constitutional claim and a civil rights violation, it is a taking of the plaintiff's property without just compensation. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 (Chk. 2011).

Chuuk cannot escape liability when the plaintiff did not accept the risk that Chuuk might not be able to find funds and was not promised payment only when and if funds were available; when the plaintiff was told on November 24, 1995, that Chuuk was still awaiting the Chuuk Department of Treasury's issuance of a check for full payment of the insurance premium which Chuuk hoped would be within a week, and was asked to "Please bear with us your usual patient [sic] and understanding"; when the plaintiff would have had every reason to believe that the funds had been appropriated and, apparently like in previous years, Chuuk was waiting for them to become available and the paperwork done to cut the check; when the same should be true for fiscal 1997, when Chuuk informed the plaintiff that it had submitted a requisition to Chuuk Finance for $84,000 and was making daily follow-up; and when the judgment was not on a breach of contract theory. Chuuk v. Actouka Executive Ins. Underwriters, 18 FSM R. 111, 119 (App. 2011).

Regardless of whether civil liability can be imposed for failing to inform an arrestee of her rights or for failing to inform her of the cause and authority of her arrest, civil liability will be imposed when it was illegal to arrest her without a warrant where she was arrested. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

A suit for damages against someone in his official capacity is a claim against the entity or agency that employs that person. Hence, a suit against the Director of Public Safety in his official capacity is a claim against the Pohnpei Department of Public Safety. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

When no evidence was presented that supports the liability of the Director of Public Safety in his official capacity, judgment for an illegal arrest by the Pohnpei state police will be entered solely against the Pohnpei state government. Alexander v. Pohnpei, 18 FSM R. 392, 400 (Pon. 2012).

When a person was never in police custody, the "deliberate indifference" duty of care standard for the liability of law enforcement officials towards prisoners does not apply. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

The police are generally not liable to a plaintiff who injures himself fleeing the police. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

Since supervisory liability requires proof of the underlying liability of the officers being supervised, when the officers on the scene cannot be held liable because they did not breach any duty owed to the decedent and because they were not the proximate cause of his death, the Director of Public Safety (and Chuuk as respondeat superior) cannot be held liable either. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

Pohnpei cannot be held liable for money damages for the actions of non-state actors. Berman v. Pohnpei, 19 FSM R. 111, 117 (App. 2013).

Punitive damages cannot be imposed on the Board of Trustees of the Pohnpei State Public Lands Trust because the Pohnpei state government is statutorily immune from punitive damages and the Board is a Pohnpei government agency. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 19 FSM R. 374, 377 (Pon. 2014).

A Port Authority and a pilot are immune from any negligence claim for the pilot's acts or omissions in berthing a vessel, but not from a gross negligence claim. Win Sheng Marine S. de R.L. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 20 FSM R. 13, 16 (Pon. 2015).

When, under prior precedent and the law of the case doctrine, the state government is immune from an interest award as a part of a judgment against the state unless the state has expressly consented to the imposition of interest and when the state government has not expressly consented, by statute or by contract, to the imposition of interest for claims or for a conversion claim, no interest will be permitted. Eot Municipality v. Elimo, 20 FSM R. 482, 489 (Chk. 2016).

A statue of limitation generally is not jurisdictional unless it is a limitations period for claims against the government. Heirs of Preston v. Heirs of Alokoa, 21 FSM R. 572, 579 (App. 2018).

The statute of limitations does not affect a court's jurisdiction because generally a statute of limitation is not jurisdictional unless it is a limitations period for claims against the government. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 621 (App. 2018).

Public officials are generally entitled to qualified official immunity so that government officials who are performing their official duties are generally shielded from civil damages. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 630-31 (Pon. 2020).

The objective test to determine whether public officials are shielded from liability for damages is that government officials performing discretionary functions generally are shielded from liability for civil damages insofar as their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 631 (Pon. 2020).

More than bare allegations of malice are required to deny public officials' qualified immunity for acts conducted in the course of official duties. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 631 n.4 (Pon. 2020).

A government official is not personally liable when the official was not in a situation where the official could be expected to know that certain conduct would violate statutory or constitutional rights or when the tone or content of the official's letters to the plaintiff was not threatening and there was no evidence that the motive for these letters was personal vengeance. New Tokyo Medical College v. Kephas, 22 FSM R. 625, 632 (Pon. 2020).

– Immunity

Some government workers have been held partially or completely immune from tort liability on grounds that they are public officers. This immunity, intended to serve the purpose of encouraging fearless and independent public service, has been bestowed upon prosecutors as well as other public officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 16 (Pon. 1985).

Under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement, civilian employees of the United States government have immunity from civil and criminal process for wrongful acts and omissions done within the scope and in performance of official duty, unless expressly waived by the U.S. government. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 95 (Pon. 1991).

A United States federal employee does not waive immunity from civil liability under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement when the civilian employee initiated litigation in the FSM Supreme Court in a separate lawsuit with different claims against different parties and where the affirmative misconduct is within the scope and in the performance of the official duty. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 97 (Pon. 1991).

The FSM Supreme Court is immune from an award of damages, pursuant to 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3), arising from the performance by the Chief Justice of his constitutionally granted rule-making powers.

Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

The Chief Justice, in making rules, is performing a legislative function and is immune from an action for damages. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

The grant of immunity to the Chief Justice while performing his rule-making authority is to protect the independence of one exercising a constitutionally granted legislative power. Berman v. FSM Supreme Court (II), 5 FSM R. 371, 374 (Pon. 1992).

A judge is generally granted absolute civil immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 391 (Pon. 1992).

A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two instances. A judge is not immune for actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity, and a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the absence of all jurisdiction. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 391 (Pon. 1992).

An act performed by a judge does not have to be an adjudicatory act in order for it to be a judicial act. Judges and justices of the courts of the Federated States of Micronesia are protected by the cloak of judicial absolute immunity for judicial functions performed unless they are in complete absence of jurisdiction. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 392-93 (Pon. 1992).

Prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their actions which are connected to their role in judicial proceedings, which include participation in hearings related to obtaining search warrants. Prosecutors do not, however, enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their role as an administrative or investigative officers, which includes participation in and giving advice regarding the execution of a search warrant. Jano v. King, 5 FSM R. 388, 396 (Pon. 1992).

Judges and justices of the FSM are protected by the cloak of absolute immunity for judicial functions performed, unless the functions were performed in the complete absence of jurisdiction. Issuance of a search warrant is within the jurisdiction of FSM courts. Therefore it is a judicial act to which immunity attaches. Liwi v. Finn, 5 FSM R. 398, 400-01 (Pon. 1992).

Prosecutors are absolutely immune from prosecution for their actions which are connected to their role in judicial proceedings, but do not enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their role as an administrative or investigative officer. Therefore prosecutors are absolutely immune for involvement in judicial proceedings to obtain a search warrant, but not for participation in and giving police advice regarding the execution of a search warrant. Liwi v. Finn, 5 FSM R. 398, 401 (Pon. 1992).

A chief justice's actions in reviewing an attorney's application for admission is a judicial function that is entitled to absolute immunity from suit for damages. Berman v. Santos, 7 FSM R. 231, 240 (Pon. 1995).

A judge is generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two events: First, a judge is not immune from non-judicial actions, i.e. actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity. Second, a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 112 (Chk. 1999).

Absolute immunity affords complete protection from a damage award to a public official as long as the challenged act falls within the scope of the activity for which the immunity is conferred. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 112 (Chk. 1999).

The factors determining whether an act by a judge is a judicial one relate to the nature of act itself, i.e., whether it is a function normally performed by a judge, and to the expectations of the parties, i.e., whether they dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity. The second question in deciding whether immunity exists is whether the judge acted in complete absence of all jurisdiction. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 112 (Chk. 1999).

Judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction, and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly. A judge is absolutely immune from liability for his judicial acts even if his exercise of authority is flawed by the commission of grave procedural errors. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 112 (Chk. 1999).

Judicial immunity protects from liability for punitive damages. Bank of Guam v. O'Sonis, 9 FSM R. 106, 113 (Chk. 1999).

A judge is generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. Few doctrines were more solidly established at common law than the immunity of judges for damages for acts committed within their judicial jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 121 (Pon. 2001).

Judges lose their judicial immunity only for non-judicial actions (actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity), or for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 121 (Pon. 2001).

Two factors, both relating to the nature of act itself, determine whether an act by a judge is a judicial one: whether it is a function normally performed by a judge, and whether the parties dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity. The second question in deciding whether immunity exists is whether the judge acted in complete absence of all jurisdiction. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 121 (Pon. 2001).

When a Pohnpei statute does not show any legislative intent to abolish the well-established principle of absolute judicial immunity for the judicial act of timing the issuance of court decisions and to allow a private suit for damages in such cases, a court can only conclude that the Pohnpei Legislature did not intend to abolish absolute judicial immunity in this instance and did not intend to create a right for damage suits against judges if their decisions were not timely. Damarlane v. Pohnpei Supreme Court Appellate Division, 10 FSM R. 116, 122 (Pon. 2001).

Under FSM caselaw, prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity from prosecution for their actions which are connected to their role in judicial proceedings, including participation in hearings related to obtaining search warrants. Prosecutors do not, however, enjoy absolute immunity for their role as administrative or investigative officers. Prosecutors are absolutely immune for involvement in judicial proceedings to obtain a search warrant, but not for participation in and giving police advice regarding the execution of a search warrant. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 366 (Pon. 2005).

A request for, appearance at, and the presentation of evidence related to obtaining a search warrant is considered part of a prosecutor's judicial function, for which the prosecutor enjoys absolute immunity. This is true even though no criminal information has been filed yet since search warrants are usually, but not always, sought before criminal charges are filed. The defendants therefore enjoy absolute immunity for all alleged wrongful acts related to obtaining search warrants or other pretrial orders of a similar nature. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 367 (Pon. 2005).

A prosecutor's actions in seeking (and obtaining) release conditions during an initial appearance in a criminal case, was a judicial function for which prosecutors enjoy absolute prosecutorial immunity. Sipos v. Crabtree, 13 FSM R. 355, 367 (Pon. 2005).

In order to determine whether a judge is liable for damages for his actions, the court asks whether the judge was performing judicial acts and whether his court had jurisdiction. When the answer to both questions is yes, the judge was not acting in complete absence of all jurisdiction, even when he had clearly acted in excess of his jurisdiction, and the judge was therefore immune from any suit for compensatory or punitive damages for his actions, but that does not end the inquiry. When the plaintiff had obtained permanent prospective injunctive relief against the judge under the civil rights act, it was entitled to the attorney's fees and costs incurred in obtaining that relief in that case, but not for any expenses incurred in the state court case in which the judge had exceeded his jurisdiction even though the FSM Supreme Court had to enjoin him from conducting any further proceedings in it. Ruben v. Petewon, 15 FSM R. 605, 608 (Chk. 2008).

Sovereign immunity should not be confused with official immunity for public officers. Government officials who are performing their official duties are generally shielded from civil damages, and the court has previously recognized that some government workers have been held partially or completely immune from tort liability on grounds that they are public officers. This immunity, intended to serve the purpose of encouraging fearless and independent public service, has been bestowed upon prosecutors as well as other public officials. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 64 (Chk. 2011).

The President has absolute immunity from damages liability for his official acts. Furthermore, the court does not have the jurisdiction to enjoin the President in the performance of his official duties such as enforcing a Congressionally enacted statute. Since suits contesting the actions of the executive branch should be brought against the President's subordinates, not against the President himself, a motion to dismiss the President will therefore be granted. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 65 (Chk. 2011).

A qualified official immunity applies to public officials. An official who simply enforces a presumptively valid statute will rarely thereby lose his or her immunity from suit. Absent extraordinary circumstances, liability will not attach for executing the statutory duties one was appointed to perform. Marsolo v. Esa, 18 FSM R. 59, 65 (Chk. 2011).

A qualified official immunity defense which requires a facially-valid arrest warrant, does not apply when there was no arrest warrant but only an eviction order. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 231 (Pon. 2012).

A judge is generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two events: First, a judge is not immune from non-judicial actions, i.e. actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity. Second, a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

Few doctrines were more solidly established at common law than the immunity of judges for damages for acts committed within their judicial jurisdiction. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

When analyzing whether a judge was performing judicial acts, the factors determining whether an act by a judge is a "judicial" one relate to the nature of act itself (whether it is a function normally performed by a judge) and to the expectations of the parties (whether they dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity). Issuing eviction orders, denying motions, and the like are all acts or functions normally performed by a judge. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

When the Pohnpei Supreme Court is a court of general jurisdiction and when it is undisputed that the Pohnpei Supreme Court has jurisdiction over cases that the plaintiff filed there since she filed those cases there for the very reason that that court had jurisdiction, the plaintiff cannot allege that a Pohnpei justice acted in complete absence of jurisdiction when he issued orders in her cases even though she clearly alleges that he acted in excess of his jurisdiction. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

Judges of courts of superior or general jurisdiction are not liable to civil actions for their judicial acts, even when such acts are in excess of their jurisdiction and are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly, and a judge is absolutely immune from liability for his judicial acts even if his exercise of authority is flawed by the commission of grave procedural errors. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 232 (Pon. 2012).

Since a judge is absolutely immune from liability for his judicial acts even if those acts were done maliciously or corruptly or in excess of his jurisdiction or if his exercise of authority was flawed by the commission of grave procedural errors, he is thus immune from a plaintiff's compensatory damages claims. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 233 (Pon. 2012).

Judicial immunity does not prevent a judge from being subject to prospective injunctive relief when the judge has acted, not in complete absence of jurisdiction, but in excess of jurisdiction. Judicial immunity does not apply against the imposition of prospective injunctive relief because no common law precedent ever granted such immunity. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 233 (Pon. 2012).

When a Pohnpei Supreme Court judge is immune from suit and thus from the imposition of compensatory damages, the compensatory damages claims against him must be dismissed. But when the plaintiff's factual allegations against the judge, viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, are claims that the judge acted in excess of his jurisdiction and violated the plaintiff's civil rights in doing so, the court will not dismiss her claims against the judge for injunctive relief and for 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) reasonable attorney's fees and costs incurred in obtaining that relief, since she alleges sufficient facts which, if proven that the judge acted in excess of his jurisdiction, state a claim for which the FSM Supreme Court can grant her some relief. Jacob v. Johnny, 18 FSM R. 226, 233-34 (Pon. 2012).

Police officers have a qualified official immunity from civil liability when they arrest someone for whom they have a facially-valid arrest warrant. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 282 (Pon. 2012).

Judges are generally granted absolute immunity from civil liability for acts done in the exercise of a judicial function. Few common law doctrines were more solidly established than a judge's immunity for damages for acts committed within his judicial jurisdiction. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

A judge loses the cloak of judicial immunity in only two events: first, a judge is not immune from non-judicial actions, i.e. actions not taken in the judge's judicial capacity; and second, a judge is not immune for actions, though judicial in nature, taken in the complete absence of all jurisdiction. The first question is whether the acts were judicial. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

The factors determining whether an act by a judge is a "judicial" one and therefore one for which the judge is immune from civil liability relate to the nature of act itself, i.e., whether it is a function normally performed by a judge, and to the expectations of the parties, i.e., whether they dealt with the judge in his judicial capacity. The issuance of a bench warrant; the contempt finding; and, under U's constitutional setup, the impeachment trial, the conviction, the denial of the substitution of counsel, and the defendant's removal from office were all judicial acts, taken in a judicial capacity. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

The second question in deciding whether judicial immunity exists is whether the judge acted in complete absence of all jurisdiction because judges cannot be held civilly liable for their judicial acts, even when those acts were in excess of their jurisdiction, or are alleged to have been done maliciously or corruptly, and judges are also absolutely immune from civil liability when they committed grave procedural errors in their exercise of authority. Helgenberger v. U Mun. Court, 18 FSM R. 274, 283 (Pon. 2012).

"Facially valid" does not mean "lawful." An erroneous court order or a court order that is infirm or unlawful can be a facially valid order. Jacob v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 612, 617 (Pon. 2016).

An official charged with the duty of executing a facially valid court order enjoys absolute immunity from liability for damages in a suit challenging conduct prescribed by that order. Because controversies sufficiently intense to erupt in litigation are not easily capped by judicial decree, the common law provided absolute immunity from subsequent damages liability for all persons – governmental or otherwise – who were integral parts of the judicial process. Jacob v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 612, 617-18 (Pon. 2016).

Absolute immunity for officials assigned to carry out a judge's orders is necessary to insure that such officials can perform without the need to secure permanent legal counsel. Non-judicial officers whose official duties have an integral relationship with the judicial process are entitled to absolute immunity for their quasi-judicial conduct since it would be unfair to spare the judges who give orders while punishing the officers who obey them. Jacob v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 612, 618 (Pon. 2016).

Tension between trial judges and those officials responsible for enforcing their orders would inevitably result were there not absolute immunity for both. If law enforcement officials assigned to carry out a judge's orders were not absolutely immune, they would then, for their own protection, need to scrutinize every court order and investigate its background before deciding whether to try to enforce it. The judicial system cannot function that way. Jacob v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 612, 618 (Pon. 2016).

Enforcement officials must not be required to act as pseudo-appellate courts scrutinizing judges' orders. The public interest demands strict adherence to judicial decrees, and absolute immunity will ensure the public's trust and confidence in courts' ability to completely, effectively and finally adjudicate the controversies before them. Jacob v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 612, 618 (Pon. 2016).

An official who is absolutely immune for a person's arrest and for her confinement to jail because those were acts prescribed by a judge's facially valid order, only has qualified immunity from civil liability arising from the conditions under which that person was held in jail. This is because absolute immunity extends only to acts prescribed by the judge's order, and the judge's order did not prescribe the person's treatment in jail. It only prescribed her arrest and confinement. Jacob v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 612, 618 (Pon. 2016).

The FSM Supreme Court would look upon a true negligence suit against the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure with great disfavor because, when a defendant is found negligent, the remedy is money damages, and because the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure is a court, and, as a court, it is immune from a suit for money damages for its judicial acts. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 119 n.12 (App. 2018).

A private litigant is absolutely privileged to publish defamatory matter concerning another in communications preliminary to a proposed judicial proceeding, or in the institution of or during the course and as a part of, a judicial proceeding in which he participates, if the matter has some relation to the proceeding. This privilege is based upon the public interest in according to all men the utmost freedom of access to the courts of justice for the settlement of their private disputes. Like the privilege of an attorney, it is absolute. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 249-50 (Pon. 2019).

"Absolute privileges" are properly classified as immunities, since they are based upon the actor's personal position or status. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 n.4 (Pon. 2019).

The absolute privilege or immunity for litigants and their attorneys is necessary for them to be protected not only from civil liability but also from the danger of even an unsuccessful civil action. It is thus necessary that the court not inquire into the propriety of their conduct in civil proceedings brought against them for misconduct in their position. The privilege, or immunity, is absolute and the protection is complete, and is not conditioned upon the honest and reasonable belief that the defamatory matter is true or upon the absence of ill will on the actor's part, but is based upon a policy that treats the ends to be gained by permitting defamatory statements as outweighing the harm that may be done to the reputation of others. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

At common law, parties to judicial proceedings are granted an absolute privilege to use defamatory language because of the overriding public interest that persons should speak freely and fearlessly in litigation, uninfluenced by the possibility of being brought to account in an action for defamation. This common law principle is eminently suitable for the FSM because it is difficult to see how any court system could function otherwise. It is sound public policy. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

Statements contained in pleadings, affidavits, depositions and other documents directly related to the case partake of this privilege; they cannot serve as the basis for an action for defamation. Since this privilege is absolute and the immunity is complete, whether counsel made a reasonable inquiry into the facts before filing the complaint is irrelevant. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

Statements in pleadings, if relevant and pertinent to the issues, are absolutely privileged even if the statements are false and made maliciously. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

False, misleading, or defamatory communications, even if made with malicious intent, are not actionable if they are material to, and made in the course of, a judicial or quasi-judicial proceeding. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2019).

Statements made by counsel and parties in the course of judicial proceedings are privileged as long as such statements are material and pertinent to the questions involved irrespective of the motive with which they are made. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2019).

Because the plaintiffs have an absolute privilege or complete immunity from defamation liability to the counterclaimant, the court must grant the plaintiffs summary judgment on the defamation counterclaims and the court must deny the counterclaimant's cross motion for summary judgment. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2019).

A litigant's absolute privilege applies not only to defamation actions, but to any tort action based on statements made in connection with a judicial proceeding. These include the intentional infliction of emotional distress, the invasion of privacy, and false light actions, including false light invasion of privacy claims that fail to meet the standards for defamation. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 n.7 (Pon. 2019).

– Infliction of Emotional Distress

A defendant must exercise due care not to cause others emotional distress that leads in turn to a foreseeable physical result. Eram v. Masaichy, 7 FSM R. 223, 226-27 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Where there was no physical manifestation of the emotional distress that was foreseeable there can be no claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress. Eram v. Masaichy, 7 FSM R. 223, 227 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

For a negligent infliction of emotional distress claim to be compensable, a physical manifestation is required. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 526 (Chk. 1998).

One of the elements of an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim is that the plaintiff must have suffered some physical manifestation of the alleged infliction of emotional distress. When the plaintiff neither alleged, nor proved at trial, any physical ailments or manifestations resulting from his termination from employment his claim must fail for lack of proof. Hauk v. Board of Dirs., 11 FSM R. 236, 241 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Since a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress cannot be sustained without evidence of actual physical illness resulting from the mental and emotional distress, a plaintiff who failed to provide evidence of actual physical illness resulting from the defendants' actions cannot obtain any monetary recovery on this claim. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

For an emotional distress award there must be a foreseeable physical manifestation of the distress. Narruhn v. Aisek, 13 FSM R. 97, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2004).

When there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by the plaintiff, an award of damages for pain and suffering must be set aside. Narruhn v. Aisek, 13 FSM R. 97, 99 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2004).

A defendant must exercise due care not to cause others emotional distress that leads in turn to a foreseeable physical result, but when there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by the plaintiff, no award of damages for can be made for emotional distress. Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 65 (Chk. 2006).

When the plaintiff presented no evidence that any of the defendants' acts that he complained of caused him any physical injury; when he did not present any evidence that any mental anguish or emotional distress he might have had resulted in any physical manifestation and, in fact, presented no evidence at all of any mental anguish or emotional distress on his part; and when he put on no evidence that anyone intended to inflict emotional distress upon him, the court had to dismiss his mental anguish and intentional infliction of emotional distress claims. Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 66 (Chk. 2006).

When there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by the plaintiff, there can be no award of damages for mental distress or mental anguish. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 418-19 (Yap 2006).

When there was no evidence of physical injury to any plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by any plaintiff, there can be no award of damages for pain and suffering even if the plaintiffs had proven they had been wrongfully discharged in violation of their civil rights. Robert v. Simina, 14 FSM R. 438, 443 (Chk. 2006).

Common issues of law and fact do not predominate for an infliction of emotional distress claim because this cause of action involves personal injury. A claim for infliction of emotional distress cannot be sustained without evidence of physical injury to the plaintiff or of a foreseeable physical manifestation or physical illness resulting from the plaintiffs' mental and emotional distress. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 160 (Yap 2007).

When the complaint does not allege that the class as a whole suffered a common physical injury, any compensable emotional distress must be each individual's physical manifestation or illness. Since the basis of each person's claim, and of the defendants' liability for that claim, is different for each class member and evidence of this necessary element for liability on an emotional distress claim would thus be highly individualized and unique to each class member and could only be proven on an individual basis, class certification of infliction of emotional distress claims would not be appropriate. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 160 (Yap 2007).

When each person's individual infliction of emotional distress claim would require a separate mini-trial, no class can be certified for this cause of action and any claims for the personal injury of infliction of emotional distress will have to proceed on an individual basis. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 160 (Yap 2007).

If the court is persuaded that no definable class is present, it may have the class allegations stricken and allow the action to proceed on an individual basis. Thus when no definable class is present for the infliction of emotional distress cause of action, the court will order that the complaint be amended to eliminate allegations that the named plaintiffs represent absent persons for any infliction of emotional distress claims and the named plaintiffs may proceed on their individual infliction of emotional distress claims, if they so choose. People of Weloy ex rel. Pong v. M/V CEC Ace, 15 FSM R. 151, 160-61 (Yap 2007).

When, in a wrongful termination case, no evidence of physical pain or a physical manifestation of suffering was introduced, no damages can be awarded for pain and suffering because the rule is well settled that to award damages for pain and suffering, such must be the result of physical injury or of a physical manifestation of emotional distress. Kimeuo v. Simina, 15 FSM R. 664, 667 (Chk. 2008).

When, in the original complaint, the plaintiffs sought damages for pain and suffering, they inartfully pled an emotional distress claim, and a clarification of this claim in an amended complaint will not prejudice the defendants. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 269 (Chk. 2009).

When there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by the plaintiff, no award of damages can be made for emotional distress. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 577 (Pon. 2009).

Physical injury to the plaintiff or the plaintiff's physical manifestation of emotional distress is a necessary element that must be proven for an award for infliction of emotional distress. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

When a statute of limitations provides a two-year limitation period for actions for injury to one caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, the applicable statute of limitations for a negligent infliction of emotional distress claim is two years. Negligent infliction of emotional distress requires a physical injury or manifestation. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

Recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress requires conduct that is extreme and outrageous. The tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress is sharply limited and only applies in the most egregious circumstances. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

When a two-year limitations period applies to injuries caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, it applies to intentional infliction of emotional distress because intentional infliction of emotional distress is caused by a wrongful act – conduct that is extreme and outrageous. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

An emotional distress claim, whether inflicted intentionally or negligently, is barred by the two-year statute of limitations. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

When, weighing the evidence before the court, the defendant's alleged wrongful act – unblocking a culvert – was not extreme and outrageous conduct, the plaintiffs have not proven an element of the intentional infliction of emotional distress tort. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

A defendant must exercise due care not to cause others emotional distress that leads in turn to a foreseeable physical result. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 246 (Pon. 2012).

One element of an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim is that the plaintiff must have suffered some physical manifestation of the alleged infliction of emotional distress, and when the plaintiff did not prove at trial any physical ailments or manifestations resulting from his employment termination, his claim must fail for lack of proof and no award of damages can be made for emotional distress. Poll v. Victor, 18 FSM R. 235, 246 (Pon. 2012).

Since a claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress cannot be sustained without evidence of actual physical illness resulting from the mental and emotional distress, a plaintiff who fails to provide evidence of actual physical illness resulting from the defendants' actions cannot obtain any monetary recovery on the claim. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 490 (Pon. 2012).

When no specific evidence was brought forth to indicate that the plaintiff has suffered any physical manifestation of emotional distress and when the plaintiff presented no evidence that any of the defendant's acts she complained of caused her any physical injury; or that any mental anguish or emotional distress she might have had resulted in any physical manifestation; or that anyone intended or negligently inflicted emotional distress upon her, her infliction of emotional distress causes of action cannot withstand a summary judgment challenge. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 490 (Pon. 2012).

When faced with a defendant's summary judgment motion, the court cannot give any heed to the nonmovant plaintiff's assertion that he intends to call witnesses at trial to support his emotional distress claim or to his assertion that a favorable judgment on his wrongful termination claims will amply support this claim because the plaintiff must show that he has admissible evidence to support his claim, and the time for him to do that is now, or never. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 567 (Kos. 2014).

One element of an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim is that the plaintiff must have suffered some physical manifestation of the alleged infliction of emotional distress, and when the plaintiff has not shown any physical ailments or manifestations resulting from his employment termination, his claim must fail for lack of proof and the defendants are entitled to summary judgment on this cause of action. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 567 (Kos. 2014).

Physical injury to the plaintiff or the plaintiff's physical manifestation of emotional distress is a necessary element that must be proven for an award for infliction of emotional distress. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 98 (Pon. 2015).

When the plaintiff did not plead any physical manifestation of emotional distress but did plead a physical injury – a battery – in connection with his arrest, whether that physical injury (battery) occurred (and also whether any emotional distress was inflicted) are a genuine issues of material fact precluding summary judgment on this claim. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 98 (Pon. 2015).

The tort of infliction of emotional distress is sharply limited, only applying in the most egregious circumstances, and recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress requires conduct that is extreme and outrageous. Solomon v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 396, 403 (Pon. 2016).

A plaintiff's allegation of a defendant's failure to respond to the plaintiff's salutations; of projecting "bad vibes;" of purportedly not assigning an adequate work load; of a disproportionate amount of scrutiny supposedly placed on her tardiness, in juxtaposition to fellow employees and allegedly noting the employee's requests for leave, hardly rise to the level of "extreme and outrageous" conduct on the defendants' part, and as a result, falls short of a claim on which relief might be granted. Solomon v. FSM, 20 FSM R. 396, 403 (Pon. 2016).

A person must exercise due care not to cause others emotional distress that leads in turn to a foreseeable physical result. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 562, 565 (Pon. 2018).

When there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of emotional distress by the plaintiff, no award of damages for can be made for emotional distress. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 562, 565 (Pon. 2018).

When the plaintiff's physical injury to support his intentional infliction of emotional distress claim was contingent on his battery claim, and when the court concluded that the battery cause of action was unsubstantiated, the intentional infliction of emotional distress claim must also be dismissed. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 562, 565 (Pon. 2018).

Recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress requires conduct that is extreme and outrageous. This tort is sharply limited and only applies in the most egregious circumstances. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 32 (Pon. 2018).

An employer's negligence by not providing proper work boots to its employee and an unfortunate workplace accident do not satisfy the "extreme and outrageous" element necessary to recover damages under the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 32 (Pon. 2018).

A claim for negligent infliction of emotional distress requires evidence of such extreme mental anguish and distress that medical assistance is sought or necessary as a result of the negligence. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 32 (Pon. 2018).

When a plaintiff does indeed suffer from some distress, but it does not rise to the degree required to recover under the tort of negligent infliction of emotional distress, the emotional distress claim must be dismissed. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 32 (Pon. 2018).

A litigant's absolute privilege applies not only to defamation actions, but to any tort action based on statements made in connection with a judicial proceeding. These include the intentional infliction of emotional distress, the invasion of privacy, and false light actions, including false light invasion of privacy claims that fail to meet the standards for defamation. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 n.7 (Pon. 2019).

Recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress requires conduct that is extreme and outrageous. This tort is sharply limited and only applies in the most egregious circumstances. One element of such a claim is that the plaintiff must have suffered some physical manifestation of the alleged infliction of emotional distress. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 488 (Pon. 2020).

A defendant who followed the plaintiff and attacked him with a machete, cutting him four times, acted in an extreme and outrageous manner and inflicted serious physical injuries on the plaintiff, which shocked him at the time and continue to cause him to feel scared. Accordingly, the plaintiff's cause of action for intentional infliction of emotional distress is sustained. Pelep v. Lapaii, 22 FSM R. 482, 488 (Pon. 2020).

Recovery for intentional infliction of emotional distress requires conduct that is extreme and outrageous, and this tort is sharply limited and applies only in the most egregious circumstances. One element of an intentional infliction of emotional distress claim is that the plaintiff must have suffered some physical manifestation of the alleged infliction of emotional distress, and when there is no evidence in the record of physical injury to the plaintiff or of any physical manifestation of the emotional distress by the plaintiff, her claim must fail and the emotional distress cause of action must be dismissed. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 509 (Pon. 2020).

When a plaintiff did not allege that her humiliation or emotional distress caused her any physical manifestation, she did not allege an essential element of the tort, and the court must dismiss this claim for the failure to state a claim for which it can grant relief. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 509-10, 512 (Pon. 2020).

– Interference with a Contractual Relationship

Relief may be granted under the law of Pohnpei for a claim of tortious interference with a contractual relationship, when an individual's economic advantages obtained through dealings with others are knowingly jeopardized out of petty or malicious motives or by the improper or unjustified conduct of a third party. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage Co., 4 FSM R. 3, 14 (Pon. 1989).

Where a defendant's allegedly offensive actions were taken in the course of a good faith effort to protect a legally cognizable interest, such actions do not constitute tortious interference with a contractual relationship under the law of Pohnpei. Federated Shipping Co. v. Ponape Transfer & Storage Co., 4 FSM R. 3, 15 (Pon. 1989).

When the defendants are not parties to the contract they tortiously interfered with and have no meaningful presence in the FSM, although the economic harm was allegedly targeted to an FSM plaintiff, it is insufficient to establish personal jurisdiction over the defendants. National Fisheries Corp. v. New Quick Co., 9 FSM R. 120, 132 (Pon. 1999).

Tort claims for tortious interference with contractual relationships, defamation, and interference with prospective business opportunities are causes of action that arise under state law. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 203 (Pon. 2001).

Relief may be granted under Pohnpei law for a claim of tortious interference with a contractual relationship when an individual's economic advantages obtained through dealings with others are knowingly jeopardized out of petty or malicious motives, or by a third party's improper or unjustified conduct. In order to succeed on the merits of a tortious interference claim, a plaintiff will also have to demonstrate that her business was lawful, and that defendants' conduct was improper or unjustified. Yang v. Western Sales Trading Co., 11 FSM R. 607, 617 (Pon. 2003).

When the plaintiff alleges facts regarding a defendant having familial ties that gave him either inside information or favorable treatment in the proceeding below that dissolved the plaintiff's public land assignment, under the relevant standard of review, the tortious interference with contract claim cannot be dismissed at this point. Asumen Venture, Inc. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 84, 92 (Pon. 2003).

Relief may be granted for a claim of tortious interference with a contractual relationship when an individual's economic advantages obtained through dealings with others are knowingly jeopardized out of petty or malicious motives, or by a third party's improper or unjustified conduct, but when a defendant's allegedly offensive actions were taken in the course of a good faith effort to protect a legally cognizable interest, such actions do not constitute tortious interference with a contractual relationship. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 449 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When a defendant believed that he still owned ¾ or ¼ of a lot, he believed that he had a legally cognizable interest in some portion of that lot and thus his actions in asking the state not to pay the rent to the plaintiff and his actions in suing the state instead of the plaintiff, although wrong-headed or the result of poor legal advice or a misconception of the law, were taken in the good faith belief that he had a legally cognizable interest in the land. Therefore the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment on his tortious interference with a contractual relationship claim will be denied as a matter of law. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 449-50 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

When the non-moving defendants have a valid defense to the tortious interference with a contractual relationship claim and when the moving plaintiff had an adequate opportunity to show that they did not, summary judgment in the defendants' favor is appropriate. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 450 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Claims of interference with contractual relations and interference with prospective business advantage, are both causes of action that arise under Pohnpei state law. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 326-27 (Pon. 2009).

It may be sufficient to impose liability that the defendant has acted intentionally to interfere with a known contract or prospect of economic advantage, that he has caused harm in so doing, and that he has acted in pursuit of some purpose considered improper. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

When no FSM case has discussed the specific elements of the causes of action for interference with contractual relations or interference with prospective business advantage, the court may consider authorities from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

The individual elements of the cause of action for interference with contract are 1) a valid contract; 2) knowledge by the defendant of the contract; 3) intentional interference by the defendant which induces breach of the contract; 4) absence of justification on the part of the defendant; and 5) resulting damages. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

Both the cause of action for interference with contract and the cause of action for interference with prospective business require a showing of damages. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

When the plaintiff did not show by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant knew of a specific contract or contracts that the plaintiff had with third parties, and that the defendant intentionally interfered with any such contract; when a letter was alleged as the interference with contract, but the plaintiff failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the letter actually served as the means by which the defendant allegedly interfered with a specific contract that he knew the plaintiff had with a third party; when a later letter does not admit that the prior letter contained false statements but is a retraction of the prior letter; and when the retraction does not establish that the prior letter constituted an unjustified interference by the defendant with a specific contract to which the plaintiff was a party, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages from the defendant on a claim for interference with contract. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

It may be sufficient to impose liability that the defendant has acted intentionally to interfere with a known contract or prospect of economic advantage, that he has caused harm in so doing, and that he has acted in pursuit of some purpose considered improper. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

The specific elements of the causes of action for interference with contract are 1) a valid contract; 2) knowledge by the defendant of the contract; 3) intentional interference by the defendant which induces breach of the contract; 4) absence of justification on the part of the defendant; and 5) resulting damages. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

Both the cause of action for interference with contract and the cause of action for interference with prospective business advantage require a showing of damages. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

When the individual plaintiff did not have a valid contract with anyone or any entity, the first element required for proving interference – a valid contract – cannot be met and he cannot therefore recover against the defendant under an interference with contract theory. Even assuming that the plaintiff did have a valid contract with some entity relevant to the action, the court's ruling would remain the same because the plaintiff did not prove that the defendant took any action that could be reasonably interpreted as interference with a contract and failed to prove that the defendant had specific knowledge of any contract to which any of the plaintiff's various corporations were a party and since there was no showing of any intentional conduct which resulted in any interference or breach of contract and no showing that the plaintiff was harmed in any way by the alleged interference and since the scarce evidence provided on any purported damages for interference was unfounded and speculative. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

Parties to a contract cannot, as a matter of law, tortuously interfere with their own contractual relations. Yoruw v. Ira, 16 FSM R. 464, 466 (Yap 2009).

Complaints to government officials are not sufficient to establish tortious interference with contractual relations. The tort requires that a defendant act intentionally with a known contract or prospect of economic advantage, that he has caused harm in so doing, and that he has acted in pursuit of some purpose considered improper. Yoruw v. Ira, 16 FSM R. 464, 466 (Yap 2009).

The elements of interference with contractual relations are 1) a valid contract; 2) knowledge by the defendant of the contract; 3) intentional interference by the defendant which induces breach of the contract; 4) absence of justification on the defendant's part; and 5) resulting damages. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 502, 504 (Pon. 2009).

The elements of the cause of action for interference with contract are 1) a valid contract; 2) knowledge by the defendant of the contract; 3) intentional interference by the defendant which induces breach of the contract; 4) absence of justification on the part of the defendant; and 5) resulting damages. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 2015).

A bank's acts in trying to collect a loan repayment do not state a claim for relief under a cause of action for interference with prospective business advantage or expectancy or under a cause of action for interference with contract. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 2015).

Claims of interference with contractual relations and interference with prospective business advantage, are both causes of action that arise under Pohnpei state law. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

The causes of action for interference with contract's specific elements are 1) a valid contract; 2) the defendant's knowledge of the contract; 3) the defendant's intentional interference, which induces breach of the contract; 4) absence of justification on the defendant's part; and 5) resulting damages. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

When no witnesses or evidence supported Pohnpei's argument that the Pohnpei Visitors Bureau General Manager's hiring needed the state government's approval, Pohnpei interfered with the plaintiff's contractual relationship with the PVB when it did not let him receive any pay although he worked performing services for four or five months. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 500 (Pon. 2018).

The elements of the cause of action for tortious interference with a contract are 1) a valid contract; 2) the defendant's knowledge of the contract; 3) the defendant's intentional interference which induces breach of the contract; 4) absence of justification on the defendant's part; and 5) resulting damages. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 505 (Pon. 2020).

The tort of interference with contractual or economic relations is a part of the larger body of tort law generally aimed at upholding an individual's right to be secure against harm and interference from others, not only as to their physical integrity, their freedom to move about and their peace of mind, but even to the extent of protecting opportunities for economic gain and for pleasant and advantageous relations with others. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 505 (Pon. 2020).

It is generally recognized that interference with existing contractual relations applies to any type of contract, except a contract to marry – marriage contracts are specifically excluded from the tort of intentional interference with contract. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 505 (Pon. 2020).

A plaintiff cannot sue for tortious interference with a contract when that contract is a marriage contract. Panuelo v. FSM, 22 FSM R. 498, 505, 511 (Pon. 2020).

– Interference with Customary Property Rights

A cause of action that alleges that the plaintiffs' customary and traditional rights to use an island might be better described as intentional interference with a customary and traditional property right than trespass.

That the plaintiffs referred to it as a trespass should not, in itself, be an obstacle to them prevailing on this point if the evidence warrants, because except for judgments rendered by default, every final judgment shall grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in his pleadings. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

– Interference with Prospective Business Opportunity

Tort claims for tortious interference with contractual relationships, defamation, and interference with prospective business opportunities are causes of action that arise under state law. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 200, 203 (Pon. 2001).

State law, and not the national law, provides the controlling limitations period for the causes of action, such as libel and slander and the tort of interference with contract and prospective economic advantage, that arise under state law. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 496 (Pon. 2008).

A cause of action for interference with contract and prospective economic advantage must be commenced within six years after the cause of action accrues. Jano v. Fujita, 15 FSM R. 494, 497 (Pon. 2008).

Claims of interference with contractual relations and interference with prospective business advantage, are both causes of action that arise under Pohnpei state law. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 326-27 (Pon. 2009).

It may be sufficient to impose liability that the defendant has acted intentionally to interfere with a known contract or prospect of economic advantage, that he has caused harm in so doing, and that he has acted in pursuit of some purpose considered improper. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

When no FSM case has discussed the specific elements of the causes of action for interference with contractual relations or interference with prospective business advantage, the court may consider authorities from other jurisdictions in the common law tradition. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

The elements of a cause of action for interference with prospective business advantage or expectancy are 1) plaintiff's existing or reasonable expectation of economic benefit or advantage; 2) defendant's knowledge of that expectancy; 3) defendant's wrongful intentional interference with that expectancy; 4) reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have received anticipated economic benefit in absence of interference; and 5) damages resulting from interference. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327, 327-28 (Pon. 2009).

Both the cause of action for interference with contract and the cause of action for interference with prospective business require a showing of damages. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327 (Pon. 2009).

When a plaintiff did not show that the defendant knew of any reasonable expectancy that the plaintiff had and that the defendant wrongfully interfered with it and when the plaintiff failed to meet his burden of proof with respect to the element of damages, he cannot prevail on a claim for interference with prospective economic advantage. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 323, 327-28 (Pon. 2009).

It may be sufficient to impose liability that the defendant has acted intentionally to interfere with a known contract or prospect of economic advantage, that he has caused harm in so doing, and that he has acted in pursuit of some purpose considered improper. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

The elements of a cause of action for interference with prospective business advantage or expectancy are 1) plaintiff's existing or reasonable expectation of economic benefit or advantage; 2) defendant's knowledge of that expectancy; 3) defendant's wrongful intentional interference with that expectancy; 4) reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have received anticipated economic benefit in absence of interference; and 5) damages resulting from interference. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

Both the cause of action for interference with contract and the cause of action for interference with prospective business advantage require a showing of damages. Ehsa v. Kinkatsukyo, 16 FSM R. 450, 457 (Pon. 2009).

The elements of interference with prospective business advantage are 1) plaintiff's existing or reasonable expectation of economic benefit or advantage; 2) defendant's knowledge of that expectancy; 3) defendant's wrongful intentional interference with that expectancy; 4) reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have received anticipated economic benefit in absence of interference; and 5) damages resulting from interference. Jano v. Fujita, 16 FSM R. 502, 504 (Pon. 2009).

Generally, a plaintiff in a cause of action for interference with business opportunities must prove: 1) the plaintiff's existing or reasonable expectation of economic benefit or advantage; 2) the defendant's knowledge of that expectancy; 3) the defendant's wrongful intentional interference with that expectancy; 4) reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have received anticipated economic benefit in absence of interference; and 5) damages resulting from interference. This cause of action requires a showing of damages. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 45 (Pon. 2011).

A plaintiff has not met the burden of producing the preponderance of evidence required to show that the defendant interfered with his expectancy when he failed to show by a preponderance of the evidence that he would have received the anticipated economic benefit in the absence of the defendant's letter because the letter objected to the plaintiff's application on the grounds of his alleged technical shortcomings and his contentious nature but the Foreign Investment Board's denial cited the plaintiff's inadequate funds, not technical capabilities. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 45 (Pon. 2011).

Tort claims, including claims for tortious interference with contractual relationships, defamation, and interference with prospective business opportunities, are causes of action which arise under state law. Smith v. Nimea, 18 FSM R. 36, 45 (Pon. 2011).

The elements of a cause of action for interference with prospective business advantage or expectancy are 1) plaintiff's existing or reasonable expectation of economic benefit or advantage; 2) defendant's knowledge of that expectancy; 3) defendant's wrongful intentional interference with that expectancy; 4) reasonable probability that the plaintiff would have received anticipated economic benefit in absence of interference; and 5) damages resulting from interference. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 2015).

A bank's acts in trying to collect a loan repayment do not state a claim for relief under a cause of action for interference with prospective business advantage or expectancy or under a cause of action for interference with contract. Salomon v. Mendiola, 20 FSM R. 138, 141 (Pon. 2015).

Claims of interference with contractual relations and interference with prospective business advantage, are both causes of action that arise under Pohnpei state law. Santos v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 495, 499 (Pon. 2018).

– Invasion of Privacy

Wide ranging and unwarranted movement of police officers on private land may constitute an unreasonable invasion of privacy, or establish that the investigation had evolved into a search. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 290 (Pon. 1983).

While the constitutional provision barring invasion of privacy only protects persons from governmental intrusion into their affairs, not from intrusions by private persons, it does indicate a policy preference in favor of protection of privacy. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 455 (Chk. 1994).

Privacy law comprises four distinct kinds of invasion (although other forms may arise) of four different interests of the plaintiff, which are tied together by a common name, but otherwise have little in common except that each represents an interference with the right to be let alone. A plaintiff's privacy may be invaded in two or more of the four tortious ways and in those cases he may maintain his action for invasion of privacy on all of the grounds available. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 455-56 (Chk. 1994).

The elements of the privacy tort of unreasonable publicity given to the other's private life are: 1) there must be a public disclosure; 2) the facts disclosed must be private facts, rather than public ones; and 3) the matter made public must be one that would be offensive and objectionable to a reasonable person of ordinary sensibilities. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 456 (Chk. 1994).

Whoever publicizes a matter about another that places the other in a false light before the public is liable for tortious invasion of privacy if the false light in which the other was placed would be highly offensive to a reasonable person, and the actor had knowledge of or acted in reckless disregard as to the falsity of the publicized matter and the false light in which the other would be placed. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 456 (Chk. 1994).

One is liable for intentional intrusion, physical or otherwise, upon the solitude or seclusion or private affairs or concerns of another if the intrusion would be highly offensive to the reasonable person. The unauthorized photographing of a person who is not in a public place will incur liability for the unreasonable intrusion upon the seclusion of another. Failure of the plaintiff to plead she was not in a public place when the photograph was taken means an essential element of the tort has not been pled. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 457 (Chk. 1994).

There may be liability for the tort of appropriation of another's name or likeness when one appropriates the name or likeness of another for his own use or benefit. The right is in the nature of a property right. Incidental use of a name or likeness does not incur liability. Plaintiff's name or likeness must have intrinsic commercial or value associated with it. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 457-58 (Chk. 1994).

There may be liability for unauthorized use of name or likeness when the plaintiff is identifiable from the appropriated name or likeness, the name or likeness is used for trade or advertising purposes, and the use is unauthorized. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 458-59 (Chk. 1994).

Consent is not effective beyond the scope for which it is given. Therefore consent to have one's photograph taken is not consent for its exhibition or publication. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 459 (Chk. 1994).

A court can find as a matter of law whether defendant's use of plaintiff's likeness was predominately commercial because the characterization of the nature of an alleged tortious publication or a defense to such a claim is often decided as a matter of law. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 459 (Chk. 1994).

In the invasion of privacy context courts interpret "advertising purposes" broadly to include the use of a person's name or picture for all types of promotional endeavors. Thus where a corporation widely distributed its calendar free to the public for use and display wherever it does business the court may conclude as a matter of law that the calendar was used for advertising or trade purposes. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 459 (Chk. 1994).

Incidental unauthorized use of a name or likeness is not actionable if the use was in the context of a public event or newsworthy item of public interest. Nethon v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 6 FSM R. 451, 459 (Chk. 1994).

Because the primary lawmaking powers for the field of torts lie with the states, not the national government, the FSM Supreme Court's duty in an invasion of privacy case on Pohnpei is to try to apply the law the same way the highest state court in Pohnpei would. This involves an initial determination of whether it is contrary to, or consistent with, Pohnpei state law to recognize a right of privacy and an action for that right's violation. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 251-52 (Pon. 1998).

Although Pohnpei has not adopted the Restatement (Second) of Torts as state law, Pohnpei state constitutional guarantees of freedom from certain intrusions indicate that a policy preference of the protection of privacy exists in Pohnpei, and there is no constitutional or traditional impediment to the recognition of a right to privacy in Pohnpei. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 252-53 (Pon. 1998).

Although the FSM Supreme Court declines to adopt this formal three-pronged test for evaluating commercial appropriation invasion of privacy claims in Pohnpei, it notes that the following elements are present and create liability: 1) the plaintiff must be identifiable from the appropriated image or likeness; 2) the image or likeness must be used for trade or advertising purposes; and 3) the use must be unauthorized. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 259 (Pon. 1998).

Postcards produced for sale are produced for predominately commercial purposes, and when a person's image fills the entire frame of the postcard, his presence is not merely incidental to the illustration of the sakau ritual. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 259-60 (Pon. 1998).

Although a plaintiff may have implicitly consented to having his picture taken, that does not constitute consent to the use of that photograph in the form of a postcard for sale to the general public, because consent is not effective beyond the scope for which it is given. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 260 (Pon. 1998).

A nanmwarki does not have authority to authorize the commercial use of another person's image without that person's consent even though the photograph was taken at a traditional feast hosted by the nanmwarki. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 261 (Pon. 1998).

There is no recovery for false light invasion of privacy where the matter publicized is not untrue or highly offensive. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 262 (Pon. 1998).

A person's appearance on a postcard showing a sakau ceremony cannot be interpreted as support for the postcard maker's commercial services, or be interpreted as trivializing or demeaning to the Pohnpeian culture, when the photograph was taken at a public event and accurately depicts what occurred at that event. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 248, 262 (Pon. 1998).

There is no impediment to recognition of a right to privacy in Pohnpei and therefore no impediment to recognition of a cause of action for violation of that right. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 413 (Pon. 1998).

Where is little guidance in the prior decided opinions of the FSM Supreme Court for damage awards in privacy cases, the court will look to the reasoning of courts in other jurisdictions for guidance in assessing damages. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

A party that has established a cause of action for invasion of privacy is entitled to recover damages for the harm to his or her interest in privacy resulting from the invasion; mental distress proved to have been suffered if it is of a kind that normally results from such an invasion; and special damage of which the invasion is a legal cause. Special damages are demonstrable, direct economic losses resulting from the invasion of privacy. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 & n.1 (Pon. 1998).

The gist of the cause of action for invasion of privacy is for direct wrongs of a personal character which result in injury to the plaintiff's feelings, mental and emotional suffering are proper elements of damages. Substantial damages may be recovered, even if the only damages suffered resulted from mental anguish. These damages may include compensation for the wounded feelings, embarrassment, humiliation, and mental pain which a person of ordinary sensibilities would suffer under the circumstances. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

Punitive damages may also be awarded where it is shown that the defendant acted with malice or with a gross disregard for plaintiff's right to privacy, in order to punish the defendant for its conduct and to deter the defendant and others from engaging in like conduct in the future. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

The amount of damages to be awarded in invasion of privacy cases rests with the sound discretion of the trier of fact. The fact that damages may be difficult to ascertain, or that they cannot be measured by a pecuniary standard, is not a basis for denying all recovery even though there is no direct evidence of the amount of damage sustained. However, to recover substantial compensatory damages, the plaintiff must prove these damages. If there has been no material injury to the plaintiff, or if there is no evidence that damage has been sustained, or no evidence to serve as a basis for the calculation of damage, plaintiff will be awarded nominal damages only. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

The measure of compensatory damages in a case involving commercial appropriation of one's name or likeness is the value of the benefit derived by the person appropriating the other's name, or the pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiff whose name has been appropriated. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

In privacy cases in which a plaintiff also seeks damages for unjust enrichment, only one recovery is available because an invasion of another's right of privacy by a publication confers no right to share in the proceeds of such publication's sale of upon the ground that the author has thereby been unjustly enriched. It is inconsistent for the plaintiff to seek recovery for an invasion of the right of privacy, and in the same suit, to claim the right to participate in the profits of the publication. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 414 (Pon. 1998).

When there is little instruction in previously decided FSM cases for assessing damages in an invasion of privacy case, privacy cases in other jurisdictions may provide some useful guidance. FSM cases awarding damages for mental pain and suffering outside the privacy context are also instructive. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 418 (Pon. 1998).

When there is no direct evidence of the amount of damages sustained, nor the amount of money that can compensate for an injury, the court, as trier of fact, must assess an appropriate level of compensatory damages for that injury. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 418 (Pon. 1998).

Compensatory damages for unjust enrichment will be not awarded when this claim conflicts with plaintiff's claim for compensatory damages for invasion of privacy because it is inconsistent for a plaintiff who wishes to recover for invasion of privacy to also claim the right to participate in the profits of publication and because when a privacy cause of action is brought together with another cause of action based on the same objectionable behavior under another theory, generally only one recovery may be awarded. Mauricio v. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc., 8 FSM R. 411, 418-19 (Pon. 1998).

A photograph that is used to make a postcard offered for sale is being used primarily for trade purposes. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc. v. Mauricio, 9 FSM R. 155, 159 (App. 1999).

A plaintiff who is proud to participate in a ceremony can suffer embarrassment and emotional upset over the commercialization of a photograph of his participation in the ceremony. Because the two findings are not inconsistent and there is evidence in the record to support this conclusion, the damages awarded the plaintiff for invasion of privacy will be affirmed as not clearly erroneous. Phoenix of Micronesia, Inc. v. Mauricio, 9 FSM R. 155, 159 (App. 1999).

For invasion of privacy – false light, the theory is that someone who publicizes a matter about another that places the other in a false light before the public is liable for tortuous invasion of privacy if the false light in which the other was placed would be highly offensive to a reasonable person, and the actor had knowledge of or acted in reckless disregard as to the falsity of the publicized matter and the false light in which the other would be placed. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 487 (Pon. 2012).

For liability to exist for false light invasion of privacy it is not necessary, although it is often the case, that the plaintiff be defamed; the plaintiff need only be subject to an unreasonable and highly objectionable false portrayal before the public based on the sensibilities of a reasonable person. Peniknos v. Nakasone, 18 FSM R. 470, 487 (Pon. 2012).

Whoever publicizes a matter about another that places the other in a false light before the public is liable for tortious invasion of privacy if the false light in which the other was placed would be highly offensive to a reasonable person, and the actor had knowledge of or acted in reckless disregard as to the falsity of the publicized matter and the false light in which the other would be placed. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 567-68 (Kos. 2014).

Publication is a necessary element of defamation and of the false light tort. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 568 (Kos. 2014).

Summary judgment will be granted for the defendants on the plaintiff's defamation and false light cause of action when the plaintiff has failed to make a sufficient showing on essential elements of his case with respect to which he has the burden of proof and when he, in his opposition to the summary judgment motion, has not shown that he has admissible evidence to support his claim, and the time for him to do that is now, or never. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 568 (Kos. 2014).

A litigant's absolute privilege applies not only to defamation actions, but to any tort action based on statements made in connection with a judicial proceeding. These include the intentional infliction of emotional distress, the invasion of privacy, and false light actions, including false light invasion of privacy claims that fail to meet the standards for defamation. Helgenberger v. Helgenberger, 22 FSM R. 244, 251 n.7 (Pon. 2019).

– Loss of Consortium

To determine a monetary value for loss of consortium, the Pohnpei Supreme Court will consider the social structure of the society and the extended family system, whereby other members of the family can be expected to provide some, albeit occasional, assistance. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 74 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

As a loss of consortium claim is derivative from a spouse's claim for damages an award for loss of consortium is properly reduced by the percentage of fault attributable to the spouse. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 170 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The right to recover damages for loss of consortium is recognized in Pohnpei. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 253 (Pon. 2001).

Loss of consortium contemplates something more than loss of general overall happiness, and includes components of love and affection, society and companionship, sexual relations, right of performance of material services, right of support, aid and assistance, and felicity. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 253 (Pon. 2001).

Some qualifications that have placed on the right to recover for the loss of parental consortium, or the loss of the society and companionship of an injured parent, have been that the children must be minors, and that the injury to the parent must be serious, permanent, and disabling so as to render the parent unable to provide the love, care, companionship, and guidance to the child, and so overwhelming and severe that the parent-child relationship is destroyed or nearly destroyed. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 253 (Pon. 2001).

The Constitution admonishes that court decisions are to be consistent with the "social and geographical configuration of Micronesia," and a cause of action for loss of parental consortium is consistent with this admonition in that it acknowledges the important role played by the family in the many distinct cultures of Micronesia. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 253 (Pon. 2001).

Minor children have a right of recovery for the loss of their father's love, care, affection, companionship, and guidance (loss of parental consortium) which they have suffered as a result of the grievous injury to their father. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 254 (Pon. 2001).

Loss of consortium is more than the loss of general overall happiness and it includes components of love and affection, society and companionship, sexual relations, right of performance of material services, right of support, aid and assistance, and felicity. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

The general rule is that the uninjured spouse who loses income when he or she provides nursing care or maid service for the injured spouse is not entitled to recover damages equal to his or her lost income as part of a loss-of-consortium claim. Instead the damages are recoverable by the injured spouse and the measure of damages for nursing services supplied by a relative who leaves his or her employment to render such services is not the amount of lost earnings but rather is the reasonable value of the nursing services supplied. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

A tortfeasor who caused an automobile accident would expect to pay the market rate for the care provided to the injured party, not the wages of a stockbroker. Thus, if there is to be recovery of lost income, it cannot be part of the uninjured spouse's claim for loss of consortium because a loss-of-consortium claim is not based on economic damages. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

The uninjured spouse's loss-of-consortium claim is based upon the loss of services provided by the injured spouse before his or her injury. The uninjured spouse's income from his own employment is not a service that the injured spouse once provided. Thus, any recovery of damages for care provided to an injured spouse must be part of the injured spouse's claim. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

The performance of material services in a loss-of-consortium claim is for the non-economic services that the injured spouse used to perform for the uninjured spouse, not the services that the uninjured spouse later performed for the injured spouse. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

The uninjured spouse's lost income or the nursing or maid services performed by the uninjured spouse, even when calculated at the reasonable maid or nursing services rate, are not part of the uninjured spouse's loss-of-consortium claim but are rather a measure of the injured spouse's damages. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 84 (Pon. 2013).

The court will not recharacterize damages as a part of the uninjured spouse's loss-of-consortium claim and alter the nature of the damages claim solely to circumvent the FSM's statutory limited waiver of its sovereign immunity that prevents the injured spouse from being awarded the full amount of the damages she suffered. The court will comply with Congress's policy choice and its intent in enacting the limited waiver. Lee v. FSM, 19 FSM R. 80, 85 (Pon. 2013).

– Malicious Prosecution

The five elements of the tort of malicious prosecution or wrongful or unjustified initiation of a civil suit are satisfied when: 1) the defendant initiated the civil litigation, 2) the litigation was resolved in the plaintiff's favor, 3) the defendant did not have probable cause to initiate the civil litigation, 4) the defendant exhibited malice or ill will, and 5) the litigation caused significant interference with the plaintiff's property. Island Cable TV-Chuuk v. Aizawa, 8 FSM R. 104, 106-07 (Chk. 1997).

When an accused's motion to dismiss alleges, in the complete absence of supporting facts or reference to any legal standard under which such facts might be analyzed, that there is probable cause to believe the State has intentionally and maliciously instituted criminal actions against him, the court will not take such an allegation lightly as it implicates the integrity of the Chuuk State Attorney General's office and will order the defendant to show cause for making the allegation. Chuuk v. Hauk, 17 FSM R. 508, 514 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2011).

– Negligence

Where it is undisputed that the original employer had no right to control the workplace or the employee's actions at the time that plaintiff-employee was injured, exercised no actual control over the manner of work, knew nothing which would have increased the plaintiff's knowledge of the risk he was facing, and did nothing to cause the injury, the court may conclude as a matter of law that the defendant is not liable for plaintiff's injuries. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (I), 2 FSM R. 131, 144 (Pon. 1985).

The common law definition of negligence, which includes the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent person would use in a similar situation, is consistent with the Pohnpeian concept of civil wrong. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 66 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

The Pohnpei Supreme Court will apply an English principle to the situation of a joint enterprise such that when parties to a joint enterprise, or their agents, perform work on another man's property and cause damage to the other man or his property through failure to exercise due care, then they are liable. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 67 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

An employer who recognizes the potential danger of a work situation, but who fails to take steps to reduce the danger or warn his employees of the danger, is guilty of nonfeasance and negligence. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 69 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

A corporation and its shareholders are liable for the wrongful act of their employees under the doctrine of respondeat superior. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 70 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

In apportioning damages among negligent parties, the Pohnpei Supreme Court will consider the following factors: the Pohnpei Constitution, custom and tradition, the degree of negligence of each party, other jurisdictions' efforts to abolish joint liability, the need to minimize the role of insurance companies given Pohnpei's stage of development, the example of the U.S. insurance crisis, other jurisdictions' efforts to modify the rules governing joint and several liability, and American judges' assessments of joint and several liability. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc. (II), 3 FSM R. 182, 185 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1987).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 531 (Pon. 1988).

Any liability of the state for suffering or death caused by defective health care provided by the state must be based upon theories of negligence, not strict liability. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 534 (Pon. 1988).

The standard of care for doctors at the Truk State hospital is that they are to exercise professional judgment in the attempt to diagnose the illness of the patient, and then, consistent with available facilities and supplies, act on that diagnosis. Asan v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 51, 56 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

In a case where a patient died following the normal delivery of her child, where the evidence fails to show any demonstrable effort at diagnosis and no treatment as a result of diagnosis, the standard of care expected of a doctor at the Truk State Hospital was not met and the evidence proves negligence. Asan v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 51, 56 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Where the driver of a vehicle dropped off a child and then failed to see that the way was clear before starting the vehicle in motion, the driver was negligent and is liable for the death of the child. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 129-30 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

One person may be liable to another if the first negligently violates a duty owed to the other and thereby causes the other to suffer injury or loss. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 357 (Yap 1990).

A volunteer who gratuitously offers to provide service or assistance to another, and causes that other to rely upon the offer rather than to seek alternative ways of responding to the need, owes a duty to perform the donated services with reasonable care. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 357 (Yap 1990).

The FSM liaison officers generally owe a duty, established by statutory authorizations and administrative directives, to exercise reasonable care and diligence in providing timely transportation services to medically-referred citizens, and when the FSM liaison office personnel are aware of facts which reveal that a medically-referred citizen is in serious condition and that the timing of her travel for further medical attention is crucial, those officials have a duty to inquire how long the stabilization procedure will take, when it will be appropriate for the citizen to travel and what, if any flights are available for the injured person. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 358 (Yap 1990).

What constitutes reasonable action or assistance must be determined in light of the surrounding circumstances. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 358 (Yap 1990).

One who has acted negligently may be held liable only for the damages proximately caused by that negligence. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 361 (Yap 1990).

A claim that the FSM liaison office did not fulfill its medical referral obligations as required by law falls within the embrace of 6 F.S.M.C. 702(2), which authorizes damage claims against the government for alleged improper administration of statutory laws or regulations. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 363 (Yap 1990).

Where the national government, through the Guam liaison office, undertook to assist in transporting persons being medically referred to other locations and then failed to provide competent and reasonable assistance, the failure to fulfill the duty owed was a failure of the government liaison office and not of just one or two staff members of that office. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 364 (Yap 1990).

Under the Compact of Free Association and the Federal Programs and Services Agreement, civilian employees of the United States government have immunity from civil and criminal process for wrongful acts and omissions done within the scope and in performance of official duty, unless expressly waived by the U.S. government. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 95 (Pon. 1991).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. It is the failure to do what a person of ordinary prudence would have done under similar circumstances. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Where any reasonable employer would have ordered all electrical power cut off while any work was being performed in close proximity to high voltage lines, the failure to do so is clearly negligent. Epiti v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 162, 166 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

When a person elects to operate a vehicle on the public streets he owes a duty to pedestrians and others using the road and adjacent areas to operate the vehicle in a safe and prudent manner. When the breach of this duty by driving in a fast and careless manner is the proximate cause of an injury the driver will by held liable. Ludwig v. Mailo, 5 FSM R. 256, 259 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

In order for a third party's negligent conduct to afford any relief to defendants by way of a contributory (comparative) negligence theory, it must be demonstrated that the negligent act or omission somehow caused or contributed to the injury sustained and that there was not an independent or superseding cause. Ludwig v. Mailo, 5 FSM R. 256, 261 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

Until proven contrary to Kosraean custom the Kosrae State Court will entertain actions for negligence as tort liability for negligence is consistent with Micronesian culture. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damage caused by the breach, and determination of the value of the damage can there be a liability for negligence. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 420 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

An action for damages for negligent surveying is not an action for the recovery of an interest in land, for which the twenty year statute of limitation would apply, therefore it may be barred by the lesser statue of limitations. Damarlane v. United States, 6 FSM R. 357, 361 (Pon. 1994).

Punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. Elwise v. Bonneville Constr. Co., 6 FSM R. 570, 572 (Pon. 1994).

A creditor who undertakes to secure credit insurance for a debtor is liable to the debtor for negligent performance of that duty or of duty to notify debtor if insurance not obtained. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

Failure of a creditor to notify the debtor of its failure to obtain insurance is negligence. As a consequence the creditor is liable to the debtor for the entire amount of the debtors' loss, otherwise the debtor is only entitled to return of full amount of insurance premiums paid. FSM Dev. Bank v. Bruton, 7 FSM R. 246, 251 (Chk. 1995).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 546 (Chk. 1996).

The state is liable for injuries proximately caused by the employment of untrained or poorly trained police officers, and for the failure to adequately train them, and the chief of police is liable for any injury resulting from breach of duties connected with his office. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 546 (Chk. 1996).

Because tort law is primarily state law a negligence action will be governed by the substantive state law and the FSM Supreme Court's duty is to try to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 64-65 (Chk. 1997).

Under Chuuk state law the elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed, which may be summarized as: a duty of care, a breach of that duty, which breach proximately causes damages. Fabian v. Ting Hong Oceanic Enterprises, 8 FSM R. 63, 65 (Chk. 1997).

The employment of a police officer with ten-year old charges and or convictions for violent behavior is insufficient to hold a municipality liable for negligent hiring because the charges and or convictions were too remote and attenuated to be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 194 (Pon. 1997).

The definition of "negligence," as the term is used in the common law countries, is applicable or similar to the Pohnpeian understanding of negligence. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293 (Pon. 1998).

Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those ordinary considerations which ordinarily regulate human affairs, would do, or the doing of something which a reasonable and prudent man would not do. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293 (Pon. 1998).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances; it is the doing of some act which a person of ordinary prudence would not have done under similar circumstances or failure to do what a person of ordinary prudence would have done under similar circumstances. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293 (Pon. 1998).

United States common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for this court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of constitutional courts here, or custom and tradition within the Federated States of Micronesia. United States courts have generally followed the provisions of the Restatement of Torts in situations where a plaintiff alleges that a defendant has negligently prevented a third party from rendering assistance. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 293-94 (Pon. 1998).

One who knows or has reason to know that a third person is giving or is ready to give to another aid necessary to prevent physical harm to him, and negligently prevents or disables the third person from giving such aid, is subject to liability for physical harm caused to the other by the absence of the aid for which he has prevented the third person from giving. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 294 (Pon. 1998).

A complaint's allegations that officials' knowing interference prevented two ships from refloating their ship after it had grounded on a reef, that the ship's crew were arrested by the officials without cause, and that this actively and unreasonably prevented rescue the vessel's by other boats, and that that interference was the direct cause of the boat's damage, set forth a claim in negligence and are sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 294 (Pon. 1998).

Under Chuuk state law the elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed. Kaminanga v. FSM College of Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 438, 442 (Chk. 1998).

A negligence claim may be stated when a party has breached its duty to negotiate in good faith. Kaminanga v. FSM College of Micronesia, 8 FSM R. 438, 442 (Chk. 1998).

In determining liability for negligent injuries generally, electricity providers are required to use reasonable care in the construction and maintenance of their lines and apparatus, and will be responsible for any conduct falling short of this standard. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 449 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

It is the imperative duty of electricity providers to make reasonable and proper inspection of their wires and other equipment and to use due diligence to discover and repair defects. A failure to perform such duty constitutes negligence. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The placing of a guy wire within areas that are traveled may constitute negligence where the wire is not guarded, covered, rendered easy to see, and a person is injured by a collision with it. An electricity provider can be held liable for injures sustained from a collision if it is shown that the company's negligence in the erection or the maintenance of such wire was the proximate cause of the injury. The test is whether the injury under all of the circumstances, might reasonably been foreseen by a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

It is reasonably foreseeable to a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence that a dangling, frayed wire could cause injury to passersby in the vicinity of the pole and wire. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

A state will be liable for damages resulting from personal injury as a result of a collision with a guy wire when the state erected and maintained the guy wire to support a pole carrying its electric transmission wires, when for a considerable length of time prior to the accident it failed to make reasonable and proper inspections of the guy wire as necessary and failed to use due diligence to discover and remedy the defective guy wire so that that injury would not result, and when the type injury which occurred was reasonably foreseeable. Asher v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 443, 450 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Negligence is a separate tort from nuisance. Although negligence is one kind of conduct upon which liability for nuisance may be based, negligence is not a necessary ingredient for a nuisance. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

Under Pohnpei law, negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. It is the doing of some act which a person of ordinary prudence would not have done under similar circumstances or failure to do what a person of ordinary prudence would have done under similar circumstances. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 535 (Pon. 1998).

The elements of actionable negligence are: 1) a duty of care, 2) a breach of that duty, and 3) damages proximately caused by that breach. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 535 (Pon. 1998).

One who carries on a dangerous activity must use care commensurate with the risk or danger of injury involved or suffer liability for resulting injuries. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 535 (Pon. 1998).

The focus of a negligence analysis is on the actor's conduct, while the focus of an intentional nuisance analysis is on the resulting interference. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 541 (Pon. 1998).

Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damage caused by the breach, and determination of the value of the damage can there be a liability for negligence. A plaintiff must show that the defendants owed the plaintiff a duty of care, and that the defendants breached this duty. The plaintiff must also show that his injuries were caused by the breach and that a value can be assigned to his injuries. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The common law definition of negligence includes the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent person would use in a similar situation. Sigrah v. Timothy, 9 FSM R. 48, 53 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

The two year limitation applies to tort actions for both negligence and wilful conduct. David v. Bossy, 9 FSM R. 224, 225 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. Duties of care differ according to the circumstances. The exact parameters of each person's responsibilities towards others will be defined through time by judicial decisions and statutes. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 341 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The elements required to prevail on a negligence claim are: a duty of care, a breach of that duty, and damages proximately caused by that breach. Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damage caused by the breach, and determination of the value of the damage can there be a liability for negligence. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 341 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Because the state had a duty of care to construct the seawall in a manner which a reasonably careful person would have done in similar circumstances and a reasonably careful person would have constructed the seawall in accordance with accepted methods of seawall construction in Kosrae at that time during the late 1980s, and because at that time black rock was routinely used for seawall construction as the best method to dissipate wave energy from the ocean, the state did not breach its duty to, and is not liable to the plaintiff for negligence by using black rocks for erosion control measures and construction of the seawall. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 341 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The general rule applicable to negligence actions is that the statue of limitations runs from the time of the negligent act or omission, even though the total damage cannot be ascertained until a later date. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 344 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Under Chuuk state law the elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed, which may be summarized as: a duty of care, a breach of that duty, which breach proximately causes damages. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 14 (Chk. 2001).

Jailers, and their superiors, owe detainees a duty of care, which may include the duty to regularly observe a detainee's condition, and may breach that duty by failing to provide the required checks on his condition, had a duty of watchfulness when they are aware or should be aware of the effect on the detainee of the scolding he received and when these failures are the proximate cause of the plaintiff's death, these defendants are liable under 6 TTC 201(1) for the plaintiff's death by neglect. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 14 (Chk. 2001).

Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damage caused by the breach, and determination of the value of the damage can there be a liability for negligence. A plaintiff must show that the defendants owed the plaintiff a duty of care, and that the defendants breached this duty. The plaintiff must also show that his injuries were caused by the breach and that a value can be assigned to his injuries. The common law definition of negligence includes the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent person would use in a similar situation. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Negligence may include a condition created by the negligent conduct of a government entity, or its employees, a condition which created a reasonably foreseeable risk of the kind of injury which afflicted the plaintiff, and that the injury proximately caused by the condition. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When the act of losing the key, or providing the key to allow one or more unauthorized persons access to the municipal building and the office area breached the duty of care to protect the plaintiff's property and created a reasonably foreseeable risk that the property in the building would be moved, damaged or removed from the premises, and when the plaintiff's property was removed from its designated location, the loss of the key, or the providing it to unauthorized persons proximately caused the plaintiff's loss of his personal property, and the defendants are liable for tort of negligence. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 236 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 239 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

Ordinary negligence is not a basis for punitive damages. In order for negligence to constitute wantonness meriting imposition of punitive damages, the plaintiff must show that the one acting or failing to act realized the imminence of the danger and failed to take steps to prevent it because he was indifferent to whether the injury occurred. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

The failure to exercise the degree of care that a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under the same circumstances constitutes negligence. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250 (Pon. 2001).

When a general contractor had a duty to provide a safe work environment for the construction work to be done at the second story heights and his duty in this regard ran not only to the employees of subcontractors, but to those that he employed directly as well, which included the plaintiff, and when his failure to provide any kind of safety equipment, precautions, instructions or supervision resulted in the plaintiff's fall and consequent injury, he is therefore liable for the damages suffered as a result of that injury. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 250-51 (Pon. 2001).

When one company assigned its employee to work for another company, and the assigning company was effectively stripped of control over the way the work was done, and when the assigning company had no knowledge of facts unknown to the employee that would have affected the risk faced by him, and did nothing else to cause the employee's injury, there is no negligence liability on the part of the assigning company. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2001).

When an employee is directed or permitted by his employer to perform services for another employer he may become the employee of such other in performing the services and since the question of liability is always raised because of some specific act done, the important question is whether or not, as to the act in question the employee was acting in the business of and under the direction of one or the other employer. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 244, 251 (Pon. 2001).

Negligence consists of four essential elements: 1) a legal duty owed to the plaintiff by the defendant, 2) a breach of that duty, 3) injury to the plaintiff, and 4) a showing that the breach was the proximate cause of the injury. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 352-53 (Pon. 2001).

It is well established that medical expenses are properly a component of negligence damages and may be recovered from the tortfeasor. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 376 (Pon. 2001).

In determining whether conduct is negligent, the customs of the community, or of others under like circumstances, are factors to be taken into account, but are not controlling where a reasonable man would not follow them. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 384 (Pon. 2001).

It is not a defense to negligence to say that others engaged in the same conduct would have operated in the same way, without taking safety precautions, and were, or are on an ongoing basis, negligent. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 384 (Pon. 2001).

The construction of a multistory building using imported technology is not imbued with Pohnpeian custom and tradition so as to lend itself to an analysis in those terms. Amayo v. MJ Co., 10 FSM R. 371, 384 (Pon. 2001).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances, or the failure to do what a person of ordinary prudence would have done under similar circumstances. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

In order to prove negligence, a plaintiff must prove the existence of a duty, breach of the duty, and damages proximately caused by the breach. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The plaintiff, in order to establish the defendant's negligence in failing to pay the sums due under the lease, has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence the existence of a duty on the defendant's part to pay. But, given the lease's illegal nature, this essential fact cannot be proven as a matter of law. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

As a matter of law no reasonably prudent person would commit an act the consequence of which might result in that person's imprisonment. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

When a reasonably prudent person in the Director of Treasury's position would not willingly and intentionally violate Chuuk state laws, and when to pay sums purportedly due under the contract at issue would violate Chuuk state laws, subjecting the party authorizing payment to criminal penalties, the plaintiff cannot as a matter of law prove a material and indispensable element of her claim of negligence for failure to pay her because the sums are due her on an illegal contract. Billimont v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 77, 81 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Each of the familiar elements of a cause of action for negligence – duty, breach of duty, proximate cause, and damages – should be alleged, and a negligence counterclaim that does not is deficient and a motion to dismiss it will be granted. Adams v. Island Homes Constr., Inc., 11 FSM R. 445, 449 (Pon. 2003).

6 TTC 305 establishes a period of 6 years in which to bring an action for negligent damage to real property. Ben v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 649, 650 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

No punitive damages can be awarded when the plaintiff has not sustained his burden of demonstrating that the defendant's actions were intentional, wilful, and malicious, rather than merely negligent. Punitive damages may not be awarded for ordinary negligence. Tomy v. Walter, 12 FSM R. 266, 272 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

Once a plaintiff has presented a prima facie case of entitlement to judgment on a cause of action, the burden shifts to the defendants to raise a question of material fact. Thus when the defendants have raised no such question, and where there is a duty of care, a breach of that duty, damage caused by the breach, and the value of the damage can be determined, liability as to the defendants' negligence has been established. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 308 (Pon. 2004).

It is well established that punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. Such damages also will not be awarded unless it has been claimed and proved that the defendant acted with actual malice or deliberate violence. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 309 (Pon. 2004).

A presumption arises that a bailee who has sole actual and exclusive possession of the goods has been negligent if he cannot explain the loss, disappearance or damage of the bailed property, its parts or contents. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

A bailee is liable for all repairs and replacement for the bailed property that are necessary due to his neglect or lack of care. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

In assessing damages, the court may take judicial notice of the prevailing cost in Kosrae of items similar to the ones lost. Palik v. PKC Auto Repair Shop, 13 FSM R. 93, 96 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

When the plaintiffs allege two separate claims for the same damages in this suit and one sounds in contract and alleges a breach of a purchase agreement since part of the plaintiffs' agreed share of the purchase price was not paid to them and the other claim sounds in tort and alleges that the defendant was negligent in wrongfully releasing the remaining balance to someone else without taking such precautionary measures that a reasonably prudent person would be expected to take as a holder of funds that plaintiffs were entitled to, the court will analyze the contract claim first and finding a breach of the purchase agreement, need not address the plaintiffs' negligence tort claims. Edgar v. Truk Trading Corp., 13 FSM R. 112, 117 (Chk. 2005).

Under Chuuk law, the elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127 (Chk. 2005).

For a plaintiff to recover for negligence, the defendant must owe a duty of care to the plaintiff and have breached that duty. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 127 (Chk. 2005).

The result of "negligence" in failing to properly record a mortgage on unregistered land is that the mortgage is ineffective against third parties – someone other than the mortgagor who had no notice of the mortgage (and the result is the same for registered land when a mortgage is not properly endorsed on the certificate of title). Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 & n.4 (Chk. 2005).

Since a bank owed no duty of care to a plaintiff when it took a mortgage to secure a loan to another, and that mortgage, even if it is unenforceable, was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's alleged damages, the bank is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law on the plaintiff's negligence and void mortgage causes of action. Additional reasons for this are that the bank has not attempted to foreclose its mortgage and that the mortgage does not cover the lot for which the plaintiff has a determination of ownership. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 128 (Chk. 2005).

The tort of "fraud-act of mistake" has not been recognized in Kosrae, but since this cause of action appears to sound in negligent misrepresentation, therefore an analysis of the action as the tort of negligence is appropriate. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Negligence consists of four essential elements: 1) legal duty owed to the plaintiff by the defendant, 2) breach of that duty, 3) injury to the plaintiff, and 4) showing that the breach was the proximate cause of the injury. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 568 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

When there is no competent evidence that a defendant breached a duty owed to the plaintiff since his duty was to represent his late father's interests before the Land Commission, summary judgment will be awarded the defendant on the plaintiff's "fraud-act of mistake" – negligent misrepresentation cause of action. Kinere v. Sigrah, 13 FSM R. 562, 568-69 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Under Chuuk state law the elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed. Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 65 (Chk. 2006).

Liability for the tort of negligence requires that there be a duty of care owed by the defendants to the plaintiff, a breach of this duty, damages caused by the breach, and a determination of the value of the damages. Generally, negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. Phillip v. Kosrae, 14 FSM R. 109, 113 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Under Chuuk state law the elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed, which may be summarized as: a duty of care, a breach of that duty, which breach proximately causes damages. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

The elements of a maritime negligence cause of action are four: 1) existence of a duty requiring a person to conform to a certain standard of conduct in order to protect others against unreasonable risks; 2) breach of that duty by engaging in conduct that falls below the standard of conduct, which is usually called "negligence"; 3) a reasonably close causal connection between the unreasonable conduct and any resulting injury, often referred to as "proximate cause"; and 4) actual loss, injury or damage to another party. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 416 (Yap 2006).

A genuine issue of material fact precluding summary judgment is whether, even if the Pohnpei construction industry's customary business practice did not include safety features that would have prevented or lessened the plaintiff's injuries, one or more of those safety feature(s) was so simple or so inexpensive in relation to the possible consequences that the Pohnpei construction industry ought to have adopted them and should be liable for the failure to adopt them. Amayo v. MJ Co., 14 FSM R. 487, 489 (Pon. 2006).

The elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty of care on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed. Kileto v. Chuuk, 15 FSM R. 16, 17 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

The plaintiffs' negligence claims fail when they failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that their homes would not have flooded with mud if the partially-blocked entrance to the Mt. Tonachau road culvert had remained partially blocked and when they also did not prove that the defendant's contractor, by restoring the Mt. Tonachau road and drainage system to its designed (and previous) state, breached its duty not to cause injury to residents and landowners downhill from the Mt. Tonachau roadwork. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 123 (Chk. 2010).

When a plaintiff did not submit any evidence about his damages and therefore could not have proven damages, his negligence claim fails. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 123 (Chk. 2010).

FSM admiralty law recognizes a cause of action for damages to coral reefs and marine resources caused by marine vessels. The elements of maritime negligence are: 1) the existence of a duty requiring conformance to a certain standard of conduct in order to protect others against unreasonable risks; 2) a breach of that duty by engaging in conduct that falls below the standard of conduct (usually called "negligence"); 3) a reasonably close causal connection between the unreasonable conduct and any resulting injury (often called "proximate cause"); and 4) an actual loss or injury to another party. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 174 (Yap 2012).

In Chuuk, the elements of actionable negligence are the breach of a duty of care on the part of one person to protect another from injury, and that breach is the proximate cause of an injury to the person to whom the duty is owed. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

When a plaintiff has failed to make a showing sufficient to establish the existence of any element essential to its case on which it will bear the burden of proof at trial, summary judgment in the defendant's favor is appropriate. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 (Chk. 2012).

When there is no factual basis for the existence of a special duty, the defendants' summary judgment motion should be granted since one of the essential elements of negligence cannot be proven. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

Liability for the tort of negligence requires that there be a duty of care owed by the defendants to the plaintiff, a breach of this duty, damages caused by the breach, and a determination of the value of the damages. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 580 (Kos. 2013).

Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damage caused by the breach, and determination of the value of the damage can there be a liability for negligence. The plaintiffs have the burden of proving each these elements in order to prevail on a negligence claim, and if the plaintiffs fail to prove any one element, judgment will be entered against them. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R.

575, 580 (Kos. 2013).

When the delay before a referral to an off-island medical facility, regardless of who caused it, did not proximately cause the patient's death, it cannot be the basis to hold anyone liable for her death. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

When the insurance carrier approved the patient's off-island referral within two days and was ready to put her on the earliest possible flight but the patient did not leave until 20 days later and when this long delay was the proximate cause of the patient's death, the insurance carrier's actions were not the proximate cause of her death because the insurance carrier did not cause the delay. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

Since the state did not have a statutorily-created duty under Kosrae Code § 12.1103 to assist in paying for the family attendant's airfare, it did not have a statutorily-created duty to inform the family attendant that he could ask the State for financial assistance for his own airfare. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582 (Kos. 2013).

The state cannot be said to have breached its duty when there was insufficient evidence before the court that it was state policy to pay for family attendant's airfare and to then seek repayment by wage or salary allotments; when there was no evidence about when this policy was implemented, by whom it was implemented, whether this policy was in existence in July 2001, the process used to apply for these funds, and whether there were any such funds available in late July 2001 that could have been used to immediately pay for the family attendant's ticket; when the statute barred the use of medical referral funds in a manner contrary to regulation; and when if no funds were available in July 2001, any request would have been futile and it would have been pointless to tell the family attendant that the State could assist. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582 (Kos. 2013).

A 1991 memorandum of understanding between the insurer and the Kosrae State Hospital that required that the hospital provide all necessary health care services within Kosrae to all covered persons and that these services would include the cost of a medical or other attendant to accompany a covered person to a health care facility is an agreement that allocates the cost of attendants between the parties to the memorandum and it does not, by itself, allocate costs or create duties between the state and the insureds ("covered persons") and their families. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 582 (Kos. 2013).

When a plaintiff does not submit any evidence about his damages and therefore cannot prove damages, the plaintiff's negligence claim fails. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 583 (Kos. 2013).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2014).

When the plaintiff has not demonstrated that the defendant's actions reflect a standard of care that is unreasonable under the circumstances, the plaintiff's negligence claim must fail. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2014).

The focus of a negligence analysis is on the defendants' conduct, while the focus of an intentional nuisance analysis would be on the resulting interference. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 531 (Pon. 2014).

When an insurance carrier's endorsement contained within an employer's policy limited the applicability of the CNMI Workers' Compensation Program to "the benefits provided under the Workers' Compensation Law of the CNMI," (which would entail that statute's "determination of pay," that statute's exclusive remedy provision setting forth tort immunity does not apply, and an employee would not be forestalled from also bringing a civil action sounding in negligence. Hairens v. Federated Shipping Co., 20

FSM R. 404, 409 (Pon. 2016).

Liability for the tort of negligence requires that there be a duty of care owed by the defendant to the plaintiff, a breach of the duty, damages caused by the breach (i.e. proximate cause), and a determination of the value of the damages. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 39 (Pon. 2016).

While tort law, especially a common law tort like negligence, is primarily a state responsibility, the national government may create tort law when legislating in an area that the Constitution has expressly delegated to Congress the power to legislate. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 170 n.4 (Pon. 2017).

To properly state a negligence claim, a plaintiff must show that the defendant owed the plaintiff a duty of reasonable care, that the defendant breached that duty, that damage resulted, and that that breach of duty was the proximate cause of the damage. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 170 (Pon. 2017).

If negligent lending were a cause of action, the borrowers would have to show that the bank owed them a duty of reasonable care to not lend them any money if the bank knew, or should have known, that there was not a reasonable likelihood that the borrowers could repay the loan in conformity with the loan's repayment terms. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 171 (Pon. 2017).

Because tort law is primarily state law, a negligence action will be governed by the substantive state law and the FSM Supreme Court's duty is to try to apply the law the same way the highest state court would. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 187 (Pon. 2017).

For purposes of Pohnpei law, "negligence" is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 187 (Pon. 2017).

When a reasonable person, in considering the totality of the circumstances, would find that the defendant did not breach its duty of care, the plaintiff's claim for negligence is not substantiated. Pelep v. Mai Xiong Inc., 21 FSM R. 182, 188 (Pon. 2017).

When a plaintiff does not submit any evidence about his damages, his negligence claim fails. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 363 (App. 2017).

When a defendant is found negligent, the remedy is money damages, but if irreparable future harm is threatened, a court, by injunction, may also act to prevent future damage. Alik v. Heirs of Alik, 21 FSM R. 606, 620 & n.6 (App. 2018).

A maritime negligence cause of action's elements are: 1) existence of a duty requiring persons to conform to a certain standard of conduct in order to protect others against unreasonable risks; 2) conduct that falls below that standard thus breaching that duty (usually called "negligence"); 3) a reasonably close causal connection between the unreasonable conduct and the resulting injury, (often called "proximate cause"); and 4) an actual loss, injury, or damage to another party. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 19 (Yap 2018).

Negligence is the failure to use such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would use under similar circumstances; it is the doing of some act which a person of ordinary prudence would not have done under similar circumstances or failure to do what a person of ordinary prudence would have done under similar circumstances. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 27 (Pon. 2018).

Negligence consists of four essential elements: 1) a duty of care, 2) a breach of that duty, 3) injury to the plaintiff, and 4) a showing that the breach was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Luzama v.

Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 27 (Pon. 2018).

Only when there is a duty of care, breach of this duty, damages caused by the breach, and determination of the value of damage can there be liability for negligence. The plaintiff has the burden of proving each of these elements in order to prevail on a negligence claim, and if the plaintiff fails to prove any one element, judgment will be entered against him. Luzama v. Mai Xong, Inc., 22 FSM R. 23, 27 (Pon. 2018).

The FSM Supreme Court would look upon a true negligence suit against the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure with great disfavor because, when a defendant is found negligent, the remedy is money damages, and because the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure is a court, and, as a court, it is immune from a suit for money damages for its judicial acts. Setik v. Perman, 22 FSM R. 105, 119 n.12 (App. 2018).

A public utility's duty of care extends beyond just a duty to landowners. It also has a duty to those persons who reside on, or who work on, or who otherwise occupy land. Thus, a plaintiff may seek relief under a negligence cause of action as a resident or an occupant of the affected land. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 154 (Chk. 2019).

– Negligence – Gross Negligence

Gross negligence has been construed as requiring willful, wanton, or reckless misconduct, or such utter lack of care as will be evidence thereof. Hauk v. Lokopwe, 14 FSM R. 61, 65 (Chk. 2006).

A negligence cause of action may be amended to add a punitive damages claim subject to proof at trial and, in the absence of such proof, the defendants may move to disallow any punitive damages award. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 268 (Chk. 2009).

Punitive damages are not recoverable for ordinary negligence. For punitive damages to be awarded, there must be evidence of gross negligence. Gross negligence is the intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the consequences as affecting the life or property of another. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 49 (Chk. 2010).

A Port Authority and a pilot are immune from any negligence claim for the pilot's acts or omissions in berthing a vessel, but not from a gross negligence claim. Win Sheng Marine S. de R.L. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 20 FSM R. 13, 16 (Pon. 2015).

Gross negligence has been construed as requiring willful, wanton, or reckless misconduct, or such utter lack of care as will be evidence thereof. Gross negligence can thus occur in a wide range of circumstances. Win Sheng Marine S. de R.L. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 20 FSM R. 13, 16 (Pon. 2015).

There are a variety of circumstances in which a pilot's navigating too fast combined with other circumstances have equaled gross negligence on the pilot's part. Win Sheng Marine S. de R.L. v. Pohnpei Port Auth., 20 FSM R. 13, 16-17 (Pon. 2015).

A "gross negligence" claim lodged against the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure that is predicated upon a purported failure to provide notice when it issued a new certificate of title, fails when, not only did the litigants have adequate notice, they took full advantage of an ability to be heard, as reflected in the numerous unsuccessful challenges that were mounted to the transfer of ownership, thereby contradicting this claim that notice was deficient. Setik v. Perman, 21 FSM R. 31, 39 (Pon. 2016).

Gross negligence is the intentional failure to perform a manifest duty in reckless disregard of the consequences as affecting another's life or property. Fuji Enterprises v. Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 362 (App. 2017).

For punitive damages to be awarded, there must be evidence of gross negligence. Fuji Enterprises v.

Jacob, 21 FSM R. 355, 363 n.8 (App. 2017).

– Negligence – Medical Malpractice

Any causative factors not within the exclusive control of the alleged negligent party render res ipsa loquitur doctrine inapplicable to an action for medical malpractice. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 534-35 (Pon. 1988).

Whether the relationship between U.S. National Health Service Corps doctors and the State of Pohnpei is such that the doctrine of respondeat superior may be applicable in an action for medical malpractice so that the state may be made to respond in damages for any negligence of the doctor has not been determined. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 536 (Pon. 1988).

The Compact of Free Association's immunization provisions, which limit a plaintiff's right to sue a physician for malpractice, do not affect a fundamental right, and therefore, the provisions need not be subjected to a strict scrutiny, but instead should be tested under the less stringent rational relationship test. Samuel v. Pryor, 5 FSM R. 91, 104 (Pon. 1991).

Medical malpractice by hospital staff does not relieve a tortfeasor of his responsibility for damages, because any injuries that might have been caused by the staff flowed naturally from his own acts. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 429 (Pon. 1996).

When, according to the complaint's allegations, the defendants' medical malpractice led to the deceased's death, and when, attached to the defendants' summary judgment motion is an affidavit of a medical doctor who is board certified in the field of family practice and the affidavit recites that the doctor has reviewed the medical records and that his opinion is that her diagnosed illness, tuberculosis of the spine, was so serious that in order to avoid paralysis, it would have been acceptable practice to administer the medications in question even if the deceased's treating doctors had been aware of her hepatitis history, the doctor's affidavit is relevant evidence based on an adequate foundation, that tends to show that the defendants did not violate the applicable standard of care. This evidence is of sufficient weight that left unopposed, no genuine issue of material fact exists under FSM Civil Rule 56, and the defendants are entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Since the plaintiffs have offered nothing to meet the evidence offered by the defendants, no genuine issues of material fact therefore exist, and the defendants are entitled to summary judgment in their favor. Joe v. Kosrae, 13 FSM R. 45, 47 (Kos. 2004).

Summary judgment will be denied in a medical malpractice action when genuine issues of material fact exist with regard to the arrangements for the patient's follow-up after she returned to Kosrae and with regard to whether she took her medicine as directed that preclude judgment as a matter of law. William v. Kosrae State Hospital, 13 FSM R. 307, 309 (Kos. 2005).

Medical malpractice is negligence in rendering professional medical services. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 580 (Kos. 2013).

Generally, one who undertakes to render professional service is under a duty to the person for whom the service is to be performed to exercise such care, skill, and diligence as someone in that profession ordinarily exercises under like circumstances. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 580-81 (Kos. 2013).

A doctor and the state hospital did not breach their duty to render professional medical services when they exercised such care, skill, and diligence as someone in that profession ordinarily exercises under like circumstances when they correctly diagnosed the patient's ailment, when they recommended her for off-island referral to an appropriate medical facility since they were unable to do the tests to confirm their diagnosis and since they were unable to offer all of the treatment options that might be needed, and when they offered her appropriate medical care as an in-patient until she could go to an off-island medical facility for her follow-up, but she refused admission. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

Since a patient may always refuse medical treatment, the Kosrae defendants cannot be said to have breached their duty of care and be held liable for the results of the patient's refusal to remain at Kosrae State Hospital for treatment until she could leave for an off-island medical facility. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581 (Kos. 2013).

The statute that provides that the state may not deny medical care available in the state to a person because of the inability to pay a fee and that makes no distinction in treatment or care because of inability to pay does not apply to off-island airfare because that is not a fee paid to the state government and is not a fee for medical services provided by the state and the off-island medical referral services are not medical care available in the state. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 581-82 (Kos. 2013).

– Negligence – Negligence per se

Violation of a statute creates a rebuttable presumption of negligence. Put another way, the unexcused violation of law which defines reasonable conduct is negligence in itself. Glocke v. Pohnpei, 8 FSM R. 60, 61 (Pon. 1997).

The FSM Supreme Court has never adopted the principle that the violation of a statute constitutes negligence per se giving rise to strict liability, but the court has held that negligence per se in the FSM means that the violation of a statute creates a rebuttable presumption of negligence. Even then, violations of statutory standards may form the basis of a claim of negligence per se only if the plaintiff is within the class of persons whom the statute was intended to protect and if the harm was of the type the enactment was intended to prevent. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 88, 95 (Yap 2013).

The statutory basis for a negligence per se claim need not provide for a private right of action. People of Eauripik ex rel. Sarongelfeg v. F/V Teraka No. 168, 19 FSM R. 88, 95 (Yap 2013).

– Negligence – Professional Malpractice

A claim that a design contractor used the wrong coordinate system for a road survey work seems more like, or as much a professional malpractice claim as a breach of contract claim. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 577 n.9 (Pon. 2011).

FSM law has previously recognized professional malpractice as a cause of action for the profession of medicine (medical malpractice) and for the profession of law (legal malpractice). FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 579 (Pon. 2011).

Adopting the common law standard for professional malpractice (or recognizing it beyond just the medical and legal professions) is desirable, needed, and appropriate, and would be appropriate even if the FSM had an extensive regulatory and licensing regime for professionals. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 579 (Pon. 2011).

Generally, one who undertakes to render professional service is under a duty to the person for whom the service is to be performed to exercise such care, skill, and diligence as men in that profession ordinarily exercise under like circumstances. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 579-80 (Pon. 2011).

U.S. common law decisions are an appropriate source of guidance for the FSM Supreme Court for contract and tort issues unresolved by statutes, decisions of FSM courts, or FSM custom and tradition and professional malpractice may implicate both contract and tort issues. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 n.13 (Pon. 2011).

The law imposes upon persons performing architectural, engineering, and other professional and skilled services the obligation to exercise a reasonable degree of care, skill and ability, which generally is taken and considered to be such a degree of care and skill as, under similar conditions and like surrounding circumstances, is ordinarily employed by their respective professions. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

Unless he represents that he has greater or less skill or knowledge, one who undertakes to render services in the practice of a profession or trade is required to exercise the skill and knowledge normally possessed by members of that profession or trade in good standing in similar communities. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

The circumstances to be considered in determining the standard of care, skill, and diligence to be required of a professional include the terms of the employment agreement, the nature of the problem which the supplier of the service represented himself as being competent to solve, and the effect reasonably to be anticipated from the proposed remedies. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

Although a professional's duty of care exists independent of and is not created by contract, a contract may furnish the conditions for that duty's fulfilment. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

Professional malpractice sounds in tort as a form of negligence. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

The reasonable care standards apply similarly to architects, engineers, doctors, lawyers, and like professionals engaged in furnishing skilled services for compensation and general negligence principles apply. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580 (Pon. 2011).

Ordinarily, a determination that the care, skill, and diligence exercised by a professional engaged in furnishing skilled services for compensation was less than that normally possessed and exercised by members of that profession in good standing and that the damage sustained resulted from the variance requires expert testimony to establish the prevailing standard and the consequences of departure from it in the case under consideration. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 580-81 (Pon. 2011).

Because the fact-finder is not permitted to speculate as to the standard against which to measure the acts of the professional in determining whether he exercised a reasonable degree of care, expert testimony is required. Only in a few very clear and palpable cases can a court dispense with the expert testimony requirement to establish the parameters of professional conduct and find damages to have been caused by a professional's failure to exercise reasonable care, skill, and diligence. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 581 (Pon. 2011).

Although the argument that acceptance of the 100% design and payment for it is waiver of any claims that the wastewater plant design was defective and that any alleged "defects" were not latent but were obvious and patent and known beforehand could prevail on a breach of contract claim, when this is a professional malpractice tort claim, the question is not whether the contractor breached the contract's terms but whether it violated its duty of reasonable care towards its client. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 581 (Pon. 2011).

When the court does not have before it evidence (and expert testimony would likely be needed) of what a design professional's duty entails when questions are raised about whether a proposal was over-designed or is unworkable under local conditions, the court will not speculate in that regard. The existence of these factual issues bars summary judgment on the professional malpractice allegation. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 581 (Pon. 2011).

When the court has nothing before it about what a design professional's duty is in relation to designing within a proposed budget, it will not speculate in that regard. Thus, whether the cost overruns in the design were such that they were the result of not exercising the reasonable care a professional in good standing would under similar conditions and like surrounding circumstances is a factual question barring summary judgment. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 582 (Pon. 2011).

When the parties' contract creates the deadlines, the tardy submission of reports, except in the most egregious cases, may be less professional malpractice than a contract breach, although even then the breach might not be material. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 582 n.16 (Pon. 2011).

Even when there is no FSM regulatory or statutory requirement that final design plans be stamped or that certain professionals stamp only certain plans, the court will not speculate about the standard against which to measure the civil engineer's acts in determining whether he acted properly in stamping electrical designs to indicate they were the final version rather than having an electrical engineer do it or indicating it in some other manner since evidence, most likely expert, must be produced about the standard professionals should be expected to follow in the FSM – in this case, not whether plans should be stamped by a professional but whether a civil engineer's stamp on electrical engineering plans is contrary to the degree of care a civil engineer should exercise. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 583 (Pon. 2011).

When, because the only evidence it produced was not competent, the nonmovant has not overcome the movant's admissible evidence that all the required plans were left behind and when the nonmovant gave the movant no opportunity to cure its omission, if in fact it had failed to leave every plan it should have, the movant is entitled to summary judgment on the claim that it committed malpractice by failing to leave its plans behind. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 583-84 (Pon. 2011).

When the movant asked in discovery for how it was to have committed malpractice and the nonmovant did not mention assuring that construction contractors produced shop drawings, the nonmovant is limited to what instances of malpractice it alleged and disclosed and cannot seek to introduce in its summary judgment opposition another instance based on different facts and theory of liability. The movant is therefore entitled to summary judgment on the claim that it committed malpractice by failing to see that the construction contractors produced the required shop drawings. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 17 FSM R. 555, 584 (Pon. 2011).

Generally, one who undertakes to render professional service is under a duty to the person for whom the service is to be performed to exercise such care, skill, and diligence as someone in that profession ordinarily exercises under like circumstances. William v. Kosrae State Hosp., 18 FSM R. 575, 580-81 (Kos. 2013).

– Negligent Misrepresentation

Negligent misrepresentation is established where the defendant made a false representation of fact which was either known by the defendant to be false or the defendant had an insufficient basis of information to make the factual representation; the representation is made with the intent to induce the plaintiff to act or refrain from acting, in reliance upon the misrepresentation; plaintiff has justifiably relied thereupon; and damage to plaintiff has resulted from such reliance. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 308 (Pon. 2004).

Summary judgment on a negligent misrepresentation claim will be granted when the uncontroverted and dispositive fact is that the defendants misled the plaintiff to believe that his rental fleet would be covered by the insurance policy if the vehicles were damaged while driven by renters, but the defendants failed to bind the type of coverage that was both requested and promised and when the defendants have not attempted to meet their burden of showing that there is a genuine issue of fact as to this claim. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 301, 308-09 (Pon. 2004).

A measure of damages for the tort of negligent misrepresentation (also called deceit) employs the benefit of the bargain rule when damages can be proved with reasonable certainty. Under this principle, the insurer would be entitled to its premium, which would be set off against what it owed its insured. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 469 (Pon. 2004).

Consequential damages, of which economic loss such as lost profits may be an example, are available for negligent misrepresentation (deceit) claims if reasonably foreseeable. Phillip v. Marianas Ins. Co., 12 FSM R. 464, 472 (Pon. 2004).

To claim promissory estoppel a party must prove that: 1) a promise was made; 2) the promisor should reasonably have expected the promise to induce actions of a definite and substantial character; 3) the promise did in fact induce such action; and 4) the circumstances require the enforcement of the promise to avoid injustice. Elements 3) and 4) are sometimes referred to collectively as "detrimental reliance." Misrepresentation, too, contains the elements of reasonable reliance and damages. Johnny v. Occidental Life Ins., 19 FSM R. 350, 358 (Pon. 2014).

It is clear that the plaintiff's claim for negligent misrepresentation must fail when the plaintiff cannot show that the defendant's representations were incorrect. Etse v. Pohnpei Mascot, Inc., 19 FSM R. 468, 478 (Pon. 2014).

The elements of negligent misrepresentation are: 1) false information is supplied as a result of the failure to exercise reasonable care or competence in communicating the information; 2) the person for whose benefit the information is supplied suffered the loss; and 3) the recipient relies upon the misrepresentation. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 430 (App. 2016).

For negligent misrepresentation, a plaintiff must establish: 1) negligence in making 2) a misrepresentation 3) that is material and 4) that causes detrimental reliance. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 430 (App. 2016).

The elements of negligent misrepresentation are: 1) justifiable and detrimental reliance on 2) information provided without reasonable care 3) by one who owed a duty of care. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 430 (App. 2016).

The essential elements of a claim for negligent misrepresentation are that plaintiffs justifiably relied to their detriment on information prepared without reasonable care by a person who owed the relying party a duty of care. Misrepresentation contains the elements of reasonable reliance and damages. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 430 (App. 2016).

When the plaintiff did not plead a negligent misrepresentation cause of action even though many of her factual allegations met all the tort's elements and when the evidence at trial proved that she was entitled to relief under that theory, the elements of which overlap those of the promissory estoppel and detrimental reliance theory that she pled and the trial court analyzed and granted her judgment on, the appellate court will affirm the trial court judgment on the ground that the plaintiff was entitled to relief for negligent misrepresentation because the record contained adequate and independent support that the plaintiff detrimentally relied on an agent's misrepresentation that her daughter was covered until age 25 "no matter what," and that that misrepresentation was material and made without reasonable care. Occidental Life Ins. Co. v. Johnny, 20 FSM R. 420, 430 (App. 2016).

Intentional misrepresentation, negligent misrepresentation, and promissory estoppel all contain elements of detrimental reliance. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178 n.11 (Pon. 2017).

A negligent misrepresentation claim's essential elements are that the plaintiff justifiably relied to his or her detriment on information prepared without reasonable care by a person who owed the relying party a duty of care. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 178-79 (Pon. 2017).

For a negligent misrepresentation claim: false information must be supplied as a result of the failure to exercise reasonable care or competence in communicating the information; the person for whose benefit the information is supplied suffered the loss; and the recipient relies upon the misrepresentation. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 179 (Pon. 2017).

An employer's alleged statement in 2008 that the worker's employment would last fifty years cannot reasonably be seen as a negligent statement inducing the employee's action in 2010 and 2011 to borrow home construction money from a bank. FSM Dev. Bank v. Gilmete, 21 FSM R. 159, 179 (Pon. 2017).

– Nuisance

Nuisance is generally regarded as a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land caused by intentional and unreasonable conduct, or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct, or the performance of an abnormally dangerous activity. A substantial interference is actual, material, physical discomfort, material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt, or significant harm, that affects the health, comfort, or property of those who live nearby. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

An intentional invasion of another's interest in the use and enjoyment of land is unreasonable if a) the gravity of the harm outweighs the utility of the actor's conduct, or b) the harm caused by the conduct is serious and the financial burden of compensating for it and similar harm to others would not force the defendant out of business. In determining the gravity of harm, a court will consider the extent and character of the harm, the social value and suitability to the community of the use and enjoyment involved, and the burden on the person harmed of avoiding the harm. In determining the utility of the conduct, a court will consider the social value and suitability to the community of the conduct, and the impracticability of preventing or avoiding the invasion. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

Nuisances are classified as either permanent, continuing, recurring or temporary in nature. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

A permanent nuisance is one which may be expected to continue indefinitely, and is generally caused by a single act that permanently affects the property's value. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

A temporary, recurring or continuing nuisance is one which is intermittent or periodic and can be abated, such as an ongoing or repeated disturbance caused by noise, vibration or a foul odor. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

Nuisances that affect the public at large are classified as public nuisances, while those that affect an individual or a small number of individuals are classified as private nuisances. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

Negligence is a separate tort from nuisance. Although negligence is one kind of conduct upon which liability for nuisance may be based, negligence is not a necessary ingredient for a nuisance. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

There is no liability for nuisance when the structural damage to the plaintiffs' house was caused by the plaintiffs' improper construction, poor maintenance and general deterioration and not by vibrations from the defendant's nearby blasting. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 539 (Pon. 1998).

Defendant created a permanent nuisance with its creation of a cliffline at the boundary of plaintiffs' property that has made plaintiffs' land susceptible to erosion over time, diminishing the value of plaintiffs' land. Defendant shall compensate plaintiffs for the diminished property value, and further undertake reasonable efforts to stabilize the cliffline to prevent future erosion. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 540 (Pon. 1998).

The first step in evaluating nuisance liability is to determine whether there has been substantial interference with plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of their land. The second step is to determine whether the harm caused by the defendant was intentional or unintentional. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 540 (Pon. 1998).

When harm is intentionally caused, liability attaches if the harm is unreasonable. Under the definition of nuisance, interference is unreasonable if the gravity of the harm outweighs the utility of the conduct, or the harm is serious and the financial burden of compensating for it and similar harm to others would not force the defendant out of business. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 540-41 (Pon. 1998).

If harm is unintentionally caused, nuisance liability will attach when it is the result of negligent or reckless conduct, or the result of an abnormally dangerous activity. If defendant's conduct was unintentional, the next step would be to evaluate whether the conduct was reasonable (i.e. negligence analysis), or the result of an abnormally dangerous activity. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 540-41 n.2 (Pon. 1998).

The focus of a negligence analysis is on the actor's conduct, while the focus of an intentional nuisance analysis is on the resulting interference. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 541 (Pon. 1998).

The logic behind an intentional nuisance analysis is that, regardless of whether a defendant acted with reasonable care, it is unfair (i.e. unreasonable) to allow the defendant to intentionally cause serious harm to a plaintiff without compensating the plaintiff. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 541 (Pon. 1998).

A defendant will not be required to abate its nuisance when it operates under permits granted by appropriate state agencies, its quarrying operation uses proper blasting methods, its quarry operation is necessary, and its quarrying activities have substantial public utility for the people in Pohnpei. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 541 (Pon. 1998).

Nuisance is generally regarded as a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land caused by intentional and unreasonable conduct, or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct, or by the performance of an abnormally dangerous activity. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 341-42 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The first step of the two-step analysis for nuisance requires that there be a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land. A substantial interference is actual, material, physical discomfort, material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt, or significant harm, that affects the health, comfort, or property of those who live nearby. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 342 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

The second step of the analysis for nuisance describes the actions of the potential liable party. The interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land must be caused by intentional and unreasonable conduct, or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct, or the performance of an abnormally dangerous activity. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 342 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

A party is not liable for nuisance when there is no evidence that the party intentionally caused the erosion damage, or that its actions were reckless, unreasonable, or abnormally dangerous and when it has already been shown that the party was not negligent. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 342 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr.

A claim that some private party has taken or deprived someone of their property is, if it was personal property that was allegedly taken, a claim for conversion or for trespass to chattels, and, if it was real property that was allegedly taken by some private party, it is a claim for trespass (including actions for ejectment) or possibly for nuisance (interference with use and enjoyment of land). They are not due process or takings claims. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

Nuisance is generally regarded as a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land caused by intentional and unreasonable conduct, or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct, or the performance of an abnormally dangerous conduct. A substantial interference is actual, material, physical discomfort, material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt, or significant harm, that affects the health, comfort, or property of those who live nearby. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 262a, 262h (Pon. 2002).

An intentional invasion of another's interest in property in the use and enjoyment of land is unreasonable if a) the gravity of the harm outweighs the utility of the actor's conduct, or b) the conduct is serious and the financial burden of compensating for it and similar harm to others would not force the defendant out of business. In determining the gravity of the harm, a court will consider the extent and character of the harm, the social value and suitability to the community of the use and enjoyment involved, and the burden on the person harmed of avoiding the harm. In determining the utility of the conduct, a court will consider the social value and suitability to the community of the conduct, and the impracticability of preventing or avoiding the invasion. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 262a, 262h (Pon. 2002).

If the actor's conduct is negligent, then to establish a nuisance it must be shown that the actor's negligent or reckless conduct caused a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 11 FSM R. 262a, 262h n.1 (Pon. 2002).

To prevail on a claim for nuisance, a party must show that another substantially interfered with the use and enjoyment of his land by intentional or unreasonable conduct. A substantial interference is actual, material, physical discomfort, material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt, or significant harm, that affects the health, comfort or property of those who live nearby. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 206, 214 (Pon. 2003).

A nuisance is an activity which arises from unreasonable or unlawful use by a person of his own property, and that disturbs another in possession of his property, or an offensive, unpleasant, or obnoxious thing or practice, especially a continuing or repeated invasion or disturbance of another's right. While it is undisputed that suicides and suicide attempts are events which disturb others, particularly family members and friends, and possibly a large number of persons in the community on a small island such as Kosrae, these events cannot be classified as public nuisances. Kosrae v. Nena, 13 FSM R. 63, 66-67 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2004).

Causes of action for public and private nuisance are recognized in admiralty law, borrowing from traditional common law principles. Admiralty courts look to general sources of the common law for guidance, such as the Restatement (Second) of Torts. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 416 (Yap 2006).

Nuisance law is frequently used to address liability in environmental contamination cases. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 416 (Yap 2006).

A nuisance is a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land resulting from intentional and unreasonable conduct, or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct, or the performance of an abnormally dangerous activity. A substantial interference is actual, material, physical discomfort, material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt, or significant harm, that affects the health, comfort, or property of those who live nearby. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 416 (Yap 2006).

A private nuisance is a non-possessory invasion of another's interest in the use and enjoyment of land. A public nuisance involves an unreasonable interference with a right common to the general public. A nuisance can be both a public and a private nuisance. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 416 (Yap 2006).

To obtain damages in a nuisance action, a person pursuing a private cause of action must have suffered significant harm. To maintain a damage action for public nuisance, a person must have suffered damage different in kind from that suffered by the general public. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 417 (Yap 2006).

When a vessel's grounding and subsequent oil spill was an unreasonable interference with the interests in the affected marine resources, resulting in significant damage, and resulted in physical injury to the reef and mangroves, and other features of the lagoon environment, a significant harm, and when the plaintiffs have suffered an injury special in kind from other Yap residents because of their traditional ownership and use interests in the particularly affected natural resources, the defendants are thus liable to plaintiffs on the theory of both public and private nuisance since the court considers the interest of the Yapese in exclusive use and exploitation of the submerged lands inside the fringing reef analogous to interests in dry land in other common law countries. People of Rull ex rel. Ruepong v. M/V Kyowa Violet, 14 FSM R. 403, 417 (Yap 2006).

Nuisance is a cause of action involving a substantial interference with one's use and enjoyment of one's land caused by another's intentional and unreasonable conduct, or another's unintentional negligent or reckless conduct, or another's performance of abnormally dangerous conduct. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 269 (Chk. 2009).

When the original complaint alleged that the defendants' negligence damaged the plaintiffs' property and interfered with their use and enjoyment of their dwelling, the defendants will not be prejudiced by an amended complaint including a nuisance theory of recovery. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 269 (Chk. 2009).

Nuisance is a cause of action involving a substantial interference with one's use and enjoyment of one's land caused by another's intentional and unreasonable conduct, or another's unintentional negligent or reckless conduct, or another's performance of abnormally dangerous conduct. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 123 (Chk. 2010).

The plaintiffs' nuisance claims fail when there was no evidence supporting a claim that the defendant's contractor's conduct was intentional and unreasonable; when road and drainage maintenance and clearing is not an inherently abnormally dangerous conduct; and when the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the defendant was negligent. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 123-24 (Chk. 2010).

FSM admiralty law recognizes a cause of action for nuisance. The Yapese interest in exclusive use and exploitation of their submerged lands on and within the fringing reef is analogous to interests in dry land. A nuisance is a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land (either dry or submerged in Yap) resulting from intentional and unreasonable conduct or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 176 (Yap 2012).

The owners were liable under a nuisance cause of action when its vessels substantially interfered with the plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of the affected reef both when the vessels were present and afterward because of the resulting damage. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 176 (Yap 2012).

When the nuisance damages are the same (or lesser portion of) those awarded for maritime negligence, no further damages will be awarded for the nuisance cause of action. People of Gilman ex rel. Tamagken v. Woodman Easternline Sdn. Bhd., 18 FSM R. 165, 176 (Yap 2012).

Defendants may be liable for nuisance regardless of whether they violated any environmental regulations and regardless of and without reference to any environmental regulations or laws. Violation of any such regulations might be used as evidence that a nuisance exists. A plaintiffs' nuisance cause of action is not and cannot be based on statutes or regulations when the complaint would state a common law cause of action for nuisance even if there were no environmental laws. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 108 (App. 2013).

National or state environmental laws and regulations are relevant to a nuisance claim only to the extent that failure to comply with those laws and regulations that apply to the defendants, may be evidence that the defendants' conduct is unreasonable, negligent, or reckless. However, reference to those laws is not necessary for the plaintiffs to prevail on a nuisance cause of action. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

Nuisances are classified as either permanent, continuing, recurring or temporary in nature – a permanent nuisance is one which may be expected to continue indefinitely, and is generally caused by a single act that permanently affects the property's value while a temporary, recurring or continuing nuisance is one which is intermittent or periodic and can be abated, such as an ongoing or repeated disturbance caused by noise, vibration, or a foul odor. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

Nuisances that affect the public at large are classified as public nuisances, while those that affect an individual or a small number of individuals are classified as private nuisances. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

Nuisance law is frequently used to address liability in environmental contamination cases. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

The first step in evaluating nuisance liability is to determine whether there has been substantial interference with plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of their land. The second step is to determine whether the harm caused by the defendant was intentional or unintentional. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109 (App. 2013).

When harm is intentionally caused, liability attaches if the harm is unreasonable. Under the definition of nuisance, interference is unreasonable if the gravity of the harm outweighs the utility of the conduct, or the harm is serious and the financial burden of compensating for it and similar harm to others would not force the defendant out of business. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 109-10 (App. 2013).

If harm is unintentionally caused, nuisance liability will attach when it is the result of negligent or reckless conduct, or the result of an abnormally dangerous activity. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 110 (App. 2013).

Once liability has attached (that is, if the nuisance claims are proven), the remedies that the plaintiffs can seek are money damages for past interference and, when it is a recurring or continuing nuisance, an abatement of the nuisance – an injunction ordering those causing the nuisance to cease certain activities. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 110 (App. 2013).

An evidentiary hearing must be conducted before the abatement of a nuisance or injunction can issue (or be denied). This evidentiary hearing may be consolidated with the trial on the merits if the trial is advanced, but one must be held on the application for an injunction. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 97, 110 (App. 2013).

When the plaintiffs failed to raise the issue of nuisance, or damages arising from nuisance, at trial, that count of the complaint is waived. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

A nuisance is generally regarded as a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land caused by intentional and unreasonable conduct, or caused unintentionally by negligent or reckless conduct, or the performance of an abnormally dangerous activity. A substantial interference is actual, material, physical discomfort, material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt, or significant harm that affects the health, comfort, or property of those who live nearby. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 530 (Pon. 2014).

The first step in evaluating nuisance liability is to determine whether there has been substantial interference with plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of their land and the second step is to determine if the harm caused by Defendants was intentional or unintentional. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 530 (Pon. 2014).

The defendants are not liable for nuisance caused by noisy members of the public when the defendants do not have the lawful right to exercise control over the revelers' behavior on the causeway, or to ask them to leave. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 530-31 (Pon. 2014).

If harm is unintentionally caused, nuisance liability will attach when it is the result of negligent or reckless conduct, or the result of an abnormally dangerous activity. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 531 (Pon. 2014).

The focus of a negligence analysis is on the defendants' conduct, while the focus of an intentional nuisance analysis would be on the resulting interference. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 531 (Pon. 2014).

Since the plaintiffs could not prove that the defendants' actions in maintaining huts and a small store on the causeway proximately caused the noise pollution affecting the plaintiffs and since the cost to the defendants of removing the huts would substantially outweigh the harm caused to the plaintiffs by the huts, nuisance liability has not attached against the defendants. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 532 (Pon. 2014).

Nuisances that affect the public at large are classified as public nuisances, while those that affect an individual or small number of individuals are classified as private nuisances. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 532 (Pon. 2014).

As a general rule, a public nuisance gives no right of action to an individual either for equitable relief, or for damages. A private plaintiff may bring an action for public nuisance only where he can show that he has sustained significant damage or injury which is different in type from the harm suffered by the community at large. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 532 (Pon. 2014).

When the disposal of human waste into the lagoon causes degradation to water quality that harms the community at large, the plaintiffs did not show that they were uniquely affected by this environmental degradation. Therefore the public nuisance cause of action against the defendants for constructing faulty toilet facilities lies with the governmental authorities, and not with the private plaintiffs. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 532 (Pon. 2014).

While negligent conduct can give rise to a nuisance claim when the conduct has caused substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's property that causes substantial harm, when the amount of damage and whether there was substantial harm are genuine issues of material fact, summary judgment will be denied. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 21 (Yap 2018).

Private nuisance is a tort that protects the interest of those who own or occupy land from conduct committed with the intention of interfering with a particular interest–the interest in use and enjoyment. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 156 (Chk. 2019).

The distinction between trespass and nuisance is that trespass is an invasion of the plaintiff's interest in the exclusive possession of her land, while nuisance is an interference with her use and enjoyment of it. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 156 (Chk. 2019).

If harm is unintentionally caused, nuisance liability will attach if it is the result of negligent or reckless conduct, or if it is the result of an abnormally dangerous activity. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 156 (Chk. 2019).

Often the situation involving a private nuisance is one where the invasion is intentional merely in the sense that the defendant has created or continued the condition causing the interference with full knowledge that the harm to the plaintiff's interest are occurring or are substantially certain to follow. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 157 (Chk. 2019).

A nuisance can be both a public and a private nuisance, but to maintain a damage action for public nuisance, a person must have suffered damage different in kind from that suffered by the general public. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 157 (Chk. 2019).

As a general rule, a public nuisance gives no right of action to an individual either for equitable relief, or for damages, and a private plaintiff may bring an action for public nuisance only if she can show that she has sustained significant damage or injury that is different in type from the harm suffered by the community at large. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 157 (Chk. 2019).

Nuisance as a substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of another's land. Nuisance occurs if the substantial interference with the enjoyment of one's land arises from intentional (or negligent) unreasonable conduct, or the performance of an abnormally dangerous activity. "Substantial interference" is an actual, material, physical discomfort, material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt, or significant harm, that affects the health, comfort, or property of those who live nearby. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 422 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

A public utility did not create a nuisance when it installed primary electric poles and replaced pipes because neither qualify as unreasonable conduct nor an abnormally dangerous activity. Public utilities often engage in the installation and replacement of utilities to provide the entire community with a higher standard of living. Neither create any realistic danger to the landowner or surrounding landowners and they provide benefits to the community. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423-24 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

A nuisance cause of action may arise when a defendant has been negligent and that negligence has substantially interfered with the plaintiff's use and enjoyment of his property. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

Diminution of a property's value is not the sole measure of nuisance damages. Special damages may also be awarded for nuisance. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When the nuisance, or the injury arising from it, is not permanent and has been or can be abated, the plaintiff usually recovers the depreciation in the rental or use value of his or her property during the period in which the nuisance exists, plus any special damages, but rental and use value are not necessarily the same thing, and a plaintiff who actually occupies the premises may recover the "use value," or special value to him or her. Discomfort or inconvenience in the use of the property is, of course, relevant to both establish special damage and as evidence bearing on the loss of rental or use value. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v.

Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

In a nuisance case, the land occupant may recover special damages in addition to the depreciation in market or use value. This commonly includes damages for personal discomfort or illness resulting from the nuisance, and the plaintiff may also recover the reasonable cost of his or her own efforts to abate the nuisance or prevent future injury. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 622 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Product Liability

A plaintiff who establishes the existence of risk factors which may have caused the injury, must show that these risk factors did in fact cause the injury. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2001).

It is enough that the plaintiff introduce evidence from which reasonable men may conclude that it is more probable that the event was caused by the defendant than that it was not. Stated another way, it does not require that the proof eliminate every possible cause other than the one on which plaintiff relies, but only such other causes, if any, which fairly arise from the evidence. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2001).

When no product defect is found, causes of action based on strict product liability and on breach of warranty fail and res ipsa loquitur is not applicable. Lebehn v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 348, 353 (Pon. 2001).

On a design defect products liability claim, evidence of other accidents is admissible to show a dangerous condition so long as the proponent makes a foundational showing that the prior accidents occurred under substantially the same circumstances. Further, evidence proffered to illustrate the existence of a dangerous condition necessitates a high degree of similarity because it weighs directly on the ultimate issue to be decided by the finder of fact. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583 (Pon. 2002).

When the alleged defect in the kerosene resulted from the contamination of the product, and not its design, logic dictates that the plaintiff must show a high degree of similarity between the accident in this case and the accidents in the other cases before the other accidents will be admitted on the question of the dangerous condition of the allegedly contaminated product. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583 (Pon. 2002).

When the instant case is similar to the other accidents to the extent that the alleged defect is the same, i.e., contaminated kerosene, but the manner in which the other accidents occurred is quite different, the other accidents are not sufficiently similar to be admissible on the question of dangerousness. Suldan v. Mobil Oil Micronesia, Inc., 10 FSM R. 574, 583 (Pon. 2002).

– Respondeat Superior

Under the common law there are only two reasons for distinguishing between agents of a principal who are "servants" or "employees" of the principal and agents who are independent contractors. The most common is to determine the possible liability of the principal for torts of the agent within the scope of employment. The second purpose is to determine the obligations, rights and immunities between the principal and the agent. The earlier common law rules making distinctions for this purpose have for the most part been supplanted by social legislation such as workers' compensation, minimum wage, fair labor standards, social security and income tax laws. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 15 (Pon. 1985).

The emphasis in governmental tort liability cases has been on the special status of government, its functions and its officials rather than on the degree of control tests commonly employed in nongovernmental cases. Even those commentators who specifically note that the respondeat superior doctrine applies to the government analyze governmental liability issues in terms of public policy considerations rather than through a degree of control analysis which distinguishes between closely supervised and high-ranking officials. Rauzi v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 8, 16 (Pon. 1985).

A corporation and its shareholders are liable for the wrongful act of their employees under the doctrine of respondeat superior. Koike v. Ponape Rock Products, Inc., 3 FSM R. 57, 70 (Pon. S. Ct. Tr. 1986).

Whether the relationship between U.S. National Health Service Corps doctors and the State of Pohnpei is such that the doctrine of respondeat superior may be applicable in an action for medical malpractice so that the state may be made to respond in damages for any negligence of the doctor has not been determined. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 536 (Pon. 1988).

An employer may be liable for the negligent acts of employees, but not for acts committed outside the scope of employment. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 126 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

An employer generally may not be held liable for punitive damages for the tortious acts of its employees. However, an employer may be held liable for punitive damages if 1) the employer authorized the act, 2) the employer knew the employee was unfit for the position at the time of the hiring, or 3) the employer ratified the tortious act of the employee. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 146 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

When force is employed by a police officer in an apparent use of official authority, the governmental employer should be held responsible for what is done. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 201 (Pon. 1991).

A state's ratification and acceptance of its employee's torts through its subsequent conduct is an independent ground for holding the state jointly and severally liable for those torts. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 202-03 (Pon. 1991).

The doctrine of respondeat superior is not to be used to determine whether a governmental entity is liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) for civil rights violations inflicted by government employees. The government entity may be held liable under 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3) when violations are caused by officials who are responsible for final policy making with respect to the of action chosen from various alternatives. Plais v. Panuelo, 5 FSM R. 179, 205-06 (Pon. 1991).

The individuals owning an unincorporated business are liable under the respondeat superior principle for the tortious injuries caused by their employee who was acting on behalf of the business and within the scope of his employent. Ludwig v. Mailo, 5 FSM R. 256, 259 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

Since the plaintiffs could have discovered the defendant's true ownership interest in the liable employer, it would place an undue burden on a minority interest owner in an unincorporated business to impose liability on him in excess of his ownership interest. Ludwig v. Mailo, 5 FSM R. 256, 260 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1992).

The state, not the chief of police, is vicariously liable under the doctrine of respondeat superior for the torts of its police officers committed in the course and scope of their employment when force is employed in the use of even apparent official authority. Davis v. Kutta, 7 FSM R. 536, 545-46 (Chk. 1996).

Although a town government is not automatically liable for all the torts of its agents and employees, it is liable for those torts committed in the course and scope of employment under the doctrine of respondeat superior. When force is employed by police officers in use of even apparent official authority, the government employer should be held responsible for whatever results. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 192 (Pon. 1997).

A fishing association is not liable under a general theory of agency when the complaint does not make a general agency allegation, and instead asserts liability based on an agreement's language, and nothing in the agreement renders the other defendants the agents of the fishing association such that the association is liable under the respondeat superior doctrine for the damages flowing from a vessel's alleged negligent operation. Dai Wang Sheng v. Japan Far Seas Purse Seine Fishing Ass'n, 10 FSM R. 112, 115 (Kos. 2001).

The doctrine of respondeat superior may be applied to impose liability upon a state for the negligent torts of its employees. The theory may also be applied to intentional torts when committed by a police officer or other official in an apparent use of official authority. In other words, a state may only be held liable for torts committed in the scope of employment. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 204 (Pon. 2006).

Generally, the question of whether a police officer acted within the scope of employment is a question of fact, rather than a legal question, although, if the facts are undisputed and can support only one conclusion, the inquiry becomes legal. Thus to survive a defendant's motion to dismiss, it is enough that the plaintiff has alleged assault and battery by a government employee cloaked with the authority of the state. Annes v. Primo, 14 FSM R. 196, 204 & n.3 (Pon. 2006).

When confronted with a situation where a principal may be held vicariously liable for its agent's acts, a plaintiff, at the plaintiff's option, may sue either the principal, the agent, or both. Thus, an agent is not an indispensable or necessary party to a vicarious liability claim against the principal. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 268 (Chk. 2009).

Since an agent is not an indispensable party to a vicarious liability claim against the principal, the principal would not be prejudiced if leave were granted to amend the complaint against it to include a vicarious liability claim against it for an agent's acts even if the plaintiffs do not also sue the agent. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 268 (Chk. 2009).

An employee is herself jointly and severally liable with her employers for the checks she converted by cashing them while she was their employee because, under the doctrine of respondeat superior, an agent's act within the scope of his or her agency is the act of the principal, and the result is that both the principal and the agent are jointly and severally liable to the person injured by the wrongful act. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 438 (Pon. 2009).

Both principal and agent are jointly and severally liable for the torts that the agent commits in the course and scope of the work performed for the principal. Individual Assurance Co. v. Iriarte, 16 FSM R. 423, 446 (Pon. 2009).

Vicarious liability is not a cause of action but a means by which a defendant is held liable for the act of another, such as a principal being held liable for the torts or contracts of its agent. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 48 (Chk. 2010).

An agent who employs a subagent is the latter's principal and is responsible both to third persons and to his principal for the subagent's derelictions. Thus the agent is subject to liability to the principal for harm to the principal's property or business caused by the subagent's negligence or other wrong to the principal's interests. Iriarte v. Individual Assurance Co., 18 FSM R. 340, 355 (App. 2012).

Since supervisory liability requires proof of the underlying liability of the officers being supervised, when the officers on the scene cannot be held liable because they did not breach any duty owed to the decedent and because they were not the proximate cause of his death, the Director of Public Safety (and Chuuk as respondeat superior) cannot be held liable either. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

Vicarious liability is not a cause of action but a means by which a defendant is held liable for the act of another, such as a principal being held liable for the torts or contracts of its agent. Respondeat superior is just the same doctrine holding an employer or a principal liable for the employee's or agent's wrongful acts. Neither term describes a cause of action. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 570 (Kos. 2014).

When two of the corporation's officials remain as defendants, the plaintiff's claim of respondeat superior or vicarious liability will not be dismissed since the corporation is still potentially vicariously liable for any liability they might have. George v. Palsis, 19 FSM R. 558, 571 (Kos. 2014).

– Strict Liability

Any liability of the state for suffering or death caused by defective health care provided by the state must be based upon theories of negligence, not strict liability. Amor v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 519, 534 (Pon. 1988).

Strict liability arises where the activity performed is not merely dangerous, but abnormally dangerous. One who carries on an abnormally dangerous activity is subject to liability for harm to the person, land or chattels of another resulting from the activity, although he has exercised the utmost care to prevent the harm. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 535 (Pon. 1998).

Strict liability is limited to the kind of harm, the possibility of which makes the activity abnormally dangerous. In determining whether an activity is abnormally dangerous, the following factors are to be considered: a) the existence of a high degree of some harm to the person, land or chattels of others; b) the likelihood that the harm that results from it will be great; c) the inability to eliminate the risk by the exercise of reasonable care; d) the extent to which the activity is not a matter of common usage; e) the inappropriateness of the activity to the place where it is carried on; and f) the extent to which its value to the community is outweighed by its dangerous attributes. Whether the activity is an abnormally dangerous one is to be determined by the court. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 535 (Pon. 1998).

A strict liability claim will be rejected when the defendant's blasting was not performed in an abnormally dangerous manner. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 541 (Pon. 1998).

Strict liability arises where the activity performed is not merely dangerous, but abnormally dangerous, so that one who carries on an abnormally dangerous activity is subject to liability for harm to the person, land or chattels of another resulting from the activity, although he has exercised the utmost care to prevent the harm. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 269 (Chk. 2009).

When there is nothing inherently abnormally dangerous about road drainage systems, a proposed amendment to add a strict liability claim for damages from a road drainage system would be denied as futile since it would not be able to withstand a summary judgment motion. Nakamura v. Mori, 16 FSM R. 262, 269 (Chk. 2009).

– Trespass

Entering private land is at least technically a trespass, absent express or implied consent to the visit. FSM v. Mark, 1 FSM R. 284, 290 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Constitution terminated all existing indefinite term land use agreements five years after the effective date of the Constitution. After that date, without a new lease agreement the occupier becomes a trespasser on the land. Billimon v. Chuuk, 5 FSM R. 130, 132 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Utility poles do not constitute trespass on land when the owner consented to their placement, accepted compensation for crop damage, and signed an agreement which effectively granted an easement for placement of utility poles. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 155-56 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

Encroachment of a road on adjacent parcels is a trespass when the state has not used the property without interruption for the statutory period, nor for a period of time that would make the assertion of plaintiff's rights unfair. Palik v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 147, 156 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

When a landowner voluntarily enters into a statement of intent to grant the state an easement the state has not violated the landowner's constitutional rights by "taking" his property without just compensation, and is not liable for trespass. Nena v. Kosrae, 5 FSM R. 417, 425 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1990).

A leasehold interest in land is a sufficient possessory interest to give a party standing to maintain an action for trespass. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 154 (Pon. 1993).

To prevail in an action for trespass, a plaintiff must prove a wrongful interference with his possessory interest in the property. Damages naturally resulting from the trespass alleged may be proved without being specially pleaded. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 155 (Pon. 1993).

When plaintiff leaseholders present a written lease agreement and the certificates of title issued to the lessor and the defendants admit to occupying the land in question, the leaseholders have made a prima facie case for trespass. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 155-56 (Pon. 1993).

Where the alleged trespassers did not claim to have an interest in the land at the time of the determination of ownership they cannot now raise as a defense a claim that the land in question is public land when that issue was decided in the determination of ownership process and certificates of title issued. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 156-57 (Pon. 1993).

Private individuals lack standing to assert claims on behalf of the public. When the state government has certified ownership of land, and the traditional leaders' suit to have land declared public land failed, private individuals cannot raise the same claim. In re Parcel No. 046-A-01, 6 FSM R. 149, 157 (Pon. 1993).

Noncitizen plaintiffs have standing to sue for trespass if they have a leasehold interest in the land. Ponape Enterprises Co. v. Soumwei, 6 FSM R. 341, 343 (Pon. 1994).

It is unnecessary to have a fee simple title to land in order to bring an action for trespass. All that is needed is a possessory interest. A trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title. Ponape Enterprises Co. v. Soumwei, 6 FSM R. 341, 343 (Pon. 1994).

In a trespass case the judgment is for physical possession of the land and the standard is based on who has better right of possession not who has the better title. Ponape Enterprises Co. v. Soumwei, 6 FSM R. 341, 345 (Pon. 1994).

A court need not decide whether a party who is being sued for trespass, and who does not claim ownership, may raise as an affirmative defense a challenge to the validity of a plaintiff's Certificate of Title issued under the Torrens land registration system when the issues raised by the defendant are insufficient to challenge the Certificate of Title. Luzama v. Ponape Enterprises Co., 7 FSM R. 40, 51-52 (App. 1995).

A trespass cause of action accrues when there is an intrusion upon the land of another which invades the possessor's interest in the exclusive possession of his land. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 177 (Pon. 1995).

Substantial, open and notorious occupation of land is constructive notice of occupant's claim and puts all persons on inquiry as to the nature of occupant's claim, and whoever willfully avoids learning of such trespass will be charged with constructive notice. Nahnken of Nett v. Pohnpei, 7 FSM R. 171, 177-78 (Pon. 1995).

To maintain a trespass action, a plaintiff must prove that at the time of the alleged trespass he had either actual possession or the right to immediate possession. Sana v. Chuuk, 7 FSM R. 252, 254 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Where a defendant has trespassed on a plaintiff's land by constructing improvements thereon the measure of damages due the plaintiff is an amount equal to the fair market rental value of the land in the place located over the period of use, and also an amount for any damage to trees or food plants during the defendant's use of the property and for any conditions caused by the defendant's trespass and use such as the construction of a garbage dump. Ikanur v. Director of Educ., 7 FSM R. 275, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

In a trespass case, a defendant who made improvements to the plaintiff's property is entitled to offset the value of the improvements against damages caused to the plaintiff's property during the trespass, but all improvements made by the defendant on land without the plaintiff's permission become the plaintiff's property and the defendant has no right to any further use of the improvements without the plaintiff's permission. Ikanur v. Director of Educ., 7 FSM R. 275, 277 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

The common law "incomplete privilege" of one to enter onto the land of another in times of private necessity is essentially codified by 19 F.S.M.C. 805(3), which states that "no person, including the owner or occupier of land may hinder or impede a rescuer." But it cannot have been the intent of 19 F.S.M.C. 805(3) to prevent law enforcement officials from carrying out their official duties in the face of an emergency rescue situation. Pohnpei v. M/V Miyo Maru No. 11, 8 FSM R. 281, 292 (Pon. 1998).

The court's role in a civil trespass case is to determine which party has the greater possessory right to disputed property. In a criminal trespass case, in contrast, the court must determine whether the prosecution has established each element of the crime of trespass beyond a reasonable doubt. Nelson v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 397, 403 (App. 1998).

When title to land in a designated registration area becomes an issue in a case involving damage claims for trespass, and there is no pending case before the land commission concerning this land or a previous final determination of ownership, a court may remand the question of ownership to the land commission to be determined within a limited time. Once ownership is determined, the court may proceed because more than an interest in land is at stake, and the land commission can only adjudicate interests in land. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 527 (Chk. 1998).

An action for trespass has been broadly defined in the FSM as a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in property. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 533 (Pon. 1998).

One is subject to liability to another for trespass, irrespective of whether he causes harm to any legally protected interest of the other, if he 1) intentionally and without consent enters land in the possession of the other, or causes a thing or person to do so, or 2) intentionally and without consent remains on the land of the other, or 3) intentionally fails to remove from the land a thing which he is under a duty to remove. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 533-34 (Pon. 1998).

When the intrusion is the result of reckless or negligent conduct, or the result of an abnormally dangerous activity, trespass liability attaches only where harm is caused to the land, to the possessor, or to a thing or a third person in whose security the possessor has a legally protected interest. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 534 (Pon. 1998).

There is no liability for trespass when the construction and use of a turnaround area did not exceed that contemplated by the parties in a valid lease agreement. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 539 (Pon. 1998).

When the parties did not reach a full understanding of what would be provided in exchange for the right to build an access road across the plaintiffs' land, but the defendant did agree to compensate the plaintiffs in some way, and when the defendant represented to the plaintiffs that the access road, once constructed, would be usable by the plaintiffs' vehicle, the defendant is liable to make the road passable by car or truck. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 539-40 (Pon. 1998).

Defendant committed a trespass when it caused two to three inches of soil to deposit on plaintiffs' land in an area approximately 12 by 14 feet. Defendant is liable to plaintiffs for the cost to return this area of plaintiffs' land to its original condition. Nelper v. Akinaga, Pangelinan & Saita Co., 8 FSM R. 528, 540 (Pon. 1998).

Actions for trespass shall be commenced within six years after the cause of action accrues. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 558 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

For trespass the period of limitation begins to run when the project causing the damage is completed, if substantial damage has already occurred, or when the first substantial injury is sustained. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 559 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

The cause of action arises, and the general statute of limitations begins to run on tort actions for injury to property at the time the injury is sustained. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 559 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

When the plaintiff claims the state trespassed on her property by installing poles, a road and pipes sometime before the end of 1987 but did not file suit until 1994, recovery will be barred by the six year statute of limitations. Sipia v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 557, 559-60 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

In the case of a continuing trespass the statute of limitation does not begin to run from the date of the original entry, but recovery may be had for a period of time not exceeding the statutory period immediately preceding the institution of the action. David v. Bossy, 9 FSM R. 224, 226 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Where the act of a wrongdoer involves a course of action which is a direct invasion of the rights of another, such conduct is regarded as a trespass of a continuing character. David v. Bossy, 9 FSM R. 224, 226 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

A possessory interest in a land parcel gives standing to maintain an action for trespass and other torts. It is unnecessary to have a fee simple title to the land in order to bring an action for trespass. All that is needed is a possessory interest. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 332, 334 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When a plaintiff has been granted the right to utilize the land through land use agreements he holds a sufficient possessory interest to give him standing to maintain an action for trespass. It is unnecessary to have a fee simple title to land in order to bring an action for trespass. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 343 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

An action for trespass has been broadly defined in the FSM as a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in property. A trespass cause of action accrues when there is an intrusion upon another's land which invades the possessor's interest in the exclusive possession of his land. To prevail in an action for trespass, a plaintiff must prove a wrongful interference with his possessory interest in the property. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 343 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When the state did not intentionally cause the black rocks to appear on the plaintiff's land, it did not intentionally cause a trespass to plaintiff's land, and when the state was not negligent or reckless in constructing the seawall and constructing the seawall was not an abnormally dangerous activity, no trespass liability attaches to, and the state is not liable to, the plaintiff for trespass. Jonah v. Kosrae, 9 FSM R. 335, 343 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Although under a common law ejectment theory one is privileged to exercise reasonable force to prevent an intrusion onto his property, provided that he has first requested the intruder to leave the premises, or where circumstances are such that such a request is unnecessary, such a theory would have no application to a case when he said nothing before he started hitting another's car, and the evidence was inconclusive as to whether the driveway was private property from which he would have been entitled to eject intruders. Elymore v. Walter, 9 FSM R. 450, 456 n.1 (Pon. 2000).

When a trespass action is not an action to set boundaries or to determine the ownership of any particular property and when the defendant never directly asserts an ownership interest in the land on which he allegedly trespasses, but rather asserts the rights of third parties, who (and any claims they may have) are not currently before the court, it is not an "action with regard to interests in land" within the meaning of 67 TTC 105 requiring a showing of special cause why action by a court is desirable before it is likely the Land Commission can make a determination on the matter. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 180 (Pon. 2001).

To prevail in an action for trespass, a plaintiff must prove a wrongful interference with his possessory interest in the property. The plaintiff must prove his possession of the property, the time and location of the trespass, and the act of trespass. A cause of action for trespass accrues when there is an intrusion upon the land of another which invades the possessor's interest in the exclusive possession of his land. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 183 (Pon. 2001).

A possessor without a claim of right in real property may maintain trespass against anyone who unlawfully disturbs his possession except against the lawful owner or someone claiming under him. The defendant in such a trespass action may not set up in defense the title of a third person with whom there is no privity or connection. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 185 (Pon. 2001).

A defense to a trespass action that someone other than the plaintiff owned the land would only be material if the defendant alleged that that someone authorized him to use the land. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 185 (Pon. 2001).

When a defendant produces only incompetent evidence, regarding other people and other tracts of land, wholly unrelated to the land on which he is allegedly trespassing, and when the speculative and conflicting statements contained in his pleadings are insufficient to create a material fact as to his right to possess any part of the land, there are no material issues of fact and the plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment on its trespass claim. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 186 (Pon. 2001).

A trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title. A trespass case is brought to re-establish possession, not to determine ownership or quiet title. A trespass case is a judgment for physical possession of the land and should be based on the standard of who has the superior right of possession, not who has the better title. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 187 (Pon. 2001).

A trespass defendant's bald assertions of third party ownership does nothing to diminish a plaintiff's superior right to possession of the land as to him and is immaterial to the issue of which party to the trespass action has the superior right of possession. A plaintiff's summary judgment motion will therefore be granted as to this affirmative defense. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 187-88 (Pon. 2001).

Because a trespass claim has either a twenty-year or a six-year statute of limitations, the statute of limitations on a trespass starting November, 1999 will not run for many years. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 188 (Pon. 2001).

When a plaintiff has acted expeditiously to notify a defendant of his trespass as soon as the defendant began construction on the land, there has been no unreasonable delay prejudicing the defendant which could give rise to a laches defense. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 188 (Pon.

2001).

A defendant's summary judgment motion based on assertions of the validity of a third party's potential claim is insufficient as a matter of law to establish a triable issue of fact as to the plaintiff's superior right of possession. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 188 (Pon. 2001).

The absence of a certificate of title does not affect a trespass case when the plaintiff holds the land under a color of title which is superior to the defendant's claimed right of possession. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 188 (Pon. 2001).

When a plaintiff has proven actual possession of part of the land, it operates as possession of the whole of the land covered by the quitclaim deeds. To require all landowners to construct buildings and fences on the entirety of their property in order to protect it from trespassers and interlopers is simply not practical. College of Micronesia-FSM v. Rosario, 10 FSM R. 175, 188 (Pon. 2001).

A noncitizen plaintiff who does not have title to the land may sue for trespass if he has a possessory interest. Marcus v. Truk Trading Corp., 10 FSM R. 387, 390 (Chk. 2001).

An action for trespass is for a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in property. The court's role in a civil trespass is to determine which party has the greater possessory right to disputed property. A trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title. Shrew v. Killin, 10 FSM R. 672, 674 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A plaintiff with a certificate of title for a parcel clearly has greater possessory interest to the disputed property so that a defendant is liable for trespass on the plaintiff's parcel when he has entered, cleared and planted crops inside the established boundaries of the plaintiff's parcel without the plaintiff's consent. Shrew v. Killin, 10 FSM R. 672, 674 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title. It is therefore not a proper proceeding for the defendant to challenge title and allege due process violations in the proceedings that determined the plaintiff's title to the parcel. The defendant may challenge the title through separate proceedings as appropriate. Shrew v. Killin, 10 FSM R. 672, 674-75 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

One is subject to liability to another for trespass, irrespective of whether he causes harm to any legally protected interest of the other if he 1) intentionally and without consent enters land in the other's possession, or causes a thing or person to do so, or 2) intentionally and without consent remains on the other's land, or 3) intentionally fails to remove from the land a thing which he is under a duty to remove. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 99-100 (Pon. 2002).

The plaintiffs have made a prima facie case for a trespass cause of action when they have established that they own the land pursuant to certificates of title and that the defendants are on the property without their consent, but in order to determine whether the plaintiffs should be granted summary judgment, the court needs to consider the defendants' arguments in opposition to the plaintiffs' motion, and if the defendants' arguments fail to establish a genuine issue of material fact exists, then it is appropriate for the court to enter summary judgment. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 100 (Pon. 2002).

When, even if a lease were deemed null and void or that the plaintiffs lacked the authority to enter into the agreement, the defendants have still failed to show that the plaintiffs do not own the property or to offer any evidence supporting their claim that they have a right to possession of the property. It would not prevent the plaintiffs from prevailing in their trespass action. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. Gilmete, 11 FSM R. 94, 102 (Pon. 2002).

In a claim for damages to land, such as trespass, all the co-owners of the affected land are indispensable parties to the action and must be joined if they are not already parties; otherwise the defendant faces a substantial risk that it may be subject to multiple or inconsistent judgments if any of the other persons who claim to be co-owners decide to sue. Ifenuk v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 11 FSM R. 201, 203-04 (Chk. 2002).

A claim that some private party has taken or deprived someone of their property is, if it was personal property that was allegedly taken, a claim for conversion or for trespass to chattels, and, if it was real property that was allegedly taken by some private party, it is a claim for trespass (including actions for ejectment) or possibly for nuisance (interference with use and enjoyment of land). They are not due process or takings claims. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

A cause of action that alleges that the plaintiffs' customary and traditional rights to use an island might be better described as intentional interference with a customary and traditional property right than trespass. That the plaintiffs referred to it as a trespass should not, in itself, be an obstacle to them prevailing on this point if the evidence warrants, because except for judgments rendered by default, every final judgment shall grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in his pleadings. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 217 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

When it is clear that regardless of the probability of appellant's success on appeal, he cannot demonstrate any right to possession of the property at the current time greater than that of the appellee, and when regardless of any stay of execution and of the offering of any supersedeas bond adequate to obtain the court's approval, the appellee is currently entitled to possession of her property pending the appeal's outcome and the appellant is not and must vacate the premises at the earliest possible moment. Konman v. Esa, 11 FSM R. 291, 297 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

As between a bare occupier of land and one holding under a deed, the deed holder has the greater right to possession. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 359 (App. 2003).

Who had, or has, title to the property was never at issue in a trespass action in which no counterclaim was brought to quiet title to the disputed land. Our law is clear that in an action for trespass, the judgment is for right of possession; in such a case, the issue is who has the superior right to possession, not who has title. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 359 (App. 2003).

The trial court did not err when it found that one party's right to possess the land was superior to another's because it had color of title, through a quitclaim deed, to the property. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 359 (App. 2003).

When the record is devoid of evidence that a non-party opposes or has ever challenged ownership of the disputed land, it does not bear on the question of who, as between the parties, has the greater right to possession of the disputed land. Nor are whether, relative to the disputed property, a public hearing was held or a certificate of title issued, or alleged defects in the quitclaim deed by which the plaintiff took its interest germane because these are title questions that do not relate to the issue in a trespass action, which is one of right of possession. These types of claims are insufficient as a matter of law to establish triable issues of fact as to the superior right of possession between the parties. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 359-60 (App. 2003).

When the action was not one to set boundaries or to determine the ownership of any particular property, the case was not an "action with regard to interests in land" within the meaning of 67 TTC 105 because the defendant never asserted an ownership interest on his own behalf in the land, but rather asserted the alleged rights of third parties who were not before the court. Thus the trial court, when it determined who had the greater possessory right to the disputed property, did not err when it did not refer the matter to the Pohnpei Court of Land Tenure. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 360 (App. 2003).

It is not practical to require all landowners to construct buildings or build fences on the entirety of their property in order to protect it from trespassers. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 360 (App. 2003).

When the College presented competent evidence that the land to which a deed refers is located miles from the disputed property and when Rosario produced only incompetent evidence regarding other people and other tracts of land that was wholly unrelated to land at issue, the trial court correctly concluded that Rosario's evidence relating to his claim of a possessory interest was insufficient to create a genuine issue of material fact as to his right to possess any part of the land. Thus, as between the parties, the College has the greater right of possession. Rosario v. College of Micronesia-FSM, 11 FSM R. 355, 360-61 (App. 2003).

A trespass case will be dismissed for failure to join the land's co-owners as indispensable parties plaintiff because any judgment in a rendered in the co-owners' absence will be prejudicial to the defendant since any of the other co-owners could sue for the same trespass, thus subjecting the defendant to multiple judgments for the same acts; because even a judgment in the defendant's favor would not prevent another co-owner from suing for the same acts; because there are no protective provisions that could be included in a judgment that would lessen the prejudice; and because the plaintiff has an adequate remedy since the dismissal is without prejudice – he may refile the case with the co-owners included. Ifenuk v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 11 FSM R. 403, 405 (Chk. 2003).

A court can determine no more than who among the parties before it has a better claim to title (or in the case of trespass – possession). A court usually cannot determine who has title good against the world. Land registration (determination of title presumptively good against the world) is the province of the Land Commission and its procedures. Enlet v. Bruton, 12 FSM R. 187, 191 (Chk. 2003).

To prevail in an action for trespass, a party must prove a wrongful interference with his possessory interest in the property. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2003).

When a party has a valid possessory interest in the property and has shown that another has interfered with his possessory interest, he has proved that the other has trespassed on property to which he has a superior right of possession and he is thus entitled to summary judgment against the other on his claims for trespass. Ambros & Co. v. Board of Trustees, 12 FSM R. 206, 213 (Pon. 2003).

Trespass actions determine who has a better right to possession of the land. Kiniol v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 335, 336 (Chk. 2004).

When title to land in a designated registration area becomes an issue in a case involving damage claims for trespass, a court may remand the question of ownership to the land commission to be determined within a limited time. Once the land commission has determined ownership, the court may proceed because more than an interest in land is at stake, and the land commission can only adjudicate interests in land. Kiniol v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 335, 336 (Chk. 2004).

When the issue of the location of the boundary between the plaintiffs' land and the defendant's land is remanded to the Chuuk Land Commission, the owner of the tower on the land with the defendant's permission is not a party to the remanded Land Commission proceedings as that proceeding only concerns title, not trespass to or possession of, land. But it remains a party to the trespass action in court. Kiniol v. Kansou, 12 FSM R. 335, 337 (Chk. 2004).

When the bank's real property mortgage has never been enforced because receivership was the chosen remedy; when no agent of the bank is alleged to have entered or to have quarried the property the plaintiff contends is his; when the receivership was not the bank's agent over which it had control, direction, or authority; when the execution of a mortgage, even an invalid mortgage, is not an "authorization" by the mortgagee for anyone to either enter the mortgaged land or to trespass on another's land, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the bank, by asking for and obtaining amended receivership terms to facilitate aggregate production to meet another's needs and to set up a payment plan for the judgment-creditors' benefit, did not commit or authorize a trespass. The bank is therefore entitled to summary judgment in its favor on the trespass cause of action. Rudolph v. Louis Family, Inc., 13 FSM R. 118, 129-30 (Chk. 2005).

Trespass actions determine who has a better right to possession of the land. Kiniol v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 456, 458 (Chk. 2005).

When title to land in a designated registration area or its boundaries becomes an issue in a trespass case, a court may remand the ownership question to the Land Commission for it to determine within a limited time. If no special cause has been shown why court action is desirable before the Land Commission can make its boundary determination, the boundary issue should be remanded to the Land Commission. Once the Land Commission has determined ownership or boundaries, the court may proceed when more than an interest in land is at stake, and the Land Commission can only adjudicate interests in land. Kiniol v. Kansou, 13 FSM R. 456, 458 (Chk. 2005).

To maintain a trespass action, a plaintiff must prove that at the time of the alleged trespass he had either actual possession or the right to immediate possession. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 466 (Chk. 2005).

The court's role in a civil trespass case is to determine which party has the greater possessory right to the property, and an action for trespass has been broadly defined in the FSM as a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in property. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 466 (Chk. 2005).

When a defendant has shown a superior right to present possession of a parcel and the plaintiff has not shown any right to immediate possession of any of the parcels he owns or any right to actual possession until 2019, the plaintiff cannot maintain a trespass action against the defendant and the defendant has the superior possessory right and is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law against the plaintiff on the plaintiff's trespass cause of action. Mailo v. Chuuk, 13 FSM R. 462, 470 (Chk. 2005).

A trespass action is one for violation of possession. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 109 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

A trespass action will be stayed when the court cannot determine which person or persons have right to possession of the land until Land Court proceedings have determined the heirs of the deceased certificate of tile holder. George v. Abraham, 14 FSM R. 102, 109 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2006).

Trespass is wrongful interference with a possessory interest in property. Defendants are liable for trespass if the plaintiff proves he owns or has a possessory interest in the land and the defendants intentionally and without consent enter or remain on the land. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 196 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Since a trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title, when a claim of trespass is raised and title to land is an issue and there is no pending case before a land commission or there is a previous determination of ownership, then the question of ownership may be remanded to the land commission. Once that ownership is determined, then a court can proceed on the trespass claim, if necessary, because a trespass claim involves more than an interest in land. Siba v. Noah, 15 FSM R. 189, 196-97 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A trespass action is one for violation of possession, not for challenge to title. The court's role in a claim for trespass is to determine which party has the greater possessory right. Thus, when the plaintiff did not offer evidence to support his claim even though it was his burden to prove that he had the greater possessory right and that the defendant intruded upon that interest and the record shows that the defendant had title and therefore a greater possessory right, the plaintiff's trespass claim must fail. And, when the defendant did not offer evidence of trespass by the plaintiff, so his allegation of trespass raised in his pre-trial brief will also fail. Andon v. Shrew, 15 FSM R. 315, 322 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

A grant of a right of way does not constitute a trespass because trespass laws are intended to protect those who have a right to possess and use land, and the doctrine of trespass does not act to prohibit the grantees' usage of land provided that they stay within the easement or right of way granted to them. Akinaga v. Heirs of Mike, 15 FSM R. 391, 398 (App. 2007).

If a defendant's acts caused trespass on a plaintiff's land and chattels but no actual damages are proven, the plaintiff would be entitled to no more than nominal damages ($1). Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 41, 50 (Chk. 2010).

When a plaintiff, based on its paid-up and unexpired prior lease, had a right superior to a later lessee to possess or occupy a public land lot No. 014-A-08, when the later lessees occupied that lot, they were trespassing. This is because the issue in a trespass action is who among the parties has the superior right to possession. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

If a defendant trespasses on a plaintiff's land but no actual damages can be proven, the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages ($1). Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 102, 112 (Pon. 2010).

An action for trespass has been broadly defined in the FSM as a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in property, and a trespass cause of action accrues when there is an intrusion upon another's land which invades the possessor's interest in the exclusive possession of his land. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 124 (Chk. 2010).

To prevail in a trespass action, a plaintiff must prove a wrongful interference with his possessory interest in the property. When the intrusion is the result of reckless or negligent conduct, trespass liability attaches only where harm is caused to the land, to the possessor, or to a thing or a third person in whose security the possessor has a legally protected interest. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 124 (Chk. 2010).

A court does not need the presence of all owners of all property abutting the land's purported boundaries, and any other landowners in the vicinity whose property or property lines would have to appear on a certified survey map to decide the limited issue raised by a plaintiff's cause of action for trespass, that is, to decide whether the defendant is trespassing or occupying land to which the plaintiff church has a better right to possess or occupy. The court does not need to (and without the other necessary parties cannot) determine where all of the other boundaries lie because the only issue properly before the court, and the only issue the court may rule upon without violating the due process rights of non-parties, is whether it is more likely than not that the land the plaintiff leased was owned by the lessor and because the determination of boundaries of any other parts of the land which the plaintiff does not claim a leasehold or of the boundaries of any other parcels of land in the area is not before the court. Church of the Latter Day Saints v. Esiron, 17 FSM R. 229, 233-34 (Chk. 2010).

When there is a prior Chuuk State Supreme Court case that deals with the ownership issue and in which the alleged trespasser may soon be joined, and when the state court, unlike Chuuk Land Commission, has the power to issue monetary awards, the later-filed FSM Supreme Court trespass case will be dismissed without prejudice. Setik v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 304, 307 (Chk. 2010).

A plaintiff must prove a wrongful interference with his possessory interest in the property to include possession of the property, the time and location of the trespass, and the act of trespass in order to prevail, but it is not for the court to assist him in proving any or all of these elements by ordering a Land Commission re-survey absent a showing of special circumstances. For the plaintiff to make the request in the first place suggests that uncertainty about his land boundaries implicates the allegation of trespass; otherwise it is unclear what the purpose of such a survey would be and while a court order might expedite the certification or surveying of boundaries, that alone is not sufficient to warrant accommodating the request. Truk Trading Co. v. John, 17 FSM R. 382, 384 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2010).

In a successful trespass claim where no evidence exists of actual damages, the trial court will award nominal damages. Carlos Etscheit Soap Co. v. McVey, 17 FSM R. 427, 437 (App. 2011).

When a tort claim – trespass – that the state occupied and continues to occupy the plaintiff's property to the exclusion of all others rises to the level of a constitutional claim and a civil rights violation, it is a taking of the plaintiff's property without just compensation. Stephen v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 22, 25 (Chk. 2011).

When the plaintiffs have an exclusive leasehold interest in a town lot for the duration of the lease, such a possessory interest is sufficient to support an action for trespass. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

When the defendants are liable for trespass, but the plaintiff failed to present any evidence of damages at trial, the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages only, which will be set at one dollar. Harden v. Inek, 19 FSM R. 244, 252 (Pon. 2014).

For either a trespass cause of action or a cause of action against a municipal government for due process violations, the plaintiffs did not have to prove title or ownership, just a greater right to possession. Andrew v. Heirs of Seymour, 19 FSM R. 331, 338 (App. 2014).

To prevail in an action for trespass, a plaintiff must prove a wrongful interference with a valid possessory interest in land. A plaintiff can demonstrate wrongful interference by showing that a defendant, 1) intentionally and without consent enters land in the plaintiff's possession, or causes a thing or person to do so, or 2) intentionally and without consent remains on the plaintiff's land, or 3) intentionally fails to remove from the land a thing which he is under a duty to remove. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 528 (Pon. 2014).

For the purpose of establishing trespass, a plaintiff can demonstrate a valid possessory interest in land by proving that at the time of the alleged trespass he had either actual possession, or the right to immediate possession of the land. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 528 (Pon. 2014).

Judgment in a trespass case is for physical possession of the land, and the court's role is to determine which party has the greater possessory right to disputed property. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 528 (Pon. 2014).

When the court cannot establish that the plaintiffs' pending application under the Pohnpei Residential Shoreline Act of 2009 complies with the Act's requirements, the plaintiffs have not demonstrated an inchoate possessory interest over the landfill by virtue of their pending application for a leasehold interest, and since the plaintiffs do not have title or a leasehold interest in the landfill and cannot demonstrate an inchoate possessory interest under the Act, they cannot demonstrate a legally cognizable property right to exclusive possession of the landfill and therefore their trespass claim must fail. Damarlane v. Damarlane, 19 FSM R. 519, 530 (Pon. 2014).

Since the alleged defect in the deed, in terms of the concomitant condition to the fee simple that conveyed the subject land to the FSM, is a question that does not relate to the issue in this trespass action, which is one of right of possession because In an action for trespass, the judgment is for the right of possession; in such a case, the issue is who has the superior right to possession, not who has title. FSM v. Falan, 20 FSM R. 59, 62 (Pon. 2015).

Under a trespass cause of action, the trespasser is liable for his intentional failure to remove from the land a thing he has a duty to remove. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 78 (Pon. 2015).

The usual remedy for trespass to land (and when applicable nuisance and negligence claims are based on similar facts) is either a judgment for an amount equal to the diminution in the land's value or a judgment for an amount that would be needed to restore the land to its previous condition, whichever is the lesser amount. To award both would constitute an impermissible double recovery. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 78-79 (Pon. 2015).

One is subject to liability to another for trespass, irrespective of whether he causes harm to any legally protected interest of the other if he 1) intentionally and without consent enters land in the other's possession, or causes a thing or person to do so, or 2) intentionally and without consent remains on the other's land, or 3) intentionally fails to remove from the land a thing which he is under a duty to remove. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 97 (Pon. 2015).

The defendants are entitled to summary judgment on a plaintiff's trespass claim when unrebutted affidavit evidence defendants shows that the plaintiff told the police to get the pigs from his land and return them and shows that a resident of the property was there and gave him permission to enter the land and retrieve the pigs. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 97 (Pon. 2015).

The government owners and users of a right of way across land are not liable for the landowners' neighbors' alleged encroachment on the land. Any remedy for that alleged encroachment, the landowners must seek from their neighbors. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 656 (Chk. 2016).

Since the Yap Constitution recognizes traditional rights and ownership of marine resources, a vessel's unconsented grounding on Sorol reef constitutes a trespass, and since proof of damages is not necessary to prove trespass, both the grounding and the running of lines from the vessel to the reef are trespasses. People of Sorol ex rel. Marpa v. M/Y Truk Master, 22 FSM R. 14, 21 (Yap 2018).

No defendant in a trespass action can plead the jus tertii – the right of possession outstanding in some third person – as against the fact of possession in the plaintiff. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 154 (Chk. 2019).

An action for trespass has been broadly defined in the FSM as a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in property, and a trespass cause of action accrues when there is an intrusion upon another's land which invades the possessor's interest in the exclusive possession of her land. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 155 (Chk. 2019).

Any person in the actual and exclusive possession of the property may maintain the trespass action, although the person has no legal title, and is in wrongful occupation, as for example under a void lease, or in mere adverse possession. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 155 (Chk. 2019).

The lack of proof of actual damage amounts is not fatal to a trespass claim because, in a successful trespass claim when no evidence exists of actual damages, the trial court will award nominal ($1) damages. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 155 (Chk. 2019).

In many jurisdictions, in order for a trespass action to be maintained, the act constituting the invasion of the plaintiff's possessory interest or causing the invasion of the plaintiff's possessory interest must be intentional, so that accidental entries are often actionable when produced negligently or as a consequence of abnormally dangerous activities but not as trespasses. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 156 (Chk. 2019).

It is unclear whether, in Chuuk, there must be an intentional act by the defendant for a plaintiff to be able to maintain a trespass action. It appears that may be needed in Pohnpei, and maybe Kosrae, but where one reported case appears to permit a trespass action when the defendant's act was reckless or negligent conduct, but even then trespass liability would attach only if harm was caused to the land. Thus, a defendant will be denied summary judgment when sewage was alleged to have been negligently deposited on the land. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 156 (Chk. 2019).

The distinction between trespass and nuisance is that trespass is an invasion of the plaintiff's interest in the exclusive possession of her land, while nuisance is an interference with her use and enjoyment of it. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 156 (Chk. 2019).

The court's role in a civil trespass case is to determine which party has the greater right to possession of the disputed property. It is not an action to determine title. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 162 (Chk. 2019).

An action for trespass is broadly defined in the FSM as a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in the real property. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 162 (Chk. 2019).

A plaintiff has the burden to prove the amount of any damages caused by the trespass. But a plaintiff's failure to proffer any evidence of monetary damages is, however, not fatal to his trespass claim because monetary damages are not an essential element of the trespass tort since, in a successful trespass action when evidence of actual damages is lacking, the trial court will award nominal ($1) damages. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

Even though the plaintiff did not plead an ejectment cause of action, the court could, if he proves he has a greater current possessory right to the land, grant the plaintiff actual possession of land through an ejectment remedy because, except as to a party against whom a judgment is entered by default, every final judgment shall grant the relief to which the party in whose favor it is rendered is entitled, even if the party has not demanded such relief in the party's pleadings. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 163 (Chk. 2019).

When the plaintiff's certificate of title (and underlying determination of ownership) is ineffective against the lessee, the plaintiff has not shown by the preponderance of the evidence that he has a current possessory interest in the land superior to that of the lessee on the land. Irons v. Corporation of the President of the Church of Latter Day Saints, 22 FSM R. 158, 164 (Chk. 2019).

A co-owner's trespass case will be dismissed for failure to join the land's other co-owner as an indispensable party plaintiff because any judgment rendered in the other co-owner's absence would prejudice the defendant(s). This is because the other co-owner could later sue for the same trespass, thus subjecting the defendant(s) to multiple judgments for the same acts; because even a judgment in the defendant's favor would not prevent another co-owner from suing for the same acts; because no protective provisions could be included in a judgment that would lessen the defendant's prejudice; and because the plaintiff has an adequate remedy since the dismissal is without prejudice, and he may then refile the case with all the other co-owners included as plaintiffs. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 (Chk. 2019).

In a claim for damages to land, such as trespass, all the affected land's co-owners are indispensable parties to the action and must be joined if they are not already parties; otherwise the defendant faces the substantial risk that it may be subject to multiple or inconsistent judgments if any of the other co-owners later sue. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 242 n.4 (Chk. 2019).

When the plaintiff's averments in his proposed first amended complaint do not cure the complaint's indispensable party problem, the best course is to dismiss this case without prejudice to any future litigation by all of the land's co-owners (whoever they then are), claiming that the defendants are trespassing on the land. Nicky v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 239, 243 (Chk. 2019).

While an action for trespass remains proper for the court to hear because it is a court of general jurisdiction under the Chuuk State Judiciary Act of 1990, the Land Commission must resolve the question of title before the court can determine the trespass issue since the tideland was in a land registration area and no special cause was shown for court jurisdiction. Irons v. Rudolph, 22 FSM R. 408, 410 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

To maintain an action for trespass, the plaintiff must prove that: 1) he had actual possession of land and 2) the defendant wrongfully interfered with 3) the plaintiff's possessory interest in that property. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 421 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

An action for trespass has been broadly defined as a wrongful interference with another's possessory interest in property, and a trespass cause of action accrues when there is an intrusion upon another's land which invades the possessor's interest in the exclusive possession of his land. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 421 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

To maintain a trespass action, a plaintiff must prove that at the time of the alleged trespass he had either actual possession or the right to immediate possession. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 421 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

Failure to demonstrate actual damages often warrants only nominal damages for the trespass. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 421 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

No trespass was committed when the public utility already had an easement over the pipes that it replaced on the plaintiff's land, and the law did not require instruction from the land owner since the soil that the utility dug up to replace the pipes was never redistributed – it was placed over the pipes again. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

No trespass was committed when the public utility placed primary utility poles to connect the general public in that area to electricity because the landowner's right to possessory interest remains subject to the public utility's right to use the soil above and below the land for public utility purposes. Thus, no interference with the land owner's possessory interest occurred. Francis v. Chuuk Public Utilities Corp., 22 FSM R. 417, 423 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2019).

To prevail in a trespass action, a plaintiff must prove a wrongful interference with his interest in the exclusive possession of the land. But any person in the actual and exclusive possession of the property may maintain the trespass action. Ownership is not a requirement. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 620 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

When it was undisputed that the plaintiff was in actual and exclusive possession of the land, the plaintiff had standing to maintain a trespass action for alleged intrusions into his right of possession of the land. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 620-21 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

A trespass plaintiff's failure to proffer any evidence of monetary damages is not fatal to his trespass claim – monetary damages are not an essential element of the trespass tort because, if evidence of actual damages is lacking in a successful trespass action, the trial court will award nominal damages. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

In a claim for damages to land, such as trespass, all the co-owners of the affected land are indispensable parties to the action and must be joined if they are not already parties. Otherwise, the defendant faces a substantial risk that it may be subject to multiple or inconsistent judgments if any of the other persons who claim to be co-owners decide to sue. Chuuk Public Utility Corp. v. Rain, 22 FSM R. 612, 621 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

– Trespass to Chattels

The tort of trespass to chattels, or personal property, is the intentional use of or interference with a chattel which is in the possession of another without justification. Trespass includes the unlawful taking away of personal property of another. Whoever commits or causes another to commit an act of trespass is liable for the trespass and its damages. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 234 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

When, although there was substantial evidence to support finding that the plaintiff's personal property had been interfered with or taken away by another person, the plaintiff did not carry his burden of proof to show that either defendant did or caused another person to interfere with or take or move his property away from its designated location, the plaintiff cannot recover on his claim for trespass to chattels. Talley v. Lelu Town Council, 10 FSM R. 226, 235 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2001).

A claim that some private party has taken or deprived someone of their property is, if it was personal property that was allegedly taken, a claim for conversion or for trespass to chattels, and, if it was real property that was allegedly taken by some private party, it is a claim for trespass (including actions for ejectment) or possibly for nuisance (interference with use and enjoyment of land). They are not due process or takings claims. Rosokow v. Bob, 11 FSM R. 210, 215 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2002).

The tort of trespass to chattels, or personal property, is the intentional use of or interference with a chattel which is in the possession of another without justification, so that when there was no evidence that the defendant intentionally interfered with the plaintiffs' personal property (inside their homes), the plaintiffs fail to prove their trespass to chattels claim. Nakamura v. FSM Telecomm. Corp., 17 FSM R. 119, 124 (Chk. 2010).

The tort of trespass to chattels (personal property) is the intentional use of or interference with a chattel which is in the possession of another without justification. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 154 (Chk. 2019).

Unlike other forms of trespass, trespass to chattels requires some actual damage to the chattel before the action can be maintained, and nominal damages will not be awarded, so that in the absence of any actual damage the action will not lie. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 154 (Chk. 2019).

When the plaintiff has not put forth any admissible evidence that any of her chattels were damaged so that she is entitled to compensation for them; when she has not alleged that any specific chattel was damaged, or its value; and when she has not put forward any evidence that the defendant's interference with her chattels was intentional, the defendant is entitled to summary judgment on the plaintiff's trespass to chattels claim. Robert v. Chuuk Public Utility Corp., 22 FSM R. 150, 155 (Chk. 2019).

– Unfair Competition

There is no common law tort of unfair competition in the FSM because that field of law has been preempted by the Consumer Protection Act of 1970. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 414 (Pon. 2001).

The Consumer Protection Act of 1970 exclusively provides the means by which unfair competition between businesses should be dealt with under both national and applicable state law. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 415 (Pon. 2001).

The Consumer Protection Act vests consumers with a civil cause of action against anyone engaged in activity which is deceptive or misleading, and authorizes the Attorney General to seek injunctive relief against such activity, to prosecute criminal violations of the Act, and to seek civil and criminal penalties against those who violate the Act. The Act does not provide a means for recourse by businesses against other competing businesses. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 415-16 (Pon.

2001).

The Consumer Protection Act abolishes any common law action for unfair competition. Businesses do not have standing to sue competitors for violations of 34 F.S.M.C. 103, including passing off goods or services as those of another. Because Congress has legislated comprehensively in this field, it should be Congress that decides whether to provide businesses with a private cause of action against competitors for engaging in unfair competition. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 416 (Pon. 2001).

Attempts to threaten or induce merchants not to sell competing products violate 32 F.S.M.C. 303. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 417 (Pon. 2001).

– Use of Excessive Force

In making an otherwise lawful arrest, a police officer may use whatever force is reasonably necessary to effect the arrest, and no more; he must avoid using unnecessary violence. Meitou v. Uwera, 5 FSM R. 139, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1991).

The tort of use of excessive force results from the arrest by a person having the authority to do so but accomplished by the use of unreasonable force. Conrad v. Kolonia Town, 8 FSM R. 183, 191 (Pon. 1997).

A detainee has a civil right to be free of excessive force while detained in the custody. Use of excessive force may constitute a battery. Atesom v. Kukkun, 10 FSM R. 19, 22 (Chk. 2001).

Violating a person's civil right to be free from excessive force while detained by the municipal police, is a violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 701(3). Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 135 (Chk. 2003).

A detainee has a civil right to be free of excessive force while detained in the custody. The use of excessive force results from the arrest by a person having the authority to do so but accomplished by the use of unreasonable force. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. 2003).

Excessive force is defined as the use of unreasonable force by a person having the authority to arrest. A person who has been arrested has the right to be free of excessive force and use of excessive force may constitute battery. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

Although an arrestee sustained some bruising to her wrists, the bruising was not the result of any arresting officer's conduct since when the arrestee was handcuffed, the cuffs were loose enough that they could slide up and down her wrists and there was enough space between the metal of the cuff and her skin to fit a regular-sized ballpoint pen, but during the travel from the arrest site to the police station, she struggled with the handcuffs, resulting in their tightening further around her wrists. Since the tightening of the handcuffs was not the result of an officer's conduct, but of the arrestee's own movements, the police did not use any unreasonable force in arresting and handcuffing her. Berman v. Pohnpei, 16 FSM R. 567, 575 (Pon. 2009).

Whether the Pohnpei police injured an arrestee through the use of excessive force and thus battered her is a question of fact. Thus, when the trial court found as fact that the arrestee had caused her own injuries by struggling with the handcuffs during the travel from the arrest site to the police station, which resulted in the handcuffs tightening further around her wrists and that the handcuffs' tightening was not the result of an officer's conduct, but rather was the result of her own movements, the police did not cause her injury and no use-of-excessive-force battery could have occurred. Berman v. Pohnpei, 17 FSM R. 360, 372 (App. 2011).

Since a police officer may employ no more force than he reasonably believes to be necessary to effect the arrest, the tort of use of excessive force (which may constitute a battery) results from the arrest by a person having the authority to do so but accomplished by the use of unreasonable force. An arrestee has a civil right to be free of excessive force when being detained. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 20 FSM R. 90, 97 (Pon. 2015).

In effecting an arrest, a police officer may employ no more force than he reasonably believes to be necessary. The tort of use of excessive force results from the arrest by a person having the authority to do so but accomplished by the use of unreasonable force. Palasko v. Pohnpei, 21 FSM R. 562, 564-65 (Pon. 2018).

– Waste

Damages for waste are normally the difference in value of the property before and after the act of waste. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

The damages for waste committed are usually measured by the injury actually sustained and if the value of the premises has been improved by the acts complained of, the complainants will only recover nominal damages, if any, at law. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 244 (Pon. 1998).

Damages for waste can also be determined by the cost of repairing or replacing what was wasted when the damage is small in comparison to property's total value and the amount is readily ascertainable. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 245 (Pon. 1998).

A lessor may not recover damages for waste when the removal of termite-infested lumber from uninhabitable houses while trying to turn the houses into a bar improved the value of the property, and because if the property had been abandoned without trying to turn the houses into a bar, the lessor would still have become the owner of two uninhabitable houses. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 8 FSM R. 241, 245 (Pon. 1998).

It does not automatically follow that because the lessor could prevent a change in the use of the premises, he should also be compensated as a result of the changes made to the structures when the trial court found that the structures were uninhabitable before the alterations were begun, and when the trial court noted evidence that the changes made had actually improved the structures. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 1999).

When the trial court found that houses were uninhabitable before the lessee made alterations, the question is the cost to return the houses to their (uninhabitable) state before the work was done. The trial court holding that the lessor is not entitled to houses in livable condition, made so at the lessee's expense, when he would have been left with uninhabitable houses had the lessee taken no steps to alter the premises will thus be affirmed. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 1999).

Nominal damages, or none at all, are awarded for ameliorating waste. Wolphagen v. Ramp, 9 FSM R. 191, 194 (App. 1999).

Waste is permanent harm to real property committed by a tenant. This may include the destruction, misuse, alteration, or neglect of premises by one lawfully in possession thereof. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

To constitute waste the act must be wrongful, and it is the general rule that no act of a tenant will amount to waste unless it is or may be prejudicial to the inheritance. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

Damages for waste are normally the difference in value of the property before and after the act of waste. Since the damages for waste committed are usually measured by the injury actually sustained, if the value of the premises has been improved by the acts complained of, the complainants will only recover nominal damages, if any, at law. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

Proof of diminution in value of property can be made by introducing the cost of repairs, and when the cost of repairs is submitted as evidence, the fact that repairs were not ultimately made does not prevent the property owner from securing recovery based on those estimated costs. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

The allowance of damages is to award just compensation without enrichment. There is thus no universal test for determining the value of property injured or destroyed. The mode and amount of proof must be adapted to the facts of each case. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

Voluntary (or commissive) waste is committed when a tenant does a deliberate or voluntary destructive act. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

Permissive waste occurs when a tenant allows destruction of property by neglect, omission, or permission. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

"Meliorating" waste, while technically waste, results when the character of land is altered but it results in the land being improved rather than injured, and acts or conduct which would otherwise constitute waste may be authorized or legalized by an appropriate provision in the document creating a tenancy. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

A lessee committed voluntary waste when, at the lease's conclusion, it did not remove certain fixtures from the property in a manner that would render the property safe and the property usable for farming or other uses because, when the lessors did not exercise the option under the lease to purchase fixtures and other property from the lessee, the lessee had the obligation to remove those fixtures in such a manner that it did not diminish the property by creating unsafe conditions. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

The lessee did not commit any waste by constructing buildings and structures authorized by the lease agreement, such as the main building, bungalows ("abandoned houses"), or pedestrian bridge. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 297 (Pon. 2019).

When the lessee did not have the obligation to restore the property to its original state, damages are recoverable only for the former lessee's acts which rendered the property unsafe and require remediation in order to make the lessor whole. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

When the lease did not require the lessee, at the lease's termination, to remove the structures and foundations, the lessor's requested damages will be reduced because the lessee should not have to pay for the removal of slabs and foundations that remain on the property. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

Damages for permissive waste is not recoverable, including any damages related to clearing trees and brushes or cutting and removing. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

When a bridge that was constructed on the property was, under the lease, a permissible structure that improved the property's value, the former lessee is not liable for its removal. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 298 (Pon. 2019).

Damages will be awarded for certain potentially dangerous materials including cut pipes, wires, rebar, certain other items left protruding from the ground and property that were a safety hazard and should have been removed because it resulted in the diminution of the properties' value. Hartman v. Henry, 22 FSM R. 292, 299 (Pon. 2019).

– Wrongful Arrest

Whether or not to pursue a citation in lieu of arresting the vessel lies within the FSM's discretion. Failure to pursue an administrative penalty under the Administrative Penalties Regulations does not render an arrest wrongful. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 19 (Pon. 2008).

While the fishing violations alleged in the complaint are subject to citation under the Administrative Penalties Regulations, the citation process is not mandatory. The citation process to assess an administrative penalty and a civil lawsuit for civil penalties proceed on two separate tracks. The fact that the FSM has not cited the vessel under the Administrative Penalty Regulations but instead has pursued Title 24 civil penalties is not a sufficient ground as a matter of law upon which to allege a cause of action for wrongful arrest against the FSM. FSM v. Koshin 31, 16 FSM R. 15, 20 (Pon. 2008).

– Wrongful Death

The common law today reflects no policy against wrongful death actions. The Federated States of Micronesia Supreme Court is not required to adopt the restrictive method of interpretation employed by the first courts who approached wrongful death statutes more than a century ago. Luda v. Maeda Road Constr. Co., 2 FSM R. 107, 113 (Pon. 1985).

Wrongful death statutes, including the $100,000 ceiling on wrongful death claims, are part of the law of the states and are not national law. Edwards v. Pohnpei, 3 FSM R. 350, 360 (Pon. 1988).

In a case where a patient died following the normal delivery of her child, where the evidence fails to show any demonstrable effort at diagnosis and no treatment as a result of diagnosis, the standard of care expected of a doctor at the Truk State Hospital was not met and the evidence proves negligence. Asan v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 51, 56 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

In a wrongful death claim in Truk State, where the total pecuniary estimated loss was $15,288 and where an infant child lost his mother, there should be a finding for the plaintiff in the maximum amount allowed by law, $50,000. Asan v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 51, 56-57 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

In a wrongful death claim, parents of the deceased child are entitled to claim pecuniary damages and damages for their own pain and suffering from the loss of their child. Suka v. Truk, 4 FSM R. 123, 130 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1989).

Although the death, and all key events giving rise to the wrongful death claim, occurred in Guam, damages should be determined under FSM law when the claim is brought under 6 F.S.M.C. 503, the FSM wrongful death statute. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 365 (Yap 1990).

The term "pecuniary injury" as used in wrongful death statutes traditionally has been interpreted as including the probable support, services and other contributions that reasonably could have been expected by the beneficiaries had the decedent lived out her full life expectancy, all reduced to present worth. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 365 (Yap 1990).

Since under Yapese custom a daughter in her adult years may be expected to provide certain services for her mother, the loss of such customary services should be considered in calculating the mother's pecuniary injury resulting from her daughter's death. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 365 (Yap 1990).

That a plaintiff parent of a decedent child can be awarded damages to include mental pain and suffering for the loss of such child is an exception to the general rule that wrongful death actions exclude compensation for pain and suffering, medical expenses, emotional distress or sorrow, or loss of companionship or consortium. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 366 (Yap 1990).

Given that a 19-year old daughter is considered a child under Yapese custom, that the decedent was a 19-year old daughter who up to the time of her death continued to live with her parents in Yap and to perform those household chores expected under custom of young female persons within families in Yap, and that the parents were accompanying their daughter en route to obtain medical services when she died, the daughter was a child within the meaning of 6 F.S.M.C. 503. Leeruw v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 350, 366 (Yap 1990).

A statutory cap on the amount and scope of recovery in a wrongful death action, lawfully enacted by the Kosrae legislature, does not interfere with traditional Kosraean or Micronesian compensation of a victim's family by the tortfeasor. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 361 (Kos. 1992).

Families of wrongful death victims do not constitute a suspect class for purposes of equal protection analysis. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 362 (Kos. 1992).

There is no fundamental interest in unbounded wrongful death recovery requiring strict scrutiny of a state law imposing a recovery cap. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 362 (Kos. 1992).

Among the rational bases supporting the constitutionality of a state statute capping wrongful death recovery are a desire to create foreseeable limits on government liability; to promote insurance; to encourage settlement of claims; and to ease the burden on courts and families of valuing losses incurred through the death of a family member. Tosie v. Healy-Tibbets Builders, Inc., 5 FSM R. 358, 363 (Kos. 1992).

Because there is no survival statute in the FSM that would allow a deceased victim to sue a tortfeasor, the deceased cannot be awarded damages for wrongful death. The statute does allow a deceased's personal representative to sue for wrongful death on behalf of the deceased's relatives. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 430-32 (Pon. 1996).

Damages for lost future earnings are not awardable where they are duplicative and speculative, but damages may be awarded for financial and emotional loss, and for loss, at present value, of customary services that a child would have preformed if not for her wrongful death. Primo v. Refalopei, 7 FSM R. 423, 433-34 (Pon. 1996).

In Chuuk, wrongful death is a state law cause of action created by a Trust Territory statute, 6 TTC 201-203, that is state law pursuant to the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions' transition clauses. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 13 (Chk. 2001).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over a state law wrongful death claim when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as a plaintiff's national civil rights claims. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 13 (Chk. 2001).

Jailers, and their superiors, owe detainees a duty of care, which may include the duty to regularly observe a detainee's condition, and may breach that duty by failing to provide the required checks on his condition, had a duty of watchfulness when they are aware or should be aware of the effect on the detainee of the scolding he received and when these failures are the proximate cause of the plaintiff's death, these defendants are liable under 6 TTC 201(1) for the plaintiff's death by neglect. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 14 (Chk. 2001).

A Public Safety Director, as the policy maker for the department, may, by failing to investigate the issue of accountability for a detainee's death, ratify the shift supervisor's and the jailer's actions. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 14 (Chk. 2001).

Since wrongful death actions are brought for the exclusive benefit of the deceased's "surviving spouse, the children and other next of kin," 6 TTC 202, when the deceased had no spouse or children, the damages are the next of kin's pecuniary injury. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 15 (Chk. 2001).

A deceased's parent (or her estate) is entitled to damages that include her mental pain and suffering for the loss of her child that resulted from her child's wrongful death, without regard to provable pecuniary damages. Estate of Mori v. Chuuk, 10 FSM R. 6, 15 (Chk. 2001).

Wrongful death is a state law cause of action created by a Trust Territory statute, 6 TTC 201-203, that is state law pursuant to the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions' transition clauses. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. 2003).

The FSM Supreme Court may exercise pendent jurisdiction over a state law wrongful death action when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as the plaintiff's national civil rights claims. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 136 (Chk. 2003).

Wrongful death actions are brought for the exclusive benefit of the deceased's surviving spouse, children and other next of kin. The pecuniary injury consists of funeral expenses (including a novena) and the earnings that the deceased would have used to support his family, had he lived. The future earnings calculation may be based on the victim's continued employment and earnings at the same rate until he reached the FSM retirement age of 60. Herman v. Municipality of Patta, 12 FSM R. 130, 138 (Chk. 2003).

A battery or wrongful death, by itself, does not constitute a civil rights violation. Harper v. William, 14 FSM R. 279, 282 (Chk. 2006).

Wrongful death is a state law cause of action created by a Trust Territory statute that is state law pursuant to the FSM and Chuuk Constitutions' transition clauses. The FSM Supreme Court exercises pendent jurisdiction over a wrongful death action when it arises from the same nucleus of operative fact and is such that it would be expected to be tried in the same judicial proceeding as the national civil rights claims. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 352 (Chk. 2006).

Wrongful death actions are brought for the exclusive benefit of the deceased's surviving spouse, the children and other next of kin. When the decedent had no spouse or children, the damages are the next of kin's pecuniary injury. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

A decedent's mother as the deceased's parent is entitled to damages that include her mental pain and suffering for the loss of her child, without regard to provable pecuniary damages. Lippwe v. Weno Municipality, 14 FSM R. 347, 353 (Chk. 2006).

Every wrongful death action is for the exclusive benefit of the surviving spouse, the children, and other next of kin, if any, of the decedent as the court may direct. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 210 (Chk. 2010).

The Trust Territory wrongful death statute is valid as Chuuk state law through the Chuuk Constitution's transition clause. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 210 & n.1 (Chk. 2010).

The Chuuk wrongful death statute phrases the class of persons entitled to recovery in the conjunctive ("and"), not the disjunctive ("or"). Generally the use of the conjunctive "and" instead of the disjunctive "or" would mean that all three named beneficiaries – surviving spouse, children, and next of kin – are within the class of persons for whose benefit a wrongful death action may be brought and construing "and" according to its common and approved English usage would mean that all three groups, spouse, children, and next of kin, compose a single class of beneficiaries in a wrongful death action. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

There is no evidence that the Trust Territory Congress of Micronesia's legislative intent in the wrongful death statute was that "other next of kin" meant only those who would inherit under intestate succession acts, especially since, at the time the Trust Territory wrongful death statute was enacted, there were no intestate succession acts. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

The Pohnpei Intestate Succession Act cannot be used to restrict the operation of the Trust Territory wrongful death statute now applied as Chuuk state law. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

Under Chuukese custom, children are expected to and do in fact contribute to support of their parents. If they are not married and are employed they give larger amounts than when they have a family of their own, but the support in some amount will continue, in a normal relationship, as long as the parents live. Whether there is an obligation under the custom to support parents or other members of the family, largely depending on their need, does not affect the next of kin's entitlement to damages for pecuniary loss. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 211 (Chk. 2010).

If a decedent had been married, this would not eliminate parental support under custom, nor would it relieve the wrongdoer under the wrongful death statute. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

In determining the class of persons entitled to recovery the better cases favor an extended operation of the wrongful death statutes for the purpose of maximizing their remedial objectives. A remedial objective of the Chuuk wrongful death statute is to compensate those persons who had the right to rely on the decedent for pecuniary support had the decedent lived. Under Chuukese custom, these include, in addition to the decedent's spouse and children, the decedent's parents. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

Since there is no indication that parental support has ceased to be the custom in Chuuk and since parents are undoubtedly "other next of kin" under the Chuuk wrongful death statute, parents of adult children, consistent with custom, are included within the single class of persons entitled to recover in a wrongful death action even when there are other members (surviving spouse and children) of the class present. But even when a plaintiff is within the class of persons who may benefit from a wrongful death action, that plaintiff still must prove pecuniary damages in order for a money judgment to be awarded, and, of course, the plaintiff must also prove the other elements of a wrongful death cause of action. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

When the employer instructed the employees to use safe procedures such as pulling rebars out (or inserting them) from the oceanside and not the roadside and when the employer provided its employees with a safe working place and did not knowingly permit unsafe procedures to be used, it did not breach its duty of care to its employees. Accordingly, since the plaintiff has failed to prove this essential element of a wrongful death claim, she cannot prevail. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 264, 266 (Chk. 2010).

When it was the decedent's own actions that were the proximate cause of his death, the causation element of wrongful death cannot be proven. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

When a plaintiff cannot prove that the defendants had a duty toward the decedent that the defendants breached, the plaintiff cannot prove an essential element of his case and the defendants must be granted summary judgment. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 431 (Chk. 2012).

TRANSITION OF AUTHORITY

Amendment or repeal of a Trust Territory statute by Congress need not be explicit to be effective. If a Trust Territory statutory provision is inconsistent or in conflict with a statutory provision enacted by Congress, that provision is repealed by implication. FSM v. Albert, 1 FSM R. 14, 16 (Pon. 1981).

Under article XV, section 1 of the Constitution a Trust Territory Code provision is repealed by a subsequent statutory provision enacted by the Congress only if the statutory provisions in question are inconsistent or in conflict. Even if certain provisions are repealed, other provisions of that same statute may remain intact if the statute, without the deleted provision, is self-sustaining and capable of separate enforcement. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 29 (Pon. 1981).

The fact that Congress repealed many provisions of Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code by implication does not lead to the conclusion that all provisions of Title 11 are repealed. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 29 (Pon. 1981).

Since the national government does not have major crimes jurisdiction over Title 11 Trust Territory Code assaults calling for imprisonment of no more than six months, the repealer clause of the National Criminal Code would not appear to repeal those sections. FSM v. Boaz (II), 1 FSM R. 28, 30 (Pon. 1981).

Secretarial Order 3039, section 2 cleared the way for the assumption of jurisdiction by FSM courts by delegating the judicial functions of the government of the Trust Territory of the Pacific islands to the Federated States of Micronesia. Thus, the High Court's previous exclusive jurisdiction under 6 TTC 251 was effectively delegated to the Federated States of Micronesia, insofar as the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia authorizes such jurisdiction. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 57-58 (Kos. 1982).

The language of Secretarial Order 3039, section 5(a) contemplates continued Trust Territory High Court activity pursuant to the "present procedural and jurisdictional provisions of Trust Territory law" only until new functioning courts are established by the constitutional governments, and recognizes that the jurisdictional provisions of Trust Territory law will necessarily be revised when those courts have been established. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 59 (Kos. 1982).

A Secretarial Order, issued by one responsible official with full authority to state his intentions and instructions precisely, typically should not require reference to other documents for explanation. It is not a product of compromises and discussions among numerous legislators, where contemporaneous discussion may be especially helpful in determining the intention of the legislature in using certain words. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 61 (Kos. 1982).

Delegation of former Trust Territory High Court judicial functions under 6 TTC 251 to the courts of the Federated States of Micronesia did not violate Executive Order No. 11021. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 63 (Kos. 1982).

Interpretation of Secretarial Order 3039 as acquiescing in FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction over suits against the Trust Territory does not conflict with any residual United States obligation to oversee activities of the FSM courts pending termination of the Trusteeship Agreement nor does this interpretation imperil any interest the United States government may have in protecting the Trust Territory government against unfair or overreaching actions by the courts of the new constitutional governments. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 64 (Kos. 1982).

Trust Territory High Court appellate division jurisdiction by writ of certiorari over appeals from the courts of last resort of the respective jurisdictions of the Federated States of Micronesia, the Marshall Islands, and Palau eliminates any possible risk which might otherwise be posed to the United States or its interests or responsibilities here by the full exercise of constitutional jurisdiction by the courts of the constitutional governments. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 64-65 (Kos. 1982).

The Secretary of the Interior has the power to terminate the Trust Territory High Court's exclusive jurisdiction over suits against the Trust Territory because that jurisdiction was originally conferred upon the High Court by authority emanating from the Department of Interior. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 65-67 (Kos. 1982).

The Trust Territory High Court's former exclusive jurisdiction over lawsuits against the Trust Territory government has been delegated to the constitutional governments covered by Secretarial Order 3039. Within the Federated States of Micronesia, the allocation of this former exclusive High Court jurisdiction between the Supreme Court of the Federated States of Micronesia and the various state courts will be determined on the basis of jurisdictional provisions within the Constitution and laws of the Federated States of Micronesia and its respective states. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 68 (Kos. 1982).

Until the state courts are established, the Trust Territory High Court retains that portion of its exclusive jurisdiction formerly held under 6 TTC 251 which does not fall within the constitutional jurisdiction of the FSM Supreme Court. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 68 (Kos. 1982).

The Seaman's Protection Act, originally enacted for the entire Trust Territory by the Congress of Micronesia, relates to matters that now fall within the legislative powers of the national government under article IX, section 2 of the Constitution, and has therefore become a national law of the Federated States of Micronesia under article XV. That being so, a claim asserting rights under the Act falls within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction under article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution as a case arising under national law. 19 F.S.M.C. 401-437. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 72 (Kos. 1982).

Retention of the power to play a major role in executive functions, to suspend legislation enacted by the Congress, and to entertain appeals from the court of last resort, the very essence of government, suggests that the Trust Territory government remains, not a foreign state, but an integral part of the national government here. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 72 (Kos. 1982).

Under the present state of affairs, the Trust Territory government cannot be considered a foreign state, citizen or subject thereof within the meaning of article XI, section 6(b) of the Constitution. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 74 (Kos. 1982).

It would be contrary to the desire of the framers of the Constitution that local officials retain control over local matters if the FSM Supreme Court were to relinquish jurisdiction over issues involving local and state powers to the Trust Territory High Court, which is the least local tribunal now existing in the Trust Territory. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 110 (Pon. 1982).

The Constitution contemplates that decisions affecting the people of the Federated States of Micronesia will be decided by courts appointed by the constitutional governments of the Federated States of Micronesia. This in turn requires an expansive reading of the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdictional mandate while we await establishment of functioning state courts. In re Nahnsen, 1 FSM R. 97, 111 (Pon. 1982).

Title 11 of TT Code is not inconsistent with nor violative of the FSM Constitution; therefore 11 TTC continued in effect after the effective date of the Constitution and until the National Criminal Code's effective date. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 127, 130 (Truk 1982).

Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code, before the effective date of the National Criminal Code, is not a national law because its criminal jurisdiction was not expressly delegated to the national government, nor is it a power of indisputably national character; therefore, it is not within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 127, 130 (Truk 1982).

The delegation of judicial functions to the Federated States of Micronesia, pursuant to Secretarial Order 3039, section 2 does not by itself give the FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction over Title 11 Trust Territory Code crimes occurring before the National Criminal Code's effective date. Truk v. Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 127, 131 (Truk 1982).

The national and state governments' assumption of powers from the Trust Territory government is accomplished through the transfer and transition approach rather than by operation of law. Manahane v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 161, 167 n.3 (Pon. 1982).

The FSM Supreme Court has jurisdiction to try Title 11 Trust Territory Code cases if they arise under a national law. Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code is not a national law. It was not adopted by Congress as a national law and it did not become a national law by virtue of the transition article. Truk v. Hartman, 1 FSM R. 174, 178 (Truk 1982).

Sections of Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code covering matters within the jurisdiction of Congress owe their continuing vitality to Section 102 of the National Criminal Code. Thus, the criminal prosecutions thereunder are a national matter and fall within the FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 185 (App. 1982).

Upon inception of constitutional self-government by the people of the Federated States of Micronesia, criminal law provisions in Title 11 of the Trust Territory Code became the law of governments within the Federated States of Micronesia by virtue of the Constitution's transition provisions. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 187 (App. 1982).

The savings clause, 11 F.S.M.C. 102(2), unlike the other sections of the National Criminal Code, was intended to apply to offenses committed before the Code's effective date. It specifically authorizes prosecutions of Title 11 Trust Territory Code offenses occurring prior to the enactment of the National Criminal Code. Therefore, these prosecutions fall within the FSM Supreme Court's constitutional jurisdiction. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 189-90 (App. 1982).

Change of forum for Title 11 Trust Territory Code cases from the Trust Territory High Court to the FSM Supreme Court is a procedural matter with no effect on the defendants' substantive rights. In re Otokichy, 1 FSM R. 183, 193 (App. 1982).

Any power the Trust Territory High Court, the District Courts and the Community Courts may have to exercise judicial powers within the Federated States of Micronesia is to be exercised not as that of autonomous foreign states but as integral parts of the domestic governments. Those courts continue to exercise trial court functions in Ponape only on an interim basis, until the State of Ponape establishes its own courts, either under its present state charter or under any constitution which Ponape may adopt. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 244 (Pon. 1983).

The interim nature and limited purpose of the Trust Territory High Court, the District Courts and the Community Courts does not suggest that these entities are immune to the restraints imposed upon officials authorized to act by constitutions or statutes approved by citizens of the Federated States of Micronesia or their representatives. To the contrary, respect for constitutional self-government and the Trusteeship Agreement provisions to which they trace their power to act here, mandate that these interim entities act with great restraint, only as necessary to supplement the constitutional courts and until creation of constitutional courts here. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 244-45 (Pon. 1983).

The exercise of governmental powers by the Trust Territory High Court, the District Courts and the Community Courts must be carried out in a manner consistent with constitutional self-government and are subject to the safeguards erected by the Constitution for citizens of the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 245 (Pon. 1983).

The Federated States of Micronesia Constitution does not contemplate that FSM citizens should be required to travel to Saipan or to petition anyone outside of the FSM to realize rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 253 (Pon. 1983).

The FSM Supreme Court should not intrude unnecessarily in the efforts of the Trust Territory High Court to vindicate itself and other judges through court proceedings within the Trust Territory system. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 254 (Pon. 1983).

The Constitution does not contemplate that FSM citizens must first petition any person or body outside the Federated States of Micronesia as a condition to consideration of their constitutional claims by courts established under this Constitution. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 267 (Pon. 1983).

The Trust Territory High Court is an anomalous entity operating on an interim basis adjacent to a constitutional framework and consisting of judges appointed by officials of the United States Department of the Interior. These and other considerations point toward the propriety and necessity of vigilance by the FSM Supreme Court to uphold the constitutional rights of FSM citizens. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 267 (Pon. 1983).

Transfer of a case not in active trial in the Trust Territory High Court is mandatory unless the legal rights of a party are impaired by the transfer. U.S. Dep't Int. Sec'l Order 3039, § 5(a) (1979). Actouka v. Etpison, 1 FSM R. 275, 277 (Pon. 1983).

National court jurisdiction over the Trust Territory Weapons Control Act is consistent with 12 F.S.M.C. 102 which states in part that criminal prosecutions shall be conducted in the name of the Federated States of Micronesia for violations of the statutes of the Trust Territory which continued in effect by virtue of the transition article of the Constitution and which are within the FSM national government's jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 1201-1231. FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 303 (Truk 1983).

8 F.S.M.C. 206 authorizes the transfer of authority from the Trust Territory and its officials to the Federated States of Micronesia government and its officials. Thus the reference in the Trust Territory Weapons Control Act to the High Commissioner and the Attorney General of the Trust Territory does not prevent its effectiveness as national law of the Federated States of Micronesia. 11 F.S.M.C. 1201-1231. FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 303 (Truk 1983).

The Trust Territory High Court has the legitimate authority to issue writs of certiorari for cases from the FSM Supreme Court; the Supreme Court cannot disregard an opinion resulting from such review. U.S. Dep't Int. Sec'l Order 3039, § 5(b). Jonas v. Trial Division, 1 FSM R. 322, 326-29 (App. 1983).

A writ of certiorari is improvidently granted by the Trust Territory High Court unless the FSM Supreme Court decision affects the Secretary of the Interior's ability to fulfill his responsibilities under Executive Order 11021. Jonas v. Trial Division, 1 FSM R. 322, 329 n.1 (App. 1983).

Title 5 of the FSM Code, including section 514, is in essence the Trust Territory High Court judiciary act. The statute was enacted when the Trust Territory High Court had general original jurisdiction over criminal cases within the area that is now the Federated States of Micronesia. The act was not deleted in the codification process but remains part of the body of FSM national law because at the time of codification, the Trust Territory High Court still had extensive original jurisdiction in the Federated States of Micronesia. In re Raitoun, 1 FSM R. 561, 564 (App. 1984).

In light of the Constitution's Transition Clause, action by the FSM Congress is not necessary in order to establish that violations of the Weapons Control Act are prohibited within the Federated States of Micronesia. The only question is whether those are state or national law prohibitions or both. If the definition of major crimes in the National Criminal Code bears upon the Weapons Control Act at all, it is only for that purpose of allocating between state and national law. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 43 (App. 1985).

The Transition Clause of the FSM Constitution effectively adopts statutes of the Trust Territory, including the Weapons Control Act, and serves as the original enactment of a body of law, criminal as well as civil, for the new constitutional government. Further action by the FSM Congress is not necessary to establish that violations of the Weapons Control Act are prohibited within the FSM. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 43 (App. 1985).

Public Law No. 2-48, promulgating the codification of the FSM statutes and speaking only of "All enacted law of the Interim Congress of Micronesia . . . and all enacted law of the Congress law of the Federated States of Micronesia" as "readopted and reenacted as positive law of the Federated States of Micronesia," may not be interpreted as an attempt to repeal or purge the Trust Territory law from the law of the Federated States of Micronesia. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 43 (App. 1985).

There is nothing absurd about a weapons control scheme that recognizes that both the national and the state governments have an interest in controlling the possession, use and sale of weapons. While Congress and the states may eventually wish to allocate their respective roles with more precision, the current Weapons Control Act appears to provide a workable system during these early years of transition and constitutional self-government. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 44 (App. 1985).

In declining to "reenact" in Public Law No. 2-48 provisions originating with High Commissioners or Congress of Micronesia, Congress seems to have been motivated by transitional considerations rather than a desire to withhold official status from those laws. FSM v. George, 2 FSM R. 88, 92 (Kos. 1985).

Procedural statute 6 F.S.M.C. 1018, providing that the court may tax any additional costs incurred in litigation against the losing party other than fees of counsel, applies only to Trust Territory courts and not to courts of the Federated States of Micronesia, and therefore does not preclude the FSM Supreme Court from awarding attorney's fees as costs. Semens v. Continental Air Lines, Inc. (II), 2 FSM R. 200, 205 (Pon. 1986).

The gross revenue tax as enacted by the Congress of Micronesia continued in effect in the Federated States of Micronesia by virtue of the transition article of the FSM Constitution but, because it was subsequently amended by the FSM Congress and was included in the codification of FSM statutes, may now be considered a law enacted by Congress. Afituk v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 260, 264 (Truk 1986).

According to Secretarial Order No. 3039, § 5(a), all cases against the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands and the High Commissioner that were filed in the FSM at the time the Truk State Court was certified will continue to remain within the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court. Those cases filed after certification are not within the jurisdiction of the High Court. Suda v. Trust Territory, 3 FSM R. 12, 14 (Truk S. Ct. Tr. 1985).

Under the Constitution of the Federated States of Micronesia, the national government, not the state governments, assumes any "right, obligation, liability, or contract of the government of the Trust Territory." Salik v. U Corp. (I), 3 FSM R. 404, 407 (Pon. 1988).

The underlying principle of the Transition Clause of the Constitution, FSM Const. art. XV, § 1, is that a new constitution ought to bring with it no greater changes than are necessary to effectuate its terms. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 476 (Pon. 1988).

That a carryover statute covers topics that now fall into areas of both state and national responsibilities is not a sufficient ground for reducing the reach of the statute or allowing it to fall short of its originally intended scope. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 477 (Pon. 1988).

If neither state nor national powers alone are sufficient to carry out the original purposes of a carryover statute, or if state and national powers are invoked, then the statute is enforceable as both state and national law. FSM v. Oliver, 3 FSM R. 469, 477 (Pon. 1988).

Determinations as to whether claims of citizens against the previous Kosrae state chartered government may now be upheld against the constitutional state government are to be made by the judiciary on the basis of: 1) when the cause of action arose; 2) the identity of the officer or person whose action created the liability; and 3) the place where the original action creating the liability occurred. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 539, 542-43 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

The Kosrae constitutional state government may be held liable for actions taken by police officers under the previous chartered state government, approximately one month before ratification and four months before implementation of the Kosrae Constitution, in falsely arresting and abusing a citizen in Kosrae. Seymour v. Kosrae, 3 FSM R. 539, 543 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1988).

As a matter of constitutional law, the authority to exercise executive, legislative and judicial powers came to the Federated States of Micronesia under the FSM Constitution, by operation of law, not through delegation of Trust Territory functions. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 103 (App. 1989).

The Constitution of the FSM has been the supreme law of the Federated States of Micronesia since May 10, 1979 and from that time on, nonconstitutional officials could be authorized to exercise powers assigned to the national government by the Constitution only through authorization by constitutional officials or pursuant to some other power rooted in the Constitution. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 104 (App. 1989).

In specifically authorizing the President to act pursuant to Secretarial Order 3039 in accepting executive functions from the Trust Territory, the FSM Congress implicitly adopted those provisions of Secretarial Order 3039 concerning transfer of executive functions as law of the Federated States of Micronesia. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 104 (App. 1989).

The FSM Constitution provides no authority for any courts to act within the Federated States of Micronesia, other than the FSM Supreme Court, inferior courts to be established by statute, and state or local courts. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 105 (App. 1989).

The transitional actions of the FSM Congress, intended to adopt as law of the Federated States of Micronesia those portions of Secretarial Order 3039 relating to judicial functions within the FSM and permitting the Trust Territory courts to continue functioning within the FSM pending establishment of constitutional courts, were a necessary and proper exercise of Congress' power under the Constitution to provide for a smooth and orderly transition. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 105 (App. 1989).

The FSM Supreme Court normally will refuse to review the correctness of an earlier Trust Territory High Court judgment, which has become final through affirmance on appeal or through lack of a timely appeal, and claims that the earlier judgment is ill-reasoned, unfair or even beyond the jurisdiction of the High Court typically will not be sufficient to escape the doctrine of res judicata. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 107 (App. 1989).

In light of the Trust Territory High Court's insistence on maintaining control over cases within the Federated States of Micronesia in disregard of Secretarial Order 3039 and to the exclusion of the new constitutional courts, its characterizations of Joint Rule No. 1 as "simply a memorandum" and of the words "active trial" in Secretarial Order 3039 as merely "administrative guidance," its acceptance of appeals after it was precluded from doing so by Secretarial Order 3039, its decision of appeals after Secretarial Order 3039 was terminated and its continued remand of cases to the High Court trial division for further action even after November 3, 1986, there can be no doubt that for purposes of res judicata analysis, the High Court was a court lacking capacity to make an adequately informed determination of a question concerning its own jurisdiction. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 118 (App. 1989).

Although final judgment in a case has been entered by the Trust Territory High Court, because any effort by a party to have the High Court consider its own jurisdiction would have been futile, it is procedurally fair to later afford the party an opportunity to question that jurisdiction. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 118-19 (App. 1989).

Where the Trust Territory High Court improperly retained a case for four years after the FSM Supreme Court was certified, and continued to hold the case more than a year after the Truk State Court was established, issuing a judgment based upon filed papers, without there ever having been a trial, let alone an active trial, in the case, by the time judgment was issued the subject matter of the litigation was so plainly beyond the High Court's jurisdiction that its entertaining the action was a manifest abuse of authority. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 119 (App. 1989).

Where the Trust Territory High Court's exercise of jurisdiction was a manifest abuse of authority, allowing the judgment of the High Court to stand would undermine the decision-making guidelines and policies reflected in the judicial guidance clauses of the national and state constitutions and would thwart the efforts of the framers of the Constitution to reallocate court jurisdiction within the Federated States of Micronesia by giving local decision-makers control over disputes concerning ownership of land. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 119 (App. 1989).

Decisions regarding res judicata and the transitional activities of the Trust Territory High Court typically should be made on the basis of larger policy considerations rather than the equities lying with or against a particular party. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 120 (App. 1989).

Actions of the Trust Territory High Court taken after the establishment of functioning constitutional courts in the Federated States of Micronesia, and without a good faith determination after a full and fair hearing as to whether the "active trial" exception permitted retention of the cases, were null and void, even though the parties failed to object, because the High Court was without jurisdiction to act and its conduct constituted usurpation of power. United Church of Christ v. Hamo, 4 FSM R. 95, 122 (App. 1989).

The Corporations, Partnership and Agency regulations were adopted pursuant to, and affect the reach of, the Trust Territory statute regulating corporations and, since those statutory provisions are part of FSM national law by virtue of the Transition Clause of the FSM Constitution, the regulations too must retain their effect until they are amended or repealed pursuant to FSM law. Mid-Pac Constr. Co. v. Senda, 4 FSM R. 376, 381 (Pon. 1990).

The Corporation, Partnership and Association Regulations incorporated by 37 TTC 52 (1980) remain in effect as FSM national law by virtue of the Transition Clause, FSM Const. art. XV, § 1, until they are amended or repealed by Congress. Mid-Pacific Constr. Co. v. Semes (II), 6 FSM R. 180, 187 (Pon. 1993).

Statutes and case law inherited from the Trust Territory are invalid to the extent that they are inconsistent with the state constitution which is the supreme law of Chuuk. Nimeisa v. Department of Public Works, 6 FSM R. 205, 210 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1993).

The United States could not assume responsibility for, or be held liable for, the absence of separate adjudicatory body for public land disputes when the exclusive authority to establish such a body had been transferred to the Ponape district legislature. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 528 (Pon. 1994).

Title 3 of the Trust Territory Code represents interim legislation prior to the time when the former Trust Territory Districts were chartered, and had no continuing existence after the adoption of the Truk Charter in 1977. Wainit v. Weno, 7 FSM R. 121, 123 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1995).

Whether carryover provisions from the Trust Territory Code are state or national laws must be determined on a statute-by-statute, or a section-by-section, basis. Burke v. Torwal, 7 FSM R. 531, 534 (Pon. 1996).

The reciprocal child support enforcement provisions of chapter 17 of Title 6 of the FSM Code remain in effect as part of state law. Burke v. Torwal, 7 FSM R. 531, 534 (Pon. 1996).

A proceeding for enforcement of a CNMI child support order in the FSM is properly filed in state court by the state attorney general, not in national court by the FSM Attorney General. Burke v. Torwal, 7 FSM R. 531, 535-36 (Pon. 1996).

Because whatever vestigial authority the Trust Territory or the United States may have had after May 10, 1979, disappeared on November 3, 1986, when the Federated States of Micronesia became independent, governmental conduct after that date is not attributable to the United States or to the Trust Territory. Nahnken of Nett v. United States, 7 FSM R. 581, 591 (App. 1996).

Although the Kosrae Constitution contains no impairment of contracts clause, it is not silent in this area. The Kosrae Transition Clause provides that contracts continue unaffected. Cornelius v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 345, 352 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 1998).

Trust Territory Code Title 67 remains in effect in Chuuk through the Chuuk Constitution Transition Clause. Pau v. Kansou, 8 FSM R. 524, 526 (Chk. 1998).

Title 32, sections 301 et seq. date from the Trust Territory period but continue in effect pursuant to the FSM Constitution's Transition Clause. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 301, 305 (Pon. 2000).

Via the analogy implicated by the Transition Clause, under a statute carried over from the Trust Territory which speaks in terms of the Trust Territory and any of its political subdivisions as being persons, Pohnpei is also a person to the same extent that a Trust Territory political subdivision was a person under the statute's prior incarnation. AHPW, Inc. v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 301, 305 (Pon. 2000).

Trust Territory statutes that mostly never took effect cannot be relied upon to interpret provisions of the FSM Constitution. Chuuk v. Secretary of Finance, 9 FSM R. 424, 432-33 (App. 2000).

Under the Chuuk Constitution's transition clause, Trust Territory Code Title 67, which authorizes and empowers land commissions to determine the ownership of any land in its district, applies in Chuuk. In re Lot No. 014-A-21, 9 FSM R. 484, 490 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 1999).

Chuuk, as the succeeding sovereign, is entitled to rely on the taking of the land in question by the Trust Territory, the previous sovereign, and is not required to correct any wrong in the original 1968 Trust Territory taking because it is now too late. Sefich v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 517, 518 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

When in 1968 the Trust Territory entered the land in question and, pursuant to 6 TTC 302, acquired title by adverse possession 20 years later in 1988, Chuuk is the successor to the title. Sefich v. Chuuk, 9 FSM R. 517, 519 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2000).

Title 6, chapter 10, subchapter 1 of the FSM Code is replete with references to officials who either do not exist now or who no longer carry out the functions with which they are identified in the statute, and when confronted with such language in a section thereof, the FSM Supreme Court has generally ruled that the section applies only to the Trust Territory High Court. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. 2000).

The witness fees in 6 F.S.M.C. 1011 apply only to the Trust Territory High Court. FSM v. Kuranaga, 9 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. 2000).

Trust Territory statutes continue in effect except to the extent they are inconsistent with the Constitution, or are amended or repealed. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 62 (Pon. 2001).

Title 67, Section 2 of the Trust Territory Code continues in effect under the transition clause of the FSM Constitution, is consistent with other provisions in the FSM and Pohnpei Constitutions, and clearly confirms that all marine areas below the ordinary high water mark belong to the government. Pohnpei v. KSVI No. 3, 10 FSM R. 53, 66 (Pon. 2001).

Trust Territory Code Title 67 remains in effect in Chuuk through the Chuuk Constitution Transition Clause. Small v. Roosevelt, Innocenti, Bruce & Crisostomo, 10 FSM R. 367, 369 (Chk. 2001).

A Trust Territory statute (except to the extent it is amended, repealed, or is inconsistent with the Constitution), which related to matters that now fall within the national government's legislative powers became national law upon the Constitution's ratification, and the other Trust Territory laws presumably became law of each of the states at the same time; and if neither state nor national powers alone are sufficient to carry out the statute's original purpose, or if state and national powers are invoked, then the statute is enforceable as both state and national law. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 414-15 (Pon. 2001).

Because the national government has the exclusive power to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, the Consumer Protection Act is the law of the FSM insofar as any advertising, sale, offer or distribution involves commerce between the states of the FSM or with any foreign entity. The Consumer Protection Act also is the law of the states of the FSM, insofar as it involves commerce which is intrastate and has not been repealed by the state legislatures. Foods Pacific, Ltd. v. H.J. Heinz Co. Australia, 10 FSM R. 409, 415 (Pon. 2001).

Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code remains Chuuk state law pursuant to the Chuuk Constitution's Transition Clause and because it has never been amended or repealed. Stephen v. Chuuk, 11 FSM R. 36, 41 n.1 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

A Kosrae district Trust Territory High Court judgment in a trespass action will not be set aside as invalid because it was in a designated land registration area when the registration area designation was not filed in the Kosrae district High Court and the prevailing defendants did not ask that title be issued to them, but only that the complaint be dismissed. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 172-73 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

The Kosrae State Court has always accepted and enforced Trust Territory High Court decisions as valid and binding, consistent with the Kosrae constitutional provisions on transition of government. Sigrah v. Kosrae State Land Comm'n, 11 FSM R. 169, 173 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2002).

Under the FSM Constitution's Transition Clause, Trust Territory statutes applicable to the states became part of the states' laws regardless of whether they were published in the FSM Code; they are the laws of the states until amended, superseded or repealed. Villazon v. Mafnas, 11 FSM R. 309, 311 (Pon. 2003).

When a state has not enacted laws in an area within its jurisdiction such as child support, national law is applicable to the state court proceeding, because the Trust Territory Code reciprocal support enforcement provisions, now codified at 6 F.S.M.C. 1711, are imputed to be state law under the FSM Constitution's Transition Clause. Under that clause, Trust Territory statutes that were applicable to the states became part of the states' laws regardless of whether they were published thereby. They stand as the laws of the states until amended, superseded or repealed. Anson v. Rutmag, 11 FSM R. 570, 572 (Pon. 2003).

When the Chuuk Legislature has made no effort to repeal, supersede or amend the Trust Territory Code regarding land tenure in Chuuk, pursuant to Article XV, § 9 of the Chuuk Constitution, the Trust Territory Code provisions still apply to land disputes. Chuuk v. Ernist Family, 12 FSM R. 154, 158 n.3 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2003).

The states of Yap and Kosrae repealed the Trust Territory Code when they enacted their state codes. Kitti Mun. Gov't v. Pohnpei, 13 FSM R. 503, 509 (App. 2005).

Generally, when the word "district" appears in an FSM Code provision carried over from the Trust Territory Code by virtue of the Constitution's Transition Clause, "state" will be read in its place. FSM v. Kansou, 14 FSM R. 136, 138 n.1 (Chk. 2006).

Under the Chuuk Constitution's Transition Clause, Trust Territory Code Title 8 is still applicable law in Chuuk. Chuuk v. Andrew, 15 FSM R. 39, 42 n.2 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Trust Territory judicial decisions are not stare decisis, that is, they are not binding precedent on FSM courts. Nakamura v. Moen Municipality, 15 FSM R. 213, 218 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2007).

Since a statute in force in the State of Chuuk on the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution continues in effect to the extent it is consistent with the Chuuk Constitution, or until it is amended or repealed; since nothing in the Trust Territory survival of actions statute is inconsistent with the Chuuk Constitution; and since the statute has not been amended or repealed, 6 TTC 151(1) remains the law in Chuuk. Dereas v. Eas, 15 FSM R. 446, 448 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2007).

Chapter six of Title Six is the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands sovereign immunity statute. If it ever had any application to the FSM, it would have been supplanted or repealed by implication when the FSM Congress enacted a sovereign immunity statute, FSM Pub. L. No. 1-141, specifically applicable to the FSM national government. It remained part of the FSM Code because, at the time the FSM laws were codified, the Trust Territory government retained vestigial functions and authority in the FSM. By its terms, chapter six relates only to the Trust Territory government's liability and not to the liability of any of the FSM constitutional governments. FSM v. GMP Hawaii, Inc., 16 FSM R. 601, 604 (Pon. 2009).

Trust Territory High Court decisions are not stare decisis in the Federated States of Micronesia, but their rationale may be adopted when persuasive. Roosevelt v. Truk Island Developers, 17 FSM R. 207, 212 (Chk. 2010).

Trust Territory Code Title 17 is retained as Chuuk state law through the Chuuk Constitution's Transition Clause. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 535, 540 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

Title 67 of the Trust Territory Code remains Chuuk state law pursuant to the Chuuk Constitution's Transition Clause and because it has not been amended or repealed. FSM Dev. Bank v. Kansou, 17 FSM R. 605, 608 n.2 (Chk. 2011).

The term "Trust Territory" in statutes carried over from the Trust Territory Code should generally be read as meaning "Federated States of Micronesia" when the power involved is a national power. Chuuk Health Care Plan v. Pacific Int'l, Inc., 17 FSM R. 617, 619 n.1 (Chk. 2011).

A statute in force in Chuuk on the Chuuk Constitution's effective date continues in effect to the extent it is consistent with the Chuuk Constitution or until it is amended or repealed. Thus 1TTC 103 is still effective statutory law in Chuuk. Ruben v. Chuuk, 18 FSM R. 425, 430 n.1 (Chk. 2012).

Since, under the Transition Clause, a statute in force in the State of Chuuk on the effective date of the Chuuk Constitution continues in effect to the extent it is consistent with the Chuuk Constitution or until it is amended or repealed, both 67 TTC 453 and 454 remain as Chuuk state law until amended or repealed since both are consistent with the Chuuk Constitution which requires "just compensation," and since they have not been repealed by implication because they occupy gaps in the recently enacted Chuuk eminent domain statute. In re Lot No. 029-A-47, 18 FSM R. 456, 459 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2012).

An argument that citizens' rights must be upheld over a Trust Territory High Court judgment because the Trust Territory High Court was not a constitutional court must be rejected when there were no constitutional courts in 1960 when the judgment was issued and the Trust Territory courts were the only functioning court system then. The impropriety of the Trust Territory High Court deciding cases when both the Trust Territory High Court and constitutional FSM courts were simultaneously in existence and functioning thus offers no support. Heirs of Henry v. Heirs of Akinaga, 19 FSM R. 296, 303-04 (App. 2014).

Under a plain reading of Secretarial Order 2969, Trust Territory public lands were transferred to the respective Trust Territory districts, and thus Trust Territory public lands on Weno were earlier transferred to the Truk District government. Although, on July 12, 1979, when the FSM Constitution took effect, any Trust Territory government interest in property was transferred to the FSM for retention or distribution in accordance with the FSM Constitution, public land on Weno was not Trust Territory government property since all Trust Territory public land there had already been transferred to the Truk district government. It would thus have been Truk district government property. Chuuk v. Weno Municipality, 20 FSM R. 582, 584-85 (Chk. 2016).

Under Secretarial Order 2969, Amendment No. 1, Trust Territory public lands in Chuuk were conveyed to the Chartered Truk District Government, and the Chuuk state government is the legal successor to the Truk district government. Iwo v. Chuuk, 20 FSM R. 652, 655 (Chk. 2016).

Neither Secretarial Order No. 2969 nor Secretarial Order No. 3039 relates to privately held land, nor do they dictate how the FSM as a nation should structure its government to deal with issues related to private lands and their title, transfer, and ownership. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 332 (Pon. 2019).

The FSM Constitution, art. XV, § 3, states that a property interest held by the Trust Territory government is transferred to the FSM for retention or distribution in accordance with the Constitution. Other FSM Constitution provisions govern land ownership and use, and FSM law allows for national government eminent domain and real property acquisition. FSM Dev. Bank v. Lighor, 22 FSM R. 321, 333 (Pon. 2019).

Chuuk State Constitution's transition clause provides that statutes in force at the time the Constitution took effect remain in effect to the extent they comply with the Constitution, or until amended or repealed. Chuuk State Land Mgt. v. Jesse, 22 FSM R. 573, 576 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 2020).

TRANSLATION

Where plaintiff's complaint is written in English and the defendant requests a written translation into a local Micronesian language, and where it appears that this is the only language the defendant can speak or read, the trial judge may order that the court provide a written translation and that the expense of providing the translation shall be taxed as a cost to the party not prevailing in the action. Rawepi v. Billimon, 2 FSM R. 240, 241 (Truk 1986).

Because the Chuuk Constitution provides that Chuukese is the state language, but both Chuukese and English are official languages, a criminal appellant in the Chuuk State Supreme Court has no constitutional right to a transcript in both Chuukese and English. Reselap v. Chuuk, 8 FSM R. 584, 586 (Chk. S. Ct. App. 1998).

Since the appellate record must be sufficient to permit the court to insure that the issues on appeal were properly raised before the trial court, the appellants are responsible for presenting a record sufficient to permit the court to decide the issues raised on appeal, and the record must be one which provides the court with a fair and accurate account of what transpired in the trial court. They therefore have the burden of providing an appendix that is reviewable by the court – a certified translation of the Chuukese transcript. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 301, 303 (App. 2010).

When an appellant argues that some of the trial court's legal and factual findings are incorrect, specifically its factual findings about the ownership of a particular piece of land, the issue is certainly relevant to the appeal, but without a translation of the deposition transcript, the appellate court cannot conclude that the deposition transcript is relevant. Thus, if the deposition transcript's assertions are part of the reported case, there is no need to include it in the appendix but if the assertions are not part of the reported case, the appellants have the burden of providing a certified translation of the deposition transcript.

Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 301, 303 (App. 2010).

When the trial transcript and a deposition transcript relied upon by the appellants are in Chuukese and have not been translated, the court may order the appellants: 1) to provide a certified translation of the trial transcript and either a certified translation of the deposition transcript or a statement that the appellants will not rely on the deposition transcript; or 2) to stipulate to a continuation of oral argument and move for enlargement of time to file a certified translation; or 3) to proceed with oral argument as scheduled without the benefit of the appendix. Setik v. Ruben, 17 FSM R. 301, 303 (App. 2010).

Usually, when the record is not in a form that fairly and accurately provides the appellate court with an account of what happened in the lower court because it has not been translated into English, the appellate court will stop the analysis of the issue there and proceed to the next since the appellants have not met their responsibility to present the court with a record sufficient to permit it to decide the issues raised on appeal and which provides the court with a fair and accurate account of what transpired in the trial court proceedings. Heirs of Mackwelung v. Heirs of Mackwelung, 17 FSM R. 500, 504 n.2 (App. 2011).

Appellate litigants should translate court decisions and other necessary parts of the record into English in order to facilitate and ensure a proper appellate review. Otherwise, the appellate court may be unable, except in an uncommon case, to ensure a proper review of the record and the litigants' arguments. Heirs of Benjamin v. Heirs of Benjamin, 17 FSM R. 650, 657 n.2 (App. 2011).

The scope and manner of examination and cross-examination during the Rule 15 depositions is the same as would be allowed in the trial itself. This includes the prosecution making available to the defendant or his counsel for examination and use during the deposition any statement of the witness being deposed which is in the government's possession and to which the defendant would be entitled at the trial. The deposition procedure will also include frequent pauses in the testimony so as to allow for translation for the defendant's benefit. The prosecution will be responsible for engaging and compensating a court-approved translator so that the defendant can follow the testimony and confer with his defense counsel. FSM v. Tipingeni, 19 FSM R. 439, 450 (Chk. 2014).

Translation expenses are generally allowed as costs. Pohnpei v. M/V Ping Da 7, 20 FSM R. 75, 79 (Pon. 2015).

TREATIES

Conduct of foreign affairs and the implementation of international agreements are properly left to the non-judicial branches of government. The judicial branch has the power to interpret treaties. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 103 (App. 1993).

Extradition treaties are to be construed liberally to effect their purpose of surrender of fugitives to be tried for their alleged offenses. In re Extradition of Jano, 6 FSM R. 93, 103 (App. 1993).

The ordinary or usual meaning shall be given to words, phrases, and terms in a treaty. Terms are to be considered in their context and a contrary meaning may be indicated by the context. Preparatory documents and subsequent conduct of the parties can be used to determine the parties' intentions. Alep v. United States, 6 FSM R. 214, 218 (Chk. 1993).

Although the FSM Supreme Court has the power to interpret treaties, it should not do so if the issue may be decided on other grounds. Louis v. Kutta, 8 FSM R. 228, 229-30 (Chk. 1998).

The imposition of community service on a juvenile offender would not violate the provisions or spirit of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child since community service, could be considered as guidance, supervision, counseling, education and vocational training, which are all preferred alternatives to institutional care (detention), which is also explicitly permitted under the Convention. Kosrae v. Ned, 13

FSM R. 351, 354 (Kos. S. Ct. Tr. 2005).

Extradition treaties are to be liberally construed to effect their purpose of surrender of the persons sought to be tried for their alleged crimes. In re Extradition of Benny Law Boon Leng, 13 FSM R. 370, 372 (Yap 2005).

An "access agreement" is a treaty, agreement or arrangement entered into by the Authority pursuant to Title 24 in relation to access to the exclusive economic zone for fishing by foreign fishing vessels. But a fishing access agreement is usually not a treaty because treaties are compacts or agreements between sovereign nations and most fishing access agreements are commercial agreements between the FSM national government and a commercial enterprise. They are business deals – not treaties. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189 (Pon. 2010).

A treaty is a compact made between two or more independent nations with a view to the public welfare. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 189-90 (Pon. 2010).

Since the Constitution specifically delegates to Congress the power to ratify treaties but does not grant Congress the power to approve or reject fishing access agreements, ruling unconstitutional the statute that requires congressional approval for fishing access agreements for more than nine vessels would not impair Congress's ability to ratify treaties and to advise and consent to presidential appointments. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

Since approval of commercial fishing agreements is not a power that the Constitution confers on Congress, but a power that Congress has conferred upon itself by statute, the court's conclusion that that statute is unconstitutional does not have any effect on access agreements that are actually negotiated and concluded as treaties between sovereign nations because, just like any other treaty, the President would continue to submit those to Congress for ratification. Pacific Foods & Servs., Inc. v. National Oceanic Res. Mgt. Auth., 17 FSM R. 181, 190 (Pon. 2010).

Article 15 of the 1944 Convention on International Aviation, which bars fees, dues, or other charges being imposed by any contracting State in respect solely of the right of transit over or entry into or exit from its territory of any aircraft of a contracting State or persons thereon, does not bar a tax only on outgoing passengers, freight, or cargo from Chuuk. Continental Micronesia, Inc. v. Chuuk, 17 FSM R. 526, 533-34 (Chk. 2011).

In order to ratify a treaty, two-thirds of the members of Congress must vote in favor of ratification. Ratification may not be done by the resolution process where only eight votes are necessary. Congress v. Pacific Food & Servs., Inc., 17 FSM R. 542, 547 & n.1 (App. 2011).

A treaty is an international agreement concluded between states in written form and governed by international law, whether embodied in a single instrument or in two or more related instruments and whatever its particular designation. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 490 n.2 (Pon. 2014).

Pacta sunt servanda ("agreements must be kept"), is the rule of law that applies to all agreements made within the framework of the international legal system, and is the basis of the law of treaties, and once in force treaties are binding on the parties to them and must be performed in good faith. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 492 & n.5 (Pon. 2014).

A treaty signed by the President, and ratified by Congress, is our law. FSM v. Ezra, 19 FSM R. 486, 497 (Pon. 2014).

Only those fisheries management agreements that require the FSM to enforce, on a reciprocal basis, the fisheries laws of foreign countries against persons who have violated the fisheries law of that foreign country, must, under 24 F.S.M.C. 120(2), implemented by National Oceanic Resource Management Authority regulation. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 304 (Pon. 2016).

A fisheries management agreement is any agreement, arrangement, or treaty in force to which the FSM is a party, not including any access agreement, which has as its primary purpose cooperation in or coordination of fisheries management measures in all or part of the region. Such an agreement, by its nature, would not be self-executing. FSM v. Kimura, 20 FSM R. 297, 304 (Pon. 2016).

In determining whether a treaty is self-executing, a court looks to the text, the negotiation and drafting history, and the postratification understanding of the signatory nations. Preparatory documents and the parties' subsequent conduct can be used to determine the parties' intentions. Additionally, the executive branch's interpretation of a treaty is entitled to great weight. Estate of Gallen v. Governor, 21 FSM R. 457, 461 n.1 (Pon. 2018).

TRUSTEESHIP AGREEMENT

Under article 6 of the Trusteeship Agreement, the United States is obligated to foster the development of suitable political institutions with the goal of self-government by the inhabitants, and to promote economic, social and educational advancement. Neimes v. Maeda Constr. Co., 1 FSM R. 47, 51 (Truk 1981).

Interpretation of Secretarial Order 3039 as acquiescing in FSM Supreme Court jurisdiction over suits against the Trust Territory does not conflict with any residual United States obligation to oversee activities of the FSM courts pending termination of the Trusteeship Agreement nor does this interpretation imperil any interest the United States government may have in protecting the Trust Territory government against unfair or overreaching actions by the courts of the new constitutional governments. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 64 (Kos. 1982).

Trusteeship principles call for similarity between the self-government accorded the peoples of the Northern Mariana Islands by the United States, and that granted other parts of the Trust Territory. If the administering authority were to permit those peoples selecting a closer and more dependent relationship with the administering authority a higher degree of autonomy than those seeking other relationships, the dual standard could suggest an effort to discourage self-government and independence of the people within the Trust Territory. Lonno v. Trust Territory (I), 1 FSM R. 53, 67 (Kos. 1982).

The interim nature and limited purpose of the Trust Territory Court, the District Courts and the Community Courts does not suggest that these entities are immune to the restraints imposed upon officials authorized to act by constitutions or statutes approved by citizens of the Federated States of Micronesia or their representatives. To the contrary, respect for constitutional self-government and the Trusteeship Agreement provisions to which they trace their power to act here, mandate that these interim entities act with great restraint, only as necessary to supplement the constitutional courts and until creation of constitutional courts here. In re Iriarte (I), 1 FSM R. 239, 244-45 (Pon. 1983).

The Trust Territory High Court must promote constitutional self-government to satisfy the provisions of the Trusteeship Agreement to which is subject. In re Iriarte (II), 1 FSM R. 255, 268 (Pon. 1983).

The Trusteeship Agreement cannot be given retroactive effect to cover events that took place before it came into force. Alep v. United States, 6 FSM R. 214, 216 (Chk. 1993).

Monetary damages are not legal remedies available to an individual for breach of the Trusteeship Agreement, either through the treaty or as codified. Alep v. United States, 6 FSM R. 214, 217-18 (Chk. 1993).

A U.S. statute requiring aliens to dispose of landholdings within ten years of acquisition never applied in the Trust Territory because the Trust Territory never had the status of a U.S. territory and the U.S. Congress never specifically extended its application to the Trust Territory. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 524-25 (Pon. 1994).

The Trusteeship Agreement does not provide individuals with a private cause of action for damages for alleged breach of any of its provisions. Nahnken of Nett v. United States (III), 6 FSM R. 508, 526 (Pon. 1994).

Although the Trusteeship Agreement was a source of individual legal rights, it, standing alone, did not create private rights of action for money damages for bureaucratic abuses attributed to U.S. or Trust Territory officials. Alep v. United States, 7 FSM R. 494, 496 (App. 1996).

WEAPONS

There is no automatic prohibition against use of a dangerous weapon to protect oneself and family against an intruder, even against an intruder without a weapon, so long as the weapon is not used in deadly fashion and the actual force employed is not more than would be reasonably necessary for purposes of protection. FSM v. Ruben, 1 FSM R. 34, 38 (Truk 1981).

Whether a particular item is dangerous often depends upon the use to which it is being put. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 511 (App. 1984).

A "dangerous weapon" under 11 F.S.M.C. 919(1) is an object which, as used, may be anticipated to produce death or great bodily harm. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 512 (App. 1984).

In considering whether the term "dangerous weapon" is so vague as to render 11 F.S.M.C. 919 unconstitutional, it is relevant that a court in the United States has held that term sufficiently definite to meet United States constitutional standards. Laion v. FSM, 1 FSM R. 503, 513 (App. 1984).

A gun with a defective trigger is a firearm under 11 F.S.M.C. 1204(4). The statute's purpose may not be evaded by such simple expedients as dismantling the weapon, maintaining weapons and ammunition in separate places, removing one easily replaceable part, or other similar ploys. Under the statute, current operability is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a firearm. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 34 (App. 1985).

Because a Rule 41(e) motion for return of seized property is predicated on the seizure's illegality and the showing of a right to possession, return of unregistered firearms is improper because possession of unregistered firearms is unlawful there is thus no right to possession. FSM v. Santa, 8 FSM R. 266, 268 (Chk. 1998).

A dangerous weapon is any object that, as used or attempted to be used, can endanger life or inflict great bodily harm. Shoes worn on the feet are dangerous weapons when used to kick a victim. Stationary objects can also be dangerous or deadly weapons. Palik v. Kosrae, 8 FSM R. 509, 513 (App. 1998).

A Philippine slingshot consists of a forked piece of wood to which is attached an elastic that is used to propel a piece of sharpened metal that has been crafted into a dart-like object, often feathered at one end for aerial stability. It is this metal dart-like object that transforms a regular (not particularly dangerous) slingshot, which uses stones, into a dangerous Philippine slingshot. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 174 (Chk. 2007).

A Philippine slingshot is a dangerous device within the statutory definition. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 175 (Chk. 2007).

An individual who manufactures, produces, uses, sells, possesses, acquires, or disposes a slingshot, pachinko, arrow or dart nikapich or Indian pana has violated Chuuk state law. The legislature has defined possession as the holding of the slingshot or pachinko, arrow or dart or nikapich or Indian pana, which includes keeping inside or outside the house or within the premises of the owner, inside any vehicles, offices, or anywhere which a person suspected to be in possession placed it. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 143 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When, although the government did not present any direct evidence to prove its point, it presented compelling circumstantial evidence that before the victim was shot the defendant had been arguing with the witness, at which time he threatened her with non-specific bodily harm, and within seconds of his threat a dart was shot from the defendant's location toward the witness's location and hit her daughter, who she was holding in her arms, the government has met its burden to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did unlawfully use a slingshot. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

When an eyewitness saw the defendant with a slingshot in his possession, this account of the defendant holding an slingshot in his hand is sufficient to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he did unlawfully possess a slingshot. Chuuk v. Roman, 21 FSM R. 138, 145 (Chk. S. Ct. Tr. 2017).

– Exemptions

Some exceptions under 11 F.S.M.C. 1203, whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible, relate to considerations separate from the essential elements of the crime and require the defendant to place them in issue. A defendant claiming exemption as a law enforcement officer or United States military person engaged in official duty, §§ 1203(1), (4), or as a designated crocodile hunter, § 1203(5), is not disputing any element of the government's basic case. Instead, these exemption claims bring into play new facts, uniquely within the knowledge of the defendant, which the government could overlook by focusing on whether the conduct prohibited by the Weapons Control Act has occurred. The defendant is in a far better position to place these exemptions in issue and it is fair to require that he do so. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 36 (App. 1985).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1203(1), (4) and (5) exemptions, whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible, are defenses within the meaning of 11 F.S.M.C. 107, although they are not affirmative defenses for they are not so designated. The ultimate burden of persuasion remains with the government, but the defendant has the burden of going forward with sufficient evidence to raise these exemptions as issues. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 36 (App. 1985).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1203(2) exemption for curios, ornaments and historical pieces whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible requires findings that the firearm be in "unserviceable condition" and "incapable of being fired or discharged." Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37 (App. 1985).

Inapplicability of the 11 F.S.M.C. 1203(2) exemption whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible because it is in unserviceable condition, is incapable of being fired or discharged and is being kept as a curio, ornament or historical piece is an essential element of the government's case in prosecution for unlawful possession of a firearm under 11 F.S.M.C. 1202. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37 (App. 1985).

A trial court may not simply presume that a person who possesses a firearm is not keeping it as a curio, ornament or for historical significance. This would be an irrational or arbitrary, hence unconstitutional, presumption or inference because one cannot determine from mere possession of a firearm alone the purpose or nature of that possession. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37 (App. 1985).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1203(2) exemption whereunder possession of a firearm is permissible applies only if the firearm is: 1) unserviceable; 2) incapable of being fired or discharged; and 3) being kept as a curio, ornament or for its historical significance. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37-38 (App. 1985).

When the accused produced no evidence to substantiate his claim that the weapon he allegedly possessed was in unserviceable condition (such as producing the weapon itself, or even a witness's report on the weapon's condition) and that it was kept as a curio, an ornament, or for historical purposes, but instead, argued that despite his repeated discovery requests, the government had failed to provide access to the firearm that he allegedly possessed so that it could, in turn, be inspected, this argument is more appropriately suited for a motion to compel discovery, rather than a motion to dismiss. The accused is free to raise at trial the defense that the weapon he allegedly possessed falls within the exemption. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 463, 466 (Chk. 2008).

A "mini bag," which is an easily-transportable article similar in that nature to a purse, handbag, brief case, attache case, or backpack, is not an "enclosed customary depository" within the meaning of the statutory exception to the statutory presumption that a firearm, dangerous device, or ammunition found in a vehicle or vessel, is prima facie evidence that such firearm, dangerous device, or ammunition is in the possession of all persons in the vehicle or vessel. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 533 (Chk. 2009).

The inapplicability of the 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2) exemption is an essential element of the government's case in a prosecution for unlawful possession of a firearm, and since it is an essential element 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2)'s inapplicability must be pled. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 128-29 (Chk. 2011).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2), in order to be exempt from criminal liability for possession of a firearm, the court must be persuaded beyond a reasonable doubt that the firearm is: 1) unserviceable; 2) incapable of being fired or discharged; and 3) being kept as a curio, ornament or for its historical value. All three of these requirements must be satisfied for this exemption to apply. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

Current operability of a firearm absolutely negates application of the Section 1003(2) exemption. For the exemption to apply, a firearm's current inoperability is not enough; it must also be proven that the firearm was not being kept as either a curio, or an ornament, or for its historical value or significance. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

An information charging firearms possession is sufficient if it or the supporting affidavit contains an allegation that negates any one of the three 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2) requirements and the prosecution's proof at trial is sufficient if it negates beyond a reasonable doubt any one of the three requirements. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

A supporting affidavit's averment that the accused had been drinking and was openly displaying the handgun at the public market is viewed as just barely enough to give the accused notice of the essential element of the charges against him that the 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2) exemption does not apply because in the appellate court's view, an intoxicated defendant displaying a firearm in public is inconsistent with the 1003(2) exemption because it is inconsistent with a claim that the accused was keeping the handgun as a curio, ornament, or a piece with historical value. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 129 (Chk. 2011).

Under 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2), in order to be exempt from criminal liability for possession of a firearm, the court must be persuaded beyond a reasonable doubt that the firearm is: 1) unserviceable; 2) incapable of being fired or discharged; and 3) being kept as a curio, ornament, or for its historical value. All three of these requirements must be satisfied for this exemption to apply, and if any one of them is not met, this exception does not apply. FSM v. Sonis, 18 FSM R. 620, 622 (Chk. 2013).

When there is evidence before the court from which the court can infer that the handgun was serviceable – testimony of two officers that they had tried to and did get the firearm to work and from that evidence the court could infer that the handgun was capable of being fired or discharged; and when, from the circumstances under which the firearm was found and where it was found, abandoned by the accused in a mop bucket at Chuuk International Airport (right where he told the police he left it), the court could infer that he was not keeping the handgun as a curio, or as an ornament, or for its historical value but that his possession of the handgun must have been for some other reason. FSM v. Sonis, 18 FSM R. 620, 622 (Chk. 2013).

A 9mm handgun that was not kept as a curio, ornament, or for its historical significance or value is not exempt under 11 F.S.M.C. 1003(2). FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 533 n.2 (Yap 2020).

– Identification Card

In requiring an identification card in order to possess a dangerous device there was not an intent to require such a card for that category of dangerous devices which can be used to inflict bodily harm and which under the circumstances of its possession serves no lawful purpose. 11 F.S.M.C. 1204(3). Este v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 132, 136-37 (App. 1989).

There is no Weapons Control Act provision that bans the importation of an otherwise legal firearm without possessing a valid identification card issued by the FSM Department of Justice. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398, 399 n.6 (Kos. 2017).

A person without an identification card can violate either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) by acquiring or purchasing, or by possessing, or by using a firearm. But if that person, without a valid identification card, does any of those things but does not carry the firearm, that person has not committed the lesser misdemeanor of 11 F.S.M.C. 1007. The misdemeanor's key element is the carrying of a firearm. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

If a defendant holds a valid identification card, then he cannot be convicted of violating either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1), even though the firearm he possesses is illegal and cannot be registered under 11 F.S.M.C. 1019, but he could be prosecuted under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5). FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

A person does not need to own or possess any firearm, dangerous device, or ammunition to apply for and to be issued an identification card. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

The statutory scheme in FSM Weapons Control Act, chapter 10 of the FSM Code, clearly requires that a person must hold a valid identification card before obtaining possession of a firearm or ammunition. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

Section 1023(5) is directed to the evil of prohibited firearms and 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) are directed to the evil of persons not obtaining a valid identification card before possessing firearms or ammunition. Thus, Congress clearly intended to address different evils with these different statutory provisions. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

– Importation

Pleading whether the firearms in question were .22 caliber handguns or .22 caliber rifles is essential because importing the former is banned by the statute, while importing the latter is not. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398 (Kos. 2017).

There is no Weapons Control Act provision that bans the importation of an otherwise legal firearm without possessing a valid identification card issued by the FSM Department of Justice. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398, 399 n.6 (Kos. 2017).

The purchase, possession, or use of a firearm is prohibited without a proper identification card, but this prohibition does not include importation. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 398 (Kos. 2017).

The Weapons Control Act does not forbid a person from importing a .22 caliber rifle through the postal service, without holding a license, and applying for a permit before or upon the legal firearm's arrival in the FSM so that he may legally possess and use the imported firearm, with the weapon being seized by FSM Customs Officers until the permit application is granted or denied. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 399

(Kos. 2017).

There cannot be a conspiracy when the achievement of the alleged conspiracy was the importation, without a valid identification card, of two firearms that are permitted to be licensed, which is not a national crime. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 400 (Kos. 2017).

The court will dismiss charges for illegal possession of ammunition when the factual basis for the charges is entirely insufficient since no one in the FSM ever actually possessed the ammunition because customs officers seized it after postal officials notified them of an incoming package's contents. FSM v. Pelep, 22 FSM R. 400, 403 (Pon. 2019).

– National Government Jurisdiction

The national government has an interest in controlling the proliferation and use of firearms throughout Micronesia; the classifications singled out for a 10-year prohibition on possession appear reasonable. 11 F.S.M.C. 1205. FSM v. Nena, 1 FSM R. 331, 335 (Kos. 1983).

The government has a serious interest, and Congress deserves the support of the FSM Supreme Court, in carrying out policy established to control firearm use. Open violations, without punitive results, weaken the congressional policy and thwart efforts to assure that firearms will be available only to responsible people. Courts must assure that the policy is carried out against those convicted. FSM v. Nena, 1 FSM R. 331, 335-36 (Kos. 1983).

The Transition Clause of the FSM Constitution effectively adopts statutes of the Trust Territory, including the Weapons Control Act, and serves as the original enactment of a body of law, criminal as well as civil, for the new constitutional government. Further action by the FSM Congress is not necessary to establish that violations of the Weapons Control Act are prohibited within the FSM. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 43 (App. 1985).

There is nothing absurd about a weapons control scheme that recognized that both the national and the state governments have an interest in controlling the possession, use and sale of weapons. While Congress and the states may eventually wish to allocate their respective roles with more precision, the current Weapons Control Act appears to provide a workable system during these early years of transition and constitutional self-government. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 44 (App. 1985).

Congress may legislate regulation of firearms and ammunition under the foreign and interstate commerce clause of article IX, section 2(g). FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

Because Congress has the present authority to enact firearms and ammunition statutes, such previously enacted statutes have continuing vitality. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 154 (Yap 1997).

The 1991 constitutional amendment that removed national government jurisdiction over major crimes did not remove national government jurisdiction over firearms and ammunition possession under the Weapons Control Act since there was an independent jurisdictional basis for it under the Constitution's foreign and interstate commerce and national defense clauses and Congress has always had the power to define national crimes. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 574 (App. 2004).

In an examination to determine whether it is a national crime, the focus is: Does the regulation of the possession of firearms and ammunition involve a national activity or function, or is it one of an indisputably national character? Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 575 (App. 2004).

The national government can regulate firearms and ammunition possession since there is an international commerce aspect to the regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition that is related to its manufacture outside of the FSM and to its movement through the nation's customs and immigration borders and on the additional jurisdictional basis rooted in the national defense clause. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

There is a national government interest in regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition in order to provide for the national security, which furthers the nation's interest in its defense, and this, in combination with the international commerce aspects, provides a jurisdictional basis for the national government's regulation of the possession of firearms and ammunition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

The power to provide for the national defense includes the inherent authority to protect the nation from threats both foreign and domestic. Protecting from these threats includes regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

The regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition involves a national activity or function because of the international commerce aspects of its manufacture and movement, together with the national government interest in protecting the national security under the national defense clause. In combination, these provide the national government with a jurisdictional basis to regulate the possession of firearms and ammunition. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 569, 576 (App. 2004).

Even if Congress took no position on its jurisdiction based on Article IX, Section 2(a), the court is well within its power to determine jurisdiction based on this constitutional provision when it is not a situation where the action of the government is being challenged for attempting to implement a non-self-executing provision of the Constitution, but is one where the court determined what authority Congress had to enact statutes regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition. In doing so, the court did not usurp the powers of Congress. Jano v. FSM, 12 FSM R. 633, 635 (App. 2004).

The national government has the power to ban the possession and use of Philippine slingshots in those places under its jurisdiction and in those circumstances that make the offense "inherently national in character" such as when the offense is committed in the FSM Exclusive Economic Zone or in FSM airspace, or on FSM-flagged vessels, or is committed against an FSM public servant in connection with that servant's service. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 175-76 (Chk. 2007).

The regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition involved a national activity or function because of the international commerce aspects of their manufacture and movement together with the national government interest in protecting the national security under the national defense clause, and that these, in combination, provided the national government's jurisdictional basis to regulate the possession of firearms and ammunition. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

When the imported materials in a Philippine slingshot are not manufactured abroad with the intent that they be assembled into a Philippine slingshot but are manufactured abroad as other articles or as parts of other articles and are legitimately imported for other purposes but are then recycled into Philippine slingshot parts, a Philippine slingshot is manufactured locally, out of locally available materials. It does not pass through foreign or interstate commerce. That some of those materials were once imported as something else to be used for some other purpose is not enough to implicate the national government's activity or function to regulate foreign commerce. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

The possession or use of a Philippine slingshot does not implicate the national government's functions and activities in the sphere of national defense or security and the connection, if there is one, is too tenuous to give the national government authority to regulate Philippine slingshots. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

The national government certainly has the power to criminalize possession or use of explosive, incendiary or poison gas bomb, grenade, mine or similar devices on the same basis that it has the power to regulate the possession and use of firearms and ammunition because these items definitely implicate both national defense and security and foreign commerce interests on which the Jano court concluded that the national government had the authority to regulate firearms and ammunition. But Philippine slingshots do not. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 176 (Chk. 2007).

Weapons control has long been recognized as a subject on which both the national and state governments may legislate. It is thus within the power of the State of Chuuk to regulate the possession and use of Philippine slingshots. If it has not done so, that does not mean that it cannot. FSM v. Masis, 15 FSM R. 172, 177 (Chk. 2007).

It has long been recognized that both the national and state governments may enact legislation regulating the possession of firearms. There is nothing particularly absurd about a weapons control scheme that recognizes that both the national and the state governments have an interest in controlling the possession, use and sale of weapons. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 211 (Pon. 2007).

Congress has an independent jurisdictional basis for the Weapons Control Act under FSM Constitution Article IX, Section 2(g) on foreign and interstate commerce and Article IX, Section 2(a) on national defense. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

The 1991 constitutional amendment did not proscribe Congress's authority to enact legislation pursuant to its independent authority under the national defense and foreign and interstate commerce clauses. Thus, the 1991 amendment did nothing to curtail Congress's authority to regulate the possession of firearms. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

Congress does not lack the authority to regulate possession of firearms because it was the framers' clear intent that commerce within a particular state should be regulated locally since there is an international commerce aspect to the regulation of possession of firearms and ammunition that is related to its manufacture outside of the FSM and to its movement through the nation's customs and immigration borders. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

In concluding that Congress has the authority to regulate the possession of firearms as part of its power to provide for the national defense, the court does not focus on the defendant's intended use of the firearm at issue, but instead focuses on the potential uses of firearms in general. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

Congress's authority to regulate firearms is not dependent on the defendant's subjective intent because the national government interest in regulating the possession of firearms and ammunition in order to provide for the national security in combination with the international commerce aspects provides a jurisdictional basis for the national government's regulation of the possession of firearms and ammunition. Congress's jurisdiction over the possession of firearms is not tied to the intent of a particular defendant. FSM v. Louis, 15 FSM R. 206, 212 (Pon. 2007).

The national government's power to regulate firearms is derived from both its ability to protect the national security under its power to provide for the national defense and its power to regulate international commerce aspects because of the international commerce aspect of firearms manufacture and movement. In combination, these provide the national government with a jurisdictional basis to regulate the possession of firearms and ammunition. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 238, 239 (Chk. 2007).

The national government's jurisdiction over firearms is not limited to only certain circumstances or certain quantities. What the national government can regulate in aggregate, it is able to regulate piece by piece; otherwise it would not be able to regulate it at all, and that, is clearly not the case. FSM v. Tosy, 15 FSM R. 238, 239 (Chk. 2007).

A contention that the FSM Supreme Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction over a case's firearms charges because there was no nexus between those charges and the national government's powers to regulate interstate and foreign commerce and to provide for the national defense or because national defense and foreign or interstate commerce was not involved or not implicated in the case is without merit. FSM v. Sam, 15 FSM R. 457, 459-60 (Chk. 2007).

– Weapons Control Act

The Trust Territory Weapons Control Act is not inconsistent with any provision of the Constitution. It therefore continued in effect. When the National Criminal Code was enacted, and major crimes were defined, the Trust Territory Weapons Control Act became national law and trials for violations thereof were within the FSM Supreme Court's jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 1201-1231. FSM v. Nota 1 FSM R. 299, 302-03 (Truk 1983).

National court jurisdiction over the Trust Territory Weapons Control Act is consistent with 12 F.S.M.C. 102 which states in part that criminal prosecutions shall be conducted in the name of the Federated States of Micronesia for violations of the statutes of the Trust Territory which continued in effect by virtue of the transition article of the Constitution and which are within the FSM national government's jurisdiction. 11 F.S.M.C. 1201-1231. FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 303 (Truk 1983).

8 F.S.M.C. 206 authorizes the transfer of authority from the Trust Territory and its officials to the Federated States of Micronesia government and its officials. Thus the reference in the Trust Territory Weapons Control Act to the High Commissioner and the Attorney General of the Trust Territory does not prevent its effectiveness as national law of the Federated States of Micronesia. 11 F.S.M.C. 1201-1231. FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 303 (Truk 1983).

The Weapons Control Act is clear as to its intent in its definition of "dangerous device," that is, to proscribe weapons of violence; its terms become clear in the light of that intent. 11 F.S.M.C. 1204(3). FSM v. Nota, 1 FSM R. 299, 304 (Truk 1983).

While proof of current operability is not essential to a finding of guilt for illegal possession of a firearm, the design and the capacity of the instrument to fire are at the very heart of the Weapons Control Act's definition of a firearm. To prove its case, the government must show that the device "is designed or may be converted to expel . . . projectiles." Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37 (App. 1985).

Although not always essential, current operability of a firearm should be shown by the government, where possible, as standard procedure. Ludwig v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 27, 37 (App. 1985).

The Weapons Control Act violations punishable by imprisonment of three or more years are national crimes. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 41 (App. 1985).

"Dangerous device" as defined under the Weapons Control Act is not unconstitutionally vague. The language, properly interpreted, affords sufficient notice so that conscientious citizens may avoid inadvertent violations, and constructs sufficiently definite standards to prevent arbitrary law enforcement. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 45 (App. 1985).

Three categories of devices are identified in the definition of "dangerous device" under the Weapons Control Act and the standards of proof for each differ slightly. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 45 (App. 1985).

The second category of "dangerous device" under the Weapons Control Act requires demonstration by the government that the item in question was designed or redesigned as a weapon and that the person whose possession is at issue is aware that the instrument was created or modified for that purpose. The intent and knowledge normally might be inferred from the nature of the instrument itself. It does not appear necessary that the possessor be shown to have actually intended to use the instrument as a weapon or for a wrongful purpose. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 45 (App. 1985).

For the last category of "dangerous device" under the Weapons Control Act, the forbidden instrument in question must not only be capable of causing bodily injury but it must also be possessed without any "lawful purpose." A violation occurs only when the possession is coupled with a wrongful purpose, that is, a purpose to use the instrument to cause bodily injury, or a complete absence of any lawful purpose, shown through statements or overt conduct of the possessor manifesting wrongful purpose. Joker v. FSM, 2 FSM R. 38, 45 (App. 1985).

Dangerous device is defined in three categories, 1) explosive, etc., 2) an instrument designed or redesigned as a weapon, and 3) an instrument which can be used to inflict bodily harm and which under the circumstances of its possession serves no lawful purpose. Este v. FSM, 4 FSM R. 132, 136 (App. 1989).

Because of the verbs in the statute, only "carry" is defined in the Weapons Control Act, "possess" is given its usual meaning of taking into one's possession, and possession means to have in one's control. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 155 (Yap 1997).

Because the defendant was affirmatively prevented from taking possession of the cooler which contained the bullets he never had present control or possession of the bullets and therefore was acquitted of the charge of possession of ammunition. FSM v. Fal, 8 FSM R. 151, 155 (Yap 1997).

The absence of an intent element in 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) (which prohibits any person from boarding or attempting to board a commercial airliner while carrying a firearm either on his person or in his luggage) evinces a legislative intent to dispense with the mens rea element and make the proscribed conduct a strict liability crime. The court can properly infer from Congress's silence in subsection (6) and lack of silence in subsections (1) and (2) that Congress intended that subsection (6) constitute a strict liability offense, whereas subsections (1) and (2) do not. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2000).

Although 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) does not dispense with the mental element that the defendant must know or be aware that he had the shotgun in his possession, the statute does dispense with the specific intent to board the aircraft knowing that it was illegal to do so with a shotgun. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 447 (App. 2000).

Because violation of 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6) is not a case of an attempt to commit a crime but a case where "attempt to board" is an element of the offense, 11 F.S.M.C. 201 (the attempt statute) does not apply to the crime of attempting to board a commercial aircraft with a firearm. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 448 (App. 2000).

When sufficient evidence was before the trial court such that it could reasonably have been persuaded beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did not attempt to turn in the shotgun to an appropriate official because the trial court could reasonably have concluded that the defendant's actions at the security screening area were consistent with the way any passenger might have dealt with any piece of carry on luggage, and that it did not constitute turning in the shotgun to an "appropriate official" under 11 F.S.M.C. 1223(6), its findings were not clearly erroneous and will not be disturbed. Sander v. FSM, 9 FSM R. 442, 449 (App. 2000).

Since there is no language in the aid or abet statute, 11 F.S.M.C. 301(1)(d), or in the firearms possession or use statutes, 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) and (7), that limits the application of one statute to the other, a defendant may be charged with aiding or abetting firearms possession or use. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 333 (Chk. 2006).

Subsection 1023(7) does not restrict liability to use of a firearm to commit crimes defined by Title 11 (the national criminal code) of the FSM Code or to the FSM Code in general. It prohibits use in connection with or in aid of the commission of "any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," a term which must refer to any or all criminal laws in the Federated States of Micronesia, national, state, or local because if it were otherwise, it would not be possible for the statute to have its obviously intended purpose and effect – to discourage the use of, and to punish the use of, firearms during the commission of other crimes. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 333-34 (Chk. 2006).

Since, under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the firearm was used to commit a crime, when the amended information does not allege what crime or crimes, the firearm was used to commit, or even that it was used to commit any crime, it therefore fails to allege an essential element of 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), and that count of the amended information will be dismissed for failure to state an offense. FSM v. Sam, 14 FSM R. 328, 334 (Chk. 2006).

A criminal information will not be dismissed on the ground that it fails to allege that the weapon in question was a handgun of .22 caliber or greater because the information alleges that the defendant possessed a .22 handgun and because a handgun's caliber is irrelevant since 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) prohibits the possession of any handgun, regardless of caliber. FSM v. Sato, 16 FSM R. 26, 28 (Chk. 2008).

All offenses involving a handgun are felonies under Title 11, chapter 10. FSM v. Aliven, 16 FSM R. 520, 527 n.1 (Chk. 2009).

11 F.S.M.C. 1023(7), which prohibits firearms use in connection with or in aid of the commission of "any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," does not restrict liability for firearms use to only those crimes defined in the FSM Code because the term "any crime against the laws of the Federated States of Micronesia," when read in context must refer to any or all criminal laws in the Federated States of Micronesia, national, state, or local, since, if it were otherwise, it would not be possible for the statute to have its obviously intended purpose and effect – to discourage the use of, and to punish the use of, firearms during the commission of other crimes. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

The use of a firearm to commit a Chuuk state law crime, such as robbery, is a national offense even though the robbery itself is not a national offense. FSM v. Suzuki, 17 FSM R. 70, 76 (Chk. 2010).

Since the possession of any handgun is banned, an information charging the illegal possession of a handgun is not deficient when the information does not allege the handgun's exact barrel length, color, caliber, or whether the handgun was a pistol or a revolver. The allegation that an accused possessed a handgun is an allegation that the firearm had a barrel length under twenty-six inches because that is the statutory definition of a handgun. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 127 (Chk. 2011).

The carefully written statutory language precludes evasion of the statute's purpose by such simple expedients as dismantling the weapon, maintaining weapons and ammunition in separate places, removing one easily replaceable part, or other similar ploys. Under the statute, current operability is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a firearm. FSM v. Meitou, 18 FSM R. 121, 128 (Chk. 2011).

The firearm statute's purpose cannot be evaded by such simple expedients as dismantling the weapon, maintaining weapons and ammunition in separate places, removing one easily replaceable part, or other similar ploys. Under the statute, current operability is not an essential element of the crime of possession of a firearm. FSM v. Sonis, 18 FSM R. 620, 622 (Chk. 2013).

An argument that the defendant never possessed the firearm is not fatal to a charge that he attempted to illegally possess a weapon. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 400-01 (Kos. 2017).

A defendant's contention that there was no attempt to commit the crime of possession of a firearm without a valid license because he applied for such license shortly after the firearm arrived in his postal box, may be raised at trial as evidence that he made no attempt to possess the firearm without a license, but the ultimate burden of persuasion remains with the government to prove the elements of attempt in spite of these assertions. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

When both the defendant's intent and whether he committed an act sufficient to amount to an attempt are questions of fact inappropriate for determination before trial, the defendant's motion to dismiss the charge of attempt to possess a firearm without having a valid identification card will be denied. FSM v. Mumma, 21 FSM R. 387, 401 (Kos. 2017).

The only elements needed for a successful 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) prosecution is that the firearm is something other than a .22 rile or a .410 shotgun and the defendant knows that he possesses a firearm. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 335 n.1 (Chk. 2019).

Unlawful firearms possession is almost a strict liability crime – the defendant need only know that he possesses a firearm, and in the case of prosecutions under 11 F.S.M.C. 1005, and that he does not possess a firearms identification card. FSM v. Pillias, 22 FSM R. 334, 338 (Chk. 2019).

Neither 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) nor 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) is the lesser included offense of the other because both impose liability for possession of a firearm or ammunition without an identification card. Section 1005(1) imposes liability for acquiring a firearm or ammunition in any manner, while Section 1006(1) imposes liability only if the acquisition is by purchase, and Section 1006(1) imposes liability for the use of a firearm or ammunition, while Section 1005(1) does not, but it is difficult to see how someone could use a firearm or ammunition without actually also possessing that firearm or ammunition, and it is also difficult to see how a person could acquire or purchase a firearm or ammunition without also then necessarily actually possessing that firearm or ammunition. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 535 & n.4 (Yap 2020).

The 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(2) statutory presumption about who possesses a firearm or ammunition found in a vehicle or a vessel applies generally to any charge based on the possession of firearms or ammunition found in a vehicle or vessel, and would apply to a prosecution under 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1). FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 (Yap 2020).

If a defendant is charged with violating both 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) and the court finds the defendant guilty of either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1), the court must then dismiss the other count because 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) charge the same crime. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 (Yap 2020).

11 F.S.M.C. 1007 is a misdemeanor because anyone convicted of it cannot be imprisoned for more than one year and because a felony is any crime which is punishable by imprisonment for more than one year. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 536 n.7 (Yap 2020).

A person without an identification card can violate either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) by acquiring or purchasing, or by possessing, or by using a firearm. But if that person, without a valid identification card, does any of those things but does not carry the firearm, that person has not committed the lesser misdemeanor of 11 F.S.M.C. 1007. The misdemeanor's key element is the carrying of a firearm. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

The prosecution, to secure a 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 conviction, has to prove an element that it does not have to prove to convict under either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1). It must prove that not only did the defendant possess the firearm without holding an identification card, but that the defendant also carried the firearm, which is not an element of either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006. Section 1007 is directed to a different evil – the carrying of a firearm, either unsafely or by someone without a valid identification card (or both), while Sections 1006 and 1005(1) are directed toward the evil of possession of a firearm or ammunition without an identification card. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

The Section 1007 misdemeanor is not a lesser included offense of 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) because that felony can easily be committed without violating 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 because, to violate 11 F.S.M.C. 1007, the firearm, whether legal or illegal, must be carried. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 537 (Yap 2020).

To obtain a conviction under either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1), the prosecution must prove that the person in possession of a firearm does not hold a valid identification card. To obtain a conviction under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5), the prosecution must prove that the person possesses an illegal firearm, such as a handgun. Thus, each statutory provision (treating 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) as one provision) requires the proof of a fact that the other does not. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

If a defendant holds a valid identification card, then he cannot be convicted of violating either 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) or 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1), even though the firearm he possesses is illegal and cannot be registered under 11 F.S.M.C. 1019, but he could be prosecuted under 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5). FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

The statutory scheme in FSM Weapons Control Act, chapter 10 of the FSM Code, clearly requires that a person must hold a valid identification card before obtaining possession of a firearm or ammunition. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

Section 1023(5) is directed to the evil of prohibited firearms and 11 F.S.M.C. 1005(1) and 11 F.S.M.C. 1006(1) are directed to the evil of persons not obtaining a valid identification card before possessing firearms or ammunition. Thus, Congress clearly intended to address different evils with these different statutory provisions. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).

Since 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 requires proof that the weapon was carried, while 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) does not, and 11 F.S.M.C. 1023(5) requires proof that the firearm was illegal, while 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 does not, and since the two statutes are directed to different evils – Section 1023(5) is directed to the evil of prohibited firearms and 11 F.S.M.C. 1007 is directed to the evil of improper carrying of a firearm, a defendant can be convicted of both. FSM v. Buchun, 22 FSM R. 529, 538 (Yap 2020).
